2. That for the 1952 taxation year the graduated rates of tax applicable to income of individuals be the average of the present rates (including defence surtax) and the rates set out in paragraph 1.

3. That with respect to income of corporations earned on and after January 1, 1952, the present rate of tax shall be increased from 15 per cent to 20 per cent on the first $10,000 of taxable income and from 38 per cent to 50 per cent on taxable income in excess of $10,000, and that the defence surtax be repealed.

4. That there may be deducted from the amount of income tax otherwise payable by a corporation for a taxation year in respect of income earned on and after January 1, 1952,

(a) the amount of income tax payable to the government of a province for that taxation year in respect of income earned on and after January 1, 1952, as a result of its operations in that province, or

(b) 5 per cent of the taxable income of the corporation of that taxation year under the Income Tax Act that is earned on and after January 1, 1952, as a result of its operations in that province, whichever is less.

5. That for the 1952 and subsequent taxation years the maximum amount in respect of medical expenses that may be deducted in computing taxable income be increased

(a) to $2,000 in the case of a person who may at present deduct a maximum of $1,000,

(b) to $1,500 in the case of a person who may at present deduct a maximum of $750, and

(c) to $500 for each dependent in respect of whom a maximum of $250 may at present be deducted, subject to a maximum deduction of $2,000 by a husband and wife between them or by a person in respect of all his dependents; and that there be included in the medical expenses that may be deducted in computing taxable income those medical expenses that at present are not included by reason only that they were not incurred in the appropriate twelve-month period in which they were paid.

6. That crown corporations that are classed as proprietary corporations in the Financial Administration Act shall pay tax on income earned on and after January 1, 1952.

7. That the special deduction from income to a taxpayer whose principal business is the production, refining or marketing of petroleum or petroleum products or the exploring or drilling for oil or natural gas or mining or exploring for minerals, be allowed for expenses incurred in the 1955 operations on the same basis as for expenses incurred in the years 1951 to 1954.

8. That the special deduction from income and taxes of a taxpayer whose principal business is production, refining or marketing of petroleum or drilling for petroleum be allowed for expenses incurred in respect of deep-test oil wells in 1953 operations on the same basis as for similar expenses in operations of the years 1950 to 1952.

9. That the exemption of the income from a metalliferous or industrial mineral mine for the first three years of production now applicable to mines coming into production during the years 1946 to 1954 be extended to mines coming into production during the year 1955.

10. That a corporation resident in Canada whose gross revenue for a taxation year ending on or after January 1, 1952 derived from the distribution to or generation for distribution to the public of electrical energy, gas or steam is more than one-half its total gross revenue for the same period shall be entitled to a deduction from the tax otherwise payable by it under the Income Tax Act to the extent necessary to reduce to 43 per cent the rate of tax payable by the corporation under that act on that part of its taxable income for that taxation year that is derived on and after January 1, 1952 from such distribution or generation.

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): I was going to suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we follow the practice we followed yesterday and have a short general discussion on the principle of the entire resolution on the first item, then on the subsequent items stick to the actual subject matter of the items under consideration.

I think perhaps I should lead off this discussion on the first item by answering some of the points raised during the first stage of this debate when the Speaker was in the chair by certain members who dealt with tax matters in the budget debate. In his remarks the other evening the minister pointed out that many excellent speeches were made during that debate but that very few of them actually related to tax matters.

So I will confine myself to those points raised in speeches which related to tax matters coming under this resolution.

The one speech which I should mention which was entirely on tax matters, and principally on the tax matters in this resolution, was the speech by the hon. member for Hamilton West, so perhaps I could start by answering the various points which she raised. If there are further technical points which may arise during the discussion on the resolution and which may need some working out, then the minister will prepare suitable replies for delivery when the bill is before the house.

On page 1555 of Hansard for April 24, the hon. member objected to the fact that in calculating the defence surtax for 1951, taxpayers were required to take 10 per cent of the amount which was the tax before deducting the credit for dividends from Canadian taxpaying corporations. The defence surtax was also calculated before the calculation of the credit for any foreign taxes. By this arrangement the tax is increased or decreased by any surcharge or payment before applying any tax credit, and this arrangement is not new. It has been the existing practice.

I shall give an example of when we reduced the tax by a percentage, the very opposite of what was done in 1951. When the tax was reduced by 4 per cent in 1945 and 16 per cent in 1946, those percentage reductions were applied before applying the tax credits for foreign taxes. Those, of course, were the only tax credits we had at that time. The hon. member will appreciate that the effect of that was to give a maximum reduction, since it was on the larger amount. The arrangement of the 1951 form carried out the intent of the 10 per cent tax credit for dividends, which was that the total tax of the taxpayer be reduced by an amount equal to 10 per cent of the net dividend income from Canadian tax paying corporations. Actually, the observation applied only to tax returns for 1951, since we have now removed the surcharge, and it is not a problem which will recur.

On page 1556 of Hansard the hon. member referred to the recommendation of the Canadian Bar Association and the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants that the taxpayer be permitted to add dividend income of his spouse in excess of $250 to his own income and so receive the benefit of the same 10 per cent tax credit for Canadian dividends. The exemption of the taxpayer is reduced when his spouse has an income over $250 because the extent to which the taxpayer has to support his spouse is reduced if the spouse has extra income. The extent to which the taxpayer has to support his spouse is reduced regardless of whether the spouse's income is from dividends, interest or wages. This suggested amendment would give special alleviation only to the couple where the spouse's income was from dividends.

On page 1556 of Hansard the hon. member referred to a case where the taxpayer supported a dependent sister in 1951. The taxpayer incurred heavy medical expenses in respect of this dependent sister in 1951, but was able to pay only a small part of them. Finally the dependent sister died in 1951. I think that is the situation. The member stated that the taxpayer is not allowed to claim an allowance against his 1952 tax for the medical expenses incurred and paid in the twelve-months period ending in 1952 because the sister, having died in 1951, is no longer a dependent of the taxpayer. This does not appear to be in accordance with the law. Section 26(1)(b)(iii) reads in part, "or any dependent in respect of whom he may make a deduction from income under section 25 for the year in which the expense was incurred." I am informed by the officers of the Department of National Revenue that they would like to have the details of this case from the hon. member.

Mrs. Fairclough: May I ask a question? Do I understand the parliamentary assistant to imply that the subsequent amounts as paid will be allowed?

Mr. Sinclair: If they are for the twelve-months period ending in 1952, even though the sister is now deceased and is not classed as a dependent so far as the dependent exemption for this year is concerned.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is new.

Mr. Sinclair: That is the interpretation which the officials have placed on section 26(1)(b)(iii). Once again, it is an administrative point. Perhaps if the hon. member would see the officials—

Mrs. Fairclough: I am wondering if that is because of the amendment which was made by the minister this year in withdrawing the word "incurred". Prior to the budget speech this year, the expenses were theoretically supposed to be incurred and paid in the same year, although that practice was not pressed in the district offices.

Mr. Sinclair: Perhaps the hon. member could follow that up with the appropriate officials.

The next point was this matter about which I am quite sure we will hear a lot this afternoon, the 4 per cent medical deduction. On page 1557 of Hansard she said that the taxpayer who has medical expenses in excess of 4 per cent of his income loses an exemption each year equal to 4 per cent of his income. Over ten years she said the total of this amount which could not be deducted could be $1,500, and this might be the factor in deciding whether or not one of his children attended university.

This is a common slip which almost everyone who is dealing with tax returns makes. It is certainly a slip I have made myself, in regarding the amount of income exempt from tax as being an actual tax saving. If in this case the 4 per cent of a man's income is $150, that means he has an income of $3,750. Presumably he has one child, since we are looking forward to a university education ten years from now. His exemption, therefore, should be $2,150 and his taxable income would be $1,600. He has to pay 17 per cent on the first $1,000 and 19 per cent on the next $600. The loss of a $150 exemption means an additional tax of $28.50. Over ten years this would amount to $285—quite a significant sum it is true, but $28.50 per year is not likely to mean the difference between university or no university.

Mrs. Fairclough: When I made that remark I do not think I called it tax; I think I called it tax basis.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, that is quite true. Then the member criticized the estimate I used in the case for eliminating the 4 per cent on medical expenses.

Mrs. Fairclough: I did, yes, but not as a major objection—only as one of the minor objections.

Mr. Sinclair: Subsequent to that I got a letter from a citizen in Hull also expressing grave doubts about my arithmetic, so I settled down and worked out sample cases which were then checked by the department. This citizen was thoughtful enough to send copies of the letter, not only to my minister but also to the member for Eglinton and to the member for Winnipeg North Centre. I was equally thoughtful, therefore, and sent them copies of my reply.

Mr. Knowles: I shall be equally thoughtful and give you a reply today.

Mr. Sinclair: I am glad that so much thought has been given to the matter.

The next case is a very difficult one which I think lawyers describe by saying that hard cases make bad law. The hon. member referred to the case of an immigrant who came into the country in November, and mentioned the impact of the family allowances. There are two situations. The first situation occurs when a Canadian child is born in November. In December the child is eligible for family allowance of $5. Because of that the parent gets the exemption of $150 for the child in receipt of family allowance—that is the lower exemption—but they have only had $5 in family allowances. However, at the end of the family allowances for eleven months at $8, making $88. Because the family allowance is not payable in the last month. The taxpayer is now eligible for the larger income tax deduction of $400, so that averages out.

This case mentioned by the hon. member, however, does not average out because the immigrant family comes in here at the end of the year, and a year later the children become qualified for family allowance. They draw family allowance for just one month, but because of that the parent, the father, on his income tax return can claim only $150 instead of $400. It is a problem which is known. There is no easy answer for it. It has been suggested that perhaps we could pro rate both the family allowance and the income tax exemption across the months. That would be a fairly difficult problem as far as administration is concerned. Since this case is so rare,—and it is rare for one reason, namely that it is a fairly fortunate immigrant who at the end of one year is in a position to be paying substantial income tax—it has been decided not to change it, or not to make it, as the hon. member suggested, optional whether they take the family allowance or not.

That leads me automatically into the other comment which was made in connection with this particular item on the impact of taxes and family allowances. I refer to the now famous speech by the hon. member for Moose Jaw. I know he has been dealt with rather severely by some of his colleagues, so I will not say anything uncharitable about him; but I will deal with the proposal he makes purely from the point of view of the impact of taxation under item 1.

To be entirely fair to the hon. member I want to read his exact words as reported at page 1573 of Hansard:

> The taxpayers are going to spend $332 million this year on family allowances. I say at once that most of this money will be well spent, but I cannot help wondering how badly my good friend, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson), needs three family allowance cheques to make ends meet. There must be many other people in Canada in the same category.
> Mr. Garson: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Would he apply a means test to the baby bonus too?
> Mr. Knowles: Over my dead body.
> Mr. Thatcher: I thank the minister for his question and I should like to answer it. I wonder whether it is sensible to pay old age pensions or family allowances to those with an income say of $5,000 a year or more. I take that figure out of the air, as perhaps it should be $6,000.

I should like hon. members to keep especially in mind that figure.

I am referring to those people who have no need of them. If the minister adopted this suggestion my closest estimate is that he would save the taxpayers about $30 million.

The hon. member was not here when the first family allowance bill was passed, so perhaps he has forgotten the implication of it. When the bill was first passed it was designed to help the lower income families, families with less than $3,000. A man who paid no income tax got the full amount, and then the benefit tapered off so that at $3,000 a man with a family really got no benefit. The extra taxes he paid and the family allowance evened out.

One year's experience with that, however, showed that it had the same grave weaknesses that our former old age pension scheme had. There were two weaknesses. The first, so far as the public was concerned, was that this family allowance then had, in the minds of many people, the stigma of charity, the stigma of almost poverty; it was only people who were poor who were going to get it. In this country we have a great many proud people—that is, proud in the good sense of wanting their own independence—and they are not going to take handouts from anybody. During that first year a great many people who actually needed these allowances and who qualified for them would not take them because of that consideration. At the end of the first year a change was made in the Income Tax Act.

I may say that the second point—and an important point as far as the cost of government is concerned; and I know that is of great concern to the hon. member—is this. If the parent had the choice of having the family allowance and the $150 exemption or of not taking it and getting the $400 exemption, every single income tax form would then have to be checked over with the Department of National Health and Welfare to see whether the child had got the allowance. That would involve an enormous amount of paper work or red tape for both departments. Consequently a better plan was worked out the next year by the income tax department and the Department of National Health and Welfare, whereby the same result was achieved through the use of taxation but not with an open, obvious means test—with the humiliations which go with a means test and the stigma of charity which led certain proud and independent families to say: no, we will not get it—and at the same time preserving this important point that this money was not going to families such as those referred to by the hon. member.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Let me show you quickly and easily just how this plan works out. The hon. member for Moose Jaw suggested as an example this innocent bystander, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I think it is most unfortunate to use as an example somebody who had not participated in the debate. As a matter of fact, I have the same view as has the income tax department, namely, that the individual's personal income is a matter for himself. However, we are extremely fortunate this week in seeing, in a national magazine, an estimate of the income of the hon. member for Moose Jaw; and since he raised the question—

Mr. Gibson: Work it out on his basis.

Mr. Sinclair: That is exactly the basis on which I want to work it out. If hon. members will just follow item 1, they will find that the income attributed to the hon. member by this magazine, which prides itself on the accuracy of its research, comes under item (k) of resolution 1, whereby the marginal rate is 60 per cent. If we had not this new family allowance scheme, the hon. member could claim a $400 exemption for his one child, but because this family allowance is now made applicable to everybody he is allowed only $150 and receives family allowance. We have therefore removed $250 and put it back in the taxable income on this 60 per cent rate, which means he pays $150 more tax, quite aside from his other taxes, for the privilege of receiving $84 a year in family allowances. Therefore, far from having no means test and giving these family allowances to the rich, we actually are making the rich pay toward this great social measure even more than they did under the first year's plan where there was this arbitrary, open means test.

I could describe it as having a built-in means test where there is no public humiliation, where all may recognize that whether they take it or not, they are going to be assessed as having taken it; where the people who need the benefit get the most benefit; and where those in the upper classes—in the brackets to which the hon. member referred in his speech—not only get no benefit but have to make a fairly substantial contribution toward this fund.

Hon. members might ask me now where the breaking point is. It is an interesting breaking point. The hon. member, in his innocence—I was going to say in his ignorance, but "innocence" is perhaps a nicer word, and being charitable I will use it—suggested $6,000. The average family allowance across Canada is $6; that is $72 a year. Where, on this $250 difference between the income tax exemption given for a family allowance child and a non-family allowance child, does the tax equal that amount? At the 30 per cent level 30 per cent of $250 is $75. Again, if hon. members will just follow item 1—and I am keeping deliberately to this item—you will find that the 30 per cent level starts with taxable income of $6,000. Hence we actually achieved four or five years ago the very purpose which the hon. member set out to establish in his speech, and I think it is a purpose which everybody interested in this legislation thinks is the best way out. We have no obvious means test. It is a solution which gives the maximum benefit to the people who are most deserving of it.

Curiously enough, exactly the same built-in provision now occurs in our new old age pension plan. You might expect that. The able Minister of National Health and Welfare had this experience with family allowances; we heard for many years the objection everybody made to the open means test that is contained in the former old age pension, and with that experience in mind we were able immediately to apply a similar provision through taxation—the taxation outlined in this schedule—to the old age pension.

Once again I want to be fair to the hon. member and not put words in his mouth. I will read the exact words he used in referring to the need for a means test in connection with the old age pension. This is again to be found at page 1573 of Hansard.

He said:

> We have had this scheme now for four months and I cannot help doubting the wisdom of paying old age pensions to Canadians who are wealthy and have no need of them.
> Mr. Sinclair: You want a means test, in other words.
> Mr. Thatcher: Just let me continue.
> Mr. Sinclair: You want a means test.
> Mr. Thatcher: I must say that I find it a little ludicrous that the taxpayers of Canada, overburdened as they are, should be paying an old age pension—I take this gentleman only as an example—to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). I cannot believe that a man in his financial circumstances needs it. I understand too that we are paying the pension to quite a few senators. I suppose even my old employer, multimillionaire J. S. McLean, now qualifies for the $40 monthly cheque, although I do not know whether he is collecting it or not.

Let me take his own example once again, and we will just see what the net return is to his friend Mr. McLean under the new old age pension scheme. The fact that Mr. McLean is referred to by my friend as a multimillionaire probably puts him in the class around $100,000 a year income. Again if hon. members refer to these schedules here they will see in schedule I that that is at the rate of 75 per cent. It is near the top bracket. Therefore, out of the $40 a month that Mr. McLean may or may not receive—I do not know whether he takes it or not—we take $30 back, leaving him a net of $10 a month. Therefore on the year he is $120 better off because of the introduction of this means-test-free old age pension.

But this is not paid out of the general treasury. We have established definite methods of contributions, of payments from everybody, including those on pension, for this plan. The first is the 2 per cent tax with the ceiling of $60. This gentleman is obviously at the ceiling. During the course of the year he pays first of all $60 as that contribution. Second is the 2 per cent sales tax. I tried to get some estimate from the dominion bureau of statistics as to what the spending habits of a man in that income bracket would be, but I was unable to get it. I do not know myself. I would presume that a man in the bracket of a multi-millionaire would spend $10,000 a year on goods other than food, fuel and building materials; in other words, goods on which sales tax is payable. So he is paying at least $200 a year more because of the fact that he is now receiving means-test-free old age pension.

Third is the two per cent levied against corporations. The incidence of this is very difficult to assess. Economists and tax authorities can dispute at long length where the actual incidence is, where that burden is carried; whether it is carried by the shareholders of the company; whether it is carried by the ultimate consumer or whether it is carried by labour who get less of the share of the profits because of the extra tax burden. It is sure to be somewhere in between. This gentleman is obviously a substantial shareholder in many corporations, and a consumer. I will say that his contribution in that way would be at least as large as his contribution to sales tax. But suppose it is even less than his direct contribution of income tax as a consequence of the tax changes to bring in this old age pension. He is paying at least $300 more in taxes to net this $120, once again showing that this measure was very carefully designed to have precisely the effect that the hon. gentleman is advocating, so that the old age pension will be of maximum benefit to those who have most need for it, and will be not only of no benefit but a major charge on those who have no need for it.

I know that the hon. member made these suggestions in good faith. He also mentioned the Prime Minister.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I ask a question? I failed to follow the parliamentary assistant toward the end. I thought in his consideration of this income that he had got to the point where he said that the recipient would have something like $120 left.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then he proceeded, if I understood him correctly, to say that would be cut down by reason of various taxes which the recipient would pay on that.

Mr. Sinclair: No, that is the benefit he receives.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I just finish? If it is not cut down by taxes that he pays on it, I am not able to follow the argument.

Mr. Sinclair: I am sorry if I have not made myself clear. I am comparing the position of this gentleman before we brought in this old age pension plan; that is, before we put on this extra two per cent sales tax and the extra two per cent income tax and the extra two per cent corporation tax. In those happy days, so far as he was concerned, he did not have these extra taxes to pay that he has to pay now. When he pays those extras he does get a benefit of $120 a year, but let us see the extra he pays for that. That $120 is the net. He actually gets $40 a month, $480 a year. Then, being at the top level, he pays a 75 per cent tax on that, which leaves him a net of $120, so he is $120 better off as far as receipts are concerned. Let us see what he did for this benefit. In my rudimentary calculation he paid at least $300 more than the tax he paid before this scheme came into effect, that is before he got this $120.

Mr. Coldwell: On the 2-2-2 formula.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Thatcher: Will the parliamentary assistant permit me a question? Would he not be paying that whether he got the pension or not? That is the law.

Mr. Sinclair: That strengthens my argument, because if he does not care to take the $120, then he pays $300 extra and gets nothing back. I would not have used him as an example except that the hon. member wanted to use him as an example to strengthen his case. From the point of view of tax levels, he could not have picked a better case.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I ask a question again? Am I not right in saying to the parliamentary assistant that by reason of putting this universal old age pension in we put on the 2-2-2 tax formula, and this man by reason of that pays this amount —I think you said $300; but surely that has nothing to do with it. He would be paying this at the present time anyway. He would be paying it whether he got the old age pension or not. Surely it is not a fair argument to say that because we have created a tax as part of the institution of old age pension by reason of which these rich men will pay more than they receive therefore it costs nothing to pay them the pension. They would pay those taxes whether they got the pension or not. Surely in order to make your argument you have to figure what he pays on the exact amount of his allowance and not bring in other taxes which he pays.

Mr. Sinclair: I think almost everybody in the committee except the hon. member followed my argument.

Mr. Thatcher: No.

Mr. Sinclair: I will try once again. Before we brought in this means-test-free old age pension this gentleman did not qualify for the old age pension because he did not come under the means test, nor did he pay any contribution over and above his existing income tax and sales tax. We decide that there is to be a means-test-free old age pension. He now qualifies for that. We also decide that it is to be paid for over and above the existing tax rate which he pays. There is to be two per cent more on personal income tax only for old age pension; there is to be two per cent more on sales tax on goods he buys for consumption, and there is a two per cent corporation tax, the incidence of which would have to be traced down with some care in differing companies. All these things are new. Then there is a new tax. On the one hand there is new benefit. The benefit he gets is $480 a year. Because of this gentleman's tax position he pays a 75 per cent rate on that, which leaves him out of this new benefit only $120. Now, let us see what he paid for that $120. I will not go through the argument again. Of these new taxes he has paid—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): And he would pay those taxes whether he got the $120 or not.

Mr. Sinclair: Just as in the case of family allowances. That is the real reason why the stigma of charity that used to attach—

Mr. Knowles: If it were not for that benefit, the tax would not have been imposed.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member has mentioned the real point, and that is the real significance of this scheme. The point about family allowances is that you cannot claim $400 allowance for your child who qualifies for family allowances whether you claim family allowance or not—just $150. Then there is no stigma of charity, and most people say: Well I am paying anyway; I might as well take it. I think there is something that should be admired in this house. All of us who have elderly people in our ridings know of the difficulties they have had in recent years. I do not suppose there is any hon. member in the house who has more elderly people in his riding than I have on the southern coast of British Columbia where so many people from central Canada come to retire. Among that group there were people who could have qualified under the previous old age pension legislation, but would not because of the stigma of charity that was there. It was referred to as a handout from the public. Even with the new old age pension, there was still the hangover of that feeling. No better example could have been given to this country, to show that this new pension plan is the right of every Canadian because every Canadian is paying for it, than the example given of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish to make clear that I am not objecting to it. I am only trying to understand the illustration; and I still think you have not made your point.

Mr. Sinclair: I am sure that if I were to take a vote it would show that almost every other member has understood it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I understand the argument made; but it does not cover the point.

Mr. McIvor: I would like to ask the parliamentary assistant this question: Does that mean that every man who qualifies for an old age pension takes it whether he wants it or not?

Mr. Sinclair: That is a matter which the Minister of National Health and Welfare will have to answer. As with family allowances, it is a matter of application. But whether he takes it or not, he will have to pay the tax—two per cent on income tax, two per cent on sales tax, and the extra two per cent corporation tax.

Mr. Coldwell: I follow the argument, and I agree fully with the point of view expressed. But I wish to ask this: Would not the argument of the parliamentary assistant be strengthened if the government had not put the limit of $60 on the personal contribution?

Mr. Sinclair: It is a matter of degree. I think the hon. member's argument illustrates best the fact that, quite aside from assessing this very heavy income tax on people of that range—the 75 per cent range at the top; despite all that, and the fact that he has already made a heavy contribution to the exchequer, he is paying at least $300 for a benefit of $120. I think if we had applied the two per cent right across the whole thing he would be then paying about $2,300 for this $120 of benefit. And even for the very rich—I know the hon. member for Moose Jaw pointed out the way to soak the rich—even for them, I think there should be some measure of justice.

I think all hon. members have wanted to have this story on the record. I believe they will agree that tax matters are difficult; but any member who wishes to have information or help on any tax matter in preparing a tax speech is more than welcome. He may consult the deputy minister of finance, or the assistant deputy ministers. He may lay the matter before the deputy minister of taxation or the deputy minister of customs and excise. Or, he might even consult the parliamentary assistant—as the hon. member for Moose Jaw was accused of doing in the press, but which was not so. Had he done so, he would have been guided away from that error.

Mr. McIvor: Then the hon. member for Moose Jaw was wiser than a lot of us thought he was.

Mr. Sinclair: Other points have been raised. I have now gone through the major points which were discussed by the hon. member for Hamilton West. I have taken them first, and I have not done so because she is a lady—indeed, I know she wishes to be regarded as the equal of other members in the house—but because her speech was the only one devoted entirely to taxation matters in the budget debate.

At page 1484 of Hansard the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) maintains that the tax to be paid in 1952—and he quite properly separated that from the old age security tax—will be higher than that paid for 1951. He gave two examples which he asked the Minister of Finance to check.

The examples, of course, were right, and they check with the tables. Nowhere in the budget speech did the minister claim that the tax for 1952 would be less than the tax for 1951. He did say, however, that the tax in 1952, disregarding the old age security tax, would be lower as a result of the proposed changes than it would be if no amendment were made to the present law. If changing the rate structure results in lower taxes than would be the case if no action is taken, surely the change must be called a tax reduction.

In this connection I wish to put three quotations on the record from the minister's speech. The first of these is found at page 1253 of Hansard, toward the bottom of the page, where he first opened up on the personal income tax field. This is what he said:

> In the personal income tax field a new rate schedule will be introduced. Into this new schedule I propose to incorporate most of the weight of the present 20 per cent surcharge. There will be some over-all abatement although in saying this I should remind the house that the two per cent income tax imposed by parliament last session under the Old Age Security Act will be coming into force on July 1 of this year.

Then, at page 1254, he said:

> I expect the revenue loss as a result of these changes to be about six per cent in a full year and this loss in revenue is a general indication of the average gain to the individual taxpayer.

And the loss of revenue is obviously money the taxpayer did not pay in.

> In other words, the average taxpayer will pay six per cent less than he would otherwise have done under the income tax law as it now stands.

Finally at page 1255 he returns to the subject, with these words:

> I think I should make clear that the reductions in income tax which I have announced will not be sufficient, for most taxpayers, to offset the effect of the old age security tax.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) made an interesting statement, which is set out at page 1491 of Hansard, as follows:

> What the taxpayers of this country want to know and what they are entitled to know is exactly, in dollars, what they have to pay in income tax in 1952, and by how many dollars that sum is greater or less than what they actually paid in 1951.

This information I now have in a series of tables now before me. I have already given one example, in connection with that discussed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, namely the married taxpayer with an income of $3,000. But, since the hon. member for Peace River has asked for more detailed information, I have had prepared what I believe is a fairly complete set of tables setting out exactly what he asked for. I agree with him that it is not percentages about which his constituents are worrying, it is the dollars in their pockets. With that in mind I have had prepared information with respect to 1951, 1952 and 1953 personal income taxes, first of all for the single taxpayer, then for the married taxpayer with no children, for the married taxpayer with two dependents and not eligible for family allowances, and, finally, for the married taxpayer with two children who is eligible for family allowances. If the house wishes to have this information I shall be pleased to place it on record.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sinclair: The tables are as follows:

[1] Includes old age security tax.

NOTE.—In calculating the above taxes it has been assumed that all incomes up to $30,000 are entirely earned incomes, and that incomes of more than $30,000 include earned income of that amount and additional investment income to make up the total. No account has been taken of the 10 per cent tax credit.

The next point made by the hon. member for Peace River was that the total tax load per capita in 1938-39 was $69.12, and that by 1951 this had risen to $360. A comparison of the total per capita tax payments in two separate years is not a very good indication of changes in the total tax burden. A study of the national accounts shows that the total tax take of the federal, provincial and municipal governments from the Canadian people in 1939 was over 21 per cent of the net national income. In 1951 the percentage of net national income taken by the three levels of government was about 29 per cent.

I wish to comment on that figure. This is not a large increase, in view of the enormous costs of the war and the present defence program which must be met by increased taxation. The comparison between 1938-39 and 1951 covers not only six years of the most expensive war in history, but also extensive post-war defence operations. That is the point I wish to make, so far as that 29 per cent is concerned.

Furthermore, the hon. member for Peace River overlooks the extent to which taxes are now only transfer payments going back to Canadians in such forms as family allowances, old age pensions, and interest on the public debt, various grants and subsidies to special groups, and payments to the provinces. This would include coal subsidies, and the like. Transfer payments of this kind to the provinces—subsidies, tax rentals and the like—are not properly speaking expenditures by the federal government, since they do not spend the money.

In the analysis by the Australian economist, Clark, to which reference has been made, he places the danger point on government spending at 25 per cent. That is exclusive of transfer payments. But transfer payments by the federal government last year amounted to about $1,500 million. I think those are probably the main points raised on item 1 of the income tax resolution.

Mr. Laing: First of all I want to compliment the parliamentary assistant on the excellent presentation of these matters that he has made both today and yesterday. I hope that he can continue his good record with respect to the matter that I now want to bring to his attention. It has to do with the question of dependents allowances, and has particular application to a subject he has just been discussing, the question of the old age pensioner. I hold in my hand a copy of the individual income tax form. This happens to be my own most recent tragic experience. I find at the top of page 2 a statement beside one of these orange asterisks, which the department likes so well, to the effect that one may not claim a dependent whose income was over $500.

I think a very unrealistic situation has arisen as a result of our no-means-test old age pension. I am sure we all realize that in every instance the old age pension is considered as income for taxation purposes. We are paying $480 a year to all our citizens 70 years of age and over with appropriate residence in Canada, but are only allowing $500, or $20 more, as a deduction for the children who in many instances support them. I think that is wrong. I think it is unrealistic in the light of our excellent Old Age Security Act.

There is another smaller but still very important group of people to whom I think my contention applies. I refer to people of junior age, particularly those who are attending university at the present time. The provision there respecting income is a limit of $500. There was a time in the very early twenties when the parliamentary assistant and I went to university together. It was a very rare occasion when a student could make $500 in a summer. At the present time if they are any good at all they do not have a great deal of difficulty making $500, and I think it is a good thing that they do not because universities have found that their costs have risen. In almost every instance they have had to raise their fees to a considerable extent. Today such fees are in the neighbourhood of $350 compared with the $75 that I used to pay. Having regard in the first instance to our old age pensioners and also having regard to the inflated conditions confronting our younger people today, I think we have an economic anachronism there. I have made representations on this matter to the minister already, and if he were to give it study I think he would see the justice and fairness of the claim. I hope that in the future he will correct the situation.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member did raise this question with the minister. It is one which normally would not come to the attention of most citizens, and I suppose most members of parliament, until next spring when the sons and daughters who are supporting their parents will suddenly realize that they can no longer claim as dependents those whom they have been claiming up until now because they are now in receipt of the means test free old age pension and their incomes are now over $500. The Minister of National Health and Welfare raised the matter on the ministerial level with the Minister of Finance. The situation is exactly as the hon. member for Vancouver South has outlined it. Everyone 70 years of age and over is now assured of $480, and if such a person has additional income of $200 his total income is now $680 and he is no longer regarded as a dependent.

The minister has taken the matter under consideration and has decided that in view of the situation the allowance for a dependent is going to be increased from $500 to $600 from this year on. The situation of the young university student will of course be covered to an extent, or any other child under 21 who is able to earn money in summer vacation. The situation however is not quite as rough on the borderline of the $500, or $600 as it will be, as some members think. There is in the Income Tax Act section 31 (8) which provides that if a dependent has an income over $500—it will now be over $600—that does not debar the person from being claimed as a dependent if the income is, we will say, $620 or $625. It would be very unfair if an income of $599 was included and an income of $601 was not. Therefore we have a tapering off provision over $600 with which some hon. members will be familiar.

The claiming taxpayer can add the amount of the excess over $600 to the tax he pays and list the person as a dependent. There is a very quick and obvious ceiling on that. In the case of the example I used of $200 additional income that person would be $80 over the ceiling. The point is of course as to where the limit is, above which it is not profitable to add the excess over $600 to the tax. If we take the $600 first of all at the base rate of 17 per cent, which is the rate paid by the great bulk of low income people who pay taxes, 17 per cent of $600 is $102, so up to $702 the tapering off provision applies.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think on the whole it has been convenient to have this reply by the parliamentary assistant to the taxation questions that were asked. Perhaps it makes it a little difficult to go back and discuss more general considerations which I think should be discussed at this point in our study of the resolution, but nevertheless I wish to do so for a brief period of time. I hope I am not one of those people who like to go on repeating things over and over again, but I think our position with respect to taxation at the present time is something that should be dwelt on, that it is tremendously in the people's minds, and that now that the budget is nearly through we are going to be in great danger of getting into a situation like the weather. Everybody talks about it and nobody does anything.

Yesterday afternoon we talked for a few hours and in the course of the discussion passed resolutions covering about a billion and a half dollars. Today, if my arithmetic is good, when this resolution has been finished we will have passed a resolution covering approximately two and a half billion dollars. We do that in the course of a few hours, but when we have done it that is just the beginning. Then the millions of taxpayers throughout Canada begin to pay the taxes. I think they are terribly disturbed about the present situation. As I said before, I think they are angry about it, and I think we should spend some time considering their state of mind and why their minds are in that state. Of course part of their state of mind is caused by the fact that they were perplexed and troubled about the surplus of last year. I am not going to dwell on that. It is not surprising that when people who were already groaning under their taxes saw hundreds of millions of dollars piled up—

Mr. Sinclair: I rise to a point of order. It was my understanding yesterday that the general discussion was going to be on the whole resolution as such, and that we were not going over the entire field of the main budget debate again. There is no reference in any of these items to the surplus, which of course involves not only ways and means but also supply. In my remarks I was very careful to stick entirely to the taxation matters which have reference to these various items. I would like your ruling, Mr. Chairman, as to whether we are again to cover the entire field of taxation on this specific income tax resolution.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If I may comment on that, today we are going to be asked really to take a second step in voting $2,500 million. I submit there are certain general considerations which arise. I propose, for example, to say something about the question of economy, because it seems to me that when we are discussing $2,500 million we are entitled to ask whether there is any possible way this amount could be reduced.

Mr. Sinclair: I rise on that question immediately, and point out that in this very long procedure in connection with tax bills we have first of all the budget debate, on the motion that the Speaker leave the chair, during which there is complete freedom to any hon. member to speak on any phase of taxation or otherwise. When we come to these resolutions we are supposed to discuss their principle, which is the increase or decrease in specific taxes. Once again I repeat that in ordinary language these resolutions are merely a warning to hon. members that tax bills are coming. The hon. member will have a wide-open opportunity to talk on any matters he wishes to raise as far as the general taxation policy is concerned, on the second reading of these various tax bills. Again I submit that I think it is helpful to have on the first item a general discussion on all the items of the resolution, as we did yesterday, and then proceed to specific discussion of individual items. I think in that way we can make the most progress and be in order.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I submit that yesterday no such narrow or technical interpretation was given. We did discuss in a general way matters affecting the customs tariff, excise taxes and so on. Speeches were made indicating the effects of these taxes in various ways. I want now to indicate in general the effect of these taxes, and to raise the whole question of whether this huge amount of taxation is necessary.

The Chairman: I think the hon. member will remember that yesterday I called the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to order because he proposed to discuss the sales tax generally. I cannot put my finger on the page in Hansard containing what I said then, but if I remember correctly it was to the effect that he could discuss generally the six or seven paragraphs having to do with sales tax, but that he should not go over the whole field. I think I also said that incidentally, in passing, he might make reference to certain suggestions having to do with sales tax which are not contemplated in the resolution, but merely as a passing reference.

In committee of supply or ways and means or of the whole I am bound to have standing order 58, second paragraph, observed. That standing order provides that speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration. It is true that in practice on the first item we do have a general discussion; but one must understand that it is a general discussion on the paragraphs of the resolution now before us. If the hon. member makes passing reference to other matters it must be no more than that.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Well, Mr. Chairman, I bow to your ruling, not only in a formal way but because I have respect for it. I would only comment that in spite of what may have been the wording of your ruling yesterday in connection with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, actually I think he was allowed to take, in his usual way, a fairly wide range in what he had to say. I have been perhaps a rather simple soul and a little too frank in indicating what I was going to say. What I should have done was say it without indicating in advance.

Mr. Knowles: Come up and see me sometime.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I may learn when I am older. I would like to make reference to one thing which has to do particularly with paragraph 5, but which also has to do with the general question of taxation; that is the way the resolution passed by this house was dealt with. I understand the Minister of Finance was asked some questions regarding it yesterday in North Waterloo, and no doubt if he were here he would be able to answer my questions with more gusto. I want to point out that I think a most unfortunate situation was created when that resolution was passed. There is no doubt in the world but that everyone in the house considered that a resolution had been passed unanimously asking that the 4 per cent exemption be altered. There is no doubt in the world that is what happened. How the government was caught off base as it was, I do not quite know. Later on it was explained, of course, perhaps with certain intellectual validity, that all the resolution actually said was that the government should be asked to give consideration. In his speech I think the parliamentary assistant quoted the Minister of Finance as saying in a general way, "Why, yes, of course; we will consider what anybody says." That is not very flattering to the house. Though that may be the attitude which is developing toward the House of Commons, it is not always stated so frankly.

The Chairman: Order. I must remind the hon. member that this matter was fully discussed and dealt with. The C.C.F. party moved, as an amendment to the motion that the Speaker leave the chair, that this very matter be considered. During that discussion the whole question of the resolution which has been introduced in former sessions and the vote taken this session was discussed fully. That amendment has been disposed of. Now the hon. member is going back to a matter which has been discussed previously, and he should not make repetitions.

Mr. Knowles: On the point you have just raised, Mr. Chairman, I respectfully suggest that more consideration might be given. First of all I point out that the parliamentary assistant made a passing reference to the matter this afternoon and said that he expected a good deal would be said about it during the course of the debate this afternoon. I agree that it should not be dealt with in the general discussion unless it is related to a paragraph dealing with the matter; but there is such a paragraph in this resolution.

May I also point out that many times in a budget debate we have had an amendment or subamendment dealing with some aspect of the budget, and despite the fact that there has been a negative vote on that amendment or subamendment the matter dealt with therein has been discussed in committee on the budget resolutions. The house may have turned down the motion, but the subject matter has not yet been disposed of by the committee of ways and means. If you wish to suggest that the discussion on this matter be confined to paragraph 5, that is a different point; but I respectfully suggest that you should not deny us the right to discuss the question of the floor under medical expenses. May I point out, as a matter of fact, that the changes being proposed in paragraph 5 are related to and inextricably tied in with the other question, so we will not be able to avoid discussing that phase of the matter.

The Chairman: If I may clarify my remarks, I was not referring to the rule which provides that once a matter has been decided by a vote it stands as the judgment of the house and therefore no reference can be made to it. I had in mind the citation which has to do with self-restraint, and that hon. members should avoid discussing over and over again matters which have already been dealt with in former debates. In opening his remarks the hon. member said he would try to avoid repetition, that he was not a member who liked to indulge in repetition. I was, therefore, bringing this to his attention.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am glad, Mr. Chairman, of the view you have taken, because it does seem to me that this question which I have been discussing does arise again of its own motion, so to speak, under the terms of this resolution. Actually, I have very little further to say on it except that I think the voters of this country, however moderate their opinions may be of the members that they send here, will be surprised that the members of this house can vote unanimously to have something done—which is the way they will understand it—and find out that it does not mean anything at all. It does not mean anything more than if the smallest village council in Canada sent in the same suggestion, because as we were told the minister is ready to consider all views emanating from anyone. Apparently the views of the House of Commons are treated exactly the same.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The hon. member is repeating what he said on the main debate. He said that twice during his speech.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister is wrong, because on the main debate I did not—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I thought he did not want to repeat.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I shall correct the minister by saying that on the main debate I did not deal with this subject at all. I believe he will find that out.

I just want to add one or two further comments, about the complexity in which we find ourselves in the first couple of resolutions. I believe that is due partly to the fact that the department—we never refer to the experts, but of course they are there—has had a most complicated task in trying to meet the political cycles which have been whirling around so rapidly. The result of that is that we had a special taxation period for the half of 1951, and now we are going to have a different one for half of 1952. We have to wait until we get to 1953 to really get going.

I believe that any other observations I wish to make can rest until later, so I shall not have to try your patience, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Sinclair: I should like to answer some of the points made. First, on this matter of consideration, there is no group of issues coming before the Canadian people in which every Canadian has so much interest as in taxes. I say that the Minister of Finance is quite right in saying that he will give consideration to any reasonable proposal put forward by any group in this country, from the House of Commons down to the smallest village council and on down to the smallest wage earner in this country.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): All I suggested was that the House of Commons might have a special position.

Mr. Sinclair: I myself as a member of parliament want no more special position for representations on taxes than any of my constituents.

The second point concerns this matter of consideration, because the Minister of Finance is bound, and should be bound, to give consideration to all tax proposals. These motions that are moved by private members on material matters, and which start by saying that consideration should be given to something, have a very special implication for the minister. It was for that reason the minister instructed me to say, as I did, that of course we would give consideration to this or any other proposal. When the hon. member, at the conclusion of his remarks, tried to imply by speaking very smoothly, as he generally does, that the house was giving assent to the proposal I jumped up and said, "No, no, we are recommending that the government should consider this proposal."

I want to say that in future, so far as the present Minister of Finance is concerned, if such proposals are going to be moved immediately before the budget, while the minister will give them consideration, they are not to be accepted in that sense. Obviously, if acceptance of a motion for consideration before the presentation of the budget means acceptance of the principle, then the whole principle of budget secrecy is gone. Every member would load down the order paper with every conceivable resolution on every phase of the tax structure.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You are really admitting my whole point. Thank you.

Mr. Knowles: Will the parliamentary assistant permit a question on that point? Would he explain why that attitude is being taken with respect to a motion this year referring to the deductibility of medical expenses, when a year ago a motion respecting the deductibility of trade union dues was not accepted but was voted down.

Mr. Sinclair: Obviously that was the right thing to do, and for the very reason I have been advancing, because in the end the thing was done.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, the government does the opposite of what the house votes for. Is that it?

Mr. Sinclair: What I was trying to point out was that, far from the government doing the opposite of what the house has voted for, if hon. members want to load down the order paper before the budget with every conceivable resolution on tax matters, and once the government said they would accept them for consideration it meant they were inevitably in the budget, then we would be in the position of having no budget secrecy. Under the British parliamentary system, budget secrecy is important so that no group shall have undue advantage by knowing of budget changes.

The second point is even more interesting, because if there was one thing I thought the hon. member for Greenwood would have understood with his long experience in business, it was that the government is anxious to bring about as little disturbance in industry in this country, and to avoid as much unnecessary paper work as possible. In my budget speech I explained at some length the reason why we have this division in the middle of the year. It has nothing to do with the government. In the old days when income tax was paid in a lump sum in the spring, no such problem arose. Today, when we deduct the great bulk of income tax through payroll deductions, week by week or fortnightly or monthly, depending upon the way the employee is paid, we have to supply every employer in the country with a tax schedule to show at what rate he should make deductions from his employees, dependent first of all on their wage and secondly their marital status. These deductions are incorporated in every pay sheet for every industry in this country.

If we were, for example, to have incorporated the full 20 per cent surcharge in last year's taxes, it would have meant that we would have had a 40 per cent surcharge for the last six months of the year because the budget was not approved until June. Then, immediately after January 1 of this year, the surcharge would have been returned to the 20 per cent, because it would have been for the whole year. This would have meant a double change in the tax schedules and payrolls of industry. It is for that reason that every tax change we have had since we adopted this policy of deductions at source—a policy which is not only convenient to government but is a real convenience so far as the individual taxpayer is concerned because he does not have to find a large sum in the springtime—has resulted in this split in the year's taxation.

Last year, for example, the tax tables which were in effect for the first half of the year were the tax tables without the surcharge which was only approved and given the royal assent in June. During the second half of the year the 20 per cent surcharge went into effect, so the same schedule could be used this year if no tax changes were made. Those schedules are in effect now. We hope that the income tax bill will be approved and become law by June, so that on July 1 the new rates which are mentioned here can be incorporated. For the first half of this year, the deductions will have been made at the 20 per cent surcharge level.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): All I am saying is that by chopping and changing you make it difficult.

Mr. Sinclair: That is a little different from the inference given. Now that I have explained that it is a convenience to both the taxpayer and industry, the hon. member is backing away from it.

Mr. Coldwell: I was going to say that, first of all, the parliamentary assistant has just said that a vote on a private member's resolution should be treated by the government in a manner different from a vote on a government measure. I have always felt that members of the house should be free to vote as they wish on a private member's resolution. This afternoon the parliamentary assistant made a statement that the government in the future will have to see that resolutions of the description of the one which we were discussing will not be approved by the house.

Mr. Sinclair: On tax matters before the budget.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes, on tax matters by the government. I take it that is the decision of the government for future guidance. I think that is unfortunate. I think that, on occasion, we should have in the House of Commons opportunities for members of the house to vote freely. I know that I was criticized for a statement made in the same connection outside the house and repeated in the house. I know that some members felt that I had been rather harsh in what I had said. But the statement made by the parliamentary assistant this afternoon would give colour and credence to what I said.

I think that there are two different sorts of resolution which come before the house. I understand perfectly well that when the government brings down a motion in support of a policy which has been decided upon by the cabinet and has been thoroughly discussed by them, they expect their own members to support it. That is one thing. But when we have before the house a private member's resolution simply asking the government to consider something, I think that every hon. member should have the opportunity and the right to vote as he pleases in that connection, asking the government to consider something.

I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that the wording of such a resolution does not bind anybody. But there are no opportunities for members of the house to express themselves as a house, apart from party allegiances, if we consider a resolution moved by a private member, particularly from the opposition side of the house, to be one that the government members must of necessity vote down. I think that is an unfortunate position into which we are getting in this parliament and, as a matter of fact, in other parliaments as well. I dislike the congressional system in the United States where the party lines are somewhat more flexible, but in the interests of the expression of the opinion and the will of private members, I think that we in this house should give some thought to our particular problem.

I am glad that the parliamentary assistant dealt with the question of a means test; and I think he did it extremely well. I think he confirms the opinion that most of us in this chamber hold, namely that the means test should have been abolished earlier; and we were happy when it was abolished. As I interjected, I think that the position would have been greatly strengthened if, in the 2-2-2 formula the government had not placed the ceiling of the $60 maximum payment by income taxpayers. It would then have been based more on ability to pay than it was. But on the whole, I think that the explanation he gave today is one that is acceptable to the committee.

I want to add this. I do not care where you attempt to put the means test, you are going to have two difficulties arise. You are going to make the people who come under the means test and get the pension feel that they are accepting something of a semi-charitable nature. That illustrates one of the great advantages of abolishing it. The other thing is this. I think most of us in the committee know that a few people who normally were fairly honest sometimes stretched their consciences a little far in making application for the old age pension. I am indeed glad that no one is now compelled or invited to stretch his conscience. In dealing with taxation matters I think we should encourage our people to be honest in every respect and that we should see to it that nothing in the nature of deception is invited or permitted in connection with our income and other taxes. I believe that the government and the officials of the department have been trying to do this in all particulars.

What I really rose to say is this. The income tax is of course the fairest form of taxation. It is based primarily on ability to pay; and as we have it in this country, it is on a graduated plan. I believe, however, that it is a pity that the government did not consider raising the exemptions somewhat. The cost of living is extremely high in this country and the exemption of $1,000 and $2,000, which seemed satisfactory a few years ago, is no longer satisfactory on account of the high cost of living. I wish the government had considered raising the exemptions say to $1,500 for single persons and $3,000 or even $2,500 for married couples, in that way enabling a good many people to meet the increased cost of living more easily.

May I also add this thought. I do not know what the future holds, nor does any other member of this committee. But the very fact that the government felt constrained to reduce or remove the excise tax to the extent it did and to remove credit restrictions a short time ago, I think indicates clearly that there is some necessity for enabling people to buy more of the goods that are being produced. I do not want to go into this matter at all fully this afternoon because I do not believe this is the place to do it. But I want to remark that, from the study I have given to the recent trends economically, it would seem that our tremendously increased capacity for production, for turning out vastly increased numbers of goods—coupled with the fact that the Korean war perhaps has not meant that we have to produce as much in the way of war supplies as the nations thought they would have to produce and so on—is causing a piling up of goods and inventories, and people are unable to buy the goods. At such a time I think an argument can be made—and a good one—for increasing purchasing power, particularly in the lower groups, in order that they may relieve industry of some of the goods that industry is producing. I want to leave that thought with hon. members and with the government.

The other comment I want to make is this. A slight easement has been made in the corporation tax. I know that in this chamber from time to time a great deal of discussion has occurred regarding the corporation income tax. I know that from time to time the Minister of Finance and others have pointed out that our corporation income tax—particularly when you reckon in what has been done in two of the provinces—is a high tax. Indeed, it is sometimes said that it is one of the highest in the world. When we compare our corporation tax with that of the United States, for example, what I think we are overlooking, is that in the United States they have two other taxes that go with it. They have the excess profits tax, which has also been reintroduced in Great Britain. They also have a capital gains tax. As hon. members know and as you, Mr. Chairman, know, we believe there should be a capital gains tax in Canada.

At noon today, and quite at random, I happened to pick up a book on my desk and to open it at a page where certain facts were given in connection with capital gains in the United States. Here is one example that I saw. It is an outstanding one, I admit, and not an average one but it stuck in my memory. Two hundred shares at $6 a share of the Pepsi-Cola Company in 1939 were, in 1945, worth $225,000. There is a capital gain of an extraordinary size. It seems to me that that capital gain should be taxed. The same is true of lesser capital gains where the individual does not turn a hand to do something to improve the economy of the country but takes advantage of the times in which we live. I could hardly credit that amount, but it was in a standard work on my desk today. Of course it may have been something in the nature of a misprint. There may have been a cipher in the wrong place or something or that sort. While that may not be a typical example to give, let me say this. Capital gains of enormous amounts have been made in the past few years on the stock market, in the increase in the value of land, the community creating the value of land, as Henry George used to teach us years ago. And certainly when the community creates a value it should get something from that value. We should have a capital gains tax. As for the corporation tax in our country, it is high, yes, but when we consider that other countries have an excess profits tax and a capital gains tax as well, as in the United States, then of course it does not seem as relatively high as it otherwise might do.

On the whole I want to say that in our opinion the direct form of taxation, that is, the income tax on a graduated scale, along the lines we have here—although I might, as I said, suggest a higher exemption; we might suggest too a steeper tax in certain of the brackets—is to be preferred to any other form of taxation that we know, because it is based to some extent on ability to pay.

What I would like in the future, when the government is looking for new sources of revenue and reconsidering the income tax, in view of the necessity of having as much purchasing power in the hands of the lower income groups as possible, is to see the exemption raised. It will be noticed that I said "in the lower brackets", not in the higher brackets. I think they have enough purchasing power now. The corporation income tax should also be rounded out by a capital gains tax and excess profit.

Mr. Sinclair: I thank the hon. member for his very interesting comments. Most of us agree that by and large the income tax based on ability to pay is regarded as the fairest tax in modern thinking. The problem of course is the extent of the exemption and the rate of progression. As far as exemptions are concerned, I anticipated it would be raised. I think the minister of course did give further consideration to this aspect at the time that the rates were being changed; but again this thing must be considered in the light of other exemptions in countries which are like our own. I think there are only four or five countries like ours. They are Canada, United States of America, the United Kingdom, Australia, and New Zealand. I want to read this little table, but I also want to put it on the record, because it shows the fact that our present exemptions are much the most generous of any country in the world, or any country like ours which levies income tax.

The interesting point, as raised by the hon. member, is that of course the very poorest countries in the world are the ones which rely almost entirely on the indirect tax, and avoid direct taxation. These countries in this table are countries that have both income taxes and indirect taxes:

Personal Income Tax
Exemption in various countries

	Canada	U.S.A.	U.K.(a)	Australia(b)	N.Z.(d)
	$	$	$	$	$
Single status	1,000	600	424	244	884
Married status	2,000	1,200	743	489	1,172
Family allowance children	150	....	234	183(c)	144
Other dependents	400	600	186	183	144

(a) Incorporating the effect of a 22·2 per cent credit for earned income.

(b) Starting points for combined income tax and social security contribution.

(c) For first child under 16 the deduction is $183; for each additional child it is $122.

(d) Incorporating the effect of the £15 rebate for 1951-52. No exemption is allowed for the social security tax of 7½ per cent.

Some of these countries have family allowances; some do not. We have exemptions for both types of children. I might point out, however, that in the United Kingdom the family allowance is not paid to the first child. It is at the rate of five shillings a week for subsequent children. The amount of five shillings a week works out to about $3 a month, and that is the rate paid to every child, whereas our family allowance starts at $5 and goes up to $8.

We have very much the highest income tax exemption on the basic single status and the married status.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): How do our taxes compare?

Mr. Sinclair: As far as our taxes are concerned, I think the minister put them on the record when he made his budget speech. I am sorry, he did not this year. As far as our taxes are concerned, my recollection from the tables I have seen—but we will have a table on income tax when the bill is before us—is that their rates in the lower brackets are higher. The point made by the leader of the C.C.F. party is that he would like perhaps a little more progressive rate in the top brackets. Well, item 1 finishes up with a top rate of 86 per cent on the top incomes. Before this provision it was 100·8 per cent. At 86 per cent it is still a pretty savage rate in the top income bracket. On top of that there is a 4 per cent investment surtax, making it actually 90 per cent.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Were there any fatalities among the people who found they had 100·8 per cent tax?

Mr. Sinclair: People with that amount of income are not easily disturbed. They do not have the worries that most of us have. The hon. member referred to the slight easement in the corporation tax. A little earlier in my budget speech I mentioned the fact that as far as the 2 per cent personal income tax and the 2 per cent sales tax paid to the government were concerned they were not properly taxes. They are actually a form of contribution to the old age pension system. However, with the corporation tax there is a little difference in outlook, because—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Some who are taxed may not get any old age pension.

Mr. Sinclair: There is a tax on everybody; that is right. But in the end the individual presumes he will be in receipt of the old age pension if he lives that long. No matter how long the corporation lives it will not receive old age pension, so the actual practical effect as far as this is concerned is that we have given this abatement of ·6 per cent in the corporation tax level, but the actual final effect of that in Canada today is that the corporations pay 52 per cent in eight provinces and 54 per cent in the other two provinces.

Mr. Low: They just pass it on to the individuals in prices.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. Sinclair: It depends. No absolute statement of that kind can be made. It depends entirely on the competitive position of the corporation.

Mr. Gillis: Corporations get subsidies and subventions, though.

Mr. Sinclair: Corporations are not alone in that, as my hon. friend knows. They are not alone in this matter of getting subsidies and subventions from the government. I think a considerable number of individuals across this country get subsidies and subventions in one way or another, and I think I can recall the hon. member not so long ago asking for an increase in the coal subvention.

Mr. Gillis: I will likely continue that.

Mr. Sinclair: I do not think the matter of a capital gains tax need be discussed again. We had a full discussion on it last year. I think most people agree that in an established society in view of the accretion in value which comes because of community effort, the sort of thing which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said was one of the principal tenets of Henry George's single tax, there is a good case for the capital gains tax. But in a pioneering country where so much of our capital is venture capital, —where it is true the amount made may be large but where a man runs the risk of losing not just his income but his capital—there is not the same case for a capital gains tax. I hear someone behind me say, "hear, hear." What I have said refers particularly to venture enterprises such as oil and mining, and enterprises generally in the northern part of this country.

The hon. member mentioned the unique case, the fantastic case, of the increase in value of the shares of a soft drink company. An increase like that is a surprising thing. So surprising is it that there must be some special reason for it. It has been suggested to me that at the time that the stock was almost worthless they were involved in a very difficult patent suit with their main competitor. Had that patent suit been lost even the $1,200 would have been down the drain. That is a very unusual case. At that time they actually ran the risk of losing their entire capital. I think these are the main points.

Mr. Green: The parliamentary assistant has mentioned the deductions allowed for children. My understanding is that in the case of a son or daughter attending university there is an allowance of $400, if that young person is under 21 years of age.

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

Mr. Green: Apparently there is also some administrative provision under which such university student may go out during summer months and earn up to $500 in any one year, without the father losing the right to claim the deduction of $400. As the parliamentary assistant knows, it now costs at least $1,000 a year for a student to attend a university; and it seems to me there should be some change in the administrative provision whereby the student would be allowed to earn more than $500 during the summer months.

Mr. Sinclair: That change has been made. The hon. member was out of his seat when the hon. member for Vancouver South asked about this matter. The allowable earnings have been increased from $500 to $600, for this year's income tax.

Mr. Green: Is that in the budget, under the act?

Mr. Sinclair: It is done by regulation under the definition of dependency. When the minister has the bill before the house he will explain it at greater length. Because of that factor, and primarily because of the old age pension factor to which reference was made, the allowance has been raised from $500 to $600. There is a provision in the act, called the notch provision, whereby there is a tapering off when income is earned in excess of $600.

Mr. Green: Would it not be fair to place that figure at the actual cost to the student per year? I do not think there can be any question that the cost runs to at least $1,000 a year, or perhaps more than that in some faculties—engineering and medical, for instance.

Mr. Sinclair: That comes down to the point we discussed before, namely that of special exemptions for special groups. It is quite true that every encouragement should be given to students who want to attend university. But then there are other classes of dependents who are equally deserving, and there would be resentment if special consideration were given to university students, and not given to these other classes. It was thought that the extension of the earning power was the fairest procedure—fixing it at $600, and tapering off to $702, I believe it is. This gives leeway for extra earnings in the summer months.

Mr. Knowles: I feel the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance has done a real service today in the analysis he has given of the relationship between the income tax on the one hand and old age pensions and family allowances on the other. All of us who were members of the old age security committee of 1950 will agree that it was the desire of that committee that, whatever financial arrangements were made, with the removal of the means test those in the upper income brackets would not benefit from it, but rather would pay back more than they actually received.

Most of us have known right along that that is the way it works out, and that fact is realized by most people. However there are a few throughout the country who are at times disturbed by the thought that we are using moneys of the taxpayers to make social security payments to rich people who do not need them. As I say, I believe the parliamentary assistant has performed a service today in setting out, as he did, figures to show the precise situation, which is that the wealthy pay back in taxation more than they receive in social security, and that is as it should be.

There can be no doubt that, with the exception of some modifications we might like to make—and I have in mind the $60 ceiling—the general principle of the relationship between income tax on the one hand, and old age pensions and family allowances on the other, is good. Indeed I hope the excellent statement in the matter made today by the parliamentary assistant might be read by those administering the Old Age Assistance Act, and also by members of the veterans affairs committee. We still have a couple of means tests affecting very important legislation, and I suggest that the request made by some of us from time to time for the removal of those means tests, is not wild-eyed at all, particularly in the light of the statement made this afternoon by the parliamentary assistant. It is time these other means tests were likewise abolished.

While I agree fully with what he said in that field, there was one section of his remarks with which I disagreed—and I am sure that fact will come as no surprise to him. I refer to what he had to say concerning the deductibility of medical expenses. Like my leader, I feel it is most unfortunate that the parliamentary assistant said what he did this afternoon. He has served notice, in advance, that any future private members' motions dealing with taxation matters presented in the house prior to the date of the budget will be defeated.

We have been told that there is no cracking of the whip on the government side. Well, here is a cracking of the whip even before motions of this kind appear on the order paper.

Mr. Sinclair: Only because of the complete misunderstanding which happened in connection with that resolution. That is the only reason for it.

Mr. Knowles: I submit that if there was any misunderstanding as to what happened in respect of this resolution, the fault lies on the government side. I need not discuss the matter in detail, as I did on April 23. No doubt the parliamentary assistant will recall what I said on that occasion, because I spoke shortly after he did on the same day. I pointed out that there have been a number of similar motions in the past asking the government to give consideration to certain propositions.

Mr. Sinclair: Tax measures before the budget?

Mr. Knowles: There was at least—

Mr. Sinclair: Just one.

Mr. Knowles: There was at least one tax measure before the budget; that was my own.

Mr. Sinclair: And it was defeated.

Mr. Knowles: And I pointed out to the parliamentary assistant not only tax measures before the budget, but other matters, some of which were quite innocuous, to the principles of which the government did not desire to be committed. Those resolutions have always been defeated, unless the government could persuade the sponsors of the motions to withdraw. I submit that if the government did not wish to be committed to the substance of my resolution of March 26 it should not have permitted the house to pass it. But it did permit the house to accept it; and in that instance it was the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance who indicated that it was all right to carry the resolution, with the result that it was carried unanimously, and I believe the house and the country had the right to draw the conclusion which was drawn.

When my leader was discussing the matter a few moments ago, the parliamentary assistant made a point of interjecting that consideration could not be given to these motions if they were made prior to the date of the budget. May I point out to him the kind of restriction he is thereby imposing upon the House of Commons. I can tell him that in the fall of 1949, after the second budget of that year, I moved an amendment to a motion to go into supply which dealt with the deductibility of trade union dues. I had considerable difficulty in persuading Mr. Speaker to accept my amendment, in view of the fact that budget matters were then before the house. It is a long story. It got involved with the flour milling report, so that eventually my amendment was allowed and was voted upon. I suggest that, however, to indicate the difficulty that a member has in bringing in a motion at any other time of the year than in the early part of a session. May I point out that the time for private members' motions is usually gone before the budget is brought down. Therefore what the parliamentary assistant has done is to serve notice on the House of Commons that the possibility of private members' motions with respect to taxation reaching a decision has been wiped out.

Mr. Sinclair: May I interrupt the hon. member? Private members have never had any right to make decisions on taxation matters. That is purely and entirely the responsibility of the government, and in particular of the Minister of Finance. The hon. member has never had the right to make a decision on tax matters.

Mr. Knowles: When I spoke on this question on April 23 I agreed with the position of the minister as the parliamentary assistant has put it now, but I also pointed out to him that the very same sections of the rule books which confine that right to the government also spell out the right of private members to bring in motions expressing opinions on matters that should be considered. The action of the parliamentary assistant today, which has been taken in the name of the Minister of Finance, is denying us the right to get a vote on a motion expressing an opinion. I submit that the parliamentary assistant is perfectly right in telling us what the position of the government is with relation to a matter like this, but I submit we are right in pointing out what the position of private members is as a result of the announcement the parliamentary assistant has made today.

Mr. Sinclair: I quite agree with the position now taken. In every debate on tax matters that takes place before the budget, and in the course of which consideration is asked, every member of the house can put forward his view. Whether the motion for consideration is accepted, talked out or voted down, the government is then aware of hon. members' views on tax matters because they have been able to express them publicly, but they have never had any right of decision. Let me give you a personal case quite aside from the case which I stated on behalf of the government.

Mr. Knowles: What is it, margarine?

Mr. Sinclair: No, I am talking again on the 4 per cent. The hon. member has referred to the margarine resolution. I recall earlier resolutions of mine on crown corporation taxation, something that has now come to pass under the present income tax resolution. I felt then and still feel that in putting forward such resolutions it would be helpful to have votes to show the opinion of members, but these tax considerations are in a very different category. With respect to the hon. member's motion to give consideration, he and other hon. members have repeatedly said that the house was unanimously in favour of the principle. I voted to give consideration, but anybody reading my speech of that day or who has heard me since will realize that I do not believe in exemptions of normal expenses, whether they be medical expenses or other things. I voted gladly for the motion that the minister should give further consideration to the matter, which was done.

What I am doing here is saying that we are going to revert to the practice which the hon. member mentioned in discussion of his resolution concerning the deductibility of trade union dues. It was the only one I could find in my limited research on these matters, and it is the best illustration I can give. It is quite true that we had a long discussion. Various members put forward their points of view. In the end the motion was defeated but the points of view expressed by members that day did have weight with the government. However, the government did not indicate that day whether or not they were going to do it any more than the Minister of Finance gives any other indication before the budget of what action he is going to take.

When the budget was brought down it showed that not only had consideration been given despite the vote in the house, which meant nothing, but favourable consideration had been given. In future exactly the same thing will be done with respect to the very narrow group of private members' resolutions which are introduced before the budget. However, if the acceptance of such motions for consideration were to be interpreted as meaning that the wish of the house had to be implemented by the government it would lead to budget changes being disclosed in advance.

Mr. Knowles: Before the parliamentary assistant interjected this last time I had just asked him to see our point of view as private members of the house contrasted with the point of view of the government. During the course of the remarks he has made he has pointed out that in his own experience he has seen the two sides of the case. He admitted in what he said that when he was merely an ordinary private member he felt it was desirable, in connection with certain matters in which he was interested, to get a vote of the house if possible even if only on a motion that consideration should be given to certain matters.

Mr. Sinclair: But never on a tax matter before the budget.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member referred to the question of crown corporations.

Mr. Sinclair: Quite right.

Mr. Knowles: There we are. The parliamentary assistant admits it.

Mr. Sinclair: That matter was not raised before the budget.

Mr. Knowles: But the parliamentary assistant admits that he felt in those days when he was just an ordinary private member that it would be desirable and would strengthen his case if he could obtain a vote of the house.

Mr. Sinclair: No, the opportunity to air my views and the opportunity for other members to air their views in the house so the government could hear them.

The Chairman: Order. It seems quite clear that the two hon. members who are now speaking are not going to agree with respect to the treatment that might be given to the consideration of private members' resolutions in the future. I would ask hon. members to come back to the general discussion of the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Knowles: I am prepared to accept your ruling. Obviously each of us could go on for a considerable length of time, and it is also obvious that neither of us is going to convince the other.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It has happened in the past.

Mr. Knowles: Each of us thinks he is right on this matter.

Mr. Weir: Would my hon. friend permit me to interject at this point? I understand he is going to leave the particular line of thought he has been following.

Mr. Knowles: That is right. I have been told to do so by the chairman.

Mr. Weir: Perhaps I am going to get into trouble with the chairman.

The Chairman: Order. If the hon. member wishes to continue the discussion of this matter he is out of order. He should not speak on it. Sufficient debate has taken place on this question which was referred to in a very incidental manner by the parliamentary assistant and taken up by the hon.

member for Winnipeg North Centre. If we are going to discuss it, then let us put aside the Income Tax Act resolution. What I have before me is the Income Tax Act resolution. I would ask hon. members to be reasonable and discuss the resolution.

Mr. Weir: I will accept your ruling. I was going to discuss the principle of the matter that the two hon. members were discussing. I think I had a better speech than either of them.

The Chairman: The hon. member may save it for another occasion.

Mr. Weir: I will forget it by then.

Mr. Knowles: May I get back to the resolution now before us and to a point which the parliamentary assistant discussed in his opening remarks this afternoon. The parliamentary assistant said that following the debate on the 4 per cent question there had been correspondence between him and a citizen of the city of Hull, and that in all cases copies of the correspondence had been exchanged among the parliamentary assistant, the hon. member for Eglinton, and myself. When the parliamentary assistant referred to the matter this afternoon I told him that I would kindly oblige by answering one of the points he tried to make in this letter. He was good enough to send me a copy of the letter, and I should now like—

Mr. Sinclair: If I may rise on a point of order, we have had a pretty general discussion entirely on item 5. Could we try to make a little progress? I also have material on item 5 and I suggest that we might confine ourselves to it.

Mr. Knowles: I am prepared to agree. I seem to be having as much trouble as the hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Oh no, you are not. You are being allowed to go on.

Mr. Knowles: There need not be any ruling, Mr. Chairman. I accept the suggestion as being quite reasonable.

The Chairman: But I would ask the hon. members if the discussion on paragraph 1 has terminated.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, no. Without prejudice to the right of hon. members who still wish to engage in such general discussion as you will permit, I will defer any further discussion of the medical expense question until we reach paragraph 5 of the resolution now before us.

With specific reference to paragraph 1, I was pleased with something else the parliamentary assistant did this afternoon. It happens to be in line with something I intended to do myself; and even at the risk of repeating what he did I think I will still do it, for a reason I shall make clear. During the course of the main budget debate a number of us complained because the Minister of Finance gave the impression that there was a decrease in taxation involved in the rates now before us as compared with the rates of last year. That is not so; there has been an actual increase, even before one adds the social security tax. The parliamentary assistant was perfectly correct in what he said this afternoon, namely that if you closely examined the words used by the Minister of Finance on the night of April 8, what he said was that the rates of taxation for 1952 following these budget changes would be a little less than they would have been had there been no change. But he has also admitted this afternoon that the rates to be paid for 1952 are actually higher than the rates for 1951.

As the parliamentary assistant knows, when the Minister of Finance delivered his budget speech he followed his usual custom and put on Hansard three sets of tables showing what the income tax payments would be. Those tables are found at page 1254 of Hansard for April 8, 1952. I draw attention to the fact that the first column in each of these tables is headed "Income"; the next column is headed "Tax for 1952 at present rates"; the next column reads, "Tax in full year at new rates" and then there is a column dealing with percentages and a final column showing the tax in 1952, with six months at the present rates and six months at the new rates. What is missing from all these tables on page 1254 is a column showing the actual tax for 1951. I have taken the trouble—like the parliamentary assistant I like to go back and see what appears in Hansard of bygone years—to go back over quite a number of budget speeches, and I have quite a collection of them here on my desk. I find that every year the present minister has presented a budget involving any income tax changes, with one understandable exception, in his tables he has given the actual tax paid the year before and the tax to be paid during the current year.

Mr. Sinclair: If I may help the hon. member, the tables I put on Hansard at the request of the hon. member for Peace River cover this whole field.

Mr. Knowles: I recognize that. I said a moment ago the hon. gentleman had done something I had planned to do, and I was glad we were thinking along the same lines.

An hon. Member: Why do it again?

Mr. Knowles: An hon. member asks, "Why do it again?" The reason is that we have different points of view about these matters. I have not yet seen those tables, and I want to make sure there is on Hansard a statement comparable to the kind of statement the minister has made before, showing these taxation changes from the perspective from which we see them, a perspective which I think is shared by people generally.

I was about to point out that on April 10, 1951, when taxation changes were made, the columns included the 1950 tax, the 1951 tax, the increase in 1951, and the increase in a whole year. There were no income tax changes in 1950, but if you go back to 1949 you will find the comparable tables at pages 1796 and 1797 of Hansard for March 22 of that year. In that instance there were reductions in taxation. Again the first column shows the income, the next column is the 1948 tax, the next column is the 1949 tax, and the last two columns are the reductions, first in dollars and then in percentages.

My point is that it has been the normal practice of the Minister of Finance to bring the tables before the house in that form: these were the amounts paid last year; these are the amounts which will be paid this year. But when he presented his budget on the night of April 8 this year he chose to depart from that practice. Instead of giving us the amounts that were paid last year and the amounts that will be paid this year, which would show the increase Canadians must pay, he gave as the first column the amounts that would have been paid this year under rates not being charged for this year, so that for a little while that evening he could make the suggestion of a slight decrease in taxation.

I took the trouble to work out a table, and I believe it will compare with one of the tables the parliamentary assistant has placed on the record. The hon. gentleman has now sent across to me some carbon copies of those tables. Naturally, since I am on my feet I have not had time to make a close comparison; but I would suggest—

Mr. Sinclair: Just read the headings, and you will find they are exactly as you suggested.

Mr. Knowles: I would suggest that the table I prepared and which I would like to put on the record is simpler, in that it is only one table. Since the committee was good enough to let the parliamentary assistant put four involved tables on the record, I hope it will let me put on the record one simple table which will read as follows—

Mr. Sinclair: I want to raise this point, Mr. Chairman. At the request of the hon. member for Peace River—which request could have been made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in his budget speech—I put on the record these four tables which have been prepared by the officials of the department. In connection with putting tables on the record, of course, there is the matter of the accuracy of the calculations. If all the matter contained in my hon. friend's table, and much more, is in these four large tables I have submitted, I do not think it is going to be helpful to have the hon. member's homework put on the record as an addition to the facts and figures already there.

Mr. Knowles: Before you reach a decision on that point, Mr. Chairman, I may say I have now had a chance to look at the tables prepared by the department, and my table compares with them except that it is much briefer in form. It is just one table showing the changes in the case of one taxpayer, namely a married taxpayer with two children eligible for family allowance. It will not take very long to read the figures, and if necessary I can put it on in that way. I thought I would save time by asking permission to put the table on the record.

Mr. Sinclair: There is a complete table covering that very taxpayer, a married man with two children eligible for family allowance, right there. If as a check on the figures of the officials of the department the hon. member wants to put his own calculations on the record I suppose the committee might consent, but I cannot understand why we should duplicate the work of the officials.

The Chairman: The hon. member said he was prepared to read the table anyway. If he is going to put it on in any case, why not let him put it on the record and save time. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: I thank the committee for its consent to put this table on the record. It is as follows:

1951 and 1952 Income Tax Payments
Married Taxpayer—with two children, eligible for Family Allowances

Income	Tax in 1951	Tax in 1952	Percentage Increase
$2,000	....	....	..
2,400	$17	$18	5·8
2,500	33	35	6·0
2,750	74	79	6·7
3,000	116	123	6·0
3,500	202	215	6·4
4,000	296	313	5·5
5,000	498	529	6·0
7,500	1,060	1,129	6·5
10,000	1,740	1,854	6·5
20,000	5,913	6,275	6·1
30,000	11,011	11,624	5·8
50,000	23,209	24,376	5·0
75,000	40,132	42,075	4·8
100,000	58,156	60,998	4·8
200,000	138,054	144,814	4·9
400,000	310,353	326,426	5·1

Note: (1) In calculating the above taxes it has been assumed that all incomes up to $30,000 are entirely earned incomes, and that incomes of more than $30,000 include earned income of that amount and additional investment income to make up the total. No account has been taken of the 10 per cent tax credit for dividends from Canadian corporations. This corresponds to the computation made by the Minister of Finance; see Hansard, April 8, 1952; pp. 1254-1255.

(2) The old age security tax of 1 per cent on taxable income (maximum tax $30) in 1952 or 2 per cent on taxable income (maximum tax $60) thereafter is not included in the above amounts.

I think the point I made will be borne out when one compares this table with the others. My table is much simpler. It does not bury or confuse the point. Rather it makes the point stand out much more clearly than in my view is the case from the more complex tables which the parliamentary assistant put on Hansard. The point that I want to stand out is that the actual result of the budget that we have before us is that the taxpayers of Canada for 1952 will, in all cases, pay more than they paid for 1951. I have also indicated what the percentage increase is in each case, and it is interesting to note that that percentage increase is fairly high in the lower brackets and right up to about $10,000 and even $20,000 income. The percentages in the brackets up to that point run 5½, 6 and 6½. Those are the increases in actual amount of income taxes to be paid for 1952 as compared to 1951. But when you go on up from $20,000, the percentage increases are lower. They are 4·6, 5·0, 4·8, 4·9 and 5·1, and so on.

Mr. Sinclair: May I make one interjection at this point? The hon. member probably recalls the very wise observation of the member for Peace River that, so far as the taxpayer is concerned, it is not the percentage increase or decrease but it is the dollar increase or decrease that is important. I think your table should include that as well.

Mr. Knowles: I was trying to keep my table simple. The parliamentary assistant has put on the record tables that are complicated enough.

Mr. Sinclair: Simply to prove your point, but not the other points. My tables are complete enough to prove anything you wish to draw from them.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We had better stop right now, then.

Mr. Knowles: As a matter of fact, after I had worked out these tables—I did them in pen and ink—I thought of the very point to which the parliamentary assistant has referred. I worked those figures out, too, in pencil, but I decided—and I am not at all reluctant to give some examples, if they are wanted—that it would complicate the picture to put in another column.

Mr. Sinclair: Complicate your argument.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Knowles: Not at all, because as the member for Cape Breton South has said, it is not the dollars you pay but the dollars you have left that count. It is one thing for the parliamentary assistant to say, if he had a chance to look at the pencilled figures on my table, that at the top bracket of $400,000 the increase is $16,073, whereas down in the lower brackets the increase may be only $7 or $13 or $17, but it is a lot easier for a person with $400,000 to pay that much of an increase than it is for some of those in the lower brackets to pay even a few dollars increase. It is not what you pay out, but what you have left that counts. A system of increases that become less in percentage as you get up into the higher brackets is contrary to the accepted practice in the field of taxation, where we believe in taxing according to ability to pay.

I agree that the government can be handed a little compliment once in a while for some things that it does. I have always been interested in the relationship between that portion of our taxes that are collected by the direct method and that portion collected by the indirect method. I am one of those who has been complaining across the years against the high proportion being collected by the sales tax and other indirect methods. I keep studying the figures and the fact is—I am free to admit it and compliment the government on it so far as it has gone—that the government has moved in the direction of a higher percentage from direct taxation and a smaller percentage from indirect taxation. If the government is acceding to some of our requests in that connection, I do not think it should hold back when it comes to the progressive nature of the income tax.

As I say, the figures I have given show that the percentage increase in the upper brackets is less than the percentage increase in the lower brackets. I have not even tried to work out what the picture is with respect to those who formerly were paying over 100 per cent. Such a calculation becomes very complicated. The parliamentary assistant knows that one of the reasons for incorporating the former defence surtax into the general income tax was to avoid that situation, so with respect to those who formerly had to pay slightly over 100 per cent their tax liability has been reduced. The highest rate in the new schedule is 86 per cent, plus 4 per cent surtax on investment income. Perhaps the parliamentary assistant knows offhand what top rate that could produce.

Mr. Sinclair: It could produce 90 per cent.

Mr. Knowles: Whereas formerly one could be required to pay 100·8 per cent on a top bracket.

Mr. Sinclair: You are certainly wanting your pound of flesh now.

Mr. Knowles: Pound of flesh nothing; what you have got here is an admission that there will be some people who will have an actual reduction in the amount of taxes that they will pay. They are in the very high brackets, but it is an actual reduction in terms of the percentages which the parliamentary assistant and I have agreed to be the case. Down in the lower bracket, however, the percentage increase is higher than it is in the upper brackets. I recognize that perhaps the amount of money to be obtained by adding a few per cent to the top bracket is not great, but I contend that in principle our income tax should be progressive right down the line. I object to the failure of the government to follow that course with regard to the taxation of those in the upper brackets.

I have made this speech a lot longer than I intended, mainly because of the difficulty I had over those tables, but at least I hope we have it clear now, in plain language that the man in the street can understand, that the income tax to be paid by Canadians for the year 1952 is greater than the income tax paid by Canadians for 1951.

Mr. Coldwell: May I speak on a point of privilege? This afternoon when I mentioned a certain figure I saw great surprise on the countenances of some members in the house. I ran up to my office to see if my memory had played tricks on me. I have before me a book entitled "The Nature and Tax Treatment of Capital Gains and Losses", by Lawrence H. Seltzer, published by the national bureau of economic research in the United States. The statement to which I referred is this:

> A man who bought 200 shares of Pepsi-Cola Company common stock at $6 a share in 1939 could sell his holdings for more than $225,000 in 1945.

I appreciate the explanation that the parliamentary assistant made, but let me point out that in this case a man bought these in 1939 and sold them in 1945. An investment of $1,200 would yield a return of $225,000.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Nobody had the money to buy them then.

Mr. Coldwell: Somebody had $1,200 and bought them. I could cite a number of other examples, but since that is the only one I mentioned, and I thought my memory could have played tricks on me, I should make sure it was put accurately.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Since we are speaking to points of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I have one. When the hon. member for Greenwood was speaking about the 4 per cent floor on medical expenses, I interrupted to say that he was repeating what he said in his speech on the budget. Since then I have re-read his speech and find that he did not mention this subject. I wish, therefore, to withdraw what I said and apologize to the hon. member.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): This afternoon the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra raised the question of exemptions for dependents, but I did not think he developed it as fully as it might be developed. That is with regard to the exemption for children who are dependent and who are over the age of 21. As the act now stands, in order to get an exemption a child must be wholly dependent on the parent and under 21 years of age or 21 years of age or over and dependent by reason of mental or physical infirmity. It is quite obvious that under 21 the exemption is given because of the dependence of the child upon the parent. As regards the taxpayer, what is the difference whether the child is 21 or 22? The taxpayer is penalized if the child is not mentally or physically incapacitated but is a student at a university, and is costing the parent $1,000 or $1,500 a year.

I suggest that times have changed since this exemption was put at 21. I do not know what the origin of it was or why it was put at 21. I do not know whether it was because the child was supposed to become a man or woman at 21 and therefore ought to be working. If he is working, he is not dependent. But as long as he is dependent I think there should be an allowance especially with regard to university students.

Since the war and up until the past year it was difficult for a young man coming out of high school with matriculation to get into a university. I know of one young man who had to wait and take a degree at another university before he was allowed to go into medicine. The result is that he entered the medicine course at 24. He is dependent on his parents. It is true that he will be able to get some employment during the summer months but the amount that he would earn would be far from sufficient to take him through during the rest of the year.

The same thing applies not only to medicine but to engineering and to dentistry. In the universities today we have a pre-dental course, a pre-engineering course and a pre-medical course. By the time a young man can graduate in engineering, he is at least 23 or 24 years of age, and he is probably older than that before he can graduate in dentistry or medicine. I was speaking to a university man today and I asked him how old the students were in first-year dentistry; and I mean the regular course in dentistry.

not the pre-dentistry course. He said that he was 25. I said: You must be much older than others. He said: No, not at all; most of them are about my age and some of them are as old as 30 or 32. As we know, a good many men came back from the war and entered on the financial arrangements provided by the government. They were, of course, much older students and they created such a demand for space in the universities that ordinary persons had to wait for two or three years.

It seems to me that it should be defined, at any rate, why is it that a person is regarded as a dependent until he is 21 but, as soon as he strikes this magic age of 21, is no longer a dependent and the taxpayer is no longer entitled to claim an exemption for him.

I have had a family of my own. Several of them have gone to university. One of them is attending the conservatory of music, which is not exactly a university. So I know what all this means. A person when studying music or medicine has no opportunity, as have other students, of earning money during the summertime to assist in financing him at university or in whatever course he is taking. I therefore feel that the government should give consideration to this matter.

I have heard parents ask about the matter. They have said to me: Why can you not get the Minister of Finance to make some exemption for our children over 21 who are attending university? They are really a dead weight or a dead load just at that particular time. If they were earning money, no parent would think of asking for that exemption. They could not anyway, because the law would not allow them to do so. I suggest that the Minister of Finance should give serious consideration to enlarging the exemption for students who are at university.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have been waiting for two hours to catch your eye. I am very glad that at last I, in this inconspicuous corner of the chamber, have succeeded in doing so. I was going to say a few words on the question of increased exemption but as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in his speech has expressed the views of this group and the views of all of the members of the C.C.F. in Canada and of the millions of people who support those views, I shall not repeat them. I want to take the opportunity presented by this general item to bring to the attention of the parliamentary assistant what I consider to be a measure of injustice and to ask him a question or two. I must say that I love asking the parliamentary assistant questions. I must also say that he is extremely courteous and usually goes to considerable trouble to answer questions asked of him verbally or when they are submitted in writing, and I appreciate that fact.

There is in my constituency a situation which no doubt is duplicated in many other places in Canada. I am now using my own personal experience or that of my constituents in order to illustrate my point. I am speaking again of the employees of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company who work in a defence industry and who, in many cases, have to travel up to 40 miles a day to and from their work. They are obliged to travel that distance in order to find accommodation for living, home sites and so on. Their services are necessary to the company and to the defence industry. That travel costs those employees from $10 to $20 a month in the way of out-of-pocket expenses depending on the distance. Those are expenses which they cannot avoid.

As I see it, Mr. Chairman, the working man or the salaried worker who has to accept a payroll deduction and the farmer who sells his crop through a marketing agency are the only persons from whom the government can be quite certain of collecting all the taxes that are due. In this connection I might point out that while these men at the present time are denied the opportunity to deduct these necessary and unavoidable travelling expenses for income tax purposes, a businessman can go to Vancouver and as long as he goes to wholesale and says: "How do you do?" and does some business he can charge up his expenses legally, or he can buy a few cross-cut saws or wedges and comply with the law. Or he can go to Toronto and do some business or he can go to New York. Any businessman can do that and enjoy a holiday as long as he does some legitimate business. The point is that he can take a business trip, combine it with a holiday, and properly charge up a considerable amount of the expenses to the operation of his business. There are other cases that I could give as illustrations of the opportunities for deduction. Once again I want to bring this situation at Trail to the attention of the parliamentary assistant because numbers of the employees have written to me. They are anxious that the government give consideration to this question.

I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant whether consideration has been given to allowing deductions in such cases. If so, why has the decision not been favourable?

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I should like to get in my four cents' worth. I should like to support the hon. member for St. John's West in the statement he has made with regard to consideration for some exemptions while students are attending university. I think the cut-off age of 21 is an old formula which has outlived its usefulness. As the hon. member points out, across the country there are many students in universities today who are 25 to 30 years of age. I myself have run into a great many of them. That situation is due to the fact that the government embarked on a program of university education for returned personnel. That is particularly true with regard to dentistry. We are crying to high heaven for doctors. We are importing them for defence industries. I think that consideration should be given to any encouragement which the government can give to students in universities who are taking courses in medicine, engineering or dentistry. I think that cut-off age of 21 should be forgotten and that the formula should be "while attending university".

During the budget debate I raised a point that nobody else has taken up on the resolution. I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant whether any consideration was given to the matter of exempting, as a tax offset, the expenses of a person who is obliged to hire a housekeeper. I know that there is already an exemption of $1,000 for the wife; but where she is in ill health or is in an institution the man with a family is obliged to hire a housekeeper. He has to pay her wages. He has to maintain her, and he is up against the responsibility of maintaining his wife in an institution which is pretty costly in this country today. In my remarks on the budget speech I suggested that consideration should be given to permitting as a tax offset the expenditures of a person who is maintaining a home when he has to hire someone to come in and look after that home while his wife is in an institution or is ill at home. Has any thought been given to that matter?

Mr. Fair: I am not a bachelor, but I would like to put in a word for bachelor farmers who are operating a farm. I understand—in fact I have had complaints—that they are not allowed to deduct as a farm expense wages for a housekeeper. That is one of the wrongs that should be righted at this session without any further delay, because, if that farmer took the time himself to do the work that the housekeeper does, it would cost him far more to pay the worker on the farm to carry on the work that he would do if he were not doing the work that the housekeeper would do.

I have listened to the hon. member for St. John's West and to the hon. member for Cape Breton South and many others speak on further exemptions for those attending colleges and such institutions. I think that exemption should be granted also.

There are programs undertaken by the government, and many of the students who are carrying on are not able to do justice to their studies because of the hardships brought about by financial difficulties.

Mr. Sinclair: If I can recall the series of questions, the first one had to do with university students. As far as they are concerned, we have already had some discussion on it. I think the point was raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South and the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. It is a problem which is raised each year by correspondence either from parents or from members of parliament. The answer is neither a simple nor an easy one. It is again this matter of trying to do indirectly what is better done directly. The best way to handle it for university students is by bursaries or loans. Indirectly they are tax relief. When we exempt them from that tax relief again it is a matter of whether it is fair or whether it is progressive. After all, it has long been recognized that a person of 21 should be self-supporting—I am quite sure that the hon. member for Cape Breton South was earning his living long before he was 21—and if the family circumstances are such that the breadwinner of the family can support him when he wants to go on further to university, they are in much better financial circumstances than other families who may have equally deserving boys who, because they have not that financial support, must go out to work, as many members of this house have had to do, to finance their university careers. Therefore the first element of injustice creeps in. The less wealthy, who cannot support their boys, are going to get no tax relief.

The second point, of course, is that in such cases when a son who is a man is supported by his father to get a university education as a dentist, a doctor or an engineer, he is making a pretty large investment in his future. I would say that the recovery is made in most cases by the son paying back when he is finished and has got the better class of employment he has obtained as a result of that investment by his father. I do not think very many think they should repay their parents the cost of education provided when they were children; but certainly when an adult man is supported by his parents at university or a professional school I would imagine the recompense would come from the man himself when he is out earning his living in that chosen profession.

The third point of course is, again, where are we going to draw the line? People have mentioned universities. Well, if we keep it strictly to universities then the example given by the hon. member for St. John's West does not apply. He used the example of a boy going to a conservatory. Is a conservatory a university? Then there are boys who go to schools, such as vocational schools here and in the United States, at the age of 21, 22 and 23. Generally they work and save to go to these vocational schools. Could they be classed as universities? The reason for the present attitude is the objection first of all that this is another case of trying to do indirectly in a minor way through tax relief things which should be done much better directly through bursaries or loans at the universities.

The next point was the matter of transportation for the workers. That again is a matter of one of those ordinary expenses which are embodied in the ordinary living costs of everyone. Unusual transportation expenses might be in the same class as unusual medical expenses; but in this case, especially with those workers who are in a bargaining position because they are highly organized in the plant to which the hon. member referred, if they have to travel this long distance to work, they know in their own minds that that is a cost of living to them and they bargain accordingly directly with the employer for a wage to compensate for that.

The hon. member referred to the fact that the individual businessman is allowed the cost of expenses of making business trips. I think he mentioned hardware particularly. I am not much of an expert on that; but again there is a great difference between a business operation and a salary or wage job. In securing a salary or a wage the workers must have in mind the cost of the ordinary or usual expenses, of food and clothing, transportation, ordinary medical expenses and the like, exemption for which is given in our basic allowance.

The other point was made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. That is the matter of medical expenses. Quite a bit is done in this respect. In connection with the example of the widower who has to hire a housekeeper because he has dependent children, he has the right to claim married status as far as the income tax exemption is concerned. If on the other hand he has to have a housekeeper because his wife is at home bedridden and needs attendance the year round, then that could be claimed under the medical exemption class as part of his medical expenses. There is not as yet any provision for the other case he mentioned, namely, that of a man who requires to hire a housekeeper to take care of his house and children because his wife is a patient in an institution. His housekeeper then is not in attendance on the wife. However, that matter can be given consideration.

The last question is a most interesting one, namely, that of bachelor farmers. I might point out that our income tax rates are heavily weighted against bachelors in every respect, again on this very sound principle which has been enunciated earlier by hon. members that the income tax is the fairest and best tax because it is based on ability to pay and because it can be made progressive. Well, certainly, bachelors have a much greater ability to pay than men who have wives and are raising and supporting children. The second thing is that actually through taxes we are able to achieve or at least to encourage desirable ends, and I think as far as this country is concerned it is desirable that most of the bachelors settle down to a happy married life and make sure that this country is going to go on and expand in numbers. And if that measure of encouragement is given by the present taxation system I think it is a matter of general acceptance.

Perhaps these bachelor farmers in the end will marry their housekeepers and enjoy the benefits, both socially and through the tax return, of marriage.

Mr. Low: I just want to say a word about this matter of extending the exemptions for students who are attending university. I was very much impressed with what the parliamentary assistant had to say. I followed it with keen interest. Perhaps he had some good arguments. I wish to support the contention of the hon. member for St. John's West, and others, that this age limit of 21 should be raised, particularly for students who are attending university. Things are different today from what they were when "Clarie" Gillis was a boy, and quite different from what they were when I was a boy.

Mr. Herridge: That was a long time ago.

Mr. Low: Very likely. But the young people in that day did not require the standard of education required today to be able to enter into the employment that would earn them a living. Every year since then—every five years, at any rate—the requirements have risen. That is, we are competing more in each five-year period.

Mr. Laing: The courses are longer.

Mr. Low: Yes, and there is greater competition for the jobs that do exist. That has been proved, I think, by the fact that universities and schools across the country have increased the prerequisites, as well as the length of the courses. That fact in itself indicates that there has been quite a change since "Clarie" was a boy.

Today boys and girls complete their high school education at the ages of 18 or 19 years. They just get nicely started at university, and suddenly their parents are cut off from income tax exemption in respect of those children. The parents have to bear the extra tax as well as the cost of giving these young people the last year or two of their education. I believe the people of this country would wholeheartedly support the Minister of Finance in increasing the age, let us say, to 23 or 24, if they are going to university or college, or to some other training institution in order to complete the education begun before reaching the age of 21, in an effort to make themselves self-supporting.

There was one thing the minister did not say, and that was this, that, when boys and girls are encouraged to go on to higher education, if the Minister of Finance would give this further help to the parents so that these young people might become qualified through their education to earn higher salaries, the minister would get back, in higher returns these boys and girls would be able to earn, anything he might allow.

Mr. Laing: That is a long-range view.

Mr. Low: They would be in a higher tax bracket. We have to look at these things from the long-range viewpoint. I appeal to the parliamentary assistant to take into serious consideration the raising of the age limit to 23 or 24, if these people are going to university or to some other training institution to complete education begun before reaching the age of 21. If that sort of cut-off is arranged, I do not think anyone could take exception to it.

Resolution stands.

Progress reported.

BEEF AND PORK

SALES OF CANADIAN MEAT TO UNITED KINGDOM—EXCHANGE OF NEW ZEALAND BEEF AND PORK TO UNITED STATES

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should like to revert to the order for motions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the minister leave to revert to motions in order to make a statement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I stated yesterday that some arrangement had been entered into which we hoped would be satisfactory for the disposal of the surplus meat which is coming on to the market in Canada at the present time. The announcement I am about to make is that there has been agreement among Britain, New Zealand and ourselves. I am about to read the announcement to the house now. This is the statement regarding the meat agreement with Great Britain and New Zealand:

As a result of an outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in Saskatchewan, Canadian livestock and meat which would normally be sold in the United States are not permitted entry to that market. Canada has therefore a surplus of beef and pork.

Agreement has been reached between the governments of the United Kingdom, New Zealand and Canada whereby Canadian meat will be shipped to the United Kingdom in exchange for New Zealand beef and pork which will in turn be sold through normal commercial channels in the United States. The Canadian meat to be shipped to Britain will not come from or through the affected area in Canada.

The United Kingdom will pay New Zealand in sterling at the existing New Zealand-United Kingdom contract rates and Canada will receive the proceeds from the sale of the New Zealand produce in the United States. As the New Zealand meat has to be exported frozen it will realize less in the United States than would have been received from the fresh Canadian product. Although there will be a net loss to Canada, Canada has expressed a willingness to recompense New Zealand for the trouble involved in implementing the exchange and the determination of a share for New Zealand in any excess there might be of net United States over sterling proceeds is under consideration.

That is the announcement as it is being made in the three countries.

I am sure the house will support me when I say that we greatly appreciate the helpfulness of the governments of Great Britain and New Zealand in making this arrangement possible. While we have naturally not asked them to bear any share of the cost, we do recognize that the arrangement has, to a degree, upset their normal plans for meat delivery. We hope that the British people will receive some compensation through earlier delivery and perhaps also by obtaining larger quantities of meat than might otherwise be possible.

May I also express a word of appreciation of the efforts of our own officers who helped to negotiate the arrangement and of the trade commissioner service of the Department of Trade and Commerce which has been most helpful at every stage. I can assure the house that there has been the best of co-operation among all concerned, both in Canada, Great Britain and New Zealand, as well as with our friends in the United States.

In addition to the announcement I have just made, which has also been released in Great Britain and New Zealand, I am glad to be able to tell the house that we have today started moving quantities of beef to Montreal for early delivery to Britain. In other words, the meat is already moving. Freezer space on ships has been booked, and there is every indication that the movement can continue without interruption in so far as shipping and other facilities are concerned.

As is well known to members of the house, we have appealed to farmers to hold their cattle off the market in so far as they possibly could in order that the supply of beef might not greatly exceed the Canadian demand. That they have done so is proven by the fact that cattle marketings for the first eighteen weeks of this year are some 25 per cent below those of a year ago. However, in spite of decreased marketings the beef supply has been somewhat in excess of Canadian demand and considerable quantities have been accumulated in storage. It is because of this fact that it is now possible for us to have beef moving to seaboard for early delivery to Britain. As the program continues we have every reason to expect that our markets will be relieved of surplus beef.

I should like to emphasize, however, that it is still highly desirable for farmers who have grass and feed to hold lightweight and unfinished cattle rather than deliver them to the markets. If this is done we are confident that the floor prices can be maintained until the present emergency is past.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): May I express the hope that the minister will regard whatever measure of success he may feel has been attained by the negotiations now completed as an encouragement to extend negotiations with Great Britain. I hope that the government will extend their negotiations and have the kind of commonwealth conference that we have been requesting for some time.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister permit one question? Will this result in the early lifting of the quarantine at Winnipeg?

Mr. Gardiner: That is entirely in the hands of the Manitoba government.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Knowles: I was not referring to the Manitoba embargo but to the federal government's quarantine at Winnipeg.

Mr. Gardiner: Any quarantine the federal government has, whether at Winnipeg or elsewhere, is associated with the handling of the disease, and merely as a result of this action we cannot relinquish any of these restrictions.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

MORAVIAN CHURCH IN AMERICA

Mr. John Decore (Vegreville) moved the second reading of Bill No. 185, respecting the board of elders of the Canadian district of the Moravian church in America.

Mr. Green: Could we have an explanation by the sponsor?

Mr. Decore: The purpose of this bill is to amend the original act of incorporation of this body, which was carried out by dominion statute in 1909. The first change proposed is to move the location of the head office from Strathcona to Edmonton. At one time Strathcona was bigger than Edmonton, but it finally became incorporated into Edmonton; just as at one time Calgary thought it was a bigger city than Edmonton, and the time is coming when it will be incorporated into Edmonton.

Mr. Nickle: Or vice versa.

Mr. Decore: I wish to assure the hon. member for Calgary West that we are not very fussy about having Calgarians in Edmonton, anyway; but that is the situation. The next important change is to increase the number of elders, the governing body of this church, from three to five. The next change is to increase the value of the real estate that may be held in Canada from some $50,000 to $500,000. Since the incorporation of this body in 1909 the number of members and adherents and churches has continued to grow, making it necessary to hold more real property and to expand the governing body.

I would like to give a very brief historical outline of this church. It claims to be the oldest Protestant church in the world and to have as its founder John Huss, who was burned at the stake in 1415. It takes its name from Moravia, which is a province of what is now Czechoslovakia. The church is noted for its missionary work and was one of the first to have foreign missions in Labrador and Alaska. There are in my constituency a number of people who belong to this church, and I can assure hon. members that they are good Christians and good Canadians. I think this bill should be referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Mr. Cruickshank: I would like the hon. member to understand that I am quite in accord with this bill, but why is the change being made from one minor city to another in western Canada?

Mr. Decore: I am not sure that I understand the question. Why is the change being made from what?

Mr. Cruickshank: As I understand it, the headquarters of this church are being changed from one city to another within the same province, which is more or less a subsidiary of British Columbia. Why is the change being made?

Mr. Decore: There is no longer a city called Strathcona. It is now the city of Edmonton, which includes what was formerly Stratchona. If my good friend will visit Edmonton, as he should, he will find that it has expanded greatly and, as I said a moment ago, it may eventually take in Calgary.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

BOUNDARY PIPELINE CORPORATION

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 6, 1952, consideration in committee of Bill No. 62, to incorporate Boundary Pipeline Corporation—Mr. Larson—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to incorporate a pipe line company to be known as Boundary Pipeline Corporation. The plan of the sponsors of the bill is to pipe natural gas from the province of Alberta to Winnipeg, and thence in due course to the central states of the United States, I presume having in mind more particularly such centres as Minneapolis and St. Paul and possibly Chicago. The applicants as set out in the bill are all described as residents of Regina, but behind them is a United States pipe line engineering firm known as the Fish Engineering Corporation of Houston, Texas.

Your Honour will remember that there was no debate on the second reading of this bill. It got through that stage, perhaps through the negligence of some of the members of the house, with no debate at all, and was referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. This evening I wish to comment on one incident which took place while this bill was before the standing committee.

The main witness called on behalf of the applicants for a charter was a certain Robert R. Herring, of Houston, Texas, who is an engineer for this Fish Engineering Corporation. He was being questioned by the member for Calgary West who, without any question, is an authority on oil and natural gas matters. Before that member had finished his examination, some of the government members of the committee intervened and moved the following motion which will be found on page 73 of the proceedings of the committee. It reads:

> . . . that sufficient evidence has been obtained for the committee to decide as to the economic practicability of the pipe line under consideration; and that the question be put on the preamble without further examination of the witness. After discussion and the question having been put on the said motion, it was agreed to on the following division:

There follows a list of the names of the members who voted for and against that closure motion. All the Liberal members present at the time voted for that motion, with the exception of the member for Hastings South who voted with the representatives of the opposition parties; for that stand I am glad to give him credit.

I would point out, Mr. Chairman, that the member for Calgary West had not yet finished his examination, and that the passing of that motion also had the effect of preventing other members of the committee from carrying on an examination; each one of them had the right to question the witness. Again, I would point out that this was a private bill and supposedly not sponsored by the government. There was plenty of time available because we were not halfway through that particular sitting at the time this motion was brought forward. We could have sat again in the afternoon. There was absolutely no time to be gained by shutting off the hearing of evidence in that manner. There were no other bills before the committee except this pipe line bill. The result of this motion, of course, was that the bill could not be given full consideration in the committee, because Mr. Herring was the principal witness.

I would point out to Your Honour, and to the members of this house, that actions such as this by a government majority on a committee are unfair, they are unwise and they are contemptuous of the democratic procedure. In fact, they are against the best traditions of this House of Commons. I regret very much that such a stand should be taken by government members in any committee. They would not dare to do it in the house because of the adverse publicity that would be at once spread across the country. Yet it was done in a committee, and it is becoming a habit which has got to be stopped. This is one more example of the weakness of this present parliament in that it has such an overwhelming government majority. I would suggest to the Prime Minister and the members of his cabinet that they remind their followers that Canada still belongs to the Canadian people and not to the so-called Liberal party.

This bill raises the question of what is to become of the natural gas piped east from the province of Alberta. It is admitted by all concerned that there will be only one line to the east, just as there is to be but one line to the west. I would remind hon. members of the debates which have taken place in this house concerning the question of piping natural gas from Alberta to the west coast. In the fall session of 1949 we had a debate concerning the bills of two groups of applicants who sought to gain charters to enable them to pipe that gas from southern Alberta down into the state of Washington at the first convenient point, and from Washington to the state of Oregon with a branch line up to Vancouver and possibly another branch line up to the Canadian city of Trail. These private bills were talked out in 1949. They were re-introduced in the session of 1950 and, after considerable debate, were finally allowed to go through. The names of the two companies then granted a charter were the Alberta Natural Gas Company and Prairie Transmission Lines Limited. It is significant that the Fish Engineering Corporation, which is behind the bill we are now considering to incorporate Boundary Pipeline Corporation, was also behind the Prairie Transmission Lines Limited. Last year, in the spring session of 1951, a private bill was introduced which would have incorporated a pipe line company known as Border Pipeline Corporation. The sponsors of this bill also planned to pipe gas or oil, I forget now which it was, to the Pacific coast via the United States. That bill was talked out during that session.

In due course the various companies which had obtained charters applied to the Alberta petroleum and natural gas conservation board for permission to pipe gas from that province. In the month of March of this year a decision was handed down by the board authorizing a company known as Westcoast Transmission Company Limited to pipe gas to the west coast from the Peace river district. This meant, of course, that they would pipe it through British Columbia first and then any surplus would go down to the states of Washington and Oregon. Of course, that was the route which we had advocated throughout, or alternatively the route from Edmonton through the Yellowhead pass and so to Vancouver.

The board having handed down its decision, the Alberta government put through a bill granting permission for the exportation of this gas from the Peace river down to the western Canadian coast. The British Columbia government is, of course, willing to take whatever steps are necessary to assist in the construction of that line, because the legislature of British Columbia has repeatedly taken a unanimous stand in favour of a gas line to the west coast which served Canada before reaching into the United States. The company building this line to the west coast still will need the approval of the board of transport commissioners and of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the latter permission being required to export to the United States. They will also need the permission of the federal power commission of the United States for such export.

It is interesting to note that with respect to this same Fish Engineering Corporation, which is behind the present bill, that when their company, Prairie Transmission Lines Limited, lost out in the race to get permission to pipe gas west, the president of the company at once announced that he was going to rush natural gas into the states of Oregon and Washington from Texas, and in that way prevent the Westcoast Transmission Company Limited from getting Canadian gas into those two states.

As to the export east of gas from Alberta, the Alberta board refused to give any direction for such export. It appears that in that province the exportation of gas is a hot political issue with the Liberals and, I think, the C.C.F. taking the position that no gas whatever should be exported from Alberta, while the Social Credit party has stood for such export. However, it is expected that permission will be granted later this year for the export of natural gas east from the province of Alberta. Hence the question of where that gas is to go is extremely important at the present time.

There are two possibilities. The first is that it will go across the prairie to Winnipeg, then south to Minnesota and other United States centres and possibly to Chicago. The second is that it will go to Winnipeg, then to Fort William, Port Arthur, Toronto, Montreal and possibly the city of Quebec, serving many Ontario and Quebec centres en route.

There have been two companies which have been active in preparing to pipe natural gas east from Alberta. One of them is Western Pipe Lines which was granted a charter in the rush just before the election of 1949, before any of us except the Minister of Trade and Commerce understood what all this pipe line excitement was about. The other is Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited which was incorporated in 1951. The first of these companies, namely Western Pipe Lines, plans to follow the United States route, to Winnipeg and then down into the United States. The second one, namely Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, plans to build the all-Canadian route. Both of them have spent several million dollars in making surveys of the respective routes, of the centres that will be served, and also in developing reserves of gas in the province of Alberta.

The applicants for this present charter now come along, and they have done practically no development work whatever. They have made no extensive surveys. They are trying to cash in on the efforts of these other companies. Their expenditures amount to $25,000. I asked that question in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. Hon. members will find this at page 11 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the committee:

By Mr. Green:

Q. There is one other question I would like to ask you, Mr. MacTavish.

I may say that Mr. MacTavish is parliamentary agent of the applicants for this charter. The question continues:

How much money has been spent by the applicants to date in connection with this project? A. I think I can find that out for you immediately. I am instructed that about $25,000 has been spent.

They plan a very small pipe to Winnipeg, namely a 16-inch pipe, whereas Western Pipe Lines are planning a 24-inch pipe and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited a 30-inch pipe. It was admitted, in effect, by Mr. Herring in the committee that all his people are trying to do is to get their toe in the door in Alberta; that is, to get a charter and get permission to put in this small pipe line and in that way get their toe in the door. In that way they would be in a preferred position because there is to be only one pipe line to the east.

Then in the committee they admitted that they plan eventually to pipe gas to the United States. At page 63 of the proceedings of the committee, in my examination of Mr. Herring, are to be found the following question and answer:

Q. Now, in this bill which you are sponsoring, which you are supporting, you are laying another plan to get Alberta gas down into the central states? A. That is correct.

They admit that they have no intention whatever of building to Ontario or Quebec. I would point out to hon. members that in section 6 of the bill we find that the applicants are asking power to build within the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, or outside Canada. There is no mention whatever of Ontario or Quebec. We asked that question also in the committee of Mr. MacTavish. It will be found at page 7 of the proceedings. The question is:

Q. Mr. Chairman, arising out of the question just asked by Mr. McIvor,—

I am hoping that the hon. member for Fort William will follow my remarks tonight because I shall try to set him straight on the views he expressed the other night.

Mr. McIvor: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I am following the hon. member.

Mr. Green: The question continues:

—as I read the bill you are not asking any power to build a pipe line in the province of Ontario at all. Is that correct? You are only asking to build in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba or outside Canada, so that obviously, it is not the intention of this company to build a pipe line in the provinces of Ontario or Quebec. Is that correct? A. That is correct, sir.

Here I should like to refer to the statement made on Tuesday evening in this house by the hon. member for Fort William. It will be found at page 1930 of Hansard. He spoke in favour of this bill, if you please, and he said:

I object vigorously to any measure providing for a pipe line that will come to Winnipeg but will not come to Fort William and Port Arthur.

Of course the one way to prevent Fort William from getting gas is to have this present company given permission to go ahead. The hon. member continues:

I supported this bill—

Mr. Hodgson: It stops at Winnipeg.

Mr. McIvor: —because the amendment I moved was carried. The purpose of my amendment was to eliminate the words "outside Canada" . . .

I now turn to page 74 of the proceedings of the committee. It so happens that the hon. gentleman did not move an amendment to strike out the words "outside Canada". That amendment was moved by the hon. member for Calgary West and the hon. member for Fort William voted against it. That vote is recorded here at page 74 of the proceedings. I only hope that the hon. member's constituents in Fort William will get the facts a little bit straighter than he did. I would point out further that in a return tabled for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, in answer to a question asking whether any cities had requested that the pipe line should be built through Canada, the information is given showing that some had, and they are listed as the township of Nipigon, the corporation of the city of Fort William and the city of Port Arthur.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that there will be only one gas line to the east. If the plans of this so-called Boundary Pipeline Corporation are approved, Ontario and Quebec will get no—and I repeat that word "no"—Canadian gas. They will have to go hat in hand to the United States for gas from Texas.

Now, let us examine that possibility. There has been a tremendous demand for Texas gas in all parts of the United States. Some of their largest cities are not yet served. I believe that Philadelphia is one such city. Under the United States law the federal power commission of that country is given jurisdiction to decide whether or not United States gas can be exported. I hold in my hand the United States natural gas act. In section 3 we find that the test which must be used by the federal power commission is whether the proposed exportation or importation will be consistent with the public interest. The test is the public interest. In practice that law has been interpreted in such a way that only surplus United States gas can be exported; that United States' needs must come first; that the gas which is being exported can be shut off if it is proved at any time that there are existing needs in the United States adjacent to the line; and I understand that no permits have been issued on any other basis.

I have here a judgment of the federal power commission in an application of Panhandle Eastern Pipe Line Company, which included an application for permission to export gas to Canada for the Union Gas Company of Ontario. We find this judgment on that application. It is dated August 31, 1951, and reads:

> It is obvious from the foregoing that, in view of the demonstrated requirements of customers within the United States and the present designed capacity of the Panhandle system (850,000 Mcf daily), no natural gas is available for exportation on a firm basis at this time. The record, therefore, shows that the proposed exportation will not be consistent with the public interest. The application in this docket will therefore be dismissed without prejudice.

They have been making similar rulings for some years. I have another ruling on an application by Panhandle, again for permission to export to Ontario, to the Union Company. This was in 1946, and was an application to export gas from the United States to Canada near the city of River Rouge, Michigan, to be sold and delivered to the Union Gas Company of Canada, Limited. Here is an extract from the judgment:

> No deliveries of natural gas shall be made to Union during the months of January, February, March, November and December, in any year during the term of this authorization.

Mind you, the application was for a very small amount of gas, 5½ billion cubic feet per year, apparently. The judgment goes on:

> Delivery of natural gas to Union shall be curtailed or interrupted whenever, and to the extent, required for the protection of deliveries of natural gas, either for immediate consumption or for storage, to any and all of applicant's customers in the United States. The authorization hereby granted shall not constitute ground or justification for any refusal by applicant to transport or sell natural gas to any person or municipality at any time during the term hereof, either for consumption in the United States by such person or municipality or for storage, or for resale for ultimate public consumption in the United States for domestic, commercial, industrial, or any other use, it being the intent of this authorization that at all times, persons and municipalities in the United States are to receive preferential service over that to Union;

Is it any wonder that the governments of Quebec and Ontario want Canadian gas? They have come out in favour of a gas line from Alberta through Canadian territory to their provinces. I have here statements from the minister of mines of Ontario, Mr. Gemmell. I am reading from the Vancouver Province of January 22 of this year:

> Hon. W. S. Gemmell, Ontario Minister of Mines, said at a press conference that "our policy is going to be to encourage a trans-Canada pipe line both as a source of fuel for Ontario and Quebec and as a national defence safeguard."
> "We see no other answer than an all-Canadian pipe line."
> Mr. Gemmell made it clear the Ontario government backed the principle of the pipe line but no individual company, although the Trans-Canada Pipe Line Company has made the only application to the board of transport commissioners to build the line east.
> Mr. Gemmell said Ontario backed a trans-Canada pipe line because of uncertainty of supply under the proposal to bring United States gas into Ontario. Such supplies would be subject to export permit rules of the United States federal power commission.

Again on March 6 of this year he said, as reported in the Globe and Mail:

> "We need natural gas in eastern Canada . . . Natural gas will replace hydro as our source of power in the years to come . . . We need a guaranteed supply of natural gas in northern and eastern Canada. I should like to underline that word "guaranteed."
> The view that gas could be brought more easily from Texas, Mr. Gemmell suggested, snagged on the word guaranteed. Already one application by an American firm had been turned down by the United States government, and another withdrawn because rejection had been indicated.
> "In view of the Washington attitude toward Canada's reciprocal agreement relative to the St. Lawrence seaway, the question is raised as to the dispatch with which the United States would consummate the proposed natural gas deal," he said. Further, no necessity exists whatever on Canada's part for a natural gas reciprocal agreement. An all-Canadian pipe line to serve Canadians awaits only government approval.

On March 29 the premier of Quebec said, according to the Montreal Star:

> Quebec was in favour of importing natural gas from Alberta rather than from Texas, he said, to support Canadian industry. He said representatives of United States and Canadian pipe line construction firms had been in touch with him about the possibilities of exporting natural gas.

The premier said nothing had yet been decided as to whether pipe lines would be built or not into Quebec province. But he said, if natural gas is to be imported it will not be United States gas.

The premier said Quebec preferred to import the gas from Alberta because it was preferable to support a Canadian industry, not subject "to a foreign authority."

There is no question that Ontario and Quebec will need all the Canadian gas they can get from Alberta and all the gas that they can get in from the United States. They need both; but they simply must have Canadian gas. A line built through Canada means the spending of $250 million; it means jobs for Canadians; it means a guaranteed supply. The hon. member for Calgary West pointed out the other night that the plan of the applicants for this charter held no benefit whatever for Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. On the other hand, if we have a line built through Canada think of the benefit to Ontario. Just think of the benefit to Fort William, Port Arthur and all the points along the north shore of lake Superior, and down through central Ontario to Toronto, and right along lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence into Montreal, and possibly to Quebec city.

I do not see how anybody can favour any other route but a route through Canada. I hope that many members from those provinces will rise in their places and support us in this fight. I believe that if this plan, sponsored by the applicants for a charter under the name of Boundary Pipeline Corporation is approved, if they get the various consents to proceed with the installation of a pipe line to the east, then Ontario and Quebec will get no Canadian gas at all. I believe it is not in the best interests of this nation that this charter should be granted; and for that reason I propose to vote against the bill.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, I had not expected to speak in this connection, but I am glad to note that my hon. friend from New Brunswick is insisting that I do so.

Mr. Riley: I hope you speak for an hour.

Mr. Cruickshank: The hon. member for Maple Creek, in a forty-two minute filibuster, has told us of what a great riding he has. I presume it is as great a district as he has said. He paid me the compliment—perhaps it was not due me—that last year I had led a filibuster in connection with an all-Canadian pipe line. Possibly I am not entitled to all that honour, because that discussion developed as a result of co-operation among a few of us from British Columbia.

Those of us who did lead the filibuster are proud of the fact; and we would like the hon. member for Maple Creek—which, I believe, is a small district in Saskatchewan—to know that we are proud of that filibuster. Already in British Columbia, in the municipalities of Richmond, Burnaby and other districts, contracts have been let to a value of $20 million or $30 million to expand the oil services in that province.

When I was home at Easter one of the greatest privileges tendered to me was that of having my picture taken. Like all politicians, even those who opposed the all-Canadian route, I like to have my picture taken. So it was not only a privilege but a pleasure to have that happen.

Near my farm is located the small station of Clayburn. Indeed, the siding is on my farm. I believe all members from British Columbia will know where it is. It was my good fortune to have my picture taken alongside two carloads of 24-inch steel pipe for the Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company. The pipe was being unloaded at that siding.

We know that large contracts have been let for the expansion of refineries in British Columbia, although they are not located in my riding. But the fact remains that the main line goes right through the centre of Cruickshank's farm, and I got a real kick out of having that picture taken.

That pipe line goes through there because a few of us from British Columbia, despite the majority of members from that province, stated our position. I well recall that an agreement was made in my office, room 565 in this building, at seven-thirty in the evening, that those of us who had taken part in the so-called filibuster would withdraw our objection if it was agreed that the main line would be within Canada. I know those who supported me will agree with what I say in this connection.

I do not know whether all hon. members read the Ottawa Citizen, nor am I sure which party that newspaper supports. However, in its issue of Friday, May 9, there was an editorial with which I agree, and which I believe will receive approval of other hon. members, because it expresses the views of members from British Columbia. It is headed "Intelligent British Columbians" and refers to a Gallup poll. I do not find that any other province is mentioned. And though my father was born in Ontario, I must accept this statement in the Gallup poll which says that British Columbians are the most intelligent people in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cruickshank: Well, it is right there in the editorial. That is what the latest Gallup poll says; it is not my statement.

Mr. Sinnott: The biggest insult to Canada.

Mr. Cruickshank: It is the Gallup poll that says that.

Mr. McIvor: The Gallup poll makes mistakes.

Mr. Cruickshank: It is not my statement, but that of the Gallup poll. And just to satisfy some of my colleagues who surround me, my colleagues from other provinces, let me say again that it was not my statement. However, judging from their stand in connection with an all-Canadian pipe line, when it was discussed at the last session, I doubt whether they would qualify. I do not have to take up the time of the house—

Mr. Riley: You can have ten minutes more.

Mr. Cruickshank: But I am sure my colleagues from Ontario and Quebec must be as interested in the development of their provinces and the economy of Canada as we were in the development of British Columbia. It will be noticed that I am not having as many interruptions from British Columbian or other western members as I had last year.

One of my colleagues from British Columbia says—

The Chairman: I would ask the hon. member to address the chair and, so far as possible, to speak to the bill.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am definitely interested in the bill, because we won last time, and we now have this development out there. We have even had gas granted by Alberta, as will be admitted by the acting leader of the Social Credit party. That gas is going to the town of Trail and, in spite of what was done by the member from Trail, it will cut their costs in half. That is what we are trying to do for eastern Canada.

Mr. Herridge: Pardon me, but did I hear you say, "In spite of the member for Trail"?

Mr. Cruickshank: Oh, I beg your pardon; I should have said Kimberley, which is a suburb of Trail. We know that Trans Mountain has now let contracts and is actually building an all-Canadian pipe line into British Columbia, a fact of which I am sure the hon. member for Vancouver South is proud. They have made the contract, and they are building it.

Mr. Byrne: I supported it.

Mr. Cruickshank: You did not. You supported nothing, so far as an all-Canadian route is concerned.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

Mr. Byrne: I supported it by my speech in the house on the pipe line bill sponsored by the hon. member for Vancouver South, for an all-Canadian route for the oil pipe line—not one for the gas.

Mr. Cruickshank: Any support the hon. member for Kootenay East gave us was after we got the amendment through and not before. Gas is more important than oil to the town of Kimberley from which he comes.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cruickshank: The records will show what are the facts, and the people of your riding will read the records too. What we are trying to do—

An hon. Member: Talk it out.

Mr. Cruickshank: —is to ensure that this bill is not passed in order that the resources of Canada may be utilized for the benefit of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec and possibly the maritimes. We have no objection whatsoever to any surplus being exported to the United States as in the case of our pulp and anything else, but we believe that primarily our resources should be utilized within our own country. I have heard colleagues who sit not so far away from me advocate this very thing in connection with our great timber resources.

An hon. Member: Don't point at me.

Mr. Cruickshank: Let us utilize our resources first to build up industry, create employment and provide security for the great labour unions that some members fail to represent at times. Let us build up that security and then send any surplus to the United States, our best neighbour and our best friend in this world next to Great Britain. We believe these resources should be developed primarily for the purpose of building up Canada, with the surplus being exported. That is what we are saying now, and we are rather surprised that members from Ontario and Quebec and even from the maritimes apparently by their silence give approval to the bill when obviously if permission is granted by the province of Alberta and the board of transport commissioners the gas will be exported to the United States. I have only talked for eighteen minutes.

An hon. Member: And have not said anything.

Mr. Cruickshank: Maybe I have not said anything yet but my colleague is afraid to get up and say anything for or against.

An hon. Member: Let us have the Gallup poll.

Mr. Cruickshank: I had better refer to that again.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Cruickshank: Order my eye. Those who are speaking now are not courageous enough to speak on behalf of their own province.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): We do not need to have any lessons from the hon. member on anything else but what he is doing now.

Mr. Cruickshank: If I am out of order I withdraw. The leader of the opposition has come into the chamber, and I should like him to note the editorial in today's Citizen.

An hon. Member: He will not like it.

Mr. Cruickshank: This includes Carleton county as well. According to the latest Gallup poll—

Mr. MacDougall: He is not listening.

Mr. McIvor: May I ask the hon. member a question? I should like to ask the hon. member if he thinks the Gallup polls are perfect and never make a mistake?

Mr. Cruickshank: I do not think they are perfect. I have been asked a direct question, Mr. Chairman, and I would reply that the Gallup poll forecast that the Liberals would be elected at the last election and they were. That is as nearly perfect as they can be. I hope the hon. member for Carleton appreciates the stand taken by some of us from British Columbia. Perhaps I had better read the heading of the editorial again. It is headed, "Intelligent British Columbians". That is what we are. Some of us are naturally modest, but we got a pipe line with an all-Canadian route which is under construction today. The right of way is being cleared and the pipe is being unloaded on sidings in Canada in spite of those who wanted an all-American route, including some British Columbia members. Apparently some of us qualify for the wording of the headline in spite of those who want to build an all-American route. Their remarks fall right off my back. I used to shoot ducks in the Kootenays years ago before some people were born.

An hon. Member: You are not shooting ducks now.

An hon. Member: You are shooting an owl.

Mr. Cruickshank: Maybe I am shooting an owl but I shot it last year with the assistance of a few members, not including some of my colleagues. The result is that over 70 cars of steel pipe are being unloaded in the province of British Columbia to build an all-Canadian pipe line. It will result in $30 million to $40 million being spent on new refineries in spite of opposition. My friend is very brilliant in some ways but he pulled a boner that time when he bucked the province of British Columbia, western Canada, the economy of all Canada and the unions of Canada by trying to divert gas and oil to the United States before utilization to the fullest extent had been put into effect in Canada. I do not want to take up too much time.

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mr. Cruickshank: I have only spoken for some fifteen minutes and I have not read the articles I want to read. However, if this matter comes up at the next session I will read the remarks made on May 5, 1950, by no less an authority than the present Prime Minister of Canada, and I will also read what was said by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. No man in Canada knows more about industry and the development of Canada than the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am going to take a great deal of pleasure next session in putting on the record what he said about the building up of Canada in spite of some of these minor obstacles from western Canada.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

INCOME TAX ACT

The Chairman: At six o'clock we were considering the first paragraph of the income tax resolution.

Mr. Thatcher: I should like to rise this evening for the main purpose of supporting the request made this afternoon by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar for an income tax exemption of $3,000 for married people and $1,500 for single persons. The crux of these resolutions which parliament is being asked to consider tonight is that income taxes in Canada this year will be higher than ever before in peacetime. In view of the cost of living I feel that it is the people in the lower brackets who are going to be mainly affected. I think the time has come for this parliament, and particularly the Minister of Finance and his parliamentary assistant, to realize that income taxes in Canada have reached the saturation point in peacetime. I think the rates which are proposed in this resolution are going to cause real hardship in this country. After all, you can ask a man to carry a 300-pound load across a room, but if you were to ask that man to carry the same load around a city block you would break his back. That is just what this government is going to do as far as the taxpayers of Canada are concerned.

I believe income taxes in Canada are discouraging initiative. I know farmers in my riding who have come to me and said, "I am going to live in the city this winter. What is the use of my going out raising hogs, raising livestock, working hard throughout the winter, only to give the money to Mr. Abbott?" I know railroaders who have made perhaps twenty trips and then have said, "Thatcher, what is the use of my going out and making any more? I have to give it all to Mr. Abbott." I know businessmen who have said, "What is the use of my trying to go ahead any further? If I do make any more money I just have to give it to Mr. Abbott." So I repeat that in my opinion income taxation in Canada has reached the saturation point.

I was disappointed this afternoon when the chairman ruled that the hon. member for Greenwood could not propose savings. How on earth are we going to get the income tax down unless the government is interested in hearing some suggestions for savings. The hon. member for Greenwood was prepared to make such suggestions this afternoon. A few weeks ago I had the privilege of making a few suggestions. I must say those suggestions were received with some ridicule, perhaps a little contempt and certainly derision. No attempt was made by the minister to answer them in any way. The only one that was answered in the house was by the parliamentary assistant this afternoon. He answered one out of about fifteen which he thought might cause me political embarrassment. That was the only trouble he went to at all.

Mr. Sinclair: I wanted to be in order, so the one I answered was the only suggestion which was relevant to the actual item we were discussing. I would also draw attention to the fact that most of the hon. member's observations are not in order as far as this resolution is concerned. That was the reason the remarks of the hon. member for Greenwood in regard to savings were ruled out, not that he should not have the right at the proper time to make whatever observations he wishes on that matter.

Mr. Thatcher: I can only assume that this government is not interested in hearing about savings. Perhaps any savings we might suggest would not be reasonable; I do not know. But at least as opposition members we are trying to make a few suggestions, and it seems to me the least the parliamentary assistant should do is make some attempt to analyse them. Again I say that income taxes in this country are too high, and unless something is done in the next year to get them down we are going to run into trouble.

The Chairman: Has the discussion terminated on paragraph 1?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Paragraph 2.

Mr. Sinnott: I would like to say just a word.

The Chairman: I might inform the hon. member that paragraph 2 refers to paragraph 1. Therefore if he wants to make only a few remarks we will consider the discussion on paragraph 1 as having been terminated.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: We are now on paragraph 2. The hon. member may proceed.

Mr. Sinnott: I was very pleased that the hon. member for Moose Jaw got up enough courage to make the fighting speech he has made. I think he is known as the parlour socialist of Saskatchewan; and those few words he said just now were said simply because of the Saskatchewan election in the near future.

Mr. Knowles: I would like to ask the parliamentary assistant a question with respect to the application of what is set out in paragraph 2. It is perhaps a technical question; if so, he may give me a technical answer. This proposes that for the year 1952 the rate shall be the average of the rates enacted by last year's budget and the rates being enacted now for 1953. I can see that it is a fairly easy matter to arrive at that average in certain of the brackets, because those brackets under the old scale correspond with the brackets under the new scale; but a point is reached where these brackets do not correspond. When that point is reached, how is the average arrived at?

Mr. Sinclair: The problem here is the problem we discussed earlier in the day, arising from the fact that today the great bulk of personal income tax is deducted at the source weekly, fortnightly or monthly. For the first six months of this year the law which is in effect until this amending bill is passed will require deductions at the 20 per cent surcharge rate. We hope we will have royal assent to this bill by June and on July 1, starting the second six months, these new rates will come into effect. So the result for the whole year will be the average arrived at by six months' application of the present 20 per cent surcharge and six months' application of the rates in this schedule. Next year, of course, providing there are no changes, the entire year will be at the rates in this schedule, and the deductions will be made according to the tables which will be used by industry after July 1.

Mr. Knowles: I fully understand that, but apparently I did not make my point clear to the parliamentary assistant. If I do not get it across to him this time I shall not press it, at least not from the floor of the house. If he will look at part (m) of the previous paragraph he will note that it relates to an income bracket from $75,000 to $100,000. This does not affect anybody in Winnipeg North Centre. But if he will look at the brackets for the previous year he will see that there is no $75,000 to $100,000 bracket. How does a person affected by that situation arrive at the average?

Mr. Sinclair: I get the point now, the fact that the brackets in the old schedule and the brackets in the new schedule, quite aside from rates, do not correspond in all cases.

Mr. Knowles: That is it. They correspond in the lower brackets but there is a point above which they do not.

Mr. Sinclair: Perhaps the easiest way for me to answer that question would be to say that when the bill is brought down the minister will give the explanation with actual examples.

The Chairman: Paragraph 3.

Mr. Adamson: Dealing with paragraphs 3 and 4 together, there is quite a technical question which I discussed very briefly with the parliamentary assistant last night, but which I feel is of sufficient importance to deal with at a little length, because it affects a great many corporations in Ontario and Quebec. It has to do, of course, with the statement by the Minister of Finance in his budget address that taxation on corporations in Canada would not be increased by the present proposals. That does not agree with submissions which have been made to me. I must admit, Mr. Chairman, that I have worked on them at some length today, and they are still a little involved to me. I have tried to put down the questions as concisely and clearly as I could and I shall endeavour, by following the notes I have made, to present the case to the parliamentary assistant. While I realize that the Minister of Finance at least had no intention of increasing corporation taxes I am sure that, in fact, corporation taxes have been increased because of the provincial tax structure in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

I believe that the minister's statement that sections 3 and 4 would not raise the tax on mining corporations is open to question. Assuming that a province levied a 5 per cent tax similar to the federal tax they gave up, the result would be the same. But in Ontario the levy of 7 per cent does not affect taxable dividends, and therefore the Canadian income tax on such dividends is increased by 4·4 per cent. The royalty or mine profits tax assessed by the provinces of Ontario and Quebec is allowed as a deduction from income in calculating federal income tax. There are two taxes in both provinces, the corporation tax and the royalty tax mentioned above. The provincial authorities recognize that there would be an inequity if both levies were treated separately, and therefore the income subject to royalty is deducted from taxable income under the Ontario and Quebec corporation tax acts.

To correct the situation a change would be required in the federal income tax regulations to permit mining companies in Ontario and Quebec to deduct mines profits tax or royalty from the federal income tax rather than from earnings. Otherwise, the federal income tax is raised by an amount up to a maximum of 5 per cent. The minister has stated that there will be no net increase in the taxes paid by corporations owing to this administrative change. However, if the Canadian income tax is amended as indicated in the resolution, this statement would be far from correct for the following reasons:

(1) To utilize this method of equalizing the income tax as between the provinces and the government of Canada, the basis of taxation in all jurisdictions would have to be the same or at least comparatively so.

(2) For example, Ontario does not tax dividends received by one company from another, in accordance with section 14 (4) (e), Ontario corporation tax act. This is a common practice in many mining companies because they finance other mines and are, in part, holding companies. In the year ended March 31, 1952, one mine received $963,000 in dividends from United States corporations. This income is not taxed under the Ontario corporation tax act. The effect of section 4 of the resolution therefore would be to tax this income an additional 5 per cent under the Canadian Income Tax Act or another $48,000 per annum, although the minister has stated that there would be no increase in net taxation.

(3) We should determine also what the status of mining companies will be. The tax paid on mining profits under the Ontario mining tax act is deductible as an expense under the Canadian Income Tax Act. The profit is likewise deducted from taxable income as determined under the Ontario corporation tax act. Is this tax now to be considered as an income tax payable to the province of Ontario? For, if so, the mine would gain in having the tax now allowed as a deduction from federal income tax. However, if it is not considered an income tax, then the mine profits as determined under the Canadian Income Tax Act would be subject to a further 5 per cent rate increase.

(4) Under the Quebec corporation tax act a mining company which pays a tax under division 3 of the Quebec mining act is exempt from Quebec corporation tax on all its income. The same question arises as to whether the mining tax would be considered an income tax, but such a company pays no tax to the province of Quebec on its revenue derived from other than mining operations. Under the amendment as proposed, all of this income would now be subject to an additional 5 per cent rate under the Canadian Income Tax Act.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this affects a number of corporations which have other income. I hardly think there is a major mining company that does not have income from other investments. Under the present proposals in sections 3 and 4, apparently this income is subject to increased taxation federally notwithstanding the provisions of the Ontario and Quebec mining tax acts. This income, while not considered taxable under the Quebec and Ontario laws, is considered taxable at an extra rate of 5 per cent separate from the earnings of the mines. I have tried to present the situation as clearly as I can. It is quite involved through these two regulations which, in effect, mean that these corporations will become liable for an extra tax which may be as great as 5 per cent. I bring this to the attention of the committee, Mr. Chairman, because I believe it is something that is of importance to the administration of the act.

Mr. Sinclair: I am very grateful to the hon. member for letting me look at his file of letters last night, so I had an opportunity of doing a little study on this matter. As he very properly pointed out, paragraphs 3 and 4 of the resolution are very clear as applied to ordinary industrial corporations. There are, however, one or two groups of industries which, both federally and provincially, receive different treatment so far as taxes are concerned from ordinary industrial operations. One of those groups is the mining industry, for the reason that it is operating on a wasting asset and in a highly speculative field. This industry, both federally and provincially, receives special provisions not accorded to other industries, other than oil in Alberta and other oil provinces. Because of that, there is a problem, which the member has outlined, that the ordinary corporation tax in provinces is not applied to these mines. The question arises as to just how these special rates will be recognized under these two items. As soon as the budget speech was made and the resolutions were brought forward, the mining industry of course recognized this point and have made representations to the department on this subject. The minister has told them that when the regulations for the new act are being drafted a sympathetic attitude will be taken so as to draft the regulations to fit these cases which were regarded as peculiar both in the federal taxation field and in the provincial taxation field.

I am grateful to the hon. member for putting the details on Hansard. Perhaps he might also supply the officials of the Department of Finance with further details, in anticipation of debate on the bill.

Mr. Adamson: I will.

Mr. Sinclair: Then, when the minister is piloting the bill through, at this point in the bill he will be able to say what has been done with regard to this problem which the hon. member has rightly raised.

Mr. Adamson: I shall be only too pleased to do as the parliamentary assistant suggests.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish to say just a word about this matter of corporation taxation in general. First of all, I want to say just a word to echo the warning given by the hon. member for Moose Jaw, because I sometimes feel that those who are in charge of our financial affairs get so accustomed to dealing with hundreds of millions and billions that they become a little bit dazzled by those large figures and find it difficult to get down to the level of those who do not deal in them. I read that the minister a day or two ago was moved to express most optimistic views, and I hope his views are correct. He says that he is an optimist by nature; he says that we are in a period of expansion, and that nothing can stop us unless there is another war and the world goes to pot.

I love an optimist. The only thing I should like to say in connection with that matter is that I hope our expansion will not be so largely based on inflation as it has been in the last few years, because that has not worked out to the advantage of everyone. A great many people in this country, without knowing just what is happening, are experiencing in their own lives the fact that inflation makes the rich richer and the poor poorer.

I want to say a word about the corporation tax in particular. The minister has very piously, and I am sure very sincerely, said during the last two years that he became troubled as soon as the corporation tax got above 50 per cent. The trouble is, however, that he does not do anything about it. I think there is a Sunday School story to the effect that a teacher asked the children to define repentance, and one said that repentance means being sorry, but the next one said: No, it means being sorry enough to quit. I think it is right that the minister is sorry. He has told us that he is and we take his word. But we want something much more than that before it will do any good.

We expect to raise—as we did last year and no doubt will again—a fabulous amount from the taxation of corporations. I think it is some $1,200 million that we expect to raise. Of course we must remember that that is only the beginning. A large percentage—no doubt some of the gentlemen I see before me could give us the percentage; I cannot at the moment—of the personal income tax will represent income received from the corporations, so that in fact you get a double harvest. I am not objecting to that fact either. I am only pointing out the tremendous importance to our whole fabric—and particularly to the tax collecting fabric—of the welfare of corporations.

Last year, with the increased taxation the facts are—and no doubt they have been carefully pondered—that most corporations during the year, notwithstanding an increase in their operating income, were taxed so heavily that their income was actually less. In a good many cases, on the other hand, the increase in income was enough to pay the taxes and leave them something extra. I think every sensible person is troubled by, or at any rate takes a serious view of, the position of corporations at the present time. Along with the expansive views of the Minister of Finance, there are some indications that not everybody is booming ahead. It therefore seems to me to be a great pity that the minister was not able to do something about this matter, that he had to take out his repentance just in being sorry and not in being sorry enough to quit.

I do not know that there is anything that I care to add at the moment except that I feel—and I wish to stress the fear that I have in my mind—that, being dazzled by large figures of expansion, of large investments much of which is from money which comes from outside the country, the taxing authorities, the Department of Finance and the government, do not give sufficient weight to the burden which is being placed on the back of the individual and which the hon. member for Moose Jaw described so well.

The Chairman: Shall we take up paragraph 5?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word or two with respect to the corporation tax. Perhaps I might put it in the form of a question to the parliamentary assistant. I hope he will not mind if, having asked my question, I comment on it before I sit down and let him comment on it. My question is this. Why is it that the personal income tax is graduated progressively and rather steeply whereas the corporation income tax is really not a graduated tax? I admit that there is a one-stage graduation in that the rates proposed in paragraph 3 now before us are 20 per cent on the first $10,000 of taxable income and 50 per cent on all income in excess of $10,000. In view of the fact that there is only that one stage, I think I am correct in saying that the corporation tax is, to all intents and purposes, a flat tax as opposed to the principle of graduation that is applied in the personal income tax.

One of the reasons that I am interested in this matter is this. Like other hon. members, I do some reading in these matters from time to time in order to try to find out what is behind taxation principles. I find that it is a subject of study on the part of some economists as to whether or not the personal income tax and the corporation tax should follow these divergent patterns or whether they should be integrated. Among economists there is, of course, a difference of opinion on the point. I am impressed, however, by the point that some writers make to the effect that when you have such a wide spread between the rates charged under the personal income tax on the higher brackets and the highest rate charged on the corporation tax, you thereby induce wealthy people to leave in the assets of the corporation what otherwise might be some of their personal gains.

The result is that part of what they have gained is, in effect, subject to a lower rate of tax than it would be if they took it out in personal income. Another result that follows is an increase in economic power on the part of those who are in a position to leave some of their wealth in corporations in that way. I could go on. As a matter of fact, the works that I have looked at are quite extensive. One can read and think about these things for hours on end. However, I have asked my question and I have expressed my opinion. I should be glad to hear from the parliamentary assistant as to why the one tax is graduated and the other is flat.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member has raised an interesting question which is quite often raised by people who look at our two direct tax schedules and wonder why the difference. As he says, we could conduct a long discussion on the matter—and I hope we shall not do so—but I can quite easily summarize it by saying this. In the case of the individual, the individual with a small income is a poor man. The individual with a large income is a rich man. The income is for his own use, and so on it we have this very steeply progressive rate of personal income tax. When we come over to the corporation tax field, however, we are not dealing with persons; we are dealing with a legal person so far as the law is concerned, but so far as life is concerned, we are dealing with assets that are held and owned by a group of individuals.

Mr. Knowles: Sometimes referred to as soulless corporations.

Mr. Sinclair: Sometimes referred to as soulless corporations or soulless individuals. In general the small corporation is owned by the little man. That is why we do have this measure of progression which was introduced two or three years ago into the tax schedule for the first time to give a lower rate of tax on the first $10,000 of profit made by the corporation. The point was that a corporation smaller than that will enjoy the full value of the 20 per cent rate instead of the 50 per cent rate which is paid on profits in excess. To avoid a rich man owning a great number of these little companies and getting all the profits to himself and so actually getting the benefit of a low rate of corporation tax in the end result, we have of course the income tax provision against closely related companies getting this special rate of taxation on every one. Only one of a group of closely related companies can get it.

When we turn to the big companies, however—first of all, the actual size of the profit as such is no indication whatsoever of the wealth of the company. One company may make a million dollars profit and be extraordinarily successful during that year because the capital involved in this operation is small. Another company may make a million dollars profit; for example, we will say that the C.P.R. in its year's operations made a million dollars net profit. It certainly would not have made a high rate of return on the very large investment which is in the C.P.R., instead an extremely low rate of return. That is the first point. The second point is the ownership of the company as far as the incomes of the shareholders are concerned. It may well be that the smaller company with a small profit is owned by three or four individuals alone, so when the profit comes back to them they have large amounts of individual income; whereas the company with the big profit may well be owned widely so the individual shareholders get only small amounts as dividends. The big companies, utilities especially, are very widely owned by great numbers of shareholders, many of whom have very modest means, and so the application of a violently progressive tax on corporations in the same way as we have on individuals would inflict undue burdens on them. However, we do compensate for that by the very point which was just raised by the hon. member for Greenwood, in that when these profits are paid out as dividends, after having paid corporation taxes, and then find themselves in the hands of people as dividends they are taxed again. And after all to get advantage from it people have to spend money. Companies as such do not get any personable pleasure out of spending money on themselves. It is when the dividends are paid out to individuals that the advantage of having money becomes apparent.

On these dividends we have the application of the progressive rate of income tax which we have just covered in the first two paragraphs of the resolution. In closing may I refer to the fact that it has been suggested that the lack of progression in the corporation rate may encourage payment out of profits which should properly be held for the companies' development. That is not actually borne out because—

Mr. Knowles: I think I said it would induce the very opposite—

Mr. Sinclair: The other way round.

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. Sinclair: This example stuck in my mind when I was home the last time, because the annual report of one of the largest British Columbia's timber operations had just been released. They made a profit of $31 million, a very substantial profit. Well, the first thing that they did was to pay $16 million corporation tax, so the people of Canada generally got the major share of these profits. That was to the government here, the federal government, because British Columbia is an agreeing province, and so we collected all the corporation taxes. That left them with $15 million net profit. Of that $15 million profit only $3 million was paid out to the shareholders as dividends, the remaining $12 million was plowed back into expansion of the plant, a most desirable thing. Of the $3 million which was paid out as dividends a large part went to the principal shareholder, a very wealthy man, who pays a very high rate of income tax. His share of these net company profits was then of course subject to the high marginal rates of personal income tax at the bottom of the last resolution. On the other hand that same company has quite wide ownership by actual employees who work in the mills of the company, a share here and a share there. When their share of the $3 million was paid to them, it too was subject to personal income tax, but as they were little people on comparatively small incomes, it would come under the low rates at the beginning of the schedule, because that is the income tax bracket in which the individual of lower income would find himself.

The one other thing we do is to give some relief to this double taxation which results from corporation tax on profits and income tax on dividends. That relief was given by the amendment of two or three years ago. We give a tax credit of 10 per cent of the dividends received from Canadian corporations.

Mr. Adamson: It must not be forgotten that corporations are merely groups of people. We are apt to forget that corporations are after all just people, and only people pay taxes.

The Chairman: Shall we now take up paragraph No. 5?

Mr. Knowles: With reference to paragraph No. 5, Mr. Chairman, we are back to a discussion which the parliamentary assistant initiated during the general debate this afternoon, and which we later agreed to defer until we reached paragraph 5. I shall not re-open the discussion on procedure with respect to private members' motions, into which we were getting involved when you, sir, stopped us this afternoon.

I shall deal rather with the disappointment that many people in this country felt over the failure of the government to remove the four per cent floor under medical expenses, and I shall also try to deal with the substance of our plea in the hope that we can yet persuade the government that action should be taken at this session.

I indicated yesterday that this was one point where I wished we could have the minister with us, and that is in no sense a reflection on the parliamentary assistant. He demonstrated yesterday and today, whether we agree with him or not, that he is well acquainted with the subjects involved in the handling of these resolutions, and he also knows all the arguments on the government's side. The difficulty is that even if I might, to my satisfaction, and even to his, persuade him that a change should be made he, not being the responsible minister, has no alternative but to stand pat. However, since the minister is not here we shall have to make our arguments with the parliamentary assistant and hope that we can wear him down so that he will in turn try to wear down the minister.

The main argument that on other occasions the minister and the parliamentary assistant have put forward for retaining the four per cent floor is the contention that that represents the national average spent on medical bills. I think he will agree with me—

Mr. Sinclair: Medical, dental, nursing, hospital and drugs.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, all these items that come under that general definition. I think he will agree with me that that is stating his side of the case fairly. He argues that everyone spends on the average that much, and if you give an allowance for that amount you will have to make it up by raising the rate or by collecting it in some other way. As I see it, the fallacy in that argument is that there is no such thing as an average man. The average person is a statistical phenomenon that does not really exist per se. In other words, averages are deceiving. Four per cent may be the average that is spent on these various medical items, but every individual pays a different amount and a different percentage of his income. Many people in the course of the year are fortunate enough to have no medical expenses. Others may spend one or two per cent. Some will be somewhere around the average of four per cent. Then, there will be others who are away above the average.

As I see it, the aim of taxation relief in respect of medical expenses should be to assist, in so far as taxation relief can, in ironing out some of that spread. I firmly believe that there are better ways to do it. The parliamentary assistant probably agrees with me—but I am not asking for his comment just now—that a program of health insurance would be more desirable. However, at the moment we are dealing with this matter at the income tax level.

My contention, which I believe is well taken, is that to use an argument in respect of averages is to use an argument that is fallacious. What you have to do is to deal with an actual fact, that people's medical costs vary from nothing up to quite huge sums of money. So it follows that if you do grant medical expenses right from the first dollar up to whatever ceiling the government chooses to impose, as deductible for medical expenses, you do not thereby give a tax saving that is the same to everybody, whereupon you must collect that same amount from everybody, so that in the end your position is not changed. That is not what happens. Rather you give tax relief to those whose expenses have been in the higher reaches rather than to those who have been in the lower reaches, or who have had no medical expenses at all. And any loss to the treasury as a result of that relief which you have given in proportion to the medical expenses people have incurred is then made up on an across-the-board basis.

That is where I think the government needs to rethink this whole position through once again. I know that it was on the basis of unusual medical expenses that this deduction was first allowed when it was brought in by Mr. Ilsley in 1943. And when he changed the floor from five per cent to four per cent in 1944 he still based the whole idea upon the concept of unusual medical expenses, with reference to what he regarded as expenses above the national average.

I submit it is just possible that the finance department has been thinking in terms of that average concept for so many years that it has not stood off and taken a look at the problem in the different terms I am trying to portray now. I feel the point I am making is basic. I feel it meets the fundamental argument the minister and the parliamentary assistant have put forward, and I urge most strongly that consideration be given to changing the income tax bill based upon this resolution, even at this very session. I submit, as I have said on two or three occasions previously, that in asking that that be done I have a very good precedent. The precedent relates to this very question of the deductibility of medical expenses.

The parliamentary assistant knows this story very well now, namely that in 1944, at this very stage of debate, in committee of ways and means on the budget resolutions, we pleaded with Mr. Ilsley to drop the floor, which was then at five per cent, down to two or three per cent. It was a new idea, that the floor should be dropped. That idea originated on the floor of the house, mainly from the opposition side, but also with support from the government side as well.

Despite the fact that no such proposal had been forecast in the budget speech or in the budget resolutions, as a result of the discussion which took place at this stage of the debate Mr. Ilsley, when he brought in his Income War Tax Act amending bill, reduced the floor from five per cent to four per cent. It was not all that hon. members had asked, but at least it was something that had not been forecast in the original budget speech.

In this instance we will forget what happened on March 26, because every time we talk about it we get into an argument. Most of us recall the vote that took place that day. Then, since that time there has been another vote—the vote on our subamendment. It went the other way. That vote expressed confidence in the government, despite the fact that it had not removed the four per cent floor.

A year ago the house voted against the deductibility of trade union dues, and then the government turned around and brought it in. Probably we can have that precedent followed too. We have had a vote against this proposal a short time ago, so now the government could bring it in. I submit the government's confidence has been endorsed by the majority of the house; but, meantime, this whole question has been threshed out considerably, and a good deal of feeling has been expressed with respect to it. Indeed, some members who support the government, speaking in the budget debate did express the hope, despite their position on the subamendment before the house, that the government would yet give consideration to the removal of the four per cent floor.

I dare to hope that there will be other members now who will join in this plea, and that the government will give consideration to it. I am refraining deliberately from saying too much about how we felt concerning the failure of the minister to meet our expectations in that regard. Rather, I am putting it to the government now on a straight basis of the justice of our plea.

Another of the arguments the parliamentary assistant used against this change—although perhaps he will interject by saying that it was just a point he was making—was its cost. He pointed out that it would cost, in his view, $48 million; but he did not say that that was the sole reason for objecting to it. That estimated cost of $48 million was the subject of correspondence to which the parliamentary assistant referred this afternoon, and which I was beginning to deal with when we agreed to defer the discussion until we reached this item.

As both of us agreed, we have given copies of our letters to the others involved in this correspondence, so all of us have the whole story. The parliamentary assistant, in reply to the gentleman over in Hull who started this correspondence, emphasized his point that to remove the four per cent floor was to remove from the taxation base four per cent of the taxable income. The gentleman who started this correspondence sought to make the point that there would not be a loss of four per cent of the total take of income tax, but only a loss of a percentage on a percentage.

I will agree that the parliamentary assistant made a good point when he made it clear that the four per cent has to be considered in terms of the amount of taxable income that it removes from the taxation base.

Mr. Sinclair: And also where it is removed from.

Mr. Knowles: Yes; the parliamentary assistant dealt with that quite fully in the letter he wrote on April 30 to the gentleman on the other side of the river. In that letter, a copy of which I have because the parliamentary assistant was good enough to send it to me, he gave four examples of taxpayers in different income brackets. The point he sought to make by giving these different examples was that the loss to the treasury in every case would be determined by the rate applicable to the top bracket in which the taxpayer is located when he claims this extra 4 per cent. Having made a case that is strong to his satisfaction at any rate, and having pointed out that in some cases the reduction in tax payable is much higher than 4 per cent, he then goes on to point out that the rate of reduction declines as the income increases but that it will never decline below 4 per cent because the amount is based on net income, not taxable income. I merely want to say, so that we can have this all on the record, that in my last reply to the gentleman across the river I said in part:

There may be something to his point—

I was referring to the parliamentary assistant.

—that the 4 per cent relates to net income rather than taxable income; but by drawing attention to this aspect of the matter Mr. Sinclair has only emphasized the fact that the 4 per cent floor is very unfair. Indeed, the point that one has to reach before he can deduct medical expenses is not just 4 per cent of his taxable income, but 4 per cent of what in most cases amounts to his total income. In other words, it is extremely difficult for the average person to get any advantage out of this supposed right.

As I see it, the major fallacy in Mr. Sinclair's argument is one that I drew attention to—off the cuff, as it were—as recorded in column 1 on page 1541 of Hansard for April 23. Even if Mr. Sinclair can assert that 4 per cent of total income is the average amount spent on medical expenses, surely he should know how deceiving averages can be. A great many people, even if the 4 per cent floor were removed, would still not claim a reduction in their taxable income by 4 per cent, so that I am satisfied that the alleged loss of revenue to the treasury would be considerably less than the $48 million indicated by Mr. Sinclair.

The point I wish to make is that the parliamentary assistant went to great trouble to show that the rate of reduction in the individual's income tax payment would vary from a high point down but that it would never get below 4 per cent. May I remind him that the amount of income tax deductibility that persons would claim starts from zero and never gets over 4 per cent. That is the reason I suggest that the parliamentary assistant is wrong in assuming that to wipe out the 4 per cent floor would automatically take 4 per cent of the taxable income out of the taxation base and cost the treasury 4 per cent of what it otherwise would receive from the personal income tax.

Four per cent is the most of one's taxable income that could ever come into that calculation. In most cases it would be less than that; in some cases it would be none at all. I am not going to pursue that further. I tried to do it, as I say, a bit off the cuff on April 23 when the point was first raised in the house, but I suggest that to remove the 4 per cent floor really would not cost the $48 million that the parliamentary assistant suggested. But even if it did I come back to my previous argument that in terms of justice and fairness—no matter what it would cost—a civilized community should make an effort to iron out if we can the incidence of medical costs. On that basis it is only fair to grant to people their medical expenses as deductible from income tax right from the first dollar.

I emphasize again the fact that the kind of argument the parliamentary assistant has used about the national average is not applied to charitable donations. The argument might just as well be made there. It might be said that average donations of Canadians to charities of one sort and another are a certain percentage, and therefore we will not exempt charitable donations for income tax purposes until they get above that particular percentage. That argument is not applied there. Why apply it to medical expenses? So much for that phase of the matter. I press it as strongly as I can, and I hope that even yet the change will be made at this session of parliament for I am sure that the people of Canada feel now more than ever the justice of our claim that the floor should be wiped out.

The resolution before us proposes two or three changes concerning which I should like to get clarification. It proposes that the ceiling shall be raised. At the present time it is $750 for a single person and $1,000 for a married person. These figures are to be raised to $1,500 and $2,000. In addition, the present law provides for $250 for each dependent with a maximum of $1,000. In other words, you could not charge for more than four dependents. The proposal seems to be to raise that to $500. However I gather from what is said in the resolution before us that the over-all ceiling of $2,000 which obtains in the act at the present time will still hold. I am not commenting on it. I am merely asking for clarification.

I am glad, however, to see the slight increase in the ceiling that is being effected by the resolution. Indeed, when we were debating this whole matter on March 26 the parliamentary assistant will remember that we got it straight between us that neither of us wants to see the ceiling abolished. The reasons for that were put on the record by the parliamentary assistant. However there is room for raising it, and I am glad to see that it has been done to this extent. I must point out, however, that this is more help to people who have money that they can spend on medical expenses than it is to the little fellow who just has the bills but does not have enough to get into the appropriate bracket.

I have one other question. In the latter part of the resolution before us it is suggested that another change be made, namely, that it will no longer be necessary for medical expenses to be both incurred and paid within the twelve month period. That is the way the law now reads. Expenses to be deductible have to be both incurred and paid during the twelve month period within the taxation year.

Mr. Sinclair: That is the old law.

Mr. Knowles: Yes. Under the new proposal it will not matter when the expenses were incurred. I should like to know whether that is of any assistance to a person who has a big bill that he cannot pay all in one year. If he gets a big bill in 1952, shall we say, can he pay part of it in 1952, then part of it in 1953, and claim the whole of it in 1953?

Mr. Sinclair: No.

Mr. Knowles: Or must the actual paying be done within a twelve month period? I see the parliamentary assistant nodding his head. If that is the case it is some help, but not a great deal. To take the problem I presented on March 26 when this matter was before us, the plight of the person who has a heavy medical bill he cannot pay off within one twelve month period is serious. If he has to pay it in two periods, in neither of those periods does he reach 4 per cent of his income, so though he has had heavy medical expenses he gains no benefit. The same is true of the allowance for cortisone, insulin and these other new drugs. That is a fine gesture supposed to help a great many people who have heavy medical bills; but it is not sufficient to get them over that 4 per cent floor, so they are denied the alleged benefit of this proposal.

This may be one of the little things; the number of dollars involved is not great, but there is a principle here which is pretty important. I hope even yet the government will accede to the wish of parliament and the wish of the people of Canada as a whole and remove this 4 per cent floor.

Mr. Fair: There is another matter in connection with medical expenses which I have not heard discussed here so far. Take the case of a person in a district without a local hospital, or a person in a local hospital district who has something the matter with him that cannot be successfully treated at that hospital. He goes to Edmonton or Saskatoon; but because the hospitals there are not able to take care of all those who need attention, the patient has to pay hotel expenses in addition to his train fare while waiting to get into the hospital. I have had some letters in reference to this, and I wonder if the department would not also consider that as a medical expense.

Mr. Adamson: If I might ask the parliamentary assistant one question, I think it would be interesting to know what percentage of the taxpayers made claims for medical expenses in the last taxation year. I do not think that figure has been given.

Mr. Sinclair: It would be a very difficult figure to give; but on page 112 of the taxation statistics of Canada is a breakdown of deductions and the amount claimed in each and every group, with the total amounts claimed. The total amount of income claimed was $31 million. That is according to the most recent statistics to be put out.

While I am on my feet I might answer the other questions which have been raised. I do not intend to again go over the ground which was gone over first of all when we had the debate on the hon. member's resolution, when the minister and I discussed the matter. Actually we first had a discussion of medical expenses in the budget debate. After the debate in the house the matter was again reviewed in the light of the observations then made. Then in his budget speech the minister gave the decision he had reached. After that, of course, we had the vote on the want of confidence motion moved by the C.C.F. party. Now we have the resolution which, as the hon. member said, I am piloting. Finally, when the bill is before the house, the minister himself will pilot it through.

As far as the actual calculation goes, I tried to make it clear in the speeches I made that the actual amount of revenue concerned was a minor point, though as far as principles are concerned the business of giving any broad exemption which would apply to all groups of taxpayers in the end had the result that this lost revenue had to be recouped in some other way by a tax which had its incidence on the same broad group of taxpayers. The hon. member mentioned the very interesting correspondence we had with this gentleman in Hull who took an interest in this matter. I was out in making the rather hasty estimate I gave in the house. I corrected my first error when the hon. member for Hamilton West was speaking. That was the fact that I had not allowed in that the part already claimed, the part just referred to by the hon. member for York West, the part over the average which had been claimed, the $30 million in some $6 billion of income. However, on receiving this letter I settled down to break it down. As hon. members know, I have no legal training, but I did have pretty extensive training in mathematics. I have done a great deal of work, for example, on this very interesting mathematical problem of averages and the weighting which should be given to averages. The thing here, of course, which makes this problem out of proportion as far as ordinary averaging is concerned is that the deduction is not taken off at the average rate of tax paid, but off the very top limit. In working out the four examples I gave, I showed that the actual incidence of this tax is very much higher than 4 per cent, so the loss of revenue being compensated for, the excess already claimed would be that.

The officials of the department thereupon became interested in the problem and did the job which I suggested to the correspondent and to the hon. member, the real job of breaking down every tax category, examining the rate of taxation on that, and then aggregating the sum. Again this is based on the premise that 4 per cent is the national average. The original figures supplied by national health and welfare indicate that this is less than the national average, which improves the argument. The hon. member says, of course, that there will be some individuals who do not claim 4 per cent, who may claim only 2 per cent. If 4 per cent is the national average, that means there are other individuals who are claiming 6 per cent, and in any tax category that will average out.

Mr. Knowles: But they are now getting the portion above 4 per cent.

Mr. Sinclair: That is the compensation to which I referred. This is a very lengthy table; I do not propose to put it on Hansard, but it is certainly an accurate substantiation of the figures I supplied.

Mr. Knowles: Could I see it?

Mr. Sinclair: I shall be glad to send it to the hon. member. This also does not compensate for the excess percentage claimed, that $30 million not of tax but of income.

The next point was the meaning of the resolution as regards the maximum deduction which can be claimed by a husband, wife and family. That was $2,000. It is now $4,000, $2,000 for the couple and then the four dependents at $500 each. The hon. member rightly pointed out that an improvement has been made by allowing the exemption to be claimed not just as it was in the old act, in the twelve months which need not be a year but which might spell two taxation years, but in the twelve months in which the sickness occurred and the bills were paid. The special case which this legislation covers, of course, is the case of unusually heavy medical expenses. It may well be that the individual cannot pay off the heavy bill he has incurred in the one year. Under the old legislation he could not claim in the next year; under this he can. It is an advantage, too, in the case of a man who has an illness to such a degree that his expenses are more than even the present deduction, because if he then spreads it over two years he comes within the ceiling in those two years.

The last point, in regard to transportation, was raised last year and given consideration again this year. Again this is a matter which would be extremely hard to administer, because transportation would range all the way from the taxicab or even the streetcar by which some people go to hospital to the ambulance, the train and the plane by which others go. Last year we had quite a discussion on that point with the hon. member for Macleod, I think it was. The government gave consideration to including transportation as a medical expense, and decided that it could not be done at this time.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to add just one word to what I said this afternoon on this subject. I was bold enough to suggest that the people of this country do believe that suggestions made by their representatives in parliament are perhaps entitled to a little more weight than just any other representations. The parliamentary assistant rather just swept me out with the dust with the remark, as affecting as it was unexpected, that he did not wish to have his views considered more than those of any other person in Canada, if I understood him correctly.

Mr. Sinclair: On tax matters affecting the individual citizen.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That struck me as very unconvincing. I would, as a matter of fact, rate him higher than that.

I am not going to labour this point. I am just going to say that it is high-minded and quite unselfish for us to raise the point at all. Much the best thing for us to do is to leave it where it is, because I think the public is irritated by what was done. It is only because of our very high sense of duty that we urge the government to do something about it, in their own interest. I think that in this case the public feels that the government has disregarded parliament as if it were nothing.

The Chairman: Paragraph 6?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to say a word on this paragraph. I welcome this measure, and I should like to ask a question with regard to municipal taxation. Can the parliamentary assistant tell us whether there is any principle, and also what the practice is, with regard to the payment of municipal taxation by crown corporations?

Mr. Sinclair: That was covered in the statement made by the minister some years ago when the federal government, as such, first began to pay grants in lieu of municipal taxes to municipalities other than Ottawa. For many years, because of special circumstances, Ottawa was paid a grant. Again it is a matter of a national average. It was estimated that across Canada the average federal holding of property in the various municipalities was 4 per cent. Those municipalities which had an unusual concentration of federal property, which is of course exempt from tax, were given relief through the payment of grants based on three-quarters of the tax above that national average. However, that just covered the departments of government and the agency corporations. These corporations, the proprietary corporations, which are—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Were they excluded?

Mr. Sinclair: They are definitely excluded from the original Abbott formula. At that time he said that since those were, to all intents and purposes, commercial businesses it would be up to them to make their own arrangements with the various municipalities. So far as I know, that has been done. I can get a report as to the extent to which this has been carried out. I know that most of them have now completed such arrangements, and I know that such arrangements go a little beyond the list here of proprietary corporations.

There are some agencies of the federal government—I think of the national harbours board for example—which are not proprietary corporations but which have also made separate arrangements with the municipalities for payment of grants in lieu of taxes for services they get from the municipality.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then, would it be correct—

The Chairman: Order. I doubt very much that it is in order to discuss the payment of municipal taxes by crown corporations on this resolution. The hon. member asked a question, and I allowed the parliamentary assistant to reply but I do not think we should get into a prolonged debate.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Could I ask one more question?

Mr. Sinclair: I think this is interesting because the principle is really the same in payment by federal corporations of both municipal taxes and federal taxes, and since we are breaking new ground, ground which most of us who are not socialists will agree is right ground, perhaps we might continue.

The Chairman: Perhaps I might point out that I am not concerned in what might be of particular interest. I am interested in having the discussion relevant to the paragraph which is under study. The hon. member for Greenwood has just asked me if he might be permitted to ask another question. That is quite convenient to me, provided other hon. members will not follow the example and begin a long debate on matters having to do with the payment of municipal taxes by crown corporations.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I suggest that, after all, the situation of the companies in respect of municipal taxes will affect their capacity to pay federal taxes. I just want to ask this question. Do the crown companies deal with the municipalities just as any other organization does? They are not in any privileged position?

Mr. Sinclair: That is correct.

Mr. Adamson: I gather that these are corporations such as Eldorado, Polymer—

Mr. Sinclair: I am sorry, I should have given the list.

Mr. Adamson: I think it would be of interest to us if we could have a list, and if the profits are available I think that might be of interest.

Mr. Sinclair: Of course, this is only going to be applicable for the first time to the profits which will be made in this year. The corporations are those set out in schedule D to the Financial Administration Act which we passed last year, the new financial control act of this federal parliament. Those in schedule D are the following: Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; Canadian Farm Loan Board; Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited; Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation; Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation; Eldorado Mining and Refining Company (1944) Limited; Export Credits Insurance Corporation; national railways, as defined in the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1933; Northern Transportation Company (1947) Limited; Northwest Territories Power Commission; Polymer Corporation Limited and Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Members who will recall the debate of last fall will realize that this includes all the proprietary corporations, with perhaps one exception, the Bank of Canada. It is such an unusual position, and in any case its profits in the end are turned over to the crown, that it was not included in the Financial Administration Act.

Mr. Adamson: I was going to ask about the Bank of Canada and the other bank, the Industrial Development Bank.

Mr. Sinclair: It is a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Adamson: Its profits, if any, are paid to the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Sinclair: The Minister of Finance has the power to transfer that portion of their profits which he decides should be part of national revenue from their account to the consolidated revenue as he has, mind you, for all these other proprietary corporations under the Financial Administration Act. The Bank of Canada is in a unique position in that it is not competing with any privately owned banking institution in Canada. It is not in competition with the chartered banks, whereas these other proprietary corporations, for the most part, are in active competition and are compared with their private competitors so far as profit and loss statements are concerned.

Mr. Adamson: Just one more question—I hope I do not trespass in asking it: Will they be also subject to provincial taxes?

Mr. Sinclair: No, they will not be subject to provincial taxes, nor will the provincial crown corporations, of which there are a fair number—I think for example of Hydro—be subject to this taxation. We would hope that perhaps, if this pattern worked out satisfactorily, the provinces might copy it. The effect on their revenues will be exactly the same, because the profits of those provincial crown corporations go in the end to the provincial treasury. Such a program provincially will do the same thing, and put these provincial crown corporations in a position where a better or more accurate comparison can be made of the relative efficiency of publicly-owned corporations and privately-owned corporations competing in the same fields.

The Chairman: It appears to me as though paragraphs 7 and 8 and paragraph 9 could well be discussed together. Perhaps they might be taken together.

Mr. Herridge: Since we are taking paragraphs 7 and 8 together, I should like to make a few remarks in this connection and they apply, to some extent, to paragraph 9. Paragraph 7 reads as follows:

> That the special deduction from income to a taxpayer whose principal business is the production, refining or marketing of petroleum or petroleum products or the exploring or drilling for oil or natural gas or mining or exploring for minerals, be allowed for expenses incurred in the 1955 operations on the same basis as for expenses incurred in the operations in the years 1951 to 1954.

I can see the purpose of that resolution, and Nos. 8 and 9 whose purposes are very similar. I presume it is to promote the exploration for gas and oil and the prospecting for minerals and things of that sort. I think that is a worth-while thing to promote in this country at this time. But, Mr. Chairman, you will remember that during the budget debates of 1950 and 1951 certain representations were made I think on sections similar to this one—they may not have been numbered the same, but they had the same purpose—by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and myself urging that similar consideration should be given to those who are practising conservation in the forest industry.

There is a tremendous need for the conservation of our forest resources in this country at this time. That procedure is being preached in every provincial legislature and it has been preached in this parliament. This worth-while purpose is being supported across Canada by many important and recognized organizations. I think it is generally accepted that anything we can do to promote the conservation of our natural resources is something that should be done, and done now for the future.

I happen to know that many large lumber companies in recent years are developing policies along these lines; they are spending large sums of money to conserve our timber and to provide timber for future generations by tree planting in some cases, by the building of fire guards, by the building of trails and by the building of roads. That type of policy is being adopted by more and more companies and also by quite a number of smaller owners. I have a knowledge of quite a number of smaller owners of forest resources in British Columbia who are doing this, and farmers at this time are being urged to do the same.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, I do not like to interrupt the hon. member but there is no conceivable connection between the cost of conservation and the cost of reforestation, and these concessions which are given to mining and oil, because mines and oil wells, unlike forests, are wasting assets. The argument which the hon. gentleman is making is one as to whether the cost of reforestation should be regarded as an operating cost or a capital cost; but it certainly has nothing to do with these three resolutions. It has been raised on other occasions. It is a matter which is now before the Minister of Finance for study. But as to the individual items here, it has no conceivable connection at all.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask just two or three questions. I had practically finished. I think there is some relation, because these items provide for the development of natural resources and what I am suggesting provides for the development of natural resources and the conservation of them. I want to ask the parliamentary assistant whether, as a result of representations made by members of this house and, I believe, by corporations and some individuals outside the house, consideration has been given to making provision for income deductions on account of expenditures in connection with forest conservation policies by companies or by individuals. If so, why has not favourable consideration been given to that matter at present?

Just before I conclude, Mr. Chairman, may I say this. I may be off the beam a bit. It may be possible, under the present law, for companies to charge these expenditures legitimately against the expenses of their operations. If that is so, I should like to know it. I should like the parliamentary assistant to advise me whether it is possible to charge against operating expenses moneys expended for the conservation of forest resources in any operation by a company, a farmer or any individual owning timber.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: The question is whether this discussion is relevant to these three resolutions.

Mr. Sinclair: I do not want to be out of order.

The Chairman: It seems to me that these questions might more properly be asked of the minister when he is dealing with his estimates. These three items have to do with special privileges to the mining industry, and the metalliferous or industrial mineral mine industry. You cannot expect the parliamentary assistant, who is prepared to reply to pertinent questions on these resolutions, to cover the whole field of whatever other questions hon. members may want to have a reply to. I think that on the estimates the hon. member might put to the minister any question that is unanswered now. When the minister comes before the house with his estimates, the hon. member might remind him that he wants an explanation with regard to this question that he has put on Hansard today. I think that he might wait until that time for a reply.

Mr. Herridge: I gladly accept your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and will accept your advice.

Mr. Sinclair: Thank you.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask a question. I am sure that item 7 has reference both to oil and to mining. I had hoped, and I would hope, that these provisions might become a permanent statute rather than be a matter for reintroduction every year under the budget resolutions. I feel that they are valuable and desirable; in fact, they are absolutely necessary. Particularly in view of the rather precarious state that certain parts of the mining industry now find themselves in, I feel that consideration should be given to making them a statute.

I have also seen statistics to the effect that it has been our experience that only one well out of seven drilled is a producer of either gas or oil. I think that information shows to the committee more than anything else the absolute necessity for having a provision like this with regard to the extremely hazardous business of drilling and prospecting for petroleum and natural gas.

I wonder whether the parliamentary assistant has any figures with regard to the expenses in connection with the drilling and exploration for natural gas and oil or as to the claims made under those regulations? If he has, I wonder if he will give them, because I think it is of enormous importance to the country to do everything possible to assist the industry. We like to talk about our greatly expanded petroleum industry; but when it comes down to the facts, when you really see how hazardous the whole business is and how many times you have a failure, you appreciate the situation. A company that I unfortunately have been interested in has, I think, drilled 47 dry wells. I think that may be a record. Perhaps that is just my luck. But I believe that this provision is absolutely vital and I should like to see it made a statute. I wonder whether the parliamentary assistant has any statement to make on its operation.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, these three items are very closely connected, of course. They are nothing new. They are extensions for another year of these special deductions. Both mining and oil are unusual industries in that mines and wells are operating on wasting assets. If any company is going to sit tight on its present ore body or on its present well, in the end it is going to be out of business. They therefore have to go out, explore and try to find new ore bodies or new oil fields. They are unlike the farmer or the forester who can, by conservation of his present operation, have his new crop develop on the same holding. That is why this special deduction has been given, namely to allow these companies in this special position—and this is item 7—to charge against their operating costs the cost of exploring away from the mine or well to find other ore bodies or oil pools. It is a very valuable concession to these industries as the hon. member for York West has pointed out. The industry would like to have it permanently in the statute. Up till now it has been on a yearly basis, but to give some measure of security it is projected ahead three years. In the last budget we told the industry that we would permit this concession at least as far as 1954, which gives them confidence in planning an exploration program for the next three years. This year we have extended that period for another year, until 1955. This may not be quite as satisfactory to the mining and oil companies as permanency, but it is much better than the old way to just leave them another year ahead. That is the situation in that case.

Now with respect to paragraph No. 8, which has to do with deep test wells, which are wells drilled to an unusual depth: In that case an even greater special concession is given, in that oil companies are allowed to deduct from their revenues the cost of this exploration, and in addition from their tax payable 30 per cent of the cost of drilling these very deep wells. The record has not been quite as dismal as the record of the hon. member's company, but naturally the hazard on these deep test wells is greater, the cost is very much higher; and so this encouragement was given. It is a very much more valuable encouragement than the previous one, and that is why we still have it on a year to year basis, on the recommendation of the head of the geological survey.

The last one is another special exemption given to mining companies. It illustrates the point we both made a little earlier, that mining corporations are treated quite differently because of the speculative hazard, and the fact that they are working on wasting assets. They are given exemption from income tax on the first three years of production. Here again the industry would like it to be permanent. Until recently it was on an annual basis. In the budget of a year ago we projected it forward three years. The last budget provided that they would have this concession up until 1954 so could plan accordingly. A year has passed, so we are now advancing it to 1955. The companies coming into production this year will now know that the first three years of their production are going to be exempt as far as income tax is concerned.

These are three concessions to these very special industries which are very highly valued by the industry.

Mr. Adamson: I realize they are valued, and I entirely approve of them. The only point I wish to make is the one about making them statutory. My other point is that today the expenses involved in bringing a mine to production, any type of mine, run into, instead of thousands of dollars or hundreds of thousands of dollars, as in the old days, millions. And instead of being a matter of possibly a year or so before profitable production might reasonably be expected, the average is in the nature of five years, even though a mill begins to operate very frequently on exploration ore, or exploration rock, comparatively early in the life of the mine. I am not going to press this point at the present time, Mr. Chairman, but I feel that under the somewhat changed circumstances there is a good reason, and a good case, which can be made for even an extension over the three years, particularly with regard to base metal mines where the mill may start to operate in order not to have a large dump or a large rock pile, and also in order to begin possibly to pay exploration costs at an early date. Frequently that test or exploration mill has to shut down and the ore body may not be proved. But because once the mill starts operating the three-year period begins I feel that under the new technique there is reason why this three-year period might be extended.

However, I do not wish to press this at the moment; I would merely bring it to the attention of the minister as an example of the sort of thing that is happening today in mining.

The Chairman: Is there any discussion on paragraph 10? Shall I report the resolution?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TREATY OF PEACE (JAPAN) ACT

PROVISIONS FOR CARRYING TREATY INTO EFFECT

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide that the governor in council may do such things as to him appear to be necessary for carrying into effect the treaty of peace between Canada and Japan; and for that purpose the governor in council may make appointments, establish offices and make orders or regulations; and to provide further that any expense incurred in carrying out the treaty shall be defrayed out of moneys voted by parliament.

Mr. Coldwell: Is the minister going to give us some explanation of what seems to be a rather comprehensive resolution?

Mr. Pearson: Possibly I might make a short statement on this resolution at this time. The house will recall that a resolution approving the ratification of the Japanese peace treaty by Canada was adopted by both houses of parliament before the Easter recess, and the Canadian instrument of ratification of the treaty was deposited in Washington on April 17.

[The Chairman.]

As hon. members are no doubt aware, the treaty came into force for those countries which had ratified it on the deposit of the United States instrument of ratification of April 28, in accordance with the provisions of article 23 of the treaty. So the treaty is now in effect. The ratification of a treaty by Canada makes it legally binding upon this country, under international law; but such ratification does not alter the domestic law of Canada and does not, of course, impose obligations on Canadian citizens.

In the United States when a treaty is ratified it becomes part of the law of the land, and automatically thereby imposes obligations on United States citizens. But under our system, though governments may bind themselves, it requires legislation to impose obligations upon our nationals.

The resolution before the house is the first stage in the introduction of a bill which will be necessary to enable Canada to implement the provisions of this treaty. Those provisions which will require implementation by legislation in this country are rather narrow, and not of political but rather of legal importance. Article 14 of the treaty, for instance, makes provision for the liquidation and disposition of Japanese property in accordance with the laws of the allied powers concerned. This article enables the Canadian government, for instance, to apply the Japanese property vested in the custodian for the benefit of Canadians having claims against Japan or Japanese nationals, and will prevent Japanese nationals from suing in Canadian courts to recover property vested in the custodian. For both of these purposes under the treaty legislation would be required in Canada. It would also appear necessary for there to be legislation to enable Canada to carry out the provisions of the protocol to the treaty which regulates the question of contracts, periods of prescription and negotiable instruments, and questions of contracts of insurance.

It is for carrying out legal provisions of that type that we require a resolution, and legislation of the type envisaged in the resolution.

The bill which will be based upon the resolution, and which is envisaged in the resolution, will be drafted along the same lines as the Treaties of Peace (Italy, Roumania, Hungary and Finland), Act, which was assented to on June 30 1948, and which some hon. members will recall. That act was substantially the same as a group of statutes passed by the Canadian parliament following the first world war, with reference to the treaties of peace with Germany, Austria, Bulgaria, Hungary and Turkey.

Under the 1948 act to implement the Italian, Roumanian, Hungarian and Finnish treaties, two orders in council only have been required. One provided that certain provisions of these treaties should have the force of law in Canada. The other in 1951 was known as the war claims (Italy) settlement regulations. It is not anticipated, therefore, that any extensive action under this resolution—or the act, if it becomes law—will be required.

Neither of the orders in council passed under previous legislation in connection with other peace treaties contained any provision for penalties, and it is not likely that any orders in council passed under any legislation to implement the treaty with Japan will require a provision for penalties in addition to those contained in the trading with the enemy regulations which were continued in effect under the Trading With The Enemy (Transitional Powers) Act, 1947.

Nevertheless it has been considered desirable, as it was considered desirable in similar bills previously, to avoid any uncertainty in the matter and to provide in any bill for the prescribing of fines and other penalties by the governor in council. Such a bill based upon this resolution will be legislation to make effective upon the nationals of Canada obligations contracted by the government of Canada with the approval of the parliament of Canada. And I believe it is usual in such cases to make provisions for a penalty, if there is a violation.

I do not think there is anything more I can usefully say at this time. If the resolution is concurred in, a bill will be introduced. And when that bill is introduced, at the appropriate time it will be moved that it should be referred to the standing committee on external affairs, where it can be given very detailed consideration by members of the committee. That might also provide an occasion for discussion on Japanese matters generally. Then, if members so desired, the bill could be referred back for final discussion here.

Mr. Green: It is almost eleven o'clock. I am not just clear as to what arrangement was made concerning this matter. Would he have objection to adjourning the debate?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If I might interrupt at this stage; I discussed the matter with the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) last night, and he had no objection. Otherwise I would not have put it on. He knows this bill is going before the committee on external affairs, and is anxious to see it go there. That is why I brought it on tonight. He even went further than that. He told me to tell your leader that he agreed that it should go to this committee. That is where they discuss these important matters, I understand—and I would like to please the hon. member for Peel.

Mr. Green: The Minister of Public Works always makes a very persuasive argument. I understand the intention is not to move that the bill go tonight to the committee?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No; probably Monday.

Mr. Coldwell: That is all right, if the bill is going to the committee on external affairs. That was the understanding. I think it might be well to let the resolution go through, bring the bill down and then send it to the external affairs committee, where we can go into it clause by clause. I do not know what arrangement was made with representatives of the official opposition but, so far as I am concerned, if it is agreeable to the official opposition, I think that is probably the procedure that would be best.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Adamson: In the minister's remarks tonight he said that immediately the United States ratifies a treaty it becomes law, the law of the land, whereas in Canada, to become law, a treaty must pass through parliament, under normal circumstances. Do I understand from that that when the secretary of state, or whoever signed for the United States, signed the Japanese treaty at San Francisco, it became the law of the land? Does it not have to go through the senate and the congress?

Mr. Pearson: The signature of a treaty by the United States does not of course automatically make it the law of that land. The signature has to be followed by ratification, after approval by the senate foreign relations committee and, by two-thirds of the senate itself, before it comes into effect in the United States. But once ratification has taken effect in the United States it becomes a part of the law of the United States and automatically imposes the obligations of its provisions upon United States citizens. In that respect the legal and constitutional situation in the United States is different from that in Canada.

Mr. Coldwell: There are certain clauses of this treaty that are of great interest to the fishermen of British Columbia. Is that matter going to be discussed by the fisheries committee before the external affairs committee deals with it? What is the situation? I believe the fisheries committee expects to go into the matter of the clauses dealing with fisheries. I heard that, and I wondered what the procedure was with two committees sitting on the same treaty, as it were.

Mr. Pearson: It is the intention to submit to the fisheries committee the fisheries agreement.

Mr. Pearkes: It has been done already. The committee is considering it now.

Mr. Pearson: It is before the committee now. I am not sure whether it has completed its consideration of the agreement.

Mr. Pearkes: No, it has not. It is waiting for certain evidence.

Mr. Pearson: There are no particular fisheries questions that I can think of that would be involved in this particular measure to implement the provisions of the peace treaty generally.

Mr. Coldwell: Except there is a clause relating to the Japanese promise that they will consider a treaty. Is that not right?

Mr. Pearson: That is right, but that does not involve any legislative action that would be required by the parliament of Canada to carry it into effect. That was an undertaking between the governments concerned, and that undertaking has been discharged by the Japanese government in the signing of the fisheries agreement which is now before the fisheries committee.

Mr. Coldwell: So that really will not enter into the discussion in the external affairs committee.

Mr. Pearson: No, it should not.

Mr. Pearkes: Article No. 9 of the treaty is the most-favoured-nation clause. I believe last July the United Kingdom parliament said that they were got going to extend the most-favoured-nation clause to Japan. Is Canada according to Japan most-favoured-nation advantages?

Mr. Pearson: Although that is not a matter coming within the scope of this resolution, nevertheless I think I am right in saying that we have not extended any rights under that clause to Japan as at this time.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Pearson thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 210, to provide for carrying into effect the treaty of peace between Canada and Japan.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On Monday we will move to go into committee of supply and call four departments, defence production, citizenship and immigration, fisheries and justice. Then we will take up the following resolutions and bills: The resolution in the name of the Minister of National Defence to amend the National Defence Act; the resolution in the name of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys concerning the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. If the hon. member for Peel is ready and in the house we can then take up the bill to provide for carrying into effect the treaty of peace between Canada and Japan.

Mr. Green: Is it available for distribution?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If it is not available we will postpone it. I said we would bring it up on Monday but I will not insist on it. It may come up a day or two later. Then there is another bill, Bill No. 63, to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act; Bill No. 93, to amend the Export and Import Permits Act; Bill No. 193, respecting the New Westminster harbour commissioners; Bill No. 194, to amend the Aeronautics Act, and Bill No. 195, to amend the Government Employees Compensation Act, 1947.

Mr. Green: Are you expecting to prorogue Monday night?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I should like to.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

QUESTIONS

ASSOCIATION OF CIVIL SERVICE EMPLOYEES

Mr. Knowles:

1. What is a recognized civil service association?
2. Does the civil service commission, the cabinet, the minister at the head of a department, or some official under the minister grant recognition? If not, who does grant such recognition?
3. What conditions or requirements must be met by an organization before recognition is granted?
4. What are the names of all recognized civil service associations?
5. When was each such association recognized, and by whom?
6. Does the government discourage or prohibit the formation of new associations of civil service employees?
7. What is the policy of the government with respect to the formation of new associations of civil service employees?
8. Has this policy ever been communicated to senior administrative officials in the civil service? If so, when, and to what officials?

Mr. Bradley:

1, 2 and 3. There is no formal definition of "a recognized civil service association".

4 and 5. As indicated above, there are no "recognized civil service associations". There are known to be over one hundred staff associations or organizations and it is not possible to compile a complete and accurate list. The following eleven staff organizations have been named by order in council as entitled to direct and separate representation on the national joint council of the public service of Canada:

The Civil Service Federation of Canada, The Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada, The Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada, The Civil Service Association of Ottawa, The Federal Association of Letter Carriers, The Association of Canadian Postal Employees, The Canadian Railway Mail Clerks Federation, The Customs and Excise Officers Association, The Canadian Taxation Division Staff Association, The National Unemployment Insurance Commission Association, The Department of Veterans Affairs Employees National Association.

6. No.

7 and 8. The government does not interfere in the formation of new associations of civil service employees.

PICTURE OF MINISTER OF TRANSPORT

Mr. Hees:

1. Were any copies of a picture of the Minister of Transport lecturing to students of Ottawa university sent out to schools, institutions and other organizations?
2. If so, how many, and what was the purpose of sending out this picture?

Mr. Chevrier: I would like to answer this question orally, if I may. I did receive a group of some eighty students of the University of Ottawa some weeks ago as my guests here in the House of Commons. While I did not lecture to them, I spoke of the manner in which parliament operated, and during the course of the talks someone suggested that I explain on a map the main features of the St. Lawrence seaway. I decided to do so. As I was talking, a picture was taken of the students and of myself, and the picture was sent out to six university student publications, six teacher publications and twelve newspapers, as part of the educational program on the St. Lawrence seaway.

I should tell the house that the national film board made a charge against the Department of Transport of sixty cents for each copy of the print, making a total of $14.40.

GERM WARFARE

STATEMENTS BY DR. ENDICOTT—DENIAL BY WASHINGTON AND UNIFIED COMMAND IN KOREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, Dr. Endicott, the communist, has accused the United Nations of using germ warfare in Korea, and every member of the House of Commons has had inquiries from across the country demonstrating the concern of the people regarding his statement and press reports on the subject. I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he is prepared at this time to make a statement on this matter.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I thought it likely that someone would bring up this question, Mr. Speaker, and I am therefore in a better position to deal with it than I would normally be.

The charge that the United Nations forces in Korea have engaged in germ warfare is so false and so fantastic that it would normally be unwise to dignify it by official denials. Nevertheless, it has become such a central feature of soviet propaganda, and has been repeated so violently and so often for the transparent purpose of deceiving persons who may not be aware of the soviet purpose behind the charge, that I think some statement should be made about it. The hon. gentleman's question gives me an opportunity to make that statement on behalf of the government.

The accusation of germ warfare is usually aimed specifically at the United States. It has been emphatically and indignantly denied in Washington and by the unified command in Korea. Within the last few days Mr. Acheson has repeated that denial, emphasizing that the "trumped-up 'evidence'" to support—and I quote him——these utterly false charges constitutes another example of the incredible length to which communists will go to propagate the big lie.

Canadian members of the communist party, who, of course, follow automatically every twist and turn of soviet policy no matter where it leads them, and their fellow travellers, who do not always realize that they are travelling under orders from the Kremlin—these people prefer to accept this trumped-up evidence rather than the official denials of our friends in the United States. The charge, Mr. Speaker, has also been categorically denied on behalf of the United Nations by its secretary general, Mr. Trygve Lie, as utterly false. I am sure that this house accepts those denials.

So far as our own position is concerned, it is, of course, a slanderous falsehood to say that Canada has participated in any way in any form of germ warfare. It is equally false and equally slanderous, but more cowardly and despicable, to imply without stating it in so many words that Canada is making any preparations in this field except for defence against such warfare. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that some of our best qualified scientists, though they would not of course be permitted to make on-the-spot examinations, have already examined the so-called evidence of Korean germ warfare that has been made public by the communists and have pronounced it, in an oral report to me, to be a transparent and clumsy hoax.

Possibly the best proof that the communist leaders themselves do not believe in these charges or in this evidence is the fact that for their so-called investigations they have used a communist body, called the international association of democratic lawyers, and other agencies which are under their direct control. The United States, the United Kingdom, Canada and the other members of the United Nations with forces in Korea have, on the other hand, agreed that the charges should be investigated by men who would be bound—and of course this is unthinkable in communist countries—only by their professional consciences, and who would act on their scientific knowledge; by men—and this would also be impossible in communist countries—who would not be subject to any form of reprisal or punishment if their conclusions were embarrassing politically to the governments of which they were nationals. For this purpose it has been proposed that the investigation should be conducted by representatives of such impartial international organizations as the International Red Cross or the world health organization. Indeed, any international organization of this kind should be acceptable to the United Nations. The communists, obviously embarrassed by the possibility that this kind of investigation might take place, have retreated to the position of denying the impartiality and objectivity of the two international organizations in question, a denial which deceives no one except themselves but which very convincingly exposes their own bad faith and their realization that the charges could not be substantiated for a moment if a genuinely impartial investigation were permitted.

In spite of this there are some in this country, deluded but possibly sincere, who have been impressed by the shrill and continuous communist propaganda on germ warfare to which they are subjected. There are others, of course, members of the communist party and fellow travellers, who are neither deluded nor sincere but who will swallow any accusation and accept any statement, however absurd, if it comes from Moscow, and will ignore any evidence or statement in reply to such an accusation which comes from their own or from friendly governments. They will condemn in unmeasured terms the policies of their own and other free countries, while they will propagate any lie, however vicious, which is uttered against their own country and its friends on behalf of soviet communist imperialism. Communist travellers and their friends, for instance, will return from Moscow with nothing but praise for the sordid and cruel despotism which has been forced on the Russian people and on those other peoples whom they have enslaved. Or they will come back from China, without any word of criticism for the inhuman treatment of Christian missionaries there, but with extravagant praise for the communist regime in that country which is responsible for such treatment.

Some of these persons have a passion for publicity, and I do not wish to minister to that passion by referring to them by name. As long as they are Canadians they have the rights, of course, of Canadian citizenship, but within the law. If they break the law they can be punished. However, we should, I suggest, be careful not to make martyrs of them in a way which would only make them more dangerous to us and more useful to the communists. It is, I think, a small price to pay for freedom and for the preservation of human rights to permit such persons to condemn and discredit themselves by their own malicious and false statements as long as they stay within the law. A few of these people, of course, may sincerely believe that they are, if I may put it this way, fishermen for peace. They are, in fact, merely bait on the end of a Red hook. They are helping the soviet government achieve certain imperialist objectives which have nothing to do with peace or freedom, but which require the weakening and eventually the destruction of the friendly co-operation which has been built up between free states in the face of the menace of soviet communist aggression.

No true or loyal Canadian, I know, will subscribe to or assist in any way this subversive campaign which employs as one of its most dangerous tactics the longing for peace which we all share and uses as one of its most destructive weapons what I have already described as ideological germ warfare.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The press has reported that a questionnaire has been directed by the Department of External Affairs to Dr. Endicott. The press also carries reports of the statement by Dr. Endicott that he does not propose to answer the questionnaire but intends to seek a discussion of this subject with the minister himself. Can the minister inform us what the situation is and whether any such questionnaire has been directed to Dr. Endicott?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, Dr. Endicott addressed to me some days ago a telegram asking for an opportunity of making a personal report to me before he made a public statement on his return from communist China. In reply to that telegram a letter was sent to Dr. Endicott in the following terms:

> I have been instructed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to forward to you the attached summaries of statements which you are reported to have made during your recent visit to Europe and to China. This is the most accurate report of these statements which we have been able to secure and I am directed to ask you whether you confirm or deny or wish to amend the statements contained in them which you are reported to have made.

This letter was signed, on my instructions, on behalf of the Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs. In reply to the point raised by the leader of the opposition may I say that to this communication I received an answer which possibly I might put on the record. It reached me last Friday, as I recall.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes. Read it into the record.

Mr. Pearson: It is addressed to me, Mr. Speaker, and if the house desires me to do so, I will put it on the record. It reads as follows:

> Dear Sir:
> This will acknowledge receipt of a letter signed by an official of your department questioning me on certain press and radio statements attributed to me.

Parenthetically, Mr. Speaker, all we did was to give him an opportunity to confirm, deny or amend those statements. He was not questioned in regard to them except in that respect. Dr. Endicott's letter continues:

> Before commenting on these questions I should like to inform you that I am speaking in Toronto on Saturday morning at Massey Hall and on Sunday night at the Maple Leaf Gardens. In these speeches I will be discussing the use of germ warfare by the United States' forces against the Chinese people. I will be repeating what I said abroad. As you are aware, I can speak Chinese fluently and I was able to ask and see for myself on the spot what I feel to be undeniable evidence of the use of bacteriological warfare by the United States' forces.
> The truth of this grave charge is a matter of the greatest importance to all Canadians and I should hope that you would want to hear what I saw in China. You will recall that I cabled you from China as long ago as April 1, before I made any public statement.

Incidentally, that was a cable from Peking to me some weeks ago protesting against the alleged use of germs and bacteriological warfare in Korea and in northern China. Dr. Endicott's letter continues:

> I would welcome a chance to present the facts to which I was a witness both to you and to the external affairs committee, as well as to the Canadian people.
> To come back to the questions your official asks. I have been unable to trace any authority possessed by your department which gives the right to question Canadian citizens in such a way, nor is the purpose of the questions clear to me. Until I receive some clarification on this point I must decline to submit to cross-examination from your officials.

That is the end of the letter, Mr. Speaker. The cross-examination to which Dr. Endicott refers was the opportunity we gave him to explain, deny or amend what he is reported to have said when he was in communist territory; and he did not take advantage of that opportunity.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I feel sure that all members of this house will be ready to approve of the strongest terms in describing what is being done by Dr. Endicott at this time. However, I raise one question which, it seems to me, has been in the minds of many people, if one may take the statements that have appeared in the press as an indication of what they are thinking. At the time the Criminal Code was amended, I think members of this house were under the impression that the effect of the amendments would be that those who were guilty of statements which might have the effect of injuring Canada's position and affecting our participation in the struggle in which we are engaged would be embraced within the wider terms of the code dealing with subversive activities. It can be no defence for anyone to suggest that it is the United States which is guilty of certain conduct. The United States is engaged in a common effort with Canada and the other nations now represented in Korea, and it would be impossible for us to divorce ourselves entirely from action of that kind, if, indeed, such action were being taken.

I do not think it is safe for us to say that no Canadian except one who happens to follow the line put forward by the Kremlin is going to accept statements of this kind. Unfortunately there seems to be some evidence that there are people who are affected by repeated statements of this nature on the part of a man who is accorded some measure of recognition even by the government itself, in the manner in which it deals with him in respect to this matter. If statements of this kind are believed by any Canadians who have sons, husbands or brothers in Korea, how can it be possible to say that they are not subversive and that they will not have a damaging effect upon the state of mind of many of our people? I most earnestly urge upon the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that he consider whether statements which can only be taken as suggesting a course of action by the United Nations forces, of which the Canadian forces are a part, do not bring the author of them clearly within the amendments to the Criminal Code which the minister introduced into this house.

I for one have expressed myself as being strongly opposed to arbitrary action or any methods which are inconsistent with our truly democratic processes. I believe the place in which any of these things should be dealt with is the courts. But I most certainly understood the Minister of Justice had indicated to us it was his belief that the amendments which had been introduced here, and which were adopted by the members of this house, were sufficiently wide to deal with activities or statements which could in any way undermine our participation in the present very real fighting in Korea, or at any other time, in the event of war, interfering with the war effort of the country. I would ask him to tell the house what the opinion of the department is as to the application of the amended section of the Criminal Code to words which can only be regarded as inclusive of the United Nations forces, having regard to the fact that Canadian men in Canadian uniforms are serving with those forces.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): In response to a question earlier during the present session, I indicated that the statements attributed to Dr. Endicott in the press as having been made in Korea and China were being examined by members of the staff of the Department of Justice, with a view to reaching an opinion as to whether or not prosecutions could be laid against Dr. Endicott under either the amendment to which the leader of the opposition has referred as having been passed last year, or under other sections of the Criminal Code.

Since that time Dr. Endicott went to London, England and made there a statement repudiating those attributed to him in China. He has since come to Canada and had communications, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, with that department, and has also made speeches in Canada. All of these have a bearing upon the opinion which is in the course of preparation in the Department of Justice.

One of the difficulties under which, in contradistinction to the totalitarian countries, we labour in Canada in a matter of this kind is that under British justice a man is presumed to be innocent until he is proved guilty. If he merely, in the course of his trial, pleads not guilty and says nothing more, the onus is upon the crown of proving a prima facie case against him by witnesses who are available to the Canadian courts, which I do suggest would not include those in China to whom Dr. Endicott's original statements were alleged to have been made.

No matter what the wording of the offence may be, one of the matters of prime importance which the prosecution has to consider is whether it can produce sufficient evidence through competent witnesses which will discharge that first onus so that the onus will then shift to the defence to establish justification, or other matters of defence.

The amendment to which my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has referred is one which was introduced last year. This is the subsection which was added to the section defining treason; it reads:

Treason is . . .

"(i) assisting, while in or out of Canada, any enemy at war with Canada, or any armed forces against whom Canadian forces are engaged in hostilities whether or not a state of war exists between Canada and the country whose forces they are, or . . ."

In other words, the prime purpose of tne amendment was to get away from the necessity, which otherwise would obtain, of having to prove that a state of war, according to international law, existed between Canada and, we will say, North Korea and China —a state of war being a condition usually recognized as that which follows an open declaration of war. I think there is no doubt that the amendment achieved that effect. But to go on, following the suggestion which the leader of the opposition has just made this afternoon, and say that it in any way eases the necessity of proving that the statement which was made was intended to assist or did assist any enemy at war with Canada is I think hardly in accord with the terms of the amendment.

In the present case this matter, as my remarks previously in the house indicates, has been under active consideration by a committee in our department consisting of the deputy minister, Mr. F. P. Varcoe, Q.C., Mr. A. A. Moffat, Q.C., who was the former deputy attorney general of the province of Manitoba; Mr. T. D. MacDonald, Q.C., the head of the combines branch, who was a former deputy attorney general of Nova Scotia, and Mr. A. J. MacLeod, who is one of our specialists in the field of criminal law. They have been giving very serious consideration to the various pieces of evidence to which I have referred, with a view to arriving at an opinion as to whether, in their judgment, it would be possible to secure a conviction from a Canadian jury under our British system of law if a prosecution were launched.

Unfortunately, Mr. Varcoe, the deputy minister, was taken to Washington for a matter of nearly a week on the St. Lawrence deep waterways matter, and Mr. MacDonald has been in New York attending a committee of the economic and social council of the United Nations dealing with international cartels, and just returned over the week end. We will be producing an opinion in the matter shortly.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask the minister a question? In view of Dr. Endicott's letter, did he have someone at the meeting in Massey Hall last night to take down an accurate account of the charges that may have been made there?

While I am on my feet, may I also say that I think we should leave a good deal of this to the good sense of the Canadian people. They know that an impartial investigation has been urged by the United Nations, but it has been refused. As long as no impartial investigation is permitted by the other side, the Canadian people should be able to evaluate the charges for exactly what they are worth. I do not think we should continue to give publicity to matters of this description. The good sense of the Canadian people will arrive at a fairly sound judgment as to the charges that have been made.

FISHERIES

ATLANTIC HERRING INVESTIGATION COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries, and in his absence to the parliamentary assistant. Does the Canada-Newfoundland herring commission exist at the present time? If not, has a herring commission been set up, and when has the commission reported to the hon. Minister of Fisheries?

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): In reply to the senior member for Queens, who was good enough to leave a notice of his intention to ask this question in my office this morning, may I say with respect to the first part of the question the answer is no.

With respect to the second part of his question the answer is also no. The hon. member, however, is probably referring to the Atlantic herring investigation committee, which was established in 1944, under joint arrangements between the federal government and the governments of Newfoundland, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. That committee was finally dissolved on March 31, 1950.

With respect to the third part of the hon. member's question, namely, when has the commission reported to the Minister of Fisheries, the reply is that reports of the Atlantic herring investigation committee were made annually to the minister through the fisheries research board.

SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

PROPOSED INQUIRY INTO GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATIVE ORGANIZATION

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I propose to avail myself of the opportunity presented by this motion to bring before the house once again the suggestion that it is to the advantage of all Canadians that we should adopt the method that has been employed by every substantial business in Canada in an effort to improve the efficiency of those businesses in these extremely important years.

On an earlier occasion, on behalf of this party I introduced a motion in which I called for the appointment of a royal commission to examine the general organization of government from the administrative point of view, with the request that it report to the house and recommend any improvements which could be made from the point of view of either increased efficiency or government economy.

At that time, so far as I could discern the opinion expressed by hon. members, there was no serious disagreement with the suggestion that it would be desirable to improve the efficiency of government administration in every way we can, but rather that no evidence had been placed before us which suggested any real necessity for such examination. Therefore I return today to this subject, and again I shall present a motion in which I shall call for an expression of opinion by hon. members.

I present the motion in the hope that all hon. members may recognize the extent to which public confidence in the efficient and effective expenditure of their moneys by the government, in itself, is a most important part of the great economic struggle in which we are now engaged. As has been said in the house on a number of occasions, our struggle against communism is not merely to build up united military strength which will preserve peace by making it appear unwise for Russia to begin a war, but side by side with that is the equally important struggle to preserve our economy and to maintain our living standards while we shoulder the financial burdens imposed upon us by the necessity for military preparations.

Therefore I suggest in all earnestness to members on both sides of the house that the extent to which, by our conduct, we can convey confidence to the taxpayers of Canada that their dollars are being well and properly spent, to that extent we shall be making an important contribution to ultimate success in our long struggle against communism and communist aggression.

Let us consider some of the reasons which suggest themselves as supporting a motion of this kind. First of all the question may arise as to the desirability of the appointment of a royal commission or of a committee of parliament. The motion which will be presented suggests the appointment of a royal commission, for reasons which I hope will commend themselves to the house. It would be possible to appoint to a royal commission men who have been specializing in business organization, outstanding accountants, men skilled in departmental work, as well as representatives of the civil service itself whose knowledge would be invaluable in assessing evidence placed before such a commission.

While there are among hon. members many who have business and accounting experience, as well as other experience which would be useful in examining a subject of this kind, the appointment of a royal commission would make it possible for the government to choose men and women who have established recognition in this country as experts in their own fields. It would also make it possible to choose men and women whose expert knowledge would permit them to examine these problems of organization without any suggestion that they might be embarrassed in any way through their being members of the House of Commons.

I feel sure it is not necessary to stress the point that in recent years one thing has been emphasized over and over again by large corporations conducting business of one kind or another. Again and again we see the statement that there has been a reorganization in the administration of a business, after a careful examination has been made, and that new methods of cost accounting have been adopted so that day by day in every department of that business it has become possible for the efficiency of the operation to be checked by statistical information.

We have observed also that one of the things done by business generally to reduce costs and increase efficiency has been to watch the way in which various activities are carried on so that there will be a guarantee that the skill and efficiency of those working on any particular task may be employed to the utmost advantage. All that this motion suggests is that those of us who are supposed to be responsible for the largest and most important business in Canada, that of the people of Canada and of Canada itself, should adopt precisely the methods which have been found to be not only desirable but necessary if business efficiency is to be practised and in many cases solvency itself maintained.

Surely some of the figures of expenditures which have been made available recently suggest many places where there might be some possibility of economy. Just recently the government statisticians prepared comparative figures of expenditures on certain typical items under various government departments. Let me place a few of those comparative figures before the members of this house, without suggesting for a moment that these are the only items which give a clear interpretation of what is happening. They are put forward simply as illustrating what has been happening; and these examples are repeated over and over again in the comparative figures presented by the government statisticians.

Let us take the Department of National Defence, which during the coming year will be called upon to spend nearly half of the enormous sum of money that is to be taken from the people of Canada by taxation as set forth in the estimates now under consideration. I take the figure for 1938-39 as the last figure before the war and because it is the year which is taken as the starting point by the government statisticians themselves.

Under the heading of professional and special services, the expenditure in 1938-39 was $198,000, the expenditure indicated for 1952-53 is $11,767,000. Surely when we see a figure as large as that we do not need to argue very strenuously that some examination would suggest places where savings could be made in an item which for similar services has jumped from $198,000 to $11,767,000.

For travelling and removal expenses in the year 1938-39 the expenditure was $1,101,000; for 1952-53 it is estimated to be $32,430,000. Let us admit that we are living in a time of higher prices; let us admit that Canada's general activities have expanded greatly; it still does not explain an increase by thirty-two times of the amount spent on that particular item in 1938-39.

For telegraphs, telegrams and other communications services in 1938-39 the figure was $57,000; for 1952-53 it is $5,239,000. That is an increase not of thirty times but of one hundred times what it was in 1938-39. Surely there must be expenditures there which would be worth examining to see if some savings could not be made. Whether the savings effected would be $10,000, $100,000, $1,000,000, or $2,000,000 as long as savings can be made, the possibility should be explored. Certain it is that impartial examination will show that lots of long distance telephone calls could have been avoided by the use of air mail which probably would have obtained the same information in very little more time. The same applies to telegrams and other communications such as wireless and things of that kind. A jump from $57,000 to $5,239,000 in itself would suggest reasons for an independent examination by skilled men and women to see if some improvement could not be made in the costs and efficiency of that operation.

Let us examine the item of films, displays, advertising and other informational publicity. Remember that this is the same government which proclaims itself as continuing efficiency. In 1938-39 it felt impelled to spend only $5,000 for films, displays, advertising and other informational publicity, whereas it now asks for $3,115,000 for the same item. There is an increase of six hundred times. Surely that would suggest reasons for exploring this item to seek possible economies and improved efficiency.

Let us look at office stationery, supplies, equipment and furnishings. Certainly the cost of these things has gone up, and undoubtedly more stationery and supplies are required; but let us look at the comparative figures and remember that while Canada has grown, it has not grown or expanded in anything like this percentage. In 1938-39 under this item $232,000 was spent. It is estimated that during 1952-53 the government will require under this item $6,164,000. Need I suggest that any ordinary business confronted with an increase of this kind in a single item would insist upon a most careful examination of the possibility of economies under that head.

Then let us look at one or two items under departments other than national defence. So there may be no suggestion that these figures have only gone up because of military preparation and activities, let us look at travelling and removal expenses in the non-defence categories. In 1938-39 the total under that heading for all departments other than defence and defence production was $3,504,000. For 1952-53 the amount estimated to be necessary is $13,991,000. Surely an increase by more than three times in that one item suggests reasons for examination. Then let us look at this interesting item covering telephones, telegrams and other communications. Let me remind hon. members that any argument which might be made that speed in modern methods of communication is essential for defence purposes would not apply, because the figures I am giving have no relation to defence activities. The figure for telephones, telegrams and other communication services for the non-defence departments for 1938-39 was $689,000. For 1952-53 the amount estimated as required by the government is $5,638,000, nearly ten times as much. Then under the item publication of departmental reports and other material we find the interesting fact that not a single cent was included in 1938-39, but that for 1952-53 there is in the non-defence departments an item of $4,368,000.

I could go on giving item after item showing similar increases in expenditures between 1938-39 and the current year. May I also point out that it is not merely the comparison between 1938-39 and 1952-53 that is illuminating. Let us take the item of telephones, telegrams and other communication services under the departments of National Defence and Defence Production. For last year, which after all is fairly close to us, the amount spent was $3,477,000. The estimate for the current year is $5,239,000. Surely an increase of nearly $2 million this year under that single item suggests that we should have cost accounting methods applied to some of these figures.

So much for the figures put forward by the government itself. Other reasons have been suggested as to why there should be an examination of the administrative methods of various departments of government. These have been brought to our attention in connection with various activities of this government. For instance, the matter of the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease, which has been under consideration both by parliament and by a committee of parliament, is examined impartially by a writer in Maclean's magazine of April 15 of this year under the heading, "Who is to blame for the foot-and-mouth epidemic?"

Mr. Speaker: Order. Has this matter not been referred to a committee?

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Speaker; what I am about to read has no reference to the matter before the committee.

Mr. Howe: The subject matter certainly has been referred to a committee of this house where it is now under study.

Mr. Speaker: I think so.

Mr. Drew: Well, I will not press the point. I feel sure what I was going to put forward was not before the committee, but if the ruling is that reference should not be made to it I do not propose to insist.

Mr. Speaker: There appears to be some doubt about the point of order but the hon. member says he will not press it and I appreciate it.

Mr. Drew: Then I wish to deal with other matters that have been under consideration and which at the moment have not been referred to any committee. For instance, I would mention certain disclosures of the waste of public money as a result of thefts at certain military camps.

Mr. Howe: Once again I must object. This very subject is being examined at the present time by the committee on defence expenditures. It cannot be discussed in this house until there is a report by the committee.

Mr. Drew: I would point out that this subject was not referred to the committee on defence expenditures. If Your Honour will examine the terms of reference to the committee you will find they deal with what has been spent on defence, and existing commitments. What I propose to discuss has nothing to do with those commitments; it has to do with the administrative conduct of the department in relation to certain matters which have a bearing on the efficiency of government administration. Not only is this matter not before the committee; I would point out that the committee has refused to deal with it. Therefore I suggest that far from the existence of that committee being an argument against dealing with the matter I had intended to mention here, the very attitude adopted by the committee suggests why this is the place to urge an appropriate examination of the matter which will not be subject to any limitations such as those which have been suggested in the committee on defence expenditures.

Mr. Howe: On a point of order, I would be quite happy to have the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) proceed with the understanding that any subject he now cares to discuss is barred from current discussion in the committee on defence expenditures.

Mr. Drew: Well, Mr. Speaker, already there have been a number of ingenious methods of muzzling committees and muzzling discussion, but this is one of the most ingenious I have yet heard. Certainly I do not subscribe to any part of it.

Mr. Howe: I do not see how any matter being discussed in that committee can also be discussed in the House of Commons.

Mr. Drew: It is not being discussed there.

Mr. Howe: I have been reading the reports of the committee, and I have seen references to this subject. If you assure me it has not been and will not be discussed—and I accept the word of the leader of the opposition that it has not been referred to the committee—we can proceed accordingly. If he wishes to carry on I will be quite happy, but I think Mr. Speaker will rule that this subject, which can come under investigation by the committee, cannot be discussed in this house.

Mr. Drew: In an effort to co-operate with the minister, recognizing that he can speak on behalf of the government, I will offer an alternative proposal which would be much more effective. I would ask him on behalf of the government to assure the members of this house that tomorrow a wide-open inquiry will be started in the committee on defence expenditures in Petawawa, Farnham and other places where these thefts have taken place. If we can have that assurance it will dispose of the necessity for discussion.

Mr. Howe: I understand that certain matters now before the courts are sub judice. The leader of the opposition knows very well I could not draw a distinction between those matters which are sub judice and those which are not; but as far as the government is concerned I can assure the hon. gentleman that no decision has been taken which in any way limits the discussion in the committee.

Mr. Drew: I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that one of the places I referred to was Farnham. That is not sub judice to the extent that there are any legal proceedings. Those were disposed of long ago. Therefore the remarks of the minister would not apply to that camp. I still leave the matter open if he will give an undertaking the committee will be able to proceed with these matters. Certainly, I would have no occasion to mention the other at all.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On another point of order before you make a ruling, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer you to pages 1797, 1798 and 1799 of Hansard for May 1, 1952. This subject was dealt with by the leader of the opposition at length. At that time he made the same request for this investigation, and after he had made that speech on the motion to go into ways and means, we voted. I know that members are entitled to repeat themselves sometimes, but I think the hon. gentleman would be wise if he did not repeat a speech which has been made. This is the second time the hon. gentleman has made it. I could read nearly the same words as he has used this afternoon from the pages which I mentioned.

Mr. Drew: I have no thought of dealing with a matter that has been dealt with before. This motion has not previously been before the house during this session. I am speaking directly on the motion before the house.

I would point out to Your Honour that the terms of reference to the committee on defence expenditures are clear, and it could only be to the extent that any of these matters might relate to the subject actually under consideration by that committee that a discussion of these subjects could be precluded here. I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that the terms of reference set out in the appointment of the committee on defence expenditures simply authorize the committee to inquire into expenditures which have been made, and into commitments for defence expenditures. As for matters such as the failure of the government to protect public property, they are entirely different. What I am doing at the moment is merely to suggest to hon. members reasons why an examination of these matters would suggest ways in which public money could be saved by more efficient administrative organization of this and other departments of government.

Unless Your Honour rules against my reference to Farnham, which I thought had been dealt with some time ago, from the point of view of the committee on defence expenditures it would have no authority to deal with it. I would then propose to make a reference which simply supports my argument that we have had a very convincing demonstration of the necessity for an examination by experts of the ways in which public money could be saved, and public property protected, by ordinary business methods. I was only going to say this in connection with the camp at Farnham. We had some discussion of that earlier, and it was contended that what had happened at Farnham was exaggerated. I wish all members of this house could see Farnham and what happened to the camp there, and also see photographs of the excellent camp that was there before. Over the great area set aside for as fine a campsite as I have seen, there is nothing but lush green grass in places where there was a whole camp with wooden hutments, fitted out with wiring, electrical equipment and everything of that kind.

It is true that the administration building still stands and is being used as a drill hall; it is true that the powerhouse still stands; but as far as one can see everything else went. The suggestion that the loss was $3,500 is a severe strain on the credulity of anyone who can remember what the camp was, and who sees what has happened to it. Anyone who knows what miles of copper wiring would cost today, what furniture, electrical equipment as well as the buildings themselves would cost, must find it extremely difficult to understand how $3,500 could be stretched to cover the loss of the property that was standing there. For a while the deed was being done in the hours of darkness, but then the thieves became so bold that they carried on in broad daylight. The best possible illustration of how little supervision was being exercised over public property owned by the people of Canada is the fact that one of the policemen down there told me that the thing was being done so openly he thought that these were government trucks and he actually escorted some of them away from the property when they were carrying stolen property. Now, that is just how far this has gone. If any large business found things of that kind happening within its own organization, experts would be quickly put to work to find out how a repetition of that sort of thing could be prevented, and how they could protect their own property as well as maintain the efficiency of each unit of their organization.

I am not going to enlarge upon these other things. They are before the house as well as before the committee. I feel confident that there is not an hon. member in this house, including the members of the government, who does not believe that there were ways in which something could have been done to prevent such a wide-open loss of property as the theft of a railway siding or things of that kind. All I am suggesting is that those are things which ordinary common sense would suggest be subjected to the examination of competent experts, so that they could present a recommendation to us as to how the administration of this department could be improved.

I only want to clear up one point in the event that it may come before this house at any time. The terms of reference to the committee on defence expenditures did not deal with the problem to which I am referring, and which has been referred to by the Minister of Public Works. The motion to set up the select committee on defence expenditures, which was presented to this house by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and unanimously approved, read as follows:

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On what date?

Mr. Drew: That was on April 3, 1952, and it read:

> That a select committee be appointed to examine all expenditure of public moneys for national defence and all commitments for expenditure for national defence since March 31, 1950, and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, and in particular what, if any, economies consistent with the execution of the policy decided by the government may be effected therein, with power to send for persons, papers and records and to examine witnesses; and that notwithstanding standing order 65, the committee shall consist of twenty-six members to be designated by the house at a later date.

I suggest that consideration of ways in which the whole system of administration could be better carried out, that there could be a better integration of the activities of different departments, for instance the Department of Justice and the Department of National Defence, the Department of Public Works and the Department of National Defence, which are so closely related in so many activities, and the activities of other departments, would not come within the terms of reference of that committee. It is for that reason I am suggesting the advisability of an inquiry which will permit an examination of ways in which the whole business of government, as one integrated responsibility, could be brought to the highest possible measure of efficiency.

Mr. Speaker, the motion that I will present is one that simply calls for an inquiry into the organization and general efficiency of government administration, as well as the possibility of co-ordinating all public services and departments, and also the assurance of the recognition of the responsibilities of civil servants and the recognition of their position within this administrative system.

I would point out that in this simple form a commission of this kind can achieve great results. I again refer to the commission which was appointed in the United States, known as the Hoover commission, of which Mr. Hoover was the chairman. It simply was asked to deal with the general problems of organization and was described as—and I quote the words—"The commission on organization of the executive branch of the government". Those were the exact words in which that commission was officially described.

Whether the government and congress of the United States have or have not implemented all the recommendations which were made by that commission, the fact remains that a commission made up of businessmen and women of the highest standing, acting under the chairmanship of a great businessman who was also an ex-president of the United States, made recommendations which they estimated would save $5 billion a year. It is not for us to challenge the wisdom or otherwise of the government and congress of the United States in their adoption or not of every detail of those recommendations. But we can examine the recommendations which were made and see that in an examination of a somewhat similar form of government and a representative body—although their congress is different from our parliament—there were specific recommendations which dealt with the very kind of subjects that might be dealt with here.

When the Hoover commission was appointed there was no suggestion that this was a fishing expedition to find any wrongdoing or anything of that kind. On the contrary, it was clearly stated that the responsibility for anything of that kind rested with congress or with the committees of congress. It was simply argued—and the argument was accepted by congress—that where there had been such a tremendous expansion of administrative activity it was inevitable that there would be duplicating services, that there would be branches of departments where similar activities would be carried on without anybody knowing about it, and that saving could be made by an over-all examination of this subject.

I have reason to recall some rather illuminating examples of the way in which these things can happen even under highly efficient units, whether of government or of public services. I recall a time when there was introduced in the Ontario legislature a measure to co-ordinate the research activities which came within the field of jurisdiction; and I would remind hon. members that in Ontario, as in other provinces, there is an excellent research organization maintained by the government. When that bill was before the house to provide a measure of supervision over research and to try to co-ordinate research, some extremely interesting things were ascertained. For instance, it was found that in three different places, each entirely unknown to the others, research was being conducted into the blood disease in partridge. That is not an unimportant thing because birdlife is, in itself, an important thing; and this blood disease was decimating the partridge population of the province. Any one research bureau supported by the skill available would have been able to do the job much better.

There were similar research activities being carried on. There was no thought of wrongdoing. There was no thought of any deliberate evasion of responsibility. On the contrary, many people were so anxious to do a good job that, without finding out whether anybody else was doing it, they were pressing forward in research of various kinds.

Here under the government we find, for instance, that there are economists under the various departments. There are economists under the Department of Finance. It was pointed out that there are many more economists in the Department of External Affairs than there are in the Department of Finance. Possibly an examination by experts might suggest that some co-ordination of the activities of some of these economists might bring to every department a wider knowledge of the economic factors and also avoid unintentional but costly duplication. That is the sort of thing which ordinary business would regard as absolutely necessary.

There is also, Mr. Speaker, the question of the civil service. Here there is a situation which calls for examination; and it is one in regard to which I should think the members of this house would welcome advice. At the present time we have a large payroll of men and women who are performing civil service duties but who are regarded as temporary civil servants. I think that it is to the advantage of the government and of the people of Canada that, except where work is obviously of a strictly temporary nature, everyone who is doing this kind of work and is in fact employed as a civil servant should be on the regular civil service payroll and should have the protection of the pension arrangements and other measures of security provided for regular civil servants.

I believe it is in the interests of the efficiency of government administration that, except where the employment is really temporary, those employed in services of this kind should be civil servants with the standing of civil servants, and that the ordinary promotional rights should be available to all of them so that the morale of our public employees may be maintained at the highest level. After all, personnel management, the examination of methods of employment, the plans which are made for the most effective use of every type of skill are all today an essential part of the administration of any business; and surely that statement applies with even greater force to the business of government.

When you see these figures indicating the immense expansion of the business of government from the years 1938-1939 to the present year; when you realize the enormous increase in the spending by this government of public money; when you realize that this expansion has taken place under pressure, and that in many cases the primary consideration, and the main consideration, was speed, rather than economy: then business common sense would suggest the desirability of an examination of this nature.

After all the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) is the first to realize that in many instances his primary concern was necessarily to see that some organization was set up which could do a job with speed, without, of necessity, waiting to find out whether some of the functions of that particular department were already being performed by some other branch of the administrative organization of government.

All these things suggest reasons for the appointment of such a commission. It does not need to be emphasized, surely, that the expenditure of public money has now reached proportions which could conceivably be very dangerous. After all, this fortunate land of ours is not immune from those difficulties which other nations, as well as this nation, have encountered from time to time. We must be extremely careful that we always have some slack which can be taken up; that we have some reserve of economic strength to meet any storm which might conceivably not be under our control, as well as those storms which might be greatly accelerated by the action of the government itself.

When we see the level of taxation in this country, when we realize the burden that this imposes upon the people of Canada, then surely no one should argue against any step which would assure the utmost efficiency in the expenditure of these huge sums, and in the saving of every dollar that could be saved. Mr. Speaker, if all the assurances given from time to time by this government were to be taken at their face value, including the assurance by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), so lightly given, that no economies can be effected and are not being effected, even so, I do not think one needs to go beyond the reports of the daily press to see that there are many people in this country, regardless of politics, who do not share that conviction. That being so, it would be to the advantage of this government if they had a report from such a commission which in fact did substantiate the claim they are making. By chance they might get such a report, but I frankly say that the Minister of Finance himself would expect no such report. I think he would be the most surprised man in this house if such a report were made. But even if such a report were made, it would be worth the effort to reassure the public that our dollars are being properly spent, and most effectively spent, for the defence of our economy and for the defence of freedom itself. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I do hope that the government will not simply say, "We have dealt with this before; we have expressed our opinion." This has been argued before, as the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) suggests. I hope that they will recognize how helpful such an inquiry could be.

May I suggest another reason why it is essential that an examination of this nature should take place. Without entering into any arguments as to the motives or otherwise, the simple fact remains that, no matter what taxation powers are conferred upon the provincial governments, their ability to tax for the purpose of maintaining the services which they must give under our constitution is very largely measured by the number of dollars that remain in the pockets of Canadians after those dollars have been drawn away by the dominion government.

There are only so many dollars in the pockets of all the taxpayers. Whether those dollars are withdrawn by the dominion government, the provincial government or the municipal government, they are the same taxpayers and they are the same kind of dollars. Therefore we must examine with some concern the fact that whereas in 1938-39, the base year employed by the government statisticians themselves in those comparative figures they have been preparing, the amount withdrawn by the dominion government in taxes of the total taxes collected in Canada was 49 cents in every total tax dollar paid by the people of Canada, leaving 51 cents out of every tax dollar available for the provincial governments and the municipal governments. This year, on the other hand, 73 cents of every total tax dollar paid by all the taxpayers of Canada will be taken by the dominion government, leaving only 27 cents of each total tax dollar available for both the provincial and the municipal governments.

When it is remembered that those provincial and municipal governments do many of the things that are most essential to the daily comfort and well-being of our people, and when it is remembered that the ability of those governments to carry out their responsibilities must depend upon the availability of financial resources, then I do suggest that the danger signs are already flying, and that the danger to the survival of our federal system should be in the minds of all hon. members when this subject is being considered. If there should be progressive invasion of the total tax field continuing at the same accelerating rate in the years ahead, it would not be long before the federal government would be so completely exhausting the available tax resources of Canada that no matter what the constitution said as to their responsibilities, duties and rights, the provincial governments and the municipal governments would find themselves mere annuitants of the dominion government. That is a situation which could be very much in the minds of all hon. members when the suggestion is made that on a businesslike basis, seeking nothing but increased administrative efficiency, there should be set up a commission which would have in its membership the very best brains available in Canada —and those are the very best brains available—so that they can examine this subject impartially, objectively and with no other purpose in mind than the improvement of the business methods of the business of the people of Canada.

Mr. Pouliot: Who are the best brains of Canada?

Mr. Sinnott: On the Liberal side.

Mr. Drew: I would be very happy if the hon. member for Temiscouata, in supporting the motion that I have to make, will suggest the names of those who should be on the commission.

Mr. Pouliot: I am not a mind reader.

Mr. Drew: In any event, may I suggest that what is put forward is a principle, and if the principle were accepted then the responsibility of naming those who would constitute the commission would be on the government, and I feel sure that the government would welcome suggestions from the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. Pouliot: Therefore your speech is purely academic.

Mr. Drew: No, my speech is far from academic. My speech is a speech devoted to an attempt to improve the business administration of the government of Canada. My speech is also one which brings my remarks within the rules of the house, and it is for that reason the motion is presented in the form in which it will now be read.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is closely political.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier)—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): But perhaps I am not a good judge.

Mr. Drew: Oh, there is no better judge in the House of Commons than the Minister of Public Works, when it comes to doing something for political considerations. And I have no doubt the reason he interjected that remark is that probably in—well, shall I say, six constituencies—he has been subjected to certain very recent and vigorous demands.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh no; Mr. Speaker, on a point of order I must point out that I have not been subjected to any pressure, from one party or another, for any of those elections. I have not been in those ridings—although I may be in one where the hon. member spoke yesterday.

Mr. Drew: I feel sure the minister would be welcomed there, because if he did go there some of those who are under the impression that requests have been made to him would be able to present their requests in person. Because most certainly the suggestion is being made not only that recommendations have been made but that promises have certainly been given.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, no, Mr. Speaker. Again, on a point of order, the leader of the opposition will have to take my word that I have made no promises. I avoid making them while there are by-elections going on. I would not do that.

Mr. Drew: Possibly that genial smile of the Minister of Public Works misled some of those who were in conversation with him.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): They are not that naïve.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Did I understand the minister to say that the leader of the opposition had spoken yesterday?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It may have been Saturday; perhaps I made a mistake.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green):

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"consideration should be given to the matter of appointing a royal commission for the purpose of examining and making recommendations for:

1. Improving the organization and general efficiency of government administration.
2. Co-ordinating all public services and departmental activities of a similar nature.
3. Assuring to all members of the civil service full recognition of their responsibilities.

The said commission to make findings and recommendations and to report the same to parliament."

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the speech of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). I heard pretty much the same speech from him a few months ago, and I have enjoyed both of them.

The suggestion is that we employ the best brains in the country to examine into the work of government, and to set up a form of government that would be more efficient than the present. Well, I must say that if I know of any available good brains in the country I ask them to join the Department of Defence Production—as I asked them formerly to join the department of munitions and supply. I think many of the people recognized as leaders in industry in this country have served the government in one or other of those departments.

And I have not been alone in doing this; other departments have followed the same practice.

Mr. Pouliot: And the treasury benches.

Mr. Howe: I have a feeling that we have had expert advice, most certainly in those sections of government that constitute the great spending departments; and I believe we have taken full advantage of the expert advice we have been able to draw from outside the public service.

But I am not admitting for one moment that the heads of the civil service in Canada do not represent the best business brains in our country. I think that in the permanent service of Canada we have men who are the equals of men in private business, so far as the efficient operation of the business with which they are associated is concerned. And I venture to say that a great number of businessmen who at times have been in the service of the government would support me in that view. Now, today—

Mr. Drew: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Howe: No; please do not interrupt. I did not interrupt you.

Mr. Drew: I did not wish to interrupt.

Mr. Howe: A most extraordinary comparison has been made today between the expenditures of government in the year 1938-39 and the year 1951-52. In the first place the gross national product of Canada in 1938-39 was between $5 billion and $5,500 million. The gross national product for the years 1951-52 was $21,400 million. I suggest we should take into consideration the fact that the productivity of Canada which, after all, is the responsibility of the government of this country, has more than quadrupled in that period of time.

Then, 1938 was the year before preparations for war were undertaken. It was a year of minimum expenditures for armed services, a year before there was any active preparation for war. Since that time we have been through a great war that has added tremendously to the debt of Canada, and we are now engaged in defence preparations which, while not on the scale of those of the great war, are still on a scale unthought of in the year 1938.

It is well to remember that since 1938 this or preceding parliaments have added expenditures amounting to more than a billion dollars a year for social services, which were not included in departmental estimates in 1938. It is also well to keep in mind that in the year 1951-52, the year used for purposes of comparison, in the neighbourhood of $2 billion is being spent for defence production and defence. Therefore I suggest that to compare the expenditures of 1938 with those of 1951-52 is a comparison which has no validity whatever.

There has been mention of professional services. In ordinary peacetime outside professional services employed by government are not extensive. Government departments prepare plans for and supervise the construction of public buildings, and few outside services are required. However, at a time when defence production is at its maximum, extensive professional services are required. Practically all defence designing is carried out by architects retained by the government for that purpose. Designs for artillery projects and for many other special defence products, such as motor vehicles, are prepared by professional men brought in from industry for that purpose, because they have the special skills required. Therefore I think there can be no validity in the comparison that is made with regard to professional services retained by the government in 1938-39 and those retained in 1951-52.

With regard to travelling expenses, in 1938-39 we had no army in Korea which was travelling back and forth between Canada and that country; we had no army in Germany; we had no headquarters in England and we had but few travelling expenses associated with defence such as are included in the 1951-52 estimates.

I doubt if travelling, except for defence, is any more extensive now than it was in 1939. The cost of travelling has increased—we all know that it has for private individuals also. I suggest that if we eliminated all other travel that was not incidental to government in 1939 we would find that the travelling expenses of this period differ from the travelling expenses in 1938 only in relation to the increased cost of that travel.

Then in the matter of telephones and telegraphs, here again we have teletype service to the United Kingdom for defence purposes, as well as a teletype service to Washington where we have an extensive military personnel. There is a teletype service to Japan and all the other services in the way of communications that must be kept up when you have an army in the field and defence equipment spread pretty well around the world.

Then we talk about films. We had no film board in 1938-39. This was a service established in later years; whether it was wisely done or not I do not know. I must say that personally I am not a great advocate of an extensive excursion into films by the government of Canada. However, there are others in this house, probably the majority of the members, who are in favour of that excursion. If we want the government in the film business, we have to pay the bill. Why complain that we are spending more on films in 1951-52 than we did in 1938-39? Of course we are.

Now we speak of temporary civil servants and the suggestion that all civil servants should be made permanent. I suggest that at the proper time they are made permanent. I am the head of a department that has no permanent civil servants; all are temporary unless they have been transferred from permanent positions in other departments. That is as it should be. We are not going to carry on defence production for ever and I regard the department as temporary. I hope I shall live long enough and be long enough in the public service to wind it up as I had the privilege of winding up the department of munitions and supply after the last war. Surely my hon. friend does not want the men and women in my department to be made permanent.

It is customary when a man comes into a department that he shall be considered temporary for a sufficient period to allow the civil service commission to judge whether he is qualified for a permanent place in the civil service. Surely it would not be a step in the direction of efficiency to eliminate that probationary period and say that whenever a man entered the service he must be permanent from the time he signed on the payroll.

We have in Canada a civil service commission which I believe is competent to deal with personnel matters. The commission makes periodic surveys of every department in Ottawa and recommends changes in personnel or in the size of the establishment in order to bring about greater efficiency in the use of personnel. I believe that that commission is competent and I do not think the best brains in Canada would do a much better job in a short length of time than the civil service commission can do by working year in and year out, month in and month out on that one particular problem of bringing about efficiency in the use of personnel in government departments.

Then we have the treasury board to scrutinize every expenditure of government. I do not know about the best brains in Canada, but I doubt if you will find a more competent or devoted civil servant than Mr. Bryce, the assistant deputy minister of finance who heads the permanent staff of the treasury board. Mr. Bryce does not function alone. He has a staff of expert accountants and financial men who deal with every expenditure made by the government. Possibly you might be able to get from the great brains of Canada men with a wider reputation but I doubt if you will get men who would take on the detailed day to day job and do it any better than it is being done today by the treasury board under the supervision of a committee of cabinet headed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott).

We have had these great sweeping movements in Canada before. I am not very good on dates, but I think it was in the twenties that a move was made to bring in great brains from the outside to reorganize the government of Canada. A firm from Chicago was brought in, and here again I do not remember the name.

Mr. McIlraith: Griffenhagen.

Mr. Howe: Do you remember the year?

Mr. McIlraith: 1919.

Mr. Howe: That would be under Mr. Meighen's government. The report of Griffenhagen's firm is available. I was not associated with the government service at the time, although I had been in the government service years before but I took great interest in the operations of the Griffenhagen firm. The tension within the civil service grew so great after the government had retained this firm that the problem of the government became to find a way of winding up the work in order to send the investigators back to Chicago. But that was not done until chaos had been created in every branch of the civil service. I suggest that any hon. member who wants to bring in a committee of great brains should consider the experience of the Meighen government in that connection and study the record of the Griffenhagen firm in doing that particular job.

We have a different system of government in Canada than that in the United States. It is true that the Hoover commission was appointed in the United States and recommended a reorganization of the government. However, it then devolved upon congress to carry out that reorganization and so far as I am aware congress has acted only to a very limited extent. It is my belief that the savings indicated in the Hoover report as being possible have not been made.

As I say, we have a different form of government in Canada than they have in the United States. It is the duty of this parliament to examine the organization of the departments of government and the expenditures made by those departments. You have before you, in the current estimates of the departments, a record of every expenditure that can be made in 1952-53; you have the name and salary of every civil servant in the government service, and the details of his duties. Any hon. member of the house has the right to criticize any department and to ask the minister any question that can be invented. It is the duty of the minister to be here accompanied by his officials and ready to answer every question that can be asked.

I would be surprised if it were possible to make savings on the scale indicated by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). In the seventeen years I have been in this house I have never found that an examination of the estimates has led to any very substantial reduction in the expenditures recommended by the government. I am not suggesting that these reductions have not been made because it is not practical to make them. It is practical to make reductions if a majority so wishes. I do suggest that the estimates, after they have been scrutinized by the responsible ministers and by treasury board, are in a form that does not permit of any obvious or substantial savings such as could be determined by any commission, even though made up of the best brains in Canada.

I have no objection to investigations. During two periods I have been the greatest spender in the government service. During the last war I was responsible for the expenditure of about $13 billion, and before this preparedness period is over I suppose I will be responsible for the expenditure of another $5 billion. I welcome any investigation of that expenditure that parliament can arrange. As a matter of fact throughout the war years we had a committee on defence expenditures sitting continuously while the house was in session, examining those expenditures.

Mr. Coldwell: And it sat between sessions.

Mr. Howe: Yes, and it sat between sessions, as my hon. friend has said. We facilitated any investigation the committee cared to undertake. If they wanted to investigate a particular plant we arranged a trip to the plant and made the plant officers available. That type of investigation was quite all right. It kept my officers on their toes. It was an indication to them that they had better have their facts and files in shape since they might have to face that committee at any time. I am glad indeed that another committee on defence expenditures is sitting, for here again I believe it will have a salutary effect on my department. By the same token, if I believed an outside commission composed of great brains, or a more competent body than was available within this House of Commons, could do a better job I would welcome any investigation such a commission might make.

As I say, however, we try to bring within the department men who are drawn from business, who have a record of success in business and a record of efficiency in operation. We make such men responsible for expenditures. Not long ago we brought the Gordon company in on a particular problem; they are efficiency experts in Toronto. A report was prepared on the salaries and organization of the personnel of government departments. That report was submitted, and it has been implemented. Salaries were adjusted accordingly, and today the Gordon report forms the background of the scale of salaries in all government departments. That was a useful service; it took several months, but it was a limited job. That firm carried out its instructions and used a number of its personnel to examine the work of the senior officials of the service, and suggested improvements in the organization and appropriate salary scales commensurate with the responsibilities of each officer.

Mr. Fulton: How long ago was that?

Mr. Howe: Just after the war, when the departments were being reorganized back to a peacetime basis.

I do not know that I can usefully add any more to this discussion. I do suggest that there is no call for the adoption of the motion that has been moved by the leader of the opposition. In my opinion he has given no supporting facts which would help him establish his thesis that a royal commission could do a useful job in reorganizing the government service at a time when the services of our leading civil servants are largely engaged in defence preparations, and when that situation extends not only to the immediate departments concerned with such preparation but to most other departments of the government. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I sincerely trust the motion of the leader of the opposition will not carry.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): At first glance, Mr. Speaker, there is something quite attractive and quite plausible about a proposal of the sort contained in this resolution. The Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) has made a number of the criticisms I had in mind when listening to the speech of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). Apart from the attraction it may have to the man on the street, apart from the fact that it is what I might call a plausible suggestion, nonetheless we have to bear in mind that the establishment of a royal commission for the purposes outlined in this amendment in effect would be an abrogation of the duties—not the rights but the duties—of this parliament. If we as members of parliament have any real function in this house it is that we must control the finances and the administration of this country; yet here it is proposed that we abrogate those responsibilities and place them in the hands of a royal commission. For that reason I would oppose the amendment.

As a matter of fact it has been possible to move this amendment this afternoon because, under our system of government, when we are discussing the administration of the government and its financial responsibilities we as private members have the right to introduce any subject we wish and to move any amendment we feel is in the interests of this house and the country. I assume that is why the leader of the opposition has moved this amendment, because he feels it is in the interests of the country. Certainly he knows he has the right to do so. But I say the first obligation and indeed the first right of this house is to control those things that come under the heading of administration, particularly the provision of money to enable that administration to be carried on.

At times it is a good thing to hire efficiency experts. As the minister indicated a few minutes ago, the government hired such experts to advise it on some of the departmental questions in connection with civil service appointments and responsibilities. Other governments have done the same thing. At present I believe the government of British Columbia has a group of efficiency experts working along similar lines. The government of Saskatchewan went into their civil service through efficiency experts, just as the minister indicated the government of Canada did when it appointed the Gordon company to do that job. But I believe we have to be careful in this parliament lest we approve of government by order in council; and I think an equal evil would be government by royal commission. A royal commission under some circumstances can perform a very useful function. If the leader of the opposition were this afternoon moving for the appointment of a royal commission to inquire into some particular alleged extravagance of the government or something of that sort, then I think the house would be well advised to consider such a proposal and to support it. Every one of us, at least on the opposition side of the house, should be anxious to promote the greatest measure of economy possible.

I am in agreement with some of the criticisms that have been made by the leader of the opposition. I have observed what I thought to be unnecessary travel, for example, in connection with the Department of National Defence. In my goings and comings across this country from Saskatchewan to Ottawa or from Ottawa to some other place, I have observed a number of servicemen. In fact, one of the conductors on one of the trains said to me that if it were not for the constant movement of men going down east for sometimes as little as two or three days training or going west for the same purpose, there would be very few passengers. This was true of the train on which I was at that time. That sort of economy is the responsibility of the government. We on the opposition side of the house, and indeed those on the government side of the house, must hold the government responsible when matters of that sort are criticized.

When there is a particular inquiry to be made, commissions may perform a useful function, but royal commissions with blanket terms of reference are not as useful. The one that was appointed in Canada in 1919 did nothing. Following world war I there was in the United Kingdom what was called the Geddes commission, sometimes called the Geddes axe, and all it did was to recommend that social services, which were in a very primitive condition, should be restricted. So far as the Hoover commission is concerned, the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) was quite right when he pointed out that the forms of government in our two countries are not only substantially different but in many respects quite different. For example, from day to day we have the ministers who are responsible for the administration of the various departments sitting on the floor of this house. Any hon. member, whether he sits on the front bench or the back bench of any part of this house, whether he sits in the government party or in the opposition parties, may rise and question the minister responsible whenever he thinks he has an urgent matter upon which he wishes to question him.

Then, too, when the expenditures of the department are before the house in the form of estimates, any member can rise in his place and question the minister regarding any expenditure of that department. This cannot happen in congress because the members of the president's cabinet are not members of the congress or of the senate. They are persons who are chosen by the president as his advisers, and are not directly responsible as our ministers are responsible to our House of Commons. The president's advisers are responsible directly to him and indirectly, if you like, to congress through appearances before the committees of congress. The conditions are very different indeed. So far as a committee like the defence expenditures committee is concerned, when it was established we supported it and we will support it again. But we have two committees at least which, if they are doing their job as they should do it—and this house should insist that they should have the right to do it—make suggestions of this sort quite unnecessary. We have the defence expenditures committee and the public accounts committee. If these two committees function properly, and members of parliament are doing their duties as members of parliament, these committees should do all that it is proposed a royal commission of this description could do.

If we cannot do the job, then we admit we are failing in the obligations that we have assumed as members of this house. I know how difficult it is in a situation such as we have at the moment, when the government has an overwhelming majority. The house always has the right to withdraw confidence from the government of the day. But even if we felt that they were not carrying out the administration as we thought it should be carried out, I imagine we would have a very difficult job to persuade a majority of the members of this house to express want of confidence in the administration. This is a weakness, but it cannot be remedied by a royal commission; it can only be remedied by the people of Canada. So long as the people of Canada elect governments with overwhelming majorities, so long will it be impossible for those of us who want to criticize the administration to withdraw the confidence of the house from the government of the day. However, that goes right back to the people of Canada who, wisely or unwisely, chose to elect a parliament with that composition. I think it was unwise, but of course that opinion is not shared by many other members of the house.

This is a parliamentary institution, and I think that whenever we remove from this parliament to a commission or committee something that is the proper function of this parliament, we weaken this institution in the eyes of the people. In these particular times with the threats to democratic governments and democratic institutions across the world, we should be doing everything we can to strengthen those institutions rather than to weaken them. I know that, as the leader of the opposition has said, probably if we went into all the details of the activities of the government we might find duplication. I know that there are certain duplications which are part of the constitutional set-up of this country. We have two houses of parliament where we have two official languages. An hon. member suggests that we have two post offices in this building, and that always appeared to me to be a duplication of effort. We have an independent House of Commons and an independent Senate. The Senate demands its rights, and the House of Commons demands its rights.

Mr. Pouliot: That is pure British tradition.

Mr. Coldwell: Of course it is British tradition. The two houses, of course, involve that kind of duplication. There are other duplications that we could find, but in this respect I agree with the minister, that the group of financial experts and economists who are giving day to day attention to these matters are men in whom many of us who know them have the utmost confidence. The Minister of Defence Production mentioned Mr. Bryce. I do not know if hon. members of the house know the background of Mr. Robert Bryce, but if they did they would realize that he is a public servant imbued with the idea of service to his country when he might have been making a tremendous amount of money for himself privately had he cared to do so.

Fortunately for Canada we have in our civil service a large group of that type of person. I am glad that we have been able to gather into our departments—external affairs, finance, the Bank of Canada, the social services and so on—men and women who, I am convinced, are anxious to serve their country to the best of their ability in the fields in which they think they can be of most service, not to themselves,—although I have no doubt that they get a great satisfaction out of it—but to their country at this time.

I am therefore of the opinion that this amendment should not be approved by the house. I have given the reasons for my opinion. The principal reasons I gave at the beginning, namely that it would be an abrogation of our duties as a parliament and it would tend further to undermine the confidence of the people in this institution which, with all its faults and defects, I think is yet the best kind of institution that man has been able to devise for his own self-government.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has brought before us this afternoon undoubtedly is a question with which the general public have been greatly concerned over the past several months. I think that the leader of the opposition has spoken of some of the fears and the doubts perhaps that may be in the minds of the people. I know that I have run across a great deal of uneasiness as I have travelled amongst the public and have talked with them. That uneasiness is easy to understand.

In the first place they see our country in peacetime, apparently—at least in what they have considered was peacetime—raising by taxation and spending over $4 billion a year. That is something which is unprecedented in Canadian history if not in the history of the world. That fact alone makes them feel uneasy. To bear the burden of taxation they now bear in peacetime leads them to suppose that all is not well. Their minds naturally turn to parliament where their representatives meet, and they wonder why something is not being done by their representatives here.

The second cause for some uneasiness in their minds is, of course, the information that gets out to them with respect to the extremely large amount of money that is now being expended each year on social services. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance just the other day, I think it was, emphasized the fact that there were transfer payments by this government to provincial governments and through them to the public of something like $1½ billion a year for social security alone. That is something that the public mind has not yet adjusted itself to; and for some time it is going to be a problem for the people to make that adjustment. They naturally turn to the members of parliament to investigate, to assure themselves that all things are above suspicion, and to report back to them.

There is also the suspicion that all is not well in government when the people see such things as those that have happened at Petawawa and in the Department of National Defence from one end of this country to the other. You cannot blame them for feeling suspicious.

Mr. Byrne: Why connect that matter with social services?

Mr. Low: I did not hear what the hon. member said, but it must be inane; otherwise he would not have said it.

Mr. Byrne: I said: Why connect that matter with social services?

Mr. Low: The fact is that there is considerable misgiving on the part of the general public today, and something will have to be done to set their minds at ease.

A good deal has been said here this afternoon about the question of investigating the whole of the government's set-up and the leader of the opposition has moved, to the motion to go into supply, an amendment asking that consideration be given to the matter of appointing a royal commission for the purpose of examining and making recommendations on a number of things; I will not take the time to read them. But in the course of the debate thus far suggestions have been made to the effect that we have all the machinery necessary to make the investigation and to find out all these things that we need to know, as representatives of the people. We may have, Mr. Speaker, but up to this time we have depended largely upon the committee method of investigation. In my judgment and experience, there are some serious weaknesses to the committee method of investigation. In the past those investigations have left a great deal to be desired.

I have had some experience on both sides of this thing, Mr. Speaker. Since 1945, I have had experience on the opposition side of parliament; and up to that time for a period of ten years I had experience on the government side elsewhere. I have therefore seen committees in action from both sides. I have come to the conclusion that committee investigations are not very useful when it comes to bringing out information in connection with such things as we now face in, let us say, the Department of National Defence. As a matter of fact, they do not resolve anything very definitely at any time. I am not speaking of the usefulness of a committee in examining estimates. I think that is a proper function of a committee; and our experience here in connection with the external affairs committee has shown that a committee of that kind can perform a useful function. In that committee I think we have done a good job. But we have not had under consideration such things as are named in the amendment that was moved this afternoon by the leader of the opposition.

There are, of course, a good many weaknesses in the committee method of investigation or inquiry, but I am going to take time to mention only two which, in my judgment, stand out. In the first place, the membership of these committees is weighted to favour the government.

Mr. Byrne: Why should they not be?

Mr. Low: As a consequence, the party that is on the defensive is always able to out-vote the people who are making the accusations or who may make accusations. You cannot get anywhere in that way. No matter how bad the information may be, no matter how damning of the government it may become, the opposition has no power whatever in those committees and the reports that are brought back to this house simply mean nothing.

An hon. Member: A whitewash.

Mr. Low: Surely it is a whitewash. That is the first thing. The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) says: "Why should they not be?"

Mr. Byrne: I would just draw to the hon. member's attention the fact that in Alberta the membership is heavily weighted on the government side, and questions have been evaded there much more seriously than they have been here in the House of Commons.

Mr. Low: Mr. Speaker, it just happens that we are not discussing the province of Alberta just now. In the second place, I said that I am going on my experience both there and here. It is just as serious there as it is here. It is just as serious in the hon. member's own province as it is here or in the province of Alberta. The important thing that I am trying to bring out is that the committee method is unsatisfactory first because those committees are appointed in such a way as to be heavily weighted in favour of the government. In those circumstances no possible findings of any consequence would ever get back or be reported back into the House of Commons.

Mr. Blue: Who demanded that the committee be set up, the opposition forces or the government?

Mr. Low: Mr. Speaker, if that has any bearing I will say that if the ones on the opposition had not asked that it be set up, it never would have been; and secondly, even when their requests are granted, the government makes it impossible for the committees to be of any use.

The second reason, Mr. Speaker, why these house committees are practically useless is this: A committee inquiry all too frequently assumes the nature of a political campaign. I sat in on some of the meetings of the committee that is examining into the foot-and-mouth disease for just a few brief moments the other day. I am not going to say anything about that, sir, but when I came away I was under the impression that the Saskatchewan election was being fought there.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: From both sides.

Mr. Low: Yes. I am not saying it was just the one side; but the point is the election was being fought there, and as a consequence I doubt very much whether, when the committee's findings are brought in, they will be worth anything to anybody. I will say that the report that comes back to this house will be watered down until it will be—well, it will not even be milk white.

I quite realize that it is the duty and the responsibility of the members of this House of Commons to be the watch dogs of everything that is being done, the watch dogs on behalf of the people. It is our duty to scrutinize expenditure, and to do everything that we possibly can to protect public property and to safeguard and to save the taxpayers' money. Otherwise we cannot justify our existence. I know that. But I want to say one other thing in that connection, Mr. Speaker, which I think every hon. member has thought of at one time or another, whether he is on the government side of the house or on the opposition side. A number of practices and habits have grown up in our conduct of affairs in this parliament which make it almost impossible for the members to perform the function for which they were sent here. I refer, for instance, to the outmoded archaic rules of this house. They are outmoded, and as a consequence my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) is getting a furrowed brow long before the time that he should.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Nobody agrees to change them.

Mr. Low: He is worried about getting things through the house.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): How?

Mr. Low: Because of the outmoded rules we do not make the progress that he would like to see, and that many others would like to see. But because of the fact that so much time is given to other parts of our business we never get down to the consideration of the estimates of the departments until about the time when there is a whole lot of effort on the government side of the house to hurry things on, to get us away home. There seems to be a desire to get us out of here so that other things can be done. I do not blame them; they have other work to do; but, Mr. Speaker, if this parliament is what it is supposed to be, it will sit here until the business of the house and of the business of the country is completed, and in a satisfactory manner, no matter how long it takes. But the haste to get through the estimates at the tail end of the session makes it impossible for the members to do the job which the government spokesman today said we ought to be doing, and which the leader of the C.C.F. party said this afternoon we ought to be doing.

I have tried to keep up with affairs in this house, and I have tried to get time to go into research and find out for myself exactly what is going on, and where it would be possible to save money, to avoid duplication, and to carry on the business of the country in a businesslike manner. But I want to say here, Mr. Speaker, that it becomes at times intolerable for any hon. member; if he is in earnest and sincere he finds his time so divided, so rushed and so regimented that he cannot do the research that is necessary. We on the opposition side of the house are denied the adequate staffs to do our research for us. Some hon. members may have access to something that I do not know, but believe me it has been very difficult for me to get access to the kind of assistance that I require to make a comprehensive investigation into the things that I would like to see investigated.

Our time is all too limited. I know, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Denis: Too much talk.

Mr. Low: Well, perhaps there is, but I will just say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member cannot blame me for too much talk. I do not speak too often in this house, even if I am the leader of a group. I try to speak only as frequently as I feel it is absolutely essential in the interests of the people.

Mr. Denis: I mean the opposition as a whole.

Mr. Low: Well, I will take up that challenge for just a moment. What are we here for? I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, that there has been altogether too much of an attitude on the part of the government that the opposition is just a bunch of nuisances. I will tell you right now that if the opposition would just band themselves together, as I have suggested on a number of occasions, and organize themselves carefully, they would get back from this government powers that have been arrogated to themselves by a group who disregard the rights of parliament. We will never get them until we unify our efforts in this opposition for this purpose.

It seems to me that one of the important things that we have to do right now is to restore to parliament its rightful place, its sovereignty that has been stolen away gradually, step by step, by a government that disregards the sovereignty of the people.

I suggest, sir, that there are two things of course that we might do. Certainly I acknowledge them. The first thing I think we have to do is to change the rules and the practices of this house so that there can be time and opportunity for full investigation. I have been advocating that for a long time, but somehow or other we have not got very far with it.

Mr. McIlraith: The opposition will not agree.

Mr. Low: There must be careful vigilance, extreme vigilance, on the part of the individual members of the house, as well as a desire to accept more individual responsibility. But at the same time I do feel that there is much in what the leader of the opposition has said; that there is need for some kind of investigation into the whole organization of government. The people are asking for it. I think we owe it to the people to see to it that everything is made clear to them in the information that they require to understand and to know. It should be made clear to them.

As far as I am concerned I am not sure whether a royal commission would do the job sufficiently well or not. I do say that some judicial or semi-judicial investigation is necessary. It is essential. Perhaps that is exactly what the leader of the opposition had in his mind. I am acquainted with what the Hoover commission did in the United States, and while it has been argued here this afternoon that there is a great difference between the government organization in the United States and that in Canada, I cannot see that the difference is sufficient to turn down a suggestion of this kind. Whether it is a royal commission or some other sort of investigation I am all for it. But at the same time, Mr. Speaker, I think we have all to resolve, and resolve very definitely, that we are going to see to it that the rights of the private members in this house are respected, and that the sovereignty of this house be returned to parliament from government members who have taken it away, and that it be accomplished before long.

In the next place, Mr. Speaker, I must say that the government will have to see to it that every means is made available to the private members of this house to enable them to get information, to enable them to assemble the information they do receive, and then to place it before this house on behalf of the people.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few words to say, and I would refer first of all to the very able speech of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) in which he mentioned a supposed disregard of the rights of private members. I have been sitting here for twenty-eight years, and I have never noticed that—except when I was discussing the conscription bill in committee, at which time I complained about the chairman and said he should be changed. I did not have any support on that occasion. However, with that exception I have never noticed any disregard of the rights of private members in the House of Commons. That is the first point.

Then the hon. member suggested a change in the rules, and said that all the rules are obsolete. That is an unfair statement. The rules are good, the hon. member would find, if he would take the trouble to read them.

Mr. Low: I have read them.

Mr. Pouliot: A comparatively small number of them apply to the discussion of public matters, and they are not difficult to understand. I am not speaking of the heavy compendiums no one reads; I am referring only to the standing orders of the house.

Mr. Low: I have read them.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, I know. Then I am sure the hon. member will agree that they are simple and easy to understand. They have governed discussion in committee and in the house since confederation because, with the exception of the rules applying to the length of speeches, there have been very few changes.

Mr. Low: I was not complaining so much about the standing orders. I had in mind the fact that a number of practices and habits have grown up in the conduct of the business of the house.

Mr. Pouliot: In answer to that I would say that we can rely upon the wisdom of the Chair, because we now have a Speaker who, according to my experience, has been without parallel. He is our safeguard and our protection. I feel safe when I speak under his shadow.

The hon. member said that there should be more vigilance, and a greater desire on the part of members of the opposition to assume more individual responsibilities. This is fine. I agree with him on that. I have the greatest respect for my colleagues in the house, and must say I was greatly surprised when I read the amendment offered this afternoon by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew).

I wonder if it is necessary to put my glasses on in order to see those brilliant men who sit behind him. I think my glasses are not necessary, because I can see that some of those gentlemen are in the house, while others are engaged outside the house in important parliamentary business. But there they are, valuable assets to the House of Commons. I will not say they are non-entities; they are good members of parliament. I know and respect them, although I do not agree with them. But I wonder why the leader of the opposition is suggesting that a royal commission be substituted for them.

An hon. Member: He wants better brains.

Mr. Pouliot: I cannot understand it; it is far from being complimentary to them. I see the young and junior super-excellency over there, taking notes—and probably he will speak after me. Naturally he will say that his pride has been offended, because in his request for a royal commission his leader has forgotten him.

Then there is the national president of the Progressive Conservative party, a gentleman who sits in the house and is also a member of a learned faculty—and that is a term applied to both law and medicine. In this instance however I refer to the law. He is a brilliant lawyer and a man of experience, but he has been disregarded by his leader.

There are many others—bright young men who were elected at the last by-elections, and are doing well in the house. But they are the forgotten men. Then there are others whom I have known for a long time. There is the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), who is a frontbencher, and the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black), who is also a frontbencher. These are men of experience, leaders in their party, wise men. And, besides that, there is the charming lady who could give advice about matters pertaining to the weaker sex.

Mr. Knowles: Careful, now.

Mr. Pouliot: It is complete. Yet all that has been disregarded by the leader of the opposition when he suggests that for his followers there should be a royal commission substituted, to do the work that otherwise they would do in the house.

Mr. Sinnott: A one-man party.

Mr. Pouliot: No, a one-commission party. Perhaps this is an act of modesty on the part of the leader of the opposition, because he could say, "I can do it all alone." But he has suggested that he would like to have the assistance of a royal commission instead of relying, as he should, upon the faithful support of the members of his party.

A royal commission?—and the purpose of the commission would be to improve "the organization and general efficiency of government administration." What does he mean by that? Does he mean a changing of the constitution? Does he mean that he would send investigators of the civil service commission to inspect the treasury benches and to decide who should tell whom what to do?

And then the reference to "general efficiency"—oh, "efficiency"! I remember an occasion when one of his predecessors in the leadership of the party received a decoration. I warned Mr. Speaker to be careful and to hold the chair well, so that he would not fall from it. Because that former leader of the Progressive Conservative party had been given by the then minister of national defence—do you know what, sir? He had been given a medal of efficiency! Yes, he had been given a medal of efficiency, and it brought general laughter throughout the country. I suggest that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) ought not to give a medal of efficiency to the present leader of the opposition for the speech he made this afternoon.

His second suggestion was to co-ordinate all public services and departmental activities of a similar nature. Well, this is centralization at its worst. The Tory party has been known to be the party of centralization, and we have proof of it in the pudding the leader of the opposition has been baking this afternoon.

Then, in his last suggestion the leader of the opposition wants to assure to all members of the civil service full recognition of their responsibilities. It is not members of the civil service who should be cognizant of their responsibilities. It is the leader of the opposition and his supporters who should take their responsibilities and, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said so wisely, ought not to compromise the future of parliamentary institutions.

I think the amendment of the hon. gentleman is untimely and uncalled for. If hon. members opposite have any ground for complaint against the government they have only to state them boldly in the house in a constructive manner. It is the duty of the opposition to offer constructive criticism. But when they complain about certain things, when the time comes to show that they are familiar with British parliamentary traditions, that they want to be true to the traditions of the great British leaders at Westminster, they fail lamentably.

I give them credit for their good will and good intentions, but they should reform. If parliamentary principles are to exist in this house the opposition should be stronger, not precisely in numbers but in action. I say to hon. members of the Conservative party that they should be rather humiliated by the fact that the two other groups, the C.C.F. group and the Social Credit, offer much more constructive criticism in the House of Commons of Canada.

Whether the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) is in order is not material. If it is not in order I shall not have the satisfaction of voting against it. I am all for parliamentary institution. The leader of the opposition would do better by sharing his work with his own supporters in the House of Commons, all able men, than to try to do the work alone with the aid of a royal commission such as he has suggested this afternoon.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that members of the house will have been touched, not to say edified, by the solicitude shown for their privileges and prerogatives, for their rights and duties by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe), and more particularly by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). The hon. member for Temiscouata and the Minister of Trade and Commerce of course are not best known for their qualities of consistency. They have qualities for which they are well known, but unfortunately that is not one of them.

When the hon. member for Temiscouata and the Minister of Trade and Commerce show on this occasion, when it happens to suit the particular argument that they wish to advance, this solicitude for the prerogatives of parliament; when particularly the hon. member for Temiscouata states that members of the opposition should be hurt by the suggestion put forward by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) that a royal commission should be appointed to carry on functions which the hon. member says should be carried on by parliament, which disregards the functions of parliament and all its members, I think we might well ask these hon. gentlemen to look first at their own situation.

There is a well-known biblical saying which is repeated in many forms throughout the bible, the most apt being the short phrase, —physician, heal thyself. The other one, to paraphrase the bible, is that one short answer where we are admonished for being overconcerned with the conduct of our neighbours and fellow men, particularly if we are concerned with their faults. It is that if we would take out the beam from our brother's eye we should first remove the mote from our own.

Mr. Knowles: It is the other way around.

Mr. Fulton: I said I was paraphrasing the bible.

An hon. Member: Why twist it?

Mr. Fulton: The sense remains the same. I ask the hon. member and those who applauded him to answer me this: If it is a slur upon the rights and privileges and duties of members of parliament to appoint a royal commission or a commission of any kind to look into things which are also the concern of parliament, how then must Saskatchewan members feel at the tremendous slight which they have suffered because this government has appointed a commission to examine into the Saskatchewan river project?

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: How does the hon. member who has just interrupted me feel in his innermost heart about his recommendations with regard to the South Saskatchewan river project being no better than those of a royal commission? I understand that this government has been receiving representations over a long time from Saskatchewan members with respect to getting ahead with this project. How does the hon. member feel when the government has seen fit to disregard his viewpoint? How does he feel when the government says, "Before we will be in position to judge whether or not the views put forward by the hon. member are really sound we must take the advice of a royal commission."

How does the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson) feel about it? How does the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Stewart) feel about it? How do all the other hon. members from Saskatchewan feel about it? I wonder how the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), the leader of the Liberal members from Saskatchewan, feels about it when he comes to apply the standards laid down by the member for Temiscouata and his colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who sits just two places away in the front row of the cabinet benches? What does he think of the government appointing a commission?

Of course it is not the first time that these two ministers have expressed divergent opinions and probably it will not be the last. I wonder how the Minister of Agriculture will feel when he returns to the house and finds that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has indicated that the views of the Minister of Agriculture on the Saskatchewan river project have been completely ignored and cast aside by the appointment of this royal commission?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, before the house rose at six o'clock I had pointed out to the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that the suggestion they had made that somehow or other there was a slight to the members of the opposition in this motion by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) that a royal commission should be appointed to examine into and consider the question of increasing the efficiency of governmental administration, was visited at least a hundredfold on their own heads. If there is any improper suggestion, which I do not for a moment admit, that the rights of members would be somehow interfered with by the appointment of such a commission, then I suggest we are in the interesting position of finding that all the Liberal members, particularly those from Saskatchewan, have been slighted by the fact that a commission has been appointed to inquire into the merits of the Saskatchewan river project, upon which a number of Liberal members from that province have expressed no uncertain views. I thought the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson), the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Dewar), who I remember interrupted me before dinner, and the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie), who also expressed an interest in the matter, might take up the matter with the hon. member for Temiscouata and the minister before making comments of that sort.

I also said, and I still feel, it would be very interesting to know how the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) who is the Saskatchewan leader of his party in this house, would feel with regard to the remark by his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce that to suggest the appointment of commissions to inquire into things which are at the same time of interest to the House of Commons was somehow or other to derogate from the responsibility of hon. members. But then those two ministers have shown themselves in the past well able on one occasion to express and on another to reconcile extremely divergent views; and although the country is left somewhat mystified as to just where it stands after hearing those conflicting views, nevertheless on the whole we are forced back to the conclusion from which we probably started, namely that however much other members of the government may talk and however much they may hold their own opinions, when it comes down to the issue it is the Minister of Trade and Commerce who really decides and runs this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fulton: I noticed that the applause came from private members, who were not joined by any members of the cabinet. So it is with the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, either in that role or as Minister of Defence Production, that I should like to deal for the next few moments.

The main subject of the minister's remarks was his contention that the appointment of a royal commission to consider ways and means of increasing the efficiency of government somehow or other would be a derogation from the rights and duties of parliament. In his speech this afternoon I must say the minister reminded me of nothing so much as an old and rather tired doctor who had a patient in a very serious condition, in fact on the point of death. This doctor, who had not taken a refresher course for some time, was not quite certain what ailed the patient. But while he did not know what was the trouble, he was very definite that the opinions of the younger consultants who had been called in were absolutely wrong. While he did not know quite what to prescribe, at least he said he knew the suggestions of his younger associates were wide of the mark. Therefore those suggestions were not adopted; the older doctor continued in charge of the case, but unfortunately the patient died. That is very much the situation we find here in this discussion of how we may improve the efficiency of government.

The minister has said that all the things being done at the present time by the government are the right things. Their prescriptions are correct. They have the best brains. They know better than anyone else how to run the country. Unfortunately the fact is that inefficiency in government is inescapable, and the effects upon the taxpayers of Canada in the constant increase in the taxes they have to pay, the ever mounting sums they have to dig out and fork over to the government, are cumulative. Unless something is done shortly the plight of the taxpayers will be extremely serious indeed. I think probably they will be able to develop a resistance to disease which will carry them through these difficult times, but I do suggest very earnestly that the government should not dismiss out of hand suggestions that efficiency might be improved, but should listen rather more seriously than they have shown an inclination to do in the course of this debate.

I regret to have to say that the leader of the C.C.F. party appears to be in somewhat the same category as members of the cabinet, particularly the Minister of Trade and Commerce. They were both quite certain that a commission is not the answer to this problem of how to increase efficiency in government service. They both took the position that to appoint a royal commission to inquire into this question somehow or other would be to derogate from the rights of parliament. Well, I know other hon. members will share my vivid recollection of the eager support the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) gave to the inquiries and considerations and indeed to the appointment of the Massey commission, which was a royal commission inquiring into the arts, letters and sciences. I would ask the hon. member and others of his party who support his views whether the subjects inquired into by that commission, including the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the national gallery of Canada and a number of others which could be mentioned, are not also under the jurisdiction of parliament. How does it happen then, if, as they now so fervently maintain, the appointment of a royal commission to investigate things which are also of interest to parliament is to derogate from the rights of parliament, that they supported the inquiries and recommendations of that royal commission?

Then, there was another one, the royal commission on transportation. Does the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage), who is saying something over there, suggest that national transportation policy is not a matter which falls within the jurisdiction of parliament?

Mr. Lesage: I was suggesting, Mr. Speaker, that I know the hon. member is too intelligent not to know the difference between the various commissions that he has mentioned, the difference in subject matter.

Mr. Fulton: I am grateful to the hon. member for the compliment, and I wish I could return it in kind, but apparently the hon. member is not able to distinguish between them. I come back to this question. The royal commission on transportation dealt with matters which are the responsibility of parliament, and are clearly within the realm of subjects with which parliament is supposed to deal. On that occasion, when it happened to suit their own political convenience, not one hon. member was heard to suggest that the appointment of that royal commission, with the conclusions or report of that royal commission, was in any sense a derogation from the prerogatives and privileges of parliament.

There was another commission, the MacQuarrie committee, appointed to inquire into the combines legislation, and particularly into the subject of resale price maintenance. The Combines Investigation Act is a creature of this parliament. We enacted it, and it is entirely within the purview of this parliament as to what should be done with that legislation; how it should be strengthened, and whether it should be varied. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) fervently supported the recommendations of that committee and the whole set-up of the committee to inquire into that legislation. Now when it happens to be embarrassing to the government—hon. members opposite are so frequently able to forget the views which they formerly held and expressed—we are told that to suggest the appointment of a royal commission to see in what way the efficiency of the administration can be increased is somehow or other to detract from the prerogatives of parliament.

Mr. Pouliot: None of those commissions were substitutes for Her Majesty's loyal opposition.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member is quite right. Indeed, in my view with respect particularly to one of those commissions, the MacQuarrie committee, their recommendations fell far short of the recommendations suggested by Her Majesty's loyal opposition, but I point out to the hon. member that on that occasion the recommendations of Her Majesty's loyal opposition were not the ones which were accepted by the government. What we are suggesting is that if on other occasions the government has ascribed such overriding advantages to royal commissions, their reports and recommendations, we find it difficult to understand why on this occasion there should be such a complete negation of the idea that a royal commission could do any good.

Mr. Pouliot: If the hon. gentleman permits—

Mr. Fulton: The answer to the problem which confronts us is to be found in the fact that this royal commission which the leader of the opposition has suggested would probably find things materially embarrassing to the government, and in its report it would be bound to bring in recommendations, with the evidence laid before it, that would certainly indicate the government has not been efficiently administering the affairs of this country. That is the only reason why, on this occasion, hon. members opposite show a complete reversal of the stand which they have taken in the past, and are now so anxious to suggest that this commission would derogate from the rights of parliament.

Mr. Pouliot: If the hon. gentleman permits, when he says I am quite right, I have nothing to add to his gracious speech.

Mr. Fulton: This afternoon the Minister of Trade and Commerce did deal with other aspects of this situation, apart from that aspect which I have just been discussing. He attempted to make light of and to ridicule the suggestion of the leader of the opposition, and he took particular objection to the fact that, in his remarks in support of his motion, the leader of the opposition had made a comparison between the level of government spending on various categories in the year 1938-39 and the level of spending on similar categories in the year 1951-52. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was at some pains to point out that this comparison did not hold water. I think those were his words. Unfortunately, here we have another illustration of the fact that on one occasion, when it suits its political convenience, the government will adopt a certain line of argument and reasoning, and on another occasion when it does not suit its political convenience but will mean embarrassment for the government to follow the same line, then it rejects that line of reasoning.

I want to point out to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and to the members of the house, that the basis for the comparison between the years 1938-39 and the years 1951-52 was suggested by the government itself. Last year the Senate finance committee inquired into this very subject of government expenditures. They asked the department officials to prepare a table from which they might assess the trends which are now evident. The departmental officials prepared their table, and the basis of their whole comparison was, firstly, the years 1938-39 and then, in comparable categories, the expenditures of the year then under review, 1951-52. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the government are going to reject that as a valid basis of comparison, then I should like to take another branch of the minister's argument this afternoon.

He pointed out that four years ago one of the departments of government had retained the Gordon firm to make an inquiry into the administrative affairs of that department. The minister spoke in glowing terms, indeed—I should not say very glowing terms—

Mr. Howe: The assignment of the Gordon firm was to evaluate the salaries of the civil servants, and to work out a scale of salaries in conformity with the functions being performed.

Mr. Fulton: I shall accept that limitation gladly. Whatever the purpose of that limited inquiry into one aspect of the affairs of one department, the fact is the minister indicated that inquiry produced some very good results. The point that emerges from this is that the inquiry, which took place only four years ago, was limited to the affairs of one department, and admittedly limited to a particular aspect of that department. But the minister himself said that in order to properly evaluate how things were being conducted in that respect they retained the services of an outside firm. All we are suggesting here is that the scope of an inquiry of that sort should be broadened in order to evaluate the efficiency with which the administrative affairs of government are being conducted, and that the government should retain the services of a commission. After all, Mr. Speaker, if the points which the minister made this afternoon in the course of his reply have any validity at all, and I am quite prepared to give them the full measure of validity, it is that an outside inquiry produced results which the government found helpful. Why then cannot the same principle be carried into effect on a broader basis? All we are suggesting here is not that a particular department should retain the services of a firm, because one department has no authority over another, but that a commission should investigate all the departments. The Minister of Trade and Commerce may think, and probably does think, that the departments of some of his colleagues are not being administered very efficiently. He has, however, much as he would like to have it, no direct authority to appoint a firm to inquire into the affairs of the other departments. It is quite open to the government to enlarge the scope of any such inquiry and by the appointment of a commission to have the administration of all departments in every aspect reported upon by a firm whose services might be found to be of some help.

In that connection the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is or was a businessman, suggests that somehow or other it would be an abrogation of the rights of parliament to appoint such a commission. Applying his own argument, I would ask the minister whether he would say that the board of directors of a company is abrogating its responsibilities and duties when it retains the services of a firm of efficiency experts to inquire into the internal administration of the company. The minister knows perfectly well that that is done on innumerable occasions throughout the whole business community of Canada.

In making that argument this afternoon the minister was, I suggest, making an argument which he knows perfectly well to be purely and simply a political argument divorced entirely from the merits of the subject under discussion. Indeed, when we suggest that a royal commission should be appointed to examine into this question, there is no suggestion whatsoever that, in their duties of scrutiny of the estimates and detailed scrutiny of every aspect of government expenditure, the members of parliament should in any way abate their energies or be less diligent in the discharge of that duty.

What we are suggesting—and hon. members opposite and members of the government know it perfectly well—is that the whole broad aspect and the many ramifications and details of government administration have multiplied so rapidly that, in the course of the type of discussion we have on the estimates, it is not possible to carry out the sort of inquiry that we have in mind. Therefore what we are suggesting is simply that, as is done in so many other cases when detailed aspects of government policy or administration are under review, a group of experts be retained to look into the question, to express their impartial and honest opinion as to whether or not any changes should be instituted, and to report accordingly. If it felt the proposals had any merit, it would still be the obligation of the government to put them into the form of legislative or other action. If they thought that the details of the report had any merit, it would still be the obligation of the opposition members and of every other member of parliament to scrutinize that report, and to discuss the details of it and to press for action in connection with the estimates or on any other occasion when the question might properly be raised.

To suggest that merely to ask a royal commission to examine into this situation and to report would be to abrogate the rights of parliament or to bring about a situation in which the responsibilities and duties of members would be lessened is to beg the whole question and to show that, in fact, the merits of the question are extremely embarrassing to the government. What they are trying to do is drag as many red herrings as possible across the trail so that it is impossible to carry on a sensible and definitive discussion.

Mr. Speaker, there are many aspects of this thing about which one might speak but, for the remaining few minutes of the remarks I have to make this evening, I want to discuss some of the financial implications of this subject which seem to me to indicate clearly and beyond dispute that it is time that a full-scale inquiry by a royal or other commission was made into this question of the efficiency of government administration.

The approach which I should like to make to that aspect of the subject is this. I should like to start with the oft-repeated statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that there is practically no room for economy in government spending because of the fact that, as he so often asserts, the large part of the government's spending at the present time is made up of what he calls uncontrollable expenditures. He therefore continually argues—and indeed he repeated it in the course of his budget speech this year—that the only room for adjustment, if we really want to make economies, is in those items of what are called special categories, namely such things as expenditures by the Department of National Defence, the Department of Defence Production, the civil defence items of the Department of National Health and Welfare, and the social services provided by the Department of National Health and Welfare.

When you analyse the argument of the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker, you are regrettably forced to the conclusion that his arguments here are as loose and inaccurate as they are in the generality of the statements which he makes. When you examine the estimates which have been placed before parliament this year, you find that, in this fiscal year as compared with last year, there is to be a net increase in spending by government of $605 million. It is true that this increase is accounted for mainly by the fact that the defence department is asking for $392 million more, and the health and welfare department for $252 million more.

The total increase asked for by all departments and agencies of the government is over $720 million. This is accounted for by 31 spending agencies of government. Thirteen departments or agencies are decreasing their spending by a total of $115 million. But when you examine this decrease of $115 million, Mr. Speaker, you find that it is largely illusory, because it is mainly accounted for by the fact that the Department of Finance has shown a reduction of approximately $100 million this year as compared to last year. The occasion of that reduction is that the five-year financial agreement with the provinces expires this June, so that only one-sixth of the amount normally payable under the agreements has been included in this year's main estimates. But, Mr. Speaker, that sort of accounting and that sort of presentation to us in the form of the estimates is nothing more or less than misleading because the Minister of Finance knows perfectly well that negotiations are now proceeding with regard to new financial agreements with the provinces and, in fact, at least one with my own province of British Columbia has already been concluded. Provision will certainly have to be made for these payments later on this year by means of supplementary estimates. But the Minister of Finance knows perfectly well now that he is going to have to make those provisions. For him to attempt to show a decline of $100 million in the estimates of his department is sheer nonsense.

Then when you look into this question further, Mr. Speaker, you find that there is already provision for increased payments to the province of British Columbia under the financial agreements. It therefore must surely be assumed that the agreements with the other provinces will not provide for any lesser scale of payment than was provided last year. If that is so, it follows that the $100 million cut now shown by the Department of Finance will be restored and probably increased before the end of the year. Therefore the total reduction of $115 million in the estimates will be wiped out and the net increase in spending by the government this year will total not $604 million but something like $720 million. Even when you allow for the fact that, of this $720 million, $644 million is accounted for by defence and increased old age pensions, and $14 million by the veterans affairs department through the medium of increased pensions to veterans, you still find the fact that there is an estimated net increase in controllable expenditures—not those uncontrollable items the minister referred to, but an increase in controllable expenditures of the order of $60 million in this fiscal year. With this fact in mind, in the light of the Minister of Finance's repeated statements that the most rigid economies are being insisted upon, and in the face of the already tremendous burden of taxes and the demands for reductions which have been voiced on behalf of the Canadian people, I think you can see that the minister's statements that they are exercising the most rigid economy and control on expenditure, and the statement repeated this afternoon by the Minister of Trade and Commerce without bringing before us any factual basis for that statement, are nothing more than idle vapourings.

Analysing the situation more closely, Mr. Speaker, and looking at the table which has been furnished by the Minister of Finance, and which is broken down into standard categories and special categories, the standard categories being those in which the Minister of Finance claims it is not possible to make any further economies, one finds that the increases in the normal items of controllable expenditures this year are far in excess of the decreases. One finds that there are increases in freight and express and cartage, in postage, in the cost of telephones, telegrams and other communication services, films, displays and other government publicity, office stationery, supplies and other general materials and supplies. Decreases are shown only in the totals for professional and special services, travel and removal expenses and the publication of the annual departmental reports. There is one substantial reduction in the category, contributions, grants and subsidies, namely, $10 million, which is accounted for almost exclusively by the reduction in the freight assistance for the movement of western feed grains previously paid by the Department of Agriculture. But when you end up, even giving credit for this and all the other reductions, you are left with the fact that outside any amount of defence spending, civil defence and national health and welfare, the total of the increases in standard categories exceeds the total of decreases by $48 million in the fiscal year.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would ask you and hon. members, bearing in mind the repeated statement of the Minister of Finance that most rigid economies are being applied, to ask the government to account for the reason why in these categories such as freight and express and cartage—and that is not defence or civil defence or health and welfare—and in government films, displays and other government publicity, office stationery and supplies and other general materials and supplies, there should be an increase of spending by $48 million in this fiscal year.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce says that we have never suggested any ways in which savings might be made. He has said that it is the duty of the House of Commons, particularly the opposition, through the discussion of the estimates, to recommend and to bring about decreases. He says that he does not recall in all his time that any decrease has ever been effected through the discussion of the estimates. I will tell him one reason why. One reason is that any time that a reduction in expenditure is suggested the government regards it as a vote of want of confidence. I well recall the time when we did suggest a reduction in a particular vote. It was in the Department of Transport, and before there had been any discussion on the merits of the suggestion the Minister of Transport rose in his place and said that in effect he regarded this as a vote of want of confidence and the whole 181 majority of the government was enlisted behind him without any possibility of discussing the merits of the situation which, as I recall it, suggested a reduction in one item of travelling expenses of $25,000. The attitude of the government was that its life depended on this vote, and from the very outset there was not a chance of discussing any reduction being effected.

The crux of the whole matter is this. The Minister of Trade and Commerce knows very well without any attempt on my part to belittle the work done by the committee of supply, which is the most important work of this parliament, that no committee of 262 members, under the pressure of business which goes on here, and in the way in which the estimates are presented by the government, has a ghost of a chance of really effecting substantial reductions in government expenditures. Just because he knows that, and because he wants that situation to continue, the Minister of Trade and Commerce seeks to belittle this suggestion of the appointment of a royal commission. If he were serious, and if his colleague, the Minister of Finance, were serious, in their oft-repeated statements that they want to economize on spending, instead of belittling they would be supporting it.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): I should like to take part in this debate for about ten minutes, because I have always felt rather strongly about the matter which is being discussed. What precisely does this resolution ask for? It asks for the setting up of a royal commission for the purpose of (1) "improving the organization and general efficiency of government administration"; and, (2), "co-ordinating all public services and departmental activities of a similar nature". I may say quite frankly that I cannot find the wording of the resolution offensive. Speaking on April 24 last on the budget I took this position, and if I may I should like to quote one sentence from Hansard.

Mr. Byrne: Now well known.

Mr. Thatcher: I said, as reported at page 1568 of Hansard:

> Since coming to Ottawa I have been one of those who have always believed there was a good deal of merit in the suggestion that a commission be set up somewhat along the lines of the Hoover commission in the United States, to study waste and duplication in the government.

I have listened to the arguments today against the proposal, but I must say that I hav heard none which would lead me to change my mind in this connection. I think any method, any method whatever, which may lead to economies should be supported by every hon. member with a good deal of enthusiasm.

I think one of the paramount issues facing all members of parliament today is the fact that the government is going to take in this coming year $4,500 million from the pockets of the Canadian taxpayers. That is a lot of money. No one realizes better than members of parliament do that most of that money is going to have to be paid by the average Canadian, by the workingman, the farmer and the small businessman.

If these taxes are necessary, Mr. Speaker, if it can be shown that we have to have them for defence, or security, or something of that nature, I do not think any Canadian, any true Canadian, will object to them. But unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, more and more Canadians are wondering whether these high taxes really are necessary. They are wondering whether they could not be reduced, if ordinary methods of economy were practised by the government. That is the crux of the matter.

This afternoon the Minister of Trade and Commerce opposed the resolution which is before us. In effect he said, "I am opposed to this resolution, because it is the right, the duty, and the responsibility of members of parliament to examine expenditures which are made." I was surprised to hear such a weak argument put forward by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. No one is going to deny that it is the duty and the right of members of parliament to examine expenditures. But every hon. member who is sitting in this chamber tonight knows that it is physically impossible for members to give to estimates and to public accounts the scrutiny which the taxpayers have a right to expect.

I know of no more futile task, or no more frustrating task, which a member of parliament can have, than to try to dig up some fact which has been buried in the estimates. This afternoon the Minister of Trade and Commerce told us that private members have every opportunity to examine expenditures efficiently. I am going to take issue with that statement, because I do not think it is correct. We have had one such opportunity this year, and that was to examine the supplementary estimates which were brought down last March 28, one parliamentary day before the end of the fiscal year. On that last day the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) brought down estimates totalling $246 million. After we had examined them for four or five hours, he had the audacity to tell members of the opposition that they were responsible for the fact that civil servants might not get paid on time.

On that occasion, the only occasion this year when we have had estimates in front of us, we were asked to pass millions of dollars per minute. And yet the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) tells us today that the members have every opportunity to examine expenditures.

I would point out that parliament has been sitting for two and a half months, and that not one single estimate for the current year has yet been before parliament. What opportunity is that?

An hon. Member: Whose fault is that?

Mr. Thatcher: I am trying to point out that it is physically impossible for members to give these estimates and the public accounts the scrutiny they deserve. The Minister of Trade and Commerce growled this afternoon that he was one of the biggest government spenders. He said indeed that, so far as he knows, there is little waste or duplication in the government. I respectfully must take issue with that assertion, because I contend that there is waste. There is unnecessary duplication. There is extravagance, right here in Ottawa, which is milking the Canadian taxpayer unnecessarily.

Tonight, at the risk of further unpopularity in certain quarters, I would ask hon. members to look at a few basic facts. I ask them to examine only one government department, one they know something about—the parliament buildings. I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the heart of the Canadian government, the very nerve centre of our legislative system, is centred right in these buildings. Surely if economy is practised anywhere, in any government department, it should be practised right here under the noses of some 260 odd representatives and 70 or 80 senators.

But what are the facts? I think if any hon. member, regardless of party politics, will be fair and look around the buildings, he will see things which must cause him concern. Even a superficial glance cannot help but reveal duplications which I cannot understand.

For instance, when a member comes into this building each morning he enters by the door at the lower floor. The first thing he sees is the House of Commons post office, with fifteen employees. Twenty feet to the right he will see another post office, the Senate post office.

Mr. Howe: May I ask a question? By whose authority are those two post offices established? I will answer the question: They are established, one by the Senate and the other by the House of Commons. The government has nothing to do with either of them.

Mr. Thatcher: Thank you, Mr. Minister; I appreciate your comment. You are reputed to be an efficient minister; yet I think you would not, yourself, argue that there is not duplication in this instance. It may be necessary; but to me it does not seem sensible—two post offices in the one building.

Mr. Howe: I may reply that I would not attempt to tell either the Senate or the House of Commons how they should carry on their affairs. That is a matter for house and senate members, for each of them to decide for themselves.

Mr. Thatcher: Thank you; but it seems to me it might be sensible for the government to set up a committee of the House of Commons, and a committee of the Senate to see whether these duplications are necessary.

Mr. Howe: Such a committee is functioning today.

Mr. Thatcher: They have not done much, then. If the minister would let me proceed, I can assure him I would take only two or three minutes more.

If you go along the corridor further you will find the House of Commons barber shop. There are some excellent men in there, doing a first class job. But I find it peculiar that a little to the right, you will find a Senate barber shop. It would seem to me that in one building one barber shop should suffice.

If one goes a little farther up the corridor we run into the House of Commons protective staff. I must say at once that I have heard many compliments from visitors, who have referred to the courtesy of those gentlemen, when they are performing their duties. But I must say, as a representative of the taxpayers, that I find it strange that we should have in one building, first, the House of Commons protective staff, then the Senate protective staff, and outside, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police—three policing powers to police one building. It does seem to me that here is unnecessary duplication.

Then, we come up to the main floor where we have one of the finest reading rooms in the Dominion of Canada, the House of Commons reading room. One can find here all the newspapers and periodicals of this country—an excellent service. But I think it is not fair to the taxpayers of Canada that about a hundred feet down the corridor, the Senate should have exactly the same service—with the same newspapers and the same periodicals.

Why should they not be combined? Surely, for about 260 members and 70 senators, one reading room should be sufficient.

Then, in the House of Commons we find a House of Commons messenger staff with 59 messengers, one for every four members. We also have a Senate messenger staff. Both have separate quarters and both have similar organizations. I wonder if the Minister of Trade and Commerce would not say that this is not duplication.

Then we have two stationery branches. I could go on and on and give other examples. We have two law branches; we have two stenographic pools.

Mr. Cleaver: Have you more than one public school in Moose Jaw?

Mr. Thatcher: We have two journals branches; we have two translation branches. The point I am making is this. It must be apparent to all hon. members, when they are looking at the situation, that there is duplication in parliament. And, because parliament is the nerve centre of our legislative system, I wonder what confidence the taxpayer can have that this duplication does not go all through government departments.

An hon. Member: How many hardware stores in Moose Jaw?

Mr. Thatcher: Taxes can be brought down by the elimination of waste and inefficiency. For years the Minister of Finance and the parliamentary assistant have been telling opposition members that one of their main tasks is to point out savings which can be made. I find it strange that they should take exception when some member tries to do precisely that.

It may be that opposition members are not always right; yet we are here, trying to do a job; and I do not see why government supporters should take objection to our endeavours. When I made a few specific suggestions several weeks ago, the only answer I received was derision, ridicule and even contempt. I simply cannot understand such an attitude. I will only say that this government does not appear to be interested in economy. It does not seem to wish to do anything about waste.

The motion which the leader of the opposition made this afternoon might or might not produce economies; but, to me, it is sensible to try any move which might bring the taxpayer relief; and therefore I will support it.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) remain in his seat, because I shall speak only a few moments. I would have been sorry if he had not been in the chamber, because what I shall say will relate to the amendment he offered this afternoon.

The basis of his amendment was certain facts concerning specially the Department of National Defence. Then he did go over the expenditures of different departments, comparing those of the year 1938-39 with those of 1952-53. If he had compared the expenditures of two immediately succeeding years, perhaps his argument would have stood up more strongly in support of the amendment he has offered.

I want hon. members to believe that what I am saying is not motivated by any political consideration. In my opinion none of the speeches made on this question have been motivated by considerations concerning provincial elections or anything else. I believe that they have been made in the interests of the country. My respect for the members of the House of Commons is such that when an hon. member gets up to speak—I may not always agree with what he says—I believe that he speaks in a sincere effort to help the people of Canada.

When the leader of the opposition requested a committee last year to inquire into defence expenditures I was one of those who approved of that move. During one year of the last war I was chairman of the committee on war expenditures. I know something of the work that was done by members of the opposition and members on the government side. It was good work. At the end of each session—we even sat between sessions—we made recommendations and to my knowledge most of those were implemented by the government of the day. I think hon. members who were on that committee will agree that we did a fine job in helping our country go through that war. As I say, when this proposal came up last year I was one hundred per cent in favour of it. The motion setting up the committee reads:

That a select committee be appointed to examine all expenditure of public moneys for national defence and all commitments for expenditure for national defence since March 31, 1950—

I cannot recall definitely, but I do not think the resolution moved during the last war contained the word "commitments." We were limited by the reference to examine expenditures only. This motion continues:

—and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, and in particular, what, if any, economies consistent with the execution of the policy decided by the government may be effected therein.

This committee is to deal with expenditures totalling nearly $2,000 million, almost 50 per cent of our total expenditures. Members of that committee can decide on the way in which they will proceed. They can decide to call witnesses, hear experts, listen to evidence, read reports, give their own opinions or conduct any other form of useful work. That is where they can point out to the government economies that should be put into effect.

Mr. Green: In connection with defence items only.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Covering $2,000 million. That is covering a lot of ground. I believe opposition members on that committee can do a good job because it was done before. They can examine these expenditures, give their opinions and report to the House of Commons. I think during the last war we had concurrence in our reports and there may have been some minority reports. But I want every hon. member to know that the recommendations made and the opinions expressed are noted by the government and implemented. We are covering half of our expenditures in this way.

The leader of the opposition discussed how we have a breakdown of the estimates by functions and by primaries. No doubt there is a considerable difference between the amount being spent today and what was spent in normal peacetime. When I became Minister of Public Works the department was spending around $15 million a year. Today I cannot even maintain what we have with that amount. It takes nearly twice that amount to pay the staff, to purchase materials and keep the works in good repair.

I am astounded that the people of Canada through this House of Commons are ready to hand over to the Department of Public Works such a huge amount. I do not prepare these estimates. When they come to me for my consideration I call in the experts and I say, "Listen, these are exorbitant." I know they will have to be paid out of taxation imposed by the budget to be brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I tell my experts to cut them 15 or 20 per cent and then bring them back. Then I spend days and weeks trying to elbow away, not only members of parliament but different departments and people from all over the country. After about two weeks' study I bring them down again.

Do you know what happens to my estimates? They come before the experts in the Department of Finance. If you know those experts you know that they are not thinking of any political considerations. I have to spend two or three days with them. They know what they are talking about. They cut my estimates still further. Then I come before the house and the estimates are tabled. That evening I feel like going home right afterward because I always get too many visitors. These visitors are not always from the one side of the house. They are all convinced that the expenditures in which they are interested are needed.

A member may come to see me and I tell him, "this is not needed, let us postpone it." He will argue his case or may even bring delegations. That happens even in the case of British Columbia in connection with the Marpole bridge. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) may think that funny, but he knows about the Marpole bridge.

Mr. Green: I am afraid the minister does not.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That would mean another three or four million dollars added to my estimates. I feel that I am rendering a service to the people of Canada and the members of the House of Commons by following the procedure I have outlined. Then when I get approval in the House of Commons for these estimates I have to do the work or have revotes. At one time having revotes shamed me. Let me tell you why at times I cannot have these works done. If they were all carried through I would have to ask treasury board for another thousand people to be added to my staff, and that would build up expenditures.

There is no body which looks into estimates and expenditures more thoroughly than the ministers of the government. Believe it or not, that is what takes place. When you look at me you see one of those who try to keep down these expenditures. With the little experience I have had I know what the Minister of Finance and his officials are going to do. They will say: You want $4,100 million or $4,200 million; we will take the gross national product. And by taking the different sections they will be able to fit the expenditures with a balanced budget.

If they wanted a deficit administration they could bring down taxes and carry on with the expenditures. My experience has been that the people of Canada do not like deficits. They are proud of being able to help others and pay their own way in the world. Before I deal with the resolution I should like to refer briefly to the speech made by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low). He said that nothing comes from these house committees because they are weighted on the side of the government. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that it is not the government that weights these committees; it is the people of Canada. Once the people of Canada say, "We want 190 Liberal members in the House of Commons", what can I do?

Mr. Harkness: Only 49 per cent of the people said that.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Even with the large expenditures facing us people seem happy, even in the House of Commons. That is because of the way you think of it, and the way you have to look at these things. Suppose we put as many C.C.F. members on our committees as we did Liberal members. My goodness, they would be on only two committees. They have not enough people in their ranks for more than that; and that is not my fault. Take the Social Credit party. I know them well. In two elections I did not have a Conservative opponent, but I had Social Crediters and they were good fighters. They could not defeat me; the people thought I should stay here. That party has only a handful of members; yet they want a majority on committees. They would not be able to handle the work.

Let me tell you one thing. Even when you have only a small number of members you can do useful work in the house. They should not agree with this resolution. I do not know English too well, but I have read the motion and tried to understand it. It urges that consideration should be given to the matter of appointing a royal commission for the purpose of examining—examining what? At least in our resolution we said, "to examine all expenditures." Then the resolution goes on "and make recommendations"—for what?—"to improve, to coordinate, to assure the civil service that they have responsibilities".

Mr. Green: Why don't you read the whole paragraph?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I have not found what the commission is to examine, unless it is the organization and general efficiency; but how do you get that from this language? Probably there is a word missing. At all events I am not here to give a lecture, and this is not a school or college or a university. That is why I always object when members repeat the same thing three or four times in this house. We are speaking to members who have finished their education. We are speaking to voters 21 years of age and more. I do not think we should give them lectures. We should tell them the facts and let them come to their own decisions.

Will anyone tell me that we have become so incompetent in this house that we cannot examine the organization and general efficiency of government administration? That is why we have been sent here. The people of our ridings think we can do that. Why admit that we cannot? The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) says we are not strong enough. Well, the people in the country want strong men in this parliament, even in the opposition. We have them on the government side; that is understood.

I do not believe we need a royal commission to make recommendations to improve the organization. In 1939 and 1940 I was chairman of a committee on the civil service. Look up the recommendations of that committee for the improvement of the organization; and the government carried those recommendations forward. Why admit we are so weak that we cannot even examine the organization of government activities? Can we not make some recommendations in connection with the public service and departmental activity, even though they may not be perfect? The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has said that we have highly paid advisers, really good men. I know them; I have known them for years. We should not lose confidence in these men. If we do, they should not be in the service; we should find other big brain trusters that somebody else can recommend.

Hon. members opposite want us to see that members of the civil service recognize their responsibilities. Let me tell you something, Mr. Speaker. I have lived in this district for more than thirty years. If there is one citizen of this country who knows his responsibilities, it is the civil servant. You do not have to show him; he knows. If you can limit him to his own responsibilities it is all you can do, because from the lower down to the higher up they do their work properly, and they are proud to have certain responsibilities. We do not need to assure them; they have a lot of responsibility. I do not always agree with what my advisers say. I often consult others in the department to get different opinions, and then come to my own judgment.

If this motion were to carry we certainly would be admitting that members of parliament are falling down on the job. We would be saying, "We come here but we cannot do all the work." But hon. members knew that before they came here. Did they believe that being a member of parliament was a part-time job, or that they could come here and just rest? A member who wants to work can work fifteen hours a day, and he will not have time to even mend his political fences when the elections come, unless he is a very active man. Members of parliament can do all that is asked in this resolution. Why have a judicial inquiry into these matters? Do we need a judge to tell us how to improve the organization and general efficiency? Why, I know a good many members of parliament on the opposite side who could do as good a job as any expert I have met.

Now, please give the people a hand. Do the work. Make your examination into I don't know what, and bring in whatever recommendations you see fit. When recommendations are made by the defence expenditures committee or any committee of this house, not many of them fall by the way. If they are not implemented in the first session, they are carried out in succeeding years. The government never implements everything that is suggested, but it does carry out important recommendations. I am not sorry the leader of the opposition brought this up. I agree that in our own organization some standing orders and regulations may be archaic; nevertheless we can still do a good job. If the hon. member for Peace River is on the committee to revise the standing orders, I would ask him to help me in that committee so at least we can make a few unanimous recommendations. That committee sat last year. As you all know, I am not a fighting man—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I pride myself on being very mild in all my arguments and in the way I expound them. Some of my best friends are on that committee, including the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), but I could not get them to agree.

Mr. Knowles: We all agreed on ten o'clock closing.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Don't get sleepy so early. We have to work in this parliament, so let us work to the bitter end. I read something in the newspapers not long ago that struck me. Hon members say, "Well, the government does not want us to take ourselves too seriously." I will tell you one thing. You have to take yourself seriously if you want to do something for the country; but don't overdo it. There is a limit even to taking yourselves seriously, because the people look at you and they will judge. If I were a young man nothing would please me more than to go out and tell the people how this house is run, how good these members are, what good work they do and how they tried to save money even though the Minister of Finance did not agree and had to get the money. I would remind them also that when they ask for expenditures to be made the money has to come from some place unless you can print money, and we cannot. So we must have taxes. I would say that this is the finest institution or organization a man could wish to belong to, and I am proud to be here to listen to the nice speeches from the opposition. You see, I know why they are made. I have been here long enough for that.

I hope no one will impute motives to me, because I have none. I wanted to tell the hon. gentleman that I was interested in his speech, and I hope I have interested him in mine. At least I made him smile, and with a smile he may continue doing good work for the country.

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, a day or two ago I referred to the member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) as a parlour socialist. In view of what he has said tonight, I believe I can extend that reference and say that he would like to be a parlour politician. He would like to sit in an armchair and have a commission doing the work instead of doing the work which his constituents send him here to do. Up until tonight I believe everyone in this house regarded the hon. member for Moose Jaw as an intelligent young man. After tonight, it is doubtful whether they will agree with their former decision.

First of all, I should like to get a yes or no from the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). Oh, I am sorry, I do not see him here, but perhaps some member of his party will answer for him. In any event, I leave this with him to think over. Will he agree with the hon. member for Moose Jaw that we should do away with the British tradition which, as was pointed out tonight, is in existence now, that members of parliament have nothing to do with appointments in the two post offices? This has been a British tradition over a long period of years.

I wish to congratulate the leader of the opposition on bringing forward this resolution. I am sure that when he did so he intended to bring to the attention of the people of Canada certain things. As the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) pointed out tonight, there were some things missing from the resolution. When the member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) spoke, he referred to the plight of the tired old doctor. By the time the doctor got to see the patient, the patient was dead. I gathered from his speech tonight that the leader of the opposition was like the doctor. He was getting old and tired, and the member for Kamloops was making a strong bid to be the leader of the opposition. The weakness of the resolution moved by the leader of the opposition was quite evident from the time he took, I believe it was about an hour and a half. As the Minister of Public Works pointed out, there was no meaning in the resolution, so I believe that hour and a half was wasted.

In bringing forward this resolution the leader of the opposition has shown a complete lack of confidence in himself. He has shown a complete lack of confidence in his party. He would rather pass on his responsibility to a commission. He has proven that he has been lax. He has shown his complete inability to carry on the duties of the opposition. He has shown his indifference in taking up the time of the house suggesting that a committee of this kind be appointed. He has shown an indifference to delving into matters which are of importance to the country. This is the duty of the opposition, and not the duty of a commission. Members of the opposition think this is a very good way to get away from their responsibility by passing the buck on to a commission. Possibly he would like to be the leader of the opposition giving directions from an armchair to commissions, and therefore have no responsibility himself to the country.

When the member for Moose Jaw spoke tonight, he said that no good could come out of these committees. I believe hon. members can recall that one of the most important pieces of legislation ever introduced was recommended by a committee, and that was the old age pension scheme without a means test. This was the unanimous recommendation of a committee. If the hon. member thinks that piece of legislation was not important, then he does not agree with his leader; he does not agree with the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and he does not agree with his party at all. I would say, Mr. Speaker, that we should lose no time in voting down this motion, and getting down to the business of the house.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): I believe that this resolution, Mr. Speaker, is one that should concern every member of this house. Personally, I suspect a motive and I am going to give my reasons for saying that before I sit down. This afternoon the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) expressed the opinion of this group, with apparently one exception, in so far as the resolution is concerned. In moving this amendment, the leader of the opposition has made certain arguments. With some of those arguments, I agree.

For example, I agree that there is a necessity for an examination into the Petawawa incident. As stated in the press within the last few days, the Department of National Defence has written off about $2·5 million as a result of thefts and fires. I believe there is a cause for investigation into that matter, and a thorough investigation. So far as the public or the members of this house are concerned, as yet there has been no intimation as to whether anyone in the services is going to be taken to task for the loss of that amount of money. The army, navy and air force rigidly enforce discipline in the lower ranks. A private or non-commissioned officer is dealt with very strictly if he is absent for a couple of days or if he commits some slight misdemeanour. He may be thrown in the clink with a fine of ninety days' pay, and his wife's allowance is stopped. The regulations are enforced so far as the lower ranks are concerned. The kind of thing that happened in Petawawa is not the responsibility of the lower ranks, as was clearly indicated by press statements and the evidence we have had a chance to see. I believe the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and the government should make an investigation into the fire and theft proposition, and whoever may be guilty, regardless of rank, should pay the full penalty. I agree with the observations of the leader of the opposition in that regard.

I do not agree with him when he asks for a royal commission to investigate the workings of government. I believe that is the responsibility of members of parliament; that is our job. In making his argument today, the leader of the opposition was quite inconsistent with arguments he has made in the past. For example, he has made many statements in the house with regard to order-in-council government. He and many of his supporters have made many accusations against the cabinet running the country without reference to parliament. On the other hand he and some of his supporters—a very few of them—have taken the stand in the house that they were opposed to the two sessions called by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the government for the purpose of completing the business of the house. The leader of the opposition and his supporters cannot have it both ways. If he objects to the cabinet's running the country and if he objects to order-in-council government, he is completely illogical when he says that the members should not be brought back in order to direct the government on matters that may come before this house. You either have to have the members here or, in effect, have the country run by the cabinet. The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and the leader of the opposition have stated on a good many occasions that they are prepared for this house to sit from February until June. If that is so, it is obvious that the only people to run the country for the other eight months of the year are the cabinet. Members of the opposition will have to make up their minds which way they want it.

As indicated by the Minister of Public Works this job is a full-time one. If members of parliament do not accept it on that basis, they are certainly not going to be in a position to do the work that is necessary here.

A royal commission to regulate the policies and the expenditures of the government and so forth is certainly not analogous to the suggestion that was raised by the hon. member for Kamloops. For example, he stated that the government set up a royal commission on the arts, letters and sciences. It is true that they did so. That is a special field with which most of the members of this house are certainly not familiar. It is a subject which required long and detailed study and contact with organizations across this country who specialized in that field. A royal commission or a commission for the purpose of developing a report that could be studied by members of this house certainly was something that was necessary in that field.

Again, the hon. member for Kamloops tried to prove that a royal commission to examine the Saskatchewan river project is analogous to a commission to regulate government and government expenditures. It certainly is not analogous to a royal commission to study a project such as the Saskatchewan river project or the Canso project, for example. That is an engineering project. How many members of this house are in a position to sit down here and tell the government what is right and what is wrong with regard to harnessing the rivers, developing power and that kind of thing? Very few of them. Therefore in a practical proposition of that kind it is necessary to get men who are qualified to make a report and to guide the government in the matter. The hon. member for Kamloops certainly was not presenting an analogy to the present proposal of the leader of the opposition.

The hon. member for Kamloops says again: What about the commission on transportation? That is another proposition. I do not know whether or not he was on the committee that studied the findings of the royal commission on transportation but I was. Members of the House of Commons do not speak the language of the railroads when examining freight rates. I found out that fact. There were some 1,500 different rates as between one section of this country and another. It was a new language to me. To me it is certainly something that we never would have been able to finalize in this house without a detailed study on the part of the royal commission, putting the thing in such a way as we could understand it. I think that was necessary.

But this proposition put forward by the leader of the opposition this afternoon is completely different. As I said a few moments ago, the opposition will have to make up their minds whether they want the cabinet to run the country for eight months of the year and to leave the members home; whether they are satisfied to bring the members back here to run the country when it is necessary, as indicated by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on two occasions, or whether they want to appoint a royal commission and let the commission do the job that we are supposed to do. That is why we are elected.

The great trouble with most of the members of this house, in my opinion, is that they are too busy thinking about their own businesses at home to pay attention to the business of the country. In my opinion that is the trouble with them. They are trying to arrange every kind of device, no matter who runs the country, in order to get home and to get to their own businesses rather than sit here and give to the business of the country the examination that it should be given.

As a rule, royal commissions serve little purpose except in the technical fields. I have in mind the report of the price spreads commission. It went to the archives to gather dust, as did the reports of several other commissions that we could mention. The report of the royal commission on coal was quite a document but it served little useful purpose. It took a long time to compile and it cost a good deal of money, but, with few exceptions, none of the recommendations were implemented.

I am therefore completely opposed to the setting up of any kind of a commission that is going to usurp the powers of the members of parliament. I think it is our job to examine the estimates, to take the government to task, and to spend ten or twelve months of the year here, if it is necessary, to do its business. My advice to anybody who is not satisfied to spend the major portion of his time in this House of Commons doing that business is to have an examination of conscience and try to find out where he wants to work.

I was rather surprised a few moments ago to hear one of my colleagues get to his feet and agree with this proposition. I said a moment ago that I suspected motives. Well, I think that hon. gentleman has a motive. I believe he would rather be back home doing business than be sitting here in the House of Commons. I say that quite frankly.

An hon. Member: I think you are out of order.

Mr. Gillis: I am expressing an opinion; I am not imputing motives.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not know to whom the hon. member refers. I do not know whether the hon. member is in the house.

Mr. Gillis: He should be.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the hon. member should impute motives, especially if the hon. member is not in the chamber.

Mr. Gillis: I said a moment ago that I was not imputing motives, but that I was expressing an opinion. If the hon. gentleman is not in the house, that is not my fault. He should be here. But if you think these remarks are offensive, Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw them.

Mr. Speaker: In view of the fact that the hon. gentleman referred to is not here, I think the remarks should be withdrawn.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. Gillis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am merely setting out the facts as I see them; but I was rather surprised. If I was going to get to my feet in this house and make a speech telling the government that I thought their expenditures were out of line, I would do some digging and I would be able to put on record here some facts showing where they were out of line. No hon. gentleman who has taken part thus far in this debate has put on the record any facts in connection with what he considered were exorbitant expenditures which should be corrected.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) made a couple of observations with regard to what he considered to be overstaffing. I was rather surprised that he would go away downstairs in the basement of this building in order to effect economies. I am sure that the categories he picked are peanuts in comparison with total government expenditures. I should just like to say this as to the post offices in this building. They are giving us good service. There are 262 members in this house. I believe that the staff we have downstairs on the members' side is a fairly small one to handle the mail of 262 members and see that it is handled efficiently. As to the staff they have there, I believe there is no extraordinary expenditure as to which you might make a saving. I am reasonably sure that the first people to make a complaint, if their mail was not delivered expeditiously, and so forth, would be some of the gentlemen who are criticizing that particular section of the House of Commons downstairs. What about the barber shop? I think there are two barbers in the members' barber shop to handle the number of members that are in this building. I do not think there is any money wasted there. I think every member will agree that when he goes in there to get a haircut or a shave he will generally find a waiting list. The service is very good; the wages are not very high. The same thing applies to the protective staff on the inside of this building that looks after the needs of the members, locking their doors, as they do at night, and closing their windows, and in many other ways performing services for them. I think it is small potatoes for any member of this house to pick on the staff of the House of Commons in the categories that my hon. friend did for the purpose of saving a few dollars.

All these people are underpaid. They are just eking out an existence. Most of them are ex-service personnel either from this war or from the first war, and they wear a ribbon. Most of them are in a position where they could not go out and compete in the labour market. I, as one member of this house—and I think the great majority in this house would agree with me—at no time would relegate somebody to the street just for the purpose of saving $3, $4, or $5 a month to pile up a surplus for the government. What is the opinion of hon. members who take that position that they want to save more money? They say they want to save the taxpayers' money. The tax rate is fixed for this year. There is going to be no change in it. They want another surplus of $300 million to be piled up. What for? So that the Minister of Finance can take that money and pay it to the chartered banks and the trusts across this country in interest on bonds. Pay it back to the banks in interest. Discharge ex-servicemen on the staff of the House of Commons who were fighting a war when these bonds were being sold to financial houses who were accumulating profits for the future. There is no saving there; there is no justice there and there is no common sense. I am prepared to pay it out in wages so that people may eat, wear clothes and live in a house rather than have it accumulated as a surplus for the Minister of Finance to pay it out to the chartered banks and the trusts and so forth in interest. In effect that is what the proposition means.

I do not want to delay the house too long, Mr. Speaker; but so far as I am concerned the motion moved by the leader of the opposition is just about as effective as a harpoon would be to a sardine fisherman, and I am opposing it.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I think after the words this afternoon of the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), almost inviting someone to take part in this debate, I could not allow the opportunity to go by without making a few remarks with respect to this motion. There has been a great deal of discussion on this matter which I think is absolutely immaterial, and is not in keeping with the motion at all. It has been suggested that the leader of the opposition was very foolish to bring in such a motion to waste the time of the house. But I would point out to you, sir, that this debate has at least this accomplishment to its credit. We have had two cabinet ministers taking part in the debate. I do not think there has ever been anything else before the House of Commons during this session which has brought two cabinet ministers to their feet in one day. Therefore I think it has some merit from that standpoint as well. And I am sure that the contribution of my friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) never reached the heights in the past that he did tonight, with his humour and that graceful Gallic touch of his. The only time that he approached it was when he tried to put through a bill last year to amend the Public Works Act. We remember the remarkable job he did to try to get the house to accept it, but in the end he had to accept substantial changes in it. His effort tonight was in keeping with that.

It has been suggested by some that the passing of this resolution involves an abrogation of the rights of parliament. If it involved that, sir, I for one would not be supporting it, and I do not think anyone on this side of the house would be supporting it either.

I always enjoy, and I usually follow with some considerable appreciation, the arguments advanced by the leader of the C.C.F. party. I must say I could not follow him at all this afternoon when he suggested that by the passing of this resolution we would be doing something which would be reflecting upon the rights of parliament or abrogating them. The Minister of Public Works seemed, I think, to answer that very well himself when he spoke a few moments ago. When his estimates come before him, what does he do? He calls in his experts. He said that is the very first thing he does. I do not think he considers that an abrogation of his function as minister. Then he said he calls them in again; he calls them back the second, and the third time; and so effectively do they slash his estimates then he weeps tears after having called them in these different times, and could not sleep at night when he left here. He did not think he was abrogating his functions. He considered he was carrying them out.

Then he made this suggestion. He said that members of parliament should do this work and carry out the functions envisaged by this motion. He said, and quite simply and truly, that members of parliament who are doing a job here—and I think myself that they are all trying—are around here fifteen hours a day, and they do not get through the work that now confronts them. I think that is a reasonably fair statement; in fact, it is very fair. And if we spend all that time now trying to do the work with which we are confronted I would like to ask the minister, where would we get the time to assume these other responsibilities that are envisioned by this motion?

He said the function of the opposition was to investigate. He himself answered that, when he referred to his friends over here, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). He said they were his closest friends in that committee. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre interjected that his friends were unanimous in wanting a certain course of action carried out. Why was it not carried out? It was not carried out because the graceful, charming gentleman with the captivating smile, with the whole force of the government majority behind him, said No, and the wishes of his friends were nullified. It is the same situation with anything else that the opposition may desire, as was so ably pointed out this afternoon by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low). I am not going to enlarge upon his arguments here.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) brought up the analogy of the civil service, and suggested that he had, and probably other departments had, as able businessmen as deputy ministers as could be found in this country. I am prepared, and I am quite sure we are all prepared, to accept the statement. I think we can all join with him in paying a tribute to our civil service. We realize that at least in the upper brackets the men whom we have attracted to the public service are of a calibre that is certainly second to none, and probably superior to that which is employed in the government service in other countries. We accept that; but the deputy minister to the right hon. gentleman I am sure is kept pretty busy looking after his department, because I am sure the minister sees that the deputy minister does his work—he would not have him there if he did not. The same is true of the deputy minister of public works who is back and forth at the many conferences which the minister told us about a little while ago in whittling down these estimates. If every deputy minister is here working efficiently they are doing a good job, but they cannot see the forest for the trees, sir, because they are busy in their own departments. That is the only difference.

As I see this resolution, it asks the government to appoint some independent body, some group, some person or persons, who are not attached to any one department, who are not working here fifteen or eighteen hours a day, who have wide experience and knowledge, the best you can find, whoever they may be. They may not be one bit better than some of the men the minister referred to this afternoon. But they have that independent position. They are divorced from departmental responsibility, and surely it cannot be argued that that is a wrong thing to do, that that is an abrogation of the rights of parliament, that that is an opposition refusing to carry out its function. That is an argument so specious that it should not even be considered. I am really amazed, sir, that it was uttered.

There have been many royal commissions. Was there not a royal commission once which brought in a report—and perhaps this is why hon. members on the other side of the house are so opposed to the idea. It seems to me that there was a royal commission once that brought in a report which prompted someone to say that "he was walking through the valley of humiliation."

And so you have had abrogation—if it is an abrogation of parliamentary function—you have had it time and time again in the study of the various phases of government, which were pointed out by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). You have had commissions making studies since the days of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, after the change of government, away back in 1896, and they have come down through the years. They have had them in Great Britain; they have had them all over the world where the parliamentary system has existed.

All we are suggesting is that the same thing be done here. Now, the Minister of Public Works spoke about the way the government was operated, and suggested that no study need be given to the operation of departments. Well, there was a royal commission that met last year, one that was headed by a distinguished Canadian, and the report of which I hold in my hand.

Strange as it may seem, it deals to a certain extent with the Department of Public Works. It deals with the storage of the records of this country. I am not going to read what is contained in this report, but what I am referring to is to be found at pages 113 and 114. What it says is that according to the evidence produced before that commission the storage of documents, over half of which, it says, should be destroyed, occupies over 350,000 square feet of space. The commission finds that figure astonishing when it recalls that the Confederation building in Ottawa has only 190,000 square feet.

Mr. Fulton: At $3 a square foot.

Mr. Nowlan: I say that 350,000 square feet, or a substantial part of it, was rented and, as the commissioner says, half of the material should be destroyed. Then the report refers back to another commission in 1912 which recommended the destruction of those records even at that time.

The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) is, of course, so busy cutting estimates that he has not had time to dispose of the material which requires so much floor space. But surely if a commission looked over it they could work out some way so that he could get rid of some of this. After all, it was a cold winter in Ottawa, the winter just past, and the poor people might have used some of it for fuel.

That is just one example of the way in which co-ordination and inspection would result. Then this afternoon the right hon. gentleman made reference to professional services, and he said that professional services had increased over the years. He said that there were no professional services today which were not necessary, and that all of them could be justified.

Well, that may be so, but I would like to see the report of a commission on the point. I think the right hon. gentleman himself, if he had his way, would certainly deal with some of these expenditures for expert services. For instance, I find in the public accounts for this year some information at page N-21 which is of interest to me. There we find reference to the payment of fees to architects. We see fees of $134,800 for architectural and engineering services on a standard ordnance warehouse; that is, preparing plans for one standard ordnance warehouse, $134,000.

Then there is another one of $128,938 for services in connection with camp buildings. I have inquired into those services, and I find that this is being spent for all sorts of imaginary buildings—a 12-room guard house, a 24-room guard house, a platoon cook house—everything except a Chic Sale special.

Here we have expenditures for everything—engineering and plans—plans for these imaginary buildings. This architect charges commissions on imaginary supplies with which to build these imaginary buildings; and he charged a commission of 7½ per cent on them. There we have a few of $128,938 for these plans for buildings which now are tucked away somewhere in a drawer, and for the imaginary supplies which went into these imaginary buildings.

And then, on the same page another gentleman received $63,864.98 for doing the same type of work—engineering work, and supplies—for imaginary buildings for which he had drawn the plans. This account refers to one company armoury. We have seen those in our small towns, and we know what a company armoury is. It is not much of a building. It also includes a 2-battalion armoury. Certainly that is not a gigantic building. But there are architects' fees and commissions in connection with these two buildings, and the work is still going on; it is not completed yet. Up to date, for architect's services and commissions on imaginary supplies for these imaginary two buildings his fees are $63,864.98.

We find consultants' fees, engineering fees and architects' fees running through practically every page of the expenditures for the Department of National Defence. And when we come to the Department of Public Works, run by an efficient minister, we have there a huge sum for architects' fees, undoubtedly properly spent. I should think it possible that some investigating agency would find that it was not necessary to employ a technical man downtown or to go downtown to get someone to draw the plans for imaginary buildings of this kind. The matter could be turned over to the Minister of Public Works, and the architects of that department could do it. That is a suggestion which, I think, is worthy of consideration.

Those of us on this side of the house will remember last year when questions were asked regarding expenditures made in connection with certain legal fees for a certain individual. Something like 40 days went by, and then the Prime Minister himself finally intervened. He undertook that he would give his personal supervision to the matter, so that the return would be brought down. Forty days elapsed before it came down. The Prime Minister of course exercised every pressure possible to have it brought down earlier.

This was a legal bill. I suggest that the Canadian Pacific Railway, or perhaps the right hon. gentleman if he were the head of a corporation, would be able to tell inside of 24 hours how much he had paid in fees to any lawyer in Canada, if his bookkeeping system were in good shape. And if the bookkeeping system was so deficient and so inadequate and so complicated that it took 40 days to get a return down for legal fees, even with the Prime Minister's personal intervention, then I suggest there is a possibility of some study of that system being required.

I am bringing up these examples to show ways in which I think some improvement could be made. It has been suggested that this is an abrogation. It is not an abrogation. It is suggested that it is something which should not be done. I say there is not a businessman in Canada, there is not a firm in Canada, that has not done this very same thing.

The right hon. gentleman himself told about the efficiency which resulted from the investigations he had conducted in connection with the film board. Well, if it was a good thing to do in one department, it would be a good thing in all departments. We are engaged in the biggest business in this country, the most complicated business in this country, the most expensive business there is.

With all due respect to my colleagues in the House of Commons I say there are no members in the house—none—who have the ability and the experience and the judgment required to survey this whole, tremendous organization, this whole tremendous system of government. And it must be done. It must be done if democracy is to function properly.

And I believe it can be done. Here is an approach; here is one rational approach to the proposition. I say that members of the House of Commons on all sides should give it their support; and it will be a good thing for this parliament, it will be a good thing for this government, and it will be a good thing for Canada if that is the result.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): There have been a number of comments tonight and at other times regarding the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher). Since the time he spoke on the budget debate comments have been made about him. I would like to say that, for my part, I believe if all members in the House of Commons had the political courage to speak their views according to the dictates of their conscience, as the hon. member for Moose Jaw has done, we would get much better government in this country. I am giving my own personal view.

We have heard the opinion expressed tonight, and on other occasions, that parliament should be a full-time job. In theory that may be all right, but in practice it is absolutely impossible. A young man with a young family may be elected and possibly re-elected for his second term. If he neglects his business, his profession or his occupation, and is defeated, as he must expect to be sooner or later, then how in the world is he going to be able to support his wife and young children? That is one thing that makes it impossible to consider this parliamentary business as a full-time job, even though in theory it is a good idea. It is necessary for every hon. member to keep his job going while he is here acting as a member of parliament.

Just in passing, I should like to repeat what I said last fall. If this parliament is to function, and if we are to get young men to come down here, then one contribution the government can make is to make free air transportation available to members who live farther than four hundred miles away from Ottawa. We who live closer than that do not need it, but hon. members farther away definitely need it because they must keep in touch with their business, their profession, their family and their constituents. You are only as good a member of parliament as the extent to which you keep in close contact with all the things I have mentioned.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

I find it hard to understand the government's refusal to have the day to day operations of the various departments examined to see if they could be operated in a more efficient manner. There are few successful corporations today which do not call in efficiency engineers from time to time to look over the day to day operations of their departments, from a purely unbiased standpoint. Corporations do not expect their departmental managers to report on their inefficiencies; neither is it sensible for this government to expect deputy ministers to come forward to their ministers and report on the inefficiencies in their departments. That just would not be human nature. It will not be done, and it is not being done, and it never has been done.

An efficiency survey in business is not looked upon as indicating a lack of confidence in the management. It simply indicates a desire on the part of management to make sure that the most efficient methods possible are being used by the various departments in the company. The company with which I happen to be associated called in the Gordon company, which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) referred to this afternoon. These people are efficiency engineers. We felt that we were doing pretty well, but we thought we would like to find out if anything could be done better.

We were simply amazed, as this government would be amazed, to find that the things that we thought were being done efficiently and smoothly were being done in a manner completely inefficient and were running in anything but a smooth way. We made the changes they recommended, with tremendous advantage to the company concerned.

If the government will call in people of that type and calibre, there is no reason why they cannot be told an infinite number of ways in which little things can be done more efficiently, thus saving the taxpayer a great deal of money. For the government to take the attitude that the day to day operations of the various departments cannot be made more efficient—and that is the attitude the government is definitely taking—displays a state of mind which would lead a commercial corporation into rapid bankruptcy.

That is no exaggeration, for it is the state of mind displayed by corporations just before they go to the wall. They figure everything is all right; they think they are in an entrenched position; the management does not want the affairs of the company looked into; they refuse to accept suggestions made by younger members of the staff; and the first thing they know they have gone to the wall.

This government seems to feel that because they operate with the taxpayers' money, economy and efficiency are of no importance. That demonstrates a state of mind which would cause the shareholders of a commercial corporation to demand a new management. I have been around a couple of the ridings in which by-elections are to be held, and have talked to many voters. Judging by the expressions of opinion given by ordinary men on the street, I feel confident that the people are going to demand a change in the management of the affairs of this country in the very near future.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I rise merely to deal with one point which has come up in the debate this afternoon. This was raised principally by the C.C.F. party. I take the most wholehearted objection to and am in complete disagreement with what they have said about the functions of this House of Commons. I am not a very old member of this house but I have been here for three parliaments and believe I have sufficient seniority to say the things I am about to say.

This House of Commons represents the people of the country, not only on a geographical basis, but on a professional, trade or calling basis. It represents them as individual members with particular skills and knowledge. Some hon. members are lawyers, some are doctors, some are farmers, some are businessmen and some are engineers. In my opinion the value of this house lies in the fact that it contains a great and varied assortment of different trades, callings, professions and lines of endeavour. When a particular question comes up there will be among us one, two, three or perhaps more who will be able to speak to the point with a great deal of professional or intimate knowledge of what is before the house. They will in fact know what they are talking about. I think that is of great value to any deliberative legislative assembly.

What are we doing? By the length of our sessions and the policy advocated by the C.C.F. we are endeavouring to make membership in this House of Commons the sole business and occupying the entire time of the elected member. I think that is wrong and dangerous. I think it is dangerous because if a member of parliament has nothing to do except to be a member his judgment on the questions coming before him will almost entirely be governed by political considerations. I repeat that that is wrong and dangerous. That is one danger arising from long sessions and the life we lead. We are making ourselves into professional politicians, and our judgment on the subjects coming before us is likely to be based entirely upon the political reaction to what we say or do in this place.

I think that is wrong and dangerous. If a man who is an engineer becomes a member of this house he should be able to continue as an engineer; he should have sufficient time to maintain his knowledge of his profession on at least a reasonably high level, and so with a man in any profession or in business. Otherwise we run the danger of becoming a group of robots whose actions are dictated either by party discipline or by the belief that taking a certain course will be politically advantageous. To me that is the antithesis of representative government. I feel that to take away a man's individuality when he becomes a member of this house is perilous. I believe that to adopt the suggestion put forward by the C.C.F. that this is an exclusive and full-time job would destroy the efficiency of this house so that it would no longer be a truly representative assembly of the Canadian people. In addition I think it would be most destructive to the democratic principles in which we believe.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Drew) which was negatived on the following division:

FLOOR PRICES FOR AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I rise to advance another matter of urgent public importance, Mr. Speaker, and that is the inadequacy of the government's floor prices under farm products and the failure, in many instances, to have those floor prices enforced. Towards the end of the war the government introduced the Agricultural Prices Support Act. At that time we were assured that there would be a fund of $200 million for the support of agricultural prices in the post-war period. The government assured us that when those prices were established for agricultural products they would be fair and reasonable, and would take into account the fact that farm prices were held down during the war years. We in this group have complained before that in the Agricultural Prices Support Act there is not a precise formula by which floor prices are established. We have, therefore, floor prices established from time to time that bear little or no relationship to the cost of production. Worse still, after the floor prices are established those floor prices are not enforced, and the producer often receives very little advantage from them.

Let us consider the floor price under hogs. That floor price is $26 per hundredweight for grade A hogs at Toronto.

The price for hogs that are overweight and for sows, No. 1 and No. 2, is forced down a long way below the floor particularly with market conditions as they are in western Canada. I believe that even in other parts of Canada farmers are often unable to market their hogs at the time they are within the grade A or B weights, and when the hog is overweight the government floor price fails to operate. I have received frequent protests from farmers in western Canada that the prices they are receiving for overweight hogs are as low as 13 cents a pound rail grade. When the price goes down to such a low figure, it certainly means a severe loss to agricultural producers. I say, therefore, that when the government establish a floor price under hogs they should establish a floor under each and every grade. When that floor price is set, then it should be enforced.

Mr. Gardiner: So it does.

Mr. Argue: Is the minister saying that the best floor price the government can give is $13 per hundredweight, rail grade, for No. 1 and No. 2 sows? As to the floor price under eggs, I do not know how it operates, I am sure. When the floor price was established back in the spring of 1950, the original announcement—and it has not been changed since then—was that the government would pay 38 cents per dozen for grade A large eggs coming out of storage in the fall; and that in addition to the 38 cents a dozen for grade A large eggs the government was prepared also to pay up to 5 cents per dozen as a storage fee. In other words, the packers could receive the basic 38-cent floor, plus 5 cents for storage, or a total of 43 cents a dozen for grade A large eggs. Today the quoted price in Saskatchewan of grade A large eggs is 27 cents a dozen. That is the quoted price, but I am afraid that most farmers are receiving a great deal less than that.

The farm wife in my constituency—and a number of them have written to me—who takes a case of eggs to the local storekeeper is often paid by the local storekeeper who handles the eggs on an average grade basis of 10 cents a dozen. The price is 10 cents a dozen to the producer and up to 43 cents a dozen to the packing company. The policy the government is now following in relation to eggs is one which has been of substantial benefit to the packing industry but is of precious little benefit to the farmers.

I say that whatever price is established for hogs, or for eggs or for any other farm product, should be a price payable to the producer and that the packing companies and the other buyers should be forced to pay those prices.

Mr. Blue: On a point of order, may I ask the hon. member this question. Do you sell your hogs rail grade or live grade?

Mr. Argue: That is no point of order. The hon. member has been around here a long time—

Mr. Blue: Answer the question.

Mr. Argue: I do not intend to answer that question.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Blue: I do not think you can.

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr. Blue: The price you are quoting is not the top price but the bottom price.

Mr. Argue: The prices I have quoted are for sows, rail grade, and not live hogs.

Mr. Blue: In Toronto?

Mr. Argue: No, not in Toronto. I do not expect the rate is much better there, but my hon. friend can check it. I did not however quote Toronto prices.

I say that the floor price under hogs, as it affects the hog producers in western Canada, and Saskatchewan hog producers in particular, is of little advantage because the farmers have difficulty in marketing their hogs when they are out of the right weights for grade A and grade B, and therefore have to take a much smaller price when the hogs are overweight.

Then the government announced a floor price for beef. Was it the floor price asked by the agricultural producers of Canada? The agricultural producers from one end of Canada to the other had asked for a floor price of $28.50 a hundredweight. I am getting, as I am sure are other hon. members, a great many resolutions from local rural municipal councils in western Canada. This one was a resolution passed by a particular rural municipal council in Saskatchewan, namely the rural municipality of Hazel Dell, No. 335, circulated to other municipal councils, a great many of whom passed the resolution and sent it to members of parliament and to the government. The resolution I now quote from was passed by the rural municipality of Key West, No. 70, and is a copy of the resolution sent to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). The resolution is as follows:

> It was moved by councillor John Prentice that whereas at the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities in Saskatoon on March 14, 1952, no amendment was moved, as was anticipated, to have the 25-cent floor price on cattle changed to 28½ cents, and also that a fair floor price on sheep and lambs be implemented;
> And whereas the federal government suggested floor price of 25 cents based at Toronto is not sufficient in comparison with the high costs the livestock producer has to pay;
> And whereas it is regrettable that cattle in Saskatchewan have to be sold at about half the price they are worth;
> Therefore be it resolved that we ask the federal government to immediately implement a floor price of 28½ cents for cattle and a fair floor price for sheep and lambs.

That is the resolution that is being circulated amongst the rural municipalities in Saskatchewan and is being passed by these municipalities. It informs the government that the 25-cent floor price is too low, that the floor price should have been $28.50 per hundredweight. That is one important aspect of the government's floor price for beef.

Another important aspect is the fact that, even though a floor price is established, in a great many instances that floor price is not being received by the producer. In announcing the floor price on April 22, the Minister of Agriculture said that on good steers there would be a floor price, basis $23.35 a hundredweight at Winnipeg. I have before me the Winnipeg Free Press for Saturday last. It quotes the prices for good steers, over 1,000 pounds, on the Winnipeg market at from $21 a hundredweight to $22.50 a hundredweight. Therefore the price quoted by the packers at Winnipeg is from $1 to $2 per hundredweight less than the government's floor price. Whenever a floor price is set, I think it should be an equitable floor price. But even if it is a floor price which is less than that which I should like to see established, nevertheless I feel it is the duty of the government to enforce that floor price once it is established. Although the minister announced in parliament that at Winnipeg the floor price for good steers would be $23.35 a hundredweight, we find a few weeks later that the farmers are receiving from $1 to $2 a hundredweight less than the floor price.

The situation at Saskatoon is even worse than the situation at Winnipeg. It was announced by the minister that the floor price on good steers at Saskatoon was to be $22.80 per hundredweight. I have the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix for Wednesday, May 7, the most recent issue of Star-Phoenix available in the reading room. It quotes good steers at Saskatoon at from $18.75 to $19.50 a hundredweight. In other words, the price the producer is receiving at Saskatoon is from $3 to $4 a hundredweight less than the government's announced floor price.

Of what value is the floor price if, after it is announced, it is not paid to the producer? The producers in Canada want adequate floor prices. The beef producers say the present floor price is $3.50 a hundredweight less than an adequate floor price. But the floor price that is set is not being paid, so instead of the farmers receiving $28.50 per hundredweight, as they rightly believe they should receive, at Saskatoon, they are receiving $17, $18 or $19 a hundredweight.

In the same issue of the Star-Phoenix there is on the front page a report quoting the text of two telegrams sent by Hon. I. C. Nollet, Saskatchewan minister of agriculture, to Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner. The first telegram reads as follows:

> Relative to very serious livestock situation that has grown worse as result of restrictions on outward movement of Saskatchewan cattle. The livestock marketing situation now desperate in Saskatchewan. With no outlet available to this province, good steers at Saskatchewan selling from 16 cents to 17 cents. Saskatoon market four to five cents lower than any other market on prairies. Again urge federal government to use emergency power if necessary to take complete control and guarantee at least that floor prices be observed.

A further telegram was sent after the Saskatchewan minister of agriculture had been in contact with Saskatchewan wheat pool officials, and that further telegram to the Minister of Agriculture reads as follows:

> Have discussed livestock marketing situation further with wheat pool officials. Saskatchewan government prepared to co-operate fully relative to provincial jurisdiction to facilitate orderly marketing and maintenance of floor prices on livestock when restrictions, interprovincial trade, removed. Authorized to say pool officials offer full co-operation.

There, Mr. Speaker, in a brief way is outlined the situation that agricultural producers are facing, particularly the beef producers, a market of 16 cents to 17 cents a pound at Saskatoon, interprovincial restrictions—

Mr. Gardiner: Why don't you read my replies to the wires?

Mr. Argue: I do not believe the reply is in the Star-Phoenix, sir. I will send the paper over to the minister, and if he can find the replies there I shall be very pleased to read them, but I did not come across them.

Mr. Gardiner: I know they are not there, just his wires.

Mr. Argue: Perhaps the Right Hon. Minister of Agriculture did not reply—

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, I did.

Mr. Argue: —to the minister at that time. It says that these telegrams were given to the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix by telephone.

Mr. Gardiner: In other words, he gave the wires to the papers before I had them.

Mr. Argue: Well, I did not say that. If the minister wants to make that statement on his own initiative he may. I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. Gardiner: I am saying it.

Mr. Argue: All I am saying is that in this issue of the Star-Phoenix there is no telegram from the Minister of Agriculture in reply to that message. As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, the prices that the producers are now receiving are wholly unsatisfactory. I am bringing this situation to the attention of the minister—

Mr. Blue: May I ask the speaker a question?

Mr. Argue: —in the hope that the minister can take action to see that these floor prices are in fact paid. We had hoped—

Mr. Blue: No question?

Mr. Argue: —that something tangible would be done to help the beef industry.

Mr. Blue: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Argue: All right; let's have it.

Mr. Blue: Well, sit down while I am asking it, please. I do not ask as many questions as you do, but I am going to ask you one.

Mr. Argue: Make it sensible.

Mr. Blue: Just a minute; did the hon. member for Assiniboia or his family ever go into a retail store and offer the retailer any more than the retailer asked to help out the industry that produced the goods he was selling?

Mr. Argue: That is a very silly question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Blue: Wait a minute.

Mr. Argue: And is a measure of the intelligence of my hon. friend.

Mr. Blue: I am asking a question—

Mr. Argue: I am discussing, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Blue: You have not answered the question I asked you.

Mr. Argue: It was a ridiculous question.

Mr. Blue: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker; the hon. member has not answered my question. I do not ask many questions and I ask him for a point-blank answer.

Mr. Noseworthy: He does not have to answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Argue: That was not a question of privilege at all. It is just another blue interruption from my hon. friend.

I was about to quote from the statement of the Minister of Agriculture of April 22 in regard to the government's floor prices, as found on page 1471 of Hansard:

If the market is oversupplied, it means the price to producers will remain at the floor.

With too many steers coming on the market the price will remain at the floor. It has not done so.

With the fixing of a floor price, it will be possible for the producer to market his cattle in an orderly manner with only finished cattle reaching the market, and if this is done the producer may expect to continue to sell all his cattle without undue market gluts, and may from time to time receive prices higher than the floor.

The minister said that the farmers would get at least the floor price, and perhaps more. Therefore that statement is certainly not being carried out. The statement goes on to say:

There are various reasons why it will be in the best interests of the cattle industry to delay the marketing of cattle while the United States embargo is still in effect, and attention is drawn specifically to the following:

I want hon. members to note this very brilliant statement:

1. When the American embargo is lifted, that market will again be available.

Well I suppose it would be equally true that when the market is again available the American embargo will have been lifted. But in any case we know that the United States is not willing to let Mexican beef into the United States for a full twelve-month period after the last case of foot-and-mouth disease has been cleaned up. If we get no better treatment—and I hope we get better treatment—

Mr. Gardiner: How do you know that?

Mr. Argue: If we get the same treatment that the United States has given to Mexico then we are facing a serious marketing situation for a good many months to come. I continue with the minister's statement:

2. Orderly marketing will relieve market congestion and undue pressure on prices received by farmers.

Well, the pressure is there, and the floor has not stopped the pressure because the prices are going right down through the floor.

The Minister of Agriculture continues:

3. The establishment of a floor price means the producer will always be in a position to obtain a minimum price for the particular grade of animals which he has to market until such time as the United States embargo is lifted.

Well, the floor price was set on good steers. I believe that floor price should have been set on each and every grade. After the floor price is set on the various grades, then the government should make sure that the packing companies pay to the producers the government's floor price.

The floor price under wheat, if I may use that as an example, is a floor price that is established for the producer. It is set on the basis of a certain grade at Fort William. The freight and handling charges are deducted, and the producer knows exactly what he will get at any given marketing point for a certain grade of wheat. That is the type of floor price that farmers demand in relation to beef, in relation to eggs, in relation to hogs or in relation to any other floors the government may establish. The floor price should be established payable to the producers and that floor price should be enforced.

When I questioned the minister on May 1 in regard to the floor price on eggs, and pointed out that producers at many points were receiving as little as 10 cents a dozen, he replied as reported at page 1758 of Hansard:

That is, if buyers of eggs who are putting eggs in storage are, over a period of time, buying eggs at, say, 10 cents a dozen, when the price at which we agree to take them over is 38 cents, they have been notified that it will make it extremely difficult, if not impossible, for them to collect from the government.

That is little assurance to the egg producers in Canada. The best they can hope for, and the only action the government will take, is to say to the packers, "Well, if you will not pay the floor price perhaps it will be difficult for you to collect from the government." What we need is a law in the country that sets the floor price, makes it mandatory that packers pay those floor prices, and then if they break the law, the packing firms should be penalized. No grain company dare pay less than the established prices for grain because, if they did, they would be penalized. And so I say that the law should be established setting a floor price, and that if the law is broken by a packing company, or by anybody else, the offenders should be penalized for having purchased farm products at less than the floor prices.

The minister again at a later date, on May 8, had this to say in regard to the general situation:

Mr. Gardiner: I think I stated yesterday—if I did not, I will state it now—that we have a definite understanding with all the provinces that we shall be permitted to exercise even the authority which the provinces think is their responsibility with respect to the marketing of meat as long as the United States embargo remains in effect. This arrangement has been functioning fairly satisfactorily.

The minister says that the arrangement is functioning fairly satisfactorily. Yet, at the same time, beef producers in Saskatchewan are receiving $3, $4 or $5 per hundredweight less than the floor price. How can we expect to get a better floor price when the minister says that the arrangement has been functioning fairly satisfactorily?

He did give us a ray of hope on Friday, May 2, when he referred to the excellent job his parliamentary assistant, the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. McCubbin), had done when he made a trip to Calgary and corrected the prices that were being paid, prices that had been lower than the floor. I am glad the parliamentary assistant made that trip, and I am glad it was successful. I suggest the Minister of Agriculture should send his parliamentary assistant to Saskatoon and, on the basis of his very successful trip to Calgary, perhaps he will be able to get the floor prices actually operating, and have them paid to the producers.

Mr. Gardiner: It is already arranged; he is going Wednesday.

Mr. Argue: My suggestion, then, was very timely. The minister says he is going; I wish him good luck. There is a real problem out there that must be solved.

I have mentioned the floor price under hogs and the floor price under beef. I believe the cheese producers in central Canada are facing very difficult times, and that they too should be given an adequate floor price. When that price is established, it should be enforced.

I see that according to the Ottawa Journal of May 9 the Ontario cheese producers refused a price of 23 cents a pound for 9,000 cheeses, when they were offered at auction. That in my opinion is a pretty low price, and I do not blame the cheese producers for doing their best to get a higher price. With the United Kingdom market lost, and with the American embargo on the shipment of cheese to the United States, it is no wonder that the price has gone down to the low point of 23 cents. I suggest the government should establish an adequate floor on cheese, a floor of at least 30 or 31 cents a pound, and that the government should negotiate an agreement with the United Kingdom for the sale of our cheese. Further protests should be made against the practice of the United States of placing embargoes on cheese and other Canadian agricultural products in contravention of the Geneva trade agreements.

I was not in the house last Friday at the time the minister made his announcement in regard to the arrangements that have been made for the sale of beef and pork to the United Kingdom. It was apparently a three-way deal. I read carefully the minister's statement in Hansard, and I noted that in his statement there was no reference to the quantity involved.

Since that time I have seen it stated in the press that the quantity involved was 30 million pounds of beef and 10 million pounds of pork. I do not know whether or not that is the correct quantity, but that was the quantity mentioned in the press. I do not know the price the Canadian government will receive for that quantity of meat; but on looking over the figures for beef and pork products, and live cattle shipped to the United States in 1951, I see that we shipped over 100 million pounds of beef and pork, and that in the same year we also shipped 200,218 head of beef cattle as well as 37,447 head of dairy cattle.

The announcement of the Minister of Agriculture, as reported in the press, is that we now have an export market for 40 million pounds of meat products. Last year we shipped not 40 million but 100 million pounds to the United States in the form of meat. We shipped perhaps almost another 100 million pounds in the form of live cattle. And so the quantity the minister announced is only a small proportion of our meat exports last year.

I would take it that the arrangement provides for the normal export of Canadian meat for a period of about three months. So that it will be necessary for the government to continue to watch our export markets, and to see that immediately the 40 million pounds is supplied other arrangements are made for a continuing export market.

We in this group have said frequently that we believe the British market should be the best permanent Canadian market for bacon and dairy products. We believe, further, that by barter and other trade arrangements the government could have maintained more successfully than it has our market in Great Britain. I hope the market we now establish over there, although a temporary one according to the announcement, may lead to a recapturing of the British market for Canadian bacon and, I would also hope, for Canadian dairy products.

I have said already that the floor prices the government has established are in most instances inadequate, and in many more instances are not being enforced. They are on a temporary and unsatisfactory basis. The floor price for beef is on a month-to-month basis. On June 1 the Minister of Agriculture will announce the floor price on beef for July. On July 1 the announcement will be made for August. So if there is a downward trend in the market there is no assurance that the market will not be allowed to continue to go down.

All the government says is, "From one month to the next we shall provide a very minor cushion, or some small restraint on the rapidity of the fall of the market." It is not enough to say to the livestock producers, "We will give you a month by month guarantee for beef." The very least the government should do is to give the beef producers of Canada a two-year guarantee in advance. We cannot expect stability in the beef industry when the floor price is up for revision every thirty days.

I suggest not only that the floor price under beef should be raised to $28.50 a hundredweight, but that it should be enforced. I suggest also that the floor price should be more permanent and projected over at least a two-year period. I hope the government will take whatever action is necessary to see that the disgraceful prices that are being paid for eggs in western Canada are corrected. The packers are making an absolute sham and farce of the government's floor prices.

The government either should establish floor prices and enforce them on eggs, hogs, beef and other products or should admit that its floor prices are not to be enforced. Then the agricultural producers would at least know where they stand. Once again I plead with the government to provide more adequate floor prices, to enforce their floor prices, and to establish them for a reasonable period of time.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, hon. members of the house who were here in 1944 will remember that the floor prices legislation was brought into effect just prior to the 1945 election.

Mr. Gardiner: This is just before the Saskatchewan election.

Mr. Wright: Many promises were made at that time with regard to what the effects of the floor prices legislation would be. We in this group endeavoured to have a formula placed in the act which would indicate to the producers of this country approximately what the floors would be under various agricultural products. In arguing at that time against that suggestion the minister stated that the government did not want to place any formula in the act as there were several factors which had to be taken into consideration in giving reasonable compensation to farmers for their cost of production and reasonable reimbursement for losses which had been suffered during the first two years of the war.

I think any fair-minded person who looks over the floor prices which the minister has established under this legislation during the past six years will say that neither of those factors has been taken into consideration. Invariably the endeavour has been to set prices which would in effect discourage farmers from producing further supplies of the products under which floors were being placed. I do not think that is a good enough way in which to implement legislation in connection with which such promises were made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner).

The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) has pointed out the way in which the packing houses of this country have played ball with the government in regard to these floor prices. I am quite sure that the farmers are not satisfied with the interpretation which the packers have placed on the floor prices legislation and the prices which the government have established. The packing houses have insisted on getting the benefit of both the rise and the fall in the market.

In 1946 when the ceiling prices were removed we found the packing houses of this country raising their prices immediately to the extent that they made something over $4 million in profits on the stocks which they had in storage at that time. The explanation which they gave later on to the price spreads committee was that it was necessary for them to do that as later on when agricultural prices dropped they would have to take a loss.

What happened last year when prices dropped? Prices to the consumer did not go down immediately. They lagged anywhere from six weeks to three months, and in the case of bacon it was some six months before the price to the consumer dropped. If the packing houses were entitled to the benefit of a rise in the market then they should be in position to take some losses when the market drops. If the government was carrying out the promises it had made in connection with this floor prices legislation they would not allow the packing houses to carry on in the manner they are at the present time.

Mr. Gardiner: If what the hon. member says is true, how does he account for the fact that the prices of hogs in Canada have been higher for several months than prices in the United States?

Mr. Wright: We are not talking about the United States market; we are talking about the market in Canada and the floor prices which have been guaranteed to the packers on pork products. The government has guaranteed a price, if I remember correctly, of 65 cents per pound for several million pounds of canned pork. For that the packers were supposed to pay the same price for heavy hogs as they were paying for bacon hogs, but the minister knows that they have not done that. The minister should not keep interrupting. If he would do something about these things instead of interrupting it would be much more to his credit.

The only way in which agriculture in this country is going to be able to function successfully is to have some long-term agricultural policy introduced which will give some security for the future. If we are to meet the demands and needs for food, not only in Canada but throughout the world, agriculture must be assured some stability. It certainly is no stability to have floor prices placed under agricultural products from year to year. We have now got down to a month to month basis. You just cannot have a successful agricultural industry in this country with a policy such as that. That is something which the agricultural industry cannot understand, nor can our farmers understand. They know that in agriculture you have to plan, not just for one year but in the case of livestock and dairying for at least five years ahead. If agriculture is to be effective there must be some forward pricing or some assurance from the government that under this floor prices legislation reasonable consideration will be given to finding markets. One of the grave mistakes made in 1947 was to allow the British market for bacon and dairy products to slip out of our hands because we were not prepared to make any concessions or to take their goods or accept their currency. The time is coming when we are going to have to do that. The time is coming when, if we are going to maintain the agricultural industry of this country, we will have to develop permanent markets for our products in Great Britain.

On motion of Mr. Wright the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will continue with the motion to go into supply and I will call the four departments I mentioned on Friday evening. Then the Minister of National Defence will proceed with the resolution to amend the National Defence Act. The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys will proceed with his resolution respecting the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. We will then take up Bill No. 210, to provide for carrying into effect the treaty of peace between Canada and Japan. We may not proceed with that if the hon. member for Peel is not in the house. We will then take up the resolution to approve the ratification of the convention concerning genocide; Bill No. 63, to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act; Bill No. 93, to amend the Export and Import Permits Act; Bill No. 196, to amend the Supreme Court Act; Bill No. 197, to amend the Interpretation Act; and Bill No. 195, to amend the Government Employees Compensation Act. I understand most of these measures are not controversial and should not take very long.

Mr. Knowles: Can we be assured that neither of the motions listed under government notices of motion will be proceeded with without notice the night before?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, no; I would not do that to the house. When we decide to proceed with those notices of motion I shall mention them the day before.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 13, 1952

The house met at three o'clock.

BRIDGES

BURLINGTON CANAL—REPLACEMENT OF DAMAGED STRUCTURE

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add a few words to the statement I made respecting the accident to the Burlington bridge.

A meeting was held in Ottawa today between the acting minister of highways for Ontario, the Hon. George Dunbar, and myself, and it was agreed that the first step in connection with the solution of the replacement of the Burlington canal bridge, which was wrecked by the steamer W. Fitzgerald on April 29, would be the replacement of the structure with a temporary non-movable bridge which would be started and carried to completion as early as possible.

Preceding this it will be necessary to remove the wrecked bridge, which work will be started immediately. It is expected that the removal of the wrecked bridge and the construction of the temporary bridge will be completed within the period of a month.

This is the first step in connection with what might be called the solution of the joint navigation and traffic problem.

CHEESE

QUESTION AS TO PRICE ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Major (Glengarry): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the Ontario cheese producers marketing board accepted the minister's offer of assistance in the sale of cheese under the agricultural co-operative marketing legislation of 1939? If the offer is not accepted by the Ontario cheese producers marketing board, is the minister ready to make recommendations that the government support cheese?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have had no further communications from the cheese producers in Ontario, so I am not in a position to say whether or not they intend to accept the suggestions which were made. I am discussing the question with council tomorrow, but I am not in a position to say what the results of that discussion will be.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, May 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) for committee of supply.

FLOOR PRICES FOR AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): When the house rose last night at eleven o'clock, Mr. Speaker, we were discussing the matter of floor prices under agricultural products, and dealing more particularly with the floor prices relating to animal products and their decline as a result of the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease. I was discussing also what measures the government was taking with regard to that. I had pointed out that when this floor price legislation was introduced in 1944 the minister had made certain promises to the house and to the agricultural industry, concerning the basis on which those floor prices were to be established. I had gone on to point out that in my opinion, and I think in the opinion of the agriculture industry, these floor prices are too low, and that even these inadequate floor prices are not being paid the farmers, owing to the failure of the purchasers of farm products to co-operate fully with the government in maintaining them.

I should like to place certain figures on the record with respect to the adequacy or otherwise of these floor prices and whether or not they really cover the cost of production of agricultural products. Anyone who understands agriculture will agree that there are three or four main cost items entering into it. First, there is the cost of living of the farm family; second, the wages paid; third, the cost of farm machinery, and finally, farm taxes. I think probably those are the four main costs in connection with agricultural products.

With regard to farm living costs, I have in my hand the Canadian Statistical Review for April, 1952. At page 22 it indicates that in April, 1951, the index of farm living costs stood at 197·1. In January of 1952 it stood at 215·8, so in just a few months it had risen by 18·7 points. The cost of living index for Canadians as a whole has declined, but the index of farm living costs has not had a proportionate reduction.

With regard to farm wages, this morning I got in touch with the bureau of statistics, who were able to give me certain figures. These show that in 1940 the average wage paid on the farms of Canada was $41 per month, with board. By 1945 this had risen to $72, and by 1950 to $101. It has continued to rise, and I venture to say that at the present time it probably stands closer to $110. So in that period there has been a substantial rise in that item of cost to the farmer.

Then take farm taxes. Taxes on owned lands and buildings in Canada in 1939 amounted to $19,200,000. By 1945 these taxes had increased to $39,100,000 and by 1950 to $58,500,000. Again I am sure that if the figures were available for 1951 and 1952 they would show a further substantial increase.

As to operating costs on the farm, I asked the bureau what farmers spent in operating costs for tractors in that same period. I was astonished to find that in 1939 the operating cost of tractors was $22,800,000. By 1945 this had risen to $47,900,000, and by 1950 it had increased to $97 million. Of course more tractors are being used today than in 1939. But if we take farm machinery repairs, another large item of farm costs, we find that in 1939 the farmers of Canada paid $19,200,000 for farm machinery repairs. In 1945 they paid $31,100,000, and by 1950 these costs had risen to $58,500,000, or more than three times the cost in 1939.

Then take farm machinery itself. Using 1935-39 as a base of 100, we find that in 1939 the farm machinery index stood at 103·6. By 1945 it had risen to 115·1 and by 1950 to 186·8, and that increase is continuing. That is not the whole story, either. If you look over the prices of farm machinery you will find that the greater increases are in the prices of the newer types of machinery, the kind we are buying today. Those increases are greater than the increases in the prices of some of the older machines which enter into the cost index but are not being used as much today. For instance, in 1945 a ten or twelve-foot self-propelled combine cost about $2,800. Today the same combine costs just over $5,000, so it has almost doubled in cost in the last six years. That is why farmers are alarmed today. They see the prices of the things they have to sell going down while the cost of the things that enter into their cost of production continues to rise.

[Mr. Wright.]

Just what has the drop amounted to in the prices of things the farmer has to sell? I am not going to give the figures on grain, though there has been a serious drop in price owing to the increase in the value of the Canadian dollar. There has been a drop of at least twenty cents in the price of wheat. Take animal products. In July of 1951 the index stood at 358·9. By February of this year it had dropped to 297·3, or a decline of 61·6 points in just a few months. And that was before or just at the time of the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in western Canada. Since that time there has been a further serious decline in the prices of agricultural products. It is no wonder that members of this house protest when they see that situation beginning to appear in Canada, with a serious decline in the purchasing power of the agriculture industry and no decline in their costs of production. That must inevitably result in less purchasing power for the farmers, and that reduced purchasing power sooner or later must result in unemployment in the industries in eastern Canada and elsewhere which supply the machinery industry for agriculture.

I hope hon. members from eastern Canada will not think that we in the west are simply making a plea for ourselves. We are not. We believe the best way to stop a decline or a depression in this country is to maintain a reasonable basis of prices for agricultural products, which will bear a fair relationship to the cost of what the farmer has to buy. That is the only way we can maintain a prosperous Canada. So I say every member in this house, whether from eastern Canada or western Canada, should be vitally interested in maintaining a reasonable floor price under agricultural products that will represent something near the cost of production. I must say that in my opinion the floor prices that have been established today do not nearly represent that cost.

Unless something is done by the government to see that these floor prices do represent the cost of production, and that when they do set a floor price it is payable to the producer, not to the processor of those products alone; that he shall have all the guarantee and that the industry itself shall be guaranteed only through the competition which the minister says must result from the present floor price—unless this is done, the farmers will not be satisfied. I do not think that competition has been sufficient to guarantee to the farmers the result which the minister I am sure desires. It certainly has not been enough; there has not been enough competition to maintain a reasonable floor price under eggs or under some of the other agricultural products. Figures produced in this house and sent to the minister by individual farmers, by farm organizations, have I am sure proved that to him.

I think the government should take immediate steps to see that these floor prices, even though they are inadequate, are paid to the producers and not to the processors.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): The question under discussion is the government's price support program and the failure of certain packing plants to pay the support price. With regard to the second point, I hope the minister will be in a position to assure us that conversations are now going on with the packing plants and that that difficulty will soon be eliminated.

It was on the other point I wanted to speak chiefly. Today is probably an opportune time to discuss the whole question of floor prices, because I think it is correct to say that this year is the first time that a real test has been made of the efficiency of operation of the government's floor price program.

I believe that to operate efficiently this program must have public opinion behind it. Moreover, I am satisfied that if the people of Canada realize the basis of the program they will be prepared to support it. Therefore I think it is unfortunate that at this time certain Canadian organizations should see fit to attack the government's support program. I have in mind the March news letter of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, printed in part in the Alberta wheat pool budget of March 28. I want to quote briefly from it, and from a short statement by the wheat pool in reply to it, and then make my own comments. It is under the heading: "Where do we stand?" and reads as follows:

> "Do we as Canadians believe in the principle of the free market, or do we not? Do we or do we not believe in a competitive economic system based on the law of supply and demand? These questions arise as the result of the action of the federal government in establishing a floor price for marketing of hogs—in fact pegging the price at the prevailing level.
> "Here we have the rather anomalous situation of the Canadian people clamouring for a lower cost of living, and when the price of one of the primary factors entering into that cost of living—meat—starts to decline, the government steps in to make sure that prices won't go any lower. The completely astounding thing about this is the thunderous silence of Mr. and Mrs. Consumer.

No doubt the reason for that is that the general consumer and the public apparently have a far better understanding of the situation than the Canadian Chamber of Commerce have. I would just like to quote a reply given in the wheat pool budget, which deals objectively with the question of free competitive enterprise:

> It is easy to talk about free enterprise and the free market. But the same is more honoured in the breach than in the observance by Canadian business interests. In support of that statement we draw the attention of the chamber of commerce to the monopoly investigations into bakery establishments, flour milling, the making of dental and optical supplies, match manufacturing, etc., and those investigations, we believe, touched only the fringe. Those boys didn't practise free enterprise and abide by the free market!
> Government assistance and government support of measures that have led to monopoly have been the rule ever since Canadian confederation.

I want to go on with the statement of the chamber of commerce:

> The explanation which was given for the government's action, according to the press, was that if farmers took a heavy loss in hogs this year, they would not raise any next year. Then a shortage would develop and prices would again skyrocket. The other side of the situation of course was not mentioned at all. With a guaranteed price for hogs, producers will merrily continue to raise hogs beyond the desire or the capacity of the market.

The farmers of this country, Mr. Speaker, could, if they so decided, so adjust their operations as to increase prices under the law of supply and demand; that is to say, the farm organizations could organize and reduce agricultural production so that the prices would rise. Does the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, or anybody else, think for one minute that that would be to the advantage of the Canadian people? Would it be to the advantage of the other nations of the world? Would it be to the advantage of those nations which at the present time have many people on the verge of starvation? Surely a country like Canada, which is hoping to give a certain degree of leadership in the world, could not justify a reduction in production at this time. And yet the Canadian Chamber of Commerce criticize the government for supporting a program which helps to maintain production, and as a result they say it means higher prices. They apparently argue that it would be better to let the prices fall so that the production would be reduced.

I think we have an obligation to the world today to do everything possible that we can to maintain production at a high level, and I would suggest that one of the most logical ways to do that is to maintain a floor price under agricultural products. By that I do not mean an excessively high price; I mean a price that will bear a fair relationship to the prices of other commodities. I would say the program can be fully justified in many ways. First of all, let me give some background.

It will be recalled that in the depression years the prices of farm products fell very much faster and very much farther than the prices of other commodities. While the prices of commodities of the secondary industries fell only 25 per cent, the prices of farm products fell over 65 per cent. And when time and again during the 1930's farmers and farm organizations would complain about the low level of agricultural prices they were told that nothing could be done about it because we were an exporting nation and therefore our prices internally had to be governed by the export prices. But it is interesting to note that that was not the policy of the secondary industries at that time. Many of those secondary industries maintained a two-price system. They sold at high prices in Canada, and then they sold at a lower price in the export market.

I recall that in the 1930's you could buy a Massey-Harris binder cheaper in Britain than you could buy it in Canada, so they were not maintaining their price on the export market; however, that was the policy at that time. True there were one or two minor exceptions, but generally speaking the prices of agricultural products were maintained at the prices that obtained in the export market. When the war came on and prices rose we adopted a price control policy in this country and price ceilings were placed upon agricultural products. The farmers then found themselves in this somewhat difficult position. During the ten years of the depression they had had to accept world market prices, prices that were far below cost of production, and many farmers went heavily into debt; many of them went bankrupt. Well, if an industry has to accept world prices when prices are low, surely it is justified in expecting to get world market prices when they rise, because that is the only way they can make up the losses they suffer during the time they are selling at prices which are far below the cost of production.

The government apparently realized that and said to the farmers: We are going to maintain a price ceiling on your products, but that is part of a general stabilization program. In return for that we are going to see to it that in the future the prices of your commodities are not allowed to fall below a fair level. And so the Agricultural Prices Support Act was put into operation. We commended the government when that legislation was brought down. I thought it good legislation then, and I think it is good legislation today. Certain changes need to be made, but the general principle behind the Agricultural Prices Support Act in my opinion is absolutely sound. When that act was put into operation, for the first few years it was not necessary to use it because prices were high. However in 1950 the prices of certain commodities began to fall out of line. Agricultural organizations took a great deal of interest in the manner in which the act was to be used to ascertain what the support prices should be.

At the convention of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture held at Niagara the minister dealt in a general way with the basis of the formula, and stated that prices for farm produce would be maintained at a level which would afford the same relationship to the prices of other commodities as existed from 1943 to 1945 at the time the Agricultural Prices Support Act was put into operation.

The interesting point today is to compare the prices of farm products on the basis of that formula. With that in mind I wrote to the bureau of statistics asking them to give me what prices of farm products should be today on the basis of that formula, so that the prices of farm products today would bear its same relationship to the prices of other commodities as existed in 1943-45.

According to the figures they have given me, in some cases the floor is a little higher; but in most cases it is lower than it should have been. This table is prepared under four columns, and I should like to place it on Hansard. Before doing so however I shall read the items because, as I go along, I shall comment upon them.

The first item concerning which I asked information was wheat No. 1 northern, per bushel, delivered at Fort William, Port Arthur or Vancouver. I realize that wheat does not come under the Agricultural Prices Support Act, but I asked for those figures only to find out what the price of wheat would be if it had been under the act. It is interesting to note that the average price for 1943-45 for No. 1 northern wheat, basis Fort William, was $1.391. In column 2, which relates to the general wholesale index today, the price would be $2.306. On the other hand, if we compare that price with the price that farmers have to pay for other commodities today the price of wheat would then be $2.530. The actual price for wheat today is about $1.80, under the international wheat agreement. So actually the price the farmer is receiving today under the international wheat agreement is 70 cents less than the price he should receive under the formula of the Agricultural Prices Support Act.

The next item about which I asked was hogs, grade B-1, dressed, Winnipeg, per hundredweight. The actual average price in 1943-45 was $16.341. Column 2, in relation to the wholesale price index today, shows a price of $27.093. Under column 3, which shows the relationship to prices that farmers have to pay for other commodities, the price would be $29.724. The actual price at the time of this report—January, 1952—was $25.390. So that the farmers were receiving around $4 less than the support price should be under the formula of the Agricultural Prices Support Act. I believe the floor price is somewhere in the neighbourhood of $25; therefore the price I have indicated here is about $3.50 per hundredweight under the formula.

The next item refers to good steers, up to 1,050 pounds, Winnipeg, per hundredweight. The average price in 1943-45 was $11.265. The price under the general wholesale index would be $18.677, and as related to the prices the farmers pay for other commodities it would be $20.491. The price at the time the report was issued in January was $30.670. The support price now is about $23.35, so that the support price is actually about $2.85 above the formula.

With regard to eggs, grade A large, at Winnipeg, the actual average price 1943-45 was $·404; the figure in column 2 is $·670, and in column 3 $·735. The price in January of this year was $·405. So the price of eggs at that time was about 33 cents a dozen less than it should have been under the Agricultural Prices Support Act formula. However I understand that the price of eggs today in many parts of western Canada is far below 40 cents. Indeed, I heard one member mention 10 cents a dozen. But even if 40 cents was being paid, that would be 30 cents less than it should be under the formula.

The next item is Cheddar cheese No. 1 white, per pound, f.o.b. Montreal warehouse. The actual average price in 1943-45 was $·205; the figure in column 2 is $·340 and in column 3 $·373, with the January price at $·440. So the price of cheese at that time was above the price to be paid under the formula—approximately 7 cents above that price.

Then we come to creamery butter, per pound at Winnipeg, and we find that the average price for 1943-45 was $·352. The figure in column 2 is $·587 and in column 3 $·640. The January price in this year was $·670. So that that price is slightly above the formula.

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask a question? Do I understand that the hon. member asked the bureau of statistics for certain facts—the price of hogs at a certain date—and did his own reasoning?

Mr. Quelch: No, it is all worked out in the table.

Mr. Gardiner: Or did he ask them to work out the formula?

Mr. Quelch: Yes. On the basis of 1943-45, as a base year, I asked them to show what the prices would be this year.

Mr. Gardiner: I am not going to say that the hon. member is wrong, but I am going to say that he asked the wrong authority for the information.

Mr. Quelch: I first of all wrote to the—

Mr. Gardiner: They are not the people who figure that out.

Mr. Quelch: Well, perhaps I had better read the letter from the bureau of statistics. It says:

Dear Mr. Quelch:

Your letter of April 7, addressed to Mr. W. G. Morris of this bureau, has been relayed to this office for reply.

We are not sure exactly which commodity group you desire to compare with the commodities you have specified, and have prepared the enclosed table which provides the following information:

1. The 1943-1945 actual average price of the items specified in your letter.
2. These prices times the percentage increase between 1943-1945 and January, 1952, in the general wholesale index.
3. These prices times the percentage increase between the same dates as shown by the index of commodities and services used by farmers.
4. The January, 1952, actual prices.

I shall put the table on Hansard—and the letter too, if it is desired.

Mr. Gardiner: The point is that they do suggest that they are not too sure what you are talking about—and I can imagine they would not be.

Mr. Quelch: It is quite clear; and the letter shows that they understood, because they wanted to know whether it should be compared with the wholesale price index or the price the farmer pays for the commodity. And in order that there should be no disagreement on the point they put the information in two columns, one based upon the wholesale price index, and the other based upon the price index of the things the farmer buys today. I think of the two the second one is the one which should count.

Mr. Gardiner: My only suggestion is that you should address your questions to the agricultural prices support board, because they are the people who can give you the information based upon any statement that I made.

Mr. Quelch: I can quite understand that the agricultural prices support board could give me the basis it is working on, but I want statistics to show what the support prices would be on the basis of the formula the minister outlined to the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and this house.

The minister will be able to tell us how that formula has worked out, and why as a result of the working out of that formula the price that should have been provided has not been provided.

I merely wanted statistics from the bureau. I wrote to the farm branch of the bureau of statistics and I think they are quite competent to give me that information. I should like to place this statement on the record.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to place the document on the record?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Quelch: The statement is as follows:

There has been some criticism of the formula. Many organizations feel that 1943-45 is not an entirely satisfactory base period. I agree, but on the other hand I would say that the formula is a whole lot better than nothing at all. We wanted a formula and the minister has given us one. With the help of the bureau of statistics we have been able to work out what the support prices should be on the basis of that formula. It is shown quite clearly that in the majority of cases the prices of other commodities have risen faster than the prices of farm products.

In the past most farm organizations have advocated that the floor prices for agricultural products should provide a parity income so that the income of the farmer will bear the same relationship to the national income as farm population does to the national population. If that formula was adopted, the prices of farm products would be considerably higher than is provided for in this formula, because today the farm population is about 25 per cent of the total population, whereas the farmers' share of the national income—I have not the latest figures—I believe is somewhere around 10 or 12 per cent.

Mr. Fair: It is 9·9 per cent.

Mr. Quelch: I am informed by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair), who obtained the figure from the bureau of statistics, that it is 9·9 per cent. There you have the farmers who represent 25 per cent of the population receiving only 9·9 per cent of the national income. That shows quite clearly that they are not receiving what could be called a parity price based on income. But I am glad, as I have said, that the government has brought in the Agricultural Prices Support Act, even though it is based upon a formula that seems to provide prices not sufficiently high. Again I say that that is far better than no support prices at all.

It seems to me that the important point is that the packing companies in Canada should be made to live up to the support prices. If they continue the practice of paying less than the support prices it will only destroy the efficiency of the operation of the whole program.

I have referred to the fact that the one way in which farmers can overcome a loss through the operations of the law of supply and demand would be to restrict production. On the other hand, even without the formula or without the Agricultural Prices Support Act the prices of agricultural products probably could be maintained fairly high if the government had an international policy which made it possible to move our surpluses to those nations that need them. I will not say that the Agricultural Prices Support Act would not be needed, but it would not be necessary to use it to anything like the extent it has had to be used when there was no means of exporting our surplus production.

I was interested in the speech made by the Minister of Agriculture before the food and agriculture organization when he stated that unless some better method of marketing was found he could hardly expect the farmers of Canada to expand their production. There is no use in the farmers expanding their production unless there is a market. Unfortunately as yet the FAO has not been able to submit any proposals for moving farm surpluses that meet with agreement by the member nations. They brought down a proposal for a world food board, but that was rejected. They brought down a proposal for an international commodity clearing house, but that was rejected. At the present time each nation has to depend upon its own resources to market its farm products.

I want to commend the government upon the agreement they have made with Great Britain and New Zealand for the disposal of beef. While there is a loss involved, it is far better to suffer a loss than to have beef rotting on the market or to have the farmers doing everything they can to reduce the production of cattle. It is a temporary expedient, but it is one which I think is justified. I hope if the government has any difficulty in disposing of surpluses in the future they will not hesitate to tread new paths. I do not believe that the use of the old orthodox channels of trade will provide the means for moving our surpluses of food products to the nations which need them. Ways and means of moving our surpluses to the nations facing widespread starvation must be found. If the practice of reducing the production of food, whilst millions of people are on the verge of starvation, becomes prevalent it will create fertile ground for the spread of communism throughout the world.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I want to take a few minutes to enter this discussion on price spreads. Throughout the war years and some of the years following, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) repeatedly asked the producers of this nation to keep up and expand their production of foodstuffs. They were told that ceilings would be placed on their products and that floors would be provided for in later years when markets might be declining. I think the institution of support prices was just and proper.

A number of the floor prices now prevailing are not satisfactory to the producers. As has been indicated, their cost of production is still rising. The bureau of statistics point out that the prices of farm machinery of the newer type will be advanced during the current year over the previous year. Farm wages and other costs are still increasing, despite the fact that they are already at an all-time high.

A question was asked today about placing a floor under cheese. This is a matter which affects the farmers of eastern Canada more than those of western Canada. I have talked to a number of dairy people during the past days and weeks and I found them in a rather sorry plight, I think through no fault of their own. They deserve some assistance by way of floor prices.

What I want to refer to chiefly at the moment is the floor prices under beef and hogs. The floor price under hogs was announced some time ago at a figure somewhat lower than that which had been asked for by organized agriculture. Taking into account the cost of feed, labour and all that, I do not think the price is sufficiently high.

With respect to the beef price, it is true that the government is working under rather vexing circumstances. These floor prices were announced early in the month of April, and throughout much of the country they are certainly not working satisfactorily. In the Winnipeg Tribune of May 8, the following report appeared:

> With no dominion price supports Alberta processors are getting cattle at bargain counter prices and hardly making an impression on available supplies.
> Alberta beef, laid down in Winnipeg at 39 cents a pound, carcass weight, is being sold for the same basic 92 cents a pound retail as Manitoba beef sides from city processors at 46 cents a pound.

The article goes on to point out the difficulty of contending with that sort of thing, and also that the consumers are not getting any benefit at this time. I asked a question of the Minister of Agriculture about these prices and what guarantee there was that they would go through to the producer. I understand that because of provincial embargoes great difficulty is being encountered. I am amazed that the Department of Justice has not given some ruling as to whether these provincial embargoes are justified. It shows lack of decision on the part of the Department of Justice, and certainly it is very bad for the country that the various provinces should balkanize the nation as they have been doing for many weeks.

Like the previous speaker (Mr. Quelch) I want to commend the minister and his staff for the efforts they have made in arranging the agreement between New Zealand, Great Britain and Canada with respect to beef. However, the agreement will far from take care of the surplus beef in Canada. I have not the exact figures before me, but I think I am safe in saying it will not take care of twenty per cent of the beef that we exported last year to the splendid United States market. Therefore hon. members will readily realize what a tremendous surplus of beef we shall have on our hands after the fulfilment of the contract for the current year between Canada, New Zealand and Great Britain. As time goes on I hope we shall be able to increase the amount of beef handled under this arrangement.

Then again, the price floors are on a monthly basis. I believe that they are to run until the first of July, and that there will then be a new adjustment. It is almost impossible for cattle breeders or producers to plan their operations on such a basis. I am fearful also as to what may happen to many producers this fall. As far back as I can remember, we have always had a great run of cattle during the fall months. People put cattle on grass and then cannot take care of them through the winter. I assume that many producers will try to carry more cattle through the winter, but many of them will be unable to do so. Some plan will have to be worked out to take care of the marketing of surplus beef during the fall months.

I have never yet heard a statement in the house as to the details of the working out of the floor price on beef and how it is carried through the various grades so as to ensure that the producer will be guaranteed the floor price. I should like to see such a statement put on Hansard. When the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease was announced in the third week of February the prices for cattle prevailing in the Winnipeg stockyards on February 22 were as follows: Steers, 30 cents; heifers, 28 cents; cows 21 cents; bulls, 23 cents; stock and feeder steers, 27 cents; stock and feeder heifers, 25 cents; cows, 20 cents, and veal calves 30 cents. Some months previously the market had been considerably higher. Therefore when one compares these figures with the present floor prices or the prices prevailing, one will see there is a very great difference.

While a great many producers are trying to help in this difficult time by holding back their livestock, some large producers of both hogs and cattle have stated that they are now going to get rid of their breeding stock and take their loss as at this time. It is a very confusing situation. I hope that the government will reconsider the question of floor prices and do more than they have done to stabilize production and assist producers. It means a great deal to the entire economy of Canada, apart from the producers themselves, and at the present time it is a very unsatisfactory state of affairs.

Mr. Picard: Mr. Speaker—

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Picard: I hope the minister is not closing the debate.

Mr. Gardiner: No, I did not start it. The debate is on an amendment moved from the other side of the house.

Some hon. Members: There is no amendment.

Mr. Gardiner: There is an amendment to the motion to go into supply.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Gardiner: It does not matter. It is not my motion and I have not spoken so far.

Mr. Graydon: Are you going to move an amendment?

Mr. Gardiner: No, I am not going to move an amendment.

The discussion last night and this afternoon has been on the question of floor prices. I am quite aware of the fact that one can take any set of prices, discuss them back and forth and arrive at all kinds of conclusions, but there are a few facts that I think are self-evident and that have a bearing upon the question. The first one is that in 1943 and 1944 we had the highest production that we have ever had. Those two years were the highest production years in agriculture. Production is not nearly so high now in some lines. It is just as high in wheat, but it is not as high in livestock products as it was in 1943 and 1944. Nevertheless, in spite of all that has been said this afternoon and last night, and whether or not floor prices had anything to do with it, we got twice as much in money for our farm products last year as we did in those years. I know that the first argument that is put forward after that statement is made is: Oh yes, but the costs of everything are higher now than they were then. However, before we would be in nearly as bad a position as has been outlined by some hon. members everything would have to cost at least twice as much in order that there might even be an argument about it at all.

Obviously, from statistics prepared by the same bureau that prepared these other statistics, we got $2,800 million for our farm products last year and $1,400 million in the years to which reference has been made. That is just double, and if anyone is trying to reason that the farmer is worse off because he has got double I would not agree with him.

Mr. Rowe: That would be in dollars.

Mr. Gardiner: That is in dollars. I say you can take all the considerations and argue yourself into any kind of decision you like if you want to start to argue from that point of view. It is like a person saying that because you load meat on the boat in Australia at 12 cents and it costs you 48 cents in Canada to do the same, you can start from there and say that Australia is four times as badly off. As a matter of fact there are so many factors entering into an argument of that kind that one would get lost before he could get half way through it. You certainly could not finish it in a forty minute speech. The obvious fact is that last year we got twice as much for what we sold as we did in the years that are taken as the basis for the relationship between our prices then and prices now.

In addition, we did not produce as much last year as we did in those years. That has some bearing upon the argument that our friends of the chamber of commerce are using, to the effect that you can affect your prices by producing less or more. If you produce too much then you will probably reduce your prices. If you produce too little you will probably raise your prices. I do not think that the farmers have been unwise in what they have done. I have heard members get up and criticize the government because farmers have reduced their production of certain products. As a matter of fact in most of these matters the farmers do not pay any attention to the government at all. They run their own show; they run their own business, and they know more about it than most members of the House of Commons. They realized that if they produced fifty per cent more hogs this year than they did previously, they would not get as much money for the greater number as they did for what they produced before. They realized that, and they carried on their activities accordingly. The farmers are producing those things which they think will help them to get along best, and the very fact that they got twice as much money last year producing less of the product than in the years referred to is an indication that they know what they are doing.

On the question of floor prices, it has been suggested time after time that we have a fund of $200 million and have not used very much of it. That carries me back to the debates of eight years ago, in 1944, when we introduced the bill under which we have the fund of $200 million to use in encouraging farmers to do one thing or another and to give them a better return for their products. The fact is, as I said the other day, that is a revolving fund. There is $200 million set up, and when we were discussing it eight years ago some members proposed that we ought to put a limit of four years on the operation of the Agricultural Prices Support Act. I took the position in the house at that time that it was eighteen years after the end of the first war before we came to the end of the period during which the difficulties had been experienced which we might find it necessary to look after now. It is now eight years after the passing of that act, and I think it can be truly said that the reasons we were anticipating eight years ago that would necessitate the passing of this legislation have never yet happened.

The reasons that were in our minds at that time were that we were going to have a great slump in prices in this country, particularly a great slump in agricultural prices. We had good reason for fearing that. The argument read a few moments ago by the member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) is the old argument that we have heard from those who are representing a group who passed that resolution. It is the same argument that has prevailed for centuries, if you like—certainly before the beginning of the lifetime of any member of this house—when it was argued that the way to stop inflation is to force down the farmer's prices first. You can force his prices down by denying him credits; denying him this and that; denying him money to spend on things. You can force down prices there, and by forcing down prices there you can control inflation.

The one undertaking the government gave, if they gave any at all, was to try to prevent that kind of thing happening at the end of this war. It has happened at the end of every other war, but it has not yet happened at the end of this one. I am not going to claim that is only because of the floor price legislation of this government. It has not happened at the end of this war because the people in other countries, as well as this, have been following a policy which has not resulted in that coming about in the manner in which it did before. Nevertheless, the remarks made by the member for Souris (Mr. Ross) and the member for Acadia are correct in this, that they have commended the government for having set a floor price policy and for having put it into effect. We have not used up the $200 million. I have said on a number of occasions, and I repeat it now, that if we had used up the $200 million the first year or the second year doing things that it was not necessary for us to do at all, but merely for the time being to have given the farmers another cent a pound or another cent a bushel on something, then we would have blown up the scheme in the very early stages. I am quite sure that long before this the house would have voted to take the amount out of the hands of the Department of Agriculture.

We took the $200 million and used that part which it was necessary for us to use in order to maintain price levels on a rising scale rather than a falling scale. I have said here on a number of occasions that I have never known a time when any country experienced prosperity by forcing prices down or by forcing wages down. Whenever we have experienced a depression, that is what we have been doing. On these occasions we have been doing it to satisfy the wishes of a very small minority of our population, and at the expense of the great majority. Since the end of the last war we have been following a different policy, not only in this country but in some others. We have been following the policy of collecting money from those who are making too much. Some people say we have got high taxes. Well, it all depends on what you are doing with the taxes whether that is a bad thing. When you are returning a large percentage of the money you collect from the few who have a lot of money to the great mass of people in the form of purchasing power, family allowances, old age pensions, health payments and that kind of thing, then it does not have the same effect as if you are just raising money and spending it to build bridges and roads. It is quite a different thing. We are collecting a considerable amount of money, and we are distributing it through family allowances, old age pensions and other forms, which makes it possible for the people to go out and buy farm products at higher prices than they have ever paid before; that is the method that has been followed.

Under that method we have done far more for the farmer, far more for the labouring man of this country, than has been done by any floor price legislation. Floor price legislation has not been nearly so necessary in this country as it would have been if other policies had been followed. What I am going to suggest to the members of the house this afternoon is that, important and all as floor price legislation is, there have been done some other things which have made it a little less necessary to have that kind of legislation in full operation.

Having said that, I am not going to agree that the act has not been used in the manner in which it was supposed to be used when we passed it, or that the results obtained have not been as beneficial as we expected them to be when we passed it. We have used that legislation in connection with most of the farm products, other than the grains, and each time we have used it it has been of some help. We have had some $40 million or $50 million of the fund in operation at one time. We have purchased the product and then resold it, and the money has gone back into the fund. I believe that the net amount that has been used is about $10 million. There have been made here today some statements which I think indicate that too many of the members have not a full understanding of the position in this country. This government cannot enforce prices on anyone in peacetime. The only time we can enforce prices upon anybody is in wartime. The reason for that is that civil rights are under the control of the provinces and not under the control of the dominion.

The only way we can arrange floor prices is by buying the product. We cannot compel anyone to pay certain prices. We can get agreement from them that they will pay certain prices. The only other way we can arrange the price is the method followed with butter and some of the other products. We say that if no one else will buy the products at this price, we will. We are now in the fourth year of following that method on butter and we have done fairly well. We have had very little criticism on it. We buy butter if anybody will sell it to us. During this last year we only got 280,000 pounds, and before that we got something in the neighbourhood of 44 million pounds. The years before that we got a considerable amount. During this last year others have found that they could take over butter at higher prices than we were prepared to pay and carry it down to the end of the season. We have been operating, therefore, but we have not compelled anybody to pay anything. We have simply said that we are prepared to buy butter most of the year at 58 cents a pound, and for a short time at 63 cents a pound. I repeat that we did not get any. Someone else paid a little more, and they got the butter and marketed it.

I am quite satisfied that if we had followed the policy suggested by the chamber of commerce, butter would have sold in this country last year at under 30 cents a pound, and that last winter people would have been paying at least double the price, if not a great deal more than that at which the farmer sold it in the summertime. It is all very well to talk about allowing absolute freedom in buying and selling, but after all there are many people out trying to make money who do need a little bit of regulating, and some need it more than others.

I am not going to agree with all that my hon. friends are saying about the packing houses. There is only one reason that men get up and talk that way. That is because it is popular out in certain parts of the country to shout down the packing houses. I want to tell the members of this house that during recent months, and particularly since the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease, we have had more out and out assistance and better co-operation from the packers of this country than we have had from anyone else except the farmers; and I know what I am talking about. The floor price for hogs is 26 cents. Well, if you do not think it is being acted upon, look at the newspapers every day. You will find that grade A hogs are being marketed at $26 right across this country. It took a week or two to get the system operating smoothly, of course, to put into operation the ideas that were brought forward; but we are doing it. Look at the price of beef today. I don't care what it was a week ago or what it was three or four days ago; look at the price today in the newspapers. You will find that it is the floor price, and that is so for only one reason, because we were finally able to make the arrangement that has been referred to already, under which we got the surplus off this market and over to Britain to be consumed. That arrangement was made only three or four days ago, and it was not possible for the packing houses and others in this country to operate as hon. members say they should have been operating until that arrangement was made.

Why do I say that? Because we have not sufficient cold storage capacity in this country to take care of the volume that was formerly going to the United States or coming onto our market. We were not more than a week or two into the experiences we had as a result of the foot-and-mouth disease until every packing house in this country was full to the roof.

If circumstances required farmers to bring animals to market and take what they could get for them, it was most difficult for anyone to do very much to help them. It is true that we did succeed in getting the packing houses to go back and pay the extra amounts for hogs that were marketed when storage could not be found and somebody would buy them at a lower price than the farmer should have had to take. We have been able to get the packing houses to go back and pay those farmers the higher prices they should have received. I do not know whether we will be able to have the same thing done in connection with beef. Take the case of a man who comes to the city of Edmonton with three steers, and finds the market practically closed. No packing house is buying, simply because they have no place to put the meat if they kill it. So he goes down the street and finds a butcher somewhere who is prepared to pay him 17 or 18 or 20 cents cash. In those circumstances there really is nothing we can do about it. In most cases where farmers persuaded packing houses to buy their animals anyway, to take them off their hands, we may be able to go back and have the packers pay more, simply because they now find they can move the product.

That is the sort of thing that can happen and is happening these days because of the deal that was made with Great Britain and New Zealand. The meat is being shipped out of storage. You do not hear any more of the complaints that caused the Tribune to publish the editorial which was read here a few moments ago. That editorial had reference to conditions that existed before my assistant was out in Calgary more than a week ago. Since that time there has been no necessity for such editorials. But editorials like that would have been written again by now, and with the facts in their favour, had it not been for the agreement with Great Britain and New Zealand. The storage would have been filled again with heavy beef. We would have had no place to send it, and it would have been back on our doorstep again. For almost twenty-four hours before the announcement was made, meat was moving out of Calgary and Edmonton. The newspapers were still publishing articles based upon the idea that someone had said we should ship east instead of shipping west. The beef was actually moving toward Great Britain hours before the public could know anything about it, because we had an understanding that no announcements would be made until that could be done in the three countries at the same time. Now that meat is moving.

There is one place, however, from which you cannot move meat yet. You cannot move meat out of Saskatchewan. I do not want to refer to what was said in committee this morning, because we are not supposed to discuss its proceedings, but there has been quite a lot of talk, and everyone who does not live in Saskatchewan thinks every animal in that province has been rubbing against an animal that had foot-and-mouth disease. So no one wants to eat any of those animals coming from Saskatchewan.

Fortunately we have had experiences of this kind before. In 1937 we went out to Saskatchewan and Alberta and bought 93,000 head of cattle, which we put in pastures. The government built the fences; we had no community pastures then, as we have now. These cattle were pastured down at Carberry, Manitoba, for the summer, and then we auctioned them off to feeders all over Canada. We sold them for higher prices than they could have been sold for by any other method, but for very low prices as we consider prices today. That cost the government $300,000. In those days it was questioned whether a government should spend $300,000 to help the livestock producers in western Canada; but the job was done.

In doing that job we acquired experience which stands us in good stead now. We can go back to Saskatchewan today and take care of the situation existing there. As I said last night, my assistant is going out again tomorrow, and Mr. Shaw is going with him. We have already made contacts with the wheat pool and others, and we think we can set up an organization that can deal with the situation. But they cannot handle it by putting the meat under the contracts we have been able to make, nor can they handle it by getting a decision on the question of whether the provinces were acting illegally when they imposed the restrictions they have imposed. In my own heart I have a feeling that the provinces are within their rights when they try to stop disease from spreading from one area to another. And I have a feeling that whether they are right or wrong they are going to do it anyway. If they cannot do it by law, they will do it in some other way. No people anywhere are going to allow you to deliberately ship cattle with foot-and-mouth disease, or hogs that may be subject to it, out of one area into another and particularly from one province to another. If that is what we are dealing with, then I have some doubts as to whether the provinces are within their rights or not. It has been said that the Department of Justice should have given a decision long ago. Well, the Department of Justice has given the same kind of decision on this as it gives on anything else. The Department of Justice naturally says: "Well, the courts are there; try it out." We might get some fellow up in Saskatoon to ship a carload of cattle down to Winnipeg and run them across the boundary line. Whether the railways would take them across or not I do not know. Probably they would not take them, but even if we could get a drover to load them on a truck and then down to Winnipeg, and the shipper got himself arrested—well, if he did that, it would take him about four months to find out whether he was right or not, and in the meantime probably he would be in jail. You could settle it that way, and Justice will tell you and anyone else will tell you that. You can have a test, because you can take it to the courts, and it will take anywhere from two or three months to six months to get it settled.

That is not good enough for this job. We have to settle this thing in a few days, in a few weeks at the outside. Therefore, when Manitoba says: "We will not kill any Saskatchewan cattle", I do not think they have any legal right to say that. But when this house put through the legislation a year ago to provide for emergencies, it gave authority to declare an emergency only if it had something to do with defence. So far as I have been able to search out, this has nothing to do with defence. Perhaps if you took a long enough view of it it has; I do not know. But in any case there is no way that we can prove at the present time that this is an emergency and say to Manitoba: "You have got to kill the beef." If I could declare an emergency it would take six months to find out as to whether we are right or wrong. In the meantime we could go on killing beef. We are not able to do that because there is no defence emergency. We know that from the Department of Justice, and there is only one other thing to do, and that is for us to try to persuade Manitoba to remove their embargo. We finally arrived at an agreement with British Columbia. We have an agreement with Alberta. I do not think our discussion was ever out in the open. Our discussions were always with them where they should be on a thing like this, more or less behind closed doors. We had plenty of trouble in our discussions in arriving at conclusions as to what we were going to do, but we eventually got there and without any hangover, and now the stock is moving out of Alberta. But there has never been a change in Manitoba since the day that it was determined that they would let sheep and pigs in but they would not let cattle in.

I cannot understand the reasoning in connection with it, but nevertheless the reasoning is there. Now, with the possibilities of moving beef out of Alberta and pork out of Alberta under the British arrangement and moving beef out of Ontario and hogs out of Ontario, there is not much to worry about anywhere else for the time being, excepting Saskatchewan. Most people do not realize that there are more cattle marketed out of Saskatchewan than out of Alberta in normal times. There are more cattle there to be marketed now than can be marketed. But they have no big packing houses to take them as they have in Alberta. They have large packing houses in Edmonton; they have large packing houses in Calgary and smaller ones in Lethbridge and so on. But we have just some dinky little packing houses in Prince Albert, Saskatoon and Regina, and then one with a little larger capacity in Moose Jaw. But they could not begin to handle the livestock that are produced in Saskatchewan, and they have never had to. We have depended on Winnipeg, and we still depend on Winnipeg. Until they let our cattle into Winnipeg, they cannot be slaughtered to be shipped anywhere else in great quantity. That is our great problem yet. It is there.

I am not sure what Manitoba is going to do—I think I know what they are going to do. I think I know what they will do inside a very short time, but I think they will do it much quicker if they are left alone until they are good and ready than if we take court action against them and try to force them and wait until the court decides. I think we can do it the other way more quickly. I say that for this reason. With all these difficulties going on I would like to ask hon. members just how they think we could have enforced floor prices. Were we going to tell this fellow that he has got to pay for animals when he has no slaughter house to kill them in? Are we going to tell the other fellow that he has got to take the farmer's cattle, whether he has grass or not, and pay the price? We had to create a situation under which this surplus could be moved, and it could only be moved by reaching an agreement similar to the one we have reached, or doing something else about it because we could not reach an agreement. But fortunately we did reach it and things are moving now, and I think the floor prices are being established.

The organization, as I said a moment ago, that we will probably put in will be an organization similar to that of 1937. With the wheat pool organized as it is now to deal in livestock as well as in wheat, we may be able to make some arrangement under which they can do for us what we had to do for ourselves before. But whether they do it or not, an organization will be put in there to do something similar to what was done in Alberta by the Alberta government. They have auctions that are held here and there all over the province. They have had them organized for years, and those auctions have been held this year. The farmers have brought in the cattle they have and have sold them to other farmers, and the farmers have taken them home and are feeding them.

In Saskatchewan, on the other hand, we have a million and a half acres of land in government pastures, and we have room on those pastures for something like 10,000 to 20,000 head of cattle. We have not the slaughter houses to kill them. We could not get the meat on the market in the next two or three weeks, or maybe a month, even if we did have slaughter houses to kill them. If farmers need cash and must have it we will say to them: "All right, bring your cattle in to some particular point and we shall have somebody there to auction them for you. We shall have somebody there to pay you if we buy them", and those that are fit for slaughter we will send for slaughter. Those that can go in to the pastures we can send to our pastures.

We believe we will get through on an arrangement of that kind without any loss to the government, and that we will be of some service to those who are there and who are dependent on the sale of livestock in the next few weeks or months in order to get along until harvest time when they can get some money out of their grain. But we will be saying to others: Keep all the cattle home on your farms that you can. Sell all those, which you must sell, to your neighbours if possible. Don't come near us at all unless you have to. But if you must come to us in order to get rid of some of them, well, then, take them to this point and that point, which will be indicated, and there will be a proper set-up there, handled either by the wheat pool or by ourselves, in order to take care of the situation.

Under that method I think we will be able to maintain the floor price; but it will not be because we have a law which says to the packers or anybody else: "You must pay it". It will be because we are prepared to pay ourselves, and handle the situation. And simply because we are prepared to pay, if anyone else wishes to stay in business he will have to pay. That is the only basis on which we can operate.

I would say to the members of the C.C.F. party that if they want to do it in any other way, the only other government body in the province of Saskatchewan that has anything to do with Saskatchewan, other than this one, is the C.C.F. government. They have the authority to do it if they want to do it. They could do it—even a good Ontario Conservative government has proven that during the last year. They took over cheese at a price. They set the price for cheese; they enforced the price for cheese. It was not this government that did it, and any provincial government can do it but no federal government can.

There is only one thing that might bother them, namely: what are they going to do with the surplus? Ontario had no trouble with cheese last year because Britain took it. But this year, when Britain was not ready to take it, they had some difficulty. But there is no other province in Canada that produces a surplus of cheese. And why they have any difficulty, I do not know. They can set their price; they can set the whole method of handling, if they wish to. They can say what the price will be, and they can enforce it. But this government cannot do that. And so all this talk which shouts "when you put a floor price on, why do you not enforce it?" is answered by the fact that we have not the authority. It rests with the province. We can only offer to buy and unless we wish to drive all others out of business the price must not be an incentive price. In other words, if it were a price to induce greater production we would drive all others out of business.

We put on a floor price which says to the people who produce the product, "If you cannot sell it to anyone else for more, we will take it at this price. We do not want it, but we will take it at this price, and we will carry it along." Then, occasionally we add this: "If we do make money we will pay it to you in the form of a participation payment, an interim payment or a final payment." We usually like to say that. Because, after all, we do not want to make money on the handling of farmers' products. We want the money to go back to them.

Then, on this question, "Why do you not see that when we set a floor price the packer pays the price to the farmer?", I say that the floor prices that we set, and the only floor prices we can set, are for buying direct from the farmer. If we go out to Saskatchewan and buy live cattle and put them in a pasture, we will have men sitting at a table right alongside the auction lot handing the man his cheque as he walks away. In other words, he will know he gets the money. When we buy butter from farmers, or from factories belonging to farmers, at so much a pound—58 cents a pound—well, they are paid for it. And, on the other hand, if a packing house buys it at 58½ cents and prevents our getting it, then they pay for it, and we do not pay for it. The farmer gets the money direct from the packing house.

Mr. Wright: Are you not buying eggs and butter and other products from the packers?

Mr. Gardiner: We do not buy from the packers.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Wright: You have to take it from the packers at a certain price.

Mr. Gardiner: No, when we buy any farm product, whether it is cheese or butter or meat or anything else, we use the packing house as a facility through which to pass the product. And we may use the staff of some of the packers in order to handle the product through their plants, on to the boats, to be shipped to Great Britain. But they are only the facility which we authorize to do our job for us. We to all intents and purposes buy the product right from the producer or from his agent.

Mr. Wright: Is that the case with eggs? Is that so when you take delivery of eggs at a set price in September?

Mr. Gardiner: With eggs it would be the case, if we had ever bought any. But the plan with eggs is different from all the other plans; and the house understood it was different at the time. We said to the dealers in eggs, right across Canada, "If you have any eggs left in storage on the first of October, from the first of October to the end of the year, we are prepared to take those eggs off your hands at 38 cents, plus carrying charges." Someone said last night that carrying charges were five cents. Well, I think in most cases carrying charges amount to four cents. With eggs at 38 cents, we undertake to take them at 42 cents, adding on the four cents. We say we are prepared to take them at 42 cents from anyone who will turn them over to us. We have been operating for three years, and have not bought an egg.

Mr. Wright: Is it not the same in connection with pork, that you offered to purchase so many millions of pounds of canned pork from the packers at a fixed price?

Mr. Gardiner: No, that is not so. And it is not exactly the same as we first intended it to be.

Mr. Wright: But you have offered that for it?

Mr. Gardiner: But we have taken over some pork at different times. Under the egg proposal, however, we have not taken over any eggs.

A while ago I was satisfied, from the information I was getting, that there were people who were not paying the floor price. As soon as we were satisfied of that we notified all those people that they need not come to us after the first of October asking us to take over the surplus of eggs. I understand that kind of thing stopped right there. I may say that some hon. members are to be congratulated upon having been among the first to bring the matter to my attention. But I do think that if it is stopped it ought to be admitted that the system is functioning. It seems to me that we set up a set of principles, and every time any little thing goes wrong in connection with them, you become the chief grousers. And that is the quickest way to kill it.

If people have a system, if people try to establish fair prices and try to stand up against what has been criticized in the handling of products in an extreme form of private dealings, and that set-up runs into a little trouble, the only way you are going to perpetuate that kind of thing is to stop shouting about the little mistakes made here and there along the line.

I do not know whether we have got the right way of handling eggs or not. But I do know we tried it as an experiment in the first year. I do know that in the second year everybody interested came back and said, "Do it that way over again"—because there was not a single thing to complain about. When we handled it the second year everyone said the same thing. The only criticism that was made in the second year was, "You ought to put the price a little higher."

Then we went back into it on the same basis, in the third year. Now we are in the midst of the third year, and some people tell us they have found that some things have slipped. Well, all I wish to say about it is that you cannot get out of it so easily just by saying that it is the packers. After all, there are a lot of eggs that never go near the packing houses. There has been talk about this 10 cents and 15 cents; but to my knowledge a packing house has never had any dealings in those areas. Where the packing house has been the price has been 28 cents or 29 cents.

I might agree that it is still a little low. I think when they get down to 32 cents that is about as low as they ought to get. When they have been down to 29, and in other places to 28, there has been the heavy freight rate to consider, for shipping long distances.

But, after all, I think I am correct in saying that, with very few exceptions, the floor price has been maintained. I am willing to admit that one of the places where the price has been low has been down in the constituency of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). That is one of the places. And I think he will agree that that is just about as far away from a packing house as one could get. And it was not really the packing house that caused most of the trouble there; and the same applies to other areas.

Mr. Argue: The information I have is with respect to the prices paid to farm women on eggs shipped to creameries. That is their ordinary place of marketing.

Mr. Gardiner: All the creameries I know of in that part of Saskatchewan are owned by farmers.

Mr. Argue: Not all.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, they all are down in that section of the country.

Mr. Argue: Oh, no.

Mr. Gardiner: And as a matter of fact those situations should be dealt with on their merits. As a matter of fact, I find that people who are organized into companies, no matter how they are organized, are human beings. Sometimes they go in one direction a little too long, and have to be turned back, even when they are co-operatives. So that if that was true in that section of the country it could only be true in one way, and that is through the co-operative creameries in not handling them as they should have—because that is what they all are. That is what they are.

An hon. Member: Not all of them.

Mr. Gardiner: That is all they would pay. If they paid more there would be that much competition for anyone else who wanted to buy. If the co-operatives which are there paid twenty cents nobody would get them for ten. That is the situation that exists there.

I think that is all I wish to say. Under the circumstances I think this is going along fairly well. No one anticipated the troubles we have had because of disease coming into the country. It is being handled as best it can. I think it is pretty well agreed that the job is being fairly well done. If we do not get it moving smoothly quite as quickly as some people would like, it is not because we have no wish or desire to do so, it is simply because we could not get things moving fast enough in some things over which we did not have absolute control.

Mr. Argue: Just a question in relation to the minister's announcement of the government's program for the buying of live cattle. Is it the intention of the government to buy only good or choice steers, or is it the intention to buy various grades of cattle?

Mr. Gardiner: It is our intention to try to persuade the farmer to keep at home anything which he will probably be able to market if and when the United States market opens. In the first place, we are going to try to persuade him to keep everything home that he can keep home, everything that he feels he can feed for a number of months ahead. Whether those are good steers or whether they are canners, we are not going to send anyone who must sell home with his stock.

If they bring them into market we will try to persuade some other farmer to buy them and take them home. We will hold an auction and allow him to bid against us and everybody else. If a farmer is prepared to pay a little more than the floor price, we will welcome that fact because we would not need to have anything more to do with those particular cattle. If some packing house is prepared to pay more than the floor price we will say to them, "take them away." But if we are not able to get rid of some we will have them taken to our pastures. That is stating in a few words the plan as it is in my mind, but I do not know that it is in anybody else's up to now.

Mr. Argue: Not passed by the government?

Mr. Gardiner: The order in council authorizes us to buy cattle or beef at the floor price.

Mr. L. Philippe Picard (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, anyone who is in the predicament which I now face will agree that the life of a member of parliament is far from being rosy. During the last three week ends I have visited my constituency when many representations have been made to me. I was rash enough to promise that on the first occasion that presented itself I would speak on floor prices on agricultural products. I made that promise as late as yesterday at noon and it happens that the day I came back the house was discussing that very question. Without having sufficient time at my disposal to get all the information I would have liked to get, I feel I must keep my promise and rise to speak at this moment.

Anyone who speaks on agricultural matters following the minister is at a disadvantage. My own experience being what it is, I feel that my position is worse than that of others who have taken part or who might take part in this debate. Before proceeding I should like to congratulate the minister upon the deal that has been arranged between Great Britain, the United States and New Zealand. I wish also to congratulate him upon the masterful speech he made this afternoon to which considerable publicity should be given. I am sure it will answer many of the questions people have in their minds on this matter.

Everybody knows that I am no expert on agriculture, that I have no practical experience in agriculture. I do not even pretend to have any theoretical experience or knowledge. My remarks are based on the representations which have been made to me by agricultural societies and private individuals in my constituency.

The main question facing those in Quebec who go in for mixed farming on a small scale is the cost of raising hogs and the small margin of profit that is left to them under the present floor. The majority of these farmers contend that there is not even a margin of profit, that they cannot produce at the floor price of 26 cents f.o.b. Toronto which has been fixed by the government. I admit that a few of them who seem to be better organized and have had more experience say that they can produce at 24 cents, but they admit that they are in the minority.

Their main obstacle is the cost of feed. When the feed is moved to Quebec or the eastern parts of Canada the margin of profit to the farmer is considerably reduced. These people contend that if the price of hogs is to remain at the present level for any period of time further relief should be given by way of a larger subsidy than the 30 cents per hundredweight now provided by the government on the transportation of feed to Quebec or eastern Canada.

As I say, I have no personal experience in this matter but bona fide farmers tell me that they have no objection to the price being fixed at 26 cents as long as they are able to make a reasonable margin of profit. Most of them feel that the present system is better than the one that prevailed after the first war when there was no floor at all. They admit that the government has adopted a wise policy by coming to an agreement with the packers, but this does not have the same effect in eastern Canada as it has in other parts of the country. However, whatever difficulty we had for a short time in Quebec has been eliminated through the activities of the minister's department.

It is hoped that the present agreement with Great Britain will facilitate matters as far as we are concerned. As far as the agreement with the packers is concerned, our farmers find the basis is sound but at the moment all cold storage space has been taken up and since there are no canning facilities available in Quebec the situation there became acute. The government agreed to accept all canned pork under the agreement but since the Quebec slaughtering houses are not equipped for canning it became impossible for them to support the market at the agreed prices.

There was one co-operative in Montreal and one in Quebec but neither has any facilities for canning. Then there was a private enterprise built by an individual who was a great help to the farmers for some time. He made money during the period when we were shipping to Great Britain. He continued to supply the British market long after other packing houses had gone back to the domestic trade. The farmers at that time were, I am told, well satisfied with the treatment they received from him.

Afterward he made arrangements to supply the United States market and our people were able to ship their hogs to him at lower costs of transport and yet be paid on the basis of Montreal as far as general prices were concerned. But when this agreement was made with the packers it was found that all cold storage facilities were filled and no canning facilities were available in Quebec. The companies manufacturing canning equipment told these people that it would take from eight months to a full year before they could supply any of this equipment. This company therefore stopped maintaining the prices but now has corrected the situation. Therefore the only reproach made by the farmers at that time was because they were not notified on the day that company stopped supporting the market. At one period our farmers were a bit worried because they were getting substantially lower prices, a top of 20 cents instead of 26 cents, but due to the interference of the minister this company has now sent cheques to all those who had sold to it at lower prices, and the situation is now remedied as far as that is concerned. However, this same packing house, which formerly slaughtered about 8,000 a week, is now taking about 1,200 at the most, and the people of our district have to ship to the Montreal market. The 26 cents applies to Montreal so there is only 23½ or 24 cents available to them for grade A. They are not on the basis they hoped to be when they first considered the statement of the minister, but the statement said f.o.b. Toronto or Montreal so there was no misrepresentation.

The fact that the local slaughtering house supported the market for a short period until the cold storage was full led them to believe the price applied to all of Quebec, but their price after shipping charges to Montreal are deducted is only 23½ or 24 cents. In producing at 24 cents, which is supposed to be the optimum or the best they can do, those who know the situation and their societies argue that they are losing money. Of course they understand that it is a temporary measure of support. They hope, possibly more than I could, that the situation will be short-lived, but we never know when the embargo will be lifted. They say that in the meantime the price should be raised to 28 cents at least. They want 30 cents, but as good traders—and farmers are good traders—they will accept 28.

In fact they accept 26 cents and say that it is much better than the way they were treated after the first war when there was no floor. Some of them argue that floors were inevitable because at one time a ceiling was also imposed. That is quite so, but most of them understand that the ceiling was imposed generally throughout the country on all commodities during the war, and if they would compare how they fared during the war and what they had as the result of their dealings under the ceiling system they understood they were a lot better at the end of last war than at the end of the first war when there were no ceilings on any commodities.

As I said, I felt a little awkward in getting up to speak on this subject, but the main object of my representation is to ask the minister to consider the special situation facing eastern farmers and particularly those of Quebec. You cannot it is true treat one part of the country differently from another but nevertheless there are differences in support prices between the various parts of the country because of shipping and other factors that are taken into account. However, because of the local facilities I think special consideration should be given to the Quebec farmers.

There is another point on which they want representations to be made. They fear that the floor on butter, which is 58 cents at the present time, may not be kept at that level. Some of them maintain that it should be raised to 62 cents. Some of them say that in a speech of the minister or some official of the department a price of 62 cents was promised at one time. It has not been shown to me and I do not know about it, but at any rate they fear that the floor price might go below 58 cents. The importation of butter last winter from outside countries can be explained to them. It has not been properly explained to them by some of their own associations, and I will come to that point in a moment. There had been a shortage in the previous winter. In order that this situation would not arise a second time the government thought it wise to import a certain quantity of butter from the Scandinavian countries.

Mr. Gardiner: If I might be permitted to interrupt, it might be well for me to raise this matter at this point in my hon. friend's speech. The floor price is set for another year at 58 cents. There is no question about that. It is 58 cents for another year.

Mr. Picard: I thank the minister, and if I ever send out reprints of my speech he can be sure of having justice accorded to him. I thank him for the correction. It is human nature not only with farmers but with everyone else to try to have a better life, and these people have asked for a floor of 62 cents. I am quite sure if I go back to them and say that the minister has stated that the floor has been extended for another year it will give them great relief.

Mr. Gardiner: Maybe I should put the statement correctly. A year ago the floor was set at 58 cents for two years, and it runs for another year.

Mr. Fraser: And ends when?

Mr. Gardiner: About a year from now, the first of May, 1953.

Mr. Picard: Then they are not only misinformed but they have misinformed me because I know nothing of the matter. The fact is that their own associations circularize them with respect to such things. The people concerned are requesting a subsidy on the transport of feedstuffs to reduce their costs of raising hogs or a higher ceiling on hogs f.o.b. Quebec for the eastern part of Quebec.

I should like to touch on a circular letter sent out by a Quebec farm organization and entitled, "An open letter to federal members". If I voice the desires of these people, who after all constitute 95 per cent of my constituents, if I take a great interest in their fate, try to understand their problems and be their voice and true representative in parliament, I must also point out that there are certain inaccuracies which their own associations have tried to instil into their minds.

When some people want to ask for something they start out by insulting or threatening, by using strong words of abuse or reproach in the hope that it will make their position stronger. I have discussed this open letter to federal members at the last four gatherings I have had in my constituency. These people are all interested in mixed farming. Some are small farmers, some are larger than others, and most of them are members of these associations. This paper is called La Terre de Chez Nous, and it is published by the Union of Catholic Farmers. I think that most farmers should belong to an association so that their interests can be looked after. I know that this association has sided most of the time with the opposite party provincially and federally, or rather it has been against everybody in authority but nevertheless I would advocate that the farmers join the association because it is their only means of putting forward their views. I do not disapprove of their belonging to it or making it stronger. They might choose their officers and the editors of their paper a little more carefully, but in any event this paper, which has quite a large circulation throughout the province, has published this open letter to federal members which I feel I must take to task.

I am not going to take very long to comment on it. I read all the numbers of this paper because even if I am not an expert on the problems they deal with I feel it is my duty to do so, and I read each number when it arrives. The first statement I do not like begins with these words:

> You who are in parliament where crises are made and who do not realize they are made . . .

Crises are not made in parliament. The crisis of the moment in a certain field of agriculture was not made in parliament. If Great Britain does not have enough funds to carry on purchasing in the dollar area and has to revert to the sterling zone, is that a crisis made in parliament? I think it is utterly false to say a thing like that. If the United States government felt that it was their duty to their own cattle raisers and to their population generally to impose an embargo because Canada had foot-and-mouth disease in the west, I think that nobody can say frankly, fairly and honestly that it is a crisis made in parliament. On the contrary, from the first moment the government tried to deal with it so that remedies may be brought about and help given where it was needed and members of parliament knew what was going on. Because the epidemic occurred in western Canada, most of the western members spoke on the subject. I did not think it was the proper time for eastern members, since no cases had been found in that part of the country, to enter the debate. Until the consequences of this outbreak were felt in the eastern part of Canada, it was quite proper to give the floor to those members who, for many days, talked about the matter.

Then this paper goes on and says that during the war the government—and in this they try to bank on the feelings of a small part of the community; they try to bank on some sentiments that they still hoped to find here and there in some districts of Quebec—they say that during the war the government in order to feed Britain made the people bear the full brunt of controls, even to the point of depriving Canadians of their needed food. That is a false statement, and as I told this meeting last Sunday, "I do not know of any of you in this room who got any thinner or whose health got any worse during the war." This country's controls were applied fairly to the largest number of people. If the people fared so well during the war it was because, as the minister mentioned a moment ago, we were buying much larger quantities of farm products, building new industries and giving more salary to the men in industry. This was done by taking from people, corporations and so on who could afford to pay, the amounts needed for these purchases. Most people understand that such appeals no longer are effective in Quebec, yet here you see them and they are circulated to 50,000 people. I believe, therefore, it is worth while to talk about this matter.

A little farther on this paper oblivious of what happened during the war says that it is the poor farmer who has been the victim. In succession they say he has experienced the invasion of margarine, the fall in the price of hogs, the epidemic of foot-and-mouth disease, the United States embargo, the importation of butter from other countries and the fall to the lowest level of the prices of butter and cheese. First of all, the invasion of margarine was not a crisis which was made in the federal parliament. There was a law on our statute books preventing the manufacture of that product. The government felt it was their duty, rather than see one group of people in the country taking the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada and trying to secure something which the other group felt should not be given, that is a declaration of the federal law as being ultra vires, to refer this matter to the supreme court. I believe the government acted quite properly. The decision of that court was in favour of the provinces, so in some provinces margarine was manufactured. Quebec imposed a ban on it but the ban was ineffective in a way because it was called a spread or went under another name, so it was kept on the market. However, that condition is not something which was fabricated in the federal parliament.

I turn now to the fall in the price of hogs. As I said, this was caused by the closing of the British market, the epidemic and the United States embargo. Those are the three reasons for the decline in price and the farmers know it. Yet in order to make the case against the government even worse this paper goes on itemizing the causes and effects as being all the causes of the unrest that might be felt in certain quarters.

They go on and say that they ask us to speak louder and with more courage in the House of Commons. I do not believe anyone in this house can say that the members from Quebec who represent these people have not made representations to the proper authorities when the circumstances warranted. I believe the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will say that as soon as the outbreak of this disease occurred a number of members from Quebec districts went to see him and bothered his secretaries and his experts in order to obtain the proper data and to be in a position to understand the situation. As hon. members know in order to correct a situation members do not have to get up and speak during a debate as often as some groups may believe they have to do. I do not disapprove of their doing so, but a case can be built quite strongly without ten people getting up and expounding the same theory. It is not the number of representatives from certain parts of Canada who take part in a debate that brings about remedies. One or two representatives making some suggestions would have the same effect upon the minister. When one or two members bring these questions to the attention of the government the effect is the same as if twenty members occupied the already crowded time of this house when some members are desirous of dealing with other matters.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this paper goes on and asks what their members are doing and what they are saying. This is why I am speaking now. What I am doing and saying now may not be the work of an expert in agriculture, but I thought I should make these representations to the minister. I had also to tell these people who are publishing this paper that they are prejudicing the case of the farmers in Quebec and that they cannot justify most of their accusations against the government or the officials of the department. If these people had come forward and said to the government, "Owing to special circumstances in our district, Mr. Minister, we would like more help, higher prices or higher subsidies; we thank you for what you have done but you might do a little more," they might have received a better hearing. Such an approach would have been more sincere and fairer to everybody concerned. But no, there are some people—these people have been doing it for years—who try to arouse feeling between the workers and the farmers, and between the latter and other classes of society, who try to destroy the confidence the farmers have in the government and the federal Department of Agriculture. This has been done by stating that all the federal government does is for the western members because the western members are always speaking on behalf of their provinces.

I believe that our farmers have more sense than that, Mr. Speaker. However, when you consider that these statements are spread to 50,000 people I feel it is time for me to get up and voice my disapproval of those tactics.

These people end the article by stating that the farmers of Quebec "hope you will take them out of this crisis created by your government." They try to pin on the government the blame for the foot-and-mouth disease, the United States embargo, the curtailment of British purchases, but frankly, Mr. Speaker, I know, from the courtesy shown by farmers in general, that they appreciate the situation better than this paper does. With his knowledge of the situation and the representations made by members the minister I know will consider any remedy that should be tried. These farmers may feel that, whatever the situation is, they have in Ottawa a department which will give their interests the consideration to which they are entitled.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I always enjoy listening to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). While I do not often agree with him, I enjoy his speeches. I do not think anyone can make a black picture look rosier than he can. In fact he would put John Fisher to shame if it came to giving a commentary on something that was black and which he wanted to paint white. He is an asset to the Liberal party. They ought to be proud of him, because he gets them out of many holes.

Mr. Sinnott: And to the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. Bryce: Look; I want to know who is making this speech. My friends here tell me I do not need your help, though you come from Manitoba; I am quite able to stand on my own two feet.

The minister had something to say about the packers and what a co-operative bunch they were, that they had come to the assistance of the government at this time. That is very good, but it will not keep me from criticizing the packers in future. I have always criticized the packers, and I feel quite justified in doing so. I am going to keep on doing that, because some of the greatest gains the packers ever made came through the misfortunes of the farmers. I need not go into details to tell the farmer members of this house what I refer to. We are in an emergency now, and just wait; you will see how the packers will take advantage of it. It does not matter to a packer whether he is paying one cent or 30 cents a pound; he has the same toll for every animal that goes through his plant.

Then the minister said that Manitoba could help by taking the cattle in there. I think the drawback in that connection is that the stockyards at St. Boniface are quarantined. Is that not the trouble?

[Mr. Picard.]

Mr. Gardiner: No, they are not quarantined in the ordinary sense of the word.

Mr. Bryce: They are quarantined in the sense that if tomorrow they took Saskatchewan animals to kill, which they would be quite willing to do, they could not get rid of the beef.

Mr. Gardiner: Oh, yes, they could. There is nothing to prevent the meat passing beyond Winnipeg, except the regulation in Montreal under which they do not accept meat from Saskatchewan, but I think that will be cleared out of the way in due course.

Mr. Bryce: I thought it was a federal quarantine on the yards there.

Mr. Gardiner: No, there is no quarantine on meat going through.

Mr. Bryce: But there is a quarantine on the yards?

Mr. Gardiner: Saskatchewan cattle have always been killed at Winnipeg, but now Manitoba says they cannot be killed there. That is the obstruction.

Mr. Coldwell: What is the effect of the federal quarantine on the situation in Winnipeg?

Mr. Gardiner: The federal quarantine says that live animals cannot go past Winnipeg. Under our quarantine live animals can go into Winnipeg and be killed, but the Manitoba government says they cannot.

Mr. Bryce: This problem has pointed up what I have advocated in the house on other occasions, the need for a board of livestock commissioners. If we had such a board today I believe it could handle this situation. It would be able to regulate the traffic, and do it on a federal basis, because it would have that power. Of course when I brought up the matter in 1944 the minister pointed out that it would not be legal. He said it would be similar to the board of grain commissioners, which at that time he said we just tolerated, that if it went to a legal battle we would lose out. But if we had that board of livestock commissioners today we would have an organization to deal with this emergency. The next time I made the suggestion the objection was that the farmers did not want it. At that time I was able to show that every farm organization has asked for such a board for the last forty years.

Coming back to the floor prices, I have here a copy of the Western Producer of May 8, 1952, and I am going to quote from page 4:

Pool livestock men pointed out that the federal government had not made any arrangements to take beef from Manitoba and Saskatchewan packing plants at the floor price. Government statements cited the continuance of the Manitoba embargo on cattle shipments from Saskatchewan, together with the absence of sufficient cold storage space in Saskatchewan, as reasons for the government's refusal to buy at the floor price in these provinces.

Pool officials concluded, therefore, that maintenance of the floor price depended entirely upon the success of the government's request that farmers voluntarily hold back deliveries, especially of feeder cattle which could stand further finishing on pasture.

But, the pool men declared, the hold-back request could not be expected to work, for two reasons: One, pressure to deliver cattle would increase following seeding, especially since more farmers than usual had fed cattle over the winter; and two, because failure of the federal government to require all cattle marketings be made through public stockyards simply meant that there would be greater direct-to-plant deliveries by farmers.

They go on and deal with prices, but I need not read that because it has been read here two or three times. We have these floor prices which the minister has said cannot be enforced. I do not know why. What is the good of putting in floors if you cannot enforce them? The prices have been set too low anyway, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) and the other three hon. members who spoke. Even so the packers will not pay those prices, and it seems absurd to set prices which the packers need not pay. There should be some way of overcoming that. There are enough lawyers in the house to find some means of making the packers pay the prices they should pay.

These prices are $25 at Toronto, $23.25 at Saskatoon, $22.80 at Calgary, $22.55 at Edmonton and $23.40 at Vancouver. I am quite sure the minister has always erred on the low side in setting prices. He has admitted that himself; I need not debate that with him. Yet here the packers are chiselling another dollar or two beyond that. I think that is bad, and something should be done about it.

Another point is this business of setting the price for a month or two months ahead. I have spoken here in the house on forward prices, but I never took that to mean a month, six weeks or two months ahead. I figured that when we set forward prices we meant for three or four years ahead so that farmers would have some stability and security and would know where they were going.

Coming back to the floor prices, if ever there was an emergency, this is one. The government should give us the benefit of that legislation and enforce it. If they do not, I just hate to think what is going to happen to the farmer.

Mr. Gardiner: If my hon. friend will permit me, it has been mentioned two or three times that the price is fixed for only a month. It is longer than that. The present price is set until July 1, and that would be about three months from the time it was first announced. Well, on June 1 the price is determined for the month of July and from then on it is determined from month to month; but it is always for two months ahead. I should like to suggest that it is not only possible that it will go down; it is possible that it will go up. It is an adjustment of the prices. There is no doubt that if we had not been able to make the British agreement it would have gone down, but with the British agreement made I do not know which way it will go.

Mr. Bryce: That is no guide to the man who is going to breed a cow for the future.

Mr. Gardiner: It is more of a guide than he ever had before, and he has been breeding cows a long time.

Mr. Bryce: You keep coming back all the time telling us that this is the best government; and that you have done more for agriculture than any other body. You have not even brought in any forward prices yet. What benefit or what stability has the farmer? The farmer has no more stability today under the Liberal government than he had under the Tory government. The sooner you wake up—

Mr. Gardiner: He is in a bad way, then.

Mr. Bryce: I might tell you this in all sincerity. The farmer will never go back to the mere pittance that he got for his work before the war. He will fight as he never fought before for something better than he had before.

Agricultural prices were the last to go up, and were the first to drop. They are going back now, and the government is doing very little about it, in order to keep them up. Take the position of the farmer today. In approximate figures he is taking $80 to $100 less for a steer than he was in February. I am sure the Minister of Agriculture will agree with me that there is that drop. Take a hog; he is taking about $35 for a hog that he was getting $54 and $55 for. How much has the consumer benefited by that?

Mr. Sinnott: Plenty.

Mr. Bryce: The consumer is getting no benefit from that.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Who said "plenty"?

Mr. Sinnott: I did.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Sinnott: Compare meat prices today with six weeks ago.

Mr. Argue: If you said it, we can forget about it.

Mr. Sinnott: Compare meat prices today with twelve months ago.

Mr. Bryce: Mr. Speaker, may I have a word? The consumer is getting practically no benefit from the loss that the farmer is taking in his produce. I can speak for cheese. Look at what you pay for cheese, and yet the farmer who produces that cheese can get only 23 cents for it. There should be an inquiry into this. Steers drop 10 cents on the Winnipeg market. If they dressed only 50 per cent, that would mean a drop of 20 cents in the price of beef. If you go into a store you will see that the price of beef is down perhaps 5 cents or 6 cents. The difference of 15 cents went somewhere. It went begging somewhere. Either the packer got it or the retailer got it. There has never been an inquiry to find out where it was going. It just happens that the consumers have to pay through the nose for it and the farmers have to take less.

I do not think the minister answered the question at all this afternoon. When I read his speech tomorrow I will find that it is just another good Saskatchewan political speech. I am sure it will be that.

Mr. Gardiner: It will be good for Manitoba, too.

Mr. Bryce: I do not know that it will. Manitoba is getting a little tired of it.

Mr. Sinnott: They are getting tired of the C.C.F. too.

Mr. Bryce: If my hon. friend had had his way he would have been here as a C.C.F. member.

Mr. Sinnott: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Bryce: Sit down and take it.

Mr. Sinnott: I am not taking anything at all from the hon. member for Selkirk or from anybody else over there. I want to say that my Liberal majority was more than it ever was before.

Mr. Bryce: Even the Social Crediters wasted their time educating him.

Mr. Sinnott: I am pretty secure where I am.

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Wentworth): I want to take only a very few minutes in this debate on floor prices. I agree with practically everything that has been said so far except that which the Minister of Agriculture himself said. What the minister said this afternoon was that in fact the farmers of this country are supposed to take what the government is offering them and say nothing.

Mr. Gardiner: Oh, no.

Mr. Charlton: They should be satisfied with what this government is handing to them, and it is a pretty bare bone.

Mr. Gardiner: You can't be a farmer, then, you say plenty.

Mr. Charlton: I have been a farmer as much of my life as the minister has.

Mr. Sinnott: A poor farmer you are!

Mr. Charlton: And I think that is going quite a way.

Mr. Murphy: And most successful.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not have any difficulty over their talking to me. They talk to me all the time.

Mr. Charlton: I did not interrupt the minister when he was speaking; I ask him not to interrupt when I am speaking.

Mr. Gardiner: It all depends on what you say.

Mr. Charlton: I can assure you it will not be something that you will like very well.

Mr. Sinnott: It never is.

Mr. Charlton: No, not from that side of the house, strangely enough.

Mr. Sinnott: It never is from you.

Mr. Charlton: The previous speaker mentioned the price to the producer in relation to the price to the consumer. I want to say that the price of hogs has dropped one-third to the producer since last August. Has the price to the consumer dropped equally? No.

Mr. Sinnott: You should know.

Mr. Charlton: Nobody can stand up in the house and say it has, not even the hon. member for Springfield.

Mr. Sinnott: I can say that the prices have dropped in comparison in the stores today. Be realistic.

Mr. Fleming: You must have been eating horse meat.

Mr. Charlton: The hon. member for Springfield thinks the price has dropped sufficiently to the consumers, anyway. We will let him go on thinking that and see how many consumers agree with him. They will be the judge of who is right and who is wrong.

Mr. Gardiner: What is the price of lard?

Mr. Charlton: Yes, and what did the minister do to increase the price of lard?

Mr. Gardiner: What is the price of spareribs?

Mr. Charlton: What did the minister do? By increasing the weight of hogs to be taken in, he simply increased the production of something which could not be sold, namely, fat.

Mr. Gardiner: You are saying that the price has not come down to the consumer. I am asking you, what is the price of lard; what is the price of spareribs?

Mr. Knowles: What is the price of boloney?

Mr. Fleming: Ask the minister.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would hope that those who object to interruptions by some hon. members would not find themselves guilty of the same offence. The hon. member for Brant-Wentworth has the floor.

Mr. Charlton: I do not think the price of boloney is something that we need to worry about, but there is a lot of boloney coming from the other side of the house.

Mr. Sinnott: You are spreading it in chunks.

Mr. Argue: There are 200 pounds of it talking.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Charlton: There are some interruptions I appreciate and some I do not, but the last one I really do.

Some mention has been made of the price of eggs and of the floor price of eggs. So far as the floor price is concerned, the minister himself answered the question as to why they could not administer the floor price legislation when he said that in the case of eggs anyone who was not paying to the producer what he thought was a fair floor price would simply be told that the government would not buy their eggs from them in the fall. If that will work, why could not the same practice be put into effect with the packers?

Mr. Gardiner: It has been. When we made the announcement the other day regarding meat sales to Great Britain we said we were not taking any meat for which they had not paid floor prices.

Mr. Charlton: I am sure the government have had plenty of opportunity to find that their floor price has not been paid in many cases. If they have not done it, they have had access to the books of the companies, one way or another, and could have found out what was paid. I think the packers can look after themselves pretty well. They have done so in the past and I think they can do it today without the minister trying to help them out.

Mr. Gardiner: What would you do now?

Mr. Charlton: It is not a case of what I would do. It is the Minister of Agriculture who is doing it. I may have an opportunity later on to say what I would do.

Mr. Gardiner: You might be minister of agriculture in Ontario, if you would apply for the job, and that is the way it would be done.

Mr. Charlton: Of course the reason the minister has not placed a floor price under cheese is pretty obvious. Two years ago he coaxed the cheese producers in Ontario to go into the cheese marketing business, on the assumption that he would assist them in any way he could. They did that.

Mr. Gardiner: They would not agree with you on that. Do not make statements which are absolutely false. That is false.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This, of course, is a deliberative assembly. Interruptions are sometimes in order if the hon. member who has the floor does not mind being interrupted. However, it would appear that the hon. member who has the floor does not wish to be interrupted, and therefore interruptions should not take place.

Mr. Gardiner: On a point of order; if the hon. member will not talk straight across the house to me, and will address himself to you, he will not have any interruptions from me. But when he asks me a question, direct, I will answer him.

Mr. Fleming: You do not wait for the question.

Mr. Charlton: In all the experience I have had in the House of Commons I have not seen the Minister of Agriculture address Mr. Speaker very often.

Mr. Gardiner: Then you are not a very good listener.

Mr. Charlton: As I was about to say, I think the reason the Minister of Agriculture is now avoiding putting a floor price under cheese is that it hurt just a little bit to have the cheese producers of Ontario get more money for their cheese last year than the minister could get for them.

An hon. Member: Why do they not do it this year?

Mr. Charlton: Is the situation this year comparable with last year? I think no one will agree that it is.

An hon. Member: You have the same board.

Mr. Charlton: The hon. member opposite will have plenty of opportunity to make his speech. I am sure the people back home will be interested to hear what he has to say.

Mr. Ferrie: You called it socialism not long ago.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Charlton: I shall continue to vote the way I wish, not the way some people to my right vote.

Mr. Ferrie: Yes, you told me that.

Mr. Charlton: The minister in January of this year actually promised the cheese producers that he would set a floor price under cheese. How long is it going to take the minister to fulfil that promise? The situation has worsened since that time; still nothing has been done.

Mr. Gardiner: I never make any promises.

Mr. Charlton: The cheese producers of this country were waiting patiently until the last two or three weeks, but they are rather impatient today. The minister made the suggestion that there was going to be a meeting tomorrow. I would hope that some good would come out of it, and that the minister would set a reasonable floor price for cheese. He made the statement today that Ontario was the only province that produced a surplus of cheese. We hope that that is not going to be used against us in the setting of the floor price.

The minister made some comments regarding the amount of talking done, and its effect on the price of beef today. I think it has been made plain enough and obvious enough to all people across Canada that, no matter if beef is slightly infected with foot-and-mouth disease, it does no harm so long as it is cooked properly. So I do not think there has been much reduction in the consumption of beef in this country, as a result of any talking done here from either side of the house.

I say that the floor price legislation has been nothing but a farce and a hoax to the agricultural producers of this country. It has won for the Liberal party two elections; and, apart from that, I can see very little that has come from it.

Butter producers are the only group who have received anything near the actual floor set by the government for their product. In other cases the floor price is set to the wholesaler, and the producer in some cases gets a small proportion of it. It has no relationship whatever to the cost of production. The floor price is a guarantee only to the wholesaler, not to the producer.

There never has been a formula written into the act. Although the minister claims he has a formula, and that he works upon it, that formula does not always bear out what has been said. That is particularly true when we keep in mind the figures that were given this afternoon by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch). I will admit the minister made a very good try today to paint a rosy picture—and that is something he does very well. But the floor price now set on beef, for a period of two months, is of very little use to any producer. It does not give him any security. He has no idea what the floor price will be after the two months are up.

I will say now that it is not only the farmer who will lose by this fact. Eventually the consumer will pay a higher price for his product because the floor price is not set high enough to hold production. In that way production will be lowered, with the result that the consumer will pay more for the product than otherwise he would have done if the floor price had been kept at a reasonable level so as to keep production where it should be.

I say again that the price to the producer has gone down considerably more than the price to the consumer. The fact that the floor prices are not high enough to keep production at a proper level will mean that the consumer will be the one who eventually will have to pay for the government's delinquency.

Mr. Sinnott: May I ask a question?

Mr. Charlton: Yes.

Mr. Sinnott: What was the top price paid to hogs—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sinnott: Just hold yourself, now. What was the top price paid for hogs in any of the five years between 1930 and 1935 when the Conservative government was in power.

Mr. Charlton: I think the hon. member will agree that the top price paid for anything between 1930 and 1935 was not anywhere near the top price paid today.

Mr. Sinnott: Answer the question. What was the top price paid?

Mr. Charlton: I do not have to answer it.

Mr. Sinnott: It would embarass you and your opposition.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I shall not be long in what I have to say. I would bring before the house one point which I believe has not been touched upon, or has not been emphasized sufficiently in relation to this matter of meat prices, floor prices and the marketing of stock. I am very pleased indeed to know that some arrangement has been made for the sale of some of our meat to the United Kingdom, through the co-operation of New Zealand. That is something we should appreciate within the commonwealth organization. The amount that we are likely to sell at the moment is relatively small and the basis upon which the trade is made is temporary and emergent from our point of view.

As the minister knows, I have always felt and I have always said that our main market for farm products throughout the years has been and will have to continue to be the United Kingdom. I criticized the government at the close of the war in 1946, 1947 and 1948 because we had entered into effective arrangements with the United Kingdom to take certain quantities of our meat products, and in not one of those years had we fulfilled the understanding—I will not call it a contract or agreement—that we had with Great Britain. Consequently to some extent —I shall deal with what I think is the other side in a moment—the loss of that market was due to our inability to fulfil the obligations we had undertaken at least tentatively. I have the figures before me for those years but I shall not repeat them because I think I placed them on the record some time ago.

The other reason was that in our undue haste to put into effect the Geneva agreements that were made in 1947 we to some extent prevented the United Kingdom from obtaining Canadian dollars by the sale of British products in the Canadian market. I think we can all recollect that we agreed to wipe out certain wartime tariff concessions to the United Kingdom as at July 1, 1948. The result was that to some extent the ability to earn Canadian dollars with which to buy our farm products was denied to the United Kingdom.

I believe that the only sure and stable market we can have in the future is the United Kingdom. I have been in this country now for 43 years during which time I have been in the prairie provinces. From time to time we have had a good market in the United States for our livestock but whenever livestock and other farm production in that country reached the point where they could supply their own market as we have recently found again we always had difficulty in marketing our livestock and farm products there. That has been the history in this country. We have had embargoes and restrictions placed against our cattle, as well as against other farm products. We have been faced with duties against our wheat, grain and other products.

I believe that if we are going to have long-term and assured markets for our farm products we shall have to look again across the seas. This may be an opportunity to re-enter the overseas market and, perhaps, to stabilize that market. If we are to do that we shall have to enable the customers of Canada to earn enough dollars to pay for our products or enable them to settle their obligations to us in some other way.

I am quite certain that the policy of marketing in North America, that of Canada and the United States, is wrong. The United States and Canada are willing to sell to the rest of the world, but we raise tariff and other barriers against goods that might come into the country and thus enable those overseas countries to earn the necessary dollars to pay for our goods. In other words, you cannot have one-way traffic, you have to have reciprocity as between your customer and yourself if you are going to stabilize the market.

I rose mainly to say to the minister that now that we have started once again the flow of meat by this arrangement I hope that it will be possible to expand the United Kingdom market. Mexico is again entering the United States market. The population of cattle and hogs in the United States has increased in the last two or three years. Of course it will be said that their human population has increased also and therefore they need more of these things, but whenever pressure has been exerted by the farm bloc of the western states we have found it difficult to market our dairy, meat, grain and other products in the United States.

After all the reliable consuming countries are those countries which can produce only sufficient food to feed themselves for three or four months out of the year. It seems to me that this house, this government and this country should be giving some study to the fiscal and tariff policies of our country in an effort to encourage those trade relationships which I think offer the final answer to some of our problems.

Our own domestic consumption should be increased to the greatest extent possible. I am not saying that the minister and others are not of the opinion I have just expressed, but I did think that when we were dealing with floor prices we should be considering ways of putting this trade on a long-term basis. Our farmers have always asked for stability rather than high prices. I have heard the minister say that in this house on numerous occasions. This afternoon the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) spoke of forward pricing.

Forward pricing is no longer an experiment in the realm of agricultural production. We have seen it undertaken successfully in many countries. It has been undertaken in the United Kingdom. As the minister knows, my relatives in the old land are and have been engaged for generations in the raising of cattle. My father fed cattle. When I was over there three years ago I found farmers to be more prosperous than they had ever been. The reason they gave me was that they knew what they were going to get for their livestock for three or four years in advance. They knew what they were going to get for their poultry products and for other things for months in advance. They had something of a guarantee of production and price stability.

The minister pointed out today that the butter producers of this country know that there is a floor under butter until May 1, 1953, and that of course is a kind of forward pricing. I think that type of forward pricing could be greatly extended if we had stable markets for our products. We have a stable market for butter because we consume all the butter we produce, even having to import some. The situation is different with regard to some of the other products we have been discussing this afternoon. The point I am making is that we need a stable market in order to deal with this problem. We should exercise reciprocity in getting that market. If we are going to sell, we must buy. We cannot operate on a one-way street.

Just one other point before I sit down. There was some discussion this afternoon about the floor prices under hogs. I have in my hand—it was handed to me just now—P.C. 1411, made at government house on the 8th March of this year. It reads as follows:

> Whereas by order in council P.C. 944 of February 13, 1952, all pork products were designated as an agricultural product for the purposes of the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, and the agricultural prices support board was authorized to prescribe prices to be offered for pork cuts placed in storage up to and including September 30, 1952, for the purpose of providing a price of not less than $26 per hundred pounds for grade A hogs basis Toronto and Montreal with appropriate price differentials at principal public stockyards throughout Canada;
> And whereas to maintain the price of $26 per hundred pounds as then approved the agricultural prices support board proposes, under the authority of paragraph (b) of subsection 1 of section 9 of the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, to offer to purchase pork in canned form in accordance with its specifications and under the authority of paragraph (a) of subsection 1 of section 9 to prescribe a price equivalent to 26 cents per pound for warm dressed carcasses basis Toronto and Montreal—

Then it goes on to say that this action is approved by the government. The price of 26 cents a pound is for grade A hogs basis Toronto and Montreal. The point that was being discussed this afternoon was that heavy hogs were taken in and that this provision had been made so that the packers could take heavy hogs and can pork products. That was not Wiltshire sides or frozen sides but heavy pork. The point that was being made this afternoon was that these heavy hogs were not being bought by the packers at the floor price of $26 per hundred pounds but for considerably less.

Mr. Gardiner: If I may interrupt, I know my hon. friend—

Mr. Coldwell: I will just make my point and then I will be glad if the minister will answer because I understand that was the point discussed this afternoon. The packers were buying heavy hogs at prices lower than 26 cents a pound and were protected for the lower grade at the higher price level. If I am wrong I shall be very glad to have the minister put me right.

Mr. Gardiner: I think my hon. friend is wrong. The packers are paid for the different grades of pork on the basis of the price for the pork. The outcome is that if you buy hogs at $26 a hundred warm dressed weight you then take the fat off, which is the lard and was worth 5 or 6 cents a pound a few days ago. There is so much of it that it comes down to that value in price. Then you take out the bone which you must take out in order to be able to can the meat, and by the time you have done those two things you have taken out half the weight with the result that what you bought for 26 cents a pound goes into the can at 52 cents a pound. On top of that it costs 12 cents to can it, so by the time you get through with it it is 64 cents a pound. Fifty-two cents out of that goes to the producer. If it is a hog of another price that is taken from the books, as it was suggested it could be, they are only paid for what we get.

Mr. Coldwell: I am very glad the minister has made that explanation because the wording of the order in council, to prescribe a price equivalent to 26 cents per pound for warm dressed carcasses basis Toronto and Montreal, would include some bone and fat.

Mr. Gardiner: It says "equivalent to".

Mr. Coldwell: Then allowances would be made for what you might term some waste or lower priced products.

Mr. Gardiner: That may mean $19 for some others.

Mr. Coldwell: That is substantially all I wanted to say on this point. There was another point I wished to deal with very briefly but I think I will defer it until another occasion because it does not fit in with what I have just said.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word or two on this same subject. I believe the discussion up to the present time has been highly profitable and quite indicative of the serious condition which exists throughout the country. What we need now is a government financial measure to cushion the livestock industry against a disastrous loss due to an unpredictable mishap. I have a letter from an authority in Raymond, Alberta, in my constituency, a man who knows the whole situation regarding livestock inside and out. The letter is dated May 6, 1952, and reads in part as follows:

> The livestock situation is very bad and going to cost an awful lot of money to the livestock industry. A differential of 6 to 10 cents between Canadian prices and United States prices is quite an item when spread over the entire cattle production in Canada.

That is the situation we must face. We must make up our minds whether we are going to allow the livestock producing industry to be seriously injured, if not in large measure destroyed, or whether we are going to adopt measures which can save it from this dangerous situation. What we must have is in essence a guaranteed incentive floor price. The minister said that it has never been the policy of the department to guarantee an incentive price as a floor, but under the conditions which now obtain resulting from the peculiar set of circumstances confronting us I believe we must keep our eyes on an incentive floor price. All surpluses could be drawn off by government purchases of all finished livestock at the prices prevailing at the time of the United States embargo.

The question will be raised as to how that can be done. Under the orthodox financial methods of the minister and the government it probably cannot be done but under a sane realistic financial system it could be done. It could be done by the wise use of the social credit of Canada. We are facing what is more than a serious passing situation in this nation. If orthodox finance cannot solve the problem then let us adopt some measure that will solve the problem.

An hon. Member: Why didn't Alberta solve it?

Mr. Blackmore: If the young man would only stop talking nonsense while someone is trying to speak the truth he would get somewhere, and we all would. Let my young friend get this straight. In world war I the dominion government through its finance department created money, bought $50 million worth of wheat and loaned that wheat to Great Britain. It could just as well have given it. There was no cost to the people and no debt incurred for Canada. That same device could be used today through the Bank of Canada or the finance department and the result would be that we would save all our livestock producers from loss, not only those for whom the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard) was speaking, but producers from coast to coast in this nation.

All we have to do is to do a little realistic financial thinking. As I have pointed out several times, what was done in world war I certainly could be done today. It could have no greater inflationary effect than would have been produced if we had sold this livestock to the United States at the prices at which we might have sold it. It could not produce any more inflationary effect than if we had sold this livestock to Great Britain in return for her guarantee that she would pay at a later date, or for gold if she had it. Why then should the device not be considered seriously and adopted, when even now we could save our livestock producers from coast to coast in Canada a loss which is going to injure that industry for a long time to come?

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

BOUNDARY PIPELINE CORPORATION

The house resumed, from Friday, May 9, 1952, consideration in committee of Bill No. 62, to incorporate Boundary Pipeline Corporation—Mr. Larson—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Chairman, I have opposed other pipe line bills similar to this in other years, just as I have opposed this one in the committee of which I was a member. The members of this group opposed these bills on the ground that we believe pipe lines such as these, which are destined to become public utilities and are to be used for the distribution of natural resources, should be built and operated by a public body.

The gas which this company proposes to transport is, to begin with, a natural resource, and it is the opinion of this group that our natural resources should not be turned over to private enterprise for the making of profit, but that they should be used in the best economic interest of the public. The transportation of gas is in a class with hydro; it becomes extremely important in the economic development of the country. Eventually, if this pipe line is built, industry will come to depend upon the gas transported by this company; private home owners will come to depend upon it; and the industrial development of those sections of the country through which the line passes, and where gas is available, will be determined to a large extent by the price and availability of this natural resource. We feel that such an enterprise is of far too great importance in the economic life of our country to be exploited primarily in the interests of dividends on invested capital. We feel that the aim of such a service should be to assure the best economic interests of industry and consumers. We feel that the distribution of this natural resource should be geared to the public need, and that providing for that need should be a first consideration.

For years past we have been handing over the natural resources of this country to capitalist enterprise for exploitation without a great deal of regard for the future needs of this country, and without too much regard for the extent to which those natural resources are used to meet the needs of the community. We feel that these resources belong to all the people. We feel that only a government responsible to those people can exploit those resources in the best interests of the people. Had Sir Adam Beck, for instance, and his supporters followed, in the matter of the hydro development in Ontario, the policy which we are following here in the matter of these pipe lines, Ontario would have been deprived of the great publicly-owned hydro system. Ontario industry and Ontario development would undoubtedly have been handicapped since our hydro developments would have been used primarily in the interests of investors rather than in the interests of the development of the economic life of the province.

The transportation of natural gas is, in many respects, on a par with railway transportation. I think it is high time that we ceased handing over natural resources to capitalist enterprise in the first place, and leaving it in the hands of capitalist enterprise until such time as they become unprofitable for such interests to operate, then unloading them on the taxpayers of the country. We have done that in several instances, and in our opinion it is a much better policy for those resources, in the first instance, to be developed and controlled by public ownership. It is only good business sense, I suppose, that the first interest of a company such as the one proposing to build this pipe line should be the investors in that company, and the payment of dividends that accrue to those investors.

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

Granted, of course, that this enterprise becomes a public utility; granted that the dividends here are limited as they are in all public utilities; nevertheless, no company such as this can place public interest first. I know that in the committee the promoters of this company tried to assure us that their sole concern was to supply the people of Manitoba with natural gas; they said that their chief interest in building this pipe line was to make gas available to the people of Manitoba and particularly those of Winnipeg.

I do not think that any of us here are so naive as to believe for a moment that such a company is primarily interested in serving the province of Manitoba with natural gas. As I have said, it is only good business that this company's first interest should be the protection of the investors in the company and the payment of dividends on that investment. It seems to us that here, in the building of pipe lines, is one instance which, probably more than most enterprises that come before us, should be under public ownership.

It may be, of course, that that which serves the best interests of the investors in this country will at the same time serve the best interests of the communities that are to be served by those resources. I think however that history has shown us in numerous cases that the interests of dividend seekers and the interests of the community that is to be served by public utilities do not always coincide. That which is in the best interests of the investors in such an enterprise as this is not necessarily in the best interests of the community. What may in many instances be most profitable in the interests of the community is not of necessity most profitable for the investors in such a public utility enterprise.

There are few people today living in Ontario who would agree to handing over the Ontario hydro system to any private enterprise. Nevertheless when that enterprise was first initiated there were those supporters of free enterprise who fought to retain hydro, just as the supporters of free enterprise are fighting today to secure and retain control of these pipe lines.

There is another question that arises in my mind out of the scramble of companies to secure charters for the building of pipe lines, and I have raised that question on a number of occasions in committee. Just why are so many of these companies joining in the scramble for charters to build pipe lines? When I asked that question of the promoters of this company, I was told that a charter would be valueless to them, would be nothing but a liability to them, unless they eventually secured from the Alberta government and from the board of transport commissioners the right to build and the right to export gas from Alberta to Manitoba.

I just cannot see astute businessmen going to the expense that is involved in securing one of these charters, in surveying routes, and all the other preliminary expenses, when it is an accepted fact by all these promoters that the very nature of this industry is such that not more than one pipe line will be built to serve any one section of the country. The investment is of such a nature that it would not be economically feasible to build two or more parallel pipe lines through any section of the country. It was generally agreed that one or the other of those applying for charters would eventually secure from the board of transport commissioners the right to proceed with their pipe line, but not two or three of them.

I have no way of proving that my suspicion is based on fact, but I have a suspicion that each one of these companies expects to be in a position to make some use of that charter and to regain with profit every dollar that they have invested in securing that charter, in surveying the route and in any other preliminary expenses connected with it. If that is the case, it will be the consumers of this product who will, in the long run, pay that cost. For every one of those charters that are granted and are not used, the consuming public will eventually pay. On that ground I still fail to see why there is any necessity for granting charters to so many of these companies.

There is another point which causes grave concern as far as this particular company is concerned. This company proposes to build a comparatively short pipe line—that is, short in comparison with the line proposed to be built by other companies—and one with pipes of relatively small dimensions, to carry Alberta gas as far east as Winnipeg. We were given statistics to show that in the opinion of the promoters there was a sufficient market to make that particular pipe line a paying proposition. We were given statistics to show just how much gas would be purchased by industrial firms in the area through which the pipe line passed, by home owners and so forth. But there is reason to believe—and in my opinion good reason—that the estimates provided to us were somewhat exaggerated. There appears to be good reason to believe that the market which will be available for that comparatively short pipe line will not be nearly as large as we were told it would be. Out of that fact arises this situation. In the event of that particular pipe line not proving to be economically feasible, or in the event of development showing that that market is not sufficient to make this pipe line a paying proposition, it would then be only good business for that company, in order to make their enterprise a paying proposition, to run from that trunk line spur lines into the United States.

I fail to see where we have any assurance that, once this undertaking is initiated, gas will be made available in Canada or to purchasers in Canada. It seems quite reasonable to assume that once having built the pipe line to Winnipeg and finding that that pipe line is a paying proposition, the most businesslike course to follow would be to build short lines from their main line into the United States, in which case the United States would be getting a supply of Canadian gas before Ontario and Quebec would have access to it.

Many of us on the committee felt that that was a real danger. It is said of course that, in such an event, arrangements could be made with the United States whereby Ontario and Quebec would get an equivalent supply of natural gas to make up for the Canadian gas that was going into the southwestern states. There is no assurance whatever that we can make any such arrangement. As a matter of fact, the opposite is more likely to be true. I hold in my hand a report from the Canadian information agency of Ottawa, dated April 26, 1951, in which it is pointed out that the natural gas industry is finding in the United States that new discoveries are not keeping pace with production. The report goes on to say:

> The ratio of reserves to production, according to the American gas association, has dropped from 32·49 in 1946 to 26·17 in 1950. The figures show also that the increase in reserves in the continental United States was almost negligible for the year 1950.
> In the southwest producing areas, the feeling is growing, according to the federal power commission, that their principal energy resource is being sold out from under them. The commission made this observation in considering applications by natural gas suppliers to serve the New England market.

There is other evidence to show that we cannot proceed on the assumption that if Canadian gas is exported to the United States before Canada's needs are supplied we can be assured of an equivalent supply of natural gas from the United States for eastern Canada.

We are told of course that by opposing this bill, and the incorporation of this company, we will probably be depriving Manitoba and the city of Winnipeg of natural gas for a long time. The argument is used that there is now or will be shortly a sufficient supply of Alberta gas to provide Manitoba with what it needs, but there will not be for some time to come sufficient quantities to warrant the building of a larger pipe line through to Ontario and Quebec. Therefore those of us who oppose the granting of this charter are charged with depriving the Manitoba people of access to that gas until more is available for eastern Canada.

In the first place, there is no assurance of course that the province of Alberta will permit the export of gas to Manitoba until there is a sufficient quantity available to warrant the building of larger and longer pipe lines. In the circumstances, I think we in this house must be concerned with the economy of Canada as a country rather than the economy of any one province. I think we in this house must take the long view of this matter and act in the best interests of Canada.

Then we are told of course that this matter can be left to the board of transport commissioners; that in the final analysis they will judge whether this company should get permission to build that pipe line or not. It is the duty of the House of Commons, and not that of the board of transport commissioners, to decide what policy is in the best interests of Canada. The promoters who came before the committee assured us that, as far as the board of transport commissioners were concerned, the one thing they would have to be assured of was that the company was financially capable of building that pipe line, and that there was a market available for the gas they were to supply.

There is no question about the board of transport commissioners' responsibility in determining policy. That is not their responsibility. If we in this house grant a charter to this company, then the concern of the board of transport commissioners is to see that the company is financially capable of doing the job for which the charter was granted. It is our responsibility here to decide whether we want one or a dozen charters granted. It is our business here to decide whether we want one province served at the expense of other provinces, because it is quite evident that the building of this pipe line and the supplying of natural gas to Manitoba will delay the building of the larger pipe line which would service Ontario and Quebec.

We here are to make the decision as to whether that particular procedure is in the best interests of Canada, or whether it will be better to withhold the transportation of Alberta gas to the province of Manitoba until such time as there is a quantity available to service eastern Canada.

Mr. Johnston: Alberta will decide that.

Mr. Noseworthy: Alberta will decide when and in what quantities natural gas shall be exported. I doubt whether we in this House of Commons should throw upon the government of Alberta the responsibility of deciding which of those companies granted charters by the parliament of Canada should be chosen. It may well be that the province of Alberta, is ready to accept this responsibility, and would want to be free to make the choice. It may well be that Alberta would like to see a dozen of those companies chartered, and then the government of Alberta left to decide which of the companies should be given the right to build pipe lines to transport gas.

Nevertheless it seems to me that, if we are going to hand this over to private enterprise, it does become the responsibility of this parliament to decide whether we should continue to grant charters to every company coming before us asking for them. So far I know that every company that has appeared before parliament requesting a charter for the building of a pipe line has been granted that charter. I fail to see the point of granting many of these charters and, in this particular instance, I can see good reasons for refraining from granting the charter.

Mr. McIvor: It has not been my custom to take it upon myself to correct the mistakes of another. But when it is denied that I moved a motion in committee, and that motion was carried, that fact stands denied. I did move an amendment to section 6 where that section states that the pipe line would go through Saskatchewan, Manitoba or outside of Canada. This was my amendment, as it is found at page 111 of the proceedings of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines:

> Mr. McIvor moves that paragraph (a) of clause 6 be amended by inserting after the word "lines" in line 23 thereof the words: "provided that the main pipe line or lines for the transmission and transportation of gas and oil shall be located entirely within Canada."

And then the report continues:

> All those in favour? Those against?
> I declare Mr. McIvor's amendment carried.

I admit that after my amendment was recorded, another similar one was placed on the record and that I voted against it. Why should I not? My amendment was the first offered. And, Mr. Chairman, I am not very particular whether this pipe line goes to Winnipeg or whether it does not. But I want to stick to the facts, and I want to have credit only for what I did. I thank the hon. member for giving me this opportunity to speak.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is obviously referring to what I said the other night. I have before me the proceedings of the committee, and at page 74 I find this:

> Consideration was resumed from April 8, of Mr. McIvor's motion that paragraph (a) of clause 6 be amended by inserting after the word "lines" in line 23 thereof the words: "provided that the main pipe line or lines for the transmission and transportation of gas and oil shall be located entirely within Canada."

It was clearly set out in committee that the company could get around any amendment like that simply by turning its gas over to an American subsidiary at the boundary. And then we find this in the record of proceedings:

> Mr. Nickle moved in amendment that the following words be added thereto: "and that the words 'or outside Canada' in line 15, and the words 'and/or international' in line 19 thereof, be deleted."

And then the report goes on to state that after division and the question having been put on the said amendment—that is, the amendment by the hon. member for Calgary West to the amendment of the hon. member for Fort William—it was negatived. Then we find that the hon. member for Fort William voted against that amendment, which would have struck out power to do anything outside of Canada.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I do not pretend to be an authority on pipe lines or oil production, but I have heard a good many speaking in the house with respect to this bill who I do not consider are great authorities, either.

The hon. member for Fort William made reference to an amendment which referred to an all-Canadian route. As I said at the opening of my remarks, I am not an authority on the subject, but from the standpoint of principle I have no hesitation in saying that I think a line should be built on an all-Canadian route provided it is economically possible, feasible and desirable.

There may be times, particularly when passing through mountainous country, when it is not economically sound to build a pipe line by an all-Canadian route. This depends upon the location of the main line of the route. I think there has been a good deal of confusion on the part of some of our socialist friends in advocating a publicly owned pipe line, and the public ownership and control of gas and oil. It was not long ago when the minister of natural resources in Saskatchewan came to the conclusion that any government—and I suppose he included both provincial and federal—would be foolish to risk the money of a province in the development of oil. He came to the conclusion that a province might easily and readily go bankrupt if it spent the people's money in the development of oil properties, or if it proceeded in drilling operations and struck one or two dry holes.

I hear a C.C.F. member behind me saying that he was a sensible man. I think he was, when he came to that conclusion.

Mr. Gibson: But it took him a long time.

Mr. Johnston: Yes, a long time and a rather expensive experience. But people do learn after a period of time.

You know, I am amused when I hear members from Ontario pleading for Alberta gas, and saying that all Canadians should have a prior right to that gas. Let me state again a general principle: I think that, in principle, Canadians should come first. I think that, in principle, Canadians—even those from Ontario—should have access to Alberta gas, first. But I think, too, that it is a mighty poor rule that does not work both ways; make no mistake about that. I never knew Ontario to go out of its way to help Alberta, Saskatchewan or British Columbia, but I have known them to do the very opposite. As a matter of principle I think Canadian rights should come first.

Mr. Charlton: What about the $65 million?

Mr. Johnston: Why, you stole over $148 million from us. What is the matter? Ontario has been getting the advantage of cheap freight rates from the west ever since confederation and the west has been paying for them. When the Turgeon commission was investigating freight rates I did not hear of any Ontario members who came before it and said, "all Canadians should be treated equally." I have not heard any Ontario member get up in this house and say the same thing. But I have heard them get up and say, "We want some of this cheap Alberta gas to develop our industries in Ontario so we can run industry out of the prairie provinces." They did not say that last part; I just put that in as a parenthesis.

Personally I have no objection to the granting of this charter. I have every confidence in the Social Credit government of Alberta because they have shown in the past that they can handle this problem. Their first concern is that Alberta shall have a sufficient supply to last for fifty years.

An hon. Member: Thirty years.

Mr. Johnston: They changed that.

An hon. Member: The Liberals say fifty years.

Mr. Johnston: The Liberals have not made up their minds whether they want public or private ownership of gas in Alberta. The province of Alberta has made it quite clear that they do not intend to export gas, except in case of emergency, before Alberta's supplies are assured. They did permit the export of gas to Montana, I think at the request of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe).

An hon. Member: He said no.

Mr. Johnston: I understand he wrote a letter requesting them to make an early decision as this gas was needed for defence purposes. Whether that is literally true or not—I think it is in effect—they have allowed the export of gas to Montana to assist our war effort. That was a proper thing to do. If a great emergency should arise I think it should be given first consideration, and so it will be given first consideration by the people of Alberta.

So far as I can see, the more companies that get charters the better bargaining position Alberta will be in. It has been stated that these companies are applying for charters so that they can bargain them off later at high prices. That is the way business works; that is the way the oil companies are working; that is the way private industry works. That may not be a good practice—I am not arguing that point at all—but actually it does not concern us provincially.

Only one or two companies at the most will get charters, but it will be Alberta that will state how much gas will be exported and when. I understand the provincial government has taken steps to see that the collecting of gas within the province is done by a provincially chartered company. In that way every individual, every group of individuals and every company will be treated alike. The gas will be collected and brought to a central point and then the companies holding charters for export can carry the gas to whatever destination they have in mind.

British Columbia is also anxious to get Alberta gas. I make no bones about saying that I think British Columbia industry should be served before Ontario industry as far as Alberta gas is concerned. That province is a neighbouring province and it will be only a matter of a few weeks before they have a Social Credit government.

Mr. Noseworthy: You are an optimist.

Mr. Johnston: I always look on the better side of things. The next province that should benefit from our oil and gas resources is Saskatchewan.

Mr. Argue: We have gas.

Mr. Johnston: That is true, but you are not making very much progress in developing that resource. I am convinced that Saskatchewan has as much oil and gas as Alberta, but under the present administration private industry has not been encouraged to go ahead and make the necessary development as has been the case in Alberta. That will probably occur in time.

Then I think Manitoba has the next right, and after that Ontario and Quebec. I do not think we need worry about the development of gas or oil in Alberta and their export. That province will be able to take care of those matters very efficiently. I would be loath to see any export of gas from Alberta until our own requirements are taken care of. Then my view is that British Columbia and Saskatchewan should have the next right of access, and then Manitoba. If we have enough left I would even go so far as saying that Ontario should have some, although they have never done very much for western Canada. I think I shall vote for the bill.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to have this opportunity to follow the last three speakers, with whom I entirely disagree. Being an Irishman I can safely take that stand and back it up. I was amazed to hear the last speaker say that Ontario should not receive Alberta gas—

Mr. Johnston: I did not say they should not.

Mr. Murphy: —until—

Mr. Johnston: That is better.

Mr. Murphy: —someone in Alberta sees fit to decide that the pipe line company which is incorporated is permitted to take Alberta gas. Let me tell the hon. member who just resumed his seat that I come from Ontario.

Mr. Gibson: Don't apologize.

Mr. Murphy: I hear the hon. member for Comox-Alberni say something. I still wish he would get a constituency which a white man can pronounce. When I hear a statement like that made by a member from Alberta I wonder if he realizes where the money came from that created the oil potential they have in that province.

Mr. Johnston: It did not come from Ontario, do not make any mistake about that.

Mr. Murphy: As I recall what happened in the last few years in Ontario, in Canada and in this house, I remember that Imperial Oil Limited spent about $30 million in Alberta before they struck oil and gas.

Mr. Johnston: That is not Ontario.

Mr. Murphy: It happens that that company has its head office in Ontario and its refinery in my city. I do not want to hear this chirping from my left that Ontario has made no contribution to Alberta. The hon. member should go back and find out just who it was that developed Ontario with respect to oil and gas.

Mr. Johnston: Not Ontario.

Mr. Murphy: Alberta. I hope I did not make any mistake in that. There are different aspects to this matter but I have not sufficient time tonight to develop them all. I think as Canadians we all share in the natural resources of this country whether they are found in Newfoundland, Alberta, Ontario or any other place. As administrators for the people of the Dominion of Canada I think it is up to us to see that those resources are developed for the benefit of Canadians generally. Since I came to this house I have never taken a provincial attitude with respect to the development of natural resources, nor can I recall that many other members have. Unfortunately there are a few occasions when we find provincialism.

An hon. Member: In this house you have got to stand up for yourself.

Mr. Murphy: I am one who rather resents such provincialism in a country like Canada which is now coming into its own in no small way. With respect to the natural resources of any province, we must concede that the particular province concerned possibly has rights over and above those of the neighbouring provinces. I appreciate the attitude of the government of Alberta in endeavouring to keep within its control and at its disposal sufficient gas to last them over a period of years. However, I do not believe, and I do not think there are many people in the province of Alberta who share the opinion, that they can have their cake and eat it too. I think I share the opinion of most members of this house that it is to the advantage of the province of Alberta to export gas and oil.

I think that the people of this country must make it known to our friends to the south that so far as traffic and trade in these two most vital of our recently discovered natural resources is concerned there must be some mutual understanding which heretofore has not appeared on the surface. I think that in a diplomatic manner it must be made quite plain to the authorities on the other side of the line that we would like to do business in oil and gas with the United States but that we resent the tariff imposed against our oil entering the United States. Up until the discovery of oil in Canada we had to import practically all our oil requirements, and I regret to say there are people on the other side of the line who seem to think that they should still be supplying us with all our oil, and who also certainly hold the opinion that no Canadian oil should go into the United States in spite of the fact that for years we have been buying practically 100 per cent of our oil requirements from that country.

I think it is time for our government and the government of the United States to discuss these very important questions. We now find ourselves supplying the state of Montana with some 10 billion cubic feet of Alberta gas per year under a five year contract. I do not think any member of the house has any doubt in his mind as to the extension of the contract when the first five year term expires. It is true that the gas is being exported for defence purposes, and as a member of the team we are justified in endeavouring to see that any defence requirements of our allies that we can fill are supplied without hesitation. At the same time I cannot help but think that we are entitled to a little more consideration so far as two-way trade is concerned with respect to a product so vital to the economy of both countries.

I come from western Ontario where a small amount of Texas gas is obtained. I know we have great difficulty in securing our requirements. We were supposed to get some 5 billion cubic feet per year, and at the present time I think we are only getting 2½ billion cubic feet per year. After all is said and done, I am one of those—and I hope that many share the same opinion—who believe that if we are prepared to export 10 million, 15 million or 20 million cubic feet we in turn should be placed in the position where we can obtain a like amount from the United States to be used in areas where the use of that gas would be cheaper to consumers than to bring it from the province of Alberta.

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) for committee of supply.

DECLINE IN HOUSING CONSTRUCTION

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to object most vigorously to the way in which the government is handling, or perhaps it would be truer to say mishandling, the present housing situation.

The number of houses started in the years 1948 to 1950 inclusive remained constant at about 94,000 units per year. In 1951 the number of new houses started was 72,000. That is a reduction of 24 per cent during the past year.

No less a person than Mr. Mansur, president of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, has estimated that the number of new houses which will be built during the present year will be between 55,000 and 60,000 units. That means that today we are building 42 per cent fewer houses per year than we were building two years ago.

Why has there been such a sharp reduction in the number of houses built last year, and which are being built this year? I believe it is due largely to the abolition of the one-sixth mortgage loan provision of the National Housing Act.

According to the minister's own statement, as recorded on page 70 of Hansard for February 5, 1951, the abolition of the one-sixth mortgage loan made it necessary, a year ago, for a prospective purchaser to increase his down payment on a five-room minimum house by about $1,000, and a purchaser of a six-room minimum house by about $1,500. Because of the increase in housing costs during the past year, these increases in down payments are at least $1,250 and $1,800 today.

According to the latest report of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, an income of at least $3,300 is required to meet the debt services on a minimum house today. I should like to quote from that report as follows:

> On the assumption that an average family cannot afford more than about 23 per cent of its income for shelter, the average prospective homeowner in 1950 required a gross income of about $2,700 to purchase a new minimum house. By the end of 1951, family income of about $3,300 was required to meet the debt service on a similar house.

An income of considerably more than $3,300 is required before the money now required for down payment can be set aside. Because of the abolition of the one-sixth mortgage loan, it is generally agreed that a man must earn at least $5,000 a year, for at least five years, in order to set aside the $2,500 or more which is now required as down payment on a minimum house. This means that people whose incomes are less than $5,000 a year are virtually excluded from buying a new house. This defeats the very purpose of the government's existing housing legislation.

If shortages of materials, caused by our defence program, made necessary a reduction in the number of houses built, then the sacrifices should have been shared as evenly as possible by all social groups. To impose restrictions which made it impossible for those with incomes below $5,000 to buy new houses, and to impose no restrictions whatsoever on those with larger incomes, was completely unfair and unjust. It is a clear case of rationing by the purse.

What has made the situation even worse is that the 200,000 immigrants, whom the government is bringing into the country each year, largely come within the low income group. These people must be housed, and they have simply increased the housing pressure on those who have had new housing denied to them.

And now, what is the situation today? When the government abolished the one-sixth mortgage loan on February 5 of last year, the Minister of Resources and Development said that the government was taking this step to conserve building materials needed for the defence program. The situation today was described by Mr. Mansur's statement that, although there were some limitations upon new residential starts because of shortages of certain types of building materials, this difficulty no longer exists, and he did not believe that, except in very isolated instances, the lack of building materials would play any part in limiting the amount of new residential construction in 1952.

In other words, the reasons which the Minister of Resources and Development cited to justify the removal of the one-sixth mortgage loan, have now disappeared. However, the government persists in denying new housing to those with incomes of less than $5,000. This unjust and unfair discrimination against those who need housing most must be removed immediately.

In the interest of those for whom housing accommodation is most needed, I would ask the government to reconsider its position with regard to its one-sixth mortgage loan arrangements, which it discarded to meet conditions not now existent. In this way, the housing legislation of this country can be made more immediately effective, and brought back in line with its original intent and purpose.

In addition to the large number of people who want to buy a new house, there are many whose greatest need is good rental housing at a reasonable rent. The answer to this problem is the low rental housing project, in which the three levels of government participate in the cost.

In Toronto we have a very excellent example of this kind of housing, in the Regent Park project. Toronto needs at least six of these projects, and I hope that, now that the province of Ontario has taken over the 7½ per cent of the cost formerly borne by the municipalities, Toronto and many other centres will undertake these projects on a large scale.

I hope that other provinces will follow the example of Ontario in assuming the full 25 per cent of the cost, formerly shared by the province and municipality. This relieving of the municipalities of their share of the cost should make it easy for many centres to undertake these low rental housing projects. I believe that they are the only answer to the housing problems of a very large number of Canadians.

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, the subject of housing is one in which I have always had considerable interest. It was actually not my intention to speak on it at this time, but after listening to some of the speeches which I have heard on housing, and, I say with some generosity, to the superficiality of what has been said on the subject, I think it is time for a little plain speaking on this subject. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) has stated that the abolition of the one-sixth additional loan by Central Mortgage and Housing last year was a great error. Who knows, perhaps it was an error. But we all know why it was done. It was done because it was considered at that time there was a shortage of building materials, and that those that were available were necessary for the war effort. If that was wrong, it was an honest mistake and it was quickly remedied.

Now, at the time we had this one-sixth additional loan, the lending value which was used was highly fictitious and very conservative. When we returned into the larger mortgage field after the abolition of the one-sixth mortgage loan, we adopted a more realistic attitude. From October last when the new method was introduced it was an 80 per cent loan based on the selling price and not on the lending value, and 90 per cent for war workers based on the selling price and not on that fictitiously low lending value. Since that time, we have had much greater loans than we ever had before. As a result, the down payments have been decreased on these small houses that come within the category covered by this loan.

I think it should be pointed out also—few people seem to realize it today—that when the dominion government came into this field they came into it gratuitously and to help the Canadian people, not because it was a field they were constitutionally obligated to enter. It was a field that involved property and civil rights—a field which every provincial government, if they are honest, must acknowledge as their sole responsibility. But in view of the fact that they were not carrying out that responsibility, the federal government entered into it in 1935 and has continued to this date. And when they are in it all they can do is to provide financial assistance, because we have not the legislative jurisdiction over property and civil rights. We have made that money available, in large quantities, and with the co-operation of the provincial government, under section 35 of the National Housing Act, almost anything can be done under that section.

I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that at this moment if there is one government in this country that has almost completely failed to take any part under section 35, it is the one Conservative government in Canada today in the province of Ontario.

I would point out that last year the attorney general of the province of Ontario made a large announcement that they were going to enter into a scheme with the federal government under section 35 of that act. At that time it was pointed out that they were going to build, I think it was, 10,000 housing units through the province of Ontario which would be given on a population basis throughout the province. At that time, I believe, on the population of the city of Toronto we were entitled to 500 units. It was pointed out that they would be erected on what have been for many years—and still are —the rifle ranges at Long Branch, Ontario.

At the time that announcement was made, anybody who knows anything about the rifle ranges at Long Branch knows that that was an unfortunate statement and, I may say, a misleading one. It has been well known that the Long Branch rifle ranges which are in the township of Toronto are not being given up by the Department of National Defence until the township of Toronto finds some other place which is equally suitable and hands it over to the Department of National Defence. It was known at that time that no such lands had been found, that no such deal had been made; that, if such a deal were made, it could not be made within a year or two; and that the 500 houses which were so glibly published as being on our doorstep had no possibility of being built there for at least a year or two years. I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that we shall probably never see them on that site.

In every other way the province of Ontario has been very co-operative verbally. Their co-operation has consisted in appointing a housing administrator. I believe that he has an assistant and two stenographers. They have gone into this business in a large way. They have insisted that they are interested in housing, and that they are doing everything possible to help us in housing. To date their interest has been extremely volatile and extremely verbal.

Aside from this provincial responsibility which everybody knows exists, and which the provincial government of Ontario has completely and utterly failed to meet, I should like to go into some of the real problems of this housing question. Many of us know what these problems are and they are not just glib talk about the abolition of the one-sixth. There are three main problems, and everyone knows them who knows anything about the building game. The first is the availability of mortgage money. The second is the relationship of lending value and sale price; and the third is the availability of serviced land. Those are the three problems that face anybody who knows something about the matter; I am not professing at all to know everything about it, Mr. Speaker, but I have some slight knowledge of the subject, and I say, with the greatest of deference, that such knowledge does not appear to have been demonstrated in some speeches that I have heard.

These problems must be faced honestly and clearly; they must be faced not with confusion, not with prejudice, but clearly and honestly. The first problem is the availability of mortgage money. The availability of mortgage money is something which depends largely on the lending institutions. The lending institutions are the institutions which have money available, in the same way as has any company depending on the money which comes into their hands through the payments largely of insurance premiums and through the availability of funds from the other securities which are not deemed as suitable at that time as the mortgage loans appear to be for their investment portfolio.

We all know that the insurance companies and various lending institutions have large holdings of government bonds. We all know that the government bonds have gone down in value, and that if the insurance companies are to have large amounts of money to invest in mortgage loans they have to liquidate these bonds at a very considerable loss.

I hold insurance policies as, I presume, does every other member in the house. I am sure that the policyholders of these insurance companies are not anxious to have these companies liquidate their bonds at a loss in order to get into the mortgage field when other fields are equally or more profitable and attractive.

Today on mortgages the lending institutions can get 5½ per cent. On many of the investments in municipal bonds and debentures and commercial bonds and debentures today they can get 4½ per cent. Today it is a well-known fact that these National Housing Act loans are expensive to service. There is a great deal of servicing in connection with them. In most lending institutions the cost of that servicing is something over one per cent. Accordingly it is simpler for them to buy these bonds yielding 4½ per cent, and it is slightly more profitable for them to do so.

It may be that, as a matter of public duty, the lending institutions of Canada should get into the mortgage field, perhaps in a larger way. Maybe they owe that duty to the people of Canada, but it is not a public service that they owe to their policyholders. In fairness to the lending institutions—and I hold no brief for them—I think it must be stated that most of them are in that field and are making as much mortgage money available for this purpose as is consistent with their financial position.

It must be remembered that during the days of 1949, 1950 and 1951 when they were putting out mortgage money in a large way, they were not putting it out from current revenues alone but were putting it out from current revenues and the conversion of government bonds and other securities into cash in order to make it available for mortgage money. To date they are limited, by reason of the fall of many of their investments in value, to the current revenue coming in from their insurance premiums and other earnings.

I think that is a fair statement of the situation and I think we must face it. I do not think it is fair to ask the lending institutions to place money out at a rate of interest and in a manner which is less profitable to them than is some other manner. If we are going to face the problem honestly, we must acknowledge the fact that if we want them to get into it in a larger way we must be prepared to give them a larger guarantee.

I think we should also cover the relationship of the lending value and the sale price. I shall have something to say on that subject later but I would point out at this moment that we have, under the present regulations under the housing act a more realistic approach. Formerly 80 per cent of the value was calculated on what was called the lending value and that lending value was a fictitious lending value based not on a sale price but on a lower figure which was based on perhaps the sale price some years earlier. To date it is based on actual sale price; and a builder who builds, under this act, certain types of housing with certain sizes of loans, depending on the types of housing involved—they are all 80 per cent loans except those for war workers which are 90 per cent—knows that when he sells that property at a price which is controlled under the National Housing Act by Central Mortage and Housing Corporation, he is going to get an 80 per cent advance on that actual sale price. It is a much more realistic approach and, I think, a much better one. As I say, I shall a little later have something to suggest in that behalf.

I think one of the most difficult and one of the main problems today—I think it is probably the most important problem today—is the availability of serviced land. In all of the larger urban localities the serviced land has been used. There is practically no serviced land available for housing. By serviced land I mean land that has been serviced with water, sewers, schools and that type of thing. There is just nowhere for people to build on serviced land.

It is a fact well known by builders and others who are acquainted with the subject, that housing subdivisions are not self-supporting in so far as the cost of schooling is concerned. Simply by placing the normal rates of taxes on this housing, the municipality immediately incurs much greater debts and much greater obligations by reason of the costs of schools which will have to be erected in order to meet the needs of the families which come into that housing division.

No municipality today which has had any experience in this field is very anxious to allow large housing subdivisions to be placed within its confines unless at the same time it is getting a fairly large proportion of industry to cover the additional taxation for schooling. So that today, before you can file a plan and get the serviced land in most of the municipalities—I am talking about urban municipalities at this point, Mr. Speaker—you must go to elaborate lengths before getting approval from the planning boards in Ontario, or if there is no planning board in the municipality, from the department of planning and development. You must put in the roads yourself; you must put in the water yourself; you must put in the sewage yourself; you must put in sewage disposal plants yourself; in some cases you must underwrite the cost, or part of the cost of the school building. You have to donate the land for the public and separate school; you have to donate so much land for park land, and it goes on and on; and the restrictions become greater all the time, and the cost greater. It has reached the point today that a small builder has practically no chance of getting serviced land, unless he is fortunate enough to be able to get some from some land servicing group. Therefore we are entering into the period when it is the large builder, the large scale builder, who is able to service sufficient land and therefore build enough houses to get enough profit out of them to make it worth his while.

House building today is a very large scale business. It is not the small builder who is doing the work today. If one looks at the number of builders operating in any municipality today he sees that the number has been cut at least in half, and sometimes down to one-third, simply because there is not enough available serviced land to build houses. And the big builder, when he finally goes through all this, complies with all the restrictions, all the regulations, all the necessities, the enormous expenses of filing a registered plan and getting permission to go ahead to build, is not too anxious to sell this land to the smaller builders, because his profit is going to be made not just by servicing the land and selling his serviced land, but by building on it and getting his profit out of the houses to be erected on it. That is one of the great problems today. I may say that that problem has not been met, very definitely has not been met, and it cannot be met until the provinces carry out their duties.

The duty of the province is definitely to assist municipalities to a much larger extent on the question of schooling. The question of schooling is something that today is not being faced, I know, in my own province—I am not so sure how it is being faced in other provinces. I know that in Ontario the provincial government has resolutely refused to face the question of the cost of schooling in the municipality, and until they are willing to face it, they are going to have this continued problem of the lack of serviced land, because the municipalities are definitely not going to permit land to be serviced within their municipalities for housing to any large extent until they get some additional help from the province in meeting the cost of schooling. I put that out because everyone who is in this building business, and anyone who has anything to do with it, is well acquainted with these problems, and realizes that while the dominion government can make money available, they are not in a position to service land themselves without the co-operation of the provinces and of the municipalities. We all know that under section 35 of the National Housing Act the dominion government has made available for servicing land and for building on that serviced land 75 per cent of the cost thereof, and all that the province has to put up is 25 per cent, and with the help of the municipalities they can split that up into whatever proportion they care to make it. That money is available there; the act is there, but it is very rarely used in Ontario, because the Ontario provincial government has resolutely and steadfastly refused to face that problem.

I have a couple of suggestions which I would like to make to this house. I think we have reached the point in the progress of this country when it may well be that the time has arrived to face the question of housing on a somewhat different basis. It may be that at this time we must recognize that housing has raised grave social implications. We all know that housing has grave social implications, the question of the standard of living, juvenile delinquency, marital happiness, health and other factors are involved in bad or inferior housing. These are things which I am sure the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) is aware of, and I am sure that he would be enthusiastically in favour of anything that would be possible to remedy that condition. As I say, the time may now have arrived, although by reason of the defence effort it may be that we shall have to postpone it for some time, but I would suggest that with the enormous prosperity in this country, and our very high national income, we should certainly consider at this point whether the time has not arrived when we shall have to take a somewhat different approach to the question of housing.

I suggest that we might arrive at it from the opposite approach and decide not so much what the lending value will be but how much the down payment will be. I know that in the United States that has been done in some areas under their F.H.A. Perhaps their down payment is too low. It may be that when the person purchases in the United States under the F.H.A. he has not a sufficient stake in that property to guarantee that he will look after it and give it the necessary care and attention which it really needs. I therefore suggest that the down payment which we have in this country should be somewhat higher than theirs. I would suggest that the time has come to consider whether instead of a mortgage loan, we should consider that the down payment should be fixed at the sum of $1,000. I know that in the United States it has been suggested that this is $400 or $500. I would hesitate to endorse that lower down payment, because I am afraid that people might think it was merely a cheap rental over a period of time, and take no responsibility for the property. But even with the $1,000 down payment, I would suggest that you would still have to take some precautions and change the terms of your mortgage so that you would then have much greater protection for the lending institution or the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. If you are going to have the $1,000 down payment, it may well be that you will have a certain number of people who will regard the property as very cheap at that price, with those low payments and low carrying charges, and you may find that they will regard it as something that they can give up at any time and move out. I would therefore suggest that there should definitely be a provision in any mortgage containing supervisory powers. Supervisory powers should be contained in the mortgage. If you are going to have a house sold on that small down payment, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and/or the lending institution should have the power to supervise that property, keep it in repair if the owner fails to do so, and add the additional cost thereof to the principal of the mortgage.

Let me give you an example. If after two or three years the painting is bad, and the house needs painting, the lending institution or the supervising authority should certainly have the power to go in there and request that it be painted, and if it is not painted, paint it themselves and add the cost of the painting to the mortgage and have it amortized over the monthly payments for say two years.

These are suggestions I put forward. I do not think they are entirely unfeasible. I think eventually we are going to have to reach a different approach to the problem. It may be that the time has not arrived, but it is certainly time for considering it, with our national economy at an all-time high today.

I have another suggestion to offer. It is that we get out of the first mortgage field entirely; that is, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and get into the second mortgage field. I suggest that the first mortgage field be left for the lending institution, which will then lend up to 60 per cent of the value of the property, and that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation encourage or discourage housing by the increasing or decreasing of the size of the second mortgage. There would be one advantage in not changing the position of the lending institutions. They would still be operating in their normal way at all times; whereas with changes in the National Housing Act from time to time the lending institutions, until they get accustomed to these changes, have a tendency to drop out of the field and then gradually come in again.

These are the suggestions which I put out. Just one final word, Mr. Speaker; I would suggest that when we face this problem we face it honestly and without prejudice. There are many things to be said in favour of the lending institutions. They are probably subject to more criticism than they should be. Nobody suggests for one moment that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been entirely perfect in its thinking, in its philosophy, and perhaps in its administration of the National Housing Act, and the other acts which it administers. But I think in fairness to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation it must be said that they have done a very excellent job, on the whole. I think in fairness to the lending institutions it should be said that they have given great co-operation. If there is some criticism to be made, then it must be of the provinces, which have failed to live up to their responsibilities.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) who laid the blame for our housing shortage at the door of the federal government, and with equal interest to the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Hunter) who shifted the blame to the provincial government in Ontario.

The fact remains of course that whether it is the fault of the provincial government or that of the federal government, we need houses and we are not getting them. The fact remains that the housing policy of the federal government needs reviewing in the light of present-day needs and present-day circumstances. It seems to me that, regardless of what Ontario has or has not done in the matter of housing—and I hold no special brief for the government of Ontario—the situation has developed today to a point where the federal government should revise the policy which directs Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

In an earlier speech I pointed out that particularly during the last year the two most serious obstacles in connection with housing were lack of serviced land and lack of mortgage funds. I realize of course that the provision of serviced land is a matter for the province and the municipalities. I realize, too, that the three-way agreement between the federal government, the provincial government and the municipalities for the acquisition and servicing of land is just not working. It just is not getting the land. It is not making it possible for municipalities to proceed with building on a large scale. I pointed out that the provision of water, the provision of sewers, streets, sidewalks, fire protection, parks, playgrounds and especially education, which the building of a large number of houses in a comparatively short space of time places upon a municipality, is a burden that most municipalities cannot bear.

A housing authority is reported in the press only this week as saying that three of the townships in the Toronto suburban area would go bankrupt within a few years if they continued to build homes without at the same time securing industrial development. His advice was that, to save themselves from bankruptcy, those townships must call a halt to the building of homes until such times as more industries have moved into those townships so as to assist in carrying part of the municipal tax burden the citizens of the townships must bear.

Some assistance must be given to the municipalities by the federal or provincial governments. Either some way must be found of relieving the municipalities of some of the burden they are now called upon to bear in the matter of education and social services, or those municipalities must be provided with a larger share of the tax income. I realize that this comes within the jurisdiction of the province. I feel nevertheless that because housing is of such national importance it becomes the duty of the federal government to show some leadership and to take some initiative in getting together with the provincial and municipal governments to see if some way cannot be found out of this difficulty.

It is said by authorities that the housing situation today is hampering our defence effort. It is certainly retarding production within the provinces and affecting the whole social structure of our society. The housing situation is of such importance that in my opinion the federal government, if it is to carry out its duty to the Canadian people, should assume the responsibility of getting together the governments at the three levels with a view to working out some solution to this problem whereby houses can be provided for those who need them.

This government has persisted in refusing to contribute anything to the ordinary public and secondary school systems within the province. It insists upon leaving that burden for the province and the municipalities. But it also leaves with the municipalities another responsibility that, in my opinion, is the direct responsibility of the federal government; I refer to the matter of taking care of the unemployed employables.

During the last winter we had in Toronto and its suburbs large numbers of unemployed employables. The federal government refuses to accept any responsibility for these people, beyond the payment of unemployment insurance. When unemployment insurance ceases, and in those cases where it is not sufficient to enable a man with a family to get by, this government washes its hands of the matter. The provincial government says that it is not its responsibility, but that it is the responsibility of the federal authorities. The result is that the municipality is left with the burden. It has no choice but to accept the responsibility. The provincial and federal governments are far enough removed from those who are in need that they can afford to remain callous to the demands made. The local municipal council is on the spot. It must either provide assistance for those people, or see them hungry or in debt. In the latter instance, where they are obliged to go into debt, local businessmen have to assume the burden.

If this government still refuses to assist in the matter of education, then I say it could assist in the housing situation, so far as suburban municipalities are concerned, if it would assume responsibility for the unemployed employables who occupy these new houses but who, in many cases, become unemployed and do not have unemployment insurance. I say again that in this matter of providing serviced land and the further matter of getting the municipalities to work with the provincial and federal governments, it becomes the responsibility of this government to show some leadership and to arrive at some arrangement whereby the municipalities will be able to bear the load thrown upon them by reason of the building of these houses.

The second serious obstacle to the building of houses during the past year has been the shortage of mortgage funds. Granted that the houses which are built under the National Housing Act are built for the upper third income group, granted that seventy per cent of our people are not receiving sufficient income to warrant the purchase and the carrying of the cheapest houses built under the National Housing Act, nevertheless if builders could satisfy the present market for houses that can be built at today's prices there would be some relief in the housing situation. As I say, the bottleneck has been the lack of mortgage funds. Mr. Mansur in his report for 1951 says:

> Experience in 1951 and the prospects for 1952 suggest that sources of mortgage funds in Canada may not be great enough to sustain a long term annual rate of housing starts at the level of 1949 and 1950.

Then he goes on to say:

> If for social reasons an annual housing program equal to or greater than those accomplished in these years is a requirement then it may prove necessary to find additional sources of credit to be made available for mortgages on new residential construction.

I do not think anyone doubts for one moment that for social reasons we need an annual housing program in this country at least as great as that which was carried out in 1949-1950. As a matter of fact most housing authorities are agreed that if we are to meet the actual needs of the people we should have an annual building program greater than the program which was carried out in 1949. There just is no question on that point, that for social reasons we need such a building program.

Since mortgage funds are not available from the insurance companies or the lending institutions there is only one other source. While Mr. Mansur does not mention that additional source there is no doubt that it is either the federal or the provincial government, or both. The fact that there is a shortage is borne out by the statistics contained in the report which indicates that the number of national housing loans in 1951 were 14,918 as compared with 33,934 in 1950. Those 33,934 loans in 1950 were for 42,280 units; in 1951 the loans were for 19,903 units only. In 1950 the mortgage loans amounted to $284,500,000; in 1951 they amounted to $123,700,000. I think those figures indicate that Mr. Mansur is right in insisting that some additional sources of credit must be made available in order to maintain the annual building program required to meet our needs.

I think there is ample evidence that there is still a market for houses that can be built with the assistance of National Housing Act loans. There is still a market for houses costing $8,000, $10,000 or more. There appears to be no great shortage of labour or materials and it would appear that there is still a considerable amount of serviced land available for building. I know personally of one builder who has serviced land available on which to build 400 houses. He has been held up for two years because the lending institutions are no longer interested in lending money under the National Housing Act. There are other builders across the country who have serviced land available for building, but that building is being held up chiefly because no mortgage funds are available from the lending institutions.

Whether or not that shortage of mortgage funds is genuine, whether or not it is a shortage artificially created by the lending institutions in order that they may squeeze more profit out of the present housing emergency, I am in no position to say. But certain it is that the lending institutions today are no longer interested in lending money in sufficient quantities to meet the housing needs of our people under the terms of the National Housing Act. Certain it is that they are not particularly interested in lending money under the National Housing Act to an extent that will maintain a building program of 100,000 houses a year.

It should be borne in mind that when the government set up its housing authority and undertook to guarantee or to secure the lending institutions against loss on money lent for purposes of building, the government provided an outlet for money which the lending institutions did not know what to do with. In the first place the government gave the lending institutions every opportunity to provide that money and build the houses that were needed on their own initiative. Back in 1944 I think the lending institutions set up their own company known as Housing Enterprises Limited. When the finance companies ran into difficulty with their own venture, when they ran into debt, when they found they were unable to build houses at a profit, Central Mortgage and Housing came to their rescue. The government took over that enterprise at a cost of many millions of dollars and rescued the financial institutions from the difficulty into which they had got and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is carrying on that enterprise.

Today when those same financial companies find that there are other investment fields more profitable than the building of houses they are just no longer interested. The fact that the nation needs houses means very little to those lending institutions. The government has increased their interest. The government has stepped up the amount of security provided, and I think has made every reasonable opportunity to induce the finance companies to make money available for houses. I think the government has gone much further than it should in seeking to placate the finance companies and to induce them to provide the necessary funds. We have reached a stage now where, as was said by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), the lending institutions have vacated that field. To all intents and purposes they have either refused or have been unable to provide the necessary funds to meet the necessary housing program. I think it is high time that the government itself undertook to lend money directly, certainly in communities with over 5,000 population.

As a matter of fact the former president of the national housebuilders association, Mr. Mager, is reported to have said that the insurance companies are attempting to regulate the amount of housing to be built in any one area of Canada. According to a report in the Ottawa Journal of April 8, 1952, he said that the insurance companies even tell them what materials they can use despite what is laid down in the national building code. Then he went on to say that the attitude of the lending institutions amounted to contempt for the government and the building industry generally.

I think if you take that in conjunction with the lobby that the insurance companies carried on last fall when amendments to the Government Annuities Act were before a committee, and the subsequent withdrawal of the measure in compliance with the insurance companies' lobby, one is justified in asking to what extent the insurance companies of Canada control not only Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation but government policy itself. Certainly as far as housing is concerned the hands of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are tied by government policy, and government policy is working in the interests of the insurance companies rather than in the interests of the hundreds of thousands of people who need houses.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what good reason is there why hundreds of thousands of home builders or buyers should be forced to pay insurance companies 5 per cent interest when the government advances the taxpayers' money to these same insurance companies at 3½ per cent? What good reason is there except the benefits that accrue to the insurance companies? Why should Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Canadian taxpayers have to rely on these companies for mortgage funds? Cannot a government, which can raise $2 billion for national defence, also raise the few millions that will be required to institute and maintain an adequate housing program? Where is the need for the taxpayers of Canada to continue to pay tribute to the Caesars of the insurance world when their own government can provide money for everything else needed by way of services except housing? I submit there is a great need for radical revision of the government's policy both in the matter of direct loans for the building of houses and in the matter of co-operation with provincial and municipal governments with respect to the building of low-cost rental housing.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

CANADIAN FORCES ACT

DISCIPLINE AND ADMINISTRATION—COURTS MARTIAL—PENSIONS, SUPERANNUATION, ETC.

The house resumed, from Wednesday, May 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Claxton that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a bill to amend the National Defence Act to effect certain changes respecting the discipline and administration of the forces and to provide that persons who commit grave breaches of the Geneva conventions of 1949 may be tried out of Canada by court martial; to amend the Defence Services Pension Act to provide that the total emolument, by way of salary and pension, payable to a pensioner who is employed as a civil servant may be adjusted in accordance with current rates of pay and allowances of the forces and to provide that members of the forces who are otherwise eligible for pension may be permitted to count periods of full-time reserve service of a continuous duration of six months or more for the purpose of determining the amount of pension; to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act to enable a person who served overseas with the Royal Canadian Navy during the second world war otherwise than at sea to count such service for the purposes of the Civil Service Superannuation Act notwithstanding that the time for election to count such service has expired; and to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act to make the provision respecting the eligibility of servicemen to sit as members of the House of Commons consistent with the provisions of the Canada Elections Act.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, this resolution introduces a bill to amend four different acts, the National Defence Act, the Defence Services Pension Act, the Civil Service Superannuation Act and the Senate and House of Commons Act. I stated when the debate was last adjourned that it seemed to me to be an unreasonable and unsatisfactory method to introduce amendments to four different acts all under the title of one bill, the Canadian Forces Act, 1952, as the minister intimated it is to be called. My objection to that method is that with amendments to four different measures it might be that exception would be taken to one while the other three would be perfectly satisfactory. One would be in the predicament of having to oppose the bill when introduced although one might agree in principle with three of the amendments. The fourth one might not be considered sound and satisfactory. However, that is a procedural matter and I presume that the government has decided to go ahead with that method. I hope it will not become a practice in the future.

Now, regarding the National Defence Act amendment, I understand that will be to provide for the punishment of those who may commit offences against the Geneva conventions, particularly against prisoners of war and injured who have been captured by the enemy. From the minister's remarks I was not quite clear as to who was going to be responsible for the punishment of the offender, because in his remarks he said "regardless of nationality". I do not know whether the punishment will be awarded by some international court or whether it will be awarded by the nation whose servicemen have been captured, and against whom any atrocities may have been carried out. The minister will explain that when speaking, either on the bill or in closing this debate.

I should like to say a few words concerning the amendments to the Civil Service Superannuation Act. I have no comment to make about the amendments to the other acts. Regarding the Civil Service Superannuation Act, it has always been a problem for the retired serviceman to find employment when he has completed his service. Quite frequently his previous training has made his services very valuable to various other departments of the government. Having been in the government service for years, he not unnaturally likes to continue in the public service. Of course, if he has gone into industry, companies have offered to pay for his services according to the value that they may have placed upon them, exactly the same way as provincial and municipal governments do when employing a pensioner.

But for many years the federal government has said that the service pension, plus the remuneration that the pensioner will receive from whatever department he is working in, could not exceed the amount of the pay and allowances that the man received on retirement without affecting his service pension. In the past that applied not only to warrant officers but also to non-commissioned officers and men. This limitation was removed a few years ago so far as non-commissioned officers and men were concerned, but it has remained applicable to officers and warrant officers. I think the amendment that is being introduced is certainly a step forward in the right direction. In view of the fact that service pay has been raised because of the increased cost of living, the pay of the pensioner will not now be considered as that of the day of his retirement but the pay of the present day. At least, that is my interpretation of the resolution.

I want to point out that I consider that is a step in the right direction, because in the past hardship has existed for pensioners. I should like to put on the record extracts from a letter which I received from a man who served for many years in the old permanent force as a non-commissioned officer, and who subsequently received his commission. I believe this is a typical case. He says:

> The most I can draw as a civil servant is $1,550 per annum which, at present, is all taxable to the extent of approximately $280 per annum leaving a net of $1,270. My pension was taxed another $90 making a total tax for 1949 of $370.
> I have had to refuse two or three raises from the civil service—statutory increases—even on as low a grading as clerk 2A, as well as the first cost-of-living increase, which might have been granted, including the proposed present increase still pending. If I had accepted them the equivalent amount would have been deducted from my pension.

That letter was dated in February, 1951. The situation in respect to that pensioner will have improved if this amendment is adopted. But I am going to offer the suggestion that we may now remove all the limitations. As it is now, the amendment will work in favour of the higher ranks, whereas the warrant officers, lieutenants and captains who retire will not have the same advantage as those in the more senior ranks. Take the position, for instance, of a captain who retires. His pension, according to whatever length of service he may have, would be based on $389 a month, which is now the pay and allowances of a captain. On the other hand, if a brigadier retires his pension would be based on $930 per month. It is quite obvious, therefore, that the increases would react far more favourably upon the officer in the senior ranks.

You may say that possibly there would not be many junior officers retiring. The class of man who retires as a lieutenant or as a captain would be one who had spent most of his service in the ranks and who had been promoted at the end of his service. He would not have had the opportunity of rising to the more senior ranks. Anyone who retired as a colonel or brigadier or a corresponding rank would have gone in as an officer and throughout his whole service would have been drawing a higher rate of pay. The man in the junior rank would not have had the opportunity of saving as much as the man in the more senior rank. While this amendment will better the conditions of retirement as compared with those which have existed heretofore, I wonder whether the time has not come when we can recognize the fact that we have removed the limitation so far as the non-commissioned officers and men are concerned; we are practically removing the limitation so far as the senior ranks are concerned, and in so far as the warrant officers and junior commissioned ranks are concerned, it seems to me we still have a limitation.

If the services of the individual are of value to the civil service, surely the time has come when the civil service can well afford to pay the price for the services which are rendered. I merely ask the minister to give that suggestion consideration before he introduces the bill; and possibly he might see his way clear to remove all restrictions and allow the individual—be he soldier, non-commissioned officer, captain or whether he be in a more senior rank—to receive the pay which the civil service would grant any other individual, without affecting his pension.

May I put it this way. Bear in mind the fact that if he went into civilian life, or if he found employment with a municipal or provincial government, his pension then would not be affected. This provision is placing the junior commissioned ranks and the warrant officer rank at a disadvantage, although I admit quite frankly—and I am pleased to see it introduced—that it is an improvement on the existing system.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I just say a few words? I am sure we have all listened with interest to the points that have been raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), particularly the matter which he was discussing in the closing part of his remarks. I hope that attention will be paid by the minister to the case that the hon. member has made.

I wish also to support the position taken by the hon. member for Nanaimo when he suggests that the government might give further consideration to its method of amending legislation affecting the Canadian forces. Despite an excellent overhaul of the National Defence Act only a few sessions ago, it appears that each session as we meet there are further amendments to be made to the various statutes that affect the Canadian forces.

In addition to the difficulty cited by the hon. member for Nanaimo in connection with this method of having one bill to amend several pieces of legislation, it seems to me that there is also the difficulty that arises in the future as to the problem that will confront those who will look for the complete statute in respect of any one of these matters. It seems to me that those who are wanting, for example, to know what is the up-to-date version of the Senate and House of Commons Act or the Civil Service Superannuation Act will be a bit puzzled to discover that, amongst other places, they have to look in amending statutes known from time to time as the Canadian Forces Act. I feel that there is posed by this situation a problem which is not solved by this method.

The hon. member for Nanaimo expressed the hope that this pattern would not be followed in the future. This is at least the second time when it has been done. Last year we had a similar bill—I believe it was called by the same name, the Canadian Forces Act—which amended not four or five pieces of legislation but quite a number—seventeen or nineteen—of the statutes of Canada. That was the bill with regard to which we got into a bit of a quarrel with the other house concerning the form of those amendments. The bill as introduced into this house was drafted in rather brief form. The hon. members of the other place thought it should be in much more extended language and they amended the bill accordingly.

I will not pursue the matter further at this time, Mr. Speaker. It is one which involves as well the whole question of what happens to bills like this when the revised statutes are prepared. I simply suggest that further thought might be given to what is the best way to amend a number of statutes in which one department is interested, both from the standpoint of being fair with the house and from the standpoint of being able to find this legislation after it gets on the statute books.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make any detailed statement with regard to the bill at this time. I will save that until the bill is before the house. However, I should like to add my voice to those of the two hon. members who have just taken their seats, and who have made an argument for not including in the one bill the amendments to four separate acts. It seems to me that to do so will cause confusion not only at the present time but in the future. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said just a few moments ago, in the revised statutes it is going to cause a certain amount of trouble and any further amendment to this act is certainly going to be a bit complicated.

Possibly the minister has a reason for this procedure; I do not know. It would appear to me, however, that if it is followed it is going to make it rather awkward for the members of the house, when the bill is before us, to vote either for or against it, if there is anything in there that we do not like. Half of the amendments might be acceptable to us, or possibly all but one of the amendments might be acceptable to all of us; but we would have to vote against the bill and against what we might consider to be desirable amendments in order to attempt to defeat one clause or article in it.

It seems to me that it would have been much better all round if the minister had brought down these amendments in four separate pieces of legislation.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Chairman, I do not think hon. members of the committee would want me at this stage to reply at length to the observations that have been made by the hon. members who have taken part in the discussion. However, I should like to say a word or two with regard to points that have been raised. First of all, with regard to the form of the bill, this is the third year in which a bill of this kind has been introduced. The National Defence Act was adopted in 1950 as an omnibus statute, for the first time since 1868 incorporating in one act all legislation with regard to defence, bringing it up to date and providing a uniform disciplinary code applicable to all three services. Naturally that legislation involved a good many consequential amendments to other statutes. By the time that act was put into effect I think there were some—the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggested a number, nineteen or something like that.

Mr. Knowles: Seventeen or nineteen.

Mr. Claxton: Seventeen or nineteen; I think that is at least so. We in the Department of National Defence considered, with the Department of Justice, how this should be done. Nineteen or more different bills—each having six stages, as they have through this house, changing the word "thus" to "so" and the words "non permanent active militia" to "reserve forces" would take some time if put in separate bills. We also had in mind the fact that now we have considerable forces in Canada and it is desirable that the amendments be put in a form which can be incorporated into their books of military law promptly and effectively. So I took the advice of the Department of Justice and of the judge advocate general and thought that the best way to proceed was to have one bill as far as possible each year relating to defence matters right across the board, just as we did in the enactment of the National Defence Act itself. We had bills and statutes in 1950 and 1951. So far it has caused no inconvenience to anyone that has been brought to my attention, and has caused a great deal of convenience to the armed forces, which now have one statute each year to which they can look if there is any amendment that year. I think that is a pretty important point.

With regard to the observation of the hon. member for Nanaimo about the Geneva convention, we propose to adopt a law which will enable us to impose the sanctions to carry out our part of the conventions, irrespective of where an offence may occur, and to take action in the courts of Canada.

Mr. Pearkes: On our nationals.

Mr. Claxton: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Pearkes: No other power will have the right to carry out punishment on our nationals.

Mr. Claxton: I think that is right.

With regard to the final point relating to limitations on the salaries that may be obtained in the civil service by retired officers and men of the armed forces, as I said the last time that this resolution came before the house, this restriction does not apply to men; it applies only to officers. As it stands today the provisions of section 4, subsection 12 and section 52 of the Defence Services Pension Act, restrict an officer or warrant officer pensioner, appointed to the civil service, to that part of his pension which, when totalled with his salary, will not exceed the pay which he was in receipt of at the date of his retirement. The proposal here is to increase the ceiling so that he will get a salary and pension which combined will total his pay and allowances at the time of that date, not the date of his retirement.

The hon. member for Nanaimo has suggested that we should remove all limitations. That might be desirable from many points of view. Here I should like to pay a tribute to people like Rear Admiral Stephens who, after a long life of service in the navy, has worked for several years in a very senior and responsible position in the department, advising on labour relations. He himself rose from the lower decks and has done a most useful job for what must, after the deduction of income tax, amount to something like $2,500 a year over and above what he would have got from pension. That kind of case demands our full sympathy and consideration. But on the other hand Admiral Stephens, or someone in his capacity who retires at his seniority, if carried on in the department in a civilian capacity, would be entitled to something like the pay, position and responsibilities of an assistant deputy minister, let us say $10,000, $11,000, $12,000. His pension after 35 years' service and more was something like $6,000. With his pay and the pension of such an officer he would be getting $16,000 or more than the deputy minister or chiefs of staff. In other words, he would be profiting very substantially from his retirement, though continuing in the service of the same government department. That would not be a desirable thing. On that account it has not been the general policy of the government to treat civil service salaries and salaries received from private employers in the same way for the reason I have stated, and I do not see how else you could deal with it.

On the other hand, we think it is quite unfair that, in view of the increases in the pay and allowances of officers of the armed forces, he should not at least be entitled to draw from his combined pension and salary in the civil service up to what he would have been entitled to draw had he continued in the service and had advantage of the pay increase. So that, as the hon. member for Nanaimo said, this marks a step in the right direction, and I must say that the advisers of the government do not see how we can go any further in this direction without making it profitable for some officers to retire and take up positions in the civil service, if we are to enjoy their service.

What we want to do is to have officers serve as long as they can usefully serve in their service capacity. Then if they have qualities and capacities which are useful to the service of Canada in a civilian capacity, enable them to have a fair recompense for work which, while it may be inadequately paid for, is something they want to do.

Mr. Pearkes: I am not quite certain whether I made my point clear or whether the minister did not quite get the essence of what I was trying to explain. I feel that while these amendments are good—and I approve entirely of the assistance which is being given to the rear admiral, who is still employed—I do not quite see the necessity of keeping a stricter limitation on the man who retires with a junior rank. The warrant officer has a stricter limitation placed upon his earnings, because at the date of his retirement, or at the present time, the pay of the rank of a warrant officer, of course, is not as high as the pay of the rank of an admiral. The pay of a captain is not as high as the pay of the rank of a colonel or a brigadier, and the limitation on the earnings in the civil service are based upon the pay of the rank at the present time. It is an improvement when it is based on the pay of the rank on the date of retirement; but why should not the retiring warrant officer or the retiring captain, or whatever the junior rank may be, have the same opportunities of earning the same amount of money in the civil service without affecting his pension, as the more senior ranks? I was asking for an equitable limitation, not one which was based entirely upon rank. I do suggest that it could be overcome by perhaps putting on a ceiling, or something in the nature of a fixed amount, or perhaps by removing the limitation altogether. But under the present system we are perpetuating a disadvantage which has been in existence for years in respect of the more junior ranks. As I said, it affects the more junior ranks particularly, because the man who retires from those ranks has probably served as a non-commissioned officer for most of his time, and only been recently promoted to, shall we say, a warrant officer or a captain, and has not had the opportunity of building up a reserve, which the officer retiring from the senior ranks would have.

I would ask the minister to give consideration to seeing whether it is not possible to find a way in which the limitation which will be imposed will be equitable on both the junior and the senior ranks.

Mr. Low: I had not intended to speak on the resolution at all. If I were to do so it would be only with superficial knowledge. However I am struck with the form of the resolution, and I am seeking more information as to why it was presented in this form. Here we have lumped together half a dozen resolutions in what could be described as one omnibus piece of legislation. It is such a radical change from the usual form of resolution preceding a bill that I think we should be satisfied that it is a good form to follow before we proceed with it.

I listened to the brief explanation given by the minister, and I am not sure that I understood all of it. If I remember correctly the minister said that, after they are passed by the house, the amendments will be inserted in service books or records by the servicemen, and he thought that if they were in this form the servicemen could interpret the amendments readily. If I were a serviceman I would hesitate to try to untangle a bill with as many facets as this one appears to have.

I am wondering if there is not some other reason behind the form this has taken. The reason might be to avoid the necessity of bringing before the house five or six, or perhaps more, different resolutions preceding bills. That may be; and perhaps it would be a proper way to save time. But I want to be sure that when we attempt to save time we do not get ourselves so confused that we will be like the centipede who, when he was asked how he knew what foot to put down first when he attempted to move, began thinking about it; and the more he thought about it the more he got tangled up, with the result that he could not move without falling down.

We may be reaching that point. I wish the minister would go a little deeper into his explanation of the form of the resolution. Thus far I am not satisfied.

Mr. Claxton: I have little to add to what I said before. There have been many demands from various quarters to organize the business of the house. That is not my responsibility. But I think it is easy for members to see that if all the technical amendments relating to national defence can be brought forward at one time, then they can be dealt with at one time by the hon. members who are especially interested in defence. Also when we reach the committee stage the technical officers of the department—the judge advocate general, and other officers—can be here to give assistance. All of them would not have to wait to go through five or more different bills, either at the same or at different times.

It seems to me this procedure makes sense, from the point of view of the proper conduct of the business of the house; and it also makes sense from the point of view of the armed forces, because we have then each year one bill relative to the armed forces. It is tied into the loose leaf copy of the National Defence Act, without any difficulty at all.

Our experience in having this done this way in the previous two years, has not created the slightest difficulty.

Mr. Low: In what form will these amendments to the bills be inserted in the loose leaf book?

Mr. Claxton: They will be loose leaf amendments cut off and tagged in.

Mr. Low: Each portion will be tagged into its own particular act?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Low: But the acts in the loose leaf book are of course separate?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask a question which may be technical, but perhaps the minister can answer it. In the case of the rear admiral whose pension would have been $6,000, but who on going to work in the minister's department ends up with a total emolument of $10,000, on what funds are those amounts drawn? Does he get the entire $10,000 from the funds of the department as civil service pay, or does he get $6,000 pension and $4,000 civil service pay?

Mr. Claxton: I am subject to correction in the answer I make, because I have never had the question raised before. My view is however that he gets his pension from the defence services pension fund to which he has contributed. Then he would receive the balance of his pay from the department. However I should like to check on that before giving a final answer.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to ask a question arising out of what was said a moment ago. Do I understand that when this bill passes it has the effect of amending the Defence Services Pension Act, the Civil Service Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Navy Act, and so on? When someone looks up one of these other acts, how does he have notice, unless he has an annotated copy? Are those amendments carried into the other acts, or do they rest solely in the measure we are now going to pass? In other words will amendments be made to the Defence Services Pension Act by this measure? How does one who picks up the Defence Services Pension Act know that this amendment has been made?

Mr. Claxton: In the same way, and only in the same way, as he would know that an amendment has been made to any statute—either through reading the statutes passed each year, from the first chapter to the end, and making the necessary corrections, or by looking at an index. The index carries references to separate statutes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is not a complete answer because, as a matter of fact, in the case of most statutes, an office copy can be brought up to date, showing what has happened in each year.

Mr. Claxton: Where there are consolidations bringing the acts up to date they carry the amendments.

Mr. Knowles: Let us take the case of the Canadian Forces Act, 1951. I believe there was one in 1951. Let us assume, and I think this is the case, that the Revised Statutes of Canada now in the process of being printed will include the Canadian Forces Act, 1951. Will the Canadian Forces Act, 1951, appear in the Revised Statutes of 1952 as a statute by itself or will it be distributed among the dozen, fifteen or seventeen different statutes which it amended?

Mr. Claxton: Distributed.

Mr. Adamson: Will this bill affect our relations with United States forces stationed in Canada?

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Adamson: I wondered whether it was the intention to amend any of those regulations.

Mr. Claxton: No. We have an act relating to visiting forces which is applicable to the United States and which was enacted in 1947, if I recall correctly. At the last session we enacted legislation applicable to the forces of the North Atlantic treaty nations. That second act permits the government to change the effect of existing statutes applicable to visiting forces. No other legislation is proposed.

Mr. Adamson: Those statutes have been before the house several times and amended?

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Pearkes: The minister stated that the amendments to the National Defence Act will provide for penal sanctions and the bringing of offenders, regardless of their nationalities, before our courts. Supposing an American did commit one of the offences contemplated against the Geneva convention, if that were possible, would he be tried before a Canadian court or a United States court?

Mr. Claxton: That is a matter having to do with the provisions of the bill. I have several pages of notes here, but I would prefer to answer that when the bill is brought down. I think it would make it more intelligent.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Claxton thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 224, respecting the Canadian forces.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

EXTENSION OF APPLICATION TO YEARS 1952 AND 1953

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to extend the application of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to the years 1952 and 1953 and to clarify the provisions of subsection five of section three so as to provide for the assistance intended when this subsection was enacted in 1951.

He said: Mr. Speaker, with your permission I should like to make a very short statement. I say a brief statement, because the matter of assistance to the gold mining industry was thoroughly discussed in this house less than a year ago, and I believe all hon. members are quite conversant with the subject.

On December 24 last my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), announced that legislation would be sought at this session of parliament to continue the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act for a further period of two years, that is, for the calendar years 1952 and 1953.

It is well known that the gold mining industry has faced and is facing real difficulties as a result of rising costs and a fixed price for the industry's product. The government has been aware of this and for the past four years has met this situation by a cost-aid system under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

In October 1951 gold producers were given access to premium markets for industrial gold. A number of mines took advantage of these arrangements and are continuing to do so. But this new outlet did not solve the problem of the higher cost mines. With costs continuing to rise, very serious consequences would face the industry should the cost-aid terminate at the end of 1951.

As I stated last year before this house, I hold that much of Canada's future growth is bound up in the development and colonization of our northern country, and gold mining is still the pioneer industry in opening northern Canada for development. It is therefore important that the life of these northern and western communities, the forerunners of our Canadian northward development, be safeguarded.

The bill which it is now proposed to introduce in this house is to provide for the extension of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to the calendar years 1952 and 1953 on the same basis as the 1951 formula. The bill will also clarify the application of the formula for cost-aid in respect of the last quarter of 1950 and of the years 1951, 1952 and 1953.

The hope is hereby expressed that this extension of the act for two more years will encourage and assist the gold mines in meeting the continued high costs of production, and will be of benefit to those communities partly or wholly dependent upon them.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of hon. members besides myself who wish to speak in a somewhat extended manner on this resolution. As the time still remaining would not permit me to complete my remarks this evening, I should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move the adjournment of the house. Tomorrow, if the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) is in the house, we will continue with this resolution.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will he be?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The second item would be the resolution to ratify the convention on the prevention and punishment of genocide; then Bill No. 210, to provide for carrying into effect the treaty of peace between Canada and Japan; then Bill No. 93, to amend the Export and Import Permits Act; then Bill No. 195, to amend the Government Employees Compensation Act, 1947; Bill No. 193, respecting the New Westminster harbour commissioners; and Bill No. 196, to amend the Supreme Court Act. As I mentioned last night, none of these measures are controversial and they should not take very much time.

Mr. Fleming: Not so far, anyway.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at three o'clock.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES

PRIVILEGE—FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I wish to refer to a matter which affects the rights and privileges of all members of this house. A telegram which just reached me this morning advises me of a news dispatch as appearing in the Vancouver Sun. It reads in part as follows:

> The following dispatch appeared in the Vancouver Sun appearing Ottawa date 13 begins:
> Dr. E. Christie, federal veterinarian told the parliamentary foot-and-mouth disease investigators today that most people in Saskatchewan feel the investigators are wasting a lot of time. The only dissatisfaction appears to have come from politicians in Ottawa, Dr. Christie states. Ends.
> In view of the grave anxiety felt throughout all of Canada at this terrible scourge it is disgraceful that any official should make such a statement and the seriousness of the matter should be squarely put before the minister of that department and a public withdrawal instantly made.

Mr. Speaker, I am not a member of the agriculture committee but I have checked and I find that such a statement was made there. There are two respects in which the privileges of this house have been affronted in connection with this statement. The first is that it is suggested that a group of members of this house investigating one of the most serious situations ever to confront the agricultural industry of Canada and seeking to arrive at the facts surrounding the outbreak of that disease should have been accused of wasting time.

The second way in which the privileges of this house and of the members of parliament are involved is that this statement, outrageous wherever it might come from, comes from a civil servant, an official of the department under investigation in that committee.

In view of the seriousness with which this matter is viewed by the agricultural industry throughout Canada and the necessity of the fullest possible investigation by this house, I feel that that statement should be withdrawn, that the minister himself should require from the official who made it a withdrawal, and should further make it perfectly clear that the statement made does not reflect the official attitude of the government or of the minister. Unless the minister takes that course, the only conclusion we can come to is that the minister himself and, through him, the government condone this affront to the position of parliament and to the urgency of the inquiry.

Mr. Pouliot: Did you remove the mote from your eye?

Mr. Fulton: That is another of your empty-headed statements.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that my hon. friend did not give me any intimation that he was going to raise this question, as is the usual custom.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gardiner: But first on the matter of privilege, as the minister of the department I should like to suggest to him that there is not any reason for repeating what has been said quite often by members of the opposition, namely that the Department of Agriculture is under investigation. That is not the fact. As a matter of fact, we have had certain correspondence placed before the house and before the committee, we have had that correspondence referred to the committee on agriculture, and there has been some discussion on the question. In so far as Dr. Christie is concerned, he is to all intents and purposes no longer a civil servant. He was given superannuation leave as of the 1st day of April, so that he is now giving service—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gardiner: —he is now giving service to the people of the Dominion of Canada that is no longer required of him by employment.

Mr. Rowe: Giving it free?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, to all intents and purposes free. He is on the period of release that all civil servants have, as of the 1st day of April, and is drawing pay up to a certain date; but he is not required under any engagement to the people of this country to be there at all. He has been serving since the 1st day of April, and even before that, simply because of his long service in the department. Dr. Christie began his service in 1910, and has been constantly with the department from 1910 to the present. He is leaving on superannuation, or is already entitled to leave on superannuation, but is simply staying there helping with this job because of his long experience in it.

Now, someone asked him a question in the committee and he answered. It was not a government representative who asked it. He answered that question as to what he himself believed was the attitude of the people in Saskatchewan, and the opinion that he expressed was his own. I have not any reason for saying it was wrong. Judging from what I know, I think it was very correct. I do not know just what I would punish him for, if I had any way of punishing him, since he is no longer really a civil servant but doing this job for us in the manner in which he is. I do not know that there is any action which I can take in the matter. I thought the committee itself was satisfied yesterday that they had heard the best evidence from Dr. Christie that they have heard from anyone who has appeared before them. He did not come as a result of our suggestion that he should be there; it was suggested by the opposition members of the committee that Dr. Christie ought to be called.

I knew he was on superannuation leave now, and was not insistent on his doing anything in any particular, but Dr. Christie came on call and he gave his evidence, and I do not think it comes in very good form from those who insisted on his being there now to be exhibiting so much opposition to the man whom they wanted to hear, simply because he did not say what they thought he was going to say or what they thought he ought to say. He told his story, and told it in a straightforward way; he answered all questions asked him, and as a matter of fact I think everyone was pretty well satisfied then with the answer that my hon. friend has referred to.

Mr. Fulton: The Minister of Agriculture has indicated that—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fulton: I am pursuing the question of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I cannot allow a debate on this question of privilege. The hon. member for Kamloops rose and said that he wished to put forward a question of privilege, and he stated his question of privilege. He asked that the minister give a reply. That reply has been given by the minister. The minister answered the points which could be replied to in the House of Commons. It seems to me that with respect to a matter arising from a statement which has been made by a witness in a standing committee, the proper procedure is to discuss the matter in that committee. The hon. member has said that he is not a member of that committee; but, as he knows, he has the right to be heard there if he makes the request, and I am sure the chairman will advise him of the meeting to attend when it is called, and he can discuss fully the matter of privilege there.

Mr. Cruickshank: I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order with reference to this matter of privilege, may I direct your attention to citation 198 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, which reads:

> Scandalous charges or imputations directed against members of a select committee are equivalent to libellous charges brought against the house itself.

It is under that citation that I am raising this matter, and in my view the question of privilege put forward is still before the house and has not been dealt with in any way. Indeed, it has been aggravated by the answer of the minister, because he stated that he supported the stand of Dr. Christie.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I listened very carefully to the point of privilege as stated by the hon. member, and as I was listening to him I was examining as to whether or not it was a matter which could be raised here. In accordance with this citation he did make his point so that a reply in this house was forthcoming from the minister responsible for the department, the Department of Agriculture, in this instance. The minister has replied. What the hon. member has asked for is a reprimand to be addressed by the minister to the civil servant, and secondly for the minister to disagree, or declare it was not the policy of his department that was stated in the reply given to the committee by the witness referred to.

The minister has replied to these two points; therefore the hon. member should be satisfied with the reply given. He may not like the reply given by the minister; he may not agree with it; but I think the matter has been disposed of.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

CONSTRUCTION OF AIRFIELDS IN FRANCE

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I would like to announce that negotiations between the French and Canadian governments concerning the construction and the use of airfields in France by units of the Royal Canadian Air Force have recently been concluded. As a result of these negotiations, which have been carried out within the framework of the North Atlantic treaty, an airfield has been placed at the disposal of the Royal Canadian Air Force in the region of Metz. Construction of additional facilities is proceeding and tactical squadrons of the Royal Canadian Air Force will, I expect, occupy this airfield next fall. These squadrons will form part of the North Atlantic tactical air forces of central Europe.

Mr. Pearkes: Will the construction of that airport be carried out by the French government, or will the government of Canada deal directly with the contractors in France?

Mr. Claxton: It will be carried out for us by the French government, which will deal with the French contractors engaged.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE—APPEARANCE OF DR. CHRISTIE BEFORE PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture. Did the minister agree to Dr. Christie's returning to Regina without the knowledge or approval of the committee, and before the members of the committee had had the opportunity to conclude their questioning of him?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): That is not a matter which would be referred to me, under any circumstance. I am not sure that Dr. Christie has gone back to Regina yet.

Mr. Argue: Well then, I have this supplementary question: Will the minister agree to have Dr. Christie appear again before the committee so that members may complete their questioning?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, the committee was adjourned at the call of the Chair, and the question as to when the committee can be called together again will no doubt be considered from time to time. But I would just state that if the committee is going to sit it would be necessary to have many other officials there, besides Dr. Christie, in order to carry on the activities of the committee. At present it is not possible to have these men here, before the committee, and at the same time carrying on activities in connection with fighting the disease and also in connection with the marketing of farmers' products.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that we change the order I announced last night in connection with the consideration of Bill No. 193 respecting the New Westminster harbour commissioners. I am told that a delegation from New Westminster, British Columbia, were present in Ottawa within the last few days. This bill is being referred to a committee and, if there are no objections, we will proceed with it first.

BEEF

MARKETING OF CATTLE WITHIN BUFFER ZONE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Before the orders of the day are called I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture arising out of the statement he made yesterday in the house regarding the sale and purchase of cattle in Saskatchewan. What is the method he has in mind for the marketing of cattle within the buffer zone as compared with those within the quarantined area? I am referring particularly to heavy livestock. The minister will have received representations in the matter, and I am asking him this question because a number of municipalities wish to know what the plan is so far as heavier livestock the packing companies will not take is concerned.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): There is no change in the plan as a result of anything I said yesterday or as a result of any new set-up being established in Saskatchewan. There is no change whatsoever in the plan so far as the buffer zone and quarantined zone are concerned. Those are set up in connection with the fighting of the disease, and no changes are being made with respect to them whatsoever.

My information is that the meat within that area is all required within the area. As a matter of fact suggestions have been made that we may have to bring in more from outside in order to keep them fully supplied. But it is true that within the area, as outside the area, it is a little difficult to find people who wish to have the heavy animals. Heavy animals have been developed for the United States trade and there is some difficulty in finding a market for them in this country.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the minister would allow a supplementary question because of the interest in the area in the plan which was announced yesterday I should like to ask one. The minister states that there is no change as far as the buffer area is concerned. What is the position of the farmer there with heavy animals weighing 1,100 or 1,200 pounds with the packing companies wanting to take only animals weighing 800 pounds? What is his position with regard to marketing or disposing of those cattle within that area? What is the government doing to protect farmers from having to take too low prices for these heavier cattle?

Mr. Gardiner: There is only one packing house to which they can take them, the one in Moose Jaw. When they apply to that packing house for the admission of heavy cattle the tendency is for them to say that they prefer not to take them. So far as I know they have eventually taken the cattle but sometimes at a price which the individual thinks is lower than he ought to receive. I think that that has been adjusted in most instances. If it has not and the individual will write in about it we will take his case up at the plant.

TELECOMMUNICATION

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO INSTALLATION OF RADIOTELEPHONE SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to direct to the Minister of Transport a question of which I have given notice. Has he any further information to give regarding the proposed installation of radiotelephone services at Colinet island, Newfoundland?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): None.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I ask when we may expect some information, because this was promised by the end of April. I have been trying to find out when it is going to be done as the people are anxious to know.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think it was promised before the end of April. It was hoped that by the end of April we would have the materials necessary to build the line in the area. I do not know that there has been any change in that position. I am unable to add anything to the statement made by the parliamentary assistant on April 3.

STRAIT OF CANSO CAUSEWAY

INQUIRY AS TO TENDERS FOR CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. Black (Cumberland): Is the Minister of Transport in a position to make a statement with regard to tenders received for the construction of the Canso causeway?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): No, I am not, except to say that a number of tenders were opened yesterday but have not yet been tabulated. It may be some time before I will be able to make an announcement, although perhaps I might be able to make it tomorrow or the next day.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

FLOOR PRICES—INQUIRY AS TO PUBLICITY GIVEN TO PAYMENT OF REFUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture what publicity has been given by the department to the statement made yesterday by the minister that refunds may be secured by farmers who have not received a fair price for products which they have sold and which are covered by floor prices now in effect.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The story would be a rather long one. An hon. member who spoke yesterday after I did gave the details of one case where he said, I believe, that some $15,000 odd had been added to the payments previously made. One could go right across the country and find similar stories being told, but I would not like it to be said that we are giving publicity to them. We are simply dealing with the cases as they come up.

CHEESE

QUESTION AS TO PRICE ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. Tustin (Prince Edward-Lennox): Yesterday the Minister of Agriculture intimated that the government would consider whether a floor price under cheese would be put into effect. Is the minister in a position to make a statement now?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I probably should have said at an earlier time that the situation has changed since the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Major) asked a question yesterday and I intimated that I had had no word from the cheese board in Ontario. Yesterday afternoon I received a telegram from the cheese board in Ontario saying that they were prepared to consider carrying on under our act of 1939. We expect to meet them tomorrow to discuss the matter and attempt to enter into an arrangement with them.

EXCISE TAX ACT

INQUIRY AS TO REBATE OF TAX ON AUTOMOBILES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) or his parliamentary assistant if the government has reached any decision concerning the possibility of tax rebates to automobile dealers and distributors with heavy inventories of new automobiles on which—

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Order paper.

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mr. Dinsdale: —on which taxes were paid before the recent reduction in excise tax was announced?

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Refunds are a matter of administration which would come under the Department of National Revenue. Perhaps the minister might answer that question.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): The answer is that no rebates will be made.

HARBOUR COMMISSIONS

NEW WESTMINSTER—EXTENSION OF BOUNDARIES AND PROVISION FOR LOAN

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 193, respecting the New Westminster harbour commissioners.

He said: Mr. Speaker, when the resolution was being considered I made a short statement which perhaps I might amplify by saying that the bill can be divided into two parts. The first part has to do with the extension of the boundaries of the New Westminster harbour to a point northeasterly as far as Grants narrows and to a point eastward as far as New Langley. The second part of the bill has to do with the approval of a loan in the amount of $1,250,000 by the governor in council for the purpose of allowing the harbour commissioners of New Westminster to build additional dockage facilities.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

I stated on the resolution the number of berths now in existence, but both the harbour commissioners and the city of New Westminster are of the view that additional facilities are required. The harbour commissioners have already obtained two loans from the federal government, one in the amount of $700,000 as authorized by chapter 10 of the statutes of 1948 and the other in the amount of $274,000 roughly as authorized by chapter 40 of the statutes of 1931.

I have nothing more to add at this stage. After the debate is completed it is my intention to move that the bill be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines for further study by that committee.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, there is very little that I can add on behalf of the official opposition to what I said on the resolution stage. We approve of the measure and we are glad that it is to be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. I should like to point out to the house that this harbour commission has an excellent reputation for keeping up the interest payments on the loans which have been made. I believe it has never defaulted on these payments and I can see no possibility of there being any default if the loan as set out in this bill is granted. We believe that the council of the city of New Westminster and the New Westminster harbour commissioners are very wise in looking ahead and planning this additional dockage. It is my understanding that a bylaw will be referred to the citizens of that city to approve of the transfer of the water lots upon which the dockage is to be built. The whole project seems to be in line with the progressive and enterprising spirit that the citizens of the city of New Westminster have demonstrated for so many decades. We are very happy to support the bill.

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I think I should say something on behalf of the people of the constituency of Burnaby-Richmond. Part of the new territory that is being taken over by the New Westminster harbour commission is in my riding. In correspondence with my people they have emphasized the fact that the New Westminster harbour commission is consistently bringing forward new business ideas. I thought the minister would like to know that the people of my riding support the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

EXTENSION OF APPLICATION TO YEARS 1952 AND 1953

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Prudham that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to extend the application of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to the years 1952 and 1953 and to clarify the provisions of subsection five of section three so as to provide for the assistance intended when this subsection was enacted in 1951.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, the principle at stake in this legislation is a simple one. Should we in this house ask that the gold mining industry be bonused? A number of members have expressed the opinion that it is of doubtful value to dig gold from one hole in northern Canada and put it in another at Fort Knox or in some private hoard elsewhere. That is a justifiable doubt. I can sympathize with those members who feel that way because today the average citizen does not use gold and does not see gold.

Mr. Gibson: He does not have any.

Mr. Adamson: He does not have any.

Mr. Weir: He cannot eat it.

Mr. Adamson: Therefore they may question what good the entire industry is doing for the economy of Canada. The details of the legislation can be discussed in committee. At the present time I merely wish to deal with the principle of the measure. I think the first question we must ask is whether gold is of any value to the Canadian economy. I wish to give three reasons in support of the contention that it is. In the first place many northern municipalities are entirely dependent on the gold industry. There is a belt running from the town or city of Timmins for three or four hundred miles right through to Val d'Or which is entirely dependent upon the gold industry for its existence. If the gold industry ceases to exist each of these municipalities will become a ghost town because, with the exception of the base metal industry at Rouyn-Noranda, there is no other industry that would keep these towns in existence.

Therefore we have to make a decision whether these municipalities, towns and settlements are to be preserved or whether we should ruthlessly allow them to disappear and become ghost towns. From every point of view I think that would be an unthinkable action for parliament to take. The second point about gold is that it is the colonizing metal which has been instrumental in pushing the farm frontier northward. The great clay belt of northern Ontario and the great colonizing efforts of the government of Quebec are dependent upon the mining industry for the disposal of farm produce. These northern farms operate under climatic conditions somewhat more severe than their competitors in the south. They are much farther from the markets of the south. Therefore in order to exist at all there must be a market for their farm produce close at hand. The employment of men in the gold mining industry provides a market for the farmers' produce.

There is another point about gold mining and colonization. Gold has been the magnet that has developed a great part of this continent. It was the gold rush of 1849 that brought about the development of California and opened up the Pacific coast. It was the discovery of gold in the Yukon that opened the great Northwest Territories and the Yukon. It was the discovery of gold in New South Wales, Australia, that resulted in the development of the great agricultural industry of that part of that continent. The gold mines in that district of Australia have long ceased to exist but it was the magnet of gold which brought people into the area where they subsequently established a stabilized farm economy.

In reality it was gold in the Elizabethan era that prompted the Spaniards to develop the Spanish Main, and the English, under Drake, to explore that part of this continent. Gold was the magnet that brought the adventurer. Gold is still the magnet which will bring adventurers.

The third point is that in Canada gold has brought about the development of many other metals. Gold was really responsible for the development of the Eldorado uranium mine. Eldorado was originally a gold company. When their original deposits proved to be non-commercial in value La Bine and the others in that company continued their prospecting and discovered the uranium at Great Bear lake. Much more recently it was gold that brought the original prospectors to Lynn Lake, which I think it is fair to say may prove to be one of the great nickel producing areas of the world. So, Mr. Speaker, we have gold maintaining our northern municipalities. We have gold responsible for pushing back our northern frontier, and we have gold, the metal of discovery, bringing other metals into production. On those three counts I say gold is of supreme value to this country.

Let us look at it as a matter of dollars and cents, from the point of view of our mineral production last year. I include both ferrous and non-ferrous metals, oil and other minerals. Our total mineral production approached $1,200 million, a staggering production for a country with such a small population. Not only did this form a very large part of our gross national product; it provided the sinews for our manufacturing industry, making possible many of our primary and secondary industries. With the raw materials right at hand our manufacturers have an advantage over those in countries which have to import raw materials. So taken as a whole our mineral industry is probably the most important industry in this dominion. Now let us look at the figures for last year, which I obtained from the dominion bureau of statistics. I must say they rather surprised me. The production of our twelve leading minerals was valued as follows:

Gold	$159,407,000
Nickel	150,600,000
Copper	149,300,000
Aluminum (ingots)	133,000,000
Zinc	132,900,000
Petroleum	121,400,000
Coal	110,000,000
Asbestos	78,800,000
Lead	56,100,000
Sand and gravel	42,900,000
Cement	40,200,000
Iron ore	26,675,000

It is interesting to note that our petroleum industry, of which we hear so much, ranks considerably below many metals, particularly gold. On these figures, showing gold to be the most valuable mineral produced in Canada, can we afford to jeopardize this industry? In my opinion, it is obvious that we cannot.

As the minister correctly stated, the gold mining industry finds itself in a very serious situation because of the fixed price. I shall deal with that later; at present I wish to deal with the routine of selling on what is known as the premium market. That market cannot by any stretch of the imagination be called a free market; it is a premium market. This is the routine. The mine produces the bullion and sends it to the mint, where it is refined into pure gold of a fineness of at least ·995 plus. As a matter of fact pure gold from the Royal Canadian Mint is ·9999 fine, or one part in ten thousand impure; and the mint deserves a great deal of commendation on the efficiency with which it produces pure gold. Then this pure gold is sent to a commercial refinery, where it is adulterated down to 22 carats or ·9166 fine. This 22 carat gold is sold f.o.b. Malton to a broker, but of course only the pure gold content of the bar is paid for. The gold is then sent to Europe, generally to France, in 22 carat form. There it is resold for export as 22 carat or industrial gold. The 22 carat bar is exported to a nation which is not a member of the international monetary fund, where it is then re-refined into pure gold. That pure gold is then re-introduced into France by clandestine means. In Paris it is sold for United States dollars or other hard currency. The gold is then shipped to private hoards, where it is lost to the monetary authorities of the free world. Other countries than France carry on this trade, of course, but that is the general procedure in the marketing of gold on the premium market.

Does this fantastic procedure make sense? To start with, the gold is lost to Canada. Second, the cost of this strange manoeuvre is in the neighbourhood of $3 an ounce. Third, the bullion is finally lost to international trade; it goes into hoards and can be used by individuals and countries whose interests may be inimical to those of the democracies. This procedure defeats every intention of and is contrary to every principle enunciated by the international monetary fund; yet this procedure is forced upon us by the rules of the fund. Therefore the whole question of our continued membership in the fund must be considered.

I wish to mention very briefly that in fact there is no such thing as industrial gold. There is some use for gold architecturally, as gold leaf, but it is very small. Gold jewelry is frequently used for monetary purposes, particularly in the east. As far as the dental trade is concerned gold has many superior substitutes. In fact, "industrial gold" is in reality a misnomer, although there is a little bit so used. Gold is a monetary metal. It has practically no other use. In my remarks I shall consider it purely as a monetary metal.

We now come to the actual plight of the gold mining industry, and I wish to put on the record this year's statements of many of the presidents, mine managers and directors of our straight gold mines. I first want to start with the statement of Mr. Emery, vice-president and managing director of Kirkland Lake Gold Mining Company Limited. He says:

> The proven ore reserves in the mine at the end of 1951 amount to 333,000 tons having a gross value of $5,268,990, calculated at $35 per ounce. An appreciable tonnage that had been carried as ore reserves was eliminated again this year as, under the present price of gold and increased cost of production, it could not now be classed as reserves.

Mr. Thomson, president of the Malartic Gold Fields Limited, says:

> The total of developed and indicated ore reserves was lower than at the end of 1949. This situation arose because of the lower price obtained for gold and because estimated lower costs were not realized and therefore substantial quantities of ore, previously included in the reserves, had to be eliminated.

Mr. Jules R. Timmins, president of Hollinger Consolidated Gold Mines Limited, says:

Due to the reduction in the amount received per ounce of gold, the value of the gold recovered decreased 30 cents, labour costs increased 53 cents and the cost of supplies increased 19 cents per ton milled in 1951. Accordingly, the margin of profit in 1951 as compared to 1950 was reduced $1.02 per ton milled, which indicates serious difficulties for the years ahead.

I mention that particularly because the average grade in Porcupine, in the years past, has been about $8, $9 or $10 a ton. If you take $1.02 from the value per ton last year, and almost an equal amount the year before, you will soon find that what you classed as ore has ceased to exist and becomes waste rock. Once that happens there is no solution in the maintenance and the continuance of the gold industry. It is dying.

The general manager of Dome Mines Limited says:

Ore reserves were maintained at substantially the same figure as last year. In this connection it should be pointed out that rising costs make it increasingly difficult to maintain the reserve position in that the unit cost of the work necessary to develop ore is advancing and additional material to be classed as ore must contain more gold than was formerly the case. Putting it another way much material which under former conditions would be classed as ore has become worthless waste rock.

One more statement is that of Mr. A. L. Blomfield, president of Lake Shore Mines, Limited. He says:

The picture of operating conditions in the industry has deteriorated even more rapidly than heretofore. The rise in the Canadian dollar in United States dollar values, since January, 1951, decreases the gross value of the gold by 5 per cent in Canadian money; its value to the mines in Canadian money is at a lower price than at any time since 1939, except for the fixed parity in 1947 and 1948. The operating cost handicap has risen in the past year by 14 per cent, a greater rise than in any previous year.

The taxes, another item that cannot be passed on to consumers, are now up to 35 per cent of the operating profit. This industry has no power of self-help, such as all other industries in a free enterprise country enjoys. The emergency gold mine assistance, the basis of which has been reduced since 1950 in the face of swiftly rising costs, taxes, etc., is still of course a help in preventing a complete shutdown. It preserves for a while the present community, while sacrificing its future. Under this system the mines now shutting down have approached final exhaustion and many will probably never open again. If these had shut down before this gutting operation, re-opening would be a normal procedure. Meanwhile, stockholders' dividends have been almost completely sacrificed.

The working force of your mine, including all sections, have loyally done their job and, while sincerely thanking them I very much regret it has been impossible to compete with the base metal mines and other industries, the price of whose produce has risen with or higher than the handicaps to operating. I hope the not-too-distant future will produce a brighter picture.

The last statement I shall read is that of Mr. Miller, president of Wright-Hargreaves Mines, Limited. He says:

In my report to shareholders just one year ago I stated the Canadian government had announced that, commencing immediately, they would allow the dollar to seek its own level in the free market and I implied that as a consequence the exchange or premium we were then receiving might be considerably reduced, resulting in less earnings to the company. This prediction has come true in part, to the extent that we lost more than 4 per cent in exchange benefits the past year which, together with continued increasing costs of taxes, labour and supplies generally, and lower tonnage milled due to labour shortage, has reduced our earnings somewhat for this current year. A re-reading of the annual report of October, 1950, would be interesting by comparison.

What does this gutting of the mine mean, Mr. Speaker? It used to be called high grading. It means this. As costs increase with a fixed price, more and more of what was once ore—a great asset, a tangible national asset—becomes waste rock. For instance, if this chamber were an ore body and if the section between the desks were high grade and the section on the outside were lower grade, as the costs went up, more and more of the section outside of the centre aisle would become waste rock and worthless; and as costs went up, as they are doing, the centre section itself would shrink until it became about the size of the desks occupied by the Hansard reporters. That shows the sort of shrinkage in ore that is going on today in our straight gold mines. I say without any fear of contradiction that if the present trend of increasing costs continues, with a still fixed price, despite the legislation we are discussing today we shall find that in five years' time there will not be one straight gold mine producing profitably, and possibly not one producing at all in Canada.

That is how serious the situation is. Now, what are the alternatives to this policy? What are the alternatives to bonusing the industry to keep it temporarily alive? There are, I think, just two. First, raising the internal price by unilateral action, or the establishment of an unrestricted free market in Canada. Both are contrary to the rules of the international monetary fund. I would be opposed to Canada, or for that matter any government, raising the price of gold by decree; although this may happen, it is wrong in principle. Gold must stand as the arbiter of value, not because of any action by a government or treasury, but because of its free acceptance by men as such arbiter, its value being determined solely by the open market economy known as the law of supply and demand. I wish to quote in this connection an authority who is a deputy governor of the international monetary fund, Dr. J. K. Holloway. He has this to say on that point:

> It is perfectly true that, until the price of gold in a free market becomes reasonably stable, a government cannot restore convertibility. Convertibility assumes a definite figure at which the unit of money of account can be converted into gold. That figure cannot be fixed until the price of gold has been determined by the arbitrament of a free market, the only agency that can now determine it. There would, therefore, be an interval during which dealings in gold would be free but the right of the citizen to demand gold for paper could not yet be exercised. But no government, intent on monetary reform, would render itself more vulnerable to a demand for gold at such times as the right to demand it is restored, by inflating its currency during this interval.

Now I come to the question of the value of the free market in bullion form in Canada, which I have advocated for a number of years in this house. The question of whether it would assist the mines is not as important as whether it would assist international trade. The four proposals put forward by the Ontario mining association should, I submit, have received more consideration by the government, and I sincerely believe that their adoption would be helpful to the country as a whole. They were as follows. One, spot delivery from stock of 22 carat gold. That means that the mines would be allowed to store 22 carat gold for sale on spot delivery, immediate sale, whenever the demand, or whenever the sale could be put through. The form "spot delivery" is a technical one. Two, to sell fine instead of debased gold. Three, allowing Canadian gold in Canada to be held for foreign account. And, four, the repeal of section 28 (2) of the Bank of Canada Act. The first was granted and the others were refused. I believe that the opinion of the Ontario mining association and the gold mines in question should have been given more consideration. However, the government, through the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), turned the proposal down, and I think a retrograde step was taken.

The question of a free market, however, involves two considerations. First, would it bring about an established price for gold in terms of our currency; and second, would it bring about a degree of international free currency exchange in Canada? The only way to arrive at a price for gold is by the operation of the law of supply and demand; but certain conditions must exist. The gold must be freely and openly purchased and sold. It must have no restrictions on it with regard to export and import, and it must be allowed to be stored within Canada.

One of the reasons today that gold is selling for only between $38 and $40 on the free market is that it must be held by its owners in countries whose political stability is certainly questionable. I ask any hon. member whether he would be happy in holding gold in such places as Tangier, or for that matter, in Paris, even though it were held in a Canadian bank. I have been informed that there are a number of Europeans who have deposited their securities in the North American continent for this very reason. Therefore the security of the bullion is a paramount matter to the holder, and were we to allow private individuals or corporations to hold gold in Canada, or in Canadian banks, I am convinced the procedure would be very attractive, and in consequence the price would unquestionably advance.

The other point concerning currency is, however, more important. It is here, I believe, that the establishment of a free gold market in Canada would be of greatest use. The owners of soft currencies today are prohibited from using them outside the boundaries of their own countries, except under government control or for certain rigidly prescribed purposes. No one, however, has ever thought of restricting anyone from purchasing anything and paying for it in gold. If therefore the owners of the soft currencies were provided with the machinery by which they could exchange these currencies, through the medium of our gold market, into gold they would have a much more useful counter, no matter what it was called. There would have to be of course a buyer for the soft currencies, but the productivity of the sterling area in itself indicates a market for those currencies for those who wish to buy in that area.

I do not say or claim that this would overcome the embargoes, or the currency restrictions, but I believe it would be a step along that path, which although small and possibly halting to begin with, would lead to further lifting of restrictions. There is no simple way out of the impasse, Mr. Speaker. The steps will be halting; progress will be slow; but, as I hope to show in a minute, the way to begin is to begin.

We in Canada are in a peculiarly advantageous position in the matter. Establishment of a free market would also make Canada one of the great international banking centres of the world. We are today the world's greatest traders on a per capita basis. Our chartered banking system is international in scope. It has been nurtured on world trade. Let us give it the opportunity of making Canada one of the world centres of banking and exchange. Some of the functions carried on so profitably by British banks and insurance companies in the nineteenth century and in the first quarter of the twentieth should be assumed by us. We must not submit to domination in this matter from New York.

Coming to the international monetary fund, the bona fides of this fund is open to question. Its two principal architects were Lord Keynes and William Dexter White, both now dead. Keynes' proposal for a world currency or a bill of exchange, which he called the bancor, had much to recommend it, in that it was apparently designed to prevent the world being divided into currency blocs operating within geographical and economic barriers within which trade was reasonably free, but between which trade was made almost impossible by currency restrictions and exchange controls, and embargoes of one kind and another.

The White plan, as it was called, was adopted, with the result that we now have currency controls, embargoes and restrictions on an almost world-wide basis designed, not to sponsor and expedite trade, but to restrict it. Recent severe restrictions imposed upon various members of the sterling bloc against the dollar countries are most destructive to world trade. Surely it need not be restated in this House of Commons, nor in fact by any Canadian, that without world trade there can be no lasting prosperity.

The White or American plan has resulted in making a currency exchange almost impossible. Nowhere outside the North American continent is there any degree of really free exchange; and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that on that evidence alone we must consider that the international monetary fund has not served its primary reason for existence, which was the freeing of exchange.

We know from recent evidence submitted to a grand jury in New York, and by the revelations of Whittaker Chambers that Dexter White was at least a fellow traveller, if not an outright communist. I do not suggest that the international monetary fund is in any way a communist front. To do so would be, of course, improper. However, the one thing the fund was set up to do was to free currencies, to re-establish convertibility and, by so doing, promote international trade. The sad fact is that by its very regulations the fund has been a deterrent to convertibility and at least in part an instrument of promotion for currency blocs whose very existence destroys that international trade which the world must have.

Therefore I think we can regard the operations of this body, if not with suspicion at least without hope. The reports received after the Torquay conference on tariffs and trade and the high hopes held by the delegates have proved to be a delusion and a chimera, simply because of the breakdown of the machinery of currency and exchange.

As a member of the banking and commerce committee who was privileged to hear the glowing reports of our delegates at Torquay, I can only regard with despair the recent action of the United Kingdom, Australia and others in putting even tighter and more drastic controls on their exchange and trade. Until we can make world trade more free we will not encourage it. Unless we encourage it we will not have international prosperity. Unless we have international prosperity we cannot exert our maximum effort toward the defeat of communism. I mention this matter of trade because it is overlooked in the development of what used to be known as the have-not countries, and what are now known as the undeveloped or underprivileged countries.

Mr. Speaker, trade can do more for the well-being of the people than any amount of gifts, any amount of handouts, any amount of subsidies or any amount of well-wishing that any rich country may do. It is on trade that the well-being of a people exists; and the greatest thing that we in the free world can do is to do everything possible to promote that trade.

In my opinion the establishment of a free market, so that gold could once again be used in part as the lubricant for international trade, would do more for the well-being of the world than all the pious resolutions passed by all the conferences, national or international, anywhere in the world.

That the international monetary fund has failed must be apparent to all. We must therefore take steps to make it an instrument of trade promotion, or else we must withdraw from it and the restrictions imposed upon us by membership. I would still hope that it could be made into a useful organization; but there are certain clauses in its regulations which will have to be amended before it can become so.

One of these clauses is that concerning monetary gold. Less than 15 per cent of last year's newly mined gold went into the hands of the monetary authorities of the free world. The figure is approximately $130 million out of a production of some $850 million. The remainder went by devious means, of which our own regulations form a part, into hoards where they can be, and I suggest are, used to foster international unrest. Certainly they are out of circulation, so far as being an effective lubricant to international trade is concerned. This in itself is a severe reflection on the fund's policy. As a matter of fact, the hoard at Fort Knox, by the very restrictions placed by the United States government upon the holding of gold by its citizens, can also be considered as sterilized or hoarded gold, not fulfilling its function in international trade. With all due respect I consider that that policy is detrimental to the world.

The scarcity of gold in international trade is not only having the restrictive effect which I have indicated, but has encouraged private barter deals and uneconomic trading at prices which have little relationship to the open market or the free economy price of the goods so traded. This further compartmentalizes trade and makes transactions more unrealistic. For example an English manufacturer who is able to get a great deal more in pounds for his produce in a sterling area country than if he sold it in the comparatively competitive economy of North America would, of course, infinitely sooner sell the goods to that sterling country, because he is allowed by the law of the United Kingdom to receive payment in sterling only. This has a bad effect on the morale of the British manufacturer and destroys his efficiency.

I do not wish to be considered critical of any other administration but as long as any country, whether it be the United Kingdom, France or even a South American republic with a favourable balance of payments, resorts to currency restrictions, quotas, embargoes, rationing or any of the other devilish devices of scarcity, there will be no prosperity in that country. No matter what glowing predictions are made in the United Kingdom there will be economic crisis after economic crisis unless and until she gives up this unrealistic and economically unsound principle.

I come now to the question of inflation and the use of gold as a deterrent to inflation. World money supply expressed in terms of United States dollars has increased from $60 billion in 1940 to $170 billion in 1950. The relationship of currencies other than North American to the United States dollar shows this increase in the money supply for non-North American countries to be far more severe. The money supply in terms of francs or pesetas, for instance, shows a far greater numerical increase. Whether the increase in the money supply is the whole cause of inflation is certainly questionable. However, it is significant that the ratio of money supply to physical production of goods bears a close relationship to price.

For instance, in Canada the cost of living, the wholesale price index and many commodity price indices have about doubled during the war decade and the money supply has increased by approximately three times, or from $1,370 billion in 1939 to $4,730 billion in February, 1952, for active deposits, or from $6,193 to $17,938 for the total of both active and inactive deposits. The physical volume of production or the gross national product has of course increased enormously since 1939, but in terms of goods it has not gone up as fast as the increase in the money supply.

Take carloadings, for example. There is now twice as much money in existence for every car loaded as there was in 1939. The cost of the goods loaded into the car has for all practical purposes also doubled. I shall not deal with the subject in any great detail as economists are not in entire agreement as to the actual relationship between the increase in the money supply and inflation. I think they are generally agreed that it is one of the major contributing factors and I suggest that the rough figures which I have given are significant.

The function of the gold standard is not to restrict economic expansion but to restrict monetary expansion not represented by physical growth in production. The return to the gold standard is the only measure which, by making currency both a medium of exchange and a store of actual value, will prevent inflation by a constantly decreasing power to purchase by the national unit of currency. This is a step which cannot be taken immediately or perhaps even in the near future. The danger of action by governmental restrictions is that they create deflation rather than disinflation. Credit restrictions produce the former condition, as recent results of the present government's policy have shown.

I have spoken on the question of inflation and the gold standard before. The gold standard is desirable, but we cannot arrive at a gold standard until we determine the price at which gold can be traded in terms of our own currency. That should not be done by government decree. Pegging the price, rigging the price of any commodity is dangerous, and doing it with regard to gold is probably the most dangerous of all.

There must be a period of time when gold can find its own level. What that price will be, I suggest, no one knows. How long it will take to find that price is also a question which cannot be answered at this time. However, when that price has been arrived at gold will tend to stabilize itself, just as I predicted the Canadian dollar would stabilize itself when it was freed from restrictions; but it will probably take longer. When that happens we can return to a fixed exchange value for our currency. However, to do so now would drain what little gold reserves we have in this country. Certainly if the United States embarked on it it would drain the gold reserves at Fort Knox in a very short time.

Therefore there must be a period in which by free action a proper price can be evolved. Even though the monetary fund set the artificial price of gold at $50 or even more and still restricted trading in gold, I would be opposed to it as being an unsound move. One thing about the capitalist system is that capital, exchange and money can be free to come in and go out. I submit that one of the first and most important moves for us to take in Canada is to allow gold that freedom, to restore the right to hold and own gold.

In conclusion I want to make the following points:

1. This bill is a palliative, not a cure.

2. The gold industry is threatened with extinction.

3. Canada cannot afford to lose this industry.

4. The international monetary fund has proved to be a costly failure.

5. Its rules prevent a rise in the price of gold either artificially or by the operation of the free market.

6. Gold is not going into monetary funds but into private hoards under present regulations. This is dangerous.

7. Canadian gold should be used by Canadian individuals and corporations to assist them in international trade. The return to a gold standard must be preceded by the operation of a truly free market to establish a price for gold which can be maintained.

8. A gold-backed currency is the only sure cure for inflation. The return to a gold standard is desirable but is not an immediate prospect.

9. The free market is the only method of arriving at the true price for gold. Just as the free Canadian dollar has stabilized itself, so will gold if all restrictions are removed; but the period of stabilization may be considerably longer.

10. No agency can prevent price fluctuations. It has generally proved disastrous to try.

Finally, I believe that Canada stands on the threshold of becoming a great international banker in her own right. I believe that we must accept this challenge. I do not believe we can afford to accept the domination of New York on this continent; certainly we cannot stand political domination from Washington. I am convinced that despite our small size in population, despite our small production compared with that of the United States, because of our potential production, because of our great storehouse of wealth as yet undeveloped, we must accept the challenge of freeing our currency, as we have done, and be prepared to stand alone if necessary and fulfil the functions of an international banker. The twentieth century can really be ours if we have the courage and the vision.

Mr. Armand Dumas (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, we have before us for consideration a resolution preceding the introduction of a bill to extend the application of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to the years 1952 and 1953 and to clarify—I would have preferred it if the word used had been "amplify"—the provisions of subsection 5 of section 3 of the act. I do not wish to take any more time of the house than is necessary, but hon. members will understand that when such legislation is being introduced I would fail in my duty if I did not bring to the attention of hon. members the views of my constituents.

First I wish to say that the Canadian gold producers are facing a very difficult situation. The employees in the mines are in danger of losing the main if not the only source of their monthly payroll. Modern communities are liable to become ghost towns. Everyone concerned has serious cause to be worried regarding the ever-increasing difficulties which have to be met by the gold mines. At the same time I wish to say that all those concerned with the plight of the gold mines are also aware of the sympathetic consideration which the problems confronting the industry have received from the federal government in the past, and they gratefully acknowledge the steps taken by the government to continue its aid to the industry.

Mounting costs of production and a fixed price for the final product are the causes which have seriously hampered the operation of the gold mines of this country more and more since the early years of the second world war. In addition to the above, we now have the Canadian dollar at a premium, and I would say that this is another handicap to the gold mines. Figures published by the bureau of statistics show that the operating costs of Canadian gold mines have risen by 40 per cent between the year 1941, when the price of gold was $38.50 an ounce, and the year 1948 when the price of gold was $35 an ounce. In 1949, when the average price of gold was $36 an ounce, the cost of producing an ounce of gold exclusive of taxes was approximately $32.

Gold Mining

Figures compiled by the department of mines of the province of Quebec are even more convincing. They show that the operating cost of producers in that province during the year 1939 was $24.65 per ounce exclusive of taxes. The average price of gold for the same year was $36.67 an ounce. In 1949, again in the province of Quebec, the cost of producing an ounce of gold had jumped to $35.56, an increase of 44 per cent. However, the price of gold for the same year had remained practically the same as that of 1939, namely, $36.16 an ounce. For the first nine months of 1951, again in the province of Quebec, the cost of producing an ounce of gold has exceeded by 18 cents the average price paid by the mint during the same period. During the month of April, 1952, while the cost of producing an ounce of gold in the province of Quebec amounted to $37 the average mint price was $34.35.

Of course one serious feature that has added to the difficulties of the industry during the last few months has been the sharp decline in the price of gold. During 1941 the average mint price was $38.50 an ounce. During 1950 the average mint price was $38.04. But for the first nine months of 1951 the Canadian dollar was at a discount of 5 per cent in terms of the United States dollar, and from September to the end of the year at a discount at less than 2½ per cent, resulting in an average price for gold per ounce of $36.82. These figures can be verified in a publication of the bureau of statistics. With the Canadian dollar at a premium instead of a discount the average mint price for gold during April, 1952, was $34.35 an ounce. For the first week of May the price was $34.31. For the week ending May 10 the mint price was $34.40½. With these figures before them I am sure hon. members will realize the critical situation facing this industry on which so many people depend.

At this point I should like to say a few words on this matter of our money being at a premium. We may be inclined to be somewhat proud of the fact that our dollar, which was at a discount for so many years, is now at a premium as compared with United States currency. However, to my mind if the Canadian dollar remains at a premium for a long time it will result in more harm than good. Our dollar at a premium simply means that it will be more costly to those who live outside our country, south of the border for instance, when they wish to obtain Canadian dollars. It is bound to check the flow of capital from the United States; and putting the brake on United States capital coming to Canada will certainly retard the development of our natural resources. Our basic industries such as lumbering, mining, agriculture and fishing are bound to be seriously affected by the increased cost of Canadian money. Other industries, such as the tourist trade, are bound to be handicapped for the same reason.

The premium on the Canadian dollar has added to the numerous burdens already being carried by the gold mines of Canada, and I hope the government will see its way clear to try to correct this situation. Recent legislation permitting the sale of gold of industrial grade on premium markets has been warmly received by the industry. At the annual meeting of Noranda Mines the president, Mr. Murdoch, had this to say in regard to that legislation:

> Last October the government took a courageous step in permitting the mines to sell gold to domestic fabricators for use in Canada and for export to the free world markets. South Africa and Canada, in attempting to assist their respective gold mining industries have, in my opinion, taken constructive action which will ultimately benefit all the trading nations of the world in breaking away from the restrictive controls and currency regulations of the international monetary fund.

A little further in his report Mr. Murdoch also said that were it not for this feeling of confidence and the recognition by Ottawa of the serious position of the industry, he would recommend that Pamour be closed down in a jiffy. That mine, by the way, is in the Timmins district, and the full name of the company is Pamour Gold Mines Limited.

The general terms and conditions under which the sale of gold on the industrial market is made, though they met with approval and commendation by the industry, could be improved at no expense to the country, in order to give more revenue to the producers. For instance, the sale of fine gold rather than debased gold should be permitted. Such an amendment to the regulations would mean approximately 50 cents more an ounce to the producers. Other regulations relating to this legislation should also be amended.

The critical situation which confronted the gold mining industry in 1948 caused the government to enact the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. Since that legislation came into effect it has been of great assistance to the gold mines, to the miners and others working for these companies, and to all the communities depending on the gold mining industry. Those of us who are closely connected with and depend upon that industry for our livelihood were very pleased with the enactment of that legislation. We have also appreciated the amendments that have been made, and we are grateful to the government for the past and present extensions of the act. I would like also to record my warm appreciation of the opportunity granted on many occasions by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and members of the cabinet to the Canadian Metal Mining Association and other delegations to come to Ottawa and lay before the government problems of great concern to the industry.

The gold producers have always been aware of the willingness of the government to co-operate, and to this end they themselves have done everything possible to increase the efficiency of their operations in order to keep down costs. Extraordinary efforts have been made to stem the rising tide. Every practicable method has been adopted to improve efficiency. Obviously there is a limit to such process, and I want to point out the need to stabilize the position and if at all possible improve the prospects of the industry. For the gold mines the crux of the problem is the price of gold. If today the gold mining people are greatly concerned over the present situation, they are not at all pessimistic. Far from it; they feel that eventually the price of gold will have to be adjusted, and they think the day is not far distant when the important trading nations of the world will return to the gold standard. It is fully appreciated that this is a highly complex problem concerning which the Canadian government is not in a position to take entirely independent action.

We must not forget that the gold mining industry has been and will continue to be of vital importance to this country. It has produced the gold required for monetary backing and for the settlement of trade balances with other countries. It is the one thing above all others on which Canada depends for opening up new areas of settlement and potential resources. I repeat what I have said previously in this house. Gold mining is the stimulus which provides encouragement to the prospectors. Just a few days ago I saw an article in a weekly paper in Rouyn-Noranda. It is the Rouyn-Noranda Press of May 8, 1952. The article is entitled "Gold Still Glitters" and it reads in part as follows:

During a week-end visit to Toronto—

That was a visit by the editor of that newspaper.

—we were surprised at the number of people not connected in any way with mining that were interested in gold the moment we mentioned coming from Rouyn-Noranda.

It shows that in other parts of the nation the importance of gold mining is recognized by even the average citizen. But at the same time gold mines are having a hard time making ends meet.

Further on in the article we find this statement:

To many, gold still glitters as brightly as ever but the gold mining situation could be much brighter.

I agree with that statement. I also think that the gold mining situation could be much brighter.

Gold has always been the spearhead in the search for mineral wealth. It has led in the past, is leading now in spite of the many difficulties encountered—and will, if permitted to do so, lead again to the discovery of valuable deposits of base metal and strategic materials.

Last week there appeared in the Globe and Mail two articles which substantiate what I have just said. In the issue of May 7 we find an article which reads as follows:

Amos—There are high hopes in this busy northwestern Quebec community that the success at Barvue Mines will once more direct the attention of the mining industry to an area that was one of the first regions of the province to be prospected before more attractive developments 70 miles to the southwest at Noranda turned the tide of prospecting away.

Further on the article states:

Gold was the magnet which drew prospectors into the area in the early days and many times since. The Barvue mine, originally staked as part of a gold rush which found no gold became, instead, a big zinc operation.

In the article in the Globe and Mail of May 6, we read this:

A windfall of zinc and silver from a small tract of land staked as a gold prospect, combined with engineering ingenuity and $7 million in cash, is rapidly transforming a stretch of muddy, hungry-looking farm land lying 22 miles east of this town,—

That is Amos.

—into a bustling community of building construction and townsite planning.

Further on in the article we read this:

Contracts for the sale of the zinc are on a firm basis covering 175,000 tons of zinc concentrate at 17·5 cents a pound U.S. funds and American Zinc has an option on a further 175,000 tons of concentrate at the same price, with the addition of an escalator clause covering possible cost and wage increases.

Mr. Speaker, you can see that mining is certainly the broad foundation of Canada's internal structure. The service of mining in pushing back the frontier has given our country a pioneer quality, a spirit of independence, self-reliance and confidence.

Canadian mining is still capable of great expansion. To be convinced of this fact, we have only to look at the map and read of what is going on in the Yukon, the Northwest Territories, northern Ontario, northwestern and northeastern Quebec and the Labrador section of Newfoundland. The lead and zinc ore of Keno Hill; the uranium of Great Bear lake; the copper deposits of Victoria island; the nickel finds of Ferguson lake and Chesterfield inlet; the big nickel mine of Lynn Lake; the ever-expanding rich mining deposits of northern Ontario and northwestern Quebec; and the iron and titanium ores of northeastern Quebec and Newfoundland are convincing evidence that there lies a land of fabulous riches. We also realize immediately that the future of Canada lies as far north as man can travel.

I will conclude by saying this. Gold is and always will be the stimulus of encouragement in the search for new mineral wealth, and we should do everything possible to restore the gold mining industry to its former health and vigour. Having done this, we shall have made a major contribution to the economy of our country.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, we in this group on all previous occasions supported this act and the extensions of it, and we support this measure because we realize that when the price of gold was pegged at $35 under the Bretton Woods agreement of 1945, the cost of production was a great deal lower than it is now, and that the rise in costs have made it almost impossible for the gold mining industry to make a go of it. However, I hope the minister does not intend to include under this act at the present time those companies which chose to break away from the agreement. We think that all those who remained under the agreement and who are selling at the $35 should be given some sort of assistance. However, those who chose to go on the open market should, I believe, remain on it.

During the past four years that this act has been in force we have paid out something like $40 million—$10 million a year—towards subsidizing the gold mining industry. That is all very well. However, we must realize that this industry has engaged in it only something like 32,000 people. I regret that the minister who is sponsoring this bill did not show the same concern when the proposed final wheat payment was before the house a year ago. I want to make it perfectly clear that we are supporting this measure because the other countries will give us goods in exchange for our gold, and not because we believe in the principle of convertibility of currencies or convertibility of gold. As long as gold is the medium for international exchange, and as long as we have the gold production potential, I believe it should be helped. However, in times like this, when we are in the midst of an arms race or a huge defence program, I think these gold miners could possibly be better employed elsewhere in mining for some of the base metals that we need for our armament plans. In other words, Mr. Speaker, I think that in times like these we should discourage the production of useless goods and encourage the production of goods that we need so badly for our defence production. However, as we are members of the international monetary fund and are encouraging gold production, we shall continue to support this bill and any extensions made to it. I repeat that we support it for those who are adhering to the fixed price. However, we have always advocated convertibility of goods rather than of gold or of currencies, but we shall support this bill.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): When the gold mining assistance bill was before the house last I spoke at some length. This afternoon I want to make just a few brief observations on this resolution, which states:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to extend the application of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to the years 1952 and 1953 and to clarify the provisions of subsection five of section three so as to provide for the assistance intended when this subsection was enacted in 1951.

This group again accepts this resolution as a temporary expedient, as mentioned in the resolution, to meet a particular and we hope a temporary situation. We support the purpose expressed in the resolution because, since there are numbers of working people, communities and other services involved, we think the government is justified in doing something for them in those particularly difficult circumstances under which they are operating.

I might say that, before proceeding with my brief remarks, we in this group cannot agree with the suggestion made by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson), if I heard him correctly, that it would be to the advantage of the Canadian people and the economy of Canada generally if we were to return to the gold standard.

While this resolution will provide for the introduction of a mining bill which will continue the payment of subsidies to the gold mining industry, we do again want to stress the fact that we in this group believe that the workers in that industry should receive wages equal to those received by individuals working in other sections of the mining industry, and should work under conditions equal to those enjoyed by other workmen in the mining industries.

In the passage of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act the government has recognized the principle of subsidies, and it has in other respects subsidized other industries where they felt they were justified in using public funds to support an industry under difficult circumstances and to keep it going. We in this group, and all hon. members, realize, as the hon. member for Spadina

(Mr. Croll) said the other day, there is a housing shortage in this country, a housing crisis. I do urge that the government show the same concern for the Canadian people who need housing when that question comes before the house. We support this bill because there is a need. There is a greater need for houses in Canada, and we do hope that the government will recognize the principle of subsidies when it comes to deal with that urgent and important question.

Mr. E. T. Applewhaite (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, on my own behalf and on behalf of a large section of the area which I represent, I welcome the introduction of this resolution and the proposed extension of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. We welcome it not only for its own terms, but because we see in it the continued expression of the interest of the government of Canada in the problems of the mining industry, and particularly those of the gold mining industry.

A great deal has been said this afternoon which I do not intend to go over but which I think, particularly as it has originated on all sides of the house, indicates that the gold mining industry is a matter of major importance to the Dominion of Canada. The point that I wish to make to the minister and to the government this afternoon is that there is still truth in the old proverb that great oaks from little acorns grow, and great gold mines are developed always from little prospects.

Something has been said this afternoon about the danger of a major decline in the gold production of Canada. And, never mind what not too brilliant ideas the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) may have expressed on this subject some time ago, the production of gold in Canada is, under our present system, a matter of some concern.

Under the terms of the act which is being extended, Mr. Speaker, it will not be possible for the minister to extend assistance to properties whose production runs below 50 ounces a year. The small producer of gold is found more often in placer mining than in lode mining, but at the same time there are also properties which make from small production of gold low profits during their initial period, particularly if they are fortunate enough to find a little vein on the property which lends itself to high-grade ore. I realize that there might be some grave difficulties in administering the act if there were not to be a limit on how small the property must be that might be assisted.

I am not going to go into the question of whether or not 50 ounces is a proper level, but I am going to use this opportunity to urge the minister and the government in some way, either under this act, or in other ways, to be of assistance to the prospector who, after all, is the backbone of the mining industry and always will be. Without him, there would never be any Hollinger, any Dome, any McIntyre, any Premier, any Bralorne, any major mining producer of any description.

Mines—this is of course a platitude—are in their very nature a wasting asset. To maintain the mining industry you have to keep on bringing in new properties. This can only be done through the prospectors, and so, both in the interest of the country itself and in fairness to the little man, the little prospector, the little operator, I would ask the minister and the government to give some thought to these suggestions.

Mr. J. A. Simmons (Yukon-Mackenzie River): I should like to say just a few words in support of the resolution before us. As all hon. gentlemen are aware, the fixed price of gold and the mining costs of operations have placed the industry in a precarious position. The present fixed price is the big problem, and it is to be hoped that the government can set in motion some definite action which will result in a price commensurate with the cost of producing it, so that the operators can stabilize their position and look forward with some degree of confidence in planning future operations which are so necessary to the future of gold mining areas throughout the constituency I have the honour to represent.

It would be a great contribution to the national economy of Canada if something could be done to restore the gold mining industry to its former status and level. But the way it now stands the subject is bound up with international and economic intricacies. One concern, I believe, is that the Canadian government is not in a position to take independent action as a member of the international monetary fund.

We welcome the extension of the type of assistance given under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, but this can be considered only as a temporary expedient. Unless some permanent solution can be found, I am afraid the industry can only look forward to a steady decline. The operators throughout my constituency feel great concern and doubt the adequacy of the proposed measure to meet the needs of the industry.

Gold has been pegged at $35 an ounce in United States funds since 1934, and I believe it is the only commodity produced in Canada which still sells for the 1934 price. We would like to see it increased in price to the same extent as other commodities have increased since 1934.

The fixed price, coupled with rising costs, constitutes a threat to many producing gold mines, and to the employees and their dependents, as well as to the communities, especially in outlying areas where the mines provide sole support. This threat applies in practically every gold mining centre in Canada, and it is plain to see why the industry feels grave concern and doubts the adequacy of the assistance to be provided to meet the needs of the industry.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot stress too strongly the urgent need of stabilizing the position of the gold mines, so that operators can undertake with confidence the future planning which is so necessary to successful mining operations, and which will result in immediate contributions to the national economy of Canada.

Unless assurance of continuity of operation over a long-range period is forthcoming, I am afraid the industry will be confronted with an even more serious crisis threatening the continuation of these important operations which are so essential to the economy of Canada.

The situation is serious; and unless something is done to alleviate the uncertainty, so that the operators can look forward to the future with some degree of confidence and assurance—rather than gloom and despair—the gold mining industry will surely decline.

I feel confident that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) is sympathetic to the problem, and will do everything possible to remedy and assist the gold mining industry.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I think the house should welcome this opportunity of giving some consideration to the position of the gold mining industry. This is the first time this subject has been under discussion at the present session. Since it was last discussed a year ago two events of considerable importance have occurred: first, on September 28, 1951, when the international monetary fund took action in freeing members with respect to the marketing of so-called non-monetary gold, and then the decision taken by the Canadian government which issued on October 7, 1951, new regulations with respect to the marketing of that same commodity, the so-called non-monetary gold.

The position of the gold mining industry and what the gold mining industry has meant in the development of the economy of this country has, it seems to me—and I say this with respect—never been adequately recognized either by the government or by the House of Commons. Gold is still what it has been for a long time, the one universally accepted medium of international exchange. It is sought today by all nations of the world, Russia included; and for Canada it has still a place of very great importance in our total economy.

The fundamental problem faced by the gold mining industry in this country is the problem of rising costs on the one hand and a fixed price for their product on the other—a price that has remained fixed for eighteen years, without change, while costs have risen at an alarming rate. Here we have one commodity singled out by governmental action not only on a national but on an international scale as one on which the price should be fixed, while it has been the policy of the government not to countenance price control in respect of any other commodities.

Let me say at once with respect to the decision taken by the government last October, which issued in the order in council and regulations which appeared on October 7, that I think it was a commendable decision. It was a step in the right direction. I cannot say that it was more than a step in the right direction; but so far as it went it was a constructive improvement.

This bill arises to some extent out of a conflict of government policy, it seems to me. The bill itself, like its predecessors, is only a stopgap measure. It is the application of an artificial expedient to a situation which calls for a long-term and constructive solution. We are still faced with a hand-to-mouth treatment of a problem which is very deep-seated, and which calls for the application of the utmost intelligence both in the house and on the part of the government.

Undoubtedly, in the three years during which it has been in operation, this Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act has been the means of keeping alive certain producing mines on a hand-to-mouth basis. But the development work in the great Canadian northland has been virtually arrested. We saw a year ago when the amendments of 1951 were under discussion that the amount of aid provided by this measure had been reduced year by year, and that the number of mines which would qualify for assistance under the act was also being reduced.

The search for gold has been the forerunner of much of the development of the great northland of this country. The searchers for gold, in effect, in many great areas of this country, have been the pioneers. The search for gold has led in turn to the discovery and later to the production of base metals and to other economic developments.

The situation confronting the gold mining industry today is so serious that that trend has been reversed. Virtually no development work is going on in the search for gold. At the present time the development work is directed rather to the search for base metals. Perhaps in a measure not experienced by any other industry in Canada, this industry has been faced during what are regarded as good times with the full effects of a depression. This has arrested the development of an industry which in times past has meant much to the development of the economy of this country.

There are many who do not like to think back to the days of the depression, but it would be well for us all to recall that in those days there was one industry which was assured a market for its product and which contributed effectively and on a large scale to keeping the wheels of industry going. That was the gold mining industry. Who can say that the day may not come when we may be glad to look to the gold mining industry with an assured market for its product to help to carry the load of the economy of this country?

How has this depression in the industry affected those who look to it for livelihood? The fact is that the production of gold in this country, even under the present measure, declined last year as compared with the previous year. Canada is not producing quite as much gold as she did prior to 1950. The minister has not yet indicated the results in 1952 of the order in council of October 7. It will be interesting to know what results in respect to production can be traced to the decision taken on October 7 as reflected in the order in council issued on that day.

What have been the results of the order in council of October 7? Putting it broadly, the effect was to provide a market for so-called non-monetary gold or gold of 22 carats of fineness or less at a price which yields approximately $3 per ounce more than the price paid for gold marketed for monetary purposes through the Bank of Canada. We have not been furnished with figures as to the proportion of the gold production of Canada which is marketed under the order in council as compared with that marketed for monetary purposes through the Bank of Canada, but I have seen figures which indicate that approximately one-third of the gold production has been marketed under the terms of the order in council of October 7.

At the same time the gold mining industry has had to contend with another problem arising out of the fact that the Canadian dollar has been appreciating in terms of the United States dollar. A price of $35 per ounce in United States funds actually yields something less than $35 per ounce in Canadian funds. This has had a damaging effect upon the prosperity of the mines and those who depend upon the mines for a livelihood, whether through direct employment or through living in communities which owe their economic livelihood, yes, their economic survival to the prosperity of the gold mines.

Certain it is that there has been as yet no revival of development work. In examining these regulations and the order in council of October 7 one might say that there are serious shortcomings to be found. The regulations introduce a great deal of rigidity. The assistance afforded by opening up a market for so-called non-monetary gold was on the basis of a choice by the producer as to whether he would market his output under the terms of the order in council of October 7 or under the terms of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. That choice carried him along a year at a time.

I submit that much of the benefit that might have flowed from the opening up of a market for this so-called non-monetary gold of 22 carat fineness or less was lost by reason of that rigidity. In the seven months during which the new system has been in operation several shortcomings have developed. I do not need to repeat what was said this afternoon by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) in his able speech, but I do suggest that within the general scope of the type of regulation now in effect there is much room for improvement. In the first place the producer should be allowed to make his choice as between the two methods of marketing, not on an annual basis but on a quarterly basis so that he might see where his advantage lies on a shorter term basis than is presently possible.

In a recent speech J. Y. Murdoch, president of Noranda Mines, who is entitled to have his observations in connection with this field treated with respect, referred to this new method of marketing as follows:

> I do feel that for greater effectiveness and in order to encourage more mines to forgo "cost-aid", the present regulations could be improved. As it now stands, once a gold producer elects to sell in the free market it must continue to do so for the remainder of the calendar year. This provision makes it difficult for certain mines to properly appraise the situation and decide what is best for them to do. In all fairness, as it is solely a matter of administration I would strongly advocate that arrangements be made to permit the mines to "elect" each quarter.
> If certain gold mines which have elected to sell their production in the present limited free world market are to continue and others encouraged to do so, some of the obstacles which they face will have to be smoothed out.
> For one thing, it should not be necessary to add copper to refined gold in order to obtain an export permit. This is an unnecessary delay and expense. It is no secret that about 90 per cent of the gold so debased and exported is promptly refined again to remove the copper and hence it brings a lower price than would otherwise obtain. The cost of debasing and refining, with consequent delay, is, of course, borne by the producer.

Further, I would urge our government to allow the private ownership of gold in Canada, either by Canadians or by foreigners. I believe that nationals of other countries would welcome the opportunity of owning gold in safe-keeping in Canada as a hedge against inflation, as well as protection against devaluation or total collapse of their own paper money, which they have so often suffered from in the past, and the prospect of an ultimate increase in value. But first, it would be necessary to rescind the provisions of the Bank of Canada Act and the Currency Act whereby the government has the power to compel the surrender of gold at the now obsolete price of $20.67 per ounce. I doubt very much if our government would ever attempt to enforce this surrender but the power is there, however out of step with the times it may be. It would surely be wholly logical for a country such as ours, with its great potential gold production, to permit its citizens the right to buy and own gold. In all probability this would lead to the establishment of a healthy gold market in Canada.

I realize that such moves on the part of the Canadian government would not be enthusiastically received by the international monetary fund and the United States treasury, both of which evidently wish to keep gold out of private ownership and to hold the price near $35 for the time being at least. But Canada, with its rather unique position in world affairs and its great potential gold production, is in a position to take such action and I sincerely hope that Ottawa is already working on these matters.

One hears frequent reference to the imminence of a "higher price for gold"; or, as it should be expressed, a revaluation of gold in terms of depreciated currencies. As I stated last and this year, such a revaluation must come inevitably, and if it be accompanied by unhampered movement and ownership of gold, it will bring about a gradual and realistic revaluation of the world's currencies and so pave the way for the removal of restrictions and fixed rates of exchange. These latter measures were forced upon us by the upheaval of normal world trade during the war, but every effort should now be made to allow the natural interplay of supply and demand to take control once more. However, I am convinced that governments will not take these steps until forced to do so by public demand. Canada has led the world in the removal of wartime restrictions and now is the time for her to move in the direction of restoring gold to its proper and traditional role as the only universal medium of exchange and measure of value.

That extract from the speech of Mr. J. Y. Murdoch I think is an utterance that is entitled to respect in this house. I commend it to the government as containing recommendations of the type of policy that the government ought to follow and ought to proclaim in the house.

I pause only briefly to comment on one or two other matters in connection with this subject. When speaking on this subject in the house on June 18 last year I drew attention to the fact that the exchange reserves of the Canadian government were to a dangerous degree in the form of United States dollars and not to a sufficient extent in the form of gold. I suggested at that time that Canadian gold was a much better hedge than United States dollars. It is gratifying to find that in 1951 the Canadian government moved in the direction then recommended. At December 31, 1950, the exchange fund account and the Bank of Canada held gold to the extent of $580 million and United States dollars to the extent of $1,144,900,000. At December 31, 1951, that situation had been corrected to the extent that the exchange fund account and the Bank of Canada held gold to the extent of $841,700,000 and United States dollars to the extent of $899,500,000. I think that is a move in the right direction.

What is required now with respect to gold is a serious attempt on the part of the house to address itself to finding a long-term and complete solution. The present measure while necessary is certainly no solution. At best it is only a stopgap, hand-to-mouth emergency measure. So far as the international monetary fund is concerned, I have said in the past that the fund and our hopes concerning it were built upon certain premises that were written into the preamble of the fund which certainly have not been realized in the experience of the world in the intervening six and a half years. I think we must recast our thinking with relation of the efficacy of the international monetary fund.

It has become largely an instrument of fiscal policy on the part of the United States government, and in this particular that fiscal policy has run counter to the interests of Canada as a leading world producer of gold. In that situation it seems to me that the duty of the government and of parliament is to put first the interests of Canada as a gold producer. We should call upon the government to seek to remedy the type of policy that has characterized the operations of the international monetary fund thus far or to make it quite clear that this country is not going to be able to continue to give support to the fund if its policies are going to run counter to the interests of Canada.

In addition, it seems to me that the government should be called upon now by the house to take energetic measures to bring about an increase in the effective world price for gold. I mentioned a moment ago that the price has been reduced lately by reason of the appreciation of the Canadian dollar in terms of the United States dollar. I am not unmindful of the difficulties in this respect. I have in my hand an Associated Press dispatch from Washington which anticipated by a matter of three weeks the change of policy announced on September 28 by the international monetary fund. On September 7 the secretary of the treasury of the United States, Mr. John Snyder, said that the United States would oppose any effort to lift the price of gold above the $35 an ounce level that has prevailed since 1934. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am not underestimating the difficulties, but I do submit that the government must address the most strenuous efforts of which it is capable to seeking an increase in the world price for monetary gold. If that increase cannot be brought about by reason of intransigence on the part of the United States government, then other steps will have to be taken by this government to ensure for the Canadian gold producer an adequate price for his product, which is not available today.

The United States today holds $22 billion of gold of which $16 billion are needed for backing their currency. It seems to me that the Canadian government ought to take this problem to Washington without delay. It should state a policy designed to bring about by concerted action an increase in the price of gold. The alternative will be that Canada will have to seek more freedom to allow gold to reach its true value according to the law of supply and demand in the world. We ask the minister therefore, what is the government's policy in this respect? What representations has the Canadian government made to the international monetary fund in this respect? What efforts has the Canadian government made to enlist the support of the United States or other governments for an increase in the price of gold? What is the government's policy? A subsidy is made necessary in the present situation by reason of the failure to act in the direction of a long-term solution, but a subsidy cannot be regarded as a sound policy for anything more than a short period to meet an emergency.

This emergency does exist. Until effective measures of the kind I have been indicating have been taken, I suppose we will have to limp along with measures of this kind. At the best this type of measure supplies only an artificial expedient. It is an inadequate makeshift stopgap. It is discriminatory in its effects, and at the very best it is only partial in its remedial effects. I repeat what I submitted to the house last year, that the time has come when parliament must address itself seriously to a re-examination of the whole position of gold and of Canadian policy with respect to it.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add only a few words to what has been said, principally to underline the point made by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) that the measure before us does not really purport to deal in any way with the situation except as a palliative. Surely it is clear, as has been set out here this afternoon, that the gold industry has been through the decades—one might even put it longer than that—a very great asset to the country. In the 1930's it was one of the sheet anchors. It seems to me what is put before us is neither one thing nor the other. I was thinking of that well known remark by Churchill, which has been widely circulated. He was said to have asked the name of one of his backbench supporters. When he was told the name was Bossom he said, "Funny name; neither one thing nor the other." It seems to me that exactly describes this measure. It is not going to solve the problems of our gold mines. It is going to enable them to keep their heads comfortably below water, not above it. It does not really deal with the situation. Therefore I just wish to express the hope that when the minister comes to reply, these strong criticisms which have been made will be dealt with in an adequate manner, with some indication given of the real judgment and intention of the government on this point.

Mr. G. M. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, the province of British Columbia was created as the result of mining developments in the Cariboo country, where gold was produced in large quantities. So I would not be fair to perhaps 2,000 voters in my riding if I did not say a word this afternoon in support of the measure now before the house.

I do not want to wander into the international sphere of monetary reform, because I would be in the greatest danger of getting beyond my depth. But it is really encouraging to hear members of all parties saying a good word for this legislation. Some of our friends over on the left do not speak that way out on the hustings. Some of them say we can get along without gold at all, that it is a wasteful product totally unnecessary in our fiscal system; that you can make money by using a fountain pen judiciously. Another of our friends over there is a follower of the late Karl Marx, who of course despised gold and directed most of his campaign against those who controlled gold in the world's markets. But we are realists in Canada; we know this great industry. Gold mining is also concerned with the defence of the country. Certain nations opposed to us have vast quantities of gold and silver, and are daily adding to those hoards. We could not do anything more useful to the economy of this country than increase our production of gold.

This subsidy will assist to a certain extent; it is a step in the right direction. If we think we can pay our debts in world markets with mere scraps of paper, with the world in the shape it is today, we are making a great mistake. Our reserves of gold held by the Bank of Canada, and to our credit by other banks, make our position very strong.

To get back to my own district, those who have developed gold mines there have made a great contribution to the development of the province. I think of one young man, out of dozens who could be mentioned, who financed the Pioneer mine. He was Colonel Victor Spencer, a veteran of the first war, who during the dull days of the thirties brought into operation a mine in the Bridge river valley which has employed hundreds of men at very good wages. By bringing that mine into operation he created a whole string of new industries; he brought about new demands for goods; he gave employment to all kinds of people, and was largely responsible for the extension of highways. The Pacific Great Eastern railway, about which we hear so much in British Columbia, is flourishing today largely because of the development of the gold mines at Bridge river, at Barkerville and at Wells, because these mines require great consignments of heavy hardware, heavy machinery, explosives, food supplies and so on. They are purchasers of trucks, automobiles, gas shovels, and all those machines required to carry on modern mining.

There was a time in the history of this country when people, reading of a new strike in the newspapers, turned over the paper feverishly to find out where the good news came from. Today, of course, the word "strike" has a more sinister meaning, and I regret that very much. But I will say this—and I am looking now at the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge)—that I do not think you will ever be able to pay a working miner too much. It is very easy for us to stand here and extol the merits of gold, to urge legislation along certain lines and so on. The men we should thank are those who go down into the bowels of the earth and often risk their lives working under very dangerous conditions, despite all our modern safety devices. They bring to the surface the gold, silver, lead, copper and other mineral products which have made British Columbia the strong and prosperous province it is today.

There is one suggestion I would venture to put forward. I think we are neglecting an opportunity in this country if we do not coin more of our metal. On the Pacific coast when I first went there the $20 gold piece issued by the United States mint was in common circulation. I would like to see Canada mint certain gold coins, especially in the year ahead as an honour to our sovereign. Then Canadians with their pockets well lined with $20 gold pieces would be able to cross over there and share in the honour of crowning the sovereign. I think also as routine business we should coin more silver. I think our troops over in Korea—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The coining of money does not come within this resolution; therefore I would ask the hon. member not to refer to that subject.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Then I will move the adjournment of the debate. That will give me a chance to conform to your ruling more accurately.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will take up Bill No. 93, to amend the Export and Import Permits Act. Then we will go into supply and consider estimates of trade and commerce and defence production.

Mr. Green: In that order?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Fifth report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. McCulloch.

BEEF AND PORK

SALES OF CANADIAN MEAT TO THE UNITED KINGDOM—EXCHANGE OF NEW ZEALAND BEEF AND PORK TO UNITED STATES

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, before motions are proceeded with I should like to complete the statement which I made last Friday with regard to an agreement between the United Kingdom, New Zealand and Canada with respect to meat:

On Friday last, I announced to the house that an agreement had been reached between the governments of the United Kingdom, New Zealand and Canada whereby Canadian meat will be shipped to the United Kingdom in exchange for New Zealand beef and pork which will in turn be sold through normal commercial channels in the United States.

Further progress has now been made in these negotiations and it has been agreed among the three governments that the difference between the United Kingdom contract price for New Zealand meat and the price derived from selling New Zealand meat on the United States market shall be shared equally between New Zealand and Canada. The New Zealand share will be used for buying additional meat in Canada which will be shipped to the United Kingdom. The equivalent value in sterling of this additional meat will be paid to New Zealand by the United Kingdom. The Canadian share will be used to offset, to some extent, the loss to the Canadian government that will be incurred under the terms of the original agreement.

In this further step in the arrangements, all three governments will benefit. New Zealand will derive higher returns for her meat. The United Kingdom will obtain more meat, and Canada is getting an enlarged market for her surplus meat.

For the information of the house I may say that shipping space has been arranged for 600,000 pounds of meat to go forward at an early date and by the end of this week an additional 6,000,000 pounds will have been contracted for and arrangements are being made for regular shipments.

STRAIT OF CANSO CAUSEWAY

LETTING OF TENDER TO VANCOUVER COMPANY

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have an announcement to make respecting the subject of the Canso project.

Preliminary work is proceeding rapidly for the construction of the causeway across the strait of Canso. This important engineering work is being undertaken by the federal government and the province of Nova Scotia and has reached the stage where tenders have been called for the rock-fill. The magnitude of this undertaking is better appreciated when it is realized that something like five million cubic yards of rock will have to be quarried, transported and dumped in the building of this rock-fill.

On Tuesday the Department of Transport received nine tenders from various contracting firms, ranging from slightly under $6 million to almost $10 million. The tenders submitted have now been carefully examined with a view to prices, equipment to be supplied and quarry location.

The lowest bid submitted was that of Northern Construction and J. W. Stewart Company, Limited, of Vancouver, at the price $5,786,650. A submission to council authorizing the acceptance of this tender has been approved by the government and immediate steps will be taken to enter into a contract with the successful bidder.

PRIVATE BILL

REFERENCE OF PETITION TO COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS

Mr. G. T. Fulford (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston City (Mr. Henderson):

That the petition for a private bill to incorporate the Ogdensburg bridge authority presented on May 14, 1952, together with the report made thereon by the clerk of petitions on May 15, 1952, be referred to the standing committee on standing orders for such recommendations as may be deemed advisable in relation to standing orders 92 and 93(3) (a) and (c).

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 225, to incorporate the Hotel Mutual Insurance Company.—Mr. Welbourn.

QUESTIONS

VISCOUNT ALEXANDER—TERM OF OFFICE AS GOVERNOR GENERAL

Mr. Pouliot:

1. What was the date of assumption of office of Viscount Alexander of Tunis as governor general of Canada?

2. Was his term extended, and if so, what was the date of the first communiqué announcing the extension of his term of office?

3. Did the Imperial Order Daughters of the Empire and Children of the Empire (junior branch) write to the government to suggest or recommend the extension of Viscount Alexander's term of office?

4. If so, was it before or after the communiqué above referred to was issued by the government?

Mr. St. Laurent:

1. Lord Alexander of Tunis was appointed governor general on March 21, 1946. He assumed office on April 12, 1946.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

2. There is no statutory provision or regulation fixing the term of office of the governor general, but the duration of his appointment has usually been for approximately five years. Lord Alexander's term was extended, and the date of the first announcement concerning his extension was October 28, 1950. Lord Alexander's term was again extended in October 1951. The date of that announcement was October 26.

3 and 4. There is no record of the Imperial Order Daughters of the Empire and Children of the Empire (junior branch) suggesting or recommending the extension of Lord Alexander's term of office, but the national president of the order did, on both occasions on which His Excellency's term was extended, write to the prime minister commending the action of the government in recommending the extension.

NATURAL GAS—SURVEY OF RESOURCES

Mr. Nickle:

1. Have Dr. George S. Hume and Alexis Ignatieff of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys prepared any survey of western Canada's natural gas resources, since publication in July, 1950, by the geological survey of Canada, of their "Natural Gas Reserves of the Prairie Provinces?"

2. Has the government considered the merits of having available a continuing, completely up-to-date detailed survey of natural gas resources of the prairie provinces, plus British Columbia, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories?

3. If so, would the government instruct Dr. Hume and Mr. Ignatieff to make such a survey without delay, and to revise natural gas reserve estimates from time to time in line with new gas discoveries, and further evaluation of presently known gas areas?

Mr. Prudham: The answer to the first section of the question is no.

In regard to the second and third sections of the question the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys published a joint report by Dr. G. Hume and Mr. A. Ignatieff in July, 1950, on the natural gas reserves of the prairie provinces. This has generally been recognized as a valuable and authoritative report.

It is the intention of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys to issue further reports when possible. A report of this kind entails a great deal of careful research. Such work is complicated by rapid new development and changing conditions. Therefore, I am not able at this time to give a definite commitment as to when the next report will be issued.

UTILIZATION OF BITUMINOUS SANDS

Mr. Nickle:

What progress has been made over the past year by the national research council and by other scientists in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys in matters related to the bituminous sands of northeastern Alberta, with particular reference to economic mining of the sands, separation of bitumen from the sand, and processing of bitumen into usable products, and any other progress towards utilization of the bituminous sands?

He said: I wish to withdraw this question, for purposes of re-wording.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

Questions

Mr. Thomas:

1. Were there any post offices closed in Alberta, during the fiscal year 1951-52?
2. If so, what were the names and locations of same?
3. Why were these post offices closed?

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville):

Mr. Lennard:

1. How many contracts were let for berets, caps or other forms of head covering for the defence forces, during the period from January 1, 1951, to May 1, 1952?

2. How many were contracted for, and at what price?

[Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville).]

ARMED FORCES—CONTRACTS FOR COATS

Mr. Lennard:

1. How many contracts were let for the defence forces between January 1, 1951, and May 1, 1952, for (a) raincoats; (b) waterproof coats; (c) greatcoats?

2. How many of each were contracted for, and at what price?

ARMED FORCES—CONTRACTS FOR TEXTILE FLOOR COVERINGS

Mr. Lennard:

1. How many contracts were let for rugs, carpets and other textile floor coverings for the defence forces, between January 1, 1951, and May 1, 1952?

2. What were the amounts of the contracts?

3. What were the quantities and the nature of these floor coverings in each contract?

ARMED FORCES—CONTRACTS FOR LEATHER FOOTWEAR

Mr. Lennard:

1. How many contracts for defence leather footwear were let from January 1, 1950, to April 15, 1951?

2. What were the amounts of these contracts?

3. To whom were they let?

4. How many pairs in each contract?

FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION—ACQUISITION OF PROPERTY

Mr. Aylesworth:

1. During the past two years, what lands or buildings have been acquired by the federal district commission in (a) city of Ottawa; (b) county of Carleton; (c) county of Russell; (d) city of Hull; (e) county of Hull; (f) county of Gatineau, giving legal description and total acreage of the property in each case?

2. From whom was such property acquired?

3. What was the total price paid to the vendor or any other persons in respect to the acquisition of each such property?

4. For what purpose, either present or future, was each such property acquired, and to what use is each such property presently being put?

5. At the present time, has the federal district commission any agreements of sale or options for the acquisition of other property or has it commenced expropriation proceedings for the acquisition of other property in any of the aforesaid cities or counties?

6. If so, what is the legal description and total acreage of each such property?

7. From whom is each such property to be acquired?

8. What is the total price payable to the vendor or any other person under any such agreement of sale or option in respect of the acquisition of each such property?

9. What is the total price which has been offered to the owner of any such property in respect of which expropriation proceedings may have been commenced?

10. For what purpose, either present or future, is each such property to be acquired, and to what use will each such property be put?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

IRREGULARITIES AT PETAWAWA—PROGRESS OF INVESTIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. Is it a fact that Mr. George S. Currie, who was appointed to conduct an inquiry at Petawawa, is now in Europe? If so, is the inquiry proceeding, and when may a report be expected?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): The inquiry is proceeding now, and has been proceeding since the day after he was appointed. Members of the staff are at work in Ottawa and elsewhere. They are engaged in collecting information, making checks, and otherwise continuing their investigation. I asked a senior partner of the firm today when we could expect a report, and he said he was not in a position to say.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I repeat that part of the question asked by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) which was not answered by the Minister of National Defence, and inquire where Mr. Currie is now. May I also ask what part Mr. Currie has played up to date in the investigation and what part he will have personally in the report which it is expected will be made.

Mr. Claxton: I am sorry, I thought I had answered the first part of the question but now that the hon. member calls my attention to it I find that I did not. Mr. Currie is in England. He started the investigation by giving instructions to his partners on the way in which it should be carried on. They have since been carrying on with the investigation. Mr. Currie indicated to me that it will be some time before the information necessary for him to make his report will be collected by them. This is the way in which chartered accounting and legal firms frequently work on operations of this size. Mr. Currie will return in time to make full use of the information obtained so that he may complete his study and make a report. It will be his report on the basis of his own study of the information.

Mr. Fleming: Does the minister happen to know when Mr. Currie will return to Canada?

Mr. Claxton: No.

OATS

QUESTION AS TO INTERIM PAYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can he say whether an interim payment on oats will be made by the Canadian wheat board? If so, when can producers anticipate receiving the payment?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): An interim payment on oats was not made at the time interim payments were made on wheat and barley, for the reason that a very small proportion of anticipated deliveries had been made at that time. The situation has not changed materially since. Deliveries are still a very small proportion of the expected. The summer market for oats is a dangerous market, as I said when discussing the subject in the house a few days ago. I doubt if an interim payment can be made until the end of the crop year. But an interim payment will be made as soon as the board can be reasonably assured that a payment can be made without danger to the solvency of the pool.

WHEAT

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT—PROGRESS OF LONDON DISCUSSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the report a few days ago that negotiations were deadlocked or broken off between representatives of 46 nations attending a conference in London to discuss the renewal of the international wheat agreement, would the minister care to make a statement as to whether any progress has been made?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The meeting of the representatives of 46 countries was held in London to discuss the extension of the international wheat agreement. All matters affecting the agreement were explored, and it is felt that some of the ancillary problems should be settled before final discussion on the maximum and minimum prices would take place A continuing committee was appointed to deal with the ancillary problems and the meeting will be arranged later in this calendar year to discuss the most important problem which of course is to determine the maximum and minimum prices for the further period of the agreement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What are the ancillary matters that are to be discussed?

Mr. Howe: Delivery points, carrying charges and a considerable number of other points.

Mr. Coldwell: Will the expected meeting be held before the beginning of our crop year?

Mr. Howe: No. The present agreement extends until August, 1953, so there is no urgency.

LAKE ONTARIO

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON LAKE SHORE EROSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I should like to direct to the Minister of Public Works a question which may concern also the Minister of Resources and Development. Have they anything to report to the house with respect to the investigation being conducted into shore erosion in lake Ontario?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): As Minister of Public Works I have no further report to make. Perhaps my colleague has something to say.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Speaker, several days ago a delegation including members of the Ontario government discussed with me the high levels of water in the great lakes which have occurred this year as a result of unusual conditions. I told them that circumstances were such as to make it difficult for either government to deal with the matter, that the high water levels were beyond our control. Since that time the Canadian government has agreed to participate in a reference to the international joint commission to enable that body to study the reasons for the high water levels. That information has been communicated to the government of Ontario.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

INQUIRY AS TO PROCEDURE NECESSARY FOR HOSPITALIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence in connection with James Farthing referred to in a Canadian Press dispatch today which states that this man had to return from Vancouver to Trenton in order to get his papers. What is the rule of the R.C.A.F. which makes necessary that type of apparent bureaucratic bungling?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I saw the press report and have asked for a report on it. Until it is received, I am not, nor is the hon. member, in a position to make any comment on the expression "bureaucratic bungling." I suggest that if he was returned to Toronto for treatment it was for some reason quite other than that suggested of putting him together with his papers.

BEEF

INQUIRY AS TO ACCEPTANCE OF BEEF FROM MANITOBA FOR SHIPMENT UNDER AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture with respect to his announcement about the United Kingdom-New Zealand-Canada beef agreement. Is it a fact that under that agreement beef will not be accepted for shipment to Great Britain from Manitoba while the provincial embargo exists against the importation of beef into that province?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I do not think any such decision has been reached by anyone, but the fact is that for the time being beef is being taken out of Alberta and Ontario. I understand that the present position is that Manitoba is killing its own beef and no beef from anywhere else. I would understand from that that they are able to consume their own beef within the province and supply a limited outside market. They are not killing any from outside Manitoba and most of what usually did pass from Winnipeg on to other parts of Canada and outside resulted from the surplus cattle from outside Manitoba slaughtered in Winnipeg.

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

TIME LIMIT FOR PROSECUTIONS—FIXING OF MAXIMUM FINE

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 93, to amend the Export and Import Permits Act.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this is a rather simple bill. As the act now stands prosecution can be taken either by way of indictment or summary conviction in the case of alleged offences, with a different penalty in each case. If proceedings are taken by way of summary conviction the maximum penalty is $500; if the proceedings are taken by way of indictment the maximum penalty is $5,000.

Another consequence of that distinction is that if proceedings are taken by way of summary conviction under the Criminal Code the charge must be laid within six months of the commission of the offence. The purpose of the bill is to permit proceedings by way of summary conviction in all cases and to provide that in all cases the maximum penalty will be $5,000. It is being provided also that in case of proceedings by way of summary conviction the proceedings may be commenced within twelve months of the commission of the offence.

In other words, the effect of the bill will be to lengthen the period within which proceedings by way of summary conviction may be commenced from six to twelve months and to increase the maximum penalty in those cases from $500 to $5,000. Offences under the act are likely to involve investigations in other countries and it has been found that the six months' period is too short.

Export permits cover strategic materials and the amount of money involved in any transaction is likely to be quite substantial. A maximum fine of $500 might be quite small in relation to the amount of the transaction involved. I do not think that there is anything more I can usefully add in explaining the bill.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to make any general comments on the bill. As the parliamentary assistant has said, it is quite simple. I have some questions to ask with regard to the operation of the act but these can be asked more conveniently in committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Export and Import Permits Act

On section 1—Time limit.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the parliamentary assistant make a brief statement as to the operation of the act, and in particular will he indicate to what extent there has been some change due to the passing of the years in the chief purpose for which the act has continued to be used? When it was passed five years ago I think we hoped that by now we would have moved into a period when controls would not be needed so much. There have been frequent minor changes, as indicated by orders in council that have been passed, and I would be grateful if the parliamentary assistant would give us a short résumé of the situation indicating the chief reasons which require the controls in operation at the present time. For example, as I read the reports of operations for 1950 and 1951 it would appear that there has been an easing up as between us and the United States. I give that as an illustration of one of the changes that have taken place. I should like to have a brief general statement.

Mr. McIlraith: Practically all the changes have been by way of removal of items from control so that we are now in a situation where export control is virtually limited to the control of strategic materials of one sort and another. Perhaps if I indicate the nature of the items under control it will be apparent what the trend is. The items under import control now are iron and steel, untanned shearlings, sulphur, butter and recently livestock. Import control on meat was recently imposed. The hon. member will see that the list under import control is very small.

Export controls are applicable to a considerably larger number of items, something in the order of 270. Incidentally, the precise list is published in the regulations which are available to all members. When you look at these items it will be seen that they are mainly of a strategic nature. For instance, if you take the heading, "non-metallic minerals, chemicals and their products" you may find approximately 60 or 70 different items in that category. It is really only the subheadings that are important. They are all items having to do with defence preparedness and involving short supply. In a few cases they have to do with preventing Canada being used as a back door for the export of goods from the United States. There may be some items where the United States has export control but not against Canada, and if we did not have export controls on those few items it can be seen that Canada could easily be used as a back door for the export of these United States items.

There are a few of these, but the main significance of export controls now has to do with destination of area control. The list of areas to which export permits are required is also published. The purpose of area controls is self-evident and I do not need to deal with it. Certainly it is fair and proper comment to say that the items that were under control in the early years of this legislation have practically all disappeared from the list except those kept under control for the reasons I have mentioned. For instance, I can tell the hon. member that in 1944 and 1945 there were approximately 1,100 items under export control.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then it would be correct to say, I take it, that the purpose of the act has changed somewhat radically and, instead of its being necessitated by reason of ordinary trade controls, which was the purpose of its passing, it is really the dealing with strategic materials that has now come to be its chief end.

Mr. McIlraith: That is a fair statement.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Could one go further and say that if we move into a situation where strategic materials cease to be scarce the act to that extent would be less needed, or would you say that even then you would have to make use of it in order to prevent materials from getting to certain countries? Would that be an element still?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes. The area factor is still very important even though the reason of scarcity of materials disappears.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Parliament authorized the naming of certain areas or countries. In other words, it authorized discrimination between one country and another. At the end of the 1951 report there is the following:

> This general permit allows described non-essential items to move freely to all destinations with the exception of North Korea, Hong Kong, China, Macao, Manchuria, Mongolia, Sinkiang and Tibet . . .

I am surprised to see Hong Kong included there. This concerns non-essential items and I take it they are not strategic materials. I take it these are essentially what are stated to be non-essential items. I should like to ask two questions about Hong Kong. First of all, is it a country, which I think is the word used in the act? Second, why is it treated in this manner?

Mr. McIlraith: I understand that Hong Kong is not treated in that manner now. It was included at the time because the United States had export controls there at that time. It is not treated as these other countries listed by the hon. member, but permits although more freely issued are still required because of the danger of transshipment.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If it were not for the words "non-essential items" I could understand why these countries are included, but why do we need to restrict in the case of what are called non-essential items? It says that non-essential items move freely to all destinations with the exception of those I have read.

Mr. McIlraith: I think it should be obvious why these non-essential materials are not being sent to North Korea today.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes, I agree.

Mr. McIlraith: We have excepted Hong Kong. As for the other countries, we would have to discuss each one specifically. It is quite apparent that even non-essential materials should not be sent to North Korea today. You come to the point where you have to discuss each country or area specifically. I have said that Hong Kong is not included now in the list of areas to which this provision applies.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Let me change my question slightly. Does this mean we have no trade relations of any kind with these other countries by way of export or import?

Mr. Howe: Perhaps I could say a word about this matter because I have been concerned with the program. We meet with the United States commercial authorities at least once every three months and discuss the strategic implications of the situation. We follow a joint policy with the United States for the reason that we are a North American country, and any regulations in Canada different from those in the United States could easily work to defeat the United States provisions. In other words, goods that could not be shipped from the United States might well be shipped to Canada and be re-exported from here. To stop that sort of thing we have parallel arrangements which change from time to time as the joint committee decides in the light of strategic considerations.

The report that my hon. friend has in his hand was a report prepared at the outbreak of the hostilities in Korea or shortly thereafter, when there was a great deal of transfer between areas. The object at that time was to keep available material from getting into the hands of the North Koreans. We do no business at all with red China. We do no business at all with Russia. We do business with Czechoslovakia in certain non-essentials, and with other satellite countries of Russia.

Russia and China are the principal areas now which are under tight area control.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I would have understood fully what the minister said about strategic considerations and co-operation with the United States if it were not for use of the word "non-essential". Am I misunderstanding the word—

Mr. Howe: Non-essential to whom?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is what I am asking.

Mr. Howe: Non-essential to Canadians perhaps, but they may be highly essential for a country to use for warlike purposes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I make the comment that it seems to me that this is not a very fortunate word. By the way, this is the report for 1951 to which I am referring. It presumably goes to the end of 1951; it is not, as the minister said, dated much earlier. However, I am not going to press the matter. I just make the point that it does not tell its own story. I think the minister has cleared the matter up, except that I think the word "non-essential" is just a bit misleading.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

General administration—

441. Departmental administration, $617,795.

Mr. Charlton: Is the minister going to make a report to the committee on the trade position?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Chairman, perhaps I might make a few introductory remarks. The activities of the Department of Trade and Commerce during the last year were largely conditioned by the changes in the economic situation we have experienced. I reviewed economic developments in Canada when I participated in the debate on the speech from the throne on March 14, 1952. I said then:

> The demand for Canadian output should, in general, be well sustained by the continuing high level of capital investment, by export demand for most of our staple products and by defence preparations.

I observed that there was "no reason to anticipate either inflation or depression" in 1952. Events since then have brought further evidence supporting this view. The supply situation with respect to a number of strategic materials has improved. Inflationary pressures have subsided. The cost of living index turned down in February of this year, recording in the last three months a decline of about three points. The cost of living is now back to about where it was last August. In other words, during the last three months consumer prices have been declining at twice the rate they were rising in the preceding six months. A further substantial drop in the cost of living index is in sight for the month of May.

The latest data we have show that employment in industry is up 2 per cent.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): From when?

Mr. Howe: From a corresponding date last year.

Payrolls are running now about 15 per cent above last year. In spite of weaknesses in some sectors, retail sales have been higher by 3 per cent in the first quarter of this year as compared with the same period last year.

As to investment, we are continuing with our record program of some $5 billion, or almost 10 per cent higher in value terms than last year's capital expenditures. Construction activity is particularly strong in the defence, industrial, public utility, and resources development sectors. Even in such fields as housing where activity was notably lower towards the end of last year, some improvement is indicated. For example, starts in cities and towns with population of 5,000 and over in March and April, 1952, reached about the same level as in corresponding months a year earlier. The best information we can obtain on the housing program suggests that starts this year may be a little lower than in the year 1951 as a whole but higher than the low level experienced towards the end of last year and at the beginning of this year.

In the trade field, recent events have also borne out my earlier remarks made to this house. Hon. members will recall that I took issue with the view expressed by opposition members that Canada was losing the British market. Trade figures for the first quarter of this year show that exports to the United Kingdom were 37 per cent higher than in the corresponding period of 1951. Exports to other sterling area countries were up 54 per cent. Our exports to Europe and Latin America have climbed even more notably. Our sales to the United States are up slightly.

One other interesting aspect of our trade picture is that for the first quarter of this year Canada has had a favourable balance of commodity trade while a year ago we were running a deficit. Altogether developments so far point to another record year for Canadian trade and one in which exports and imports may be in better over-all balance.

The trends which were evident in both our external trade and our domestic economy suggest that Canada is emerging from a period of initial adjustment to a defence program to one where supply and demand are in better balance, with a consequent easing of the pressure on prices. In the home market underlying demand remains strong, bolstered by a vigorous resources and industrial development program and a rising level of defence expenditures. As for our customers abroad, there are indications that even where currency difficulties exist, many of Canada's basic export commodities are too urgently needed to be dispensed with. The outlook therefore is for a further rise in the level of employment, income, and output.

In this period of adjustment the Department of Trade and Commerce has helped in three ways. In the first place, shortly after the war broke out in Korea we started building up in the Department of Trade and Commerce a number of units to look after some aspects of the defence production and material allocation program. With the formation of the Department of Defence Production on April 1, 1951, these units were transferred to the new department. This helped us materially to put the new organization together in a short space of time.

Secondly, the department has carried on with its effort to assist in the expansion of Canadian trade, both exports and imports. The great emphasis on this phase of the work by the department is in line with the government's view that, in spite of the importance of defence preparation, special attention must be given to our trade relations with other countries. A high and diversified level of exports and imports continues to be a vital prerequisite to the nation's well-being.

Departmental representatives participated in the trade conference at Torquay which began in September, 1950, and lasted until April, 1951, and took an active part in the sixth session of the contracting parties to the general agreement on tariffs and trade in Geneva during September and October, 1951. A considerable number of trade discussions were carried on with individual countries, the United Kingdom, other parts of the British commonwealth, the United States and a number of European, South American and Asiatic countries.

[Mr. Howe.]

Thirdly, the Department of Trade and Commerce has continued to assist domestic industry. Activities cover a great variety of aspects, from assisting business firms facing supply and market problems to encouraging foreign manufacturers to establish plants in Canada, from negotiating with Canadian suppliers for products to be shipped to India and Pakistan under the Colombo plan to making arrangements for Canadian participation in industrial fairs abroad and particularly in organizing the Canadian international trade fair. The fair this year will be held in Toronto from June 2 to June 13. We have already had an indication that this year's fair will be bigger than any of our earlier fairs, and that Canadian industry will be participating to a greater extent than ever before.

As to details of the activities of each branch of the department, they may be found in the annual report of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the calendar year 1951, tabled this day. Copies will be made available to hon. members as soon as they are received from the queen's printer, probably within the next few days.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Chairman, I am sure we were all very interested in the report the minister gave us on trade conditions in Canada today. It is most urgent and most important that we take a great deal of time and interest in studying this situation as it is. For years our most stable market for agricultural products has been the United Kingdom. I want to give a brief historical sketch of what has happened to those products we have sent to Great Britain, Mr. Chairman, and the position in which we are today with regard to those products.

In 1938 we supplied 27·5 per cent of the total British imports of barley. By 1951 we had lost this market to Russia, which is now the largest supplier. In so far as oats are concerned, in 1938 we supplied 93·9 per cent of the total British imports; in 1945, 96 per cent; in 1946, 72 per cent; in 1947, 92·9 per cent; and by 1948 we had lost this market to the iron curtain countries, chiefly Russia, and the sterling countries. In 1938 we supplied 254·5 thousand cwt. of beans which was 24·3 per cent of the total British imports. By 1951, we had lost this market. In 1945 we supplied 43 per cent of the total British imports of beef. We lost this market largely to the Argentine Republic and found an alternative market in the United States which has since been closed to us as a result of the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in Canada. This is the most recent example of how our present pattern of export trade, important as it has been in the past, can be shut off overnight.

In 1938 we supplied 18·1 per cent of Britain's bacon imports. This market for Canadian bacon was built up tremendously during the forties, as is evidenced by the fact that in 1945 we supplied 83 per cent of the total British imports; in 1946, 73·5 per cent; in 1947, 74·4 per cent; in 1948, 70·1 per cent; and in 1949 we started to lose this market to Denmark, Poland, The Netherlands. By 1951 Canada supplied only 16,048 cwt., out of a total British import of 4,426,138 cwt., while Poland supplied 730,166 cwt., Netherlands 695,267 cwt. and Denmark 2,953,-355 cwt. Our percentage of this market now is considerably below the pre-war level of 1938. In 1938 we supplied 34 per cent of the total British import of ham. This market was steadily built up until in 1947 we supplied 78·5 per cent.

In so far as cheese is concerned, Canada has long been the large supplier to the British market. In 1938 we supplied 23·2 per cent of the total British import. This market was built up until in 1945 we sold 1,004,945 cwt. or 31 per cent of the total British imports. There has been a steady decline in the sales of cheese on this market until today our reduced export of 234,568 cwt. out of a total importation of 3,884,865 cwt. is further threatened. During the forties Canada built up quite an export market for poultry in the United Kingdom. In 1947 we supplied 107,479 cwt. or 18·2 per cent of the total British imports. We have now lost this market and iron curtain countries such as Poland and Hungary have become the substantial suppliers.

In 1945 Canada supplied 56 per cent of the British imports of shell eggs and 26 per cent of their dried eggs. In 1948, we supplied 79·8 per cent of their dried egg imports, 20·5 per cent of their imports of frozen eggs and in addition 29·1 per cent of their whole egg imports. This market has been lost to Poland, China and the sterling countries. In the case of condensed milk, in 1938 Canada supplied 56·6 per cent of Britain's total imports. This market has been lost to the sterling countries and The Netherlands. In 1938 Canada supplied 42·5 per cent of the total United Kingdom imports of fresh apples. This market was built up by Canadian producers to as high as 69·2 per cent of the total British imports in 1946. In 1948 we lost this market entirely, largely to sterling countries and to some European countries. In 1949 efforts were made to regain this market in view of the heavy surplus of apples in Canada, and our exports to Britain amounted to 513,145 cwt. of their total imports of 1,763,757 cwt. or about 29 per cent. In 1950 our exports to this market increased to 880,443 cwt. of their total imports of 2,349,081 cwt. or over 37 per cent. In 1951 the total British imports of apples increased to 3,885,093 cwt.; but imports from Canada dropped to 484,664 or about 13 per cent of their total imports. Today that market, or what is left of it, is again threatened.

In the case of canned tomatoes, prior to the war, Canada had developed a considerable market for canned tomatoes in the United Kingdom, and we supplied 176,034 cwt., or 19 per cent of their total imports. This market for canned tomatoes was gradually built up until 1946, when we supplied 515,931 cwt. or 47·3 per cent of their total imports. In 1947 we commenced to lose that market largely to Italy and other foreign countries in the sterling area. The market is now lost absolutely to Canadian producers.

In the case of canned salmon, in 1938 the Canadian fisheries industry enjoyed a considerable export outlet for canned salmon in the United Kingdom market, and we supplied 155,679 cwt., or about 14 per cent of their total imports. This outlet was developed considerably as an export outlet, when in 1949 Canada supplied 82 per cent of Britain's total imports. In 1948 British imports of canned salmon from Canada were reduced, while their imports from foreign countries were increased. In 1950 our total exports to the United Kingdom of canned fish of all classes totalled only 84,465 cwt. of a total British import of 603,528 cwt., or less than 14 per cent. In 1951 we were able to increase the total exports of all kinds of canned fish to the United Kingdom market to 143,666 cwt. of their total imports of 378,650 cwt. Today this outlet market is again threatened.

In the case of pit props, an export market for pit props in the United Kingdom is of particular importance to the maritime provinces. In 1945 we supplied 9,954 piled cubic fathoms of their total imports of 161,121, or over 55 per cent. By 1946 we had increased this to 217,474 of their total imports of 458,989. In 1947 we supplied 207,640. In 1949 we commenced to lose this market when our exports dropped to 165,393, although the total British imports had jumped to 558,433. In 1950 we practically lost this market, when our exports fell to 8,179, while the Scandinavian countries, Poland, Germany, Yugoslavia and Russia became the chief suppliers.

In 1951 we were able to increase our exports of pit props to the United Kingdom to 51,082, or about 13 per cent. The future of this market, so important to the maritimes, is now questionable.

In the case of lumber, softwoods, sawn but not further prepared, prior to the war the Canadian lumber industry had built up a valuable export market in the United Kingdom. This market was further built up in the years immediately following the war as evidenced by the fact that in 1946 Canada supplied 319,573 standards of United Kingdom total imports of 689,279. In 1947 we supplied 475,065 of their total imports of 1,129,065. By 1950 the Canadian exports to the United Kingdom had fallen to 115,456 when total British imports were reduced to 749,078. In 1951 total British imports amounted to 1,576,381, and imports from Canada more than doubled when they increased from 115,456 to 371,637. Just how much the announced reduction of £600 million in British imports in 1952 will affect this valuable Canadian export market has not been made clear so far. The records indicate, however, that in 1950, when Britain was faced with her last dollar-sterling crisis, and imports of lumber were shifted to soft currency currencies, including the Soviet union, the reduction in total imports bore a direct relationship to reduction in imports from Canada.

In 1938 Canada had export markets for 16,093,611 pounds of tobacco in the United Kingdom. In 1950 our total exports to this market were 15,838,955 pounds or slightly below the pre-war level. In 1951, however, Canadian tobacco marketing boards were able to sell 21,673,652 pounds of tobacco in the British market. However, on January 30 of this year the British government announced drastic cuts in British food, tobacco, and other imports. The Ontario tobacco industry has been informed that Britain plans to reduce flue-cured tobacco purchases in 1952 by 75 per cent, the result of which will be to reduce our export market considerably below the 1938 pre-war level.

The above sixteen examples of important segments of Canada's export trade to the United Kingdom have been checked with published accounts of trade and navigation of the United Kingdom, as tabled in the British House of Commons, and standards used are British measure. All comparisons were made on a basis of volume of trade in each case so that inflated prices in the last two years would not give a false impression of increased exports resulting therefrom.

While it can be reasonably argued as inevitable that our export trade in most agricultural products would sooner or later revert to pre-war levels, the trade figures for 1951 now show that our export trade in the most stable market we had, namely, the United Kingdom, has fallen below the pre-war level of 1938.

Today, with Britain facing the most serious financial and trade crisis in her history, Canada, as the only dollar member of the commonwealth, finds her markets facing a most serious threat.

Our exports to the United Kingdom in 1951 of barley, oats, beans, bacon, ham, cheese, poultry, condensed milk, canned tomatoes, apples, canned salmon, are all below the pre-war level of 1938, while our export outlet for softwoods in the United Kingdom was only slightly above the 1938 level in 1951 and was considerably less than half of it in 1950.

Our 1938 pre-war export market in Britain for tobacco amounted to 16,093,611 pounds. In 1950 our exports fell slightly below this figure, 15,855,955 pounds, but jumped again in 1951 to over 21·6 million pounds.

On January 30 last, Britain announced a 75 per cent cut in 1952 for tobacco imports. This will have a very serious effect upon Canadian tobacco producers already confronted with reduced domestic markets as a result of the increased tax placed on cigarettes and cigarette tobacco in the Abbott budget of 1951.

Our cheese exports to Britain, which in 1951 fell below the 1938 pre-war level, are now subject to further serious reductions in 1952 as indications now are that Britain will not renew her 1951 contracts with Ontario cheese producers.

United States as an alternative market in 1952 is not very promising. Canada, along with other countries, has been endeavouring since last August to have that country rescind their ban on imports of dairy products, applied under an amendment to their defence production act, contrary to the international obligations assumed by the United States as well as Canada and other countries under the Geneva agreement on tariffs and trade.

It must be admitted that our export market in Britain for eggs in either shell or processed form was largely a wartime export which we could expect to lose because the water content of eggs did not warrant long distance transportation and dried eggs are a relatively low priced product.

The same argument could be advanced for our loss of the British market for condensed milk, on the ground that the water content of this product could stand the long freight haul in wartime but not peacetime, although trade figures show we did supply 56·6 per cent of total British imports of condensed milk in the pre-war year 1938.

The same argument could not be advanced, however, in the case of our export trade in apples where this has been largely a trade between Britain and Nova Scotia based on a cheap water haul.

In short, while it must be admitted that wartime levels of export trade or even moderately reduced levels were largely dependent upon Canada's post-war competitive position being more favourable than pre-war, the serious problem confronting Canadian producers in 1952 is not the maintenance of wartime levels of British export trade outlets or even moderately reduced levels; it is the fact that the level in 1951 has fallen below the pre-war 1938 level and even this low level is further threatened in 1952.

When this very serious threat to our export markets is brought to the attention of the public, the government says, in effect, "nonsense" and points first to some alternative markets found in the United States and then proceeds to say all is well—our gold and dollar reserves are substantially the same as they were—this is just Tory propaganda.

Nevertheless these facts go unanswered:

1. True, our dollar and gold reserves are substantially what they were before we started losing these markets, but were it not for the heavy inflow of capital into this country our loss of exports with which to pay for our imports would be taking Canada down the road towards a crisis.

The heavy inflow of capital cannot be expected to continue indefinitely and should not be considered as a permanent and satisfactory solution.

2. History of trade has shown that similarity of production in Canada and the United States often results in their having a surplus when we have a surplus production, for which we seek export markets only to find they have raised their tariff or utilized some other device to exclude us from their domestic markets.

Indicated serious loss of Canadian export markets in the United Kingdom, presently at levels below those of pre-war, and further threatened in 1952—coupled with the unstable alternative outlets found in the United States which are also gradually being lost to Canadian producers and are further threatened in 1952, makes this question of Canadian export trade, upon which one out of every four Canadians depends for a livelihood, a matter of urgent national importance.

A review of Canadian export trade figures since 1946 clearly indicates the dangers involved in the present pattern of Canadian trade. Our exports to the United States have risen from 38 per cent to 65 per cent of our total exports while those to the United Kingdom declined from 26 per cent to 15 per cent.

The increase in exports to the United States is largely attributable to the fact we are exporting to that country Canadian raw materials, in the unfinished or semi-processed state, and for which there is a world demand. The continuation of this policy of exporting employment is detrimental to the standard of living in this country and contributes materially to retarding our development as an industrial nation.

The decrease in exports to the United Kingdom since 1946 not only reflects the falling off in wartime levels of export trade or even the moderately reduced levels which it was reasonable to expect, but in many cases they have fallen considerably below the 1938 pre-war levels and in the case of a number of products have been lost entirely to Canadian producers.

Our export trade to the United Kingdom last year showed an increase over the previous year—$638 million as against $472 million. This can be attributed to the following reasons:

(a) Accelerated demand arising from the British rearmament program;

(b) Increase in prices of about 14 per cent;

(c) Efforts of the dollar-sterling board.

This improvement in 1951 is now seriously threatened by:

(a) The announcement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on January 23, 1952, that sales from Canada to Britain under the United Kingdom token import scheme will be cut 25 per cent from last year.

(b) The announced import cuts of 500 million pounds sterling by the British government for 1952 to which must now be added the additional 100 million pounds sterling announced in the British budget presented in the British parliament on March 11 last.

Today we are confronted not only with a further loss of United Kingdom export outlet markets, but practically the entire sterling area which conducts roughly one-half the world's trade.

For the year 1952 this bloc which includes 64 countries has announced drastic cuts in imports chiefly from dollar areas. Of the commonwealth, all countries but India, Pakistan, Ceylon and Burma have already announced drastic measures to curtail imports. These countries have refrained so far on the ground that their standards of living now are at such a level that it is impossible to further curtail imports.

Cuts in imports announced by Australia are expected to total between 400 and 500 million pounds sterling and will directly affect Canadian exports to that market which totalled $49·1 million in 1951.

New Zealand, to whom Canada exported goods to the value of $21·8 million last year, has announced the cancellation of all licences for dollar imports and that new applications will be carefully scrutinized.

South Africa—Canadian exports to South Africa in 1951 were valued at $52·7 million, showing an increase of $10 million over the previous year. The announcement recently that imports will be confined to one-third of the consumer goods imported last year will seriously affect this Canadian export trade outlet.

Our total exports to commonwealth countries—excluding gold—which last year amounted to $872 million as against $655·1 million in 1950, are now seriously threatened.

Import cuts have been announced by all these 64 countries with the four exceptions mentioned above. This action is not specifically aimed at Canada, although as a dollar country our export markets will suffer materially in the year ahead. The action was taken as a first aid device by these countries as they tackle the money problems with which they are now confronted.

Canada by her contributions to post-war financing Britain gambled heavily on the future of sterling. We still need that sterling market which accounts for about 50 per cent of the world's trade. Rather than leave the Canadian economy vulnerable to economic fluctuations or political tariffs in the United States, or allow ourselves to drift into the position of having only the United States bidding for Canadian products, this country should initiate action now to set up the machinery for a complete study of commonwealth trade possibilities, within the confines of our international obligations under existing trade arrangements.

With regard to primary products, particularly agricultural products, export markets are essential as a means of disposing of surpluses, which, no matter how small they may be in relation to total production, allowed to remain unsold depress prices out of all reasonable proportions. As evidence of the recognized seriousness of undisposable surplus production we have by legislation provided for floor prices under agricultural products. Even this, however, is not a satisfactory substitute for export markets, for the floor price set is usually at a level where the government hopes it will have as little of the product as possible left on its hands.

[Mr. Charlton.]

Canada is a member of the commonwealth just the same as Britain, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, or any other country within that association of nations.

We have every right to sit down with these countries now in an effort to devise means whereby we can work out our mutual salvation in matters of trade.

The present policy of drift now followed by the present government is wholly inadequate to meet present challenges. We have paid dearly for this policy in the past and action should be taken now before this whole trade situation explodes in our face.

The record of this government is strewn with incidents where action recognized as necessary was delayed until the situation became so bad that public reaction forced resolute action. This happened in the case of:

(1) Outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in western Canada;

(2) Sale of illegal passports by officials of the department of immigration. This was first mentioned publicly over a year ago when the minister promised to look into it. Action was not taken until a few months ago, and even yet the extent of this bribery has not been disclosed.

This pattern of drift is clearly evident in regard to trade. We are losing our export markets to such a degree that even the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) frankly admitted it when he said on February 1 last, as published in the Toronto Star of February 2, that Canada's foreign markets have now shrunk to such an extent that sales of raw materials, such as were requested from Canada by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization committee set up prior to the Lisbon conference, are vital dollar earners which help Canada toward balancing her trade with United States.

This policy of drift, until a situation becomes so serious it practically explodes in their face and public opinion forces the government to act, is true with regard to Canada's export trade today. We are losing our traditional markets and the tempo of these losses is accelerated as the months go by. This is not only reflecting in pockets of unemployment across this country, but many of our major industries are now threatened. Real concern is now felt by our primary producers as to where markets will be found for this year's crop. Other industries, such as lumbering, pit props and related products already see the distress signals flying although these apparently go unnoticed by the government most responsible.

The answer given by Mr. Howe in the House of Commons on March 12 last that a commonwealth trade conference was unnecessary because there was a commonwealth finance ministers' conference in London in January is wholly unsatisfactory. In the first place, the Minister of Finance, who represented Canada at that conference, rightly or wrongly created the impression he was there largely as an observer, Canada being the only dollar member of the commonwealth at a meeting called to deal with a sterling crisis. Further, that was a finance ministers' conference held without the advice of trade experts available to the countries represented.

A commonwealth trade conference should be called for the purpose of dealing with matters of trade designed towards unblocking existent channels of trade and development of new ones geared to expansion now under way within the commonwealth, and not for any specific purpose a minister of finance would or could serve. If the commonwealth means anything it means we could sit down in conference and review the whole trade situation as it has developed since the war. Already too many valuable years have been wasted without the necessary action being taken while our traditional markets are being closed to us.

While the deal arranged between New Zealand, United States, Great Britain and Canada for beef is a step in the right direction, it will not take care of the surplus we will undoubtedly have this year. It is imperative therefore that the government do everything possible to try to regain our former position in the United Kingdom market. While it is not desirable that we should gain through the misfortune of one of our sister nations in the commonwealth, if reports are true of an unusual drought in Australia it might be to the mutual advantage of the United Kingdom and this country for Canada to make every effort possible now to supply the British market.

Mr. Howe: We have just listened to a political speech so full of inaccuracies that it should be answered immediately. The hon. member says that we have lost our British markets. I stated that sales to Great Britain were up 37 per cent last year over the previous year.

Mr. Charlton: In dollars.

Mr. Howe: In volume as well as in dollars. The sales for the first three months of this year are up at least 25 per cent over the sales for last year. If my hon. friend would like to have figures, I have them here.

Mr. Charlton: I have them too.

Mr. Howe: Why not interpret them correctly?

Mr. Charlton: I made the statement that your figures were not based on volume; that makes a difference.

Mr. Howe: The total value was related to volume.

Mr. Charlton: If the minister would give the volume and not the price it would present a different picture.

Mr. Howe: I will give the figures for the first three months of this year as compared with last year.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): In volume?

Mr. Howe: How can my hon. friend expect volume in over-all trade. If my hon. friend will just consider the difference in price between last year and this year, which is just fractional, he will compare the results.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then do not pretend that the hon. member is inaccurate because he gives the volume, which is the most sensible way to give it.

Mr. Howe: Here is the comparison between the first three months of this year and the first three months of last year, showing our sales to different countries:

	First three months 1951	First three months 1952
United Kingdom	$113,000,000	$154,000,000
South Africa	8,900,000	15,380,000
Australia	8,448,000	15,286,000
New Zealand	2,300,000	6,178,000

So we have lost our British market. I never heard such nonsense.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You have not questioned a single figure the hon. member gave.

Mr. Howe: I never heard such a distortion of facts in my life.

Mr. Charlton: On a question of privilege, I should like to ask the minister how many pounds—

The Chairman: That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Howe: I am getting to the information; I am taking every item in my hon. friend's speech and turning it inside out to show the ridiculous nature of the situation.

Mr. Argue: How about farm products?

Mr. Howe: I am coming to that. I have the information for every country in the world.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You said you were going to question the hon. member's figures.

Mr. Howe: What figures?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The figures he gave you. You have not questioned one yet.

Mr. Howe: He said we had lost the market for beef.

Mr. Charlton: We had lost it until this last deal.

Mr. Howe: Why? We find that in New Zealand beef for Great Britain is put on board ship at fourteen cents per pound, whereas in Canada it is put on board ship under the present floor prices at forty-eight cents per pound. Why have we lost the British market for beef? It is because our farmers do not wish to raise beef for market at fourteen cents per pound delivered at seaboard. What about pork? Why have we lost the market for pork?

Mr. Charlton: We have lost it, have we?

Mr. Howe: I did not say that. Why are we not shipping? Because Great Britain can buy it in New Zealand at twenty cents; they can buy it on the continent at twenty cents, but our farmers think that they should get twenty-six cents a pound. Under the present floor prices our farmers have been getting at least that for some time. If my hon. friend wants to put the Canadian farmer, which I assume he does, in competition with farmers on the continent, in Australia and New Zealand for that market on a price basis—it must be on a price basis—then—

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Howe: I did not interrupt my hon. friend and I do not want him to interrupt me. My hon. friend speaks of the market for oats. Canada is not normally a large exporter of oats. Oats is a domestic crop. In a year of short crop it is all consumed in Canada. In a year of surplus crop we have the highest priced market in the world at our door. It has always been there, probably always will be there, and is a market that can take whatever surplus we have, be it large or small. The same is true of barley. We have a market at our door for barley. Sometimes we have a substantial quantity of barley for export and sometimes we have very little for export.

My hon. friend has spoken about the market for cheese. We had a very big market for cheese in Great Britain throughout the war. We practically supplied all the cheese that Great Britain used during the war. We had contracts up until last year for considerably more cheese than we could supply. Some years we did not supply 30 per cent of the cheese for which we had a contract with Great Britain. I do not know whether Great Britain considers Canada as a very reliable source of supply. We had been supplying it at a competitive price, but last year the Ontario producers went over to England and made a contract for a small quantity at a very high price, the highest price I think that Great Britain has ever paid for cheese. When this year came along the British said that they did not want any more cheese from North America. They had built up sources of supply elsewhere.

My hon. friend says that we have lost the British market for lumber. It is my impression that in the last year Great Britain has been buying all the lumber from Canada that Canada could supply. I know that a year ago they would have taken considerably more lumber than Canada then could offer.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You have come to something at last that we have not lost. That is good.

Mr. Howe: Does my hon. friend think we have really lost the British market for anything? That is your story. You will stick to it and you will tell it on every platform, but it is totally untrue.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Oh, no. No one said that.

Mr. Howe: We have sold more to Britain in the last twelve months than we have ever sold in the history of this country, war years or no war years.

Mr. Charlton: On dollar value?

Mr. Howe: On dollar value, tonnage or anything else.

Mr. Charlton: Not on volume.

Mr. Howe: On volume as well. Produce your figures on volume. You have not produced any so far. You have kept to a few fringe products that we sometimes sell to the United Kingdom, and always in small quantities except in the war years or immediate post-war years when markets were maladjusted. I could go over the list product by product. I would be glad to take any product that anyone would like to discuss, but the fact of the matter is that Canada has found markets somewhere for everything it could produce. We speak of canned tomatoes, and it seems we have lost the British market. We had a shortage of canned tomatoes no later than last autumn and throughout the past winter.

The hon. member says we have lost the British market for canned milk. I do not know where the market has come from but I know we have been able to sell every tin of canned or powdered milk this country has been able to produce, and I have great confidence that we can do so in the future. I do not know just what the process would be if we were to tie ourselves to one market and take the price conditions of that market. Are we going to close out more profitable and more accessible markets? Is this country prepared as a matter of policy to say that we are going to supply England in any event and that any price that England is willing to pay will be the price for Canadian producers? Is that the policy my hon. friends are advocating?

Mr. Charlton: That is absolute nonsense.

Mr. Howe: How do we get beef into England when they are buying it at 14 cents a pound on the boat?

Mr. Charlton: Would the minister permit one question?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: What happened to the promise made during the war years that if the farmers of Canada would sell at a lesser price than the world price the government would protect them with respect to future markets in Great Britain and make up the difference over and above the price the farmers had to take?

Mr. Howe: Is that the policy for which my hon. friend is asking?

Mr. Charlton: That was the policy promised by this government in the war years.

Mr. Sinclair: What page?

Mr. Howe: What page? My hon. friend has distorted the export picture so consistently that he has no idea of the policy of the government or the position of the farmers under the government policy.

Mr. Sinclair: He just has no ideas.

An hon. Member: Nothing up top.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Howe: As I say, the situation is that our exports for this year will be a record for any year in peacetime history, and I am referring to our exports of everything that Canada exports. It is true we have lost a certain market for certain products because of the inability of that country to afford to buy our products. Great Britain would like very much to buy Canadian canned salmon. It is popular but it is a higher priced food than other foods they are buying. It is considerably higher in price than the meat they are buying from Australia. They have said to us that they are sorry that they cannot afford our salmon. They may change their minds. That door has not been closed. That is the position today and it is purely on the basis of price. They just cannot afford that expensive food.

Mr. Charlton: We have still lost it though.

Mr. Howe: Well, lost—what does my hon. friend think we are going to do with the salmon, just leave it in the ocean or throw it away? We will sell it somewhere where they can afford to buy canned salmon.

Mr. Charlton: I said we had lost the market. You said we had not. Now you agree that we have.

Mr. Howe: I did not say we had lost the market. I said the situation in Britain was such that they could not afford to buy canned salmon this year. So far as cheese is concerned, they trifled with our small amount of Canadian cheese until the price has got too high for them. They do not want any more Canadian cheese at the moment.

Mr. Ferrie: Tory policy.

Mr. Charlton: Yet we import cheese from New Zealand.

Mr. Howe: Certainly we import. We are a trading nation. Will my hon. friend just subside? He must be sure he is wrong because he is so persistent in throwing my statement off balance. Let us not emphasize the effect of the foot-and-mouth disease, which it will take time to correct, but will my hon. friend admit that we have sold everything this country has produced surplus to domestic requirements over the past year, and at the best prices available in the world? Perhaps he will mention something we have not sold.

An hon. Member: Apples.

Mr. Howe: We sold the apple crop last year and sold it at a good price.

Mr. Charlton: There was a surplus of cheese last year and the foot-and-mouth disease had nothing to do with that.

Mr. Howe: That was all in the province of Ontario. The marketing of cheese was in the hands of the province of Ontario. A price of 36 cents a pound for cheese was set by the cheese co-operative and it was not possible to sell cheese at 36 cents a pound in any market in the world, and not even in Canada to the full quantity available. The production of cheese in Canada is just about equal to the consumption of cheese, and the best market for Canadian cheese is the market in Canada.

Mr. Charlton: Then why was there a surplus?

Mr. Howe: Because the price has been too high.

An hon. Member: Tory policy.

An hon. Member: The worst thing that could happen to Canada.

Mr. Howe: I do not know that I need to say any more, but I must say that we are now enjoying the greatest market in England we have ever had. My hon. friend referred to tobacco. We exported about $11 million worth of tobacco to England last year. England decided it could not afford to buy as much tobacco from North America. The cut-back on Canada was not as severe in proportion as the cut-back on the United States. The British are buying from Canada a proportion of the tobacco they bought last year. In the meantime they are using up the stockpile they built up in the United Kingdom. When that stockpile is consumed they propose to come back to North America for the usual tobacco requirements of the United Kingdom. Let us put that bugaboo at rest. I had a lot more to say—

Mr. Charlton: You cannot think of anything else.

Mr. Howe: I have listened to such a ridiculous statement by the hon. member. From end to end it is distorted. It is a political speech that is being recited on the platform. There is not an atom of truth in it.

Mr. Charlton: You have not disproved it yet.

Mr. Howe: Instead of losing markets we are shipping more to the markets we are supposed to be losing. As I say, we have markets for everything that Canada can produce. We have been able to find the very best markets in the world, and as a result the Canadian economy is at the highest point of prosperity it has ever reached in the history of the country.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, this is not quite the atmosphere in which one likes to rise for the purpose of discussing a problem of this description.

Mr. Howe: We will now have a little bit of sweet reason.

Mr. Coldwell: No; I do not know that you will. What I was going to say was this. The minister this afternoon has given us an optimistic forecast of the immediate future of trade and commerce in our country. I agree with him in this respect. Canada has been exceedingly fortunate in the post-war years. I think of the prognostications that were made by various officials of the Department of Labour, the Department of Trade and Commerce and by other departments of government, as well as economists in almost every country in the world, to the effect that in the post-war period we should face a severe depression which would test the rather vulnerable economy of Canada.

Mr. Hetland: What about the C.C.F.?

Mr. Coldwell: We simply repeated them.

Mr. Hetland: And believed them.

Mr. Coldwell: May I say that the prognostications that we gave were the prognostications that were given by the Department of Labour of this government, and by the outstanding economists all across the world.

Mr. Sinclair: By the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Coldwell: Let me say this. What was it that changed the picture?

Mr. Ferrie: C. D.

Mr. Sinclair: C. D. Howe.

Mr. Coldwell: Just let me say this. I am not going to take from the Minister of Trade and Commerce any credit which is his due. I have a high regard for what the Minister of Trade and Commerce did during the war and for what he has done since the war. I am not going to say one word whatever to detract from that record. I am, however, going to say this. We were fortunate, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce was fortunate, because of what happened. We had UNRRA demanding goods and services that we could supply. We had the Marshall plan in which we were able to participate. Then, just as there was something in the nature of a slight recession falling upon the world, we had the regrettable outbreak of the Korean war and the demands of the new armament industries. Of course we now have had NATO and the demand for further raw material and so on.

All this has kept the economy of the North American countries at a high level of production. As long as this situation continues we are likely to see a high level of production. No one person can take credit for that situation. It was rather an unexpected windfall for the ministers of the governments that now enjoy the high level of prosperity in North America and elsewhere.

In his introductory remarks the minister referred to the decline in the cost of living. I think that a decline should be welcome; but let me point out again that the present decline in the cost of living is largely reflected in the loss of revenue in the agriculture industry. If we are going to have a fall in the cost of living, let it be a fall all the way round, so that its impact is not on one industry alone. Usually a decline in agriculture prices, thereby causing a fall in the cost of living, is a sign of some recession in the economy. I hope it is not so in the present instance. The minister says employment is up and wages are up. The pockets of unemployment we had are fading out, it is true, and I hope that steps will be taken to see to it that, during the coming autumn and winter, pockets of unemployment are avoided everywhere in this country.

The minister says capital expenditure is up. Capital expenditure has increased tremendously in this country, in the United States and in other countries. I may say that I have seen writings in which there was expressed by economists who follow these matters closely—not only in the United States but in the United Kingdom and recently in the writing of a great French economist—some concern lest the world may be over-capitalizing and increasing capital equipment at too great a rate at the present time; and that with the entry into the productive field once again of Japan and Germany, unless these countries can find markets where they used to find them—Japan, for example in China, and Germany to the east as well as other parts of Europe where she finds it difficult to sell at the present time—we are going to find that there may be severe competition which may change the picture extensively.

When the Minister of Trade and Commerce was speaking the thought crossed my mind that it is easy to criticize opposition members from the ministerial benches because, after all, the ministers have research facilities which the rest of us lack. I only wish that we had at our disposal the research facilities for the obtaining of information that is available immediately to the ministers in discussions of this description.

I quite agree that trade is an all-important consideration in the Canadian economy. We as a country are a producer of goods in tremendous quantity. In our own country we could use more of some of these goods if our people could only get at them. But even if we were able to do that, the huge surpluses we can produce will have to be exported. I know the minister's department is an ably staffed one.

If I may digress for a moment, may I say that I was exceedingly sorry to note the other day the departure from that department of Mr. Max Mackenzie. I think he has been an outstanding public servant. I had the pleasure, as did the hon. member for Peel, of working closely with him at the San Francisco conference seven years ago and also in New York in 1946; and I came to have a high regard for his ability.

There is, however, this to be said; and in this matter I support the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth. A serious threat to our economy has been developing in these post-war years. We have become more and more dependent on a single market for our trade; and that single market is the United States. The minister is perfectly right when he points out that that tendency has been largely due to the fact that other countries with whom we formerly traded in large quantities have found it difficult to obtain in our country the necessary purchasing power in order to get the goods they require. But that does not alter the fact—and I think we should face it—that we are running into grave danger of placing too many of our eggs in the one basket, instead of perhaps trying more than we have been, as far as I know—and as I say, I speak without access to the necessary research facilities—to find more varied outlets for our increasing production of grain, dairy products, raw materials and manufactured goods.

The United States has never been a stable market for Canadian goods, particularly for the kind of goods in which, on a long-term basis, Canada has excelled. We have had indications of this fact in recent times. It would seem that our alternative, wherever it is possible to do so, is to seek export markets overseas and to do everything we can to reach agreements so that we may reverse the trend that has made us so dependent on the unpredictable United States market.

This afternoon I was glad indeed to hear the further announcement made by the Minister of Agriculture.

The amount of meat involved is not very large in relation to the amount that we could produce and may have surplus for export. I believe we have every reason to be glad that New Zealand, the United Kingdom and Canada were able to reach such an agreement regarding the marketing of the surplus meat caused by the United States embargo against our Canadian supplies. May I say that this indicates very clearly indeed what can be done when friendly governments are prepared to co-operate with one another to meet a problem that one of them faces. Private trading, may I say, could not have reached this agreement. Only because of the fact that in the last number of years we have been trading on the basis of nations were we able to reach an agreement of this description. I have no doubt that that is the pattern, whether some like it or not, of future relationships among many of the great nations. In passing may I say that I hope that an international wheat agreement will be arrived at within the next year, and that the price will be satisfactory to the Canadian producer. I hope the price will be in line with the price that he should expect with the increased cost of production that has taken place over the last number of years. I believe that every effort should be made to reach an agreement satisfactory to all concerned. I know the difficulties because of the monetary situation across the world, and I recognize the difficulties that have arisen in that regard.

In the inter-war period, that is between 1920 and 1939, the United Kingdom closely rivalled the United States as the market for Canadian products, but in dollar exchange we sold as much as $2 worth of goods to Britain and bought from her as little as $1 worth of goods in return during a number of those years. In those days that was a condition that could be overcome because of the British investments overseas, and her ability to obtain the necessary dollar exchange. All that was changed by the war. With the loss of the investments, which she had to liquidate during the war in order to buy goods to meet her war effort abroad, she changed from the world's great creditor nation to one of the world's great debtor nations. This, of course, accounts largely for the changes that have occurred.

Between 1920 and 1939, we exported an average of 35·8 per cent of our total products to the United Kingdom and 38 per cent to the United States. Our exports to the two countries were, therefore, very similar. In the first half of 1951—I should like the minister to correct me if I am wrong—on the other hand, only 14·4 per cent of our total exports went to the United Kingdom and 63·3 per cent went to the United States. If those figures are correct, and I have no research organization to help me in arriving at such figures, they do indicate what I said and what the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth said, that we are putting most of our eggs in one basket and that is a very dangerous thing to do. In regard to our exports to the United States, we have to remember that most of those exports are raw materials for industrial purposes in that country. Last year, of course, there was a considerable quantity of meat as well, but most of the exports were raw materials for industrial purposes, whereas the exports that we have been making in the past to Great Britain consisted of some raw materials but largely of foodstuffs and products from our farms. I believe that is the point that we should be considering at this time, and realizing that there is developing a rather dangerous change both in the channels of trade and types of commodities as between these countries and Canada.

I might just add that it is interesting to note that only five countries, other than Britain and the United States, took 1 per cent or more of our exports. This indicates again the restricted area in which we market our Canadian goods. This is not only true of exports, but it is equally true of imports.

In the period 1920 to 1939, imports from the United States were 64·7 per cent of our total imports, and imports from the United Kingdom were 17·5 per cent of our total imports. This emphasizes the statement I made a few minutes ago that we purchase much more from the United States than from the United Kingdom, and we sold relatively more to the United Kingdom than to the United States. In the first half of 1951, 70 per cent of our imports came from the United States, while, as I have it, only 10·7 per cent of our imports came from Great Britain. We imported, as I have said, 1 per cent or more of our total imports from only five countries in addition to the United States and Britain. It is true, then, that our trade always has been highly concentrated in a few countries, indeed largely concentrated in two countries. The United Kingdom and the United States, between the two world wars, together accounted for an average of about 77 per cent of the total trade of Canada. In the post-war period, the United States and the United Kingdom have accounted roughly for the same percentage of our trade, varying from 72·6 per cent in 1946 to 79·6 per cent in the first half of 1951. I want to say to the minister that there is something alarming in the change that has taken place in our trade and commodities as between these two countries, as the figures I cited a moment ago—if they are correct, as I believe they are—will bear out.

Mr. Howe: May I call the hon. member's attention to one factor? He should keep in mind that Canadian production is vastly greater now than in the twenties. I doubt if the volume—

Mr. Coldwell: In the goods I have dealt with?

Mr. Howe: —perhaps not the goods, but the over-all volume of goods shipped to Britain—has dropped. The total volume of exports is very much greater, so the percentages are down. I think that is a factor he should look at. Of course, we have been forced to balance our exports and imports with the United States, because we could not continue in any other way. A few years ago we had a drive to balance our imports and exports to the United States to keep the country from going bankrupt in United States dollars.

Mr. Coldwell: What the minister says, I know, is a valid criticism, but I believe you have to compare the two percentages, the percentage of trade with one country and the percentage of trade with another country, because you are taking the percentages out of the same aggregate volume of the production of our country. A moment ago I said that the most obvious difficulty that faces us in connection with the problem is the international balance of payments with which Britain has been faced, as a result of the drastic change in her economic status to which I have already referred. Before the war she was rich enough to pay for almost half her imports from dividends earned from her overseas investments. Since she was compelled to sell them during world war II, as I have said, she no longer has those revenues, and those assets. I do not think it is out of place to say that very much of that expenditure was made, particularly in the first year or so of the war, in order to fight the war on behalf of those of us who had the good fortune to live in North America, the United States, as well as Canada, far away from the scene of conflict and threat that then hung over Britain and Europe.

Britain is handicapped by the lack of dollars, so that she is compelled against her will to reduce her imports from this country and to look elsewhere for some of the supplies that she needs. And may I say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that, as I believe, if we are going to correct this situation to any degree we have to help her to earn more dollars in North America; and that applies not only to Canada but perhaps more particularly to the United States, because we have not yet had a great urge in this country nor have we had public opinion demanding increases in tariffs against British goods coming into Canada, though there has been some suggestion of it. If we are to bring about a better trade condition across the world, somehow or other Britain has to be able—and that applies to other countries as well—to earn more dollars in order to buy goods from the dollar countries.

Last year we bought an average of $31·9 million a month from Great Britain. That in the aggregate may seem at first glance quite a large amount to purchase, but I was very glad to hear the minister state that the imports from Britain are running higher in the first months of this year, because the figures I had for the first two months of this year indicated that the imports were lower, at a lower rate per month. I am very glad to hear him say now the imports are running at a higher rate than they were earlier this year.

Mr. Howe: I would not like a wrong impression to be created. I did not say the imports were running higher. I said our exports were running at a higher rate. I was not talking about imports. Unfortunately they are not running higher; they are running a bit lower.

Mr. Blackmore: Imports into Canada.

Mr. Howe: Imports into Canada.

Mr. Coldwell: This is what the Economic Record for April 1952 had to say. This is a publication of the United Kingdom information office, and in its April issue it commented on the trade with Canada as follows:

> That is why British purchasing in Canada is having to be cut further despite the United Kingdom hunger for the things Canada produces.

They were referring to the announcement made that Britain would have to import fewer Canadian goods, and it goes on to point out that the food minister, Mr. Lloyd George, when asked recently in the British House of Commons what was being done about Canada's $300 million unsaleable surplus of beef, pork, milk products and food grain, had this to say:

> For balance of payments reasons we are regretfully compelled at present to confine our purchases of Canadian food mainly to cereals and flour.

Well, of course, owing to the co-operation of New Zealand, that has been partially rectified as far as we are concerned. Then other commonwealth countries, with whom we should attempt to promote the best possible trade relations for political as well as economic reasons, are being compelled by the dollar gap to reconsider their all too low purchases from Canada. A great deal depends upon the ability to trade on a two-way basis.

I am not going to pursue this at very much greater length; but I do want to say that I believe that Canada, with our prosperity, with our favoured condition, should take a lead on every possible occasion not only to set an example ourselves but to urge other countries to do everything possible to remove their barriers from the trade channels. We should do everything we can to assist the nations that are our customers or our potential customers to earn dollars in our country. At the present time our own trade and the trade of the world are bewitched by uncertainty regarding what is going to happen in the United States, on the outcome of the election as well as the uncertainties of the American tariff, which has always been rather vacillating, and the possibility of a sudden shift in trade policies.

There is a good deal of concern felt everywhere, in our own country as well as in other countries, regarding that. We remember the general agreement on tariffs and trade, the Geneva agreement, to which my hon. friend referred this afternoon, which was brought about in 1947. When that was brought before the House of Commons in December of that year many of us hoped that the promotion of trade between nations would cease to be the subject of discrimination such as hampered and prevented successful trade in the past. Unfortunately those expectations have not been realized, at least in full measure, because the United States, in direct contravention of the trade agreements, established an import quota on certain commodities, including cheese, simply as a result of domestic pressure upon the government of that country. They are always subject to that kind of pressure. Then the United States took action to restrict imports of fats and oils and dairy products from this country in contravention of the agreement, and I venture to say—and I think the minister would confirm this—that we have lived up to every obligation we assumed under the Geneva agreements. I do not know of any obligation that we assumed that we have not fulfilled. Indeed, we fulfilled the agreement a year earlier than was entirely necessary, and in the fulfilment of the agreement automatically, on January 1, 1948, we did reimpose or raise some tariffs against the United Kingdom and against some of her goods with the result that, though it did not mean a very great deal, it did in fact diminish her ability to earn dollars in Canada.

Mr. Howe: But only at the request of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Coldwell: At the request of?

Mr. Howe: Yes. It allowed them to—

Mr. Coldwell: Only at the request of?

Mr. Howe: Of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Coldwell: I thought it was at the request of the United States. As I remember it, I thought the United States proposed that the United Kingdom—

Mr. Howe: It allowed the United Kingdom to make the trade with the United States that they wished to make, and we did not raise any barrier against England except at the request of England.

Mr. Coldwell: All right. But it does not alter the fact that we did put that agreement into effect on January 1, 1948; we did increase some tariffs against certain British goods on July 1 of that year; we did thereby diminish her earning capacity for dollars in this country. We have fulfilled every obligation. Our great neighbour to the south, the United States, assuming similar obligations, has not fulfilled her obligations to the extent that we in Canada have, and to some extent we have been the losers by the non-fulfilment of those obligations by the United States.

As I said, I am not going to pursue this further. There is another matter that I had intended to discuss this afternoon, but owing to the interruptions and so on it would take me a little longer than the time allotted to me permits.

Mr. Howe: Go ahead.

Mr. Coldwell: No; I never like to do that, Mr. Chairman, but I will deal with it on another occasion. However, I think that this parliament and the government must give every consideration possible to this vital problem of Canadian trade and commerce.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to speak extensively on this occasion in connection with the matter of trade and commerce, although I think there is no more vital, interesting and important subject for the house to discuss in the greatest detail. Unfortunately the two speakers from the opposition who have preceded me have indicated the kind of thing that ought to be done, but have avoided carefully any suggestion as to how it ought to be done.

I think that for a member of parliament, in times so critical as this, to spend his time trying to tell the minister what ought to be done—which even every 14-year-old boy in the country knows—and yet to refrain from giving him any idea as to how it ought to be done—which apparently the minister himself does not even in the slightest degree know—is to waste our collective time and the time of the country.

If I were disposed to go into this matter in any considerable detail now I would devote my attention to the problem of how to enable Great Britain to get Canadian dollars.

Mr. Coldwell: Go ahead; we will listen.

Mr. Blackmore: I shall have considerably more to say on the subject before we have finished the discussion of this important matter of trade and commerce. However, I should like much better to hear what others have to say, whether any members in the house have any suggestion as to the way out of the difficulty. If any member has such a suggestion, I will listen with great humility and attentiveness. But it ought to be borne in mind and elaborated upon that what was said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, just before he closed his remarks, is the all-important fact that confronts us in the world. It is the problem of what the United States is going to do.

I think that when we accepted—and I think recklessly—the idea that we could live in a world where there would be non-discrimination we did an injustice to ourselves intellectually. Anyone who would suppose that, after more than a century of admirable success in building up a powerful economy by means of discrimination, the United States would depart from that proven policy in order to give us a chance to sell goods in her market, must be either unrealistic, or perhaps just a little off colour. Unfortunately the government and the opposition, with the exception of the Social Credit party, were all off colour on that occasion; because they supposed that the United States would actually lower tariffs on commodities entering her country, and allow various goods to compete with her production. They supposed that.

Well, common sense, as well as all American history, would contradict any such possibility. There are those who seem to think the United States ought to let Canadian cheese come into that country to compete with United States cheese. Well, will someone who thinks he knows tell us how on earth it could benefit the United States to let Canadian cheese come in for her people to use, and allow her own cheese producers to be destroyed thereby? Can anyone see how that could possibly help the United States? The United States' chief concern is to look after the people of the United States, is it not? If the United States brought down her tariff on every kind of goods the nations producing those goods desired that she should, it would not be more than fifty years until the United States would be back in the position of a purely primary producing area, and would be one of the most hopeless and helpless nations on earth. Because there is hardly a commodity used in the United States that is not produced somewhere in the world far more cheaply than the United States can possibly produce it, bearing in mind the high wage standards and the high living standards which prevail in that country, and which undoubtedly the people of that country desire to have prevail.

Going right back to the beginning of United States history, what was it that made her great and strong? It was that high protective tariff wall. What was it that made Germany great and strong? It was her high protective tariff wall, which Bismarck, as a result of the wise counsel of List, insisted upon building up.

What was it that made Britain great? We hear a great deal about free trade, but it was not free trade that made Britain great and powerful. It was the fact that for centuries wise monarchs and wise governments carefully protected the infant industries of Britain until they grew into giants. They became so strong that industries of a similar nature in other countries for the time being could not compete with them. But very shortly after Germany began to use the high protective tariff, her industries became powerful enough to compete successfully with those of Britain, and even to sell goods right in Britain in competition with British production.

What was it that built up Germany? It was the high protective tariff. What was it that built up Japan? It was the same sort of thing.

Mr. Stick: And hard work.

Mr. Blackmore: Yes, and hard work, we realize that; but just the same there was a protective tariff, if it was necessary. They kept their people on a low standard of living and operating at a high degree of efficiency.

Mr. Stick: And a low cost of production.

Mr. Blackmore: Yes.

Mr. Stick: Not a high tariff.

Mr. Blackmore: That was another way of going about it. They chose to keep their people on a low standard of living.

Mr. Stick: But not a high tariff.

Mr. Blackmore: Does anyone in this country want Canada to come down to a low standard of living in order to be able to compete in the world? Will anyone suggest for one moment that the United States should bring down the standard of living of her people to a level comparable with that which prevails in Japan, in order that she may be able successfully to keep Japanese goods out of the American market, without a tariff? Is there any member in the committee who would suggest that to anyone in the United States? Well, the ordinary United States citizen upon hearing a suggestion of that kind would brand as a lunatic the one who made the suggestion.

Undoubtedly the United States will keep a high protective tariff on every commodity of which she is able to produce what she needs. Very well; that is just common sense. That is the first fact we face. What is the next step the United States follows? Just as rapidly as she can do it she is introducing industries which will supply her with goods which formerly she imported from abroad. Anyone who wishes to investigate with some thoroughness the extent to which that process has gone on since the beginning of world war II will find some most instructive reading in the Reader's Digest of December, 1949, which carries an article setting out why American dollars are scarce. I may give the contents of the article before the conclusion of this discussion.

The general message of the article, the general fact elaborated, is that the United States is increasing the variety of her industrial life.

Mr. Darroch: So are we.

Mr. Blackmore: That is another important fact in the situation. It means that the needs of the American people for goods coming in from abroad are decreasing progressively, unless she can get raw materials to supplement those raw materials of her own the supply of which is largely exhausted —as, for example, iron. She will take plenty of iron, she will take plenty of wood, she will take plenty of oil, she will take plenty of those primary products of which we cannot afford to deprive our country if we are to avoid exhausting our supplies of these things within twenty-five or thirty years. She will take those things, but she will not take the products which can be processed from those things if she can possibly avoid it. That fact is as clear as it can be. It is a major factor in the trade situation of the world today.

Obviously United States tariff restrictions are going to become more effective as she approaches more nearly a condition of being completely self-sufficient. That is the ideal toward which I believe her leaders are working. In other words, the United States is rapidly developing into what might be called an economic nationalist state.

Canada is doing exactly the same sort of thing under the exceedingly wise guidance of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). He gave a speech not long ago in Montreal—he will correct me if I do not paraphrase him correctly—in which he said that Canada was endeavouring to decrease her vulnerability. Those were not his exact words, but the general thought he was conveying was that he and the government were striving to make the Canadian ecenomy less vulnerable. The minister will check me if I am wrong.

What does that mean? It means that Canada under the guidance of the minister and the government in power is seeking to reach the point where Canada will be self-sufficient in respect of all really vital commodities. She does not want to be in the position where she will be dependent on outside sources of supply during the exigencies which might result from war in any part of the world. We had a good example of that in connection with rubber. I believe it was the Minister of Trade and Commerce who established the Polymer Corporation as a result of which we are now fairly secure in respect of rubber. If it had not been for institutions such as Polymer we should have been in a very bad way in world war II. The minister will correct me if I am wrong in that.

Will anyone in this house, will anyone in this country advocate for one split second that the Polymer Corporation should be disbanded and thus render us vulnerable in respect to rubber? He certainly will not. But what has this thing done? What has the establishment of Polymer done in the world? It has had the practical effect of depriving Malaya of its main source of revenue. The minister will check me if I am wrong on that. If you want to find the reason why communism prevails so dangerously in Malaya, why some 50,000 British troops have to be kept there to keep down communism, you will find it in such things as Polymer.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend asked me to correct him. Is it not true that Malaya has received the highest price for rubber in the last two or three years ever received in its history? It is still receiving a very high price compared to any standard, despite what has been done. The Polymer Corporation and artificial rubber is merely keeping pace with the increase in consumption rather than cutting into the supply from Malaya.

Mr. Blackmore: I am glad to have the minister correct me. We are under the same difficulty as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) referred to. When a member of the opposition rises in this house he is facing an expert of the highest quality, with a large expert staff. If he was not that he simply would not be worthy of the position he occupies. If a minister in charge of a department of government with a staff of fifty, one hundred or probably more skilled experts cannot know more about the details of that department than all the rest of the house put together, then it is time that minister resigned.

An hon. Member: He has to be good to be in the Liberal party.

Mr. Blackmore: I say he has to be superior to be in the government of Canada, no matter what party is in power. We lack the facilities to get this information and that is why I want the minister to check me if I am wrong. I gather from what he said that we have been buying from Malaya just as much rubber as we bought before the second world war; is that right?

Mr. Howe: I should think that that is probably right.

Mr. Blackmore: I have apparently been misinformed in respect of that matter. This reference to Malaya may be digressing a little, but we want to have everything right. With these high prices are the Malayans able to produce as much as they produced before world war II, before the Japanese ran over their country? Probably the minister is not in position to answer. Whatever the answer to that may be, the simple fact is that if we set up institutions in Canada by which we can produce rubber which Malaya is depending upon in order to get the things she needs, then we shall be depriving the Malayans, unless some other factor enters into the matter, of the means of getting a living. At the same time we are increasing our invulnerability. The fact is that we are endeavouring to become more and more self-sufficient in respect of every vital commodity.

Here we have the two great American nations, Canada and the United States, situated side by side. These countries possess probably the greatest resources to be found in a similar area on the face of the earth; they possess probably the most intelligent and skilful people in the world; they possess great amounts of capital; they possess the best of industries; they have the greatest amount of know-how, as it is called today. They have a vast consuming public which enables the United States at least to mass produce, thereby cutting down costs. Why in the world should these two nations not be able to become self-sufficient?

When they do become self-sufficient how on earth is any nation outside of those two nations going to be able to get any of our dollars when we will not accept any of their goods? If you want the fundamental trouble in a nutshell, there it is.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Blackmore: Let us face that fact just as it is and try to figure a way out. Let us not spend our time making insinuations or casting accusations against the United States because she will not let in our cheese or any other commodity. Let us try to find some way whereby the United States can let the nation which wants to send in cheese get United States dollars without sending cheese into the economy of the United States to compete. We will then be working on some realistic basis.

Up to the present time there has not been one word said in this house, except by Social Crediters, as to how Canada can provide Great Britain or any other nation with Canadian dollars except by letting in their goods, no matter how those goods may compete with our own industries and even destroy them.

An hon. Member: Tell us again.

Mr. Blackmore: In so far as I am informed there has not been a suggestion made in the United States, except by the U.S. counterparts of the Social Crediters, as to how they can provide dollars to other nations which need those dollars desperately to buy the goods which the United States needs desperately to sell, except by accepting goods from those nations to compete with the output of American industry.

It surely must be obvious to any ordinary man far less intelligent than the members of this house that there is an absolute paradox there. There is an inconsistency which simply must be dealt with. How to deal with it is the problem. What has the United States hitherto done? Let me recall to hon. members what she did. Right after the first world war the United States found it necessary to lend money abroad, to European countries and South American nations, with which to buy her goods, and she continued to do so until 1928. She kept herself out of a depression by that means during the several years before 1928. How did she provide dollars? She did it by lending dollars abroad. The result was she was able to sell her goods and keep her people employed.

One thing which to me is cause for amazement is that the United States has not put two and two together and figured out a way of providing dollars in a similar manner without lending them abroad. She lent billions and billions of dollars to European and other nations during the years between 1920 and 1928. Then she began to discover that she could not get her interest on these loans because she could not accept the goods of these other nations without destroying her own economy. She discovered further that she would never be able to get her money back unless she accepted such goods, and as she would not accept them she would never get her money back.

What happened then? When the United States ceased her foreign lending policy she went into a depression and dragged the rest of the world with her. Unless she finds some device whereby the difficulty can be overcome she will go into such a depression just as often as she ceases foreign lending. Since world war II what has she done? She evolved the Marshall plan. For what purpose? The purpose was to carry on foreign lending under a different name. We can say all we like about the generosity and magnanimity of the United States, and I honour her for as much of that as entered into the matter, but nevertheless the fundamental purpose under the United States Marshall plan was the urge to get United States dollars into the hands of prospective purchasers of United States goods in order to keep her out of a depression. No matter what the Marshall plan cost it would not cost as much as a depression.

Canada, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar pointed out, shared rather munificently in the Marshall aid advances of the United States. It was a generous gesture on the part of the United States to permit us to do it. We did so, and as a result the Marshall aid system helped to provide us with markets.

The Marshall aid plan has rather run out so now the United States has adopted some sort of security measure. I forget the name of it.

Mr. Howe: The economic security administration. It takes the place of the Marshall plan.

Mr. Blackmore: I thank the minister. The name had slipped my mind. I did not expect to speak this afternoon and I am speaking extemporaneously. Now the United States has brought in the economic security administration with power to lend money indefinitely. For what purpose? Ostensibly the purpose is to help Europe but down at the bottom it is to help the United States to sell her goods. To show how intense is the United States' desire to sell her goods abroad, I call to witness her insistence that Great Britain shall buy shells, cartridges and all that sort of thing to equip her armies from the United States so as to give United States business firms a market, thus utterly disregarding the needs of Great Britain for similar markets. That is enough to show how the United States keeps her eye on the ball, and in her case the ball is getting markets abroad.

Mr. Hosking: She has given the money to start with.

Mr. Blackmore: She has given the money. She has given United States dollars, and by that means she is providing herself with markets.

Mr. Hosking: Then don't criticize her.

Mr. Blackmore: I am not criticizing. I am trying to get the Canadian parliament and everybody else to face the facts as they are and not try to build their theories on sand. Let us get down to bedrock and know what it is all about. For us to expect the United States to adopt a policy of strict non-discrimination in the light of the facts I am now giving is for us to be utterly unrealistic. The hon. member for Peace River has just referred me to an article on rubber. I have not had a chance to read it but he says that it supports the statement I was making concerning Malaya. What are we going to do if this new device the United States has adopted whereby she provides prospective foreign customers with the money with which to purchase her goods ceases to function? What is she going to do and what is Canada going to do?

There is one more thing the United States has done. I am not finding fault but I am mentioning it because I have already spoken several times in the house on this very subject. I spoke on April 2, April 9 and May 5 and followed a general line of thought based upon the fact that since 1922 the United States has enforced in the world the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause. The unconditional most-favoured-nation clause has impeded nations in their trade arrangements beyond all power to estimate, and she is still following the same policy. Why is she doing that? It is purely to provide her own producers with markets. She wants to bring about a condition where if any little nation in the world gives another little nation a favour, as the result of which that other little nation can get a market, the first nation has got to give the big powerful United States the same favour so she, the U.S., can go in there and sell her goods thus displacing the goods of the little nation being favoured. That is the meaning of the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause which prevails in the world, and in my opinion Canada fatuously committed herself to the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause because it was said that we want an expansionist program. The Minister of Trade and Commerce issued a pamphlet in 1945 in which he said that we favour expansion.

I discussed that on May 5 to some extent. I do not propose to go into it today but what it actually means is that the United States is free to expand indefinitely. By using all sorts of means she gets markets for herself all over the world regardless of what happens to the rest of the world. Thereby she exports her unemployment and dumps it on the streets of the other nations of the world by simply exporting her goods in every direction under the protection of the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause upon which she bases what her apologists are pleased to call "expansionist policy." Expansionist policy for the United States! And for the United States alone!

Another important factor is the Bretton Woods agreement which was designed to put every nation signing the agreement upon an unconditional gold standard. I discussed that matter in some detail on May 5.

What are we going to do about the whole situation? I say first of all let us get out of the Bretton Woods agreement just as fast as we possibly can, and get everybody else out of it. While I am on this point, may I say that I read the other day that Germany was going to be given the opportunity to come into the Bretton Woods agreement. From the way that was so gracefully put, I gathered the impression that Germany was told she would have to accept the Bretton Woods agreement. If you want to know why the dangerous situation exists in Germany today —one which may wreck us in a short time— go look for it, I suggest, in the Bretton Woods agreement and in the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause which Germany would presumably have to accept if she became a member of the comity of nations which we are pleased to call the "free" nations associated in the thing we call NATO. If what I am saying in this connection is not true, I invite anyone to put me right.

What is the situation when it comes to providing dollars to Great Britain to buy goods from America—Canada or the United States—or when it comes to providing France or any other country in the world with dollars with which to buy our goods? First of all, we are going to produce our own goods— which is a sound policy and one which I have commended the minister for—so we do not want their goods. They therefore cannot get our dollars, no matter how they try. Does that not sound hopeful to them? Does it not sound hopeful to us when we come to contemplate finding a market for our surplus agricultural products?

In addition to that, we are hedging ourselves about with an unconditional gold standard under Bretton Woods, binding in a strait-jacket every nation in the world which accepts it; and we are insisting on the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause doing all the damage the other measures did not do. One could almost repeat the old prayer that our fathers used to sing: "We have done those things which we ought not to have done and we have left undone those things which we ought to have done; verily there is no health in us."

We can recede from that position. We can denounce the Bretton Woods agreement and everything it stands for. Let us do that.

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mr. Blackmore: Oh, yes; and I will defend that stand at the greatest possible necessary length. Those who do not see the soundness of my position do not realize what this Bretton Woods agreement means. I will suggest to the hon. member that he read my speech of May 5 in which I quote authorities that even he will not dare to question, no matter how bright, intelligent and well informed he is. Let us denounce the whole policy of the most-favoured-nation clause. It is pernicious. It is based on the principle of non-discrimination in a world where the greatest nation in it, or what has been the greatest nation, reached that position by persistent and incessant discrimination, a policy that she proposes to follow to the *n*th degree. She imposes it on everybody else but she will not impose it on herself.

What do we need to do? The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar kindly asks me to repeat once more. Last year, two or three times, I advocated that Canada advance a line of credit to Great Britain of $1 billion a year for five years. That would provide Britain with Canadian dollars. That would enable Britain to buy the goods we have to sell. That would enable us to sell everything we could produce in the way of goods Britain needs, including all kinds of agricultural products, all kinds of fishery products, all kinds of food, clothing, shelter that we produce. We could sell them to Britain as fast as we could produce them and in as great quantities as we could produce them. We could sell not only what we can now produce but what we could come to produce. It would also enable us to sell those goods at a price which we need to sell them at, having produced them in Canada which has a high standard of living.

The United States could have a similar arrangement. If they lent billions of dollars between 1920 and 1928, they can go on doing the same thing. The question then arises: where are you going to get the money? I am going to repeat one thing more which many hon. members in the committee will not accept, but I warn them that if they do not accept it, they take a fearful responsibility for the welfare of the people of the world. Yes, I know there are many people who laugh and who are not a bit concerned about the chaos we are going through. They do not laugh about a terrible war. The hon. member opposite waves his hands in a perfectly ridiculous way. He does not mind driving the country into a depression for five, six, seven or eight years. He does not mind going to war or subjecting the people to five or six years of war. But when it comes to adopting a new idea financially, he cannot do that.

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps, I might suggest to the hon. member that this is not the time to discuss financial methods or schemes. I would therefore ask him to confine his remarks to trade and commerce.

Mr. Blackmore: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. But the question Your Honour needs to ponder between now and tomorrow, or the next time he comes in, is how we can carry on trade and commerce without finance. I think probably you will find that to be a rather difficult problem to answer. But in deference to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, I will close by merely saying this. The constitution of the United States gives to the congress of the United States the power to create money debt-free and to determine the value thereof. If the United States lent money which she created debt-free under her constitution, as Lincoln created it, she could go on with that foreign lending policy indefinitely, at no cost to her people, providing people abroad with all the money they need to buy all the goods the United States wants to sell.

The Chairman: Order. I think the hon. member will have to find another occasion on which to make these remarks as to methods of finding money or other financial matters.

Mr. Blackmore: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I will merely make this statement in closing. Under the British North America Act Canada can do exactly the same thing as regards creating debt-free money that the United States could do under the U.S. constitution. If she does that, she can lend money with which to buy all her surpluses in Britain or abroad. And that is the only way whereby Canada or the United States can enable the various nations to obtain United States and Canadian dollars without accepting into their economy goods which are bound to destroy the invulnerability of their economies.

Mr. Hosking: Mr. Chairman, I wish to rise to take part in this debate for just a few minutes in order to make clear to some of the members of the committee a few of the facts, as I have observed them, since coming into the House of Commons in 1949, with regard to the prosperity of this country and how it has been achieved. From the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth we heard numerous criticisms, and from the Minister of Trade and Commerce we have heard of their inaccuracies. Then the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, in a complementary manner, told us that Canada had recently enjoyed several years of prosperity and that he did not think the ministers—particularly the Minister of Trade and Commerce—should accept the credit for these prosperous years.

I should like to recall that in 1949, during the debates at that time, the opposition members—both the Conservatives and the C.C.F.—suggested that we would have a ruinous economy unless we had controls and with them the necessary rationing. Our government, in its wisdom, saw fit not to adopt those measures. Possibly it is that feature of good, sound, government policy which has helped more than the opposition will admit to give us the prosperity which we have enjoyed in this country.

When the estimates were under discussion in 1950, I can well recall both the Conservatives and the C.C.F. suggesting to us that unless we launched on a terrific program of public works, we would have tremendous unemployment. Our government—and particularly the Minister of Trade and Commerce—explained to them that this was not the time to go into a program of public works. He in his wisdom, along with the rest of his colleagues, did not listen to the suggestions that were put out, and the cost of living dropped a little because essential commodities were not used in huge works programs. I should like to point out to the member for Rosetown-Biggar that the federal government did deserve some of the credit for the good times that we have enjoyed as a result of not taking the advice of the opposition.

In 1951, of course, the Korean war was on, and I think this might be a good time to suggest to the member for Rosetown-Biggar that the Korean situation is not a blessing because we have had good times as a result of it. No war is a blessing at any time. Any man who has taken part in any of these wars resents any person suggesting that war is a good thing even if it creates good times.

Mr. Thatcher: I am sure if the hon. member had heard the speech, he would know that was not the meaning at all.

Mr. Hosking: Nevertheless, if you read Hansard you will see that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar implied that we have got good times as a result of the war and that it was a good thing.

Mr. Thatcher: No, no, that it is not a good thing.

Mr. Hosking: I should like to make it perfectly clear that is the interpretation—

Mr. Thatcher: I think the member for Wellington South wishes to be fair, and I think he would agree that the leader of this party certainly did not mean we were glad because we had the Korean war.

Mr. Hosking: I am just going by what he said. He suggested it was because of the war we had good times, and not as a result of the things the Minister of Trade and Commerce did.

Mr. Thatcher: That is a different thing.

Mr. Hosking: The inference is that war is a good thing because it brought good times.

Mr. Low: The inference is that the only way which the economy can work is through war.

An hon. Member: Are you making that statement?

Mr. Low: I am making that statement right now that the only way the economy of this country, as managed by this government, can continue is through war, but that does not make war a good thing.

Mr. Hosking: I certainly agree with you that no war is a good thing, and I do not like anyone to suggest it is creating good times.

Mr. Low: It does create good times, and that is the only way we have had good times.

Mr. Hosking: That may be your opinion, but it certainly is not mine, and I am glad a Liberal government is governing the country instead of one with your opinions.

Mr. Low: Produce the evidence that it does not.

Mr. Hosking: Let me suggest to you—

The Chairman: Order. Will the hon. member address himself to the Chair.

Mr. Hosking: Let me suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that in 1950 when this Korean war broke out, the opposition were suggesting that we should again put on price controls. The government, in its wisdom, decided that we would put on the credit restrictions and taxes which were of a beneficial nature to all the people of this country because they brought down the cost of living. I should like to suggest that now that we have successfully combated the inflation which was brought about by the Korean situation the government, in its last budget, has made a very substantial effort to create employment and good times by removing those controls which a year ago it was necessary to impose.

It is with these thoughts in mind that I would recall to hon. members of the house, through you Mr. Chairman, that this government, with its sound judgment; because it was not driven into huge public works expenditures at the wrong time; because it did not put on controls and rationing at the wrong time; and with its policy of pay-as-you-go, has created the good times that we have enjoyed in this country. I think, Mr. Chairman, I should make it clear to the house that we do appreciate what the Minister of Trade and Commerce has done when he tells us that under the Liberal government we have sold all the products we have produced in this country during the past year at the highest prices that we have ever had. I should like to pay him a tribute at this time.

Mr. Coldwell: On a matter of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I understand that while I was absent from the chamber the hon. member said I had made a statement that war was a good thing. I do not know how any such interpretation could be put on anything I have said or have ever said. I think it is a most abominable thing, and a great danger to the peaceful commerce of the world.

Mr. Hosking: I said that you had said that war had created good times, and that the Minister of Trade and Commerce should not take credit for that.

Mr. Coldwell: That is a distortion of what I said.

Mr. Thatcher: May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon we heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce give us another of his typically optimistic trade speeches. As a matter of fact, I suppose most Canadians find it rather refreshing to hear the optimism of the minister, but I think this afternoon he perhaps went too far. He accused the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth of distorting the facts, when the hon. member suggested that our British markets are disappearing. Well, I shall not accuse the Minister of Trade and Commerce of distortion, but I certainly do accuse him of gross inaccuracies this afternoon, and of making misleading statements. I draw the attention of the committee to two or three of the statements which he made. He said that we have sold more to Britain in the last twelve months than we have ever sold in the history of this country, war years or no war years. I ask hon. members to look at that again. What are the facts? I have in my hand a publication which is put out by the dominion bureau of statistics, I believe a department under the minister. It is called "Canadian Balance of International Payments for 1951." I turn to page 13 and there I find a statement of the Canadian domestic exports to the United Kingdom from 1948 to 1951. In 1951, the year the minister is speaking about, Canada exported to Great Britain $631 million worth of goods. That is the figure that is supposed to be the all-time peak. Yet in another column I find that in 1948 we exported goods valued at $686 million to Great Britain and in 1949 $705 million. So I say this afternoon, when the minister made such a statement, he was absolutely inaccurate. He went on further this afternoon: We have not lost our export market to Britain; we are up 37 per cent over the previous year. Well, technically the minister was correct; they were 37 per cent over 1950. But what the minister forgot to tell this committee was that exports were down very considerably as compared with 1948, and down even more substantially as compared with 1949. Therefore I do not think that this statement was technically accurate. The minister went on to say: Canada has found markets for everything it could produce. I wish that some of the apple growers of Nova Scotia had been here this afternoon and heard the minister make the statement. The hon. member for Cape Breton South told me that down in his part of the country they are paying apple growers $5 a tree to dig up their trees, because they cannot find any markets for their apples.

I hold in my hand the supplementary estimates passed by this House of Commons on March 31, and I find item 568, $1,200,000, "to provide assistance to the apple growers in British Columbia"; item 569 is for $300,000, to provide assistance to the apple growers in Nova Scotia. If the minister could sell all the apples that he could find, why are the taxpayers paying those subsidies? I wish he would explain.

When the minister suggested that he has no marketing troubles today he was overlooking beef, despite what he said; because, while this new agreement which was announced several days ago is a very important factor in the marketing of beef, yet certainly it is not going to take more than 15 per cent or 20 per cent of the exports which we had last year to the United States. While the new agreement will help for two or three months, at the end of that time we are going to be back precisely where we were before. I think most hon. members do not honestly believe that the American embargo will be lifted for a year or two years at the earliest. If that is the case we are going to have very real difficulties in marketing beef before very long.

Mr. Ferrie: What do you know about beef?

Mr. Thatcher: When I look at the hon. member, I don't think he knows too much.

There is one other point. In the figures which the minister put on the record this afternoon, he said that our exports to Britain in 1951 were greater than they were in 1950.

That is technically true, as I said; but the point he did not mention was that many of those increases were caused by increases in war materials which we sent to that country. I quote from the same chart again and I find that aluminum, for instance, jumped from $39 million to $57 million; zinc and lead from $14 million to $40 million; and other nonferrous metals from $34 million to $55 million. The all-important point, as I see it tonight, is that our markets for farm products in Great Britain have been sharply decreased, and I use this chart again to bear out that statement. Wheat, for instance, went from $173 million in 1950 down to $159 million last year. Bacon and hams from $24·4 million down to $0·6 million; cheese, from $15 million down to $8 million, and so on. Mr. Chairman, Canadian agriculture is facing at this time a very real crisis. It is facing that crisis because of one factor, namely, that we have been losing many of our traditional British markets.

This afternoon the minister pointed out, as he has done many times in the past, that we found alternative markets in the United States. I give him credit for that fact; it was no mean achievement; but, as was repeatedly pointed out this afternoon, that United States market is a vulnerable one. Last year two-thirds of our exports went down to that country.

Now, in the past the United States market has always been vulnerable. We had a very good example a few months ago. We entered the Geneva agreement, or signed the Geneva agreement, hoping that it would have better trade possibilities than the old imperial preferences, and I think probably it will have. But only a few months ago we had a very good indication that the Americans can render the terms of that agreement null and void at any time they wish. The American congress did exactly that when the matter of Canadian cheese was concerned.

While I am on that subject I would ask the minister to explain why the government has been so vacillating in trying to get the Americans to remove that discrimination which is contrary to the treaty. Perhaps the government should consider some retaliatory action.

So I say the American market is a most vulnerable reed upon which to base better Canadian trade. What would happen in the Dominion of Canada if in the next presidential election Senator Taft should become president? I do not for one moment deny that Senator Taft has many sterling qualities. In many ways no doubt he would be a good president; but the fact remains that he is, or at least he has been in the past, a man who has advocated higher tariffs. And if those higher tariffs should come about, Canada could very suddenly lose a substantial portion of her American market. Therefore I say it is sensible for us in Canada, while there is still time, to try to diversify our markets. This afternoon the hon. member for Lethbridge made some rather interesting remarks as to what should be done. It is pretty well obvious to all that the best alternative market for farm products at the present time is in Great Britain. There can be no doubt about it. The minister himself admitted the British would like to buy our cheese. He said they did like to buy our salmon, but they have not the dollars to do it.

I must contend that a large part of the fault for that fact lies at the doorstep of this government, because the British leaders have told us since the war—not once but a hundred times—that the only way they could continue to buy from us in the same quantities was for us to increase our purchases from them. In other words they said that harsh economic facts force them to bring their Canadian purchases in line with their Canadian sales. They told us that years ago.

I think the government has been apathetic in devising ways of increasing British imports into this country, and thus permitting them to earn more dollars. Britain's plight today is perhaps even more dangerous than it has been in the past. They are still short of dollars. Only last January the commonwealth ministers met, and after that meeting there was a sharp curtailment of purchases made in dollar countries. So the future, to say the least, is not bright.

I feel there are two or three steps the government could take which would enable the British to increase their purchases in Canada, and thus stabilize our farm market. It seems to me that the first sensible step should be for us to decrease our tariff against British goods, whenever it is possible within existing treaty regulations. I think there are certain places we could do that. In the second place I suggest to the minister that our government should embark upon a vigorous "buy British" campaign, right from St. John's, Newfoundland, across to Victoria, British Columbia.

I look at page 486 of the estimates and I find we have 398 employees in the trade commissioner service abroad. They are in about 50 different foreign cities. Most of them are doing a good job; but I think if only 50 of those employees came back to Canada for a few months and got in touch with Canadian importers, a great deal of good could be done. If these commissioners went to the importers, and explained to them why it was necessary for us to "buy British", and how important it was to the economies of both countries, I believe they would meet with a great deal of co-operation.

Out in Saskatchewan several years ago the Hudson Bay association tried a somewhat similar campaign, when they went to wholesalers, manufacturers and importers and asked them wherever possible to buy British goods, and to bring them by way of the Hudson bay route. Their campaign met with substantial success—perhaps not as much as they would have wished, but enough to have made the effort well worth while.

I repeat that if the government would give leadership in this "buy British" campaign, through its own trade commissioners, it would be a real step forward and would help the British to earn dollars.

The third step which I think could be taken would be for the government to express its willingness to go into unorthodox trading methods such as barter and exchange, or something of that nature. After all, with a surplus of beef and of cheese, and with surpluses of other commodities, and with the fact that many countries need food, it seems to me that any exchange method should be tried.

In the coming year I suggest that the Department of Trade and Commerce give a good deal of attention to trade with Japan and Germany. Now that a peace treaty has been signed with one of these countries, and will be signed soon with the other, there should be real potential possibilities with those countries. Before the war we traded with them very considerably. Both these countries have heavy populations and need food.

Finally, the department should not overlook the possibility of trading with certain countries behind the iron curtain. Britain herself has not overlooked that possibility. In this connection I should like to quote a paragraph from an Associated Press dispatch of Monday, April 14, which states:

> Estimates of new east-west trade which may result from the Soviet-sponsored international economic conference here grew by leaps and bounds today . . . A source with the British delegation predicted Britain may get £50 million worth of new business with Russia, China and other communist countries.

I do not know to what extent trade with those nations is possible; but I think Canada must beware lest we become separated from important channels of trade. Those are countries which could absorb a good deal of our merchandise. I realize at once that we would have to be careful to see that strategic war materials did not go to them.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): This afternoon we listened to a speech by the Minister of Trade and Commerce which I did not think was quite up to his usual level. I have no doubt that when the minister makes decisions, as he does from time to time—and we all know and respect his capacity—he exposes all sides of the problem. What disappointed me as I listened to him this afternoon was that we were really just hearing one of those rather tiresome bits of self-congratulation which, I suppose, please those who utter them, but which I do not think add greatly to the amount of human knowledge on the subject.

Apparently at the end of that speech we were supposed to sing the Te Deum and call it a day, because when the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth undertook to make some critical observations the minister seemed to be extremely nettled, and proceeded to embark upon a series of observations which surprised me and which, as I say, did not do him much credit.

He began by saying, "We have just listened to a political speech filled with inaccuracies which should be answered immediately". And then the minister purported to answer the inaccuracies. But so far as I could discover, what he did was not to answer inaccuracies but rather to explain certain difficulties which are in the way of trade—and which of course we all recognize. He said, "I am taking every item of my hon. friend's speech and turning it inside out to show the ridiculous nature of the situation". That does not seem to me to be a very sensible way to begin a speech.

Having said that, the minister then went on, first of all, to the item of oats. He quarrelled, not with the facts which the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth stated; he undertook to say—this was a legitimate argument to make—that oats are usually consumed at home and therefore the figure which was given was misleading.

Then we got to cheese. The minister talked a lot about cheese, quite sensibly on the whole, but then he finally wound up by saying that this was entirely a matter where the Ontario government was to blame. It seemed to me that that was a very poor performance after what he had undertaken to do, which was to take every item in my hon. friend's speech and turn it inside out.

Then he shifted away entirely from the British market, which perhaps was wise because after all it is in the United States that our trade has chiefly grown. Then he talked about our export market as a whole and resumed his usual rather boastful line. We are all glad that our exports have increased and all that we are asking is that the minister try to give us, as he would in any business discussion, a picture of our position. He should not just tell us the favourable things without indicating that there are some hazards to the position. He knows better than any of us that there are certain producers in the country having a bad time. He knows probably better than any of us the reason for that. All that we ask is that he does not shy away from these things and treat us like little children. All that we ask is that he treat this House of Commons as he would treat any serious group of men.

Then he made one statement which I did not quite understand, although this may have been due to his being in an impatient mood. He asked the hon. member to subside and then went on to make a rather curious statement. He said that the hon. member "must be sure he was wrong because he was so persistent in throwing my statement off balance." I am sure the minister will be glad to explain what that means. I do not know exactly what it means. At any rate it did not live up to what he had said at first, that he was going to turn the statements inside out. So much for that.

As I say, what I have to complain about in the minister's speech is that I think we are entitled to be treated as more or less mature people and be given a picture of the situation. As I have said, the minister knows that there are people in this country who are suffering from unemployment. He knows the situation in the textile industry. He knows the situation in the pulp business, no doubt better than any of us. Those are the things which are relevant and which should be brought to our attention when we are discussing these matters.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw raised some very relevant matters with regard to the United States. Anyone who has the slightest knowledge of economic history will appreciate what the hon. member for Moose Jaw, and I think also the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar pointed out, that it is a chancy business to deal with the United States. I remember a senior member of the Republican party, a gentleman who is still active in United States politics, who said something to me some years ago which registered deeply in my mind. He said, "Of course, you people in Canada must face the fact that if business should become not so good and we have surpluses here you will find that we will again become tariff minded." As a matter of fact there are indications of that right now.

Mr. Stick: Who said that?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not going to mention the name, which is well known. My hon. friend will have to take my word for it that this gentleman is quite a well-known Republican. That is what he said and there are many indications to bear it out. As a matter of fact the minister has told us the difficulty they are having in getting the United States to carry out some of the undertakings made at Torquay and elsewhere. When we come to question time I hope we will be able to learn a good deal about the aftermath of Torquay, Annecy and Geneva because that is most important.

At the present time the signs are not all favourable. There is a considerable emergence of applications for tariff increases. I have a list here covering the applications pending right now, some of them not so important but others rather important. They cover chinaware, motorcycles, tobacco pipes and bowls, bicycle parts and so on. Those are not basic things, but nevertheless they indicate what is in the air. The minister is really like a bull on the stock market. He thinks everything is going to go on in the same pleasant way and we will not have to take into account the possibilities of changes.

Mr. Ferrie: As long as he manages things, it will be all right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is all right. I suppose what hon. members here would like us to do is to take the advice given by one hon. member the other day, that we should get down on our knees and thank God for the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: Say that again.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): So far as I can see, every member on the government side applauded. That indicates that it is unanimous. I do not raise any question about that. I suppose we do not need to go down on our knees in thankfulness for the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but we should offer some appropriate sign of obeisance.

Mr. Ferrie: There is no better in the world.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): This hero worship is a grand thing, but it must become rather tiresome occasionally to the objects of it. On the whole, I think that is a competition we cannot very well enter into because hon. members opposite would leave us far behind.

I should like to refer to what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said this afternoon. It seemed to me that he talked in a most sensible way. I do not always agree with him in connection with economic things, and I was not in favour of his bulk buying passages, but nevertheless when he spoke about eggs in one basket and trying to look at the question in the broad, I think he was very sensible indeed.

Of course it is true that our home market is much more important than it was years ago. To a certain extent that takes care of our home production to a greater degree than before. Nevertheless, as I said before, there are enough farmers in this house to know that when we are told that everything is for the best in the best of all possible worlds they are not sure that that applies to them. It would be a very sorry substitute, it would be a bad exchange if we had to give up a lot of farmers living on the soil and able to sell their products profitably for the oil rigs that are coming in and spending United States money in Canada. Of course we are all in favour of that, but we are in danger of looking at these dazzling figures which are given us of the money we have, the gold we have and the United States exchange and all that kind of thing. That does not mean much to the man on the land who is not able to sell his goods.

Therefore, as I said at the beginning: I hope from now on the minister will perhaps realize that at any rate we are grown up and take us into his confidence.

Item agreed to.

443. Trade commissioner service, including payment of compensation to trade commissioners for damage to and loss of furniture and effects, under terms and conditions approved by the governor in council, $2,329,134.

Mr. Charlton: I notice in the particulars on page 487 the second highest payment is in connection with Caracas. Could the minister explain that?

Mr. Howe: Caracas has the highest cost of living in the world and it is necessary to pay our trade commissioners substantial living allowances to bring them into the same position they would be in if they lived in Canada. I might explain that the salaries of trade commissioners are based on living conditions in Canada, and if living conditions in any country are higher than in Canada compensation is paid accordingly.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does that mean it is entirely done through the medium of salary or that it is done through an adjusted expense allowance?

Mr. Howe: The salaries of the trade commissioners are the same no matter where the commissioner is located. If he is located in Canada or anywhere else in the world he gets the same salary, but over and above that he gets a living allowance based on the cost of living in the country in which he is located compared with Canada.

444. Information division, including publicity and advertising in Canada and abroad, $177,854.

Mr. Wright: Are motion pictures used in your advertising campaign abroad?

Mr. Howe: Yes. Moving pictures are used quite extensively. Most of them are obtained from the film board but in addition the department occasionally makes a film at its own expense for some particular purpose such as selling a particular product.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): To be perfectly candid, I am surprised at the smallness of this item. Is this the whole? Are there any other figures for information, publicity or advertising of any kind? Are there no salaries? Is this the whole story?

Mr. Howe: Yes, except for the trade fair. We have an item later to cover the trade fair. As a matter of fact we use the trade fair advertising not only for the trade fair but for institutional advertising for Canadian products. The department does not advertise in Canada. All the advertising is in other countries, and this is the cost of it.

Mr. Blackmore: Would it be in order to ask the minister on this or some other item to give the details of trade that he was anxious to give us this afternoon in reply to the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth. He was going to give us a breakdown of the exports to Great Britain and other British commonwealth countries. I would really like to have that on record in order to know what it is. Could that be given under this item, or some other item that the minister might name?

Mr. Howe: You would like to know what commodities we export to Britain?

Mr. Blackmore: I would really like to have the minister give a thorough reply to the speech of the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth, not that I want the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth to be answered but because I want the information. It seems to me that he made a very valuable contribution, and if the minister has anything that would relieve our minds on any of these matters we certainly want to hear him.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. Howe: I gave the over-all figures. The hon. member for Brant-Wentworth made his case on the point that in 1938 we supplied 40 per cent of Great Britain's imports and in the year 1951 we supplied a smaller percentage. Of course that is quite misleading because Great Britain's imports were very much smaller both in volume and in value in 1938 than they were in 1951. Total imports of Great Britain from all sources were about $800 million in 1938. The total value of Canadian exports for the year 1952, if our forecast is correct, will not be far short of $800 million. You may say that there has been inflation to the extent of 100 per cent over 1938. As a matter of fact it is not that high, but in that case even in constant dollars our exports to Great Britain would be about 50 per cent of the imports they were making in 1938 compared with the 40 per cent we supplied in that year. The point I am making is that we are supplying more goods to Great Britain today in volume than we supplied in 1938.

Mr. Quelch: I think the thing that concerns a good many of us is the fact that in recent months the government has actually advised farmers against expanding their production. The minister has pointed out that the government has been able to market their products up to date but in spite of that fact they have warned farmers that if they expand their production there may not be a market for it. Could the government not make some arrangement with the sterling area by which that increased production could be made available to them? I have in mind, for instance, what is happening between Canada and the United States today. We have a serious unbalance of trade with the United States, somewhere in the neighbourhood of $524 million, but on account of large-scale American investment in this country we have had the dollars with which to make up that deficit. If we were willing to accept sterling from Great Britain for our surplus production and then invest that sterling in Great Britain in the same way that the United States is investing in Canada we would in that way provide a market for any increase in production that the farmers are able to accomplish.

Mr. Howe: I am not aware that anyone has asked the farmers to curtail production. I certainly have not. There is nothing I should like better than to have more wheat, oats, barley and rye. I will not say more flax because flax is a domestic crop. I wish my hon. friend would tell me who suggested that quantities should be reduced.

Mr. Quelch: I will give the minister my reasons. I have here a speech made by the Minister of Agriculture before commission I of FAO on November 23, 1951. This is what he said:

> Our barley supplies are better than ever before, and our oat supplies above the long-time average. These, together with our feed wheat position, make it possible to produce more meat and dairy products . . . I am afraid this increased production of meat and dairy products will not materialize unless fears are removed from the minds of our farmers. The meat and dairy farmer has no assurance he could dispose of his surplus if it were produced. His experience suggests to him that there is no outlet.

That statement was broadcast across Canada by various farm organizations, and Mr. Hannam in commenting upon it stated that farmers would be crazy to expand their production with that situation. Then again, when the Minister of Agriculture spoke before the Canadian Federation of Agriculture convention a month ago, he had this to say, as found in the Western Producer of January 31, 1952:

> Warning farmers against embarking on highly stepped-up production of food for the domestic market, Mr. Gardiner said earnestly that it was true the government did want to see production up. But as long as Britain lacked the dollars to buy Canadian cheese and bacon and eggs he was not going to tell any farmer to produce more hogs, more eggs or more cheese.

A statement of that kind is of course bound to discourage food production especially when it comes from the Minister of Agriculture. I do suggest that if we in Canada were prepared to adopt measures similar to those adopted by the United States with respect to Canada, the making of large-scale investments, if we were prepared to accept sterling for a certain amount of our meat shipped to England and then invest that sterling, thus increasing the productivity of Great Britain, there would be no trouble in disposing of our production. In that way we would increase the productivity of Britain so that they would have more exports with which to buy other imports. We would be doing exactly the same thing as the United States is doing with respect to Canada. I do not know whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce considers large-scale American investment in Canada a good thing for this country. I presume he does. The Minister of Finance said he did not think there was any harm in it. It is a good thing for the United States and Canada. I suggest we could reciprocate by doing the same thing with the sterling area, and in that way provide them with the dollars with which to buy our products and at the same time help to expand their productive capacity.

Mr. Howe: I think the farmer is in the same position as almost anyone else. He must consider the crop that will give him the greatest return. For instance, now that the foot-and-mouth disease is shutting us out of a good many markets for beef, I would not think this would be a good time for the farmer to expand his beef production. Anyone who produces anything must gauge his market and shape his course accordingly. On the other hand, instead of feeding his coarse grains to livestock the farmer can find a ready market for those coarse grains, and as he tapers off one type of production he can build up another. Conditions change from year to year in any business. For instance, a manufacturer of stoves has to size up his market for the current year before he can plan his production. That applies to anyone who manufactures anything, and to some extent it applies also to the farmer. He must size up the future too. I spent a good part of my early years on the farm, and I know a great topic of conversation among my elders was what they should plant this year, what would seem to have the best prospect of success.

Nevertheless if my hon. friend will look at the gross farm income over the years I think he will find that farm production has not been going down. As a matter of fact it has been going up. I think 1950-51 showed the biggest over-all income for the farming community of any year in history. If we have good crops in the fall it is probable that 1952 will be a still bigger year as far as farm income is concerned.

Mr. Quelch: I would agree that farm production has been high, and that until the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease prices were fairly satisfactory, generally speaking. But changing over from livestock to grain is not as simple as some of the other things the minister referred to. It is a simple matter to change over from wheat to oats or oats to barley, but the production of livestock is a long-term proposition. You cannot change pasture into cultivated land overnight. We hope that in the not far distant future the foot-and-mouth disease will be cleared up and then no doubt the United States market will be opened again and we will be able to ship our cattle there.

Mr. Howe: I would like to correct my hon. friend. I did not suggest that people should cut back on livestock. I said it would not be a good year to expand livestock production.

Mr. Quelch: But I think the government should give attention to this whole question of finding ways and means of getting rid of surplus production. If instead of statements such as the one I read by the Minister of Agriculture the government would say to the farmers: there is a tremendous shortage of food in the world; there are many nations with millions of people on the verge of starvation; through the United Nations we have pledged to do everything in our power to maintain production at the highest possible levels and therefore we want you farmers to expand your production as much as possible, I am satisfied you could get a large increase in the production of livestock. But you cannot expect the farmer to do it without some assurance that when he does increase production it will not be used as an excuse to force prices down. So often we are told that we must be governed by the law of supply and demand, but if that argument is used we will not get a greater expansion of farm production than is taking place already. If on the other hand assurance could be given that the government would find a policy under which surplus production would reach the nations that need it, either in Europe or in Asia, I am satisfied there would be a large increase.

I do not intend any reflection upon the minister, for whom I have a high regard. I think he has done a remarkable job in moving wheat supplies in these difficult years.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend asked why we did not do as the United States is doing. I would not like it to be suggested that we have done any less than the United States. We have given over $3 billion in outright gifts and in loans in the last seven or eight years to tide over our customers, and I would not say that door was closed. But I did point out that we have been disposing of our surpluses.

My hon. friend says we might produce more livestock, but in that connection he must keep in mind that we live in a cold country. Generally speaking our cattle have to go under shelter in winter and be fed grain that has been put aside for that purpose. We are competing in the United Kingdom with Argentina, a country with a mild climate, where a steer never has a roof over its head until it walks into the abattoir on its final journey. The stocker cattle are raised in the south. Then they are moved up on foot to the lush country around the river Plate, where they feed on alfalfa. There they are fattened and driven down to the abattoir, from where the beef is shipped to England. The situation is very much the same in New Zealand, where the cattle never go under a roof. It is the same in Australia, though unfortunately drought affects a section of that country and makes the raising of cattle more hazardous than in either Argentina or New Zealand.

However, the fact remains that in trying to raise cattle for Britain in Canada we are competing with countries that can raise cattle for much less, as witness the fact that in New Zealand today, as we find under this cattle transaction of ours, they are accustomed to put frozen beef on board a boat, and are doing it under contract with Great Britain, at 14 cents a pound. To put that same frozen beef on a boat from Canada to Great Britain costs 48 cents a pound.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Howe: Because we are guaranteeing the producer $26 on the hoof.

An hon. Member: It is $25 at Toronto.

Mr. Howe: My memory is not too accurate, but I think it is $26 for choice and $25 for good steers.

Mr. Fair: There is one point in connection with the 1951 farm income that should not be lost sight of; that is, that included in this amount is the balance of payments on wheat crops from 1945 to 1949, which amounted to many millions of dollars. That should be segregated from the other farm income.

Mr. Aylesworth: From what the minister said a few moments ago I take it he would suggest that under our climatic conditions our farmers should produce only one commodity, perhaps wheat and coarse grains.

Mr. Howe: Oh, no. I was talking to a westerner, but I did not say we should raise only one commodity. My hon. friend is attempting to put those words in my mouth. I was talking about beef as against wheat, oats and barley. My hon. friend can make his own speech.

Mr. Aylesworth: The minister distinctly suggested that this country was not suited to the raising of beef cattle.

Mr. Howe: For the British market.

An hon. Member: In competition.

Mr. Aylesworth: What do you want to say? Say it now. I have never heard you make yourself clear on anything since I have been here, and I am sure you will not be clear on this. If the minister or the government have now reached the point, because of the position in which we find ourselves, that they feel this country is not suited to the raising of beef cattle, then I would say the same thing applies to hens. We have to house our hens for a great part of the year. We also have to house our hogs, so we are not on an equal basis with Australia, New Zealand, and these other countries with warm climates where the stock can run out and graze on grass for twelve months of the year. That also applies to dairy cattle. From what the minister has just said, are we to take it that we should not be raising anything in this country except grain? I am sure he would not suggest that we produce more cheese under present conditions. Eggs, and in fact everything that the farmer grows today in eastern Canada, are under the same handicap when compared with the situation in that regard in other countries. In my opinion, in so far as the cheese situation is concerned, if the United Kingdom market cannot be regained for our surplus, I believe that the government should institute a program that would encourage the people of Canada to eat far more cheese than they are eating today. If we encouraged the people to eat an average of only one pound more of cheese, we would have taken care of approximately 14 million pounds. Another thing I believe the government should do is to discontinue the prohibition against the sale of cheese until it is at least three months old. Many people prefer cheese at a much earlier stage of its development. I feel that if we could conduct some kind of selling program of that nature, we could take care of a great deal of our surplus cheese.

I should like now to mention the position with regard to beef cattle. I hope I am not out of order in mentioning this now; but if I am, the chairman can draw it to my attention. Within the last few years, especially during the time when we had controls in this country, I believe much harm has been done. The government educated the trade of this country—I am now referring more particularly to the retail meat stores—into taking a larger spread. The trade was told during those years, as I am sure every hon. member here will recall, that they could take a certain spread. I know that in several places inspectors who were appointed by the government told storekeepers that they were not charging sufficient for a certain piece of meat. They were told that they were allowed to charge a certain price, and that is what they should charge. I can say this, that I think the government did a good job in educating the retail trade in that respect. I feel and have felt for some time that something should be done. I do not believe in dictatorship or anything of that sort, and I do not mean that, but I think that the government could issue a warning to the retail trade of this country that they have not been fair to either the producers or the consumers of this country.

Hon. members will recall that last January the price of beef dropped a few cents. The unfortunate outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease caused the market to drop a few cents more, and in round figures I think the total drop amounted to about 10 cents a pound live weight for beef cattle. This meant that the wholesale price of beef dropped about 20 cents a pound. I can assure you that you can go into many stores in this country today and find that the consumer is not getting the benefit of that 20-cent reduction. I am sure that if the retail price of beef had dropped as much as the wholesale price the consuming public would be buying beef today at more than 20 cents a pound less than they were paying for it at the beginning of the year. I do feel that the government should issue some statement that would show the trade that the wholesale price has dropped, and therefore there should be an equal drop in the retail price.

I have been speaking particularly about beef, Mr. Chairman, but the same thing applies to pork and everything else. I have been speaking about beef because I think that the price of pork has dropped more fairly. If the price of beef had dropped 22, 23 or 24 cents a pound, then the consumer could have bought much more than he did. The labouring man would have bought far more beef than he has up to the present time, and in that way I think we would have found a market for some of this surplus meat. I will agree that at the end of last year beef prices did reach a high level; in fact they reached a point which was not good for the trade. The price reached a level where the labouring man had to eat less meat, and so today we find ourselves with surplus beef. We find also that the consumer is still paying several cents a pound more for the meat that he is buying than he should be asked to pay. I am only drawing this to the attention of the ministry—I see the Minister of Agriculture smiling, and the problem is one which falls more within his department than that of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

As I say, I do feel that some statement should be issued by the government. As the Minister of Agriculture said the other night when he was speaking about eggs, if the trade charges too great a spread on eggs, then in October those merchants would find that the government would not take care of their surplus eggs. I believe that if a similar statement were issued concerning beef prices, it would be of some benefit to the consumer. In that way we would also find a greater market for our surplus beef.

The Chairman: May I remind hon. members that we have had a general discussion on the first item, departmental administration. At that time the general economic conditions and outlook were discussed. I would not want to have another general discussion on this item merely because it calls for the payment of salaries to a director of a division, five or six economists, stenographers and typists. The hon. member for Lethbridge opened this discussion and said he had his doubts as to whether it was in order. He asked the minister for certain information which the minister gave. He also informed the committee that part of the information had been given during the afternoon. The member for Acadia and several other members took part in a discussion which has certainly gone much further afield.

I listened to the remarks made by the member for Frontenac-Addington, and I thank him for having said that if he was out of order he would accept the advice the chairman gave. Unfortunately he was not here this afternoon when the general discussion took place, and I thought that if no objections were taken to his remarks he should be allowed to carry on.

Hon. members of the committee should realize that if we are to make successful progress we should not initiate a general discussion on every item which seems to give some scope. This item has to do with payments of salaries to the director of economic research, economists and others. If hon. members will look at it they will find it reads:

Economics division, including conducting of investigations and reporting upon current economic conditions and outlook.

In his opening remarks the minister gave the current economic conditions and outlook. Someone observed that his remarks were optimistic in regard to the picture, and others said other things. Therefore this question was fully discussed. On an item dealing with salaries of those in the department, and of those making reports, are we going to open up the whole matter of trade and commerce throughout the world? I do not think so.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I asked the minister a question. I see that most of the money spent in this economics division is for salaries, or the bulk of it. Looking over these salaries I find that for the type of work done and the qualifications that are usually demanded they are not high. I think that, like a good many salaries in the government service, they are much below the average paid by industry for the same type of service. Where are these economists located? Are all of them in Ottawa, or are some of them attached to various offices overseas? If they are located in Ottawa, what type of work are they doing? Are they writing publications for the department, or making investigations into trends and so on? If they are overseas what are they doing?

Mr. Howe: I agree that the salaries are low for men of the training that these men have. As a matter of fact, we lose them to industry all too quickly. A unit survey has been made recently and salaries are being brought more into line with the laws of supply and demand in the field. The raises are not great. In senior positions the government cannot hope to pay the salaries that private industry will pay for the same service. These men are located in Ottawa. They are located in departmental buildings. Their main function is to obtain fundamental data from the bureau of statistics and interpret them into a form that is useful for government departments. It is a service branch for several government departments. It is used by finance and several other departments of government. I think they are extraordinarily good. I think the heads of the three branches are just about as good economists as you will find anywhere in Canada, or anywhere on the continent—at least their forecasting seems to me to be amazingly accurate, and I cannot speak highly enough of the service they give the government.

Mr. Coldwell: None of them is overseas?

Mr. Howe: No; all in Ottawa.

Mr. Charlton: During the minister's answer to the hon. member for Lethbridge he again made the statement that we exported more goods in volume to Great Britain in 1951 than we had in any previous year. I would now ask the minister, in view of what he said about my statement this afternoon and about my figures, just what products he had in mind. Give us the name of the products that we exported more of to Great Britain last year than ever before. I mean more in volume.

Mr. Howe: It is hard to draw those figures out of the hat. I need to get notice, but I will give the hon. member a few. One would be nickel, another would be copper, another would be zinc and another would be lead. These I am sure of. Another would be aluminum. I could perhaps give the hon. member some more by looking them up, but I will give these without any hesitation. Probably another would be lumber.

Mr. Charlton: I was referring particularly to agricultural products. This afternoon I said that, owing to war conditions and defence conditions in England, there were many goods that we had exported more of, but they were defence items, as the minister has now said. I was referring particularly to agricultural products.

Mr. Howe: I think we exported more wheat and more flour. If we did not last year, we will in the current year export more wheat and more flour to Britain than we have ever exported in history.

Mr. Charlton: I wonder whether we could have those figures?

The Chairman: During the general discussion it appeared clear that the minister did not agree with the statement made by the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth and the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth did not agree with the reply given by the minister. I do not think they will agree any more readily this evening.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): I think I will be in order on this. It was mentioned here this evening that inspectors—this might come under salaries; I understand that inspectors are given salaries if they work for the government—have gone around to retailers in this country and told them that they had to charge more for their products. Would that be a federal inspector? If so, can the minister tell us his salary?

Mr. Howe: They were not federal inspectors, of course. My hon. friend spoke about domestic affairs, and we are discussing export affairs. He would have to go back to the last war when we had price controls. Possibly the wartime prices and trade board have inspectors, but there are at present no federal inspectors, dealing with retail prices, and there have not been any for at least seven years.

I might point out that under the constitution of Canada prices are the responsibility of the provinces, except when certain emergency legislation is in force, which it is not at the present time. Property and civil rights are a function of the provinces. If anyone can control prices it is the provinces. There must be provincial legislation for that purpose. If the federal government attempted to do so, its legislation would be declared ultra vires.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): I have a supplementary question. This is the point I want to get. Were there any government officials setting prices and telling the retailer that he should raise his price? I know there was a price set above which you could not go, but what I am getting at is this. Was there ever a time in the history of Canada, to the minister's knowledge, when a retailer was told he could not lower his price?

Mr. Howe: No.

The Chairman: Order. In order to keep this discussion conducted in an orderly manner I cannot permit questions to be asked on an item which has nothing to do with control prices.

Mr. Coldwell: With all due respect, Mr. Chairman, may I suggest that since a number of hon. members—I was not one of them—were away this afternoon attending committee meetings, and I rather think some of them would have liked to speak on the general item in a more general way, as some of us did, a little latitude might be given.

The Chairman: I would say to the hon. member that I sympathize as much as I can with those who were not here during the general discussion. He will also agree with me that I cannot be governed by my sympathies in the performance of my duties. Therefore the discussion, according to the rules, has to be strictly relevant to the item under discussion. It is always unpleasant for the chairman to intervene and ask hon. members to confine their remarks to the item under discussion. I have always found it very difficult to have this particular rule observed, paragraph 2 of standing order 58. That standing order contains the word "strictly". It says that the remarks must be strictly relevant to the item under discussion. I am afraid that, at times, if some of my colleagues were not kindly disposed toward me they would feel that I am at fault in permitting so many hon. members to disregard the rules. The hon. member for Yale may proceed.

Mr. Jones: I agree with your ruling, Mr. Chairman. Unfortunately, however, during that time in which you allowed a certain amount of latitude, statements were made which I do not think should remain unchallenged. One statement was made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in connection with the varying of crops to avoid surpluses. In general what the minister said is true, but I must say that in my constituency we are tied to an apple, pear and small fruits crop in general, and that crop cannot be varied from year to year. We could not grow apples in one year and potatoes the next. We are tied to a crop that cannot vary. Therefore that principle does not apply.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member is quite right when he says that a certain amount of latitude has been allowed. As a result of that there are bound to be complaints from some hon. members.

However, once the Chair has listened to the initiation of the discussion, and has satisfied himself that it has reached a stage of duplication, such as has now taken place, he must ask hon. members from that point on to confine their remarks to the item before the committee.

If I were to give latitude to the hon. member for Yale, what would the hon. member for Moose Mountain say about it? What would be said by the hon. member for Lethbridge, or the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington, or the hon. member for Greenwood, and so on? They would say, "Well, now that this opportunity has been given to the hon. member for Yale, we may all talk again." Where would we be then? Therefore I must ask hon. members to co-operate.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Wright: I should like to bring to the attention of the Chair a point of order—

The Chairman: Apparently two hon. members are rising to discuss a point of order.

Mr. Wright: I would point out that the item now before us is the economics division, including the conducting of investigations and reporting upon current economic conditions and outlook. I suggest that is a fairly broad item. I do not think any hon. members who have spoken have been very far from the subject, namely, the economic outlook in Canada.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I venture a suggestion? As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar pointed out, there are a good many members who deeply regret they were not here when item 441 was being discussed. Would it be possible for us to return to that item, with consent—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am asking the chairman.

The Chairman: In reply to the hon. member for Melfort I would say that a few moments ago I read the citation from the book. My contention is that this vote has to do with the payment of a director of that division who is conducting investigations and reporting upon current economic conditions. That does not mean that we must discuss over again current economic conditions, and the outlook, which was fully discussed under item 441.

Mr. Graydon: On a point of order; I fancy all hon. members have had experience of this kind at one time or another, that is with the discussion overflowing into another item. I agree that there must be some discipline in a discussion of this kind, but I fancy we would make more progress and you, Mr. Chairman, would be much happier, if we were to revert to item 441 for a few moments, complete that discussion, and then return to our program. I believe this would save time.

The Chairman: I appreciate what has been said by the hon. member for Peel. I am not displeased that the discussion has arisen at this time, because we are now embarking upon the discussion of the estimates, and this point may be raised later on. I know from experience that we are always confronted with the same problem; this is not the first time we have had it.

In committee of supply hon. members are under the impression that, when the first item is called, they are free to discuss matters in general affecting the department, and in that they are correct. But what happens is this: When we come to a subdivision or a subheading under the department, another general discussion ensues. For instance, I see here an item concerning the dominion bureau of statistics. I am reasonably sure that, no matter how much discussion we have had under the administration item with respect to the cost of living, there will be an attempt to discuss it again when we reach the item for the bureau of statistics. And, again, there are items here for the wheat and grain division, and I am sure the whole wheat problem, involving the marketing of wheat, which was discussed on the first item, will be discussed again. Further in the estimates we find that item 458 deals with the Canada Grain Act.

Perhaps hon. members would help me if they would ask themselves what they would do if they were chairman of the committee. How would they have the rules observed, and still be fair to all? At one point or another someone must make a decision, and it just so happens it is my luck to have to do it.

Unless there is unanimous consent we cannot revert to item 441. Is it the wish of the committee to follow the suggestion of the hon. member for Peel that we revert to item 441 and thus reopen the general discussion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Coldwell: I think it would save time to do that.

The Chairman: I hear some hon. members say no.

Mr. Blackmore: Is it necessary that the decision be unanimous?

The Chairman: Oh, yes. The vote has been called, discussed and carried. If we revert to item 441 at this time it must be by unanimous consent, because the item has been carried.

Perhaps hon. members will keep this in mind, that at a later time we are likely to have supplementary estimates dealing with departmental administration. At that time they may have the opportunity to discuss matters in general in connection with the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Blackmore: I suggest that the subject to which the hon. member for Yale referred might properly be discussed under the next item which deals with international trade relations. What would be the reaction of the Chair to having the discussion at that time?

The Chairman: I decide questions of order only when they arise. We are now discussing item 445.

Mr. Jones: I believe I could ask a question which would be relevant, under the heading of economic research. My understanding is that economic research has reference to the ability of other nations to purchase our surplus produce. That being so, what are present indications for the marketing of Okanagan and other Canadian apples in Great Britain this year?

Mr. Howe: The outlook is not good, on account of the dollar shortage.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am not sure if I am in order in asking the question I have in mind. I would ask the minister however if he knows anything with respect to the sale of salt codfish in the European market which, up to this date, has been financed through sterling held by the Canadian government in London.

Mr. Howe: I can report to my hon. friend that our expert on fish tells me that the prospects for the sale of codfish are good.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): In Europe?

Mr. Howe: In Europe and elsewhere.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): How is it to be financed?

Mr. Howe: Well, I think they pay cash for it.

Mr. Blackmore: That means dollars.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If it is still permissible to ask a question, I should like to ask one. The minister referred to economists, and his observation was that the forecasts they made were extremely good. I wish he would say a word further as to the nature of their work. Perhaps he could give us an illustration of the kind of questions put to them, and in particular whether there are any questions affecting the direct conduct of this or that business.

Mr. Howe: The economics division provides economic intelligence service for the department. It undertakes to keep in close touch with economic conditions in Canada and make appraisals of prospective developments. The division replaces the former economics research division and economics forecasting division. In performing these functions the division maintains under review a number of aspects of the general economic situation including production, employment, trade, investment, income and prices as well as conditions in specific industries and areas. These studies are not made elsewhere in a comparable form and are consequently of assistance to associated departments of the government as a whole as well as to our own department.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does this division work entirely separately? There are a considerable number of economic sections throughout the government. I understood the minister to state a minute ago that one of the services this division performs is for his department. Is there a pooling of talent in the various economic divisions throughout the government?

Mr. Howe: There is a pooling of information. Other departments may have problems which are not within the scope of this particular division and for that purpose they may require economists to do work of a different nature than that performed by the economists in the Department of Trade and Commerce. I have given my hon. friend an outline of the work performed for the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister knows his own experts and no doubt thinks highly of them. He knows what their capacities are and what their work is. But who knows the experts in the various departments? Who can assure us that there is no duplication? Who takes an over-all view? It has to be a pretty expert man who is an expert on experts.

Mr. Howe: I can speak only for myself. I assure my hon. friend that I do not do that task, as I am busy enough looking after my own department.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is a very definite but very unsatisfactory answer. If the minister cannot answer my question I think we ought to have some indication where we can get an answer. In view of what the minister has said I do not think there is much point in my pressing it now, but I would like to have an indication as to where it can be pressed because I do not think it should be left unanswered.

Item agreed to.

446. International trade relations division, including investigating and reporting on commercial relations and foreign tariffs and a contribution of $6,300 to the international customs tariffs bureau, $150,156.

Mr. Charlton: Would the minister explain this contribution of $6,300?

Mr. Howe: That is a payment for services. The office in Berne furnishes Canada with every change in tariff made by every country in the world, and we in turn provide that office with any change in our tariffs. The office in Berne pools information received from every country in the world and supplies consolidated information to every country which is a member of the organization.

Mr. Catherwood: Could the minister comment on the businessmen's committee which was set up under the leadership of Mr. Duncan and which I believe worked independently of the Department of Trade and Commerce although it was working along identical lines. Could he indicate just what was accomplished by that committee?

Mr. Howe: In the United Kingdom a dollar export board was formed, the purpose of which was to promote exports to dollar countries. At the request of the dollar export board a dollar-sterling board was formed in Canada under the chairmanship of Mr. Duncan and with a membership of distinguished Canadians, for the most part men in business. The purpose of that board was to work with the dollar board in the same direction, that is to promote exports from the United Kingdom to Canada. I think the Canadian board did a first-rate job.

Any difficulties faced by a Canadian wishing to import equipment or any other commodities from the United Kingdom could be cleared through the board. Delivery problems were cleared, information was obtained as to quality, and other service was rendered by this board to Canadian importers. That board did much to promote the import of British goods into Canada. My hon. friend will recall that some two or three years ago imports from Great Britain exceeded exports to Great Britain in value. In other words, the trade was about in balance at that time. As a result the board in Canada was disbanded and an advisory committee set up in its place. I believe within the last two or three months proposals have been made to revive the dollar-sterling board. Of course the government would be glad to see any step taken that will improve the balance of payments between Canada and Britain. The government had no direct relationship with the dollar-sterling board other than to make a contribution toward the expenses of the board. Part of the money for the support of the board was raised privately and part was contributed by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What relationship has this division to our own tariff board?

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Mr. Howe: It has no relationship with the tariff board. This is the branch of the department concerned with external trade that negotiates trade agreements with other countries. It was the branch that looked after negotiations at Geneva, Annecy and Torquay. It furnished the experts on foreign trade for the Canadian government. These delegations are usually made up of representatives from external affairs and finance, and a man from the tariff board, and expert information on export trade is furnished by this group.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): When you go to Torquay or Geneva you have the tariff board, plus the other departments, plus these representatives from the Department of Trade and Commerce. Is it clear that there is no duplication of tariff work? I can realize that when a trade agreement is being made you must know what the tariff situation is, but we have what is supposed to be an expert tariff board. I certainly believe that it is. I come back to what the minister said in answer to my last question, that he does not consider it any part of his duty to see that there is no duplication.

Mr. Howe: I did not say that.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Are we sure that there is none here?

Mr. Howe: I wish my hon. friend would quote me accurately. I did not say that it was none of my business; I said that I did not know, which is quite different.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): But you know everything that is your business.

Mr. Howe: I would not go that far afield. The tariff board is concerned with domestic tariffs, tariffs of the Canadian government, and this division is concerned entirely with foreign tariffs. They are complementary to each other, but they do not overlap in any particular.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I thought of that one too, strangely enough. How can a tariff be domestic? Tariffs are two-sided things. We make tariffs here; other people make tariffs also, but surely we must study them both at the same time in order to get anywhere.

Mr. Howe: That is why they send experts from the tariff board and from the Department of Trade and Commerce. The tariff board knows all about Canadian tariffs and these men are supposed to know all about the tariffs of other countries and their effect on Canadian trade.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister is not going to leave it at that and have us believe that the Canadian tariff boards knows only about Canadian tariffs. That does not seem to make sense. I am still going to look for the man who can tell me that he is looking for needless duplication. However, the minister says it is not him, or perhaps he says "he".

Item agreed to.

447. Exhibitions generally, $253,236.

Mr. Coldwell: This item is a large amount, and I notice there are what strike me as two relatively small amounts included in the breakdown for the kind of work one would expect to be done. In the details on page 492 we find an item of $5,000 for literature for distribution at exhibitions abroad and an item of $2,500 for displays for trade commissioners' offices. We have a number of trade commissioners abroad, and it struck me that department displays costing only $2,500 would not permit very much of a display even in one or two of the offices. As to literature for distribution at exhibitions abroad, a number of exhibitions are held in European countries and in the United Kingdom, and it seems to me that is a very small amount for literature for this purpose. Perhaps there are other places where money is provided for literature for distribution at exhibitions. Perhaps the minister might explain.

Mr. Howe: There are certain publications that come under the information vote such as the Canadian trade bulletin which is a weekly publication. This is a sum for taking part in exhibits. We build up exhibits over the years. For instance, we have exhibits in Europe that we show at Milan and the various trade fairs in Europe. We add to them each year, freshen them up and bring them up to date, but we try to keep the expense modest because it is questionable in times such as these how much return there is from an exhibit at a trade fair. However, we think a creditable but not lavish job is being done, one which allows us to exhibit at the principal trade fairs in Europe and South America.

Mr. Fleming: In these exhibitions what aspects of Canadian life or Canadian production are featured?

Mr. Howe: It is production that is likely to be sold in the area. In Milan I believe it would be furs. It depends on the nature of the fair. With respect to the British trade fair, at the present time we are concentrating on showing market opportunities for British goods in Canada. We do not put on an exhibit to sell Canadian goods in England because we know we have not much opportunity anyway, and we think we will do the over-all situation more good by advertising opportunities for the sale of British goods in Canada. At the machinery exhibition held in the north of England there are certain Canadian manufacturers who exhibit goods such as heavy construction equipment, stoves and material of that kind that they believe they can sell in the area.

Mr. Thatcher: Would the minister tell us how many exhibitions of this nature were held in the past fiscal year and whether they were all held on foreign soil?

Mr. Howe: They are all foreign. Our only domestic fair is the Canadian trade fair which is covered by a separate vote. We exhibited at the Milan international trade fair, the Brussels international trade fair, the British industries fair, London, the British industries fair, Birmingham, the industrial textile exhibition at Lisle, where we showed furs and textiles, the world tobacco conference at Amsterdam where we exhibited Canadian tobacco, the Colombo plan exhibition at Colombo, Ceylon, where we displayed Canadian technological achievements, and the Canadian permanent exhibit at Rockefeller centre, New York, where we exhibit a series of manufactured products which are changed from time to time.

Mr. McLure: Is there any place where you show furs?

Mr. Howe: We show furs in most of these exhibits.

Mr. Thatcher: I take it from the minister's answer that there are nine fairs overseas in which we participate. Would he say whether they take actual orders for the merchandise exhibited or make any endeavour to sell it? I should also like him to tell me if any of these exhibitions are held in the wintertime.

Mr. Howe: Most of the fairs are held in the wintertime. We take a general exhibit and we encourage Canadian merchants to exhibit as well. The Canadian government does not take orders but the merchants who also exhibit are of course prepared to take orders. They go there for that purpose.

Mr. Bater: I notice that under the item for the Canadian international trade fair, 1951, there is an item under expenditure of $718,087, and an item of $415,043 under revenue. Is the revenue derived from admissions to the fairs and the renting of stalls?

Mr. Howe: Yes. We have not come to that item yet. We are talking about fairs generally. We will come to it in a moment.

Mr. Fleming: With respect to the details on page 492, there are two items here concerning which I should like to know why they are both charged in the present fiscal year. There is an item of $12,000 for participation in the British industries fair, 1952, and an item of $11,000 for participation in the British industries fair, 1953. How does it happen that these two items for two different years are charged in the present fiscal year?

Mr. Howe: The difficulty is the expenses overlap the fiscal years. For example, with respect to the trade fair certain preparatory work has to be done in the preceding fiscal year, and there are certain other expenses that are incurred at the time the fair is actually in progress. The trade fair is typical, and the work of preparing for the 1952 trade fair started the week after the 1951 trade fair was finished. Considerable expenditure for advertising and various other purposes is incurred in the fiscal year previous to the actual date of the fair.

Mr. Fleming: Looking at what happened last year, then, I presume we can expect a further item in next year's estimates covering the balance of expenditures for 1953?

Mr. Howe: That is right.

Mr. Quelch: Can the minister say how many nations had exhibits at the international trade fair last year?

Mr. Howe: We have not reached that item yet.

Mr. Quelch: I thought we were on it.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Eglinton wanted to ask a question on item 447. After the question had been dealt with I called item 448, which has to do with the Canadian international trade fair.

Mr. Charlton: I have a question I would like to ask on item 447.

The Chairman: If the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth still wants to address questions under item 447, he may do so.

Mr. Charlton: Did I understand the minister to say these "exhibitions generally" have nothing to do with exhibitions in Canada?

Mr. Howe: That is right.

Mr. Charlton: Then do I understand this whole staff is kept in Canada in connection with exhibits in foreign countries?

Mr. Howe: They are not all kept in Canada. Some work out of Canada.

Mr. Charlton: They are not in Canada?

Mr. Howe: Sometimes some of them are and sometimes they are not.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. Charlton: I see the amount allotted for travelling expenses is only $5,000. If their only work is looking after exhibits abroad I would expect the travelling expenses to be greater than that.

Mr. Howe: We maintain an office in London and an office in Canada. All the exhibits are built here in Ottawa, where we have a workshop, and shipped to their destination. Then attendants go to the exhibitions. They may go from Canada or from the London office, and they hire local help.

Mr. Charlton: But that has nothing to do with the departmental exhibits at the local fall fairs in Canada?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Charlton: Nothing whatever.

Mr. Howe: Oh, occasionally we have loaned the workshop to another department that wishes to build an exhibit, but that expense is charged to the department doing the exhibiting.

Mr. Charlton: But is not the director of exhibitions the director in charge of all these small exhibits in Canada too?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Bater: That is under the Department of Agriculture.

Item agreed to.

448. Canadian international trade fair, 1952, including authority to refund, from revenue, deposits received for contracts for space (revote $74,500), $538,380.

Mr. Bater: I think my question is in order this time. I notice this is the only item to which any revenue is attached, and I wondered whence that revenue came.

Mr. Howe: It comes from the sale of floor space at the fair and from admissions paid by the general public. This is not operated as a fair for the purpose of earning money. It is operated in order that buyers and sellers may get together in a leisurely way and complete transactions. But two or three days a week we admit the general public at certain hours, and the admissions paid by the general public are a source of revenue. The total cost of the 1951 trade fair was $720,932 and the revenue was $415,043, leaving a net deficit of $305,889. I am happy to say the deficit is getting smaller each year, and when conditions get back to normal I hope we can operate the trade fair at no cost to the Canadian government.

Mr. Quelch: Could we know the number of exhibitors last year, how many are exhibiting this year, and how the amount of space reserved this year compares with last year?

Mr. Howe: A year ago an announcement made it clear that the future of the fair beyond 1952 would depend on increased participation by Canadian exhibitors. In the 1951 fair, space sold to Canadian exhibitors amounted to less than 42,000 feet out of a total of 145,000 feet. The latest reports for this year indicate total space sales of 184,420 square feet, about 30 per cent higher than last year, of which 91,240 feet have been taken by Canadian firms. That is nearly two and a half times the space Canadian firms had last year.

Mr. Quelch: Have you the names of the nations who are exhibiting?

Mr. Howe: Yes. This is for the 1952 fair: Australia, Bahamas, Barbados, Belgium, British Guiana, Canada, Colombia, Denmark, England, Finland, France, French Morocco, Germany, Iran, Italy, Lebanon, Netherlands, Pakistan, Portugal, Scotland, South Africa, Sweden, Switzerland, United States of America.

Mr. Fleming: Is Ireland not there?

Mr. Howe: Not this year.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does the department have any means of assessing the success of the fair, other than by the space rented and the admission paid? Is there any other test in the way of business flowing from the fair?

Mr. Howe: That is very difficult to get, because the transactions are private between exhibitors and customers. All I can say is that most of them come back year after year. The expense is considerable, and I assume they must be satisfied with the results or they would not come back.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): When the minister says most of them come back, is he referring to individual firms or countries as a whole?

Mr. Howe: Individual firms. I have had some very surprising stories from Canadians. I remember that a man came to me and wondered if he could advertise Canadian caviar. I said I did not know there was such a thing, but he said he made it in a small way and wondered if it would pay to take a booth. I said it would not cost very much, that he might try it. He has had so much business since then that people have forgotten caviar ever came from Russia. Similarly, last year a man came to see me. He had a small furniture factory in the maritime provinces, and he put in an exhibit of school desks. During the later days of the fair he came to me and said he had taken so many orders he had to put an addition on his factory, and that it would be touch and go whether he would be able to fill the orders he had taken while at the fair. A great deal of business is done there. Buyers have a chance to look over Canadian products and Canadians have a chance to look over the products of other countries. I believe buying is on a very satisfactory scale.

Mr. Fleming: I am glad to hear that statement by the minister, because, if I remember correctly, about a year ago he expressed some doubt as to the wisdom of continuing the fair.

Mr. Howe: That was because of the lack of interest shown by Canadian exhibitors. We had more Canadian exhibitors the first year than in succeeding years, and I felt we were not justified in running a fair at a deficit for the benefit of foreign exporters. I made the statement that we would try it one more year, and unless there was a great deal more interest on the part of Canadian exhibitors than had been displayed at the last one or two fairs I thought we would wind it up. In other words it must be a two-way show; the foreign buyers must have something to look at from Canada just as Canadian buyers want something to look at from abroad. Strangely enough, when it was suggested that it might be wound up every organization in Canada protested vigorously, including organizations which I thought were very lukewarm towards the fair. They became great advocates.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Did they take space?

Mr. Howe: Apparently they did.

Mr. McLure: Is the administrator of the Canadian international trade fair the same gentleman as the director of exhibitions?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. McLure: Then the $2,000 he gets here is in addition to his other salary? The director gets $9,000, and if he is the same man as the administrator this is just $2,000 extra?

Mr. Howe: I was mistaken in my answer. Mr. Bannerman is the director of the exhibition branch. He is in charge of all fairs, including the trade fair. Mr. Hoffman is the administrator of the Canadian international trade fair, and has no other duties except the Canadian trade fair.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Bannerman is a very capable official.

Mr. Howe: We think so.

Mr. Catherwood: I should like to ask the minister if any action has been taken by the department to encourage Canadian exhibitors to show at this fair. I have attended this fair for the last two years, and I think it is a wonderful show place for the products of the Dominion of Canada. I do feel that when these foreign buyers are present at that fair every effort should be made to encourage our own exhibitors to show there. Has the department taken any steps to encourage them?

Mr. Howe: Yes, we asked the international organizations to stimulate the idea of exhibiting at the fair. Then we did something we have never done before: we put on some salesmen. These were men such as retired bank managers, who could give some time to the matter and who were paid for their services. They knew something about business, and had the proper contact with Canadian firms to enable them to place the advantages of the fair before these firms. These salesmen did a very good job, and I think it was due to this special sales effort that this year the space taken by Canadian exhibitors has more than doubled.

Standards division—

449. Administration, including administration of the Precious Metals Marking Act, $113,359.

Mr. Herridge: On this item, I am not sure what particular heading it is under, but under the standards division there is provision for a number of inspectors of standards. Are those men doing work in connection with the act, that is enforcing the Canada Standards Act? Could the minister give us a description of what is being done in that connection?

Mr. Howe: Yes, the work of establishing national standards is proceeding, but it must necessarily proceed slowly. We must be sure that the standard is a standard that the trade and the purchasers will accept. A number of standards have been set up, and of course we have the Precious Metals Marking Act which is also under this division. Progress is being made towards widening the number of articles that must be bought and sold under the trademark "Canadian standard".

Mr. Wright: Can the minister give us an indication of the number of articles that are now standardized?

Mr. Howe: There is hosiery, fur and fur-trimmed garments; Babcock test bottles; turpentine—I am afraid that I cannot give a full list, but those are typical items.

Item agreed to.

Dominion bureau of statistics—

453. Administration, $167,714.

[Mr. Catherwood.]

Mr. Thatcher: So far as the Canadian bureau of statistics is concerned, on previous occasions I have said that I thought they did some very good work. In my experience as a retailer, however, I have found that they send out to various people a good deal of information which I do not think is of particular value. I have an idea, because the cost of this bureau of statistics to the taxpayer has increased from a million dollars in 1939 to $6 million today, that they might be compiling a good deal of information which may be useful perhaps but which Canadians might possibly get along without. This is one department in which the minister might be able to cut out some of these reports which are not particularly valuable, and thus save the taxpayer some money. I should like to have some comments on that.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, I came to the Department of Trade and Commerce with very much the same idea. A very strong committee was set up to pare down the number of publications. I had thought that they had been growing. Perhaps someone wanted a report on something, and it became an annual publication. As a result of those efforts the personnel of the bureau has been reduced. In 1948 the staff numbered 1,457; in 1949, 1,418; in 1950, 1,429; in 1951, 1,323. The number of publications has already been reduced as a result of this drive that was instituted two years ago, and 56 reports have been entirely eliminated. More than 120 reports considered to be too specialized for general distribution have been transferred to the reference paper or memorandum class.

Previously, every report issued by the bureau was sent to the "all publications list", which contained between three hundred and four hundred names, the majority of whom were subscribers at $30 per annum. Undoubtedly, many on the list received reports which did not interest them, and this led to some criticism. Reports of a technical or very specialized character, now called reference papers or memoranda, are no longer sent to the "all publications list". Those who want to receive all of them pay a special subscription price of $15 for memoranda, and $5 for reference papers. These are mentioned in our daily bulletin and non-subscribers must write for copies. This means that 176—that is 56 plus 120—out of approximately 500 publications examined have been discontinued as regular bureau reports. Fifty-six have been eliminated entirely, and 120 have become memoranda or reference papers.

Most of those previously receiving copies of everything we published will receive 176 less bureau reports.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Chairman, I think that is a very encouraging feature. Will the minister state who decides what new statistics or what new publications will be put out? Does he decide that himself?

Mr. Howe: There is an advisory publications board to the bureau and that board decides whether a request for information should be granted, and whether the subject matter should be reported each year or reported periodically.

Mr. Thatcher: I thank the minister, and I hope this year he will continue doing the same thing because I believe there are a few more that could be eliminated.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a comment under this item concerning the proposed new consumer price index. I believe that all members must be conscious of the shortcomings of the present cost-of-living index, the basis of which goes back a great many years. No one, I am sure, is going to argue that there is not some reason for revising the basis of the index. On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, I submit that it is altogether desirable that while the new consumer price index is being introduced, the old index should be carried on for a considerable length of time. In a return tabled on May 8 by the parliamentary assistant, it was indicated that the new consumer price index would not commence before the summer of 1952. I am urging that the present index should be published for a considerable period of time after the new index comes into publication, and along with the new index.

I am basing that partly on the fact that a great many labour agreements have features which are tied to the present cost-of-living index. I am also proposing it upon the ground that the public is entitled to have a continuing basis of comparison with costs which it has been accustomed to over a period of years. That is not to detract from the idea of the new consumer price index, which I have no doubt will become a more accurate gauge of movements in general price levels so far as they affect the consumer than the old cost of living index. I think the public, for its information, is entitled to a continuance of the index to which it has been accustomed for a long time. It would be misleading simply to base our conceptions of living costs and the value of the Canadian dollar on the base period proposed by the new consumer price index, which is to be the year 1949. I hope that we are never going to become so adjusted, never going to come to the point where we are so ready to accept 1949 price levels as being a standard that we will simply accept the new consumer price index as one that does not for its full understanding require to be referred back and related to an entirely different basis. For that reason, Mr. Chairman, so that the public may be able to have a reasonably accurate gauge by which to measure price trends so far as they affect the consumer, and to relate those to a period that we hope is more normal than the period in which we are living so far as consumer prices are concerned, I am urging that the present cost of living index should continue to be published for some time to come, even after the new consumer price index has come to be published.

Mr. Howe: That is the intention. The first index under the new list of commodities will be published for the month of July, and for a time both indexes will be published side by side. I may say that—I do not know why—my hon. friend seems to want to perpetuate the years 1935-39 as typical. I think perhaps he is deceiving himself; I do not think he is deceiving anybody else. I hope I do not live to see conditions go back to the 1935-39 level. But it has been the custom every ten years or so to change the index, and to take a new base. That has been happening probably ever since a cost of living index was published. It happens here; it happens in the United States as well. They have just shifted to a new base—I am not sure what their base is. We think the year 1949 is the last year for which we will have full statistics upon which to base an index, so that the index will start off not at 100 but probably at 120 or 125 or somewhere in that range. But as long as we have a base which is reasonably representative of the period under discussion I do not think the year is important. If my hon. friend can see something sacred in the years 1935-39 we might consider immortalizing them and keeping them forever, but I think he would have to explain it pretty carefully.

Mr. Fleming: I can assure the minister that I would not wish the years 1935-39 to be regarded permanently as typical, because these were years of Liberal administration. I would not want to think that that was typical.

Mr. Howe: You would like to go back to 1930-35.

Mr. Fleming: You said 1935-39, and there is my answer on that.

The minister has indicated that the old index is going to be carried on for a period of time. It is a question of the length of it. I asked the minister a question on this subject in the house some weeks ago, when the new consumer price index was first announced. So that the people may have an opportunity of measuring the extent of the rise in the cost of living I asked the minister whether the government would be prepared to continue publication of the cost of living index until at least the next general election. The minister rejected that very firmly. I was not asking him when the general election was to be called. Far from my thoughts be any such question, Mr. Chairman; but I did think that it was only due to the people that they should have an opportunity of measuring the extent to which the prices have risen and the value of the Canadian dollar has fallen. I think there is very great danger that that may be lost from sight if we accept 1949 as the standard year and simply calculate trends from that year and in relation to that year.

The minister does not want to regard the years 1935-39 as standard or typical, but I would not want to see the high costs that we have been living under, and which were in effect in 1949, regarded as typical. If the minister has some better suggestion, well and good. But let us not regard these four years 1935 to 1939 as typical. In measuring what is a reasonable time I ask the minister to continue to publish the old index along with the new, and to continue it for at least a year.

Mr. Howe: The bureau of statistics and my hon. friend were exactly opposite. The bureau of statistics pays no attention to elections, and my hon. friend thinks of nothing else.

Mr. Fleming: No.

Mr. Howe: Therefore I am afraid it will be difficult to reconcile the two points of view, but I will explain to the bureau my hon. friend's views, and they can take such note of them as they think warranted.

Mr. Coldwell: Can the minister tell me what has happened to that very useful and valuable publication the Canada Year Book? Has it been published this year, or what has happened to it?

Mr. Howe: It will be published.

Mr. Coldwell: It will be published this year?

Mr. Howe: Yes, in January, 1953.

Mr. Fair: As a farmer I do not like either the period 1930-35 or 1935-40. I never had as tough a time getting enough to eat, and paying my bills or of keeping the sheriff away as I did during that ten-year period from 1930 to 1939, which has been used for cost of living index purposes. I think of the terrible damage that has been done to the farming industry, because while we were supposed to be getting into the period of Liberal prosperity during those years we were still down in the depths of a depression as far as farm prices were concerned. Prices that existed during those years have been used here on many occasions to show the prosperity of agriculture. They were entirely misleading figures, and as far as I am concerned, and agriculture as a whole, the sooner we get rid of the prices and the price structure of agriculture during the 1930 to 1940 period the better off we will all be.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to make reference for a moment or two to what the hon. member for Eglinton said. I certainly never felt that the period for 1935-39 had any magical significance. I also agree with the hon. member for Eglinton that this other period should not be fastened on us either as a kind of normal yardstick because, if it is, what it really means is that a lot of people who have never been able to readjust themselves economically to the tremendous rises in prices are going to have that period accepted as more or less normal, and to that extent psychologically there will be a great difficulty in the way of their ever getting a readjustment.

What I want to speak about is the size of this item. Here we have an item of more than $4 million. At a time when we are seeking economies we have an increase of $259,000. No one has more cause to speak well of the dominion bureau of statistics than I have, because I have had a great deal of help and a great deal of courtesy from them. I do feel it is one of the places where it is extremely difficult to prevent expenditures from pyramiding; and unless there is a definite system effectively carried out it seems to me it is bound to go on. Because, after all, the people who are running this are enthusiasts—if they were not they would not be good at their job—and consequently there will constantly be those who will suggest this or that pet project—"pet", that is, to the suggester—and they will go on and do that work.

I wish to assert, first of all that, obviously, the minister, with all the things he has to do, cannot be reviewing these many hundreds of employees, and trying to analyse what is going on. Who does it? The minister says there is a committee. I would like to know who compose the committee.

While I am on my feet I would ask the minister whether he has thought of the possibility of having the fresh views of some outside agency which would come in, investigate what has happened, and ask the very useful question: Why? I understand when Winston Churchill was made originally First Lord of the Admiralty, as quite a young man, his first act was to call in all the senior officials and ask them what they were doing. They all told him, very readily and glibly. Then he asked them a question they had never been asked before: Why? That was something, apparently, a great many of them found difficulty in answering.

Mr. Howe: The efficiency of the bureau is the responsibility of the director and his deputy. They operate under the supervision of the deputy minister and the associate deputy minister of the department, who gives the bureau his attention. Other officers of the department are detailed to consider special aspects. For instance the committee on publications includes the assistant director of the bureau, but the rest of the committee were people inside the bureau, but outside the division under review.

It would be dangerous to bring in an outside firm. The cost depends entirely on the kind of information required. That is built up over the experience of the years. If we suspend a publication there are always complaints from some sources that valuable information is being cut off. We have that experience whenever we drop a publication. It takes experience to evaluate the seriousness of a complaint. I doubt if it is a job that anyone without experience in the work of statistics could perform. Our bureau is considered one of the best in the world, and we try to make sure that the work it undertakes does not go too far afield.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have no reason to regard it as anything but a very good bureau. Whether it is one of the best in the world I cannot say. I am afraid that when I hear that kind of opinion expressed it only indicates to me that there is a great deal of self-satisfaction and not enough of the attitude of criticism aroused. However, I appreciate what the minister says, that it might be difficult for an outsider to come in and to assess what is going on. Yet it seems to me that nothing suggested thus far indicates that there is any acid test here.

For instance, what is the test of need? A publication is sent out. Very few people ever consider writing in to say that it was not a good one. Indeed, it may have been a good one. But what is the test to determine whether X hundreds or X thousands of dollars will be spent? To what extent are people charged for what they get? To what extent is distribution free? Four million dollars is a lot of money; and I suppose, as things stand, it is going to go up and up. It has gone up $260,000 this year.

Mr. Howe: Publications are free only to those on the official list. If my hon. friend would like to have them it will cost him $30 a year. They are sent free to trade commissioner offices, to trade offices of foreign countries located in Ottawa, and to a list of people who, for official reasons, are entitled to them. Aside from that a charge is made for each copy of a publication.

Reference has been made to the increase this year. I would point out that we had to consider the problem of old age pensions. The bureau did some work in forecasting amounts required and in setting up a check for old age pensions payments. It has done a great deal of work in connection with family allowances. Proof of age in connection with old age pensions required a great amount of work by the bureau of statistics. Usually it is work of that kind that expands the activities of the bureau. It is much easier to put new publications on than it is to take them off. However, a careful watch is kept to see that no new publication is brought out that is not required by the need of the day.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Let me refer to something which I believe is under consideration—and it is a very interesting thing, too. I understand the bureau is grappling with the task of producing quarterly returns of corporations, such as they have in the United States, and which I believe we have not had. There, it seems to me, is an interesting point. It would be nice to give this information—indeed I would like to have it myself. But how will it be tested? I suppose it would cost a lot of money to have it. It would not be easy to determine whether that is worthwhile or not. What is the system? Is there any test that can be applied, or do we just go on getting this, that, and the other thing which may be interesting?—because it seems to me there is no end to it, ever.

Mr. Howe: I am told the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada desire the publications so that they may estimate probable revenues.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Do they pay for it?

Mr. Howe: The same person who supplies their money will pay for this.

Mr. Argue: I should like to refer back to a matter mentioned earlier, the new consumer price index put out by the bureau of statistics. The hon. member for Battle River pointed out that agriculture does not wish to go back to the conditions of 1935-39. I am wondering if there is going to be a change in the base of agricultural statistics to a new 1949 base. I do not know whether that would be preferable or not. It seems to me however that if the consumer price index is going to be changed to 1949, the indexes of agricultural prices—and I am referring to the 11-factor cost index, the 8-factor index, and other indexes—might also be changed to the 1949 base. I wonder if that is being done.

Mr. Howe: I can assure the hon. member that every factor in the cost of living index will be on the 1949 base, including the agricultural index.

Mr. Argue: Does the minister mean that the farmers' cost of production index which, so far as I know, is not included in the consumer index, will be changed?

Mr. Howe: Yes; all other indexes, as well as the cost of living index, will be published with the 1949 base.

Mr. Argue: Will it also be the practice to continue for a period of time the other indexes?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Argue: Regarding agricultural prices?

Mr. Howe: Yes; they will both be published for a time.

Mr. Fleming: I found some difficulty in following one answer given by the minister to the hon. member for Greenwood, when he offered as a reason for the increase this year in item 454 over last year's appropriation the fact that the bureau has been called upon to do a good deal of work in connection with old age pensions, and proof of age. I would remind the committee that we are now dealing with an item covering the fiscal year which commenced on April 1 while the bulk of the work referred to by the minister was done in the previous fiscal year. I should have thought that the bulk of that work having been done, for the very reason the minister has indicated we would be entitled to expect a reduction in the item this year as compared with last year.

Mr. Howe: The work on old age pensions is a continuing job. Much was done last year, some more will be done this year and more will be done next year. I have here an essay on new work undertaken without additions to staff.

Agriculture statistics division: New work undertaken in this division in recent years includes the following: Construction and publication of a monthly farm price index and an annual physical volume of production index; extension of the cash and net income series back to 1926; a new weekly series of butter stocks for 9 cities; a new series of monthly estimates of egg production and of monthly oilseed crushings; annual estimates of vegetable acreages and production; preparation of per capita food consumption statistics and publication of two reports per year; preparation of special forecasts of farm production and income for the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Most of this work has been undertaken with no increase in staff. This was made possible by improvements in procedures including a greater application of the sampling principle, simplification of questionnaires, adoption of the peg-board system, improved methods of estimation, et cetera. In the large semi-annual surveys almost double the number of returns are now being processed with no increase in staff. Larger samples in other surveys are also being handled with the same staff.

This division has had the preparation of a handbook of agricultural statistics under way for some time. Part I dealing with the historical statistics of field crops has been published and other parts are in preparation. This work has been accomplished with no increase in staff.

What I have stated refers only to agricultural statistics, but I could give details about industry and merchandising and general assignments, including the one I have just mentioned. I would not think my hon. friend would want to hear that.

Mr. Fleming: Does the list of work just read by the minister cover new work undertaken this fiscal year, work that was not done in the fiscal year 1951-52?

Mr. Howe: I was talking about work done during the year 1951-52.

Mr. Fleming: My question was directed rather toward the matter raised by the hon. member for Greenwood as to why there should be an increase this year when the bureau had discharged the considerable amount of work the minister has referred to in connection with the inauguration of the new universal old age pension plan. The volume of work which the bureau will be called upon to do this year would be reduced as compared with that done in the previous fiscal year. Is there some new work being undertaken this year as compared with the last fiscal year and which accounts for the increase in the item? This, of course, is quite apart from the census.

Mr. Howe: The increase is only 5 per cent, which is practically all covered by increased salaries and increased operating expenses. The work of the bureau is always increasing. Our population is increasing, the gross national product is increasing, the activities of business are increasing, and the work of the bureau of statistics is increasing. In the last several years they have been making valiant efforts to handle these increases without additional staff, simply by improving the efficiency of the bureau. I think they have made a reasonable success. I could read the complete list if required.

The new cost of living index has been under study during the past year and has taken an enormous amount of time. Meetings have been held with almost every organization in Canada interested in the subject. There is always something new to be done. As I say, efforts are being made to keep the staff constant and to handle the work without any increase.

Mr. Fleming: Could the minister or his colleague, the Minister of Public Works, tell us what the new bureau of statistics building is going to cost?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): When my estimates are before the committee I shall have all the details as to that building.

Mr. Blackmore: Is the statistical summary issued by the Bank of Canada based upon data provided by the dominion bureau of statistics?

Mr. Howe: Yes. The basic data for all statistical reports issued in Ottawa are supplied by the bureau of statistics. The actual interpretation is made by economists outside the bureau whose duty it is to interpret information supplied by the bureau.

Mr. Blackmore: Regardless of the department concerned?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Blackmore: If it had not meant delaying the committee I would have liked to hear the complete list of the various activities carried on by the bureau. I should like to know to what extent the dominion bureau of statistics is regularly compiling data in order to show the total productive capacity of Canada in connection with almost every commodity.

Mr. Howe: I shall be delighted to send across the text of what I was reading from as the hon. member may be the only one interested in the detail.

Mr. Blackmore: Perhaps I might tell the minister what might be new to the house and the country. One reason why I am particularly interested in the bureau of statistics is that if it is ever decided to set up a Social Credit state—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: —the first thing we shall want to have is what is called a national account book indicating the actual productive capacity of each industry in the nation.

An hon. Member: What will it cost?

Mr. Blackmore: That is a sort of question we might expect from anyone so simple as to ask a question like that before he knows just what we are talking about.

The Chairman: I must ask the hon. member to address himself to the Chair and not conduct a conversation with hon. members across the floor. I might also ask him to confine his remarks to the dominion bureau of statistics. I do not think we ought to go into the future and consider the setting up of a state which might perhaps be different from the one we have now.

Mr. Blackmore: I am just wondering to what extent the bureau of statistics is ready to be utilized for compiling the national account book. The first important thing needed would be complete details of every branch and aspect of the productive capacity of the nation and I am just wondering if the bureau of statistics is in a position to assemble and supply that information.

Mr. Howe: The national product indicates the total production of the country. The capacity to produce may be larger but what is actually produced is the gross national product. That is prepared by our department based in part upon information supplied by the dominion bureau of statistics.

Mr. Blackmore: There is a rather thorough breakdown of the gross national product with respect to what is actually possible now and what will be possible with certain developments and so forth.

Mr. Howe: That is right.

Item agreed to.

454. Statistics, including contribution of $3,100 to the Inter-American Statistical Institute, $4,088,614.

Mr. Charlton: In the details on page 500 there is an item of $142,473 for rental of office equipment. Would the minister explain that item?

Mr. Howe: These are special business machines. My hon. friend knows that certain business machines are not bought. They are rented and that is the rental of certain equipment that was installed particularly for handling the last census. I may say that much more work was done on special machines in the last census than ever before.

Mr. Charlton: If that be the case, would not the item of $137,176 for 1951-52 have taken care of the last census?

Mr. Howe: I did not understand the question.

Mr. Charlton: The amount for last year of $137,176 would have taken care of the 1951 census.

Mr. Howe: No, the work is not completed. It takes a year or two after the census is taken before all the publications are completed and all tabulations made.

Mr. Charlton: Then we can expect that figure will probably go down in 1953.

Mr. Howe: Very likely.

Item agreed to.

455. Census of population and agriculture and the 1951 census of distribution, $1,731,366.

Mr. Catherwood: What was the total cost of the taking of the census in 1951?

Mr. Howe: The total cost is $8,874,503.

Mr. Thatcher: At this point I should like to suggest another saving which seems feasible to me, and I think this is the only place that I can bring it up. An extra census is taken on the prairies halfway between the ten year censuses. I think it was originated in 1905 when Saskatchewan entered confederation. The reason it was taken then was that the population was increasing fairly rapidly and the people wanted additional representation. I suggest the time has come when that census could be eliminated. I think the last time it was taken was in 1946, and it cost about $600,000 of the taxpayers' money. With a population that is relatively stable now, I respectfully suggest that is an economy which could very well be made.

Mr. Howe: I am told it is required by statute and that certain grants are based on the five-year census. We could not just wipe it out but we could explore the possibilities.

Mr. Thatcher: Perhaps the minister can tell me if there is any reason for retaining it. The population is now fairly stable. Is there any reason for that extra census in the three prairie provinces and not in the other seven provinces? It does not make sense to me, and I do not know anyone on the prairies who wants it.

Mr. Howe: I think the provincial treasurers probably want the statutory grants which are based on the five-year census.

Mr. Thatcher: How do the other seven provinces get along without it?

Mr. Howe: I am not familiar with the statute and should not be discussing the matter. I am told it is a statutory requirement. I will be glad to look into the matter and if there is any good reason why it should be abolished I will see what can be done to that end.

Item agreed to.

Wheat and grain division—

456. Salaries and other expenses, $28,918.

Mr. Wright: In 1950 the minister introduced an amendment to the wheat board act providing for the appointment of two additional members to that board. I assume the minister thought that was necessary at that time or he would not have had the act amended. Two years have now passed and no appointments have been made. In my opinion the wheat board is doing a very good job but I think its members are overworked. One member of the board has to spend a great deal of his time attending international conferences and selling our wheat abroad. Incidentally, I think the board has been doing a good job in finding markets for our wheat, but I suggest to the minister that he might give serious consideration to seeing that these appointments are made because I feel that now that the wheat board is handling coarse grains, contacting our customers abroad and making sales, the time has come when the membership of the board should be increased. It would not cost the government anything. The salaries of the members of the wheat board are paid out of wheat board funds. I am sure the farmers of western Canada would be prepared to see the number of members increased so they could do their job even better than they are able to at the present time, particularly with respect to securing new outlets for our grain.

Mr. Howe: The only reason we have not appointed additional members of the board is that we have not been able to find men who have the experience and the background of the three men we have on the wheat board.

Mr. Wright: Then you will never find them.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend knows if you deteriorate the average you bring down the value of the team. There are men who have had the experience necessary but unfortunately they are not available for service on the board. However, I am still looking, and if I can find a man who I believe will improve the work of the board I will be very pleased to appoint him. If I cannot find a man who will improve the work of the board or who the board think will improve their work he will never be appointed as long as I sit in this chair.

Mr. Wright: Why did the minister introduce the amendment to the act unless he had somebody in view or some plan in view to actually implement the amendment? It seems to me that the minister must have had something in view. As to finding somebody with the experience of the men who are on the board at the present time, that is practically impossible. You must train younger men. These men are getting older and unless there are younger men in training on the board to fill these positions the time will come when some of the present members will die or retire and you will then be in the position where you will have to make appointments. I think the time to make appointments is now so that there will be somebody in training.

Mr. Howe: When the wheat board act was amended on the last occasion my hon. friend will remember that we added coarse grains to the work of the board, and it was felt that might require additional personnel. I dare say the board would get on better if it had four members instead of three, but as I say I have not found a man so far whom I wanted to appoint to the board, and the board has not recommended any appointment to me. One day we will probably need a fourth commissioner. Then we will have to find him and we will find the best man we can. I am very happy about the work of the board at the moment, and when I have a good thing I like to leave it alone.

Mr. Fair: Earlier we had some discussion about the international wheat agreement. We got some information but I should like to have a few more details.

Mr. Howe: It is not possible to get it from me. The meetings of the conference were supposed to be in camera. I have given all the facts I know, and I hope no one else is prepared to give any more information than I have. The meeting is only adjourned. Mr. Phelps gave some information in Regina and I believe he has been cracked over the knuckles for it. I do not want to be cracked over the knuckles so I am not going to give any information.

Mr. Argue: The minister said that negotiations would be resumed later this year. Has he any information as to the probable date of resuming negotiations?

Mr. Howe: I have none.

Mr. Ferrie: If the minister appointed two more commissioners as requested who would pay their salaries and expenses?

Mr. Howe: The producers of wheat.

Mr. Argue: We in this group have always supported the wheat board as the agency to handle grain produced in western Canada. As the board is now operated it handles wheat, oats and barley. We have continuously asked that its operations be extended to include flax and rye. I believe if the operations of the board were so extended it would get the overwhelming support of western producers, just as the producers of Manitoba gave overwhelming support to the board marketing oats and barley.

When it is sold on the open market the production of flax is a real gamble. Trying to produce flax at any time is a gamble, but if in addition to the hazards of production you have a widely fluctuating market it makes the production very risky. Last fall I believe the price of flax went up to over $5 a bushel. A few weeks ago it was down to $3.50, and I believe it is now about $3.80. I think it would be much more satisfactory if a reasonably safe initial payment on flax were made by the board, with interim and final payments later as is now the practice in regard to wheat, oats and barley. I am wondering if there is any possibility of such action being taken. Then there is one other point I wish to raise.

Mr. Howe: That question has to do with the wheat board act; it cannot be considered under these estimates. The wheat board act comes up for revision next year, and nothing can be done until then. When we are discussing the wheat board act we shall be glad to discuss this subject, but it should not be dealt with on these estimates.

Mr. Argue: With great deference to the minister, it becomes very difficult for members to discuss the estimates if they are not allowed to suggest any additions or expansions in the item under consideration. I think it has always been in order to suggest the extension of any item.

The Chairman: If any such suggestions are to be made that can be done quite properly on the first item. That is why we have a general discussion dealing with the administration of the department and any measures under the control of the department or the minister. If we were voting the salaries of the justices of the supreme court, for instance, does my hon. friend think he would be entitled to discuss all the judgments those learned gentlemen have rendered?

Mr. Argue: I would not say that.

The Chairman: Well, here we are dealing with a board and the salaries of that board. The hon. member wants to go into the various decisions they should render, or the service they should perform. I think he should offer those suggestions on the first item, which has to do with the whole department, rather than on this item which has to do with salaries.

Mr. Howe: Might I point out that not even the salaries of the board are included in this item. The salaries are not paid by the federal government. This vote has nothing to do with the operation of the wheat board.

Item agreed to.

Canada Grain Act—

458. Administration, $137,981.

Mr. Bater: Perhaps I am out of order again, Mr. Chairman; perhaps I should bring up what I want to discuss when the standing committee on agriculture and colonization meets to discuss the annual report of the Canadian wheat board and the board of grain commissioners. I intended to say something in connection with additional grain drying and storage facilities in northwestern Saskatchewan. I was also going to make some suggestions for changes in the initial quotas on grain at the elevators. I will ask the minister if I would be more in order to bring up these matters later, when the standing committee on agriculture and colonization meets.

Mr. Howe: I think there would be a better discussion then. However, we can discuss the board of grain commissioners, who are paid by the federal government, if my hon. friend wishes. Technically I think he can do that, but it might be better if he would defer that discussion until the committee meets, though he should do as he wishes. My thought is that it is a quarter to eleven and I would like to get the estimates passed.

Mr. Wright: Have the government given consideration to an overhaul of the Canada Grain Act? It is a number of years since we have had a major revision of that act, and I believe representations have been made to the minister or to the government in that regard. Perhaps they prefer to leave the decision until after we have discussed this matter in the committee on agriculture.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend will find in Votes and Proceedings of today a resolution preceding a bill to amend the Canada Grain Act. In other words it is the intention to revise the act at this session.

Item agreed to.

Board of grain commissioners—

459. Operation and maintenance expenses, including inspection, weighing registration, etc., $2,868,720.

Mr. Charlton: I wonder if the minister could give us some idea of the amount of grain that has been handled this year through each of the government owned elevators.

[Mr. Howe.]

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps the hon. member has not noticed that government grain elevators are not under this item but are under item 460.

Mr. McLure: I think there are some 1,200 employees of this board and I would like to know how many are civil servants and how many are permanent. When I asked the minister a question on another item I understood him to say that none of the employees were civil servants.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend was asking about the Canada wheat board. The costs of that board, including the staff, are paid by the producers of grain. The government exercises general supervision over the work of the board but does not pay any of the expenses. The board of grain commissioners is quite different. Its costs are paid by the government and all its officers are paid by the government. Practically all the officers of the board of grain commissioners are permanent civil servants, even the elevator operators.

Item agreed to.

Canadian government elevators—

460. Operation and maintenance expenses, $877,777.

Mr. Charlton: Could the minister tell us what amount of grain was handled through the government elevators last year, giving each elevator separately?

Mr. Howe: Some days ago I brought down the annual report of the board. That gives the information. I am sorry I have not a copy here. The reason my hon. friend does not have a copy is that we have not been able to get the report from the printers, but I am told it will be available for distribution next week, well before the meeting of the agriculture committee, and it contains all that information. The only information I have here is that the earned revenue from government elevators was $1,101,914 and the expenditures were $911,745, so there was a profit of about $200,000 in the operation of the elevators. That covers the elevators at Prince Rupert, Moose Jaw, Saskatoon, Calgary, Edmonton and Lethbridge, and the Port Arthur elevator which is leased to a private operator.

Mr. Charlton: And Churchill?

Mr. Howe: And the one at Churchill.

Mr. Charlton: Am I to understand there is an operating profit of around $200,000 on the government elevators?

Mr. Howe: There was last year.

Mr. Charlton: An over-all profit?

Mr. Howe: That is right.

Item agreed to.

Special—

462. International economic and technical co-operation division, including the administration of the Colombo plan and of certain United Nations co-operation plans, $88,192.

Mr. Fleming: Under item 462 we have apparently a new division within this department, the international economic and technical co-operation division, with a director at a salary of $12,000, four administrative officers, a librarian, control process officers, three stenographers and a clerk. I wonder if we could have from the minister a statement as to the reason for establishing this new division? I hope we do not need to assure the minister or the house that there has been unanimous support for the provisions made by the Colombo plan, but does it inevitably follow that because Canada is providing needed technical assistance to the commonwealth countries in southeast Asia that there must be this new division set up within the department?

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, the amounts are quite substantial. We have made two grants of $25 million each, and that money must be spent to the satisfaction of the taxpayers of Canada as well as the recipient countries. The personnel of the division are mostly concerned with that plan. Nik Cavell is a man with a great deal of experience in work in the area in which the Colombo plan is being executed. I would be glad to read the extract from the annual report of the department bearing on this branch, if the hon. member so desires.

Mr. Fleming: Is it very lengthy?

Mr. Howe: It is a full page, yes.

Mr. Fleming: None of us has a copy of the report which was just tabled this afternoon.

Mr. Howe: I understand that, and I am sorry, but there again it has been delayed in the printing office. It will be available within a day or two. I do not know that I can read a short extract that would be particularly illuminating. It is necessary, however, to examine with the countries concerned the type of assistance that will be satisfactory to them. We believe that is something that will appeal to the Canadian people. For example, in Pakistan I believe we are building a cement plant, and that is something Canada can do very well. In India there are hydroelectric projects, certain irrigation projects, and over all there is the technical assistance program which calls for administration. We send administrators from Canada out to the field to do work in the field, and we also take people from the area to Canada to give them instructions in Canadian methods. I think that Canada could hardly hope to do a job under the Colombo plan without considerable experienced staff who could handle the problems that are encountered.

Mr. Catherwood: Should not this item actually come under the Department of External Affairs?

Mr. Howe: I agree with the hon. member, but unfortunately the Department of External Affairs has insisted that it should come under the Department of Trade and Commerce, on the theory that we had the personnel who were more familiar with the problems.

Item agreed to.

National research council and atomic energy control board—

295. Salaries and other expenses, $12,198,684.

Mr. Green: This item opens up a new branch, and I would suggest that it be adjourned.

The Chairman: Shall I report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Item stands.

Progress reported.
