HOUSE OF COMMONS

DOMINION OF CANADA

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, April 7, 1952

The house met at three o'clock.

THE BUDGET

ECONOMIC AND FINANCIAL STATISTICS—TABLING OF WHITE PAPER

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I desire to table copies, in English and in French, of the white paper in connection with the budget, 1952-53.

Mr. Croll: May I ask the minister whether the white paper he has tabled is to be printed in Hansard? If so, will he make the necessary motion to have that done? I think it is desirable that it should appear in Hansard.

Mr. Abbott: I was proposing to move tomorrow that it be printed as an appendix to tomorrow's Hansard, as has been done in past years. Printed copies will be available for hon. members today and tomorrow. In order to avoid duplication, I thought I might ask the consent of the house to have it printed in tomorrow's Hansard together with the budget speech.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INCREASE OF QUORUM FROM TWENTY TO THIRTY

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 179, respecting the quorum of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to increase the quorum of the House of Commons from at least twenty to at least thirty members. By doing so, we shall merely re-establish, to the nearest round figure, the proportion stipulated in 1867, when the Commons had only 181 members as compared with our present membership of 262.

I believe this is the first bill to be based on the authority of the parliament of Canada to amend the constitution of Canada in matters exclusively federal, apart from certain specified exceptions, according to the amendment to the British North America Act of December, 1949.

I should like to say that I am indebted to Dr. Maurice Ollivier, our parliamentary counsel, for his help and advice in drafting this bill. Dr. Ollivier is always most helpful to hon. members who seek his advice, but because of the extra time and attention he has given to the drafting of this bill, in the light of its constitutional aspect, I felt I should like to thank him publicly at this time for his counsel and assistance.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WAR REPARATIONS

QUESTION AS TO INTERIM PAYMENTS OF CLAIMS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to reply to the question asked on Thursday last by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) with respect to interim payments for war claims for persons in real need.

As I explained to the house on March 10, a scheme was devised whereby payments would be made to claimants coming under categories laid down in the compensation rules which were established by order in council P.C. 667 of February 4, 1952, and which was published in part II of the Canada Gazette on February 27.

Those persons who fall within the rules will receive interim payment if their claims are established; and that is a definite decision.

Thus far, some sixteen persons have made application for interim payment, and those applications are now being processed. Hon. members will understand that this is a fairly complicated problem, and a good deal of detailed information is required before payments can be made. I am advised that the applications are being dealt with as expeditiously as possible.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there is one thought that I should like to place before the Prime Minister in connection with what he has just said to the house. When he speaks of claims being established, that could, of course, mean the total figure of the claim. Where there may be some doubt about the total figure of the claim but no doubt about there being some substantial measure of claim, I would suggest that some system be devised under which interim payment could be made so that very needy cases, of which I know the Prime Minister is aware, could be dealt with without further delay. I think this would prevent real hardship without the necessity for awaiting the determination of the larger amounts which it may take more time to deal with.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am sure that those who are processing these claims have this consideration in mind, and my information is that they wish to have, in connection with one we both have in mind, something on record to show that there is real need.

CHEESE

MAINTENANCE OF INDUSTRY AS MARKET FOR SURPLUS MILK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture or, in his absence, to his parliamentary assistant. What action, if any, is proposed by the government to preserve and to maintain the Canadian Cheddar cheese industry as a market for surplus milk? My question arises out of an article appearing in the London Free Press on Saturday morning.

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should like to assure the hon. member for Middlesex East that everything that can be done will be done. We had the cheese and the dairy men in here discussing the matter with us some weeks ago. As this is a matter of government policy, it will be announced in due course.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

LAKE LEVELS—PELEE ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier). In view of the impending disaster owing to high lake levels, does the government intend to take immediate steps to prevent Pelee island from being entirely covered by water?

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a general impression that whenever there are flood waters anywhere in the country there is on the federal government a responsibility to see that no damage is done or that whatever damage is done is repaired.

The other day I tried to point out to one of the hon. members that that is not the responsibility of the federal government. Floods in the various provinces are primarily the responsibility of the local authorities. Whenever it happens that there is a catastrophe of such magnitude that the local authorities feel it is beyond their power to deal with it, they apply to the federal government for assistance. There have been three or four cases in which the magnitude of the catastrophe was felt to be such that it took on a national aspect, and the federal government co-operated with the local authorities in an effort to alleviate the consequences to the individuals who had suffered. But unless the flooding of Pelee island can be attributed to some works for which the federal government has responsibility in connection with navigation or navigable channels, it is not primarily a responsibility of the federal government.

There have been many requests for inspections by officers of the Department of Public Works in connection with the floods that are occurring at this season of the year. Those inspections are being made for the purpose of ascertaining whether the disasters are in any way attributable to works for which the federal government is responsible. But that is as far as we can go under the present constitutional distribution of responsibilities.

If there is a situation at Pelee island which can in any way be attributed to federal works, I am sure that the engineers of the Department of Public Works will investigate the matter and make an appropriate report to the minister of that department. But if it is something which is not attributed to federal works but is rather a calamity arising out of the course of nature, then only if the local authorities, through the provincial government, made representation that the consequences were such that the provincial authorities were not capable of taking care of them, would the federal government feel called upon to consider whether they should recommend to parliament that the matter be treated as one of national magnitude.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister. Has Ontario asked for aid in the Pelee island, Detroit river and lake St. Clair districts or any other district in that province? Has it asked for aid for the province of Ontario?

Mr. St. Laurent: Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker. But that is not something that the province would have to do immediately following the occurrence of the disaster. They themselves would naturally investigate and be in a position, if they came to the federal government, to make representations that would show that there was something of a national character that had to be dealt with. Because I have not received any representation does not mean that there may not be some made after the Ontario government has ascertained the extent and magnitude of what has taken place.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, without being unduly concerned about the constitutional division of authority, in view of the concern which this matter is causing not only in Ontario but also in the United States, may I suggest that an examination be made by the departmental engineers to see whether in fact there is any practical way in which this serious situation can be dealt with?

Mr. St. Laurent: I am sure that that is being done by the officers of the Department of Public Works. It is not only in respect of these international waters that examinations are being made. I know that representations are coming from sections of the province of Quebec asking for federal assistance in connection with damages resulting from the action of waters at this season. I know that the inspectors of the Department of Public Works are examining all these situations, because quite frequently the assertion is made, not always founded on fact, that the disaster is in some way attributable to works done by or omissions of the Department of Public Works in connection with navigable waters.

Mr. Fraser: This must be the only thing that the government does not control.

Mr. St. Laurent: I did not understand what the hon. member said.

HIGHWAYS

NIPAWIN-FLIN FLON, MAN.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. M. Ferrie (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Resources and Development if he will table the correspondence between the government of Saskatchewan and himself with regard to highway No. 35 from Nipawin to Flin Flon in the years 1951 and 1952?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Subject to the general reservation with regard to approval by the provincial government respecting their correspondence, I shall be glad to table the correspondence.

AMERICAN AIR LINES

REPORTED MOVEMENT OF CANADIAN EMPLOYEES TO BUFFALO FOR LIE DETECTOR TEST

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if he has had a complete report on the circumstances surrounding an incident where eight Canadian employees of American Air Lines were required to take a lie detector test only to find that the test was to be made in Buffalo instead of in Toronto as they had expected?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The answer is no.

Mr. Fulton: Has Colonel McCormick any comment to make?

Mrs. Fairclough: Does the minister propose to take steps to prevent such unwarranted action on the part of United States companies operating in Canada?

Mr. Garson: The matter will be investigated.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE ORDERED ON MARCH 12

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Wentworth): Will the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture be good enough to advise the house when we may expect the correspondence relative to foot-and-mouth disease which was ordered tabled on March 12?

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): I will look into the matter and see what can be done.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

QUESTION AS TO APPLICATION TO FISHERMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour the present position in respect to fishermen being considered eligible to receive unemployment insurance.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I thank the hon. member for sending me notice of this question. The unemployment insurance commission carried out a survey of the fishing industry in 1951, excluding the fish processing portion of the industry which has always been insurable employment. Consequently we have a good deal of information and I can give my hon. friend a long answer or a short answer. I think I shall give him the short answer, and then if there is any further information the hon. member would like I shall be glad to provide it.

It was found that those engaged in the industry could be classified as follows:

	Number	Percentage
Masters and owners	14,094	16
Wage earners	6,172	7
Sharesmen	49,148	56
Lone workers	18,762	21
Total number	88,176

The commission further found that the sharesmen, being in effect self-employed, are not suitable for coverage under the Unemployment Insurance Act. To insure the wage earners who are employed under a contract of service would not solve the problem as they number only 7 per cent of the total labour force in this industry. Anomalies would be created because of the great extent to which fishermen pass back and forth between the status of wage earners, workers on shares and lone workers, not to mention woods and farm workers. The nature of the industry, which is highly seasonal, makes it very difficult under present procedures and conditions to apply unemployment insurance even to the wage earners.

As my hon. friend knows, the difficulties which I have outlined apply with special emphasis to the Atlantic coast fishing industry.

PRIVATE BILLS

LILLIAN MAY HOLLOWAY O'BRIEN

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved the second reading of Bill No. 32, for the relief of Lillian May Holloway O'Brien.

Mr. Speaker: I notice there are a number of divorce bills on the order paper; is it the wish of the house that I call them?

Mr. Coldwell: One at a time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I ask that these bills should be considered one at a time. Last Friday evening we did suggest that the group of bills in connection with which the evidence had been placed before hon. members might be taken together. However, that suggestion was not approved by the sponsor, and I have had no indication today from the sponsor as to his wishes regarding these bills. Consequently I gather that he desires that they should be dealt with as they were on Friday evening, one at a time.

I do not propose going into a prolonged discussion on this bill. In this case I have read the evidence, and I notice that it is quite clear as to the reasons for seeking a dissolution of the marriage. But I cannot refrain from pointing out that once again investigators are involved.

In this particular case the chairman of the Senate committee, Hon. W. M. Aseltine, made the statement that in his opinion the petitioner, in this case a woman, should not have been put to the expense of having an investigator to investigate this case since there was a birth registered by a mother who was not the wife of the person accused of the offence in this particular bill. As the hon. senator said, once again we have an investigator, and unnecessarily so in this case.

One odd thing about this case is that when the investigator who had made the investigation, Abe Golden, was called to give evidence as a witness, the crier reported that he was engaged in the other committee room. In other words, he was engaged in another divorce case in which he had been the investigator. The chairman then asked the solicitor for the plaintiff, Mr. Garber, if it would interfere with the proper presentation of his case to have another witness called in the meantime. Mr. Garber said that it would not, and Harry Maxham was then called. The evidence states:

> Harry Maxham appeared as a witness on behalf of the petitioner, and, having been duly sworn, testified as follows . . .

I do not want to put the testimony on the record, but here apparently are two men in partnership as investigators in connection with this type of case. Apparently they are so busy that one was appearing in a case in another committee room, and the result is that the evidence given is not that of the witness who actually swore to the accuracy of the charge, if you care to call it that, but that of the partner who testified on behalf of the other investigator, Mr. Golden.

This is something that indicates once again the position in which the house is put with respect to divorce cases. I am not criticizing the members of the other place, nor am I criticizing the committees of the other place which investigate these cases. A year or two ago, at the invitation of the chairman of one of their divorce committees, I attended one morning and observed the manner in which they dealt with divorce cases, and I must say that I had no quarrel with the manner in which the committee dealt with them at that time. The case now before us was in all probability inquired into with a lot of other cases, and under pressure, because, as I have already indicated, one of the witnesses was actually engaged in another divorce hearing in another committee room. Such circumstances indicate clearly the pressure under which the hon. gentlemen of the other place operate in handling divorce cases.

I doubt whether more than a handful of the members of this house have read the evidence in the case now before us, but I believe it is one where there may be justification for the plea that is made. Hon. members are very tired indeed of discussing divorce cases. We are very tired of having cases of this sort come before us, and we are tired this afternoon because once again more cases are before us. If the motion for second reading is challenged I do not know what the result of the vote will be, but, as I pointed out on Friday night, many hon. members refuse to have anything to do with divorce cases. On Friday night there were three votes. Out of 256 members available to vote, seventy-six voted in the first instance, seventy-seven in the second case and seventy-nine in the third, indicating most clearly that hon. members do not want to have anything to do with these bills.

I think it is wrong that those who, because they are in attendance in the house, feel they are compelled to vote on these cases, are called upon to exercise that obligation. I do not think it is fair that those who belong to religious organizations that do not tolerate divorce under any circumstances should be called upon to consider them. I think that the bill now before us should not be proceeded with until the house has had an opportunity to give serious consideration to any alternative proposals there may be for removing this obligation from members of the House of Commons and placing it where these cases can be dealt with in a different manner and apart altogether from the membership of this house.

I realize that it is not right and proper for a minority, no matter what we think, to inflict our view upon the majority. Perhaps in discussing these cases only a minority of hon. members are vocal, but I believe in this instance the minority represents the opinion of the majority. The same thing applies to the cases themselves. I do not think a majority has the right to say that nobody shall grant divorces, because minorities have a right to individual and personal freedom; but I do not think this house should be compelled to deal with the case now before us or any of the other cases on the list today.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

> That this bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house further consideration of this bill should be deferred until this house has had an opportunity to discuss alternative methods of dealing with this divorce application.

I am limiting the amendment to the one particular bill, because in that way I believe that what I am suggesting is within the rules of the House of Commons. I am not anxious to force this matter to a division, and if the Prime Minister or the government generally care to give some assurance to the house that an alternative method of dealing with this divorce application and others that may come before us hereafter will be adopted, I shall not press the matter to a division.

I do not want to call for a division with respect to this particular bill, because I think there is some validity in the plea made for dissolution of the marriage. I think, however, that something must be done about this matter, because the present procedure is making the House of Commons a butt for ridicule. I think the dignity of parliament is undermined when we have to discuss bills of this description, and I know that members of the other place feel very much the same about the question as many hon. members of this house. Indeed I know that the chairman of one of the divorce committees of the other place last year said he would not accept the chairmanship of or membership on one of these committees again. Therefore I move this amendment in order that we may try as a parliament to refer this matter to a place where it can receive proper consideration and so that we may be relieved of a most unpleasant responsibility.

Mr. Pouliot: May I ask the hon. member a question? What is the alternative that the hon. member would suggest?

Mr. Coldwell: I refrained from mentioning any alternative because I wish to remain strictly within the rules of the house. I think that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has suggested an alternative on a number of occasions. He has suggested removing this matter from parliament and placing it under a federal court of law that would sit only in the city of Ottawa. Therefore no court would be established in the province of Quebec or in the province of Newfoundland. We would simply transfer from this house to a federal court sitting in Ottawa the responsibility of making proper judicial decisions which we of necessity cannot make.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. gentleman has said that he wishes to remain strictly within the rules, but I am afraid that assertion of his desire is not in accordance with the amendment he has moved. The effect of the amendment is that the bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house consideration should be deferred until the house has had an opportunity to discuss alternative methods of dealing with this divorce application. But there is no alternative method. If it is a bill for divorce, the constitutional procedure is that it comes here from the other place, is given first and second readings, and is then referred to a committee to ascertain whether the facts upon which the prayer is based can be established to the satisfaction of that committee. I do not think there can be any alternative way of dealing with a private application to parliament for extraordinary relief in the form of a bill. It seems to me that the amendment is nothing but an enlarged negative which would deny second reading of the bill because what it suggests is something that can have no other practical result.

With respect to the other matter, I know the hon. gentleman is as anxious as I am to avoid religious controversies in this country. He has said he realizes there are religious denominations which do not admit of divorce. There are other denominations which do, and he says, I think quite properly, that the majority should not force upon the minority who do not believe in divorce the acceptance of divorce as a legal institution.

Mr. Coldwell: Or vice versa.

Mr. St. Laurent: On the other hand the larger minority should not force upon a smaller minority the position that there could never be any divorce at all. That is the position of my hon. friend, and I think generally hon. members will feel it is reasonable. In democratic institutions the majority must not disregard the honest views of the minority. It must try to accommodate itself to those views in matters that do not endanger the safety of the civil state. Likewise I think the larger minority must seek to accommodate itself to the honest views of the smaller minority, where it does not endanger the safety of the civil state.

As the hon. gentleman knows, this matter has been under consideration many times. A few years ago earnest consideration was given to a system under which there would be official examiners who, on applications for divorce based upon adultery, would inquire into the facts and make reports. Then there might be one omnibus bill that would have as a schedule the reports of these examiners in all these cases, so the matter could be dealt with on one occasion and only one during each session. It seemed that might have something to recommend it, because it would not mean the establishment of divorce as a legal institution but would be merely another method of enabling persons to make application for special legislation to deal with their special cases. The only difference would be that instead of dealing with one application at a time, after all cases had been investigated the reports would be annexed as a schedule to an omnibus bill, and they would be dealt with at one time.

After consideration by the gentlemen of the other house, however, it was found that they would not be agreeable to this change. They felt that if they were going to take the responsibility of adopting the legislation they should satisfy themselves as to the facts. This house might very well take the same view and say it wanted to satisfy itself by firsthand examinations of the witnesses as to the propriety or otherwise of exercising special jurisdiction.

Because of the diverging views at that time, and because there was no other alternative but the one suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), which means establishing divorce as a legal institution to which one has a right if he establishes certain conditions, it was felt that the old system, with all its inconveniences and all its annoyances, which had been working for a number of years and had not occasioned any serious religious controversies, setting up one section of the population against another section, was after all less harmful to continue than to try some other system.

I have never attended any of these hearings in the other place. However, I have been told by the gentlemen who have attended, and who have also attended hearings in the courts, that the proceedings in the other place compare very favourably with those in the courts of Canada where divorce jurisdiction is exercised. Perhaps it is not our normal function to deal with these matters, but it is no more disagreeable for us individually to deal with them than it is for the gentlemen who sit on the bench in our courts of law. It is unfortunate that human nature should be such that these cases do arise. If there were not the honest and conscientious conviction that in certain cases divorces were a good thing the solution would be to deny divorces. But there are some who have the honest and conscientious belief that under certain conditions divorces are right and produce better results than their denial. On this continent of North America one can doubt whether it is only in cases where there is the conscientious conviction that a divorce is going to be beneficial that divorces are granted. The proportion has become alarmingly great. Under those conditions, when you cannot make a change that is apt to be better than what you are changing from, is it not as well not to attempt a change?

Perhaps I should not have said this on the point of order, but I do urge the point of order in regard to the motion which would deny second reading of the bill.

Mr. Knowles: First may I say that some of us over here appreciate the forthright statement just made by the Prime Minister, even though he was just discussing the point of order. With respect to that point of order, if I may say so with great respect I think he has answered it himself. The Prime Minister doubted that it would be possible for us to do what the motion asks, namely, discuss alternative methods of dealing with these divorce applications. Then he proceeded to do that very thing, to discuss one alternative method, if not two. That is all the motion asks, that this house be given an opportunity to discuss alternative methods of dealing with these divorce applications. As my leader has already pointed out, he is not presenting this motion with any desire to divide the house but rather with a view to having a discussion on the question and a statement from the government. In effect we have had a bit of a statement already by the Prime Minister, and I would hope that after some discussion from various quarters of the house there might be a further statement.

With respect to the point as to whether the motion is in order, I would remind Your Honour that it is based upon the authority of citation 657 of Beauchesne's third edition. I need not read the whole citation because it has been put on Hansard so often, but it does make it clear that on the motion for second reading of a bill it is possible to move an amendment stating—> —some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principle, policy, or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution . . .

And so on.

On the basis of that citation frequent amendments have been moved to government bills, public bills and private bills along the lines of the amendment now before us. With respect to private bills I would point out that on two or three occasions similar amendments have been moved to pipe line bills. For example, on November 18, 1949, at page 1979 of Hansard, one was moved by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). On November 25 of the same year, at page 2256 of Hansard, one was moved by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). I believe I should read the terms of that amendment, because of its similarity to this one. It reads:

> That this bill be not now read a second time but that further consideration thereof be deferred until this house has had an opportunity to record its opinion . . .

And then a certain opinion is spelled out. This amendment asks precisely the same thing, that further consideration of this bill be deferred until the house has had an opportunity of entering into a discussion of this matter.

While I am on my feet, and since the question of possible points of order has been drawn to Your Honour's attention, I should like to say that this motion does not refer to the subject matter of a bill standing in my name on the order paper. It stays clear of that. I submit that any discussion of this motion should not involve a discussion of that particular proposal, but that it could involve a discussion of any other proposal that hon. members may have in mind. In fact, I would say that is one of the reasons for presenting the motion in this form. My proposal is contained in a bill which is before the house and the country; opinions have been expressed upon it. There are those who support my proposal and there are some who do not like it. But all agree that we do not like the practice now being followed, so here is an opportunity for members of the house to suggest other methods that might be considered.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in those terms the amendment is in order. I believe it would be desirable to have a discussion to see what the ideas of hon. members are as to other possible methods, in addition to the alternative methods to which the Prime Minister referred in his remarks.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think the hon. member should distinguish between the precedents he cites and this motion. This motion seeks to defer consideration of this bill until there has been an opportunity to discuss alternative methods dealing with this specific divorce application. This divorce bill arises out of a petition to parliament to grant a special dispensation. It does not involve the setting up of divorce as an institution. The only procedure for dealing with this application is by an act of parliament, and at this stage there is no alternative which can be suggested to the motion that we agree or refuse to agree to the second reading of this special act of parliament.

Mr. Knowles: May I point out to the Prime Minister that in the case of each of the precedents I cited a particular bill was before the house, but the amendment suggested doing something else before we would agree to the second reading of the bill.

Mr. McIvor: I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. When these bills are sent to the committee, is there an opportunity given to the committee or to any member of the house to examine them?

Mr. St. Laurent: The rules of the house are not for interpretation by the Prime Minister, but the rules concerning private bills imply that they are sent to a committee so that the committee can assert to the house whether or not the allegations upon which the application is made are founded in fact. It would be within the powers of the committee to require the attendance of witnesses and the production of papers, or to make any kind of investigation that would enable the committee to say to the house whether or not, in its opinion, the allegations had been established.

Mr. Fulton: May I just say a word on the point of order? It occurs to me that there is a striking similarly between the amendment offered on an earlier occasion when a private bill to incorporate a pipe line was being discussed, and the amendment offered on this occasion. Your Honour will recall that under the Pipe Lines Act, there was a provision made by parliament that on subsequent occasions individuals who wished to incorporate a pipe line company would come before parliament requesting an act of incorporation. It was when those individuals, in compliance with that law, made their request and the house was proceeding with the bill based on that request that it was suggested by way of amendment that the bill be not further proceeded with but that the house should then consider the advisability, instead of incorporating pipe line companies, of placing all pipe lines under public ownership.

This suggestion was placed before the house, and the amendment was regarded as being in order. It seems to me it was practically identical in form with the suggestion which is now made. Pursuant to the provisions of the British North America Act certain petitioners have appeared before this parliament, and a bill, in accordance with their petition, has been framed. It has been considered by the Senate and is now before the house. The suggestion here is that instead of proceeding with that bill the house should consider alternative methods of handling this problem of divorce, and this specific divorce, which is exactly the same as saying that instead of proceeding with a pipe line bill we should consider alternative methods of handling pipe lines. I submit that the point made by the member for Winnipeg North Centre as to the earlier amendment having been in order establishes clearly that this amendment is in order under these circumstances.

Mr. Speaker: We have before us a motion for second reading of a divorce bill. The amendment is:

> That this bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house further consideration of this bill should be deferred until this house has had an opportunity to discuss alternative methods of dealing with this divorce application.

It has been brought to my attention that similar amendments have been allowed in the past. I have not before me the wording of the similar amendments, but I do not think it was suggested that the wording was exactly the same as the wording of this amendment. In any event, on both occasions which were mentioned, I do not think any objection was made to the regularity of the motion. I do not think I was asked to give a ruling on the motion, so the point of order was not considered. If I am wrong in that respect, I should like to be corrected now.

Mr. Knowles: I believe that is so, but the motions were put to a recorded vote.

Mr. Speaker: That has no bearing on whether or not the amendment was in order. We did not discuss the regularity of the amendment at that time; therefore I made no ruling. I am not in the difficult position of having to change my ruling.

Amendments to second readings of bills are made under the provisions of citation 657 of Beauchesne's third edition, wherein it states:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill,—

This amendment does not come within the scope of those words.

> —or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction,—

The amendment does not come within the provision of those words.

> —or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress;—

I suppose it might be argued that this amendment is opposed to its progress. I do not think the meaning of the words, "otherwise opposed to its progress" can be interpreted as bringing in such a wide amendment as this.

The citation continues:

—or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence or the opinion of judges.

I do not see how this amendment comes within the provisions of citation 657.

If I recall correctly, those who contended that the motion was in order based their contention first upon the fact that similar amendments have been allowed in the past. I have stated my position in regard to that point. The other contention was that it came within the provisions of citation 657, and as I have stated I do not think it comes within the provisions of that citation. The motion seems to be a negative one. It is stated in the motion that the house should not give second reading to the bill until the house has had an opportunity to discuss alternative methods of dealing with this divorce application. I do not know when, if ever, and I do not think any hon. member knows when, if ever, the house will have an opportunity to discuss alternative methods of dealing with this divorce application.

The suggestion is that the second reading should be held up until a situation does happen which may never happen. I doubt whether it would be in order to hold up the bill under that circumstance.

The other point which has been raised by the Prime Minister is that this amendment proposes to hold up the second reading of the bill until the house has had an opportunity to discuss alternative methods of dealing with this—I emphasize the word "this"—divorce application. Our rules do not provide for any other method of dealing with this divorce application. Under all the circumstances I cannot allow the amendment to stand. Is the house ready for the question?

Motion (Mr. Winkler) agreed to.

Mr. Coldwell: On division.

Motion agreed to on division and bill read the second time.

JEAN MARIE WEEKS OPZOOMER

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved the second reading of Bill No. 34, for the relief of Jean Marie Weeks Opzoomer.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Gagnon: On division.

Mr. Coldwell: On division.

Motion agreed to on division and bill read the second time.

MARGARET ELIZABETH STRANGE COLTON

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved the second reading of Bill No. 37, for the relief of Margaret Elizabeth Strange Colton.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the other two bills that have been given second reading are bills in connection with which the evidence had been distributed. We come now to the first of a large number of bills up for second reading today in connection with which we do not have the evidence. I might point out that when we started this afternoon there were 111 divorce bills on the order paper for second reading. Forty of those are bills in connection with which the evidence has been distributed, leaving 71 in connection with which we do not have the evidence. I wonder whether the hon. member for Lisgar, who is sponsoring these bills, is in his mood of last Friday night or in his mood of last Tuesday night. I wonder whether he might consider allowing the 71, in connection with which we do not have the evidence, to stand?

Mr. Winkler: I agree to let them stand.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lisgar has consented. Does the house consent to the applications for divorce in connection with which the evidence has been distributed being read collectively at this time?

Mr. Coldwell: Not collectively.

Mr. Knowles: I think what the hon. member said was, he was prepared to let the 71 stand.

Mr. Speaker: I did not follow him.

Mr. Howe: Let us take them one by one as they come.

Mr. Speaker: Let us settle one point at a time. Is it agreed that the bills in connection with which the evidence has not been distributed shall stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed. Is it also agreed that the bills in connection with which the evidence has been distributed shall be read collectively?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: If I have the numbers I will put the motion.

Mr. Knowles: Do I have to go to bat again? In addition to the two that have already been read, Mr. Speaker, the bills in connection with which the evidence is in our hands are the following: 46, 52, 58, 59, 67, 68, 69, 70, 78, 88, 95, 97, 100, 102, 103, 109, 111, 113, 114, 115, 118, 121, 122, 123, 131, 133, 134, 135, 137, 139. I stop there to suggest that there is a typographical error on the order paper in the name in connection with Bill No. 139.

Mr. Sinnott: You must find them interesting.

Mr. Knowles: The next ones are: 140, 143, 151, 153, 154, 155, 156, 162. These bills total 38, and with the two that were passed previously make 40. I think that is enough divorces for the House of Commons to pass in one day.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): That's what you think.

Motion stands.

Mr. Howe: On division.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Coldwell: On division.

Motion agreed to on division and bills read the second time.

SECOND READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 61, respecting the British Northwestern Fire Insurance Company.—Mr. Henry.

GULF PULP AND PAPER COMPANY

Mr. Lomer Brisson (Saguenay) moved the second reading of Bill No. 91, respecting Gulf Pulp and Paper Company.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member who is sponsoring the bill make a brief statement about it?

(Translation):

Mr. Brisson: Mr. Speaker, the Gulf Pulp and Paper Company was incorporated under chapter 85 of the Statutes of 1902, as the "North Shore Power Railway and Navigation Company" which, under chapter 99 of the Statutes of 1914, became the "Gulf Pulp and Paper Company".

This company is subject to the terms of part III of the Companies Act, 1934. Section 190 of the Companies Act provides that no company subject to the said part III shall use any of its funds in the purchase of shares in any other corporation, unless in so far as such purchase is specially authorized by its act of incorporation. Section 145 provides also that any company coming under the terms of the said part may be exempted from any of its provisions.

The Gulf Pulp and Paper Company owns certain waterpower on the Ste. Marguerite river, in Saguenay county, which were granted to it by letters patent in 1903. The company also fully owns a wide stretch of land along the river. They have also acquired certain rights from the Quebec government in order to develop more profitably the waterpower in question.

Plans have been made for the construction of a dam on the Ste. Marguerite river with a view to developing a minimum of about 25,000 horsepower. The construction costs will amount to approximately $6 million. This development is being undertaken jointly by the Gulf Pulp and Paper Company and the Iron Ore Company of Canada. As you know, the latter company is preparing to develop the iron deposits of New Quebec and Labrador. The power from the Ste. Marguerite river development will be used for the mining of these iron deposits at the Sept Iles terminus.

We understand that the development of these deposits is part of or closely related to the defence program. This development will also benefit the Gulf Pulp and Paper Company, which is now unable to operate twelve months a year, as it lacks water during the winter months. This inconvenience will be remedied by the construction of the dam, which will store water the year round. We forgot to mention that the Gulf Pulp and Paper Company is now manufacturing woodpulp.

The Gulf Pulp and Paper Company and the Iron Ore Company of Canada have agreed to form a new company with a view to developing the waterpower in question. This company is named the Gulf Power Company. Moreover, both firms intend to subscribe to the capital of the newly-formed company an amount of about $1,600,000.

However, as under section 190 of the Companies Act, the Gulf Pulp and Paper Company is not allowed to subscribe to the capital of the new firm, we are asking parliament to amend the act incorporating the Gulf Pulp and Paper Company in order to enable the company to acquire shares in other companies. Besides, that power is normally granted ordinary companies and provided for in subparagraph (e), subsection 1 of section 14 of the Companies Act, 1934.

Section 13 of the act incorporating the Gulf Pulp and Paper Company also limits the borrowing power of the company to the amount of its capital stock issued as paid-up and unassessable.

We feel that we should take the opportunity of completely revamping section 13 of the act incorporating the said company, so as to grant it the ordinary borrowing powers provided in subsections 1, 2 and 3 of section 63 of the Companies Act, 1934.

Mr. Pouliot: Would the hon. member say who are the present directors of this company? Who is behind this bill? Who are the present directors?

Mr. Cruickshank: Is the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) a director of the said company?

(Text):

An hon. Member: No, he is not.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am asking the hon. member.

Mr. Pouliot: I should like to have an answer to my question. I think it is a reasonable one. We are not dealing with abstractions; we are dealing with men; and I should like to know who is behind the move to have that amendment?

Mr. Cruickshank: That is the question I asked, only in French.

Mr. Pouliot: You asked it in Latin.

(Translation):

Mr. Brisson: Mr. Speaker, the two companies involved are the Gulf Pulp and Paper Company and the Iron Ore Company of Canada, of which Messrs. Charles Bigonesse, of Quebec city, and Jules Timmins, of Montreal, are the respective managers.

(Text):

Mr. Fraser: Will this bill be referred to the banking and commerce committee?

Mr. Speaker: I understand that this bill will be referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Mr. Fraser: It should go to the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

PERTH MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. J. N. Corry (Perth) moved the second reading of Bill No. 92, to incorporate the Perth Mutual Fire Insurance Company.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. member give us an explanation as lucid as the one we just had?

Mr. Corry: This company was organized on October 2, 1863 under chapter 52 of the Consolidated Statutes of Upper Canada, 1859. The original name was County of Perth Mutual Fire Insurance Company. It was originally on a mutual plan only. In 1877 the name was changed to Perth Mutual Fire Insurance Company, and they commenced operations on a cash basis as well as continuing the mutual plan. They were licensed in the province of Quebec in 1938, and also in 1938 obtained supplementary letters patent in the province of Ontario to write all classes of insurance except life.

In 1947 the company was licensed in the province of British Columbia, and in 1950 in the province of Alberta. Therefore it has been writing insurance in four provinces and by way of re-insurance in the whole dominion. The present company, it is expected, will be absorbed by the new company which seeks incorporation, and the directorate and the management will be the same as the present directorate and management.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

[Mr. Brisson.]

STANDING ORDERS

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT RESPECTING DEBATES AND PROCEDURE IN COMMITTEES

Mr. Hughes Cleaver (Halton) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the standing orders of this house should be amended in regard to debates and in regard to procedure in standing and select committees in order to bring the rules of debate more in line with present day needs and that, inter alia, such amendments should specifically provide: (a) for the passage of allocation time orders by this house with respect to any measure brought before it and that motions for allocation time orders should be put by Mr. Speaker, including all underlying amendments, after sixty minutes of debate have elapsed; (b) for the fixation in standing orders of a time limit on debates on the address in reply to the speech from the throne and the debate on the budget, after the expiration of which periods of time, the motion and all underlying amendments would be put by Mr. Speaker; (c) for the limiting to one half hour of the debate on all procedural motions and underlying amendments; (d) for provision that at the expiration of the seventh allotted day the chairman of the committee of supply and ways and means shall forthwith and without further debate put every question necessary to dispose of all of the votes of the departmental estimates under consideration; (e) for the requirement that at least four members should rise in their seats to express opposition for a request for unanimous consent to a suspension of the rules, otherwise unanimous consent of the house to be presumed when requested.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I want to admit frankly at once that I do not claim to have any profound knowledge of the standing orders or of the rules of debate. In 1951 the house was in session for eight months. A check of Hansard discloses that if members on the government side of the house had taken up as much time as members of the opposition groups—

Mr. Noseworthy: Why should they?

Mr. Cleaver: —we would not have finished the work of the house in twelve months. One would have thought that after being in session for eight months the house could have completed its work in an orderly fashion in time for hon. members who live some distance from Ottawa to be home with their families at Christmas. But on the Thursday before Christmas twenty-seven members of the Conservative opposition—the total membership of that group is less than one-fifth the total membership of the house—apparently made up their minds that that was not going to happen. Because of three succeeding amendments to a procedural motion —which by the way if introduced in the house at Westminster by a minister of the crown is carried without any amendment being permitted and without any debate—the house spent all of that Thursday discussing what hours we would work on Thursday.

Mr. Fulton: The procedural motion was not introduced by a minister in that case.

Mr. Sinnott: You will get your chance.

Mr. Cleaver: I will let any hon. member follow me who wants to split hairs on niceties. I am just interested in the broad general lines and am giving the reasons for introducing this resolution.

To me the only thing which that Thursday before Christmas clearly demonstrated was the fact that our rules are urgently in need of amendment. Under the rules of the house there was nothing at all to prevent a similar performance the next day and the day after.

Mr. Fraser: That was the government's fault.

Mr. Cleaver: While it is a primary and cardinal rule that the opposition has the duty and the right to discuss thoroughly and to criticize all government measures, I suggest that there is one rule much more important than that, a rule which must be followed if in the final analysis we are to continue as a democracy—the right of the majority to rule.

Mr. Hodgson: With an iron hand and with a steamroller behind you.

Mr. Cleaver: The British House of Commons has a membership over twice as large as ours and serves a population four times that of Canada. I think it is an understatement to say that in Great Britain they have problems of government quite as difficult and as important as our own, but notwithstanding that fact, by an orderly procedure and certain other features of their standing orders and rules of debate they are able to perform their task in much less time.

A three-way exchange took place on March 5 last which I think headlines in a few words what I want to say. I quote from page 136 of Hansard as follows:

> Mr. Drew: I say this with the utmost seriousness. The laughter of hon. members in regard to this matter merely indicates that they have overlooked the fact that the House of Commons at Westminster, which we follow to a considerable extent, has no time limit on speeches; but because of the planning of debates, and the indication ahead as to when the debates are to take place, it is able to do the extremely important business which is carried on there in a much shorter time than we do ours.
> Mr. Claxton: Because it has a timetable.
> Mr. Whitman: There are no filibusters there.

The house at Westminster is able to do the extremely important business which is carried on there in a much shorter time than we do ours. We have the reason.

> Mr. Claxton: Because it has a timetable.

Then the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Whitman) gives us one of the causes for the great delay which takes place in this house. He says:

> There are no filibusters there.

I hope the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) will not change his mind. I hope he meant what he said—

Mr. Sinnott: He is not here today.

Mr. Cleaver: —and I hope he will support—

Mr. Fraser: He is here today.

Mr. Cleaver: —this resolution. I have purposely drafted my resolution in terms wide enough to permit any and every member of the house who wishes to do so to give his views as to ways and means by which our debating practice can be improved. The first paragraph of my resolution is very general in its terms. Then I follow with five amendments which I suggest. You, Mr. Speaker, and the members of the house have heard the leader of the Conservative opposition, the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) and many other members comment favourably from time to time on the practice at Westminster. Therefore I took the trouble to read the British Hansards, and I hope the house will bear with me while I put on the record under broad headings what takes place in one week in the British house. Apparently the practice there is that on Thursday the government announces the business of the house for the whole of the following week. I should now like to read from the British Hansard of February 28 of this year:

Business of the House

Mr. Attlee: May I ask the leader of the house to state the business for next week?

It is not for one day but for "next week". The answer is as follows:

Monday, 3rd March—Supply (2nd allotted day): Committee stage of the civil estimates and estimates for revenue departments vote on account, 1952-53.

A debate will take place on the appointment of Lord Waverley as chairman of the royal commission on the taxation of profits and income.

Tuesday, 4th March—Supply (3rd allotted day):

Then follows the detail.

Wednesday, 5th March—Debate on defence, which will take place on a government motion to approve the white paper.

On looking up the British Hansard for March 5 I find that Mr. Churchill opened the debate. In the motherland the debate on defence is of course quite as important as the debate on defence in our House of Commons. Defence is a very important subject at the present time. The debate on this subject was limited to one day. It started at 3.35 p.m. and continued until 9.58 p.m. when the question was put on a recorded division. Sixteen members took part in the debate and their average speaking time was about eighteen minutes. The house then proceeded with the other work indicated on the agenda for that day and sat until 2 a.m. On the following day, March 6, the house dealt with the navy estimates, and anticipating that the debate would go beyond ten o'clock a motion was moved extending the hours of the sitting. It was in this form:

That this day the business of supply may be taken after ten o'clock and shall be exempted from the provisions of standing order No. 1, sittings of the house.

That motion, as provided for in their standing orders, was carried without amendment and without any debate. The standing order in that regard is standing order No. 1, paragraph 6(b). On March 6 the house went on with the navy estimates. Then on Friday the house reached private members' day, half of which I believe is taken up with private members' bills and the other half with private members' motions. On checking through the record for that week I find the agenda for the entire week was carried through in regular fashion as announced on the Thursday before without any quibbling or any cross-fire about it. The government simply announced that on this, that and the other day the house would do a certain part of the business of the country.

[Mr. Cleaver.]

Hon. members may wonder how that can be brought about. Apparently in the British rules there are two instruments. One is closure under standing orders 29 and 30. Any member may move closure but to be operative it must have a majority support of 100. The other remedy is the passage of time allocation orders with respect to individual subjects, commonly termed the guillotine. It is very seldom used. The first occasion I could find when it was used was back in 1932, and if members would like to refer to the 1932 British Hansard, fifth series, volume 269, page 1320, they will be able to obtain full information with respect to it. I could not find any recent illustration. Apparently the very fact that the power is there is all that is necessary to achieve the result. I understand the practice is that the parties of the house, through their whips or other representatives, reach an agreement as to what time of the house will be devoted to a particular subject. Then after the length of time is decided upon the Speaker allots the time to the government and the opposition in total. In turn the whips of the parties reach agreement among their own members as to the members who will speak and the amount of time they will be allowed. I am told that if any member is foolish enough to abuse his privilege of speaking and takes more time than is allotted to him the Speaker just does not see him again for a session or two. The end result of all this is that there they have an orderly procedure. Every member knows in advance what subject is coming up on a given day. He has full opportunity to get ready for it. The time of debate is limited to the point where time is precious. They do not have any of this dreary reading of well-written essays. They have a lively and constructive debate on the subjects before them. Time is precious and should be treated in that way.

If I may come now to the five specific amendments I have suggested I should like to state at once that so far as I am concerned, after even a short study of the British practice, I should very much like to see our House of Commons follow the practice of Westminster in its entirety. I am frank to admit, however, that I believe it would be such a shock to some members of this house that a transition period might be necessary, so we should be perhaps a little more moderate in adopting the practice at Westminster.

Now coming to the five specific amendments, the first is:

(a) For the passage of allocation time orders by this house with respect to any measure brought before it and that motions for allocation time orders should be put by Mr. Speaker, including all underlying amendments, after sixty minutes of debate have elapsed.

Hon. members who would like to read up on this subject will find it fully dealt with in the fifteenth edition of May at page 461 and following. As I mentioned a few moments ago, I have not been able to find any recent record to give the house in regard to time allocation orders.

My next suggested amendment is:

(b) For the fixation in standing orders of a time limit on debates on the address in reply to the speech from the throne and the debate on the budget, after the expiration of which periods of time, the motion and all underlying amendments would be put by Mr. Speaker.

I have turned up British Hansards in regard to debates on the address. Hon. members will recall that the last session at Westminster was perhaps one of the longest and most hectic in many years. The government had a slim majority, and there was the threat of a general election hanging over the house for practically the entire period. On looking up the record I find that six days were devoted to the debate on the address. The mover of the address took thirteen minutes; the seconder took ten minutes. On the first day, October 31, 1950, seven and one-half hours were devoted to the debate. There were eighteen speakers, including the leader of the opposition and the Prime Minister. The average length of the speeches was twenty-five minutes. To summarize the debate on the address that session, it took forty-five and one-half hours; there were one hundred speakers, and the over-all average was twenty-six minutes per speaker. I ran across one thing that rather interested me, which I would like to mention now. On the fifth of the six allotted days Mr. Speaker made this statement, which will be found at page 606 of British Hansard, fifth series, volume 480. The house was then considering the housing amendment.

Mr. Speaker: Before I call the amendment, I am afraid I must inform the house that there are about fifty members who would like to speak today.

That was a short day. Twelve members spoke. When the time arrived for the vote on the amendment, it was taken; the other thirty-eight speakers simply did not have a chance to speak.

With respect to the debate on the address during the present session, it started on November 6 and concluded on November 13, lasting only six days or thirty-eight and one-half hours. There were 107 speakers and the average time per speaker was twenty-one minutes. The mover took thirteen minutes; the seconder took eleven minutes. Many speakers took less than fifteen minutes. It was a brisk and sparkling debate. It was quite obvious that no member was reading his speech. Every member who took part in that debate had something on his mind he wanted to get over to the house. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we would have a much better attendance in this house if our procedure were similar to that at Westminster.

Now I come to the next suggested amendment:

(c) For the limiting to one half hour of the debate on all procedural motions and underlying amendments.

In view of what I have already said in reference to what happened the Thursday before Christmas I need make no further comment on this proposed amendment:

The next proposed amendment is:

(d) For provision that at the expiration of the seventh allotted day the chairman of the committee of supply and ways and means shall forthwith and without further debate put every question necessary to dispose of all of the votes of the departmental estimates under consideration.

Under standing order 16 the British House of Commons provides that twenty-six days, being days before August 5, shall be allotted to the business of supply in each session. Hon. members will have noted that during the week I quoted the house was told what allotted day that day was. A very careful record is kept, and on the twenty-fourth day all outstanding votes are put without further debate. In framing my recommendation as I did I felt that it might be considered too drastic to accept in toto the British practice in regard to estimates, though as far as I am concerned I am all for the practice at Westminster. My suggestion was simply that we incorporate in our rules a provision whereby a serious filibuster on the estimates could not develop.

Now I come to the last suggested amendment:

(e) For the requirement that at least four members should rise in their seats to express opposition for a request for unanimous consent to a suspension of the rules, otherwise unanimous consent of the house to be presumed when requested.

I bring this up because of the fact that from time to time in connection with the work of the house, particularly in connection with committee work, often for good reasons bills will come quite late before the banking and commerce and other committees, and suspension of the rules is necessary unless the applicants are to be put to the trouble and expense and delay of coming back to parliament at another session. Usually consent is obtained without any difficulty. But on one occasion during the last session it did not look as if unanimous consent was going to be granted. I do believe that the work of the house should not be held up at the whim of one member. The suggested amendment is that it should be necessary for four members to rise in their places, not simply shout out that they object, and indicate that they are objecting to the granting of unanimous consent.

To sum up briefly, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish any member of this house to feel that this resolution is intended to encroach in any way upon the right and duty of an opposition group to criticize or discuss legislation that is brought before the house. I believe that is a paramount duty, and a paramount right. I believe that recently Mr. Churchill stated this in a very clear fashion when he was a member of the opposition. I shall read from a part of one of his speeches:

> The house is not only a machine for legislation. It is a great forum of debate and the process of legislation is not necessarily smooth because it is rapid and violent. The house ought to have the opportunity of moulding and shaping the laws which afterwards have to be obeyed by the people.

As I mentioned a short time ago, in addition to that cardinal rule, to me it is equally important that we should have majority rule. I thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): In joining this debate, Mr. Speaker, I must say that the remarks I shall have to make will be in somewhat unprepared style because I have not made any notes for a criticism paragraph by paragraph of the hon. member's resolution. Today I want, if I may, to discuss one or two matters which have been very close to my heart and attention during these years in the House of Commons. They are related to matters of which this resolution forms at least a part.

In common with others who have sat in this house for a good many years and have witnessed its deliberations, I have felt that there were streamlined reforms which parliament, in the light of its importance to the Canadian people and to democracy, ought to institute. I am quite sure that any of us who have, for instance, conversed with those who have sat in the galleries of this august chamber from time to time have found some rather interesting criticism from those who have witnessed for the first time the procedures of the great House of Commons. I am not going to detail those criticisms because they are so well known to every member that I need not bore the house with a repetition of them. There is no doubt in my mind that, whether or not we like it, there is a desire on the part of the public and the members of all parties to see if we cannot get a somewhat better procedure and better general working conditions in this parliament.

[Mr. Cleaver.]

One thing that has concerned most of us throughout the years has been the disposition towards longer sessions of the house, and in some instances of late to more sessions. I am not so sure however that all the criticism which has been levelled against parliamentarians concerning the length of time we sit here is entirely deserved. It may well be that we take too long in many of the discussions that are held, but do not let us forget the extent of the business which this parliament now handles as compared to what it was when I first came into this house with the hon. member who moved this resolution. A comparison between the work in those days and what it is now indicates that perhaps we are conducting the business of the house in almost as rapid a fashion as we were then.

Perhaps we could take as our yardstick the amount of money which is now requested in the estimates. I recall being appalled and dismayed—an opposition member always is appalled or dismayed over something—over the fact that we were spending almost $500 million in the budget of 1936. I cannot recall now what I said at that time, but I am quite sure that I took the government to task in no uncertain way and told them to make sure they would never let that kind of thing happen again. Of course, as usual, my advice was not heeded, so today we are in a position where eight and a half times that amount of money is being spent in one year by the federal government. It may be said that that is not an indication of the extent or comprehensiveness of the work of parliament, but it at least does serve as a yardstick for measuring the breadth of subjects with which parliament is concerned in these days. There was an added acceleration during the time of the war, and during the period of rehabilitation and reconstruction there was a still greater acceleration of that situation until today I am quite certain that many of the modes of procedure which were quite good in 1867, or even in 1936, are not now adequate. The sooner we can come to the conclusion that some changes have to be made, the better for parliament, the better for the country and the better for democracy itself.

I do not think we can approach this with any degree of dogma. We have to consider all the suggestions which are made in good faith from all sides of the chamber. This is not a party matter, it is a matter of settling our democratic procedure in this chamber for the conduct of business.

One thing which, from time to time, has been criticized in the press and in other places is the long-winded speeches that are made by backbenchers for the consumption of their own constituents. I am going to take issue with anybody who says that. I have never believed, since I came to this house, that time was wasted in listening to the ordinary private member on the back benches. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I very often find them more interesting, more instructive, and I am quite sure more informative as to the exact position with respect to Canadian affairs than some of those who have almost become professional in their advocacy of certain things on all sides of the House of Commons. Therefore I want to put in a word for the back bencher. I myself was a back bencher geographically for a long time. I have never considered myself anything more than that, although I now sit in the front row. I think that when we get to the position in parliament where we become just advocates for advocacy's sake, we lose our identity and our power and our influence, because actually the man who is on the back bench and who is representing that part of Canada which he knows best has something to contribute; and when he contributes, even if he speaks for only forty minutes, as is the case now, we ought to consider what he says, and the government ought to take heed, because he does represent a section of Canada just as though he were sitting beside the Prime Minister of Canada. That is of great importance.

When we take visitors through the House of Commons they often ask us to point out the seat the Prime Minister occupies. They always look at the Speaker's seat, because they have the idea that it must be the Prime Minister's. When you show them that the Prime Minister's seat in this house is the same as anybody else's seat, so far as its structure is concerned, they marvel at it. The reason is, of course, that in a great sense every member of the house has equal rights. Having that in mind, of course these rights have to be preserved. I do not want it ever to be said that we should get to the point where we can have just a little ring of members around the front who are doing all the debating and while the people on the back benches keep quiet for the rest of their lives. That is not what we should be doing.

More than that, when I hear people saying that the reason why we should have shorter speeches is the time that the back benchers take up, I take issue with them. I have never believed that. I have never been in favour of reducing the time of the ordinary back bencher who makes a speech perhaps once or twice a year for the people and on behalf of the people whom he represents in one part of Canada or the other.

When we come to the question of the length of time of speeches—and this has been a thorn in the flesh of every committee that has dealt with the subject—I personally on many occasions have thought that we could reduce the time of speaking. I know I did not have complete support from many sections of the house; nevertheless I did think that in the broad scheme of streamlining the work of the House of Commons there might perhaps be included somewhere a representation of that kind because, after all, it is much easier to make a long and windy speech such as I am making now in the house than it is to make a well-ordered, concise and effective speech like some of the others that have been made and will be made in this debate. I remember on one occasion hearing a very prominent statesman say that he had taken three days to prepare a speech which he was going to make in twelve minutes. He said: "If I were going to make a two-hour speech half an hour's preparation would be sufficient".

I now come to the part of my hon. friend's resolution that has to do with the allocation of time. I hope that he will not press this resolution, because I fancy the purpose and the objective he has in mind will be sufficiently served when his motion is debated and we are given an opportunity to discuss these matters which are of such vital interest to every commoner here. I do think the government's position particularly would be misinterpreted if one of its supporters were to press to a vote such a drastic proposal as the allocation of time in the House of Commons, because I would be forced at this stage to vote against it, and I do not like to vote against my neighbour more often than I have to.

On the question of arranging the time of the house, the hon. member mentioned the United Kingdom parliament. I hear a lot about the United Kingdom parliament, and in a good many respects I think it has served a purpose that no other democratic institution has. I remember going into the library of the United Kingdom parliament on one occasion and seeing there a plaque with a Speaker's name on it going back as far as 1277. I thought to myself, well, that is a pretty long time to be in the adventure of democracy and in the experiment of government. It is not much wonder that sometimes we, who have been a nation for only a little while, feel that we should take some of our advice from those who have been experimenting with this institution for so long. But there is one thing that my hon. friend did not mention, and which goes to the root of some of our problems, and I am not sure that any of us in the House of Commons can cure it. It is this. In the British house there are substantially only two political parties, although I must confess that in all fairness to the government we ought to mention at least under our breath the Liberal party, which does occupy some seats there now.

It is a vastly different business in the United Kingdom from what it is here. I am quite sure that the Prime Minister, his whip, and the Minister of Public Works, who handles the day-to-day affairs of the government leadership, can testify to the truth of what I say. When you have an official opposition, and then other groups to the left of that again to the number of two, and sometimes more than that, you have a problem which it is more difficult to solve than that in the United Kingdom, because there they have their procedure and their method of handling debates which have grown up through the years. I am quite certain that nothing in the way of too drastic solutions will reach the objective that we all have in mind, namely, the streamlining of the House of Commons.

When I first made a speech on this subject I fancied myself a regular Sir Galahad in these matters, and somehow or other I thought that all hon. members would gather round me after I had spoken and say, I heartily agree; we will bring in all these reforms. But I found there was hardly anybody who thought the same as I did. There were some of them who thought along the same line on some things I said and some of them supported me; nevertheless I found there was a wide division of ideas. When it came even to the question of how long we should sit in the house, I found that we never were able to get a completely unanimous opinion. But I want to say this to you, Mr. Speaker: I do not think we have to pass this resolution, or any other resolution, or have any more committees, so far as the sitting time of the house is concerned. I am in favour of going back to the hours we had at the last of last session, and keeping with them until we finish.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): Would you be willing to reduce the time of the speeches to thirty minutes?

Mr. Graydon: I would be willing to reduce everybody else's except the one I am making now.

In so far as the United Kingdom parliament is concerned, there is another point I want to raise. As has been very properly pointed out, debates there are naturally concentrated. It is a remarkable example of how they concentrate in close quarters around the subject at issue. Those of you who have witnessed those debates can corroborate me. Debates in the British house have a relation to the subject that few debates could have in this chamber. Our set-up in this chamber does not make for discussion of that kind. I suppose when we get the loudspeakers on our desks—

Mr. MacDougall: God forbid.

Mr. Graydon: The hon. member may have Victoria day on Monday by then, and he will not have to work. In any event, one of the troubles with this chamber is this; and in what I am now saying I am not suggesting it should be changed. On the other hand, we have got to consider the fact that this chamber is more like a cathedral than it is like a debating chamber. With a man away down at one end debating with the hon. member who just interrupted from down at the other end, how can you expect a profitable debate from the standpoint of those two members? It is not possible to have that sort of debate in this chamber, but it is possible in the United Kingdom chamber in which no member has a seat allocated to him. The result is that you see the cabinet, the secretaries, the under-secretaries and so on all huddled up, close together. I remember seeing the late Hon. Ellen Wilkinson—who was a very small woman anyway, and who was a member of the Attlee cabinet—when she was sitting in the house. There were two big cabinet ministers sitting on each side of her and she was squeezed in between them into about four or five inches of space. It is the economy of space, of course, which makes the House of Commons at Westminster the great debating chamber that it is.

We must take things as we find them. You cannot perhaps change the complexion of this chamber or the geographical position of its seats; and perhaps the best thing we can do is to have a loudspeaker system so that we can at least hear what everyone says. But even with that system, in a chamber built as this one is, I do not think you will find that closeness and proximity in debate between members which is characteristic of Westminster.

I should now like to come to one other matter among those that have been raised. Having in mind the extension of the work of the House of Commons and of the government, how best can we fit our rules and our procedure in to take care of it? I know it is the old story about the question of the estimates and the like. I think we ought to do one of two things with some of the estimates. The estimates of the Department of External Affairs are now sent to the standing committee. Those who sit on that committee—I do not know whether other hon. members in the house have the same opinion—think it is a good committee of the house. We think that during past years it has done some useful work. It could not have had the success it has achieved had it not been for the distinguished chairmanship of the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette). As to the other estimates, I know there are arguments pro and con as to whether they should go to committees. I remember Mr. Neill, who sat for the constituency of Comox-Alberni, on one occasion, after I had raised the question of sending the estimates to committees, said to me: You had better be careful, young man, because you are in opposition; and this is no kind of proposal to come from the opposition benches.

That may be so. Nevertheless, it seems to me that we have two things to consider when we are deciding whether we should send the estimates to committees. First of all, we may as well admit right now that our whole committee set-up is out of date and is, to a large extent, a useless appendage appearing in our Hansards in the early part of the session. Some of the committees never meet at all. They are completely out of date. So far as the committees relate to the various departments of government, I am not so sure that we should not now consider having our standing committees set up with some relation to the matters that those committees will be investigating or those various items of legislation that are brought in by the ministers. As it is now, often one does not know to what committee something should be sent, because the committee set-up is so far out of date. You do not know whether matters should be sent to one committee or the other. I am strongly of the view that we should now make some attempt to alter our entire set-up with regard to the standing committees. The present set-up, in my opinion, is a relic of the horse and buggy days. Just because this was the way a thing happened to be done at the beginning of this century, I do not see why we should still be carrying on with these relics of the past.

There is a real job to be done in connection with our committees, having regard to changing the structure of them. When that is done, then of course you have a good chance to send the estimates of a particular minister's department to the appropriate committee. For instance, if you have a standing committee on public works, the estimates of the genial Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) would, of course, be referred to that committee, provided that the house so agreed; and so it would go all down the line. Having that procedure in mind, it would seem to me that we could remove from the House of Commons a good deal of time-consuming debate on certain questions. If you go through Hansard some time, you can observe the kind of questions that are asked of the ministers in the committee of the whole, and the answers that are given; and you will find that there is not much wonder that there are a great many members who are not in the chamber at those times. The taxpayers in the galleries say: Why are they all out, and why do only a few show any interest in the proceedings? The answer is this. You have one minister there, and you have half a dozen questioners who are interested in that particular line of work; other people who may be interested in something else altogether, of course, await their turn on some other occasion. Nevertheless, a large part of the committee's work in parliament is taken up in the discussion of matters in which only a few members are or can be interested. Instead of that procedure, I suggest that if we had our estimates going to standing committees, we would have every single member of the house somewhere on those committees, taking his place, and we would thereby eliminate all the boredom that from time to time is expressed by backbenchers because of having nothing to do, not being able to speak and not being able to take their proper part in administering the affairs of the nation. Right there in those committees they would have their chance to speak, to do a job for parliament, for the constituencies and for the country. From the backbencher's point of view particularly, I think that suggestion has great attractiveness.

It may be that we should not take the whole of the estimates of every department out of the committee of the whole. I know that there are some arguments that can be adduced both for and against that course. But after the administrative item has been debated in the committee of the whole—and this item gives every member a good chance to speak, whether he happens to be on any particular standing committee or not—and after it has been passed by the committee, the detailed estimates following could readily go to the standing committees that I would suggest. In a sense that would be a compromise between those who want everything to go to a committee and those who want to have everything dealt with in the committee of the whole house.

Mr. Weir: May I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. Graydon: Yes.

Mr. Weir: I have two things in mind, one dealing with matters after they have been accepted—and by that I mean reports of committees the following year—and one dealing with matters of policy before committees.

My point is this. If you are having estimates generally referred to committees, would you expect the answers to questions to be given by departmental officials or to be given through the ministers?

Mr. Graydon: I think the government whip will admit that we have had some experience in the committee on external affairs. It has worked out in this way: We usually have the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) attending in the committee for one, two or three days. I think you can always count on the departmental officials sticking up for themselves and when a question concerning policy is asked they will always say that that is a matter for the minister. I cannot think of any instance where we got into trouble in the committee on external affairs in that regard. I thank the hon. member for bringing up this question because it gave me an opportunity to refer to the only experience we have had along these lines. I am simply suggesting that it might be adopted in connection with other estimates.

I am satisfied that there are many other things that can be done in connection with streamlining the rules. When I got up I had no intention of making a speech anywhere near as long as that made by the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown), but I do want to express some of the things that have been revolving in my mind in connection with house work. We hear a lot about the limitation of speeches and procedure in connection with rulings by Mr. Speaker. I think things are much better now than they were, but one thing we do still have is long-winded statements by ministers of the crown at the opening of the house. When such a statement is made and another hon. member gets up to reply he is likely to be ruled out of order. If it were not for the great leniency and wisdom and discerning judgment of His Honour I suppose we would have to be silent after these long statements are being made.

At first I was quite innocent about these statements. I used to think that just before a minister left his office something urgent had come up about which he had to make a statement. But then I noticed that quite often a minister would appear jittery and nervous if he did not get in his statement on the order for motions fairly early. Then I would look up in the press gallery and I would see the sheets flying around and would realize that copies of the statement had been sent to the press before it was given to the House of Commons.

That sort of thing could develop into a species of insidious propaganda. It is an important duty of the opposition to see that it does not go as far as that. I must say that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is not a great offender in that regard. When he is, we always tell him about it. I think these long-winded statements on the part of the government should be made short and to the point. More than that, I do not think any manoeuvres or conspiracies should be indulged in with backbenchers. I am only imagining this, but I can hear a minister saying to a backbencher, "I am going to get into trouble if I make a statement on the orders of the day because the opposition will object; how would you like to ask me a question and then nobody can say anything if I give a long answer?" That has been done although I have always been innocent enough to believe that the minister and the member had never had any previous communication.

This is the sort of thing I want to mention because this is the sort of thing that disturbs the House of Commons. I am hopeful that this lecture—for which I am not charging anything—will be taken in good part by those who need it most. As a matter of fact, some of those on the government benches who need it most are out of the chamber while some of those who need it least are present.

The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) will think that I have rambled a long way from his resolution but I think he will understand that it provides a broad vehicle for discussion in a frank and open manner. The hon. member made reference to the reading of speeches. I am afraid my thinking is not very orthodox in this connection. I would rather have a 15-minute speech read from a manuscript than listen for 30 or 40 minutes to a speech which had not been prepared, such as the one I am making.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Graydon: I remember when I first came to the house I was told that I should be able to speak on my feet without having to look anywhere except across at the other benches. I have always tried to do that, but it is a rather hard rule to follow. At times statements must be made by members of the government or members of the opposition in which questions of policy may be decided by one or two words. I think we have to use common sense in this sort of thing. I have never objected to ministers using rather extensive notes when they are dealing with questions of policy. I have spoken on external affairs on occasion and I have felt it necessary to have extensive notes or perhaps to quote partly from a speech that I had had typewritten.

But there is one thing I think we should get rid of. Oftentimes a member will read a speech containing phraseology which is so different from that which he normally uses that we would not recognize it as the remarks of the same man. That is what I object to. I have always had a suspicion that somebody else has had a hand in its preparation. When members come down here to represent constituencies they have the duty to speak on behalf of their constituents without the assistance of other people who may put in their mouths words that they would not normally use.

There is one thing I should like to have particularly noted by the backbenchers. More and more backbenchers should speak. I know my hon. friend will say that this resolution is designed to bring about that very thing, but there are other ways of doing it. Hon. members are sent here by their constituents. Their constituents may realize that they are not great public speakers, and perhaps that is why they have been elected. I do not think anyone in this house should be fearful about getting up and expressing his thoughts even though they may not be expressed in the language that might be heard in the appeal court of Ontario or of some other province.

After all, the House of Commons is not an appeal court. A person who has not a good education has as much right to be heard here as anyone else. This is the place for everybody to be heard, whether he is educated or not. This is the place where the people who sent them here should hear them, even though their voice may be halting and hesitant. I do not thing anyone should have any fear that he is inferior to anybody in this chamber, because he is not. In this chamber one person is as good as another whoever he or she may be. I should like to see that view adopted as a battlecry so far as members of parliament generally are concerned. As I said before, I enjoy the contributions made by those who do not speak often and who usually speak sectionally. Even if they do speak about their own sections I am often more interested in hearing what they have to say because it gives me a better idea of Canada as a whole. We should hear what people from various sections of Canada have to say, and the speech from the throne and budget debates provide an opportunity for that. I have spoken a lot longer than I intended, but I really should be allowed some special consideration because I am speaking in reply to a government motion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Graydon: The hon. member did not put that badge on it but I am going to do so for him.

Mr. Cleaver: I am sorry but I cannot accept it.

Mr. Graydon: In any event, in so far as our work in the House of Commons is concerned, I am not one who thinks that we should be complacent as to the present rules of procedure or the present conduct of debate. I have not felt that way for a long time. I think there are many people who are distressed and disturbed that we do not handle our business with better dispatch. Although on this occasion I have not given the house very much information, and perhaps there has not been a great deal of intellectual content in my remarks, at least I have done what I have urged the backbenchers to do. I have spoken my mind.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all of us in the house agree that there is room for improvement in our rules of procedure and in some of our practices. Indeed there are a few suggestions I shall make while I am on my feet, but I think I should make it clear at the outset that I do not agree with the suggestions put forward by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) in the motion now before us. Since I intend to express my opposition to most, if not all, of that motion, the responsibility devolves upon me to show that there are other steps that could be taken and to indicate the things that I think might be done.

In the first place I think it would add materially to the debates that take place in the house and to the endeavour to deal with our business more effectively if we could adopt hours of sitting at least similar to those that were in force toward the end of last session. I am sure if we could get it established for all time that we would adjourn at ten o'clock at night it would improve the spirit, morale, good will and everything else around this place.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): What do you mean by "everything else?"

Mr. Knowles: After all, most members arrive here pretty early in the morning. They get here around nine or nine-thirty every morning, and I suggest that by the time it is ten o'clock at night it would be a good idea to call it a day. I suggest that far from that extra hour shortening the session it actually lengthens it because many speeches made during the last hour are merely made to keep the debate going or because tempers are frayed as the result of the long time that members have been here during the day.

With respect to hours, I would point out that last year's committee, which sat under the chairmanship of Your Honour, recommended that the hours should be from 2.30 to six o'clock on each of the five afternoons, Monday through Friday, and from eight to ten on Monday, Tuesday and Thursday evenings.

Some members on the government side have suggested that that involves too great a reduction in the number of hours from those we now sit. The present sitting hours of the house—apart from our committee and office work—amount to twenty-seven a week, and the hours I have just quoted would total only twenty-three and a half. Some members feel that is too great a reduction. I suggest as a compromise that we could reinstate the Friday evening sitting from eight to ten in the proposal made by last year's committee, and that would be a little closer to the total number of hours we now sit. As a matter of fact it would mean a loss in the total number of sitting hours of only an hour and a half a week, and I am sure we would more than make up for that if we were to adjourn at ten o'clock at night.

I am one of those who feel that we could, to the advantage of the debate and the advantage of the speeches we make, including the speeches of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, reduce the length of speeches to thirty minutes, as suggested by the committee last year. I think that would be all to the good. I am one of those who feel that a change of that nature should not be forced upon the house when there is a substantial body of opinion against it, but I hope more consideration will be given to it.

The other type of suggestion that I offer for helping to streamline procedure is not in the nature of specific changes in rules. As a matter of fact I do not think you can achieve the objective of streamlining the business of the house merely by changing the rules. If you have an issue before the house about which there is feeling, over which there is contention, time is going to be taken on it no matter what rules you try to put through. What really matters if you are trying to expedite the business is that there be an understanding between the government and the opposition as to what is being proposed, and some measure of good will back and forth. I do not mean by that that the government and the opposition are going to agree on the things we are doing. We cannot agree when we are opposed to measures that are brought down, but I feel that the house could be taken into more of the government's confidence by the government telling us a little more in advance what business it proposes to have the house discuss.

Frequent references have been made already today to practices followed in the United Kingdom. One of their practices is for the leader of the house to tell the house on Thursday of each week what the business will be for the days of the succeeding week. Here our practice for the most part is to be told at eleven o'clock at night what the business will be for the next day. I submit that is not conducive to a feeling of co-operation and good will between the two sides to the debate on any question.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? How can we announce a week ahead of time the business for each day of the next week when we have no limit on debates? We never fix a limit on the debate on external affairs or the debate on national defence, and I do not know when we will complete those debates. If I were to announce the business for the first week we reconvene I would probably be far from the mark.

Mr. Knowles: That is a fair question but the minister has given the answer to it. If the government were to give us an indication as to future plans a few days ahead or a week or two ahead, so that we would know what would follow the debate then in progress, I think there would be more of a disposition on the part of the opposition to move on from one debate to the other.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): They would have to change quite a bit.

Mr. Knowles: As it is now, announcement is made of one debate at a time and we get that at eleven o'clock the night before it starts. The disposition of members is to settle down into that debate as if that is all there is.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Will the hon. gentleman permit one more question? Tonight I am going to announce that tomorrow we will continue the debate on national defence, get into committee of supply and I will call four departments. The budget will be on at eight o'clock. After the budget we will take up the Japanese treaty. Do you think the house will follow my directions?

Mr. Knowles: What will we do on Wednesday?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We will revert to the Japanese treaty, if the debate is not concluded. Will the house follow that advice?

Mr. Knowles: I am having the satisfaction of seeing my suggestion accepted while in the middle of making it. I thank the minister for having given us an indication of what will be the business for the next two days. I was about to say to him and to the government that in the last session or two and particularly this session some progress has been made toward this goal.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Not in the length of debates.

Mr. Knowles: Just a moment. We have made progress in that the government has acceded to requests from the opposition to arrange for particular debates. For example, we had the debate on external affairs and we are having a debate on national defence. The minister seems to think those debates were lengthy. I do not think it was out of the way to have a debate for four and one-half days on the important question of external affairs, and so far we have had only two days on national defence.

Mr. Cleaver: The debate lasted two days in Britain.

Mr. Knowles: I will get back to Britain in a little while. We have had those debates, and I believe hon. members on all sides, whatever their views, will agree they were good debates. I feel that it will save time later in the session for members to have the feeling that they had the opportunity to debate these important questions.

When you consider the matter of trying to achieve fair play and co-operation back and forth, I want to say quite frankly that it is a two-way proposition. If the government will play ball with the opposition by letting us know what their plans are, what matters are to be brought up and what debates we are to have, the opposition should not just talk for the sake of talking. But on the other hand I submit the government should not expect the opposition to close off debate just because a deadline creeps up on us, as happened with respect to the supplementary estimates last week. I say this is a two-way street. The opposition has a responsibility; but so has the government a responsibility not to crowd the house by giving us matters that have to be disposed of within too limited a space of time. As I said a moment ago, I feel we will make more progress if we have some understanding of what our program is and some planning of the work of the session. I feel we will make more progress that way than by trying to alter the various rules of the house.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If the hon. gentleman would permit a question, would his party give us their plans for every day next week and what they intend to do?

Mr. Knowles: If we were transplanted to to the government side of the house we would do so.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You always come up with something new.

Mr. Knowles: We will be away from here next week, but I can promise the Minister of Public Works, since he wants to know our plans, that the week after that we will make our contribution to whatever subject is before us each day, as determined by the government.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): And taking a lot of time.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) has made some specific suggestions. I have already indicated that I do not agree with them, that far from expediting the business of the house I think they would actually delay it, in that their adoption by the majority of this house would make the members of the opposition and minority groups feel that restrictions had been placed upon them. As a matter of fact, despite his attempt at one point in his speech to say he did not want to limit free debate and the right and duty of the opposition to criticize, nevertheless two or three times the hon. member showed his hand. He started right off by comparing the time taken during a previous session or two by government members and the time taken by the opposition; and he had a great deal to say about what he called the filibuster that took place during the session at the end of 1951. As the hon. member knows, I was a little annoyed at the length of a certain debate, and I tried to do something on one occasion to bring that debate to a conclusion. I regret to say I was not successful.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Is the hon. gentleman willing to suggest to the house that no member should speak more than once a week?

Mr. Knowles: No, I would not make any such suggestion. The fact of the matter is that members are sent here by the people of the constituencies of Canada to bring their best judgment to bear on the issues that come before the country. How people can expect to bring their judgment to bear on these issues by sitting in their seats and not saying anything is more than I can understand.

If I may get back to where I was before the last interruption, I was pointing out that the hon. member for Halton made it clear in his remarks that his main desire is somehow to cut down the amount of time the opposition is taking. He showed his hand in that respect in his opening remarks, and he revealed it again two or three times during the course of his speech.

Mr. Cleaver: That is perfectly right; I admit it. I think the government supporters are entitled to as much of the time of this house as the opposition groups. I may be wrong, but that is the way I feel.

Mr. Knowles: I have no quarrel with that statement, Mr. Speaker, but the hon. member did not propose that government members be given more time. No such proposition needs to be put forward; they have the right now to take all the time they wish. What he proposed was that methods should be adopted by a majority vote of this house to place restrictions upon those who are now exercising their right of speech in this parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: Never mind saying oh, oh. I point out that each item the hon. member has placed in his omnibus resolution with the possible exception of (e), about which I will say something when I come to it, is restrictive in nature. Each proposal is an attempt to cut down the length of time to be taken by members of the opposition. That is my quarrel with this motion, that its underlying basis disregards the principle of free speech and the freedom of members of parliament to exercise their rights and their responsibilities when they come to this house. I would like hon. members to listen again to citation No. 1 in Beauchesne's third edition:

> The principles that lie at the basis of English parliamentary law, as Bourinot so aptly says, are: "to protect a minority and restrain the improvidence or tyranny of a majority; to secure the transaction of public business in an orderly manner; to enable every member to express his opinion within limits necessary to preserve decorum and prevent an unnecessary waste of time—"

Mr. Cleaver: That is fair enough.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: Let me hear you say "hear, hear" to the next clause:

> "—to give abundant opportunity for the consideration of every measure, and to prevent any legislative action being taken upon sudden impulse."

Where are the hear, hear's now?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: Good. Similarly I ask hon. members to remember citation 818, which is taken from John Hatsell, a parliamentary authority of the late 18th century, who said:

> "So far the maxim is certainly true and founded on good sense that as it is always in the power of the majority by their numbers to stop any improper measures proposed on the part of their opponents—"

That is right, and it should be that way. The majority should have the right to rule and the right to have the final say. But, says Hatsell, it is also true that—> "—the only weapon by which the minority can defend themselves from similar attempts from those in power are the forms and rules and proceedings which have been found necessary from time to time and are become the standing orders of the house, by a strict adherence to which the weaker party can alone be protected from those irregularities and abuses which these forms were intended to check, and which the wantonness of power is but too often apt to suggest to large and successful majorities.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is one thing for the hon. member for Halton to say that it is the right of the majority to rule and to make the final decision, but it is another thing to suggest that the majority should use that power in a wanton manner to restrict the right of speech, to restrict the opportunities of members on the government side or the opposition side to participate fully in debate.

Although I shall not take time to read it because it is a lengthy one, members should read citation 20 in this same edition of Beauchesne. It appears on pages 11 and 12. In this citation Dr. Beauchesne has quoted at length from the very well known speech by Edmund Burke made to his constituents at Bristol in November, 1774. The reason I remind members about this citation, and of the quotation from Burke which is included in it, is that I believe it emphasizes the importance of every private member of any parliament—

Mr. Cleaver: Of every private member, and not just members of the opposition.

Mr. Knowles: That is exactly the point. I am going to stick with this argument for a moment and put on the record a few sentences from Edmund Burke:

> But, his unbiased opinion, his mature judgment, his enlightened conscience, he ought not to sacrifice to you, to any man, or to any set of men living. These, he does not derive from your pleasure; no, nor from the law and the constitution. They are a trust from Providence, for the abuse of which he is deeply answerable. Your representative owes you, not his industry only, but his judgment; and he betrays, instead of serving you, if he sacrifices it to your opinion.

That whole statement of Burke's, and that speech to his electors was on the point that, what was being elected to parliament was not a rubber stamp but a human being, with powers of judgment, and one whose responsibility it was to bring those powers of judgment to bear upon the issues of the country in the interest, not only of one constituency but of the whole realm. I urge upon all members, as I am sure they all have, to read that statement of Burke's to remind themselves of the importance in this house of every private member from every constituency in this country.

Mr. Cleaver: Having concluded that, would the hon. member mind if I asked a question?

Mr. Knowles: Is the hon. member going back to the question he asked a moment ago?

Mr. Cleaver: No. My question is this. Do you not admit that all four recommendations which I have put forward in my resolution are less restrictive as to debate than are the rules in Westminster, or is he criticizing Westminster?

Mr. Knowles: The situation at Westminster and here are different in so many particulars that it is almost impossible to make a comparison. May I point out—

Mr. Cleaver: All your quotations are from the old country.

Mr. Knowles: —that frequent reference is made to the fact that at Westminster they fix these periods of time at the end of which a vote is taken. I would point out that if there are members who still wish to speak on the day the vote is to be taken the debate sometimes continues all night. Indeed you have these 23-hour sessions. In other words, so long as people still want to speak—

Mr. Cleaver: I must quarrel with the hon. member on that point. The debate only carries on when a motion is made for it to continue; otherwise a vote is taken at the end of the agreed period. I cited one case where, during a debate on the address, fifty members wanted to speak but only twelve spoke and then the vote was taken.

Mr. Knowles: No doubt it happened the way the hon. member says it was recorded on that particular occasion, but I have been over there and seen the members of that parliament in action. It is not always acceptable to a member to withdraw, and if he does not wish to withdraw that day's sitting continues until those who wish to speak have spoken. Sometimes a debate goes on continuously for 23 hours, or longer. You have, therefore, a case where you are not denying to the private member his right to be heard for fifteen minutes or seven minutes, whatever it may be, if he wishes to do so.

Mr. Cleaver: All I am asking for is the Westminster practice.

Mr. Knowles: No, you are not asking for the Westminster practice at all. You are asking for a curtailment of the practice that is now in vogue here. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that this whole business of comparing Westminster with the situation here has been gone into by others. It was fully investigated by Dr. Beauchesne in the days when he was clerk. He prepared a lengthy report on this matter which Mr. Speaker Fauteux presented to the house back in 1947. The report pointed out that there are great differences, geographical amongst others, between the United Kingdom, where you have a small compact country, largely homogeneous, as compared with the wide expanse of our country and all the different interests we have from coast to coast. This report is to be found in the Journals for Friday, December 5, 1947, from pages 7 to 32.

A portion of that discussion, which is to be found on pages 10 and 11, points out many of those differences that exist between that country and ours which result in it being necessary for us to pay some attention to the British practice, but to recognize also that we have a Canadian situation, and that we have to develop a parliamentary practice of our own based on British principles and yet clearly Canadian. I would point out that in that same report which was presented to this house by Dr. Fauteux—I think it is fair to say he had the assistance of Dr. Beauchesne in preparing it—he said this, as reported on page 10 of the Journals of December 5, 1947:

> The mere object of shortening sessions must not be the aim of any revision of our rules. The duties of a representative parliament are too important to be performed in a hurry. No question should be decided until it has been fully discussed.

Mr. Weir: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to make an interjection. The hon. member, in his reference to Burke's speech about the duties of a member of parliament, interjected an inference to the effect that members who did not make speeches but merely voted were rubber stamps. I do not think that is a proper inference to be made. In its implication it naturally refers to a greater extent to government members than it does to opposition members. I venture to say that even in the governments of the United Kingdom a lot of members have voted with their parties, even though they have not made speeches, and in that sense the hon. member would refer to them as rubber stamps.

I believe that the hon. member will agree that members on the government side, and even in his own party, quite frequently vote without making speeches. Whether or not they are voting exactly according to the dictates of their conscience we do not know, but in that sense they are rubber stamps. Government members, may I point out, have opportunities that opposition members do not have of becoming informed on matters of policy. I think it is quite improper, therefore, for the inference to go out that government members are really rubber stamps voting along with the party.

Mr. Knowles: It is six o'clock, but may I just say this. I have no objection to the point made by the member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Weir) that some members may feel they can express their judgment by voting just as much as by speaking. My point is that if a member feels he should express his judgment by speaking, he should not be restricted in that right or cut off from doing it.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Except if he repeats the same speech five times in the same session.

Mr. Knowles: I would agree with that. It is strange that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) did not hear me when I was making suggestions with which he agreed. Now that I am making a few with which he does not agree, he is making these frequent comments.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION AND NEW CONSOLIDATED CODE

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, may we revert to motions for the purpose of my filing the report of the royal commission with reference to the Criminal Code under the chairmanship of the Hon. W. M. Martin, Chief Justice of Saskatchewan, and the new draft consolidated Criminal Code, which is an integral part of this report?

STANDING ORDERS

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT RESPECTING DEBATES AND PROCEDURE IN COMMITTEE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cleaver:

That, in the opinion of this house, the standing orders of this house should be amended in regard to debates and in regard to procedure in standing and select committees in order to bring the rules of debate more in line with present day needs and that, inter alia, such amendments should specifically provide: (a) for the passage of allocation time orders by this house with respect to any measure brought before it and that motions for allocation time orders should be put by Mr. Speaker, including all underlying amendments, after sixty minutes of debate have elapsed; (b) for the fixation in standing orders of a time limit on debates on the address in reply to the speech from the throne and the debate on the budget, after the expiration of which periods of time, the motion and all underlying amendments would be put by Mr. Speaker; (c) for the limiting to one half hour of the debate on all procedural motions and underlying amendments; (d) for provision that at the expiration of the seventh allotted day the chairman of the committee of supply and ways and means shall forthwith and without further debate put every question necessary to dispose of all of the votes of the departmental estimates under consideration; (e) for the requirement that at least four members should rise in their seats to express opposition for a request for unanimous consent to a suspension of the rules, otherwise unanimous consent of the house to be presumed when requested.

[Mr. Weir.]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, just before six o'clock, at least just before the last interruption before six o'clock, I was dealing with the point set out in the report on procedure which was presented to the House of Commons on July 5, 1947, by Mr. Speaker Fauteux. I had drawn attention to two or three sentences, particularly these:

The mere object of shortening sessions must not be the aim of any revision of our rules. The duties of a representative parliament are too important to be performed in a hurry. No question should be decided until it has been fully discussed.

I should point out that in that same paragraph it is made clear that we do not want to go to the other extreme and waste time in unnecessary repetition. But the point is clearly set out there by Dr. Fauteux, and has been confirmed by Dr. Beauchesne, in his studies of these matters, that we should realize the important question in relation to parliamentary debate is not whether we get it over in a hurry or spin it out at length. Rather the important aspect is the quality of the debate, the quality of the legislation dealt with and the responsibility that we bring to our task as members of parliament.

If I might refer back to the interjection made by the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Weir) just before six o'clock, I have no objection to those hon. members who feel that they can make their contribution by saying little or nothing during the course of a session. Neither do I have any objection to the plea made indirectly by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) that there be opportunity given to government members to speak more than they now do. There is no doubt as to their right to speak as often as they wish, and far from putting any restrictions on them, I would be glad to see them take a greater part in the debates of this house than they do at the present time. But, Mr. Speaker, what I do object to is the attempt which is involved in the motion now before us to restrict those who are speaking, and, according to the hon. member for Halton, that happens to be the members of the opposition.

I pointed out that the resolution before us, at least in so far as four of its points are concerned, is definitely restrictive. Their aim is to set up a system whereby this house, by a majority vote, would determine that certain debates would last for only a certain length of time. The result of that, Mr. Speaker, is inevitable. The result would be that in some of those debates there would be hon. members who wished to speak but would not have an opportunity to do so. They might be members of the opposition; they might be members of the government side of the house. I contend that members who are sent here should have the right to speak on issues that come before the house, if they wish to do so, and that is why I oppose the hon. member's proposal.

I have no objection to any changes in the rules that are agreed upon by the house as a whole which are fair to all and equal in their application to all members. But a set of rules like these would not be equal in their application. These rules, if put into effect, would result in some members having the right to take part in certain debates, and other members being denied that right.

If I may come back to Burke's statement again, I suggest that the constituents in every part of Canada send their members here to bring their best judgment to bear on the issues before this house, and that the electors in every constituency have a right to expect that their member will have the right to speak if he wishes to do so. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, for that reason, I feel that the house should not entertain the first four proposals in the motion put forward by the hon. member for Halton.

As I have said, there are frequent references to the practices at Westminster, and there are many things at Westminster that we would do well to follow; but I submit, as Dr. Beauchesne and Dr. Fauteux have pointed out, there are vast differences between that country and this. We have to develop procedures and ways of doing things that fit appropriately the Canadian situation.

One of the proposals that are before us is (c):

> For the limiting to one half hour of the debate on all procedural motions and underlying amendments.

Mr. Sinnott: That is long enough for anyone.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Springfield says: "That is long enough for anyone." I think the hon. member misunderstands paragraph (c). Paragraph (c) does not say that speeches should be reduced to thirty minutes. If it said that I would agree with it. What paragraph (c) says is that the total time taken by all the members of this house on a procedural matter shall be limited to thirty minutes. Mr. Speaker, I might take that long myself, and no one else would get a chance.

Mr. Sinnott: No, you are wrong.

An hon. Member: Don't we know it.

Mr. Knowles: I was hoping that there would be some comment, and I hear there is. Mr. Speaker, it is true that the important debates in this house are on matters of substance, not on procedure, but there are times when a point of procedure and procedural proposals can be extremely important in their bearing on the rights and privileges of the members of parliament, and to suggest that in no case should a debate on a procedural motion last more than a half hour is, I suggest, unduly restrictive of the rights and the privileges of hon. members.

The other points (a), (b) and (d) are related to debates in various ways, but all have as their aim the limiting to a certain definite period of time all the debate that can take place in this house. If such a limitation could be brought about debate by debate as it comes along, by agreement in the house, I am all for it, but to lay it down as a rule, passed by a majority vote of this house, will not expedite the business of the house; it will annoy those who are frozen out by such a measure, and you will actually have the debate increased and the length of the session increased by time being taken on other items.

I said earlier that I would say a word with regard to subparagraph (e) which reads:

> For the requirement that at least four members should rise in their seats to express opposition for a request for unanimous consent to a suspension of the rules, otherwise unanimous consent of the house to be presumed when requested.

There are those who regard that as a plausible suggestion. I think it is one to be looked at very carefully. What it suggests is that we should make it easier to suspend the rules of the house. It is now possible, Mr. Speaker, to suspend any rule of this house in the proper manner, by notice being given, that notice appearing on the order paper and it coming up after the required forty-eight hours' notice. What this motion would suggest would be that that procedure could be got around, and that at any time the house could be asked to suspend any of its rules, provided that there were fewer than four members who did not object. Well, that raises the whole question as to whether it is a good idea to suspend rules. Rules are established by a parliament like this because we believe they are a proper way to carry on our business. They are sanctioned by long usage and by all the traditions of our democratic process. To suggest that they should be lightly set aside is, in my view, open to question. I know of occasions in the time that I have been here when there has been before the house a measure that seemed agreeable to everyone, and so we have been asked, by unanimous consent, to suspend the rules and to go through two, three, four, five, six or seven stages in one day. I remember in particular the bill with respect to re-establishment credits which was introduced toward the end of world war II. That was a measure that we were all anxious to support. It was introduced toward the end of the session, and the late Mr. King suggested that inasmuch as we were all in favour of it, perhaps we could let it go through all its stages in one day.

For anyone to suggest that we should stick to the rules seemed a bit out of place in that particular atmosphere, and so it was permitted to go through. Within the next two or three days, however, we began to get public comment as to some shortcomings in that legislation; but we no longer had the opportunity to express any of those views on the floor of this house because we had by-passed the usual procedure and had put the bill through all its stages in the one day. I think that if, on that occasion, one hon. member had felt that the conscience of the house should be pricked a bit and if he had said, "No; I think that at least one of these stages should stand over for another day", it would have been better. In that event those views which people had and which they communicated to us a few days later could have been expressed on the floor of this house. I mention that as one example. There are others that have taken place since I have been here. I mention that one in particular because that is one of the rules, the suspension of which is so often requested.

I can agree that in many cases it seems unnecessary to wait for another day, we will say, for third reading of a bill for which there is general support. But what happens here is that if we let third readings go time after time without waiting for the next day, it becomes almost a practice of the house; and then anyone who wants to hold it up is told that is no longer the practice of this House of Commons. It is that sort of thing that makes me suggest that we should be extremely careful about changing the rule with respect to unanimous consent. I do not think we should agree that anything has unanimous consent unless it actually has unanimous consent, and that rule should apply very definitely with regard to the standing orders of this house.

I conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, on this note. I simply want to say that I feel that there are improvements that could be made in our rules and in our procedure. At the opening part of my remarks I suggested some of the changes that I thought should be made. I have spoken in particular of the hours of sitting, of the length of speeches, and of planning the work of the session. I think we have made some progress; and I think that the reason we have done so is that we have had so many committees on house procedure. I know that some of those who have been on those committees feel frustrated; they feel that we meet for hours on end and that we do not make much progress. The fact of the matter is, however, that we talk these matters out and we reach some agreements and those agreements get reflected in the way the business of this house is conducted.

I think we should continue to attempt to improve the rules of this house and to improve the procedure of this house in that way. I do not think we should try to do it by means of a motion of this kind coming before the house, being voted on and being passed by the majority of the house against the will of a substantial minority. After this discussion has taken place—and there is no doubt as to the value of the discussion, whatever our various opinions may be—I hope the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) will consent that the motion be adjourned or that it be postponed to another day and that he will leave to the committee method the whole question of trying to improve the rules of the house on the basis of good will and co-operation rather than on the basis of the majority using its power to introduce restrictive changes which would defeat their own purpose.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I believe that members on all sides of the house agree that certain changes should be made in the standing orders. In regard to this question that appears to be the only point upon which there is any unanimity. But the minute you start to discuss any changes, you then get a multitude of different views; and few members appear to be willing to compromise on their stand. I think that fact is borne out by what has happened in the various select committees that have been set up during the past few years to deal with the question.

Last year a special committee was set up to bring down recommendations as to ways and means of expediting the business of the house. That committee had before them the experience of what had happened on former occasions, and they therefore hoped to bring down some worth-while recommendation. They realized that the only chance of getting a recommendation from the committee was to bring down suggestions that would represent a fairly close approximation to unanimity. The first question they tackled was that of the hours of sitting. There was a high degree of agreement on that point; but many of us in that committee felt that it would not be possible for that committee merely to recommend that change in the hours of sitting. After all, that committee has been set up for the purpose of helping to expedite the business of the house. Therefore, if they had merely recommended that we shorten the hours of sitting, the net result would have been the lengthening of the sessions of the house rather than the shortening of them. Hence it was considered wise to tie in with that recommendation one to the effect that the length of speeches should be cut down from forty minutes to thirty minutes.

Unfortunately, that recommendation did not gain the same degree of agreement as did the one for a change in the hours of sitting. But even on that point there was a fairly high degree of support. Seventy-five per cent of the parties supported it, the Conservative party being the only party that was opposed to it. For that reason—and I would say for that reason alone—it was considered wise to make the recommendation in regard to the hours of sitting as a permanent affair, which would have required an amendment to the standing orders; but in regard to the shortening or the limitation of speeches, the recommendation was merely that as an experiment for one session we would have the speeches shortened from forty minutes to thirty minutes.

Personally, I thought that was a reasonable suggestion and I had hoped that it would receive the support of all parties. But as I mentioned a moment ago, the Progressive Conservative party could not see their way clear to support it; and for that reason, I presume, the government did not see fit to proceed with the recommendation. I still think, however, that the government would be fully justified in proceeding on that recommendation, because it would certainly improve the hours of sitting. I think everybody would feel in a better mood as a result of having the sittings adjourned at ten o'clock instead of eleven o'clock. It would also help to expedite the business of the house because, if that recommendation had carried, we would have seven and a half speeches a week more than we now have under the present sittings; that is, if everybody used his full time, we would have forty-eight speeches a week whereas at the present time we have only forty and a half. Not only would it improve the general sittings of the house and meet the favour of all members in that regard, but it would actually increase the amount of business that could be handled by the sittings.

I now want to deal specifically with the proposals contained in this resolution. I think the hon. member for Halton did a service to the house in bringing this question before it. I do not agree with the resolution but at least it can be said that we are having an interesting discussion on this question. In so far as we in this group are concerned, I may say that we can support only the last paragraph, namely paragraph (e), which provides that at least four members should rise in their seats to express opposition for a request for unanimous consent to a suspension of the rules.

That is the only section we are prepared to support. The reason we are opposed to the others is that paragraphs (a), (b) and (d) would require the apportioning of time for speaking. I think all members will realize that it would be very difficult to apportion the time on an equitable basis. If there were just two parties in the house it would not be so difficult, but with four parties it would be quite difficult to apportion time on an equitable basis. What would the basis be? The hon. member for Halton suggested that it should be left to the whips to decide, but the whips would have to have some basis on which to work. Would it be on the same basis as that used for setting up committees? Would it be on the same basis as that used for apportioning time over the C.B.C.? We would certainly not agree to that.

The hon. member for Halton suggested that there should be equal time for the opposition and the Liberal members. I would point out that there are a number of reasons why the opposition need and should have more time for speaking than the members of the Liberal party. I think the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Weir) gave one of the best reasons why members of the opposition should have more time to speak than the members of the Liberal party. When the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was speaking, the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa objected to the use of the term "rubber stamp" in regard to Liberal members who did not speak. He said he objected to that term because Liberals did not have to speak as much. He pointed out that they had other opportunities to express their opinions and discuss with the government what should or should not be done. He said that they had other opportunities to ask that certain bills or legislation should be amended.

The opposition does not have the same opportunity and for that reason, if for no other, the members of the opposition are justified in demanding that they have a longer period of time in which to express their points of view than the members of the Liberal party. I think the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa made a good point in that regard although he may have been bringing it up for a different reason.

The government has a majority and can put through whatever legislation it wants to. You may ask: How can they get legislation through if there is a filibuster? The government has power to impose closure, although they do not like to use it. But the only power the opposition has is to advance arguments in order to convince the government that legislation should be changed. Sometimes the opposition must speak at great length in order to convince the government that legislation should be changed. We have recent examples of how as a result of argument put forward by the opposition the government finally realized that their legislation was not wise and changed it.

This happened in connection with contracts at the last session. As a result of a strong protest by the opposition the government changed their legislation. I recall some years ago the same thing happened during the budget debate in connection with depreciation. The opposition objected to certain depreciation provisions and debated all day, and the next day the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) brought down an amendment to carry out the very thing the opposition had been asking for.

It is on such occasions that the opposition must have time in order to put forward their arguments, and put them forward forcibly. I am convinced that if the proposals contained in this resolution were carried out they would greatly restrict the efficient operation of the opposition. I think all members will agree that it is not desirable that the efficiency of the opposition should be cut down or restricted.

There is one other point I want to bring up and perhaps the members of the Liberal party will not agree with me on this. The opposition actually represents more voters than do the members of the Liberal party. A vast majority of the Liberal members got in with minority votes and therefore the opposition in this house must express the opinion of a greater number of voters than the members of the Liberal party can speak for. So I think there are three good reasons why the apportionment of time should be on the basis of more time for the opposition than for the Liberals. But I repeat that it would be very difficult to accomplish such an apportionment and I think it would be far better for the government to leave that question aside altogether. I come now to paragraph (c) which reads:

> For the limiting to one half hour of the debate on all procedural motions and underlying amendments.

Surely the hon. member for Halton could not have been serious in making that suggestion. I do not think any hon. member will suggest that such a thing would be feasible. Imagine some point of order coming up in the house and the first speaker being the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. No one else would have a chance to speak as he would probably take the whole half hour. Even if somebody else was allowed to speak for a few minutes, he would want to reply. If you limited it to a half hour you would just have one member speaking and the rest of us would not have a chance to say anything. We could not possibly support this section. I am also very much opposed to section (d) which reads:

> For provision that at the expiration of the seventh allotted day the chairman of the committee of supply and ways and means shall forthwith and without further debate put every question necessary to dispose of all of the votes of the departmental estimates under consideration.

Suppose we were dealing with the estimates of the Department of Agriculture which contain many items. An hon. member might be interested in an item at the bottom of the list and might feel that he would never have a chance to speak on it because the time would be used up. He would be forced to take up that matter on the first item and the result would be that every member would be bringing up his own particular matters on the first item and you would have a most disorderly debate. Section (e) reads:

> For the requirement that at least four members should rise in their seats to express opposition for a request for unanimous consent to a suspension of the rules, otherwise unanimous consent of the house to be presumed when requested.

We would not oppose that. I think it is only reasonable that if all hon. members except one desire that a certain rule be suspended, then that rule should be suspended. I think any party in the house should be able to find four members to object if they wanted to object and the government would then not be able to proceed. I do not think one member should be allowed to hold up proceedings. He may happen to be in bad temper or have a chip on his shoulder and out of pure devilment want to stop the proceedings.

I think there are changes that could be made in the present rules which would greatly expedite the proceedings and increase the efficiency of the house. It should not be very difficult to bring about these changes.

First, I think we should change the hours of sitting as recommended last year by the committee so that the house sits from two-thirty o'clock in the afternoon until ten o'clock at night. Then the length of speeches should be reduced from forty to thirty minutes. As I pointed out, if that were done and if every member who spoke took his full time you would actually have seven and a half more speeches in the week than you have at the present time. There would be a more pleasant feeling in the house and at the same time more work would be done.

There is one other matter which would not require a change in the standing orders and the rules; it simply requires that the present rules should be carried out. Speeches should not be read in this house. I know some hon. members will say that that is easier said than done, that it is hard to enforce that rule. There are many occasions when it would be quite simple to ask a member to stop reading his speech. When a member holds up his speech and is reading it word for word and line for line, what he is doing becomes quite obvious. It is all very well for him to say he is just referring to some very copious notes but it is easy enough to tell when a member is reading a speech, and I say that so long as that is a breach of the rule it should not be allowed. If on the other hand the house feels that members should be allowed to read their speeches, then let us amend the rule and permit them to do so; but as long as the rule exists I think the practice of reading speeches should be discontinued. I am satisfied that if the rule were enforced it would also help to expedite the business of the house. Speeches would be far more interesting to listen to and we would know for certain that a member was expressing his own views instead of perhaps merely reading views expressed by somebody else and put in the form of writing for the member.

Those are the three things I think should be done. I think we would be making a big mistake to try to carry out the recommendations covered by the resolution. I am satisfied that in the first place it would take a very long debate on amending the rules to put a thing of that kind into operation, and in the second place I think if it were done it would cause a good deal of confusion and dissatisfaction in the house.

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have listened intently to the speeches that have been delivered since the beginning of this debate, and I must tell the house that there are some points of view that have been expressed with which I agree and others with which I do not agree. Let me take the last point made by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) about the reading of speeches. I have sat in the House of Commons for twenty-eight or twenty-nine sessions. That is a long time. I have had quite an experience listening to speeches whether read or delivered extemporaneously. In my opinion there is a psychological problem involved. Sometimes you see a member get up for the first time in a deliberative assembly and after talking for five or ten minutes he then tries to fill out the rest of his speech with the remainder of the strength left in his legs. That is psychological. He cannot face such an assembly whereas he can face a crowd on the hustings, on a public platform.

Everyone here will admit that the atmosphere of the House of Commons is quite different from that of the public platform. When you are on the public platform you have many friends gathered around to support you. In the House of Commons you have people who are very objective in their thinking. They are of different parties but they are accustomed to listening to speeches. Some of them read newspapers. Others talk. Others go out and others come in. They attend to their own business. Do you think such an atmosphere helps a speaker who is a little shy and timid in delivering a speech without reading it? I think the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) was right this afternoon when he said he had no quarrel with those who read speeches.

Mr. Graydon: Provided they write them themselves.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I shall come to that. I am not prepared to say that all the speeches read in the house have been prepared by others. Most of the time the speech is prepared by the one who is speaking. He cannot express himself properly without reading his speech because, in vulgar language—I do not quite know how to express it otherwise—he has not got the guts to express himself.

An hon. Member: Intestinal fortitude.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): As my hon. friend says, intestinal fortitude. Therefore he has to read his speech. In academies of science, philosophy and so on all the speeches are read and the level of the discussion is not lowered because of that fact. Speeches are not longer because they are read. I think some of the speeches delivered in the house—mine, for instance—would have been better if they had been prepared ahead of time in written form, and I am accustomed to the House of Commons.

Mr. Graydon: You are pretty good.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): When you take the time to think carefully and assemble your arguments properly I think you make a better speech, advance better arguments and come to the point you want to make in a better and quicker way. Therefore I do not think the rule forbidding the reading of speeches is such a good one. It is one of the rules we find in this thick volume of Beauchesne forming that spider web through which only the experts of the house can see clearly, and even when they see clearly they cannot agree. Even the experts disagree. When I first entered the house as a member I looked at that fat volume and said: Maybe all these rules have been manufactured so as to make a better appearing volume. I said to myself: It is better looking when it is fat and big; it looks learned. That is what I thought. I think we should do away with all these rules and have our own House of Commons rules. Then when we do not agree we would not be obliged to go to the bottom of the page and find a little remark that kills all the other articles that have been quoted before. That is what happens here too often.

Mr. MacDougall: I quite endorse the remarks that have been made and I wish to ask the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) if he would be in favour of having a public bonfire of the first, second and third editions of Beauchesne. I certainly am.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): It all depends. I spoke of the psychological aspect a few moments ago. It all depends on whether you did not suffer any repression in your childhood and can look at the fire without being scared. To prove what I was saying about the reading of speeches, I should like to refer to something that happened when I was a provincial member in Quebec, and it concerns a member who had experienced some ten sittings. I was the whip of the Liberal party, and one morning Mr. Taschereau asked me to get a few members to make a good debate on horticulture. Therefore I got members of the opposition and the Liberal party and they started speaking. The member to whom I have already referred, and who had the experience of ten sittings, started to speak about small fruits. He tried to cross the blue line and he could not do it. He had small fruits in his mind and on his lips and he could not get away with it because suddenly he got scared of the house. He got shy and noticed the way members were looking at him. That is a problem that can arise in the case of any member listening to me at the present time.

Mr. Graydon: Stage fright.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I am sure of that, and that is why I advocate that the rule forbidding the reading of speeches should be abolished. The result would be that better speeches would be delivered. I do not quarrel with anyone who reads his speech whether he be the chief of the opposition or a minister of the crown. There is a way of shortening the session. I think I would favour a thirty-minute time limit on speeches. In an old French classic of Boileau there is this saying:

Ce que l'on conçoit bien s'énonce clairement,
Et les mots pour le dire, arrivent aisément.

That means that a man who thinks clearly and who knows his subject well does not have to take forty minutes or an hour in order to tell the house his understanding of the subject and what he knows about it. He can do it in thirty minutes. It is an exceptional subject that requires more than thirty minutes to discuss. I do not say that a minister, or the chief of the opposition, or the leaders of the other parties might not take more than thirty minutes when they have a special question to discuss, but in my opinion almost any matter can be fully dealt with in half an hour.

There is another way of shortening the session; and I speak from experience, because I am one of those in the house who are guilty. I believe some hon. members make too many and too long speeches for propaganda purposes. I have had some of my speeches printed and sent to my electors just for propaganda, and I know some hon. members do the same thing. I see thousands of copies of speeches leaving the House of Commons, and very often they are just for propaganda. If you could cut out half of this propaganda, that would be a way of shortening the sessions.

I said what I have to say about the rules. I think they should be changed. I believe we should have a committee of this house to go over those rules and draw up new ones on which we could all agree. I have no doubt that under such rules the work of the house could be dealt with just as well as under the rules we now follow. I have no quarrel with anyone who disagrees with my point of view, but I do believe we could shorten our sessions by getting together in a committee and trying to work something out. That would take a lot of good will, a lot of objective thinking, and a deep sense of co-operation.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver), who introduced this resolution, drew attention to the situation in the British House of Commons and attempted to show that less time is devoted to parliament in England than in Canada. To repeat a famous phrase, I think that is a "terminological inexactitude". I checked in the very volume to which the hon. member referred, May's Parliamentary Practice, fifteenth edition, to ascertain the length of British parliamentary sessions. I find that they had sessions of seven and one-half months before the war and eight and one-half months after the war, which rather exceeds the length of the sessions of this house.

The hon. member also referred to filibusters here, and suggested they had none in Britain. The all-night sessions they have had recently, however, would seem to come pretty close to filibusters. He also mentioned the debate on defence which took place there on March 5, describing it as lively and constructive, indicating the number of members who took part and the average length of their speeches. I would point out to hon. members that in that debate there was a better division as between the government and the opposition than is usually the case here. Eight members on the government side participated, with ten from the opposition benches. I think that indicates a greater element of freedom on the part of private members in the British house. I suggest it would be useful if we had the same degree of participation here by private members on the other side. Much as I enjoy listening to the ministers, there are many private members on the other side who have information which should be conveyed to this house.

The hon. member also indicated that in the British house the type of debate, attendance in the chamber and so on were much better, and he seemed to attribute that to certain rules they have which are not applicable here. I cannot see that there is a great deal of difference. There are occasions when the British house is crowded, when the atmosphere is tense and a great debate is in progress. There are also occasions in this house when there is a great air of expectancy, when the chamber is crowded and debate is lively and constructive. There are plenty of occasions in the British house when it is just as dull as it is in this house. I have sat in the galleries over there and have seen very scattered attendance. As far as I can see the only advantage they have over us is that the Prime Minister and those sitting in the front benches can put their feet on the table by the dispatch box, as I have seen Mr. Attlee do. I have listened to debates there that were no livelier than many debates here. After all, they go through the same routine. There are lively debates, and there are debates dealing with routine matters which do not attract much attention.

I suggest that Mr. A. P. Herbert's book "Independent Member" gives an idea of what transpires there; and it indicates that the situation is not very different from that in Canada. As hon. members will recall, Mr. Herbert was a member of the House of Commons for about sixteen years, during which time he was very active and influential. I am going to read one or two short passages from his book to indicate that things are not so different in the British house. If anyone imagines that everyone there pays rapt attention when a member is making a speech, let him listen to what Mr. Herbert says:

> There is movement everywhere. It is like making a speech in a beehive and those who remain motionless are not necessarily attentive, or even silent. Ministers and whips must confer upon the course of the debate, check facts and figures, read documents about something quite different. A member will come in with a resolution or amendment to another bill, to which he is seeking signatures. He goes from friend to friend, and there is a whispered colloquy with each . . . Then there will be a few couples having private conversations about their holiday plans, about the party meeting, about the latest scandal, or the by-election, or the pretty girl in the Speaker's gallery.

As to the reading of speeches, I agree with what was said by the hon. member who preceded me. There are occasions when it is helpful to a person to be able to at least refer to his notes. As Erskine May puts it in his book on parliamentary procedure:

> A member is not permitted to read his speech, but may refresh his memory by a reference to notes.

Then he goes on to say:

> The chair does not as a rule intervene unless appealed to, and, unless there is good ground for interfering in the interests of debate, usually passes off the matter with a remark to the effect that the notes used by the hon. member appear to be unusually full, or that the hon. member has provided himself with rather copious notes.

I think perhaps that is the best approach to that question. Now and then members of the British house read their speeches, and dealing with the preparation and reading of speeches Mr. Herbert has this to say:

> Mr. Churchill, they say, dictates the first versions of his great speeches; but what a time even that must take! Some humbler folk, like myself, are incapable of dictation: that is, being writers first and speakers afterwards, perhaps, we more surely find the satisfying phrase and sequence in the act of writing.
> At first, I used to write out every word of a speech and have it typed—not for reading but for remembrance. To get good phrasing and a lucid line—unless you are a Churchill or a King's Counsel—I still think this is best, though now I much resent the expense of time and trouble. After that, if I may advise the beginner, it is a good thing to write the heads of the argument, with any choice quotations or figures, on the back page, or a blank page, of the bill, white paper, or what-not. It is natural and proper to see a member flourishing the bill which is under discussion: and—who knows?—he may have jotted down those brilliant arguments during the debate. I find myself often repelled by the other method—by the member who has an evident bundle of notes like a pack of cards. Sometimes, as each little page is done with, he puts it down on the bench beside him. Sometimes they are turned over like the pages of an almanac.

I believe that would indicate that they have the same trouble there that we have here. He instances, too, the difficulties facing a member of the house who finds himself without an audience. You might be interested in the following, speaking about a backbencher:

The backbencher must be in his place when the debate on the bill begins: but there is small chance of his going into action for two or three hours. The minister, whose opening is delayed, perhaps, till three forty-five, takes a leisurely forty minutes and the front-bencher on the other side is nearly as long. When he sits down it is five o'clock and most of the house goes out to tea, which is always hard on the Liberal spokesman, who is next. Your member, Mr. Smith, wishes very much that he could go out with the other happy members and have a cup of tea. But that would endanger his chance of being "called" by the Speaker, so he must sit and listen to this dreary Liberal (all other speakers are dreary when you are waiting to speak yourself).

I suggest that conditions in England are not so different from conditions here. I should like to deal with what the hon. member said about the allocation of time orders. Again he drew his example from England, and again I should like to quote from Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, chapter 19, which mentions methods of curtailing debate, on page 454. It reads:

The principal methods available for the curtailment of debate on particular items of business in the House of Commons are the following:

1. The closure of debate (of which there are two principal forms) (i) the ordinary closure; (ii) closure on the words of a clause.

2. The selection of amendments.

3. The allocation by orders of limits of time for discussion.

Further on he says:

They are probably a permanent feature of modern procedure, but they are still felt to be an unfortunate necessity and not to be justified except against obstruction or by pressure of business. This is especially true of the first and third of these methods—

That is closure and allocation time orders.

—the employment of which has become decreasingly frequent in the last twenty years.

I believe the important problem that faces us in this resolution is the desire to impose a restriction on the rights and privileges of private members of the house. I would point out that there is no restriction on cabinet ministers, who may speak at great length on almost any occasion. In December the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) filled eighteen and a half pages of Hansard, while the other day the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) filled ten pages of Hansard, consuming an hour and a half. His counterpart in England took one hour of time in a similar debate.

I noticed, too, on looking through Beauchesne, which someone wants to destroy but which I think should be saved, that in 1943 on a non-confidence motion on defence preparedness the Speaker ruled that four ministers, who had in some way or another an interest in the matter of defence, had the privilege of speaking for an unlimited time. If that ruling should be invoked again it would place unusual powers in the hands of the ministers who are already powerful enough in so far as the rights of private members are concerned.

The proposal we have before us is part of the process of erosion of the functions of parliament. We are talking about reducing the time of the session, shortening debates, restricting the length of speeches and things of that nature. I believe that that is due to a misconception of the functions of parliament. Parliament is not an administrative body, it is what is known as a talking shop, a place for debate. We look to the cabinet and the civil servants to carry out the administration. Parliament's job is to examine government policy, legislation and expenditures, and to call for the redress of grievances before the granting of supply. There is no other way to do these things except to talk. I believe every member admitted to the house should have the same right to express himself as any other member, irrespective of his position in the house. He may have something to contribute to the debate which has not been thought of by others. Time and again I have heard it mentioned, although I have not been here so long, that the subject matter under discussion has been fully debated; everything has been said, so let us have a vote on it. It does not necessarily follow that everything has been said. Someone else may rise and throw some light upon the subject; consequently I am against any restriction of the debates in the House of Commons.

The length of speeches has been discussed many times, and it is not a new topic. It is mentioned in every parliament and I suppose in every legislature. It is often a topic of conversation for the general public. My interest in this matter was aroused last October when I found in the Financial Post of October 20, 1951, a headline which read, "How improve parliament's efficiency." The question which was submitted to a number of gentlemen across the country was, "What are your suggestions for improving the efficiency of parliament?" Summarizing their suggestions, it came to this: Members talk too much and too often. The most frequently voiced suggestion for improving parliamentary efficiency thus becomes limiting the speeches, especially in debate on the throne speech and on the budget.

The gentlemen who made these findings were quite distinguished, some of them being experienced in legislative assemblies, but others were not. I do not propose to read out their names, but by occupation two of them were university people; four were editors; two were members of provincial legislatures and two were senators. I do not know whether or not that is effrontery on their part. Six of them were businessmen. However, they were expressing a general opinion with regard to parliament.

It has been suggested here that debates be limited to thirty minutes, and consequently the sessions would be reduced and everybody would be happy. I looked into this last fall to see just how much there was in that idea. I recalled that at one time debates were unlimited in the House of Commons, and that in 1927 the forty-minute rule was established. Therefore I looked back at the Journals of the House of Commons from 1900 to 1950 just to see what the situation was. I assumed that from 1900 to 1927—that is a period of 28 years—when unlimited time was allowed members in the House of Commons, the sessions must have been very long, and that after the forty-minute rule was introduced in 1927 the sessions must have been appreciably shorter. I found that the average for the 28 years before the forty-minute rule came into effect was 143 days, and the average for the 23 years after the forty-minute rule came into effect was 146 days. I suggest that reducing the speeches from the unlimited time to forty minutes was not the answer necessarily to the problem of the length of the sessions of parliament. On the basis of that examination, I fail to see how a reduction from forty minutes to thirty minutes would solve the problem that we are attempting to deal with here. If from unlimited time to forty minutes did not reduce the sessions, from forty minutes to thirty minutes is not going to do it either.

My observation, in the time that I have been here, shows that many speeches in this house do not run for the forty minutes. Some do, but not all run for the forty minutes. There are quite a number of speeches of ten minutes, fifteen minutes, twenty minutes and twenty-five minutes, and it balances out. Therefore I think the forty-minute rule is still a sound guide. In any case, I have been making an attempt to restrict my speeches to thirty minutes or under. I am afraid I am going to fail tonight, but I should like to have the right to speak for forty minutes, and by self-discipline try to restrict myself to twenty minutes, twenty-five minutes or thirty minutes, but I would still like to retain the right to speak for forty minutes. I do not think it should be taken away from anyone. If a minister of the crown can speak for an hour, an hour and a half, or two hours, surely a back bencher should be permitted to speak for forty minutes to explain to the minister how wrong he is.

We talk about the length of the sessions. As to the two sessions of 1951, I am not sure whether they established a record for Canada, but when I was looking through the Journals of the house I discovered that certainly up until 1951 the record for the length of a session was set in 1904. In that year they met on March 12, and adjourned on October 24. They had off only Good Friday, Easter Monday, May 24 and July 1, and two or three scattered days like that. There was no long Easter adjournment. They sat for seven and a half months, dealing with quite a number of very important problems, a great deal of railway legislation, immigration and I think redistribution. In that year they discussed the problems that we are discussing now. Almost fifty years ago, and at the end of a very weary seven and a half months' session, they spent a few minutes lamenting the fact that they had been away from home so long, and so on, and they made some suggestions as to what should be done in the future. A Mr. Boyd deplored the length of speeches. He suggested more preparation between sessions and condensation of speeches to fifteen minutes or twenty minutes. He referred to Cromwell's action in removing the mace and locking up the House of Commons, and estimated that no harm would result if the same thing were done in Canada.

A Mr. Robinson urged earlier commencement of the session and suggested that they should start say in January rather than in March. He pointed out the serious effect on a farmer who, in the year 1904, had to miss the spring sowing and the harvest. A Mr. McCreary thought that better preparation on the part of the government would help out, with the help of their office staff, and suggested that they start in December, adjourn for two weeks at Christmas, and then continue in January and attempt to finish in April. Mr. Borden, later Sir Robert Borden, suggested that the government should bring down its business earlier, and then the government spokesman—and we can all pretty well guess what he would say—who was the Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. Cartwright, made the suggestion that there should be shorter speeches and no Hansard.

This is not a new problem, and it is perhaps difficult to find a solution. I think we have to recognize the fact that fairly long sessions have to be held in the governing of the country of Canada. During the period when our population was about 5½ million, members of the house were spending five months engaged in their duties here. Now that the population is 14 million, five to six months seem essential. There are means of shortening the session, by using some of the rules which are established such as under special circumstances the moving of the previous question and the imposition of closure, if there is an obvious obstructionist move on.

If government business were brought down earlier in the session it would be helpful. If contentious legislation were brought forward earlier in the session, that again would be helpful; but generally I think it is a matter of arrangement and consultation among the various parties in the house. It has been obvious that, since the war, sessions have extended in length. This has been the practice in England. The House of Commons there and here find themselves sitting longer since the war than before. That is due in this country, as in England, to the development of the so-called welfare state, greater government interest in general affairs of the people, and the tremendous burden that is placed upon us by our difficulties in international affairs.

I would suggest that the hon. member who has introduced this legislation should reconsider the matter. I think that throughout it is aimed at the restriction of debate in this house, and that by arrangement and consultation between the parties many of our problems can be solved. We do not want to be forced into the position where stringent rules are applied, restricting in any way the liberties and privileges that have been built up in the House of Commons over many hundreds of years. It has been a slow process; it has stood the test of time. We can make the necessary adjustments here and there that will solve some of our problems, but I think we must recognize the fact, whether we like it or not, that the sessions, in order to conduct the nation's business, will have to be fairly lengthy.

I cannot say that I am enamoured of this particular type of life, but having put our hands to the plow we must stay with it until somebody decides that we should be retired. Under these circumstances, I think we must give our attention to the nation's business. I have noticed this. The very people who say, parliament talks too much, and it takes too much time, will be the very ones to criticize, if something is missed by parliament. They will be the first ones to say: No one raised his voice in the House of Commons, with regard to such and such a measure which went through in the dying days of the session. You cannot have it both ways. Either you must permit full debate, full discussion and full investigation of the business of the government, and you must devote the time to it, or else it would be simply a matter of assenting to most of the propositions that are put before us without investigation and without that close attention that surely is required from people placed in the responsible positions in which we find ourselves.

Mr. Maurice Boisvert (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks I should like to commend the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) for having introduced today an important resolution with respect to parliamentary rules and procedures. I am not yet as familiar with the intricacies of those rules and procedures as is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), so I will confine myself to some general observations about this subject, that is to say, what could be done and what should be done to improve our parliamentary system.

No one can contest the right of this house to arrange and rearrange its procedures to fit the purpose of a sound and full discussion of the problems which have to be met efficiently by this parliament. The modernization of procedure is already an old question which has been debated in Great Britain and in Canada for many decades. Some improvements have been concurred in during the course of events which have taken place in this country. I do not want to use much of the time of this house but I should like to show that, in 1927, this parliament had been studying this question; and from the beginning of the century up to 1949 some improvements had been brought in. One of those improvements is standing order 37 which limits the speeches of members to forty minutes. The question that we should ask ourselves today is this: Is it possible again to reduce the time allowed to members for the discussion of issues brought before us, or are those issues so wide in importance that we cannot make up our minds within thirty minutes—

Mr. Cruickshank: Ten minutes.

Mr. Boisvert: —and bring, before this house, ample considerations which would help this chamber to take a proper decision? Let me quote the Speaker of that time, the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, who was elected in the constituency that I have the honour to represent in this house. On resuming a debate on a similar question, in 1927, he said as reported at page 1345, of Hansard of March 18, 1927:

"On one occasion after the war, in 1920, I happened to be in the House of Commons, and the proceedings were most interesting to me. Asquith had been elected for one of the Scottish seats, Paisley, I think it was. He was introduced on that day, and he gave notice of a motion to consider the state of Europe after the war. That was surely a big issue. The motion came up the following day by mutual agreement between Lloyd George and Asquith. Asquith spoke for thirty minutes on the state of Europe after the war, and Lloyd George followed and closed the debate in twenty-five minutes. Surely a member can say all he has to say in less than forty minutes. I was in favour of making the limit thirty minutes. The best English ever heard in this house was spoken under closure, in twenty-minute speeches. The speeches were to the point, couched in excellent language, went to the root of the question, and delivered, I may say, with warmth and eloquence for fear of the guillotine. I say to the house, let us be practical. We say that we model our rules upon the English pattern. In England they have reduced materially the length of speeches. They do their business,—yes, and they administer the affairs of a great empire in rather short sessions of the house. Why should we be provincial in this matter? Let us imitate the great mother of parliaments; let us be broad-minded and businesslike.

I think that these considerations which were brought before the house, in 1927, could apply today for better reasons than those which were given in 1927.

The question of shortening the length of time of speeches in this house should be welcomed by the members of all parties. If we do not reach an agreement about the way of debating our problems, we are going to see the development of a by-product of discussions—I mean the filibuster. The filibuster is in great honour in the United States. By definition it is a way of preventing a government from adopting the legislation proposed to the country for the good of the country.

Mr. Cruickshank: Not necessarily.

Mr. Fraser: Good or bad.

Mr. Boisvert: It may bring satisfaction to some members and to some party of the opposition's side. It may be very pleasing for a party or for a member to see that they are or he is restricting legislation day by day, speech by speech, and inch by inch. But we are not elected for such a purpose. We are elected to make laws for the good of the country. We are elected to pass legislation which is supposed to affect the wealth of the nations.

Mr. Cruickshank: Like pipe lines.

Mr. Boisvert: By filibustering we do not achieve that aim of doing good for the country. To those who like filibustering I will say that, in the long run, it ruins the confidence of the people in the democracy.

Mr. Cruickshank: Oh, oh.

Mr. Boisvert: It brings ill effects to parties in the opposition.

An hon. Member: And to the government.

Mr. Boisvert: For many years we have been offered various ways of shortening the debates and shortening the sessions. I will say that Mr. Beauchesne—who is so often cited by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—in 1943, in the preface to his third edition of his book on parliamentary rules and forms, recommended modifying our system in order to make it more elastic and better for the house. Mr. Beauchesne in his third edition wrote this:

"The procedure of the House of Commons was simplified by the amendments made to the standing orders in the session of 1927, but there are still certain deficiencies and it is imperative that special orders be adopted if the house wants further to expedite the passage of legislation."

It was imperative at that time that we should take further steps to improve the procedure in this house. Some good suggestions were made then. He recommended that an attempt be made to reach agreement between the various parties so that speeches could be shortened and debate reduced to a few hours of debatable subjects. If we are to take days and days, weeks and weeks and months and months discussing matters, as we did last session when dozens of speeches were made repeating the same thing, I do not think it will be good for this parliament. We live in a country where speed is the main thing. When everything goes fast, we in this parliament should not have to sit and listen for long hours to the discussion of matters which are of no interest even before the debate is closed.

For two months last session we discussed certain subjects but during this session we have heard nothing about them. That indicates that the interest which seemed so apparent toward the end of last session has faded. This has been the case with many other debates. I am strongly in favour of the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Halton because I have faith in democracy, faith in freedom of speech and in freedom of discussion.

No one has said anything to convince me that it is the intention of this resolution to do anything that would interfere with freedom of speech, freedom of debate and freedom of discussion. It has been said: "that to be a slave of old tradition is as great a folly as to be a slave of new quackeries". I think we have heard and seen many quackeries since this parliament has been charged with the administration of the country. Let us get away from these quackeries and be simple and natural in our arguments. Let us provide rules for our parliamentary system for the good of the nation and the best of our parliament. Now I would like to say a few words in French and I shall be quite brief in the remarks I intend to make in my own language.

(Translation):

Any institution, excellent though it may have been and still may be, which does not reform, loses its power of resistance through the ravages of time and of public opinion. The natural political evolution of a nation calls for reform. It is far better to adapt our parliamentary forms to this inevitable change than to see the very foundations of our system shattered, sooner or later, by disastrous revolutions.

A nation's parliamentary system may be compared to the shores of a continent. It is wonderful to see how, against the blows of the waves, continents take on shapes which reduce the effects of this incessant beating upon their shores.

That is why I would like this parliament to have, from time to time, control over its own procedure so that it may be adapted to our times. Speed is a characteristic of the present day. While everything, save parliamentary debate, moves with ever-increasing rapidity, we spend endless hours discussing subjects which, in a great many cases, cease to have any importance, even before the debate is brought to a close.

I therefore support, most enthusiastically and with the greatest conviction, the resolution moved by the hon. member for Halton.

(Text):

I want to congratulate the hon. member for Halton on having brought before the house a matter which is of such importance to Canada.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take only a few minutes of the time of the house. I think I should be given credit for having introduced a similar motion in 1940. I have never read a speech yet and I do not intend to. The only speech I have ever read was one written for me by Torchy Anderson, a member of the press gallery; Blair Fraser; the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner); and Mr. Brockington. I read that one into the record and it sounded fine to the people at home, but I have heard lots of other stuff. I have listened to the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) and I have listened to other hon. members of this house since 1940.

I told you how you could reform the other place and I want to tell you how you can reform this place. I placed all this on the record in 1940. There are just two simple rules that need to be enforced. I mentioned before how two members from the press gallery and two distinguished gentlemen had written the only speech I ever read. I do not know which one was the worst. Probably my reading was.

If you would enforce the rule that speeches be not read and limit speeches to a maximum of twenty minutes, we could improve our proceedings. I can say without fear of contradiction that there are not five members in this House of Commons who can make a speech lasting forty minutes that is either interesting or entertaining. If you enforce that rule I will keep under twenty minutes and I will not read a word of what I have to say. I am quite well aware that I can have an excellent speech written for me by somebody else that I can put on Hansard and send out to my constituents as these gentlemen do who read their speeches.

An hon. Member: Not all of them.

Mr. Cruickshank: I do not care whether you like it or not. Any man who reads his speech must have had it written for him by somebody else.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Cruickshank: I have never read a speech yet. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will make a speech on anything at any and all times. I admit that, but I want to say, so far as Fraser Valley is concerned, that despite what the hon. member who introduced the resolution says, nobody is going to limit me when it comes to speaking on any subject if I see fit to do so on behalf of my constitutents. I say this is the solution, and some of the junior members to my right might listen to this. When the member moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne and the seconder only speak for twenty-one minutes and all from memory we do not need forty minutes to say what wonderful ridings we have, and members of the house do not need to take five minutes to extend congratulations to the mover and seconder on the wonderful speeches they have made. That is nonsense. Let us get down to the two rules. Limit any speaker to twenty minutes and entirely eliminate the reading of speeches that in ninety per cent of the cases are written by somebody else.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I have a few words to say.

An hon. Member: Do not read it.

Mr. McIvor: I agree with the hon. member who has just sat down. I would also pay my tribute to the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) because he prepared his case so clearly and did not read his speech. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) said that we do not want a little ring. That is what we want to eliminate. There are too few members occupying most of the time of the house. What has happened in this debate? The hon. member for Halton introduced the question. One member from the Progressive Conservative party, one from the C.C.F. party, and one from the Social Credit party, representing one-third of the membership of the house, take more time than those representing two-thirds of the membership of the house. That is not a proper proportion.

I agree that no member should need forty minutes with the exception of the leaders of the parties and, as the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) has said, a member should not need to read his speech if he has had time to prepare and think about it for days and days. If he cannot remember it when he comes into the house how can he expect hon. members to listen to it when it is poorly read? I do not think we need forty minutes. When we were students we were told that a short address with more punch in it was far more important than a long dry address with energy left out.

An hon. Member: That is a long time ago, Dan.

Mr. McIvor: I have only been in the house a short time. At least, that is what it seems to me. In that period I have seen two reforms. Last year the hours were changed and this year we are back on the same old hours. I think we should adjourn at ten o'clock at night and that a man should be able to go home and sleep a little while before twelve. The other reform we have had is that ladies were allowed to go into the gallery without their hats. We have that reform today. Perhaps we will see more of it in the spring of the year when they are getting tired of their old hats anyway. I think that the ladies should be allowed to knit in the gallery. There are clubs knitting for the Red Cross, war services and relief causes. If the ladies got tired or could hear somebody then they could knit, enjoy themselves and serve their country.

There is another reform I should like to mention. I have spoken of it before. You, Mr. Speaker, stand up reverently in the house and lead us in worship but the galleries are empty. Not even the representatives of the press are allowed to enter. The prayer you use in your service is in keeping with the teachings of the Great Teacher who said that whosoever will may come. I hope that this reform will take place soon and that people will be allowed in the gallery to join with us in bowing their heads and worshipping the Supreme Being.

I know that a book on science ten years old is out of date with the exception of the science of government. The science of government certainly does need to be reformed, and the hon. member for Halton said that the rules of the house need to be amended and improved. If we do not improve them it is a sign that we are not doing what we should, but the word "liberal" means reform without any "pro" before it or "co" or "so" tacked on it. It means that we can grow and reform.

Mr. J. A. Bradette (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I shall not be very long in presenting a few of my viewpoints about the rules of the House of Commons. Before I proceed I want to pay a tribute to the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) for his resolution which has given us an opportunity to discuss at some length a matter that has not only been before the public but before parliament for many years; namely the reform of the rules and procedures of the Canadian House of Commons. A day such as this makes every parliamentarian and every Canadian realize the logic, the artistry, if I may call it that, of the British parliamentary system on which our own parliamentary system is largely based. Early in the session there is an opportunity to discuss resolutions brought forward by private members. I do not believe there are many democracies that have perfected that system to such a degree, and I for one, although I am in favour of the drastic changes in our present procedures and rules, will go slowly as far as some of them are concerned because after all we are considering procedures which have been tried and tested not only for years but for centuries, but which in our times are not fulfilling their purposes.

I want to say a few words about a statement made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill). He referred to the time taken by ministers of the crown. I think it would be unfair for me to mention the time of the house that has been taken on some discussions, and rightly so, by the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Drew) for the simple reason that the leader of the official opposition, no matter what the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre may think, has more responsibility than the average member of parliament. The same principle applies just as forcibly, if not more so, to the ministers of the crown and particularly the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) because after all they have the responsibility of bringing legislation before parliament. They have the responsibility of presenting it in a forceful and clear way and of presenting it in a manner that will be understood by every member of the House of Commons with all the necessary details. That is why I do not like that kind of reflection and comparisons are generally odious. I do not like the insinuation that ministers of the crown have been taking more time than they should have. I for one have been here for many years and I have never found a case under any conditions or circumstances where I felt that I had the responsibility on my shoulders that a minister of the cabinet has on his, and subject to criticism if their statements were not fully and clearly presented.

I also listened very attentively this afternoon to the speech of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), who was very active on the rules committee last year. In his remarks I thought he showed good judgment, as he does in all instances; but there was one thing with which I do not agree. He almost regretted that he did not read his speech this afternoon. Let me tell the hon. member that while his remarks may not read so well in Hansard, while the phraseology may not be just as chiselled as he would like, his personality with vibrancy was brought to us this afternoon; his eloquence was displayed once again. That is something you cannot put in print; yet it was felt in this parliament and in the galleries. So on that score alone I believe the house will gain a great deal if speeches are not read. The hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) thinks the reading of speeches is a good thing for the house. My view is that this House of Commons is becoming more and more like a conference or a reading room; and that was never the intention that it should be so. I know my own constituency sent me here and after receiving their directive and after having been in contact with them for many years, and they want me to express their sentiments as I understand them, no matter how bad my delivery may be or how poor my English pronunciation.

Another practice in this house which I think is deplorable, and which has come into being only in the last thirty years, is the quoting of citations from newspapers, editorials and periodicals. It almost seems that some hon. members are not able to put two words together unless they have a quotation to help them. This is not parliamentarianism; they are not expressing their own sentiments. I think it would help shorten the sessions if all members would try to express their own ideas, as I know they want to, and express themselves in a very practical way, which they can always easily do.

When I make that statement I have in mind one of my dear colleagues from northern Ontario, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Little), who is ill at the present time and for whom we all hope a speedy recovery. In all the years this fine man has been in the House of Commons he has not spoken more than half a dozen times, and never more than five or ten minutes at a time. But his speeches were right to the point; they were logical, and were appreciated not only by members of this house but by his own constituents, and he gave all his time and talents to his duties as an M.P. That is the kind of parliamentarianism my electors at least expect from me, and that is what is expected from all of us.

So I do not believe members should be allowed to read their speeches; and when I say that, Mr. Speaker, I mean no reflection upon you, for I believe you have done a wonderful job if any Speaker ever has. A member may have been helped in preparing his speech, but he should make a point of giving it in his own language; he will give a better speech. I remember one occasion when two very good members had well written speeches which I do not believe they took time to analyse or scrutinize. The first thing they knew they were saying some things in this house they never intended to say and for that reason alone they were defeated at the next election. These are things which are worth considering by a member of parliament.

As far as I am concerned I hope and pray that rule will be implicitly obeyed; and that is quite possible. I do not say the Prime Minister or the members of the cabinet or the leader of the opposition or those who speak for them should not be allowed to prepare their speeches, because it would be impossible for them to improvise on the very important problems they have to discuss. As far as the average member of parliament is concerned, however, my experience is that if he is left to himself he is much more eloquent and receives much more attention from the house and also from the galleries if he does not read his speech.

As most hon. members are aware, for three years I served as Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons. That was during war, when we were dealing with the war appropriation bills, which concerned nearly all departments of government and which dealt with billions of dollars. During those years we spent three or four months on that bill alone. One of the things I cherish about those years is the wonderful co-operation I received from every section of this house. One day a member of the Progressive Conservative party thought he had been harsh with me, and before we adjourned at six o'clock he came over and said, "Joe, I am very sorry." I replied, "Don't be sorry. I know what you said came from the head, not from the heart." It was always a surprise to me that under our rules we could get through our sessions during the war years in five, six or seven months. If hon. members had not tried to play the game and to abide by the rules it would have been possible to spend the whole year here.

Of course we all realize, as the public realize, that to be elected in our own constituencies we must have something of the gift of the tongue, we must be able to express our sentiments. On every measure that comes before this house there is the natural temptation for each of us to get on our feet and speak. You can readily realize what would happen if we followed that impulse. We all understand that a certain amount of individual and collective discipline is necessary on the part of hon. members. This afternoon the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) mentioned party discipline and referred to the whips and so on. I can tell the hon. member I have been here for over a quarter of a century, and I still have to hear from the whips any directive as to how I should vote on any matter. I say that very sincerely. After all, we are free people when we come here. We are the masters of our own actions and only responsible to our electors. At the same time I am sure the hon. member and his own leader realize perfectly well that unless a certain amount of direction is given within all the parties the result will be chaos, not only within the party but in our whole parliamentary system in most of our activities. So I hope such charges will never again be levelled, because I cannot visualize a single member of this house being a servile servant either to a whip or to his own party and I never heard of a whip using undue pressure.

At the same time there is need for a certain amount of co-ordination, and I speak very feelingly on that score. At times measures brought in by our own government are not very popular in some sections of the country. I will always remember one budget a number of years ago, when Mr. Ilsley brought the Canadian dollar to par. That was a blow to the gold mining industry of my section, as it was a blow to the constituency of the hon. member for Timiskaming. It would have been easy for me to vote against my own party on that measure, but I knew that in bringing the Canadian dollar to parity the government was doing a thing which was good for Canada as a whole; and when I received a mandate from my people it was not to represent just my own constituency but to represent the whole of Canada, because this is a central house for Canadian politics. So we went into our constituencies and told our people that though the measure was going to hurt a fine industry, at the same time it was better for Canada and the Canadian people as a whole. As a result we were never criticized on that score, as our constituents understood the situation.

I repeat, and I address myself particularly to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that there is no such thing as trying to make slaves of us as far as the party is concerned. That would not be Canadianism; that would not be any part of the Canadian system. I do not believe he ever tried it in his own party, and I think that statement applies equally to other parties in this house. We are free men representing free people in a free parliamentary institution. If parliament should decide to pass this resolution I believe it would solve most of the problems we are facing at the present time; it practically means the implementation of all the changes that we intend to make.

I repeat that if everyone wanted to speak on all subjects it would be utterly impossible for parliament to finish its work within twelve months. It is not fair for members to say that they must speak on all occasions, because if this was done the work of parliament would never be done. For instance, only last Friday that fine newspaper the Montreal Star mentioned the fact that after the minister had spoken in the debate on national defence, there were no spokesmen from the Liberal side. To some extent there was an insinuation or a criticism of this party. I cannot believe, as some members say, that the opposition members have a greater obligation than the members on this side. After all, we also have a responsibility towards our constituents and to this parliament. If we wanted to use mathematics as a basis, which cannot be applied to any parliamentary system, it would be possible for us on this side to speak as often as the members on the other side.

What would be the result? The session would be prolonged almost indefinitely, but there would be no reason for criticizing those on the government side, if they decided to do so.

For five years I sat on the opposition side of the house, and to some extent they were happy years because we could express our sentiments on almost anything; we could get on our feet almost any time. However, as a man who has been loyal to his party I do not wish to make an issue of it because it is a good party with good leadership. The same thing applies just as forcibly to the other parties. The members belong to good parties with good leadership. For instance, sometimes I have had to follow the directive of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) when he has said: "Joe, spare us one of your fine speeches today because we want to get through with the measure." I complied with the request, which was a fair one. I never spoke on these matters, and I have never regretted it. It is possible to have these limitations within the other parties, and it would make for better results in our deliberations.

This afternoon the member for Peel put forward some new aspects of the subject, and I admire him for it. However, he tried to strike quite a blow at the ministers by saying that before the orders of the day are called on many occasions they make lengthy statements to the house. If I correctly understand his party's views on several occasions they have blamed the government for not giving enough information, so I do not know where the ministers should begin or stop. After all that is the proper time for a minister to give the house information to answer questions, some of them asked the previous day. So far as I am concerned personally, I feel that the member for Peel is very glad of the information given. Under our system it is possible for the government not only to give information through members of the cabinet but also through private members who may express their sentiments, and this is always conducive to good legislation.

Although I do not believe in the motto I often hear it said that the primary duty of the opposition is to oppose. In my opinion that principle is not dynamic enough nor strong enough, it is too sterile, too static. The opposition has a duty to be more than passive. Without divulging any secrets I may say that when I was deputy speaker the fine old gentleman who was on my left used to say to me on several occasions that one of the great features of the Liberal party was that anything good propounded by the Conservative party or any other party was made their own in no time. This could be one of the good features of the opposition parties too, and the mere role of opposing is not constructive enough to be helpful to that party.

Last year I was in favour of the sitting hours that we adopted, although in my own mind I was not convinced that it would be conducive to shortening the session. Unless we shorten the length of the speeches to at least thirty minutes, then I do not know where we would end. You cannot cut down the time of sitting, and at the same time maintain the length of the speeches without lengthening the session. It is humanly impossible. I say that quite sincerely. If we were not in favour of shortening the speeches we would come to the same situation we face in all sessions. Towards the end of the session, after we have had a general discussion on nearly all the measures and all the departments leaving only the statutory items, about which most of us can do nothing, we would have to stay here three or four weeks, sitting mornings, afternoons and nights, just as we have done in the past. This is a terrific ordeal for every one of us who has to stay until the end of the session. I repeat that if we want to modernize our procedure we must, to some extent, copy the British parliamentary system and adopt the suggestions in paragraphs (a) (b) (c) (d) (e) of the resolution.

We would not lose very much by adopting most of the British system. I do not mean that these changes should all be made this session. We should try to eliminate repetition. When I was the deputy speaker—I am speaking to you from my experience—the most difficult problem was to keep speakers on the subject. When we considered the estimates of the Department of National Defence, for example, we had a general discussion on the administration item which at times lasted for days. When we were considering the different items it took me all my time to keep members of parliament on the beam, as we say. You cannot make human nature other than it is—and it is a fine thing that it is so—and that illustrates to some extent the urgency for the allocation of time during the speech from the throne and the budget debate, as well as some important governmental measures on which a lot of leeway is given to the members of all parties to express their opinions but the number of speakers should be very limited. For instance, take the government party. On a certain measure two or three members will speak because they are familiar with the problem. The same principle should be applied in the same manner to the other parties. They all could have two or three members who are studying the matter mentioned in a certain bill, and they would be the only ones that would speak on it. It would be quite easy to know in advance how many speakers there would be on each subject, and then you could allocate a certain time for the debate. If we adopted that method, it would be one of the finest ways of modernizing the procedure in this house.

It is true that some members of parliament believe it is necessary for them to speak, otherwise some of them will not be here after the next general election. They are afraid their opponents will say, "We have paid you $10,000 for one year and you never made one speech". So far as I am concerned, if I look after my departmental work, if I am active in my committee work, if I look after my correspondence carefully, if I receive my constituents as visitors in my home—I never keep any office hours—I need never worry about the next election, even if I did not make a speech here. After all, there are several other ways for members of parliament to utilize their knowledge, their activities. There are committees of this house in which members could spend a lot of time, and their time would be usefully employed. I do not say this in a critical way, but I notice that some members who are great debaters on the floor of the house are often not very active committee men. In my opinion that is a sad thing because those men, with their fine analytical minds and with their knowledge of certain aspects of our Canadian life, could do a marvellous job in committees, although they would not get the same publicity there that one gets on the floor of the house. Speaking personally, I spend at least four or five hours every week in government departments working for my constituents, and that takes up quite a bit of time and activities. I do not believe members of parliament need to worry if they do not make speeches in the House of Commons because their constituents would be quite satisfied if they realized their representative was being a true servant of the people.

I thank the house for the kind attention it has given to me, and I wish to compliment again the hon. member for Halton for his fine presentation. The discussion has been good. It has been an illuminating discussion because many many angles have been brought forward, which have not been brought forward heretofore in the House of Commons and all speakers expressed themselves forcibly. All through the thread of the discussion you could readily see the demand, the inner demand, of every member of this house to see the rules of parliament revised and modernized.

Even during this debate, and in previous debates, owing to the heavy national majority that the government has, there was talk of steam rolling and so on, which statements are simply ridiculous. Well, I must make this statement. Perhaps the time is not over-ripe to amend our rules of procedure, but the time may come before very long that we may have to do it. Public opinion will request it because, although this is not a business organization or institution, we must to some extent modernize every aspect of our parliamentary system realizing the new situations and conditions that we have to face so that every member of parliament will be given an opportunity to take part in the activities and thereby conduce to shorter sessions. If we do that I believe that we shall be accomplishing great and needed work. I repeat, the time may come, even if the house is not unanimous in the reform and in the amendments to the rules of the house, when the majority in the house may have to have its voice heard on that score and have these changes passed by the majority.

Last year we put into practice some new experiments in the rules committee under your fine leadership, Mr. Speaker. We came to a unanimous decision only on the hours of sitting. When we came to the shortening of the time of the speeches we did not have a unanimous decision. We cannot have one without the other. In this matter, as in all others, it is a matter of compromise, of give and take. I make this appeal to every member of this house. Forgetting party lines, forgetting party affiliation, let us put our minds together and modernize our parliamentary rules so that those who come after us will be very thankful indeed for what we have done, which will mean not only a lot to our parliamentary system but also to the whole of the Canadian nation.

Mr. H. P. Cavers (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, before coming to this House of Commons I had formed the opinion that the debates that took place in this house were fixed and set by a direct set of rules. Since being in the house I have not become an authority on those rules, but I did not need to be an authority to find that the state of perfection which I had thought existed in this house does not exist at the present time, and that the rules are greatly in need of amendment, and that it is time that we brought the rules more in line with the present-day needs, as set out in the resolution presented by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver).

The previous speaker, the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette), has stated that eventually we shall be obliged to amend the rules of this house because of the criticism of the public. I think there has been criticism by the public for many years. In fact, I am informed that it was the late J. W. Dafoe who described a parliamentary debate as that vast repository of talk. We have had various criticisms of the way in which the business of this house has been conducted. Some lengthy sessions have become longer and longer. It is my opinion that these sessions have been extended because of the length of the speeches that have been delivered in the House of Commons.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) made the statement this afternoon, or implied, that a member was not doing his duty unless he spoke at great length in the House of Commons. To my mind that is not the sole duty of a member of the House of Commons. As has been said by the hon. member for Cochrane, there is correspondence, departmental work, and many other things in the riding that have to be taken care of. I believe that the people of our constituencies—and I have talked to many of them—expect their business to be conducted in an efficient manner and with dispatch. They wish action and a great deal less verbiage in the house. I do not know whether hon. members are aware of the fact that by June of 1952 this parliament will have been elected three years. Out of the three years or thirty-six months that we shall have been elected, we shall have spent in session in Ottawa twenty-five months. Out of the thirty-six months we have had the opportunity to be at home for only eleven months.

It seems to me that the business of a member of parliament is not confined solely to debates in the House of Commons. I think a member has an obligation to get out about his riding and find out what is going on in the particular constituency that he represents. The way that we are going on in this house, we are apt to be living in an ivory tower in Ottawa out of touch with the common people who elect us and send us here to do their business. It is about time we had the opportunity to return to our home constituencies for a portion of each year, when we would have an opportunity to go out on the highways and by-ways of our constituencies and talk to the people and get an idea of what they know and what they feel about the issues that are being discussed here in the House of Commons.

Mr. Gibson: They are not so dumb.

Mr. Cavers: I agree that the business of government has become more complicated in the last twenty years, but it is not necessary to prolong debate in order that we may have a reasonably lengthy session. People in Canada are concerned because we cannot finish the business of the country in a five-month session and we are obliged to have two sessions each year. I wish to quote an excerpt from a recent editorial in the Ottawa Journal, which reads as follows:

> Every member of parliament knows well that there is atrocious waste of time in parliament, debates which sensibly could be confined to a day are dragged on through weeks in complete futility.

Of course there is such a thing as freedom of speech. No one in this house denies the right of freedom of speech to those members who are elected to do the country's business; but as I have seen parliament in action, I am convinced that there is a repeated and persistent abuse of that privilege. Freedom unbridled may become licence. That is why I say I commend the hon. member for Halton for the resolution which he has placed before us tonight. I think there is a great deal of merit in that part of his resolution which limits the time of speeches in the debate on the speech from the throne, in the budget debate and in any other particular debate.

No hon. member need feel that he will not have an opportunity of expressing himself in this house. I have yet to see the time when any hon. member has been refused the right to speak during any of the debates, and I believe that would continue if a limited time were placed on each debate. Then, I think the time of speaking could be reduced from forty minutes to twenty minutes. When I was a law student some years ago, I recall very well a lecture by a former member of this House of Commons, and an eminent counsel, Mr. Arthur G. Slaght, Q.C. Mr. Slaght on that occasion told members of the class that it was impossible for the average speaker to be able to hold the attention of any group, particularly a jury, for more than half an hour. I am sure there are few members in this House of Commons who can hold the interest of the House of Commons for longer than twenty minutes, and do it successfully. Therefore I congratulate the hon. member for Halton. I hope that this resolution will come to a vote, and that it will receive the support of the majority of the members of the House of Commons.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it has been said that soul-searching and self-confession have certain advantages. Indeed I remember an occasion—I think it was just at the spring session of last year—when somebody who perhaps was not over-charitable said that the Senate had never discussed anything so intelligently as when it discussed the necessity of reforming its own rules. Applying the same feeling, I suppose one might say that the House of Commons is probably never more profitably engaged and never appears in a better light than when it is confessing its own faults, admitting its shortcomings and trying to find ways and means of devising improvements in its procedure.

That is what we have been doing a good deal of today. From what we have heard, it seems that many members feel that the house wastes too much time. There has been a process of self-accusation. If that self-accusation results in true penitence and reform, I suppose that some good—perhaps more than appears on the surface—will have been accomplished. This thought reminded me that there is an apt verse in the bible—and I found it in chapter 15 of St. Luke—which I have just obtained from the table. I may say that I found it with the help of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who is an authority on many subjects.

An hon. Member: The bible too?

Mr. Fulton: It is verse 7 of chapter 15 of St. Luke, and it reads as follows:

> I say unto you, that likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons, which need no repentance.

An hon. Member: Actions speak louder than words.

Mr. Fulton: I think you will perhaps see, Mr. Speaker, that considerable good has already come from this debate, in signs of repentance on the part of hon. members. We in the opposition here have heard accusations oft repeated—and with, I think, a good deal of sincerity—that we take too much of the time of the house that is, that numbers of members of the opposition, out of all proportion to the actual size of the opposition parties, monopolize the discussion in the house at the expense of the unfortunate but numerically larger government party. I am sure that you will have observed, Mr. Speaker, that we have already taken those admonitions to heart and that so far there have spoken in this debate seven members of the government party as against only four from the opposition benches.

An hon. Member: You will make up for that.

Mr. Gibson: How long have they spoken?

Mr. Fulton: In the course of this debate we have already heard a great deal about the question of filibuster. "Filibuster", of course, is a word which is applied by those who wish to put through a measure and who find themselves opposed. It depends entirely on the point of view with which you approach the measure, as to whether you call the speeches made for or against the measure a filibuster or constructive criticism. Bearing in mind the fact that seven members from the government side have spoken today—when, under our rules, debate on the resolution is strictly limited to the one day, as against only four from the opposition side—one wonders whether these members are indulging in a form of filibuster or merely in constructive criticism of the practices and procedures of this house.

Mr. Sinnott: How do their speeches compare in length of time?

Mr. Fulton: We have already heard a good many suggestions, in addition to those set forth in the resolution by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver), as to how our procedure could be improved, and how we could save the time of parliament and shorten the session. I should like to make a suggestion. This is the first one; perhaps I shall have more to make later. I think that this suggestion would be just as easy to implement and that there would be just as much agreement as to its desirability and as to the methods by which we might have it implemented, as there will be on any of the other suggestions which have been presented to you, Mr. Speaker, in such profusion in the course of this debate. My suggestion is one which will appeal particularly to the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), who contributes so succinctly, although so seldom, to the debates in this house. My suggestion is that a method should be found of dealing with those long Thursday-to-Tuesday week ends indulged in largely by the members from Ontario and Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gibson: That is not fair. They work harder than we do.

Mr. Fulton: I must point out, Mr. Speaker, that I am not attributing any blame. I am merely pointing out the fact. If that problem could be solved and if somehow or other the members from those two provinces could be made to realize that, in fact, the House of Commons is just as attractive a place over the week end as are their home constituencies, I believe that we should be able to get through the work of the session in considerably less time than that which is now taken.

Mr. Gibson: No. They speed it up by going home.

Mr. Fulton: You well know, Mr. Speaker, that it is inevitable and natural that when a practice such as this is recognized and has practically come to have the force of law by virtue of custom, it must follow that during that period none of the really serious work of the session or none of the serious legislation which may result in votes is taken into consideration, as a rule, on Fridays or Mondays. I throw out the suggestion not in any spirit of criticism but merely as seeking to call the attention of Your Honour and of the house to a problem which faces us and one whose solution, I am quite sure, is not beyond the powers of sagacity which you, Mr. Speaker, have shown you possess in such generous measure.

Mr. Cruickshank: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: Gladly.

Mr. Gibson: One Rhodes scholar to another.

Mr. Cruickshank: Through you, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member—and to the one absentee member from British Columbia; and I am not referring to the hon. member for Kamloops—may I ask the hon. member if he would agree that those of us from British Columbia, Nova Scotia or Newfoundland should have at least two passes a year on Trans-Canada Air Lines in order to compete with the former members from British Columbia who now reside in Ottawa?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I will not express any opinion on the merits of the suggestion with regard to passes on Trans-Canada Air Lines. I would, however, say that it would vastly increase the difficulties of the whips of all parties in maintaining a quorum in this house—

Mr. Cruickshank: Never mind the whips.

Mr. Fulton: —if, in addition to the members from Ontario and Quebec, it were made possible for the members from farther away to get home over the week end.

Sometimes I think that we should be serious about these things, and that we should ask ourselves the question whether, in the long run, we shall do ourselves or anybody else any real good by debating so seriously the question of improving our methods here and increasing the efficiency of the House of Commons.

I am not always certain that it is a good thing to be purely efficient. I am not certain that we get only advantage from subjecting ourselves to the suggestions of efficiency experts. I was impressed by something which was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) in the course of his speech this afternoon when he spoke about the problems which confront a member of parliament and the serious tasks which he has to undertake. One thing has impressed me in the course of my comparatively few years as a member of the house, and it is this. I do not think that there is anything that the members of parliament could do by way of improving the procedure here which would really meet with the approval of the people of Canada. I think that they to some extent rather like to have the House of Commons and the members of parliament whom they can always make the butt of a useful joke. That is something that is useful to a man looking around for some story to tell in a meeting.

A member sometimes gets the feeling that nothing he can do is right. If he talks in the House of Commons, he is accused of wasting time. If he remains silent in the House of Commons, he is accused of lack of interest and letting important legislation go through that is full of flaws and defects which he should have pointed out and brought to the attention of the government. If the session is long and a member stays here during the whole session, he is blamed for not coming home and meeting his constituents and for getting out of touch with the people at home. On the other hand, if he skips part of the session and goes home and is seen around his constituency, he is wrong again and is accused of being overpaid, never seeming to do any work at Ottawa. I did not know that members of parliament can ever really become perfect.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad to know that there is one perfect member in the house. It increases one's faith in human nature and in our parliamentary institutions. It seems to me that the important thing to do in this parliament, as in any other human institution, is to make the best of the resources which are at our disposal. The resources which are at our disposal here are the human resources made up of the sum of the members of parliament who are here trying to do the best they can for their country and their constituents.

While it is true that we must occasionally give serious attention to the methods and procedures under which we work, I feel very strongly that it would be most unwise for us to take a resolution of this sort which is written down on the order paper containing suggestions which have been worked out conscientiously and simply to say that those are the changes we are going to make regardless of the opinions or feelings of those who have some doubt as to the extent to which it will curtail the right of debate.

I do not want to repeat what has been said many times this afternoon, but I think it is important to remember that parliament is a forum for discussion. That is what the word means. I do not want to be disagreeable or critical, but I certainly must take issue with those who say that the sole function of parliament is to pass legislation. I submit most earnestly that one of the important functions of parliament is to examine legislation before it is passed. In my view that is the reason why our rules have been worked out even to the point of being in the view of some hon. members cumbersome, defective and inefficient so that it is hard to get legislation through quickly.

I should like to make one or two perhaps more serious remarks. I do agree that there is a necessity for an overhaul, perhaps improvement and some streamlining of our procedures. I sometimes think of the rules of parliament as they are in existence today as being something like the one-hoss shay about which Oliver Wendell Holmes wrote, the one that was built in such a logical way that it run one hundred years to a day and then all of a sudden, as the poem goes on, ah, but stay, I will tell you what happened without delay.

It would take me a long time to tell you what has happened to the rules of parliament, but I do believe that they are in danger of suffering from what happened to the one-hoss shay. If we do not patch them up, if we do not revise them, if we do not streamline them, if we do not try to bring them more into conformity with fundamental things, one day they may collapse about our ears in a manner similar to the one-hoss shay. The time may come when resentment builds up to such a point that we may perhaps be irritated, if you like, or consider ourselves forced into doing something rash and reckless and extreme with the rules which would result in an improper limitation of debate.

I think it is useful for us to look at our rules and I think we should approach them with the recollection that these rules were devised to deal with a country of some three million people in 1867, not quite one hundred years ago but getting on toward it, and that they have not been modified substantially or brought up to date since that time. They were sufficient for a parliament with the volume of business that existed in 1867, but they are hardly adequate to deal with the volume of business that a nation of fourteen million people has today, with all the many problems and difficulties that confront such a nation.

I think we should take a good look at the House of Commons in London which has always struck me as having more elastic rules which seem to make it easier to conform to the increased pressure of business than do our rules. But I do not think we can do what the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) has suggested, and take any single set of rules or procedures for limiting debate which might be applicable to the House of Commons in London and apply them in the form of a strait-jacket, as it were, to our procedures here without undertaking certain other fundamental revisions of the rules and procedures of this house which would make them a more suitable framework around which to apply the restrictions to which the hon. member has referred.

I am not going to speak at length for the very good reason that I am not an expert on the rules either of this house or of the House of Commons in London. However, there is one thing which does strike me as the central point around which the rules of the parliament in London are made so flexible and which enables that House of Commons to curtail debate without there being any suggestion of unfairness or of the majority party forcing its will upon the minority. In my view the whole feature revolves around the position, the dignity and authority of the Speaker in the House of Commons at London.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you will believe me when I say that I speak in no sense of criticism in referring to the position of the Speaker here as not being the same as the position enjoyed by the Speaker of the House of Commons in England. If that is so it is for no other reason than that it has been our custom to change our Speakers with every parliament. As is well known, in England the Speaker is not changed with every parliament. Although it is not any part of the written law, the custom there has resulted—I may be putting it rather carelessly—in the Speaker's having a more independent position than he has here.

When the Spearker there rigidly applies some rule, enforces limitation of debate or disciplines a member, there is never any feeling that it is done for reasons of partiality. The Speaker there is absolutely impartial, and that is recognized. It seems to me that until that same fundamental principle is accepted here and we can have the same curtailment of debate as is possible over there, which would be accepted without any suggestion inside or outside the house that there was unfairness or partiality, it will be extremely difficult for us to adopt these restrictions which the hon. member for Halton has set forth in the resolution.

Perhaps I can say in a few words what I perhaps have not succeeded in saying very clearly. It would not be logical to adopt only some of the methods by which debate is curtailed in the parliament in London without adopting the other features without which the discipline necessary to insist upon that curtailment and enforce it would be non-existent or which would result in extreme resentment by members if discipline were enforced. It seems to me that it would enhance the dignity of parliament and make it more likely to have voluntary acceptance of rigid enforcement of discipline on the part of the Speaker if the Speaker's appointment in this House of Commons were permanent, as in the British House of Commons.

We have to meet certain other difficulties in Canada that do not confront the parliament in London. There is the tradition, which I think is a very proper one, that the Speaker in Canada should be on one occasion of English-speaking origin and on another occasion of French-speaking origin. But I think that could be perfectly well maintained without the frequent rotation of Speakers that we have in Canada. Whenever a Speaker chose to resign or retire and a new Speaker was appointed the same principle could be followed, but I regard it as unnecessary to change Speakers with every parliament. I believe it would raise the tone of our debate and make it possible for the Speaker to discipline us, which we all need on occasion, much more readily if the same system were followed here as is followed over there.

I do wish to say, however, that we should bear in mind always that distant fields look green, and that although there are some ways in which the procedure at Westminster perhaps is preferable to our own, nevertheless they have their trials and difficulties too. They have the same complaints about tedious debates and about too much time being given to one subject in comparison with another. That reminds me that I want to correct the record in one respect. Several references have been made to the debate on the resale price maintenance legislation at the last session. I had not realized that the views expressed by opposition members on that occasion had made such a deep impression on hon. members on the government side. We heard them this afternoon speaking of an endless and protracted debate. Indeed the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert) in referring to that debate said that they had listened to speeches for three weeks. That was not good enough for him and he increased his figure to two months. If hon. members will check the record I believe they will find the subject was discussed for four and a half days before the Christmas break and for two days after the Christmas break. Of the four and a half days preceding Christmas one day was entirely devoted to a discussion of procedure. On that occasion the procedural discussion was not initiated by a minister of the crown but by a private member, our good friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Therefore on a subject of tremendous importance, a step which was to bring about a change in a long established system affecting all retail business in Canada, after a debate of only three and a half days hon. members opposite were found to say that this thing was being unnecessarily and needlessly protracted, and indeed we even heard suggestions that it was time to apply closure. I suggest that we maintain a sense of proportion in all these things and that hon. members opposite as well as members on this side remember that whether or not a debate is a filibuster depends entirely upon the point of view of the person who is using that word.

Mr. Sinclair: How do you classify the two and a half hour speech you made in that debate?

Mr. Fulton: I want to correct my hon. friend. The speech was just an hour and fifty-eight minutes. It was a lengthy speech but I submit it was an important subject, and I classify it in the same category as that of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) who introduced the debate on that occasion and spoke for even longer than I.

Mr. Sinclair: But you are not a minister.

Mr. Graydon: Neither are you, Jimmy.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps there is not too much reason for members opposite to be concerned about the length of time taken by members on this side. I sometimes wonder at the violence of their criticisms because I am quite sure they all had and still have a great deal of respect for the memory of a former minister of this government, a person who was a great friend of us all and who was admired and respected by us. I refer to the late Hon. Humphrey Mitchell. That very wise and sagacious parliamentarian, experienced man of affairs, man of common sense, is reported to have said on one occasion—and I can well believe he did so because it sounds like the sort of remark he would have made in giving advice to newcomers, young members like myself—that far more members have talked themselves out of the house than have ever talked themselves into it.

Mr. Cruickshank: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: By all means.

Mr. Cruickshank: Does the hon. member also recall that the former minister of labour said: If that is what a university education does, thank God I quit when I was 14 years of age.

Mr. Sinclair: Another sagacious remark.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member has not made it clear exactly what a university education does.

Mr. Cruickshank: We are listening to it.

Mr. Fulton: I think he would have to be much more specific before he could expect me to agree with him. But if there was any force at all in that remark of the former minister of labour I cannot see that there is very much occasion for violent criticism or opposition by members on the government side when members of the opposition wish to exercise their right to speak.

Coming back to the remark with which I was about to close before I was sidetracked momentarily, I think it is important to remember that although there are certain desirable features of the procedure of the House of Commons in London they obviously have their troubles. They apparently not only have their long week-enders, their t.n.t. boys, Thursday to Tuesday, but they also have their fair share of what an hon. member sitting near me the other day called "leopards behind the curtain". According to a report about parliament appearing in Punch for March 19, it appears that in the House of Commons in London on Monday, March 10, there was one of those occasions when most of the members were engaged in meetings outside behind the curtains and in private rooms around the parliament buildings. The article in Punch has this to say:

> The subject under debate on the floor was the army estimates, which were destined to keep the house until nearly three the following morning. But the greater interest lay in countless other gatherings in the palace of Westminster, at which plans for (a) the downing of the Bevanites; (b) the triumph of the Bevanites, and (c) compromise, were eagerly debated.

After listening to some of the points made by the comparatively few speakers who remained in the house and took part in the discussion, a striking similarity to what was said the other day by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) with respect to the defence debate, the article goes on to say:

> It took still longer for the house to dispose of the estimates, not so much because there was anything to talk about as because it is the tradition to take a long time over the estimates. But most of the opposition side stayed at their private meetings, "out of doors," as Mr. Churchill always puts it.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): There has been again today, as there has been on very many other occasions during the last ten years since I have been here, a debate upon the desirability of making some improvements in the rules governing our sittings. There have been a number of suggestions but it has been quite as apparent today, as it was on other occasions, that it is very difficult to get anything like 250, 255 or 262 well disposed gentlemen to agree upon changes in the practices that have grown up that would constitute real improvements.

However, I have had a check made of the Journals, and since 1926 there have been more than a dozen occasions when the desirability if not the necessity of improvements has been discussed; and as the hon. gentleman who just spoke said, the rules are very much the same as when they were designed to take care of a parliament representing three million people, with affairs very much less difficult and complex than those that have to be dealt with at the present time. During the last two sessions we had experiments with changes with which some were quite well pleased and others not so well pleased. On December 13 of last year a report was submitted to this house by a select committee that had been set up to consider with Mr. Speaker the recommendations that might be made. There did not happen to be any time to give consideration to that report, because it would have been the practice to refer it to the committee of the whole. I sat through more than one day of discussion of the rules in committee of the whole which produced nothing but the interesting speeches to which we listened; and there seemed no time last session to do that. But in the report submitted at that time there are suggestions and recommendations which certainly appear to a great many to have substantial merit. No doubt suggestions have been made here today that would appear to a good many to have substantial merit.

Certainly there will not be another opportunity before Easter to get back to this question. In order that the discussion today may not be lost or wasted, like some of the former discussions in this house, might it not be advisable to reconstitute the committee to which I have just referred to consider with Mr. Speaker all these suggestions that have been made? If I had the unanimous consent of the house I would move the following motion—and I trust the mover of this resolution will not be offended at this course of action—instead of trying to reach a decision here as to whether or not the precise form of this resolution could or should be adopted:

> That a select committee composed of members to be named later be appointed to consider with Mr. Speaker this resolution (Mr. Cleaver's motion) and the debate thereon, together with the proposals and suggestions contained in the report of the select committee on the procedure of this house presented on December 13, 1951, with power to send for persons and papers and to report from time to time its findings and recommendations to the house, and that the said resolution be now referred to the select committee thus appointed.

That select committee might again recommend some further trials, if not definite changes in the rules. A number of hon. members on both sides of the house, or if not both sides at least belonging to the parties habitually seated on the respective sides of the house, would favour, as I gathered from the applause that marked some of the statements made in the course of the debate, the adoption of the hours we were using toward the end of last session. Even if we got no further than that and did not have the qualification the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) felt was necessary, that is to say a concurrent decision to restrict speeches to thirty minutes, I am sure a large number of members—I do not know whether it would be anything like unanimous—would prefer the hours we were using and would feel that by self-discipline we might make up the time those hours would take from the regular week. I think if we did reappoint this select committee it could make another try, and I would hope something constructive would come from it.

There is much to be said for the point of view expressed by the hon. member who last spoke as to the impossibility of fitting into our system parts taken out of the rules of practice of the parliament at Westminster. They have been the result of a gradual growth accompanied by qualifications which we might not have as an accompaniment if we embodied them in our own standing orders and proceedings. It has been suggested for perhaps two or three sessions that we could fix separate debates. Well, this year we had a separate debate on external affairs. We have one on defence that has not yet been completed but which I hope may be completed tomorrow. It may be we will find that is something that makes for an improvement in the order of debate.

I think much is to be said for the suggestion by the hon. member that the authority of the Speaker over the House of Commons at Westminster is very great, and helps to maintain an orderly conduct of the discussions without any feeling of resentment. Well, I do not wish to be unduly complimentary, sir, but it is my impression that during the sessions you have occupied that position the dignity with which the affairs of the house have been conducted and the impartiality you have displayed have been such as to give confidence to everyone that rules with some elasticity which you might be allowed to apply would be applied in a dignified and impartial way, and that this would also help not to throttle freedom of speech but to eliminate unnecessary repetition without there being any feeling of resentment.

I would be very reluctant to ask the house to vote by a majority something that any large section of the house felt was unfair. I do not think it would be practicable to get the work of the house done if there was a lasting feeling of unfairness in the minds of any substantial group in the house. I think that would defeat our purpose. While such modifications as we do get may not be acceptable to everyone, they should be such that no substantial group would feel that the majority was abusing its power. I think the only way to achieve that kind of result is to have these matters further considered by a committee the members of which will be suggested by the various groups. They may not be able to make many unanimous recommendations, but I would hope they would be able to have unanimous recommendations on rather more than has been found possible so far; and that in any event there would be a spirit of generosity on both sides that might allow us, for the remainder of the session after Easter, to have the hours that we had during the last session, and that the establishment of those hours would create a desire to have them operate in such a way as to not prolong the session unduly. If I have the unanimous consent of the house, I would submit this motion to re-establish this select committee, the names to be specified at a later date, and have the select committee consider this resolution, all the suggestions that have been made in the course of the debate as well as all the suggestions that the committee dealt with in the report that was tabled on December 13 last.

Mr. Graydon: Will the Prime Minister permit a question? I was not quite sure of one point in the Prime Minister's amendment to the motion of the member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver), and that is whether or not the new committee would have the power to go beyond the terms of the motion of the member for Halton and the suggestions that were made, as well as the suggestions which were passed or considered by the report of that special committee on December 13? I should think that perhaps it would be advisable to include an extra power there so that the committee, if they felt it was desirable, might go further and consider other matters.

May I make one other suggestion to the Prime Minister, and I hope he will not mind my doing so. Might it not be advisable, in view of the fact we are just about to end our activities for the Easter recess, for the house to agree upon the question of hours of sitting set out in the report of December 13 so that we could start with those hours after the Easter adjournment?

Mr. St. Laurent: With respect to the last suggestion, there has been no notice of this, and the house is hardly more than half full at this time, so I think it might be regarded by everyone as unfair to make a decision. If the committee is set up perhaps the whips could submit the names, if not tomorrow by Wednesday, so that that committee could be constituted at once. The last time the committee was set up, the day after it was constituted it brought in a recommendation concerning the hours which was concurred in, so I think that no time would be lost if it were done in that way.

Mr. Graydon: Perhaps that would be better.

Mr. St. Laurent: As to the scope, the motion provides for referring not only the resolution but the debate of today, and I think the debate has covered pretty generally everything that would be apt to be required to be considered. My intention was not to limit consideration of the committee in any way whatever, and if the committee found that the debate of today and the suggestions that are in the report of December 13, 1951, did not extend to everything that they should consider, it would be very easy for them to make a report and ask for further powers. I am sure the house would be only too glad to grant those further powers.

I trust that this committee would be a committee of the same members as at the last session, and probably the names would be readily available. They could be secured not later than Wednesday, and the committee might even have a meeting before the Easter recess; then a report would be available for consideration as soon as we got back. I am afraid that some of those who have had objections to changing the hours would feel it was not quite fair to have done it without notice, by unanimous consent of a house which was not even half filled. I hope the hon. member will feel that that is perhaps true, and my reason for taking that attitude is not that I do not want it done, but that I think it might be done in a more acceptable way if it came as a report from His Honour the Speaker and his committee.

Mr. Drew: I am somewhat concerned about the actual form of this motion. I am merely anxious to put through a motion that is effective. As the motion which is before me reads, it would appear to be a separate motion, standing by itself. I am wondering how it is related to the motion of the member for Halton now before the house, to which this motion refers. May I point out that it is not drafted as an amendment to the motion by the member for Halton.

Mr. St. Laurent: That is why I asked for unanimous consent to present it. We have followed the procedure of 1930. There had been a motion of this kind before the house, and then it was moved that the original motion and amendment be referred to a committee appointed to deal with all matters connected with pensions for returned soldiers, and that the committee have power to consider the advisability of doing such and so. I thought that this would permit the resolution, the debate on the resolution, and the other matters that are not before us this session but that are expressed in the report that was tabled at the end of last session, to be referred to this committee and get the consideration of the committee. Then, they would come back to the house in the form of a report from the committee.

Mr. Coldwell: It seems to me that to regularize the procedure it would be necessary for the member for Halton to withdraw his motion, then have a vote on this motion separately. As I understand, the Prime Minister is suggesting that the subject matter of the hon. member's resolution should be referred, along with the committee report that was made to the house and any suggestions that have been advanced in today's debate, to this special committee. If any other members have valuable suggestions to offer the committee, or the committee itself has some valuable suggestions, I understand they might be considered. It seems to me there is no limit to this. To get the procedure in proper order, I think the hon. member for Halton should withdraw his motion, that is without prejudice to the resolution or the subject matter of it, then the Prime Minister's motion might be carried. The whips might be asked to name a committee tomorrow morning, and possibly they could have a meeting right away.

Mr. St. Laurent: In 1930 it was not considered necessary for the motion which was then before the house to be withdrawn. It was a motion to have the board of pension commissioners consider pensions, and the motion was not withdrawn. It was a motion that all the words after "that" be struck out—

Mr. Coldwell: It was an amendment.

Mr. St. Laurent: No, it was moved that the motion and the debate on it be referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs. The hon. member for Halton told me he had no objection to withdrawing his motion, but I told him I did not think it was necessary. I thought it might be referred to the committee and that, being referred to the committee, it would disappear from the order paper. I would not wish to be discourteous to the member for Halton, so I asked him and he told me he had no objection if that were required, in order that the matter might go before the committee.

Mr. Drew: It is only a question of draftsmanship, but the Prime Minister has just pointed out that the motion to which he referred, and which he is using as a precedent, actually called for the striking out of certain words of the earlier motion.

Mr. St. Laurent: No, there had been a motion and an amendment, and instead of deciding either the motion or the amendment the Prime Minister moved that the motion and the amendment be referred to the committee, and it was on that precedent that this procedure was drafted. I do not think there is any point in taking much time over these procedural things. I think we are all agreed that the subject matter should be considered by this select committee under the chairmanship of the Speaker. The hon. member for Halton is, I understand, prepared to withdraw his motion. If any hon. member feels that is more desirable—I do not think it is necessary—it could be done so that we will not be embarrassed by any dispute on procedure.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I point out that it is just because these things do become precedents, as the Prime Minister himself mentioned in relation to something that happened in 1930, that I am suggesting a change in a few words that I believe would bring this in order, if the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) is withdrawing it. I suggest that it read:

> That a select committee composed of members to be named later be appointed to consider with Mr. Speaker the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Halton and the debate thereon . . .

But then that would specifically refer to the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Halton which is now being withdrawn. I am only concerned about the fact that this will stand without any subsequent argument.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am not quite clear as to what the hon. member means. Does he suggest that with his change, the motion should be withdrawn?

Mr. Drew: Yes.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. St. Laurent: If it is withdrawn, then it should be the subject matter of the motion that is referred, but not the motion, because once it is withdrawn it ceases to exist.

Mr. Knowles: The subject matter.

Mr. St. Laurent: Perhaps the hon. gentleman has not noticed the last two lines of the resolution before him. They read:

> . . . and that this resolution be now referred to the select committee thus appointed.

Mr. Drew: I took it you read the resolution which you have in your hand.

Mr. St. Laurent: No, it was intended to be a resolution submitted by the hon. member for Halton.

Mr. Graydon: I suggest that this debate be referred to the committee, too.

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, it should be a very good illustration of what is required to be dealt with. We are sometimes pretty technical, and it may very well be that it would be desirable for the committee to provide some elasticity. Perhaps the simplest thing for me to do will be to withdraw this, because I am getting into a muddle that I did not anticipate and I did not want to bring about. I am quite prepared to withdraw my motion.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, then, if I am going to leave it, I am going to leave it as it is.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the desire of the house that I read the motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Motion (Mr. St. Laurent) agreed to.

Mr. Drew: It will create an interesting precedent for some future time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will resume the debate on the motion to go into supply and discuss national defence. We hope sincerely to conclude this debate and call an item in the following departments: trade and commerce, resources and development, national health and welfare, and labour. Then we will consider the resolution to approve a treaty of peace with Japan.

It is understood that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will make his budget speech at eight o'clock. I suppose the opposition financial critic will adjourn the debate and the house will revert to its ordinary business.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, while it may be that the government will not be willing to consider it, I do suggest the advisability of proceeding with the motion to set up a redistribution committee.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I myself am becoming a little muddled. I thought we had an understanding that we would have two debates; one on external affairs and one on national defence. Discussing it with my colleagues today, I insisted that we continue this debate on defence.

Mr. Drew: Let me make this quite clear. I am not suggesting that there be an interruption of the debate on national defence. But, following the hope expressed by the minister that that debate would terminate, I was merely suggesting that when that debate terminated there might be an opportunity to proceed with the resolution dealing with redistribution.

Mr. St. Laurent: With respect to that, Mr. Speaker, I think I should volunteer this word of explanation. I may have to withdraw the resolution, the notice of which I have on the order paper, and substitute another, because I am told that under the rules there cannot be any amendment moved that would expand the powers of a select committee. Though I do not want to sponsor anything that I would have to oppose, I want to make it as broad as possible, so that the house can cut it down if it chooses to do so, but so that there will be no procedural obstacle in the house expressing the whole of its views. I thought I had just that in the form of the resolution that is on the order paper, but I am told I have not; that there would be other points of view that it should be possible to discuss, but that could not be raised by amendments that would be in order to the notice as I have framed it, and I have been asked to frame it in proper terms so that the other matters could by amendments to mine be properly discussed and not be ruled out of order. This is also a matter which has difficulties on its merits, and I should like to avoid having procedural difficulties in the matter submitted. I feel that I am not doing this as the Prime Minister; I am doing it as the leader of the majority party, whose duty it is to provide an opportunity for a full discussion of the subject.

Another draft has been prepared, which I have submitted to the critics to see if that would allow the discussion of everything that it might be desirable to add, and I may have to ask tomorrow for permission to withdraw this notice and substitute another. I hope it may be possible to do that, and to have it ready for Wednesday, if I can get the dispensation of the forty-eight hours' notice for the new form.

I am told that my form would take care of one set of difficulties, but would raise another set of difficulties that could not be overcome by any amendment that would be in order, and that in order to make it possible to have the other set of difficulties taken care of I shall have to broaden the terms of my proposal, or the Speaker would find himself obliged to rule out of order certain amendments that it may be desired to suggest.

Mr. Drew: I agree with the Prime Minister that it is most desirable that in a matter as important as this there be no question of the adequacy of the resolution. When I made the suggestion it was with the idea that possibly the members of that committee might, if possible, meet and have certain information placed in their possession before the Easter holiday, but I agree that it is more important that the resolution adequately cover all contingencies.

It being ten minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, April 8, 1952

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

DEFENCE EXPENDITURE—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina) presented the first report of the special committee on defence expenditure, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT

Mr. H. B. McCulloch (Pictou) presented the second report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to suggest to the hon. member that he consider allowing this motion to stand until Monday. As I listened to the presentation of the report the only recommendation heard was that leave be granted to the committee to sit while the house is sitting. I may be wrong, but I was under impression that we were also to ask for leave to authorize the chairman to have as many copies of our proceedings printed as he might determine from time to time. I did not hear any reference to that in the report which he presented.

I think it is important that we should get on with the printing of the proceedings of the committee. I have some misgivings as to concurrence at this stage in a report which recommends only that the committee be permitted to sit while the house is sitting. Would the hon. member consider withholding the motion for concurrence until tomorrow or a week from Monday next so that the question of printing may be further examined?

Mr. McCulloch: It was decided this morning that we would not meet until April 22. I think everyone was in agreement with that.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Fulton: Do I understand from the hon. gentleman that he is withholding the motion for concurrence until Tuesday, April 22? I am sorry, but I could not hear what he said.

Mr. McCulloch: No.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Fulton: I am not certain, but I gathered from what has been said that the hon. gentleman is not disposed to accept my suggestion. Under the circumstances I do not agree to the motion to concur in the report.

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): It has just been stated by the chairman of the committee that the committee will not meet again until April 22 at eleven o'clock in the morning. I see no reason why this motion should not pass.

Mr. McIvor: There is nothing in this report apart from asking for permission to sit while the house is sitting. Surely that is not controversial.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fulton: I have raised a question with regard to another decision which the committee made this morning and which I understood was to be reported to the house this afternoon but has not been reported. I think it should be included in the committee's report. Under the circumstances I cannot agree to concurrence in the report this afternoon, because I think it is an incomplete report.

Mr. Speaker: It would require unanimous consent to have the report concurred in this afternoon. Probably the matter can stand until tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion stands.

GRAIN

INITIAL PRICES FOR WESTERN WHEAT, OATS AND BARLEY

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I would like to advise the house of the decision of the government in regard to initial prices for western wheat, oats and barley for the crop year commencing August 1, 1952.

As members of the house know, the Canadian wheat board is in the midst of a very large and difficult operation this year. In spite of unfavourable harvesting conditions last fall, and in spite of the fact that there is considerable threshing to be completed in the prairie provinces, the outturn from 1951 grain crops in the west is still very large.

Grain

It is likely that total grain deliveries by western producers in the present crop year will be in the neighbourhood of 700 million bushels, which is the largest delivery of grain in any single crop year in the history of the west.

The difficulties of the present crop year have not arisen from the quantity of grain which will be delivered to the board. The difficulties arise from the lateness of the 1951 harvest, the unprecedented quantity of out-of-condition grain threshed by producers, and the general quality of the grain harvested. In spite of these difficulties, good progress has been made in disposing of deliveries from the 1951 crop. The large crop in 1951 was accompanied by a good demand for grain, and this fact will be reflected in the operating results attained by the board during the crop year, in spite of all the difficulties arising from the lateness of the crop, delayed harvesting, and the fact that at least 250 million bushels of grain will be received from producers in a tough or damp condition.

So far as wheat is concerned, the major part of producers' deliveries during the crop year 1951-52 will be disposed of within the crop year. However, with the prospect of substantial marketings by producers in the final months of the crop year, some increase in the wheat carry-over can be expected on July 31 next.

On the basis of progress to date in disposing of the 1951 wheat crop, and the prospect for a continuation of a broad demand for wheat, the government is establishing the initial price for wheat for 1952-53 at the same level as at the start of the present crop year, namely, $1.40 per bushel basis No. 1 northern wheat in store at Fort William-Port Arthur or Vancouver.

In general, the position in respect to oats and barley parallels that of wheat. While very large deliveries of both grains are expected during the present crop year, demand has been satisfactory. There will be some increase in year-end stocks of both grains, due to the lateness of the 1951 harvest, the volume of grain still to be threshed this spring and the necessity of conditioning large quantities of oats and barley prior to sale. However, the outlook is such that the government feels justified in establishing initial prices for both oats and barley at the same level as at the start of the present crop year. These initial prices are 65 cents per bushel basis No. 2 C. W. oats in store Fort William-Port Arthur, and 96 cents per bushel basis No. 3 C. W. 6-row barley in store Fort William-Port Arthur.

As I have mentioned on other occasions, these are initial prices, and it is always the hope of the government that pooling operations conducted by the wheat board will result in surpluses which will permit either increases in the initial prices during the crop year, or final payments to producers after the close of the crop year, or both.

Mr. Cardiff: Would the minister care to make a statement with regard to feed grain in Ontario? He has said that the price is to be 65 cents at Fort William, but it costs us in Ontario about 95 cents per bushel.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend is referring to the initial price at Fort William. Beyond the initial price there is the participation certificate. The price in Ontario is based on the final price rather than the initial price.

SHIPMENT OF WHEAT THROUGH CHURCHILL—AUTHORITY FOR DIVERSION CHARGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): I did not send notice of this question because it has been inspired by the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I should like to ask him under what authority diversion charges are made against wheat going through the port of Churchill, and if the government will not take into consideration the abolishing of this unearned levy—because that is what it is.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The wheat is delivered by the producer to a private elevator company, and it is necessary to divert the wheat from the usual outlet of the private elevator company to a government terminal elevator. There is always a diversion charge in that connection. If my hon. friend would like a more comprehensive statement I should be glad to obtain such a statement from the wheat board and give it to the house later on.

PRICE OF BREAD IN RELATION TO RETURNS TO WESTERN WHEAT GROWERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is it the intention of the government to continue its present policy of making cheap bread available to the people of Canada at the expense of the wheat growers of the prairie provinces?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): It is the policy of the government of Canada to sell wheat to the Canadian consumer at the same price as to the consumer in Britain, the consumer in Egypt, the consumer in Germany and to other consumers throughout the world.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PAY INCREASES FOR TEMPORARY EMPLOYEES

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to lay on the table a report of the civil service commission respecting certain employees of the House of Commons.

Recently I assured the house that the matter of increases in the salaries of our temporary employees was receiving my attention and that of the officials of the house, and that a report would be made as soon as possible.

I now desire to inform the house that salary increases in line with those recently granted to other employees of the public service have been granted to the temporary employees of the house, retroactive to December 1, 1951, for the continuous employees, and from the commencement of the session for our sessional staff.

I might perhaps add that in order to help make Easter more pleasant to the staff of the house, the cheques covering these increases, as well as the salaries for the first half of this month, will be issued on Thursday morning.

AERONAUTICS ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR ZONING OF AIRPORTS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Aeronautics Act to provide that the governor in council may make regulations for the zoning of airports and also to provide for the payment of compensation in respect of any property injuriously affected by the application of the said regulations.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WITHDRAWAL OF NOTICE OF MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF REDISTRIBUTION COMMITTEE

On the order for government notices of motions:

April 3—The Prime Minister—Resolved, that a select committee be appointed to consider the results of the census of 1951 and the readjustment of the representation in the House of Commons necessitated thereby, with power to consider whether the said readjustment should be made in strict accord with the rules presently set out in the British North America Acts 1867 to 1951, and the other statutes in that behalf, or whether it is desirable to provide that there should be no reduction of more than fifteen per cent at any one time in the number of members assigned to any province and that there should be assigned separately two members instead of one to the Yukon and the Northwest Territories or any part thereof and that the total number of members should be increased accordingly; with instructions to prepare a bill or bills with schedules to give effect to its findings and conclusions and to contain and describe the several electoral divisions entitled to return members to this House of Commons; with power to send for persons, papers and records and to examine witnesses, and to report from time to time; and that notwithstanding standing order 65, the committee shall consist of thirty-seven members to be designated by the house at a later date.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): When the notice of motion concerning the resolution to set up a select committee on redistribution was referred to at the close of last evening's sitting I intimated that I might find it desirable to ask that this notice be dropped so that I might substitute one in somewhat different language which would make it less difficult for the house, without infringing any of the rules, to consider all the various aspects of this problem. I now find that that is so, and I should like to ask that this notice of motion be dropped.

I shall immediately hand the Clerk for inclusion in the Votes and Proceedings of today another notice of motion in a somewhat different form. Of course the result will be that the new notice will not appear on the order paper for tomorrow, but it will be on Votes and Proceedings. Now, should there be time to consider it tomorrow, and should it be the desire of the house to have it taken up, I would be quite prepared to submit the motion tomorrow, although it will still be only on the Votes and Proceedings as a notice.

Order withdrawn.

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 15 FOR THIS DAY'S SITTING

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That standing order 15 in relation to the consideration of private and public bills on Tuesdays be suspended for the sitting of Tuesday, April 8, 1952, so that the order for the house to resolve itself again into committee of ways and means (budget) may be proceeded with at 8 o'clock, p.m.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

COAL MINE EMPLOYEES IN INVERNESS, N.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. F. Carroll (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, and I apologize for not having given notice. The minister no doubt is aware of the serious situation that exists in the mining town of Inverness. Six months ago the mine was closed down, and since that time three or four hundred employees have been out of employment. In most cases their unemployment insurance has run out. I ask the minister to consider the possibility of doing something outside the act for these people until something else can be done for their rehabilitation.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I know something about the situation referred to by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond. While it will be impossible for the unemployment insurance commission to continue the supplementary benefits which expired a week ago today, nevertheless I will ask the commission to have someone look into the matter referred to and see whether they can assist in finding employment either there or elsewhere.

QUESTION AS TO APPLICATION TO FISHERMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour arising out of an answer he gave me yesterday with respect to unemployment insurance for fishermen. In the report of the unemployment insurance commission survey of 1951, paragraph 279, appear the words, "Some form of unemployment assistance should be provided by the proper authorities". Would the minister clarify these words?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I think what is meant is that since the conclusion was reached by the commission as I announced yesterday in the house, that for the time being at least fishermen could not come under the Unemployment Insurance Act, any cases of need among fishermen would have to be taken care of by local programs of unemployment assistance or relief.

ANNUITIES

MODIFICATION OF CONTRACTS IN RELATION TO OLD AGE SECURITY PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the payment of old age security commencing at age 70, has consideration been given to permitting the modification of existing contracts for deferred annuities so as to pay a greater annuity up to age 70 which would be reduced by $40 a month after age 70?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Yes, this is one phase of the question of annuities that is being studied by our officials.

[Mr. Carroll.]

IMMIGRATION

SMUGGLING OF ALIENS FROM CANADA INTO THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Would the minister make a statement on the report from Buffalo that immigrants to Canada, or aliens, are being smuggled across the border? Has he any record of any of these people having had their passage from Europe paid by Canada?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I read the report in the newspaper, and that is the only notice I have had of the alleged action on the other side of the border. I think it ought to be made clear that our immigration policy is designed to admit to Canada persons who intend to reside here permanently and ultimately, we hope, take out Canadian citizenship. We have no knowledge of any large-scale smuggling of aliens such as was indicated in the newspaper report. If we do get evidence of it I shall bring it to the attention of the house.

Mr. Fraser: Is there any check on the Canadian side of the river to prevent these people from crossing there?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): We have our usual officers on the Canadian side. I think my hon. friend's purpose would be served by my saying that if anyone is caught and returned of whom we have a record we would then consider whether he ought to be deported from this country.

Mr. Cruickshank: Is there any compulsion on an immigrant or displaced person who comes to Canada to remain in Peterborough and not move to British Columbia?

Mr. Fraser: They would never move from Peterborough to British Columbia.

HEALTH

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF SURVEY REPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, arising out of a return tabled yesterday in response to a question of mine of a few days ago. Will he consider tabling in the house the health survey reports that have been received thus far from several of the provinces, and the others as they come along?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The hon. member did not give me notice of his question.

Mr. Knowles: Surely you do not need notice for this question.

Mr. Martin: I usually want to give his questions the greatest consideration. Characteristically I will give this matter my very serious consideration.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SEAWARD DEFENCE BASE, ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister prepared to give details with regard to the proposed expenditure of $500,000 for the St. John's harbour defences?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): The hon. member asked a similar question on March 10. I said that a contract had been let, and I was then prevented from giving further details because the Speaker said the question should go on the order paper. I still have the same information. A contract was let on February 20 for a wharf, a slab and some other works. The amount of the contract is $543,450. It was let to the Diamond Construction Company.

SUPPLY

NATIONAL DEFENCE

The house resumed, from Friday, April 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Claxton for committee of supply.

Mr. E. W. George (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned on Friday last I had just read the motion moved by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on Monday, October 22, 1951. This is one of the most important motions that has ever been passed by the house in peacetime, and for the sake of continuity I am going to read it again. It is as follows:

> That this house approves the continuation of Canada's participation in the efforts being made through the United Nations to establish international peace, and in particular to defeat aggression and restore peace in Korea, and by the North Atlantic treaty nations to deter aggression and promote stability and well-being in the north Atlantic area.

I do not say that in assenting to this motion opposition members agreed with everything that the government or the services had done in connection with Korea and the North Atlantic treaty. I do say, however, that there was a wide opportunity, indeed an invitation, for anyone who did not agree with everything that had been done, to say so. The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) did not say so. He said so just six months later, long after the brigade had arrived in Europe as announced, arranged and carried out. The military expert of the opposition said nothing about armour.

You know, Mr. Speaker, it is sometimes not a bad thing to go back and look at what has been said previously, in order to get our perspective right. When we were raising the 25th brigade to go to Korea we did not get much in the way of support or assistance from the Conservative opposition. This is what the hon. member for Nanaimo said in the house about the 25th brigade on September 1, 1950, at page 131 of Hansard:

> The appeal was made to the young men of Canada. That appeal has been magnificently responded to. But what have we got? A conglomeration of men bearing the proud names of great units, unknown to their own special unit commanders, their officers, their N.C.O.'s. Any man who has had any experience in the service will tell you that it takes a long time to weld such groups of men together in order that they become a fighting team, because it is team work that counts, not merely the individual skill of an individual soldier to handle his weapon.

Then on page 133 the hon. member also said:

> I fear that the brigade now in training will be ready either too late or just in time to take part in the victory parade.

That is the brigade which everyone who has seen it says is the finest fighting formation ever fielded by this country. So much has been said about this excellent brigade that there is no need of repeating it here. We are proud of them, and they are perpetuating the famous records of Canadian soldiers who have preceded them in other wars. I wonder what they think now of the remarks made about them by the hon. member for Nanaimo.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I repeat that the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) was not doing a service to the reserve forces when, by inference, he tagged them as he did. One or two isolated cases of personnel joining up only to participate in athletics does not mean that other units allow this sort of thing. I hope he has done as he suggested he would—that is, given the information to the minister. I do not mean that when conditions exist which are contrary to the rules and regulations and/or not in the public interest, they should not be exposed. Far from it; I am sure every citizen has an obligation in this regard, and especially members of parliament. When any of these cases come to light hon. members should report them immediately to the authorities or to the minister, instead of waiting for an opportune time to arrive to air the matter on the floor of the house.

Mr. Herridge: It was reported immediately.

Mr. George: That is not what you said in the house. Adverse publicity such as this is detrimental to recruiting for the reserve army and tends to lower the morale of those at present on strength.

We are also proud of the 27th brigade; and speaking of this brigade Waldo Frank in the Los Angeles Times, as reported in the Montreal Gazette of February 6, 1952, stated it was——the most cheering sight in the otherwise drab picture of western defence along the Rhine-Alps line.

Further in the same article he said:

. . . although the Canadians have been in Germany only since December, they already present a better picture of a battle-ready fighting team than any other allied combat unit in Europe with two exceptions—the U.S. 1st infantry division and the two brigades of the U.S. armoured cavalry.

A little further on he says:

Everybody in the brigade is a volunteer, with full understanding of why he is here and how long he will stay in Germany. Finally, all hands in the brigade are well clothed, well fed and well paid.

Canada has only fourteen million people, but the opposition experts talk as if we should supply the military components which would normally be supplied by a country with ten to fifteen times our population. We must continue to play our part in preserving peace, and there must be visible proof of our intentions. The peoples of Europe have been liberated once and they are not interested in having it done again. We must stop communist aggression where it is. Canada has provided the troops as agreed under NATO. They asked for and got infantry. Being a member of the armoured corps I am not talking against armour. I am simply insisting that armour must be properly supplied and used. Otherwise the results are disastrous.

All the opposition theories in favour of an armoured brigade group being sent to Germany instead of the infantry brigade group we did send are another example of the opposition's apparent non-constructive attitude toward most government legislation and policies.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to debate Canada's national defence policy as it now exists and as it is forecast for 1952-1953, because it is difficult to grasp anything clearly from the statement made by the minister in introducing this debate on Thursday of last week. I do not mean it was difficult to understand what the minister said; he did give us some background in connection with defence, but it was extremely difficult to get from his statement any clear picture of the present position of our defence forces, exactly what we have in the way of forces in being today to meet aggression, and what exactly we may have in the way of forces in being at the end of this fiscal year as a result of the money we are being asked to spend.

I can only say that in reading over the speech carefully with a view to getting something from it which one might criticize sensibly and constructively, there seemed to be in it a complete sense of unreality. You cannot take that speech and analyse it, and say that for this expenditure of $2,100 million we are getting so many tanks, we are going to have so many guns, we shall have so many operational squadrons at the end of the year equipped with so many aircraft of such and such a type. That sort of break-down is impossible, however carefully you examine the minister's statement. It is impossible to take from his remarks anything more than a general statement of objectives for the end of 1954.

It is true the speech was lengthy. That was quite proper, because he was introducing an important subject, having to do with an expenditure of over $2 billion. The minister did give us the background of some of the decisions that have been taken as to the raising of our forces and the objective proposed for the end of the three-year program on which we have now embarked. He gave us some lengthy quotations from the statement by General Eisenhower, which already had received ample publicity in the press and over the radio. He then gave us a definition of "infrastructure", and referred to the word as having been drawn from a French word having to do with railways.

He went on to tell us that the word was first used in the western union countries, and he referred to all the uncertainty that surrounded it, until I began to wonder whether he was going to end up by suggesting that this subject be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines rather than the committee on defence. For all we got out of the minister's speech in the way of facts upon which we might build a constructive debate, he might almost as well have been speaking about something to do with railways, canals and telegraph lines. When he referred to the western union, the threatened strike in the Western Union Company in the United States made me wonder whether we were not going to bog down to an equal extent in the creation of a defence effort in Canada.

The lack of reality in the minister's approach to this subject, and his reluctance to give us a clear statement of what we are to get for the money we are spending, is I believe typical of the situation we find when we look into the actual structure of our defence program. I can find it nowhere better illustrated than by an experience I had last year during a long week end—while the house was adjourned, not one of the Thursday to Tuesday variety—while driving back to Ottawa from Windsor. En route I gave a lift to a soldier who was wearing the shoulder flashes of the Royal Canadian Regiment. I asked him whether he had yet been with his battalion, and he told me he had been posted to the battalion shortly after joining up and had then been sent to an army cooking school. I thought that was interesting, because here was a soldier who was a member of a parachute battalion, one of the units of the airborne brigade, and I wondered what kind of cooking equipment they used. I asked him what kind of stoves they used, and said I wondered whether they were anything like the company cookers which we used in the field in the last war.

The soldier asked me what kind of outfit we had used, and I described to him as best I could what we called the hay-burner with the series of stands on which the containers were placed in which the food was cooked for the company. I said I did not believe that would be a suitable thing for packing and dropping from a parachute, and he said, "No, we do not have anything like that; we were not trained on that." I thought they were probably trained on something much more up to date and realistic, so I asked what kind of equipment they were trained to use. He said, "We have the most wonderful up to date stoves in the world, a most magnificent set of gleaming Moffat electric ranges." I thought that was typical—to train a cook who is going to cook for a parachute regiment on a Moffat electric range. I did not like to ask the soldier, but I think I should like to hear from the minister what arrangements are being made for the soldier-cook to plug his stove in when he drops by parachute from an aircraft. Well, of course the illustration can be strained, but it indicates the sense of unreality pervading the whole defence structure in which we are trying to carry on this debate today.

The task is made much more difficult by the fact that the minister sought in advance, during the course of his introductory speech, to frighten us from criticizing the way in which his department is carrying out its responsibilities. He sought to do that by suggesting that for us to say that things should be done differently would in some way be disloyal and would tend to weaken the defence effort. He sought to discourage us from criticizing by saying—if you suggest something should be done differently you will only be displaying hindsight. I shall have more to say a little later about this outrageous suggestion, which I regard as indicative of a perverted attitude to parliament and to the responsibilities and functions of the Minister of National Defence in his relationship to parliament and the country. At the moment I think it must be said that the minister's attitude is typical of the means by which he seeks to distort the true picture of our defence effort and to throw a cloak of secrecy over the clear deficiencies that exist. Notwithstanding the minister's effort, I intend to refer to some of those deficiencies and shortcomings in the course of my remarks this afternoon.

The first general observation I wish to make by way of criticism is that to total up the amounts we have spent in the last two years, and add to that the amount we are being asked to authorize for this year, gives a total which is quite unjustified in terms of any concrete achievements which have been laid before us. If you compare the total spending with the figures of results which were given, it presents a clear indication of inefficiency and waste in our defence effort.

Some of the figures, Mr. Speaker, are interesting, if not alarming. In the fiscal year 1950-51 the total spending for all defence purposes was $784 million; in the fiscal year 1951-52 it was $1,944 million, making a total for those two years of $2,728 million, to which we are being asked to add this year authority for the further expenditure of $2,109 million. By the end of the fiscal year in March, 1953, therefore, we shall have spent in those three years alone a total of $4,837 million—just under $5 billion.

The question which must be asked—and which should be answered—is this: What shall we have by the end of the fiscal year 1953 to show for the expenditure of this staggering sum? It is there that the shortcomings and deficiencies in the minister's statement become obvious. When you try to see what you can find in the way of details concerning what we shall have in existence at the end of that time you find that, looking first at the navy, there is no clear picture of what will be operational.

I have the minister's statement before me, and here is what he had to say about the navy, as reported at page 1088 of Hansard for April 3, 1952:

> By way of summary, Mr. Speaker, in the twenty months since Korea the navy has commissioned nine ships and launched six others. It has twenty-seven more on order, with forty awaiting refitting.

It is operating sixteen schools. In Korean waters alone it has sailed over 450,000 miles.

When you try to find out exactly what will be in existence in the way of anti-submarine task forces, which we have been told is the prime role of the Canadian navy in the future, there emerges nothing. This general statement does not tell us whether we shall have one task force, or two, or only part of one. How many of those nine ships which were commissioned are now operational? How many of those that have been commissioned are at sea? What about those ships that have been launched? In what state of readiness are they? What about the twenty-seven ships on order and the forty awaiting refitting?

The vague statement made by the minister is useless so far as giving this house and this country any clear picture of naval defence preparedness is concerned. It makes it impossible to carry on any constructive criticism of the government's policy. But what we do know with respect to the navy—although we are not told this; we have to dig it out of the mass of facts and obscurities which surround it—is that we have virtually nothing now capable of discharging Canada's main naval role which, as we have been repeatedly told, is to place in service, primarily in the Atlantic, an anti-submarine task force.

When we turn to the army to see what we shall have there, what do we find? Well, we find that we have some specific information, but the information we have in this case gives rise to no feeling of security but rather to one of deep disturbance. We find that by the end of 1952 we shall have in the field three isolated infantry brigades with not a vestige or a scrap of armour, not an operational tank; and of these three infantry brigades themselves, only one of them, namely, the brigade in Korea, will be operational—ready to take the field and fight, that is—by the end of 1952. We have not the forces to form one complete division. We have no formation of divisional size. Most serious of all, perhaps, is the fact that we have no reserve capable of immediate mobilization.

With respect to the Royal Canadian Air Force, from the minister's statement it is again uncertain just what we shall have by way of squadrons in being and operational by the end of the fiscal year 1952-53. One looks in vain for this information in the minister's speech. But from a study of the minister's speech and the most recent white paper on defence—that which was tabled in June of 1951—we can guess that we shall have not more than a total of thirty R.C.A.F. squadrons in any shape or form by the end of that fiscal year; and of that thirty, there will be a maximum of twelve active air force squadrons. We are not told in what state of readiness or partial readiness or partial equipment and manning with respect to aircraft they will be; but it appears that that is the limit—that the very maximum we shall have in any state of operational readiness will be twelve squadrons of the Royal Canadian Air Force.

When we turn to the subject of equipment, what do we find? There have been so many boasts about the money we are spending—boasts completely unmatched by equal figures of what we are getting—that it is definitely disturbing to see how little we have actually secured to date in the way of equipment. In this matter I believe the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) has to take an equal share of responsibility with the Minister of National Defence. It must be admitted that in this regard we have been, to some extent, bedevilled by difficulties over the question of standardization; but I believe that our difficulties—big enough as they were in that field—were increased by a mistaken and too early decision to standardize on American patterns. The decision to standardize on American patterns—and we must be clear on this matter—did not refer only to certain specific and individual types which we felt, in the individual case, were the most desirable on which we could standardize. The decision went much further than that. It went most of the way, if not all the way, to a decision to standardize the equipment of whole divisions on the American pattern. As authority for that conclusion I refer to the statements of the Minister of Defence Production himself, in his report to the house given in February of last year, commencing at page 179 of Hansard, and the white paper on defence to which I have already made reference and in which you find such passages as this one on page 26, where, referring to the shipment to Europe of the arms for a complete division, it says:

This procedure was the only practical way for Canada to standardize on U.S. patterns.

Throughout the white paper and throughout the speeches of the Minister of Defence Production and of the Minister of National Defence over the past year, up until the present time, there have been repeated references to this decision to standardize on the American pattern. One result of this decision—which, as I have said, was an early and mistaken one—is that we in Canada completely lack any adequate armoured formation. Recently we have received, I understand, a few tanks of the British Centurion type for training purposes. We are not in any position—and we are not beginning to approach the position—where we could equip and field an armoured regiment, let alone a brigade with tanks.

I believe that this lack of armaments is one of the most serious criticisms of the defence preparedness of the Canadian army today. It is now apparent that not only members of the opposition but sometimes even members of the government and ministers of the crown are wiser in their hindsight than they were in their foresight. We are now told that the Centurion tank has been recognized and approved as the most suitable tank in existence, in production at the present time, for modern warfare. The Minister of Defence Production has always resolutely set his face against the proposal that Canada build tanks. It is difficult to compete with the minister in a field of this type. He makes these statements—and they are accepted as gospel—that it is not logical for Canada to build operational combat tanks. But I cannot see why—

Mr. Howe: Will my hon. friend permit a question? Is he aware that Canada has built over 1,000 tanks comparable to the United States Mark IV?

Mr. Fulton: I am not talking about the Mark IV. Is the Mark IV the same as the Centurion?

Mr. Howe: No. The Mark IV is the American type.

Mr. Fulton: I was not referring to that type of tank. Actually, I was not aware that we have produced 1,000 of those, but if we have, I would ask the minister and the Minister of National Defence to tell us where those tanks are? They are certainly not of the best fighting type and are not in the hands of any fighting Canadian formation today. We are given to understand that the decision has now been made to standardize on Centurion tanks. The question that we should have answered is why Canada had not made arrangements previously to build this tank in Canada under licence from the British authorities. I understand that the difficulty is that we cannot get them in quantity from British production now because the British themselves are short of them as a result of their production difficulties. I fail to see, however, why we could not have made arrangements earlier to standardize on this type of tank, which is now agreed to be the most suitable combat type, and why we could not have got busy with building some of them for ourselves and our allies.

There apparently have been mistakes of equal magnitude in connection with the production of the all-Canadian jet fighter, the CF-100. After all the boasts that were made as to the imminence of production so that Canadian squadrons might be completely equipped with an all-Canadian fighter, this aircraft is still not in production or anything approaching it. After the spending of many millions of dollars, there is only one prototype of this fighter in existence. Compare this record of performance, after the spending of all that money, with the boastful statement made at page 27 of the white paper last June, 1951:

> Delivery will soon begin of CF-100 Canucks from the A. V. Roe factory in Toronto.

It is disturbing—indeed, it is desperate—when one views the situation in terms of the amount of money which is being spent, to see how far short performance falls of the promises which have been made with such profusion. But the most serious indictment with respect to our equipment shortages and deficiencies is the fact that the equipment we do have in the hands of our troops who are fighting is in many respects obsolete or obsolescent. Here I should like to refer to what was said by Dr. Gordon M. Shrum, of the university of British Columbia. The Vancouver Daily Province of April 4 reports an address he made to the association of professional engineers in Stanley Park pavilion last Thursday evening. Dr. Shrum, by the way, is a member of the national defence board and of the national research council. The newspaper article contains this report of what he had to say with regard to some of the weapons with which we are fighting, and the deficiencies and shortcomings of the weapons being used in Korea:

> "You'd be fed up if you were over there. We all heard of push-button warfare, but there they are using weapons, and even aircraft, of the last war. We have been spending money on research, but we haven't the equipment."
> Jet planes, travelling at 700 miles an hour, are using obsolete machine guns. "They might as well be shooting at each other with pea shooters." The allies, he said, would be unwilling to "trot out our best things for Russian observers."
> "However, we don't have these things anyway."

I well know it has been suggested previously in the house that the jet aircraft manufactured in Montreal are being equipped with a type of armament which to all intents and purposes is obsolete. We are spending something like $400,000 per aircraft, and turning them out with a type of armament comparable, as Dr. Shrum has said, to a pea-shooter. That is not hindsight. That is criticism that has been made in the house and, I know, made privately to the minister as well. But in its all-pervading wisdom the government continues to produce this type of aircraft, with this basic type of armament. Then the Minister of National Defence in his speech in the house tells us that we must not dare to criticize the defence effort of the government because to do so would be to detract from that defence effort.

Another example of serious deficiency in equipment, in spite of the expenditure of nearly five billions of dollars which we will have made by the end of this fiscal year, is in the lack of an up-to-date aircraft carrier. It was suggested, not just recently but some time ago, that the carrier was then obsolescent, and it is suggested that it is now obsolete. One cannot talk carelessly about replacing an aircraft carrier as though it were something that could be done overnight or even in a year. But we have not been told of any steps being taken to replace —not just to overhaul—the Magnificent, and to have an aircraft carrier capable of handling jet aircraft, which surely must be the minimum if we are to assume the anti-submarine role which has been assigned to us.

I turn now to the question of our reserve force. It is most regrettable that there was nowhere in the minister's statement any mention worthy of the name of Canada's reserve forces. Perhaps that is not as strange as it might seem at first sight, because it is my belief, after consultation with officers in the reserve army, and after reading some of the statements made by the defence association, that so far as the preparedness of our reserve force is concerned, so far as their readiness for mobilization is concerned, it is a matter of shame and regret and not one of pride. I use those words deliberately, and I want to make it clear that it is not the fault of the officers and men of the reserve forces, but rather the fault of the system under which they are compelled to work.

This deficiency with respect to our reserve force carries more significance and more cause for alarm and disturbance when we read the minister's statement made in the house on February 5 of last year when he was referring to the general subject of defence. Speaking in the house on that occasion the minister, describing Canada's role and obligation to contribute forces to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, said, as reported at page 95 of Hansard:

> In addition to whatever army forces we have in Europe—

And that is of course the 27th brigade now over there.

> —our army role in NATO is to provide a strategic reserve.

As has been pointed out, a strategic reserve in that sense does not mean anything like the reserve forces we have in Canada. A strategic reserve must be a reserve available to be placed in the field immediately as and when strategic reserves are needed—not a reserve which can be called up by a leisurely process of mobilization such as we knew in Canada when, at the time of the last war—and we were working under the same system then—it took us four years to mobilize five divisions. It is not that type of reserve at all, not a lengthy and leisurely mobilization of non-permanent forces until they are ready for the field. This type of strategic reserve refers to quite another concept of reserve forces.

Not only is the department to be criticized because we are not remotely prepared to discharge that type of obligation, in view of the sad state of Canada's reserve force, but it is imperative that we be informed by the minister what has happened to change the picture to such an extent that we have the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) declaring recently in the house that Canada has no commitments to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization beyond the one brigade now in Europe, and that that is the limit of our commitments up to 1954. That was the very clear statement made in the house a couple of weeks ago by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I should like to know how that statement is to be understood when it is read in conjunction with the earlier policy statement of the Minister of National Defence, that one of Canada's roles in NATO is to provide a strategic reserve.

In dealing with this subject of our reserve force, mention must be made of the Canadian rangers. When one talks to men out in British Columbia who had experience with the Pacific coast militia rangers during the last war, one realizes that there is obviously a tragic waste of the services of these men who are able and willing to make a most valuable contribution to the defence effort of this country. I should like to put in a word with the minister for the organization of the Canadian rangers, if that is what they are to be called—instead of the Pacific coast militia rangers—that at least in British Columbia he should let them be organized on a basis which has some semblance of reality. There are men out there who know how this should and could be done. Yet, so far as I am able to learn, their advice has been completely disregarded, with the result that the organizational structure of the Canadian rangers in British Columbia is completely unworkable.

What has happened? Apparently someone sat down in Ottawa and drew a series of lines on the map, dividing the province into zones and allocating one unit to a zone. In some cases these zone boundaries follow the lines of rivers. The result is that communities which have a complete identity of interest with other communities in the area find themselves on the other side of the line on the map, and thus in another zone, and not placed with a community just across the river, or perhaps up the stream a little way on the other side of the river—they find that they are not placed with communities with which they have constantly and normally worked in matters of this kind.

This is just one further example of the state of unreality in our defence planning. It would seem that someone sits down and draws a line on a map, without consulting anyone who has had experience as to what would be the best way of organizing the Canadian rangers in British Columbia, either with reference to the proper boundaries of a zone, or the size and type of unit to be organized in a zone.

All this adds up to a situation which is desperate—and this applies to all aspects of defence preparedness, navy, army and air force, the state of equipment and the state of reserves, with which I include the Canadian rangers, formerly known as the Pacific coast militia rangers in British Columbia—all this indicates a situation that is desperate when viewed in terms of the money we have spent already and the money we are being asked to authorize this year.

Although we will have spent just under $5,000 million on defence by the end of this fiscal year, a careful review of what we have been told, read in the light of what we have not been told but should have been told, produces the numbing realization that those who are planning our defence and its integration with our North Atlantic allies are moving in a sphere as far removed from reality as it is possible to be.

What do we have? We have a navy stated to be primarily a submarine hunting force but with only one obsolescent carrier and so far as can be ascertained no additional or new carriers called for. Let me just refer to what the white paper on defence said with regard to the navy, as is found on page 7 of that document, as follows:

> It has been demonstrated in the past that carriers and their aircraft are essential to the successful execution of naval action; especially is this so in the case of anti-submarine warfare which is expected to be a vital commitment of the Royal Canadian Navy in the event of another war.

We have a navy with only one obsolescent carrier and no plans made for additional or new carriers.

We have an army of three isolated and independent brigades, not trained to operate together and totally without armour. The brigade in Europe is virtually an orphan. There is no complete picture as to what operational role that brigade will be called upon to fill, under whose command it will be and with what formation it will serve. We have an army of 49,000 men without even a formation of division size, completely without reserves and with no reserve unit capable of immediate mobilization. We have an army where it is typical for cooks for a parachute battalion to be trained on electric ranges.

We have an air force with a conglomeration of aircraft, some jet-powered and some piston-engined. Many of the jets are obsolete; the piston-engine class are even more so. The special Canuck interceptor fighter is not even commencing production after we have spent scores of millions of dollars and after many loud boasts have been made about the imminence of the production of these aircraft in numbers.

We have an army which is virtually at a standstill with respect to equipping and training on new and up-to-date materials, with all the difficulties and delays that are imposed on training because of the premature and unwise decision to standardize on United States lines. That has apparently been now abandoned except with respect to some artillery weapons. This is not being wise after the event because we warned the minister of the dangers of an early decision to standardize on United States lines. We told him that in our opinion that decision should not be taken. It would be interesting to know, and I think we must be told, how much time and money has been wasted as a result of this decision and what the backing away from it will make necessary in the way of additional expenditure.

We find a situation where at the time of the last white paper 56,000 civilian personnel on a full and part-time basis were required to look after a defence force of 80,068, or nearly two civilians for every three service personnel. The proportion today is as great or even greater according to the information the minister has given.

This is a situation which is bristling with questions requiring answers, not evasions; requiring answers as to what is being done to bring our reserves into a state of readiness; whether mobilization will be made possible in a reasonable time and not a matter of years. It requires answers as to what is being done to make Canada well equipped with fighting tanks. What is being done as to standardization? What is being done so as to equip our air force with adequate armament? What is being done to equip and prepare our navy to discharge its submarine hunting role which has been laid down so clearly for it?

It is a situation that indicates without room for argument that the minister has a heavy responsibility to answer for a story of errors, inadequacies, waste, duplication and inefficiency.

In closing I want to contrast this situation with some of the words which the minister used toward the end of his statement when he told us that to criticize would be only to say, "yes, but," and that to criticize would somehow or other be merely a display of hindsight. We are being asked to authorize the spending this year of $2,100 million. That being so, is anyone more entitled to say "yes, but" than the taxpayer, when he is the man who must pay the taxes from which this money is to come?

Surely the taxpayer is entitled to ask this question—or to have his elected representatives in parliament ask it for him. Does the minister really mean to say, when fifty cents out of every tax dollar asked for in this year's estimates is going to be spent by his department, that the taxpayer has no right to say, "yes, but"? Does he mean to say that the taxpayer has no right to say: Yes, I am willing to put up the fifty cents, but I think it would be better spent if it was spent on giving us a little more up-to-date armament and a few tanks, instead of spending so much to build up a public relations force for the minister, or to enlarge the scope of his headquarters by employing so many civilians to serve such a comparatively small number in the armed forces?

There is a definite right on the part of the taxpayer, and members of parliament on his behalf, to say, "yes, but". There have been many deficiencies and failings in the minister's discharge of his responsibility for the adequate preparation of our defences, but none so glaring as his totally unjustified assumption of omniscience and superiority in his condemnation of any possible criticism before it had even been voiced. We are dealing here with a proposed expenditure of $2,000 million, and yet the minister says: Do not criticize or attempt to show that we are doing anything wrong or that anything we are doing should be done in a different way; to do so will be merely showing hindsight.

The very fact that we have so tragically little in the way of forces in being at this moment and are proposing to spend this vast amount extra and will still have only very limited increases in our available striking force by the end of the year constitutes the strongest possible condemnation and criticism of the defence program of which the minister is in nominal charge. The whole situation with which we are confronted indicates to my mind that the minister, far from adopting this perverted attitude in connection with his relationship to the House of Commons and the country, should instead be inviting not only the house but the country to take a second look at defence; should be explaining why after having spent $2,500 million in the last two years there is virtually nothing to show for it, and why we are being asked to authorize another $2,000 million. Up to date we have had little in the way of concrete information as to what we are going to have in being at the end of this year.

I believe that the whole situation calls for a total reassessment of our defence effort and a far greater concentration on the preparing of our forces in Canada with equipment and weapons which have some relation to reality and to the necessary state of preparedness and equipment to meet and to beat the only foe we shall ever be called upon to fight.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, as one who had the privilege of serving in two world wars I am naturally interested in all matters pertaining to defence. Today I should like to draw attention to one aspect of national defence which in my opinion is of vital importance. Last Thursday the minister placed on Hansard, at page 1084, an estimate of the enemy's strength. One hundred and seventy-five active Russian divisions represent 2,800,000 men whom Russia now has under arms, and one-third of these are mechanized. On mobilization this number could be doubled. We are informed from various sources that Russia has about 25,000 tanks, 20,000 aircraft and 350 submarines. In addition she is feverishly rearming her satellites, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Roumania, Bulgaria and Hungary.

The question naturally arises: For what purpose has this overwhelmingly powerful force been built up? Certainly it is not to protect Russia against any possible aggressor. The Kremlin knows full well that there is no nation in the world today that wishes or is likely to wish to invade Russia. To find the answer we must examine the idea that dominates the rulers and people of Russia; the idea which determines everything they think, say and do; the idea which controls every phase of their national life, even their music. That idea was born 100 years ago in the mind of Karl Marx. Professor Theophil Spoerri, of Zurich university, has analysed it in these words:

> With the communist manifesto (1848) comes the first expression of a new ideology: Marxism. Marxism would never have been so powerful if it did not arise out of reality. Marx's primary concern was man himself. "To be radical means to grasp the matter by the roots. For mankind those roots are man himself." Marx showed how through the economics of capital man himself became a thing. The worker sold his strength and time as goods. Thus work becomes the cause of alienation, divided personality. In this way being becomes materialistic.
> Against this process of making things out of man, out of society, and out of nature, Marxism directs three positive basic principles. First, the "Praxis"

(practical program). "Philosophers have interpreted the world. The point is to change it." That is not only a challenge to action. It is a new philosophy: truth is only found in action . . . Secondly, the "Kommune,"—society. Man is not a private individual. He is a social creature. He becomes real only in relationship to other men. The goal of history is to do away with the barriers between men and classes: the "classless society." Thirdly, the "Totale," the whole. In this faith in a new order of society there lies an unconscious religious element. Through Karl Marx the Jewish Messianic creed has permeated the modern labour movement. It is in the sense of the whole (the "dialectic movement,"—through opposites towards a synthesis), that every individual finds his rights, all divisions are cured and all fixations broken.

In political terms this idea is described as a "people's" democracy to distinguish it from our "western" democracy. This "people's" democracy offers social justice, order, discipline and equality—but at a price; the price of tyranny and a brutal and ruthless suppression of the individual for the benefit of the masses. A former communist has summed up the religious aspects of communism in the words, "A vision of man without God." It is a system which denies the existence of God. It sets up the state as the supreme authority and forces man to live for society and not for himself. In social terms it is a force that transcends all frontiers and all barriers of class, wealth, race or colour. An ex-communist describes this force as follows:

Communists are bound together by no secret oath. The tie that binds them across the frontiers of nations, across barriers of language and differences of class and education, in defiance of religion, morality, truth, law, honour, the weaknesses of the body and the irresolutions of the mind, even unto death, is a simple conviction: It is necessary now to change the world. Their power, whose nature baffles the rest of the world, because in a large measure the rest of the world has lost that power, is the power to hold convictions and to act upon them.

The key then to the whole communist philosophy lies in these words: "It is necessary to change the world", to change it by every means available, economic, political, psychological; by peaceful means if possible but by force if necessary. This then is the reason and purpose for the huge Russian war machine; to change the world, to change the present system, to impose upon the world the communist way of life. We therefore have to meet two powerful forces, the Russian military might and the far more powerful communist ideology which it is meant to serve.

The Korean aggression alerted us to our real danger. Last Thursday the minister reported the progress we have made in building up our forces and our plans for the current fiscal year. A few days ago the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) brought us up to date on NATO; and this, together with reports from the United Nations, indicates that on the political front we are holding our own and have even made some advances. The taxes we have to pay remind us continually of the efforts that are being made on the economic front, and we are well aware of the great advantages we enjoy on the industrial front by reason of our great natural wealth and our industrial potential.

But it is the ideological front with which I am concerned today. This is the most important front of all. The battle goes on continuously without ceasing and it is a struggle for survival. The Christian idea of man as a creature of God and the communist idea of man without God cannot exist side by side in the same world. The struggle must go on until one or the other triumphs. Success on other fronts cannot result in a lasting peace. The best it can produce is an armed truce in which the cold war will continue as fiercely as ever, with endless taxes and endless money and energy being poured into non-productive channels instead of being used to serve the needs of humanity.

On the other hand, if we win the war of ideas we cannot possibly lose on any other front, and lasting peace and all those other things for which our comrades fought and died in two world wars will be assured.

A great European scholar, Professor Eiliv Skard, dean of the faculty of humanities of Oslo university, has this to say:

We live in an ideological age. I think it is necessary to stress it. The man who is not clear on that fact does not really understand his time. We know from the history of the last years that a nation with a false ideology can ruin the world, and we know that a nation without an ideology will go down.

We have, Mr. Speaker, two enemies, the Russian military might and the communist ideology. We can meet military power with military power. We can match economic force with economic force. We can check political moves with political counter-moves. But no military, political or economic force can defeat an idea. An idea can only be conquered by a better idea, an ideology only by a superior ideology.

Do we have such an idea? Can we develop a superior ideology? The answer is yes. We in the western democracies are a little shy and timid when it comes to talking about ideologies. We almost feel it is a sign of weakness even to mention the word, so we try to meet the passion and plan of alien ideologies with talk, with lip service to high ideals, and as a last recourse with force. Then we hope to live on as we have always lived, selfishly, comfortably and undisturbed. The truth is that we do have a superior ideology.

The Christian idea with its moral and spiritual values, upon which our western democracy is based, is far superior to the communist idea and far more radical and revolutionary. Communism does not go to the root of the trouble, because it seeks only to change the system. The Christian idea goes further; it seeks to change man himself.

The claim is made on every hand that human nature cannot be changed. That is the big lie of our time. It is the lie on which communism bases its justification for the class struggle. It is the lie behind which we hide when we are unwilling to change. It is a lie that has been disproved over and over again in the history of the Christian religion and is being disproved by overwhelming evidence around us every day.

We do have a superior idea capable of developing unity between people of every race, class, colour and nation. It is the Christian idea, which is the very foundation of our democratic way of life. The thing to do, as my colleague from Trinity-Conception (Mr. Stick) has pointed out, is to live it; because only if we live it can it achieve its full force and vitality.

Last Thursday the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) stated that NATO represented a new concept in international co-operation and organization. We are a partnership of free nations bound together by a common danger represented by a common enemy. That concept will become much more meaningful, however, and the partnership far stronger when the countries of NATO are bound together by a common ideology based on a common set of moral and spiritual values. Only then will we be equipped to move from a partnership of fear to a partnership of faith when the common danger is surmounted. It has been said in this house that our policy is one of peace through strength. No nation is strong that is ideologically weak; and it has been demonstrated that the strongest army cannot long defend a weak ideology.

Russia has mastered and perfected the art of ideological warfare. So skilful has she become in applying this new war strategy that already she has conquered eight nations of eastern Europe and gained the alliance of a large part of Asia without employing a single soldier and without firing a single shot. Today in every nation of the world communist agents full of zeal for their cause are busy undermining the nations from within so they will fall an easy prey to the communist idea. We know how these agents work, how they use propaganda to spread fear, confuse issues and undermine confidence in our national leaders; how they mobilize the negative forces of fear, greed, hate, resentment, suspicion, lust, pride, ambition and selfishness; how they seek by every means to weaken and destroy a nation's morals.

How else can we meet this threat, unless we begin at once to build up our ideological defences, to forge ideological weapons and learn to fight ideologically, as Russia does? Doubtless that was what General Eisenhower had in mind in the paragraph to which the minister called particular attention at page 1083 of Hansard, and which I repeat:

> The momentum must be continued with renewed vigour, and since moral force is the genesis of all progress, especially progress towards security and peace, we must give primary attention to this vital element.

In his address to the senate foreign relations committee in Paris last July General Eisenhower had this to say:

> The one thing I want to stress at the beginning is this: the struggle going on in the world is for the minds and hearts of men. It is an ideological struggle. There is every possible way of going about the thing, and open warfare is only one method.

No one can escape the ideological war. It is total war. It involves both civilians and the armed forces. Everyone needs ideological training. It has to start somewhere, and in my opinion the logical place to start is with the armed services, for these reasons. They have the organizational framework in which such training can be carried out immediately. Secondly, it is a weapon of definite value in battle, since soldiers inspired and moved by the fire and zeal of a militant ideology have a definite advantage over those who are not. I think this has been proved by the fanaticism and determination shown by the communist troops in Korea. Besides all this, should a war break out between the communist countries and the democracies, even if the democracies secured a military victory, what then? Can the democracies police Asia? Can they feed the teeming, hungry millions of India and Asia? If not, what is the answer? Surely the solution lies in giving them an idea bigger and better than communism to live for and be governed by.

Our armed forces are the ambassadors of the democracies among the people of the nations where they are serving. By their conduct they interpret democracy to those people, and if they give an adequate demonstration of the democratic way of life there is no doubt that this idea will capture the hearts and minds of the people among whom our forces are serving.

I think we have been somewhat reticent in facing realistically the need for ideological training for our forces because the armies of the communist world have attached so much importance to it. It is their daily fare, completely integrated with their training in arms. We have tended to regard it with the distaste we feel for propaganda, a distaste that has been developed by the communist prostitution of that fundamentally decent word and procedure. However, we cannot afford the luxury of self-righteousness or oversensitivity in this respect. The attack is real, the weapons are real, and the techniques are real. It is an attack launched and maintained by trained men. We may hate the intent and its methods but to ignore either is to court disaster.

I should like to commend the step taken last year when the bureau of current affairs was set up for the Canadian armed forces, to help the serviceman determine that which he had enlisted to support and that which he must be prepared to oppose. As an initial step it was excellent. By introducing discussion group techniques it has enabled a trial and error experiment to be carried out which by this time should have established what problems have to be overcome, what methods are most effective and exactly what is required to achieve the objectives announced by the minister last year.

I had a great deal of experience with this kind of work in world war II and also in adult education in civil life, and for that reason I have had a special interest in the B.C.A. program. I know from my own experience and from the experience of my opposite numbers in the United States forces during the last war how difficult it is to get area and command headquarters to support such programs on their own initiative. I know how difficult it is for the young junior officer to initiate such a program without some special training, without proper accommodation and without other physical requirements essential to its implementation. I understand the reaction of the officer who regards it as just one more chore for which he is Joe. I know how easy it is for those who are hostile to the program to sabotage it, and discredit it as somebody or other's special pet whim. Finally, I realize the danger that negative and subversive elements may take advantage of it to defeat it and deflect it from its true purpose.

I should like to see the B.C.A. program integrated with other training programs. I should like to see adequate provision for training schedules, and the means of implementation in various formations authorized by national defence headquarters. I should like to see training schools and short courses for selected officers who are to implement the program, just as is given in the case of gas warfare, guided missiles and any other specialized arm. From my own experience, I know that mere information, in itself, is not sufficient. Academic discussion of topics, however timely, however interesting, is not enough. This has been proven over and over again by the discussions under ABCA in the British army, and the even more elaborate information and educational program of the United States army. To be effective for ideological training, the information must have ideological content, and both the information and discussion must be geared to ideological objectives. It is also essential that men giving leadership in this program are themselves convinced that we have the superior ideology.

In order that there be no misunderstanding, I should like to list what I consider to be some of the main objectives of an ideological training program:

1. To give personnel a vision of what inspired democracy really is—a vision of mankind working out its destiny under the guidance of God.

2. To give personnel a clear understanding of the moral and spiritual truths upon which this vision of inspired democracy is founded, which has given it strength in the past and upon which its future survival depends.

3. To develop a fighting faith in an idea far bigger than man himself, an idea which will satisfy all their inner longings and aspirations and to which they can give themselves completely and fully. That is what communism does for communists.

4. To train personnel to be ideologically minded; to be able to discern the ideological battlelines that run through all the issues and problems of our present day, whether in politics, business, industry or in the home.

5. To enable personnel to recognize the ideological content of communist propaganda whether spoken, written or printed and to meet it with a counter ideology.

6. To recognize material with ideological content and sources of such material.

7. To give personnel basic knowledge of the nature of alien ideologies and their fundamental principles.

8. To train personnel to recognize the ideological weapons and tactics used by the enemy, and to develop counter weapons and tactics for democracy.

9. To enable personnel to understand clearly in simple positive terms exactly what Canada is fighting for, and what we are fighting against. To say we are fighting for the four freedoms or against aggression is not sufficient.

It should be obvious that mere information and academic discussions cannot achieve any of these objectives, because ideological training affects the heart and will as much as the mind and intellect. I hope the minister will find it possible to give some consideration to these suggestions, because much of this kind of training need not cost the taxpayers one extra cent and the total cost is comparably insignificant. Without it, we cannot achieve maximum effectiveness of our efforts in other directions. With it, we cannot possibly lose. It is an iron-clad guarantee of total victory and lasting peace with minimum cost and effort.

I realize that there are difficulties. I realize that Canada, in military terms, is a small country, but a small country with a big idea can change the history of the world. Napoleon said that there are only two powers in the world, the sword and the spirit. In the long run, the sword is always defeated by the spirit. This dictum so applicable in Napoleon's time is even more pertinent today when the enemy is communist ideology as well as Russian military power.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, this is not a substantive motion and I understand that consequently I have no right of reply. A number of questions have been asked, and if it were to meet the wishes of hon. members I would be glad to try to answer them.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Claxton: In the course of the debate which has taken place a number of members have dealt with the same matters, and I have tried to collect their comments under as small a number of headings as possible. Perhaps the point that was made most often by members of the opposition groups was that our 27th infantry brigade in Europe should be an armoured brigade. To this, other assertions were added, such as those made by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) that we have not got a scrap of armour, not an operational tank and so on. It was suggested also that we should have built tanks in Canada. These points of view are serious, and I believe have largely been dealt with by the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. George) in his speech last Friday night.

There are additional points I should mention. This 27th Canadian brigade was announced for the first time in this house on May 4, 1951, when its composition was announced. The next day there appeared in the newspapers a full page advertisement for the 27th Canadian infantry brigade group. That was eleven months ago. At that time the house was in session and there were many opportunities, including nine days spent on the estimates, when anyone who was critical of the organization of this brigade might have raised his voice. Then we had a fall session. During that session the question of defence was discussed on the resolution moved by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on October 22. While I do not suggest that the approval of that resolution by the house without a dissenting voice meant that the house approved everything the government had done, I do suggest it presented an opportunity for any hon. member who felt that something had not been done correctly to say so.

It was not, however, until the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) spoke on the radio program "The Nation's Business" in January that this suggestion was made. Long before that time this brigade had been equipped, trained and transported to Germany where it was stationed. If this suggestion was intended to be placed before the government in time for it to take effective action, it was too late. I think there appears to be a good deal of misunderstanding about the composition of an infantry brigade group. This term does not apply to any fixed set of formations, but generally speaking it is taken to mean a formation which includes three infantry battalions, an artillery regiment, a tank squadron and all the other formations necessary to enable that group to operate as an independent unit. It was that type of organization we created to send to Korea, where it has been found that its general balance of arms and of formations has met the need admirably. No other formation has a better record. The composition of the various formations has been the subject of continuous examination not only by the officers of our own armed forces but also by those of other forces. So far as I know, it has not been suggested by anyone in a responsible position we followed the wrong course either as to weapons or organization.

One of the newspapers said that this brigade "consists of foot-soldiers, the PBI, in army parlance, each man equipped with a rifle and nothing more". The fact is that only 40 per cent of the men are armed only with rifles. The rest have mortars, machine guns, 25-pounders, anti-tank weapons, rocket launchers, flame-throwers and, finally, tanks. As I say, the composition is designed to enable the brigade to train and fight alone or in association with larger formations.

The 27th Canadian infantry brigade group is practically identical in composition with the 25th brigade groups. It has tanks. The armoured unit in Europe is equipped with Centurions which we have bought from Britain, whereas in Korea we are using the No. IV, which is the latest model of the Sherman which we bought from the United States. In Europe our brigade is operating as an independent brigade; it is not formed into any division or corps. It is training as an individual brigade; and it is planned to establish it in its own training area towards the end of this year.

An armoured brigade group is a new term, I think. We know of armoured brigades—

Mr. Harkness: We had them in the last war.

Mr. Claxton: An armoured brigade group of the type such as I have mentioned, which can operate independently? I am informed that one has never been formed.

Mr. Harkness: We had two of them in the Canadian army.

Mr. Claxton: We had an armoured brigade, as I understand it, namely, a brigade of armour which was not designed to operate separately but rather was designed to operate with one or more divisions. The establishment that I have been given to enable an armoured brigade to constitute an independent armoured brigade group operating separately would be, by a good many hundreds of men, a larger establishment than the one for the Canadian infantry brigade group. In other words, the suggestion that this procedure would save men is entirely ill-founded. It would take more men to operate this brigade group as an armoured brigade group than to operate it as an infantry brigade group.

Mr. Fulton: I think the suggestion was that it would save men by establishing more efficient use of men.

Mr. Claxton: The suggestion was made that it would save men.

Mr. Fulton: That was not the main import of the suggestion.

Mr. Claxton: Well, it was said. I do not know whether it was what was meant. The suggestion was made too that we should send not troops but technicians.

The next point I want to make is that it was never suggested to us that we should send an armoured brigade group. In fact the contrary suggestion was made.

We have been acquiring tanks from the British at the fastest rate they could deliver them to us. We have now received delivery of over 40. Some of them are in Europe and the rest are in Canada. We shall be taking more on an order which is well over 200. We are taking them as fast as we can secure them.

Mr. Fulton: Are those all Centurions?

Mr. Claxton: Yes. I do not believe it would have been possible to get Centurions before we got those that were delivered to us. Certainly it would not have been possible for us to manufacture Centurions in Canada before the first Centurions were delivered to us inasmuch as they had not reached the stage, even in England, where production could have been commenced in Canada and developed to the point where there would be actual delivery. From the point of view of time, I am informed by the Department of Defence Production that there is nothing in that suggestion, that we are getting Centurions as fast as we could, and that we are getting them in as large numbers as we can.

With regard to the suggestion that we should manufacture tanks in Canada, I would point out that we would not have a large enough requirement for tanks to justify our setting up the tools, equipment and production machinery necessary. We would also find ourselves equipped with all the tanks we could possibly conceive of our needing in another world war, should it come; then the productive capacity would be idle and we would find ourselves with an aging group of obsolescent tanks and faced, at some stage or another, with the necessity of repeating the operation five, six or seven years later.

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry to interrupt, but if the minister will permit me to do so, may I say that I am sure he will admit that the suggestion was never confined explicitly to manufacturing tanks only for Canada. It was rather to manufacture tanks on the same basis as that on which we are now manufacturing the F-86E, namely, for ourselves and for our allies.

Mr. Claxton: To give them away?

Mr. Fulton: I do not understand we are giving away the F-86E.

Mr. Claxton: Yes, every one of them; that is, to Britain. We have indicated what we propose to give away, and what we propose to give away are the types of equipment that we ourselves need and that other countries need, which are not being manufactured in sufficient quantities by other countries and which we have the special facilities to produce—for example, the gun plant at Sorel or Longueuil—whereas a tank factory would require entirely new facilities.

Finally, may I say that there are two additional reasons why it makes sense for us to purchase Centurion tanks. One is that, by placing this order in Britain, we enable the British to build up a production line and that enables them to produce larger numbers of tanks at lower costs, a result that is greatly to be desired from the point of view of over-all defence planning. It also helps to give economic assistance to the British by reason of the fact that we pay them for what we get, including these tanks.

As to the equipment that we have ordered from the United States, we ordered tanks—Pattons and others—but it has been found necessary to make substantial modifications in those types, and they will not be in production by the time we hope to have delivery of the Centurions which have proved themselves to be good tanks in battle in Korea.

With regard to other types of equipment which we were going to acquire from the United States, there have been delays; but surely hon. members were not surprised at the fact that there should be delays when they recall what happened in Korea after the orders were placed. Delivery had been commenced in respect of equipment we had ordered and which was to be delivered to us; but it was found that it was more urgently needed somewhere else. We had equipment to meet our own needs, both in Europe and here, and it made sense that the United States type of equipment we had ordered from that country should be used for other purposes.

Referring to the air carrier, hon. members have suggested that we should modernize the Magnificent, or get more of them. Magnificent in its present condition is a carrier of a type still in current use in the Royal Navy. There is in process a procedure of modernization, refitting and the like; and when its turn comes Magnificent will be exposed to that procedure. That is taking place in accordance with arrangements which have been worked out with the Royal Navy.

We have considered adding another carrier to our navy, but it would mean giving up something else, or getting more money—because we cannot use the defence dollar twice. The operation of carriers is a large-scale business. There are only four countries on our side, so far as I know, which have carriers—the United States, the United Kingdom, France, and ourselves. And the number is not very great. However there are some in reserve. We feel it very desirable that we should have one carrier for training or operations on anti-submarine activities; but to have two of them would be a pretty considerable undertaking for us in peacetime.

As our role is largely anti-submarine, the Avenger aircraft, with which our carrier is fitted, are very suitable for this purpose, and will probably continue for some time to be more suitable than any jet yet in sight for anti-submarine work. Jets, which have a short range, a high landing speed and not a very high load-carrying capacity, are not considered yet as suitable entirely for the purpose. It is not expected therefore that for this purpose jets will come into active operation until some time in the fairly distant future.

Questions were asked about the progress of the CF-100. The CF-100 and the Orenda engine were started late in 1946. Detailed design was commenced in the middle of 1947, and the first prototype was flown in January, 1950. That is about three years after the start, which is considered good time for the first flight of a new type of aircraft. The tests both of the engine on the ground and of the aircraft and engine in the air proved satisfactory. As I have said before, both the manufacturer and the R.C.A.F. felt that they would be in production much faster than is the normal time for the development of a new type of aircraft. It turns out that it is not much faster, but about the same as is usual for similar types of aircraft of a totally new design. The CF-100 pre-production order is well on the way to completion now, with several aircraft about ready to be delivered. I saw them two weeks ago in Toronto. The engine plant will begin production on a regular production-line basis in June. It will be at half the planned rate in September, and running at the full planned rate in 1953.

I expect we will be producing enough Orenda engines to enable us to begin using them in the F-86E early in 1953. That engine will give the F-86E still more speed than it has today—and it is generally recognized as the fastest aircraft there is.

The next point mentioned was with regard to standardization. I did not say anything about it in my introductory remarks, because there have been no major developments. There is steady progress at the working level, working out the specifications and, in some cases, the design for equipment. A good many kinds of procedures and types of equipment have been standardized but the situation with regard to the rifle remains much as it was.

Following the meeting of defence ministers of the United States, France, Great Britain and Canada in Washington last year, we agreed to refer the matter to the standing group. The committee appointed by the standing group made a report to the meeting of defence ministers at the North Atlantic council. That report was considered, and was the subject of discussion between Mr. Churchill and myself in London in November, and here in January, in the course of which he told me that they had decided not to go into all-out production of the .280, but to continue development work looking toward production at a date some time in the future.

Meanwhile the United States has said it will not be ready to change from the Garand .300 for several years. That is the situation. We have rifles of the .303 No. IV which are being used by our troops in Korea, and are still found satisfactory as the .303 always was. Our troops in Europe are also equipped with the .303. We have considerable numbers of .303's in Canada, and also of Garands. We do not propose to go into production of rifles until the situation becomes clearer. We have enough rifles to see us through the first year of a war. We have good production equipment, could go into production and reach a high rate within a short time so as to produce rifles for ourselves and our allies to meet our needs, and to assist in meeting theirs.

The suggestion was made that we are short of equipment in Canada. For example, take 25-pounders. We have all the 25-pounders we need. We have given away several hundred, and we will continue to keep the rest until we acquire the 105 millimetres, which we are going to produce in Canada, as well as the 155.

A question was asked also about the situation regarding anti-aircraft guns. It was said that we had given away all our anti-aircraft guns, and that we are doing nothing about it. We gave away one hundred 3.7 guns and replaced them by one hundred 90 millimetre guns acquired from the United States. We have more on order from the United States and we have a still larger number of 3.7's in our own possession in Canada. When we get the guns from the United States we shall probably release further guns to Europe.

I was asked to give some figures on construction. The 1952-53 program includes a carry-over from 1951-52 of $198 million. This represents contracts which have been let and which we expect to complete in 1952-53. The program for 1952-53 provides for an additional $46 million of contracts to be completed this year.

As I explained, this construction is required by reason of the greatly increased size of the armed forces and increased operations. We will have to carry on a construction program of somewhat this magnitude for several years yet before we have the accommodation and training and operational facilities needed for our forces as presently planned.

Reference was made to the number of civilians in the armed forces. Our position on this has been made clear on a number of occasions. The policy is to use a civilian in place of service personnel in every case where it would be possible to use a civilian in wartime. If we have a stenographer or telegrapher or clerk at national defence headquarters and do not need to have that person in uniform in war, then we employ a civilian.

The figure of 40,000 civilians which I gave includes both classified and prevailing rates. The actual number at February 28, was 39,398, of which 20,093 are classified and 19,305 prevailing rates employees. The latter figure includes some 5,000 casual workers who are engaged at camps and the like for short periods. The figure of 19,305 prevailing rates employees covers workers engaged in the dockyards, in the shops, at camps and so on, just as if they were employed by an ordinary employer. They receive the rates of wages prevailing in the locality for their types of work.

Since Korea, where the strength of the armed forces has increased 100 per cent, from 47,000 to 95,300, the strength of civilian employees has not gone up anything like that amount. Further, the number of service personnel at national defence headquarters has only increased by 255 or 12 per cent since Korea, whereas the total strength of the armed forces has increased by 100 per cent. These figures can be better examined when we get into a detailed discussion of the estimates. I assure hon. members that this question of the size of the armed forces and the way in which they are employed is receiving continuous consideration at every possible level.

We can say, and I have said before, that applying the same standards to the forces of other countries, our forces are equally operational or even more so. For example, over forty per cent of the men in the navy are at sea; our fliers have more hours of flying per month for each man on the strength of the air force, and that kind of thing. We are not satisfied merely to compare our standards with those of other countries and we must continue to do increasingly better in every respect.

The next point mentioned was that of obsolescent equipment, having regard I understood particularly to aircraft. We are going to replace obsolete equipment as fast as we can with better equipment. We are producing the F-86E at a rate which compares favourably with production in the United States. We expect to be able to meet our commitments for deliveries to the United States and to Great Britain and to equip our own twelve squadrons as well as the necessary reserves. We expect to be doing the same with the CF-100, using it for the defence of Canada. As the CF-100 comes into operation it will be issued to the squadrons, both active and auxiliary, which may be using Mustangs or Mitchells.

However, both the Mustang and the Mitchell have been found to be exceedingly rugged and useful aircraft right up to the present time. They would be very useful in connection with the kind of operation that might have to be engaged in should we be attacked in the near future. The Mustang has a range and speed which makes it well able to take on the type of bomber which might reach Canada according to our present information.

With regard to Harvards, our production rate is substantial and able to meet our requirements. We are not going to produce quite as many Harvards as we at first planned, but we will be producing more of the new jet plane, the T-33, which is the modern version of the P-81.

The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Dinsdale) referred to the armament of the F-86. As he understands, the question of aircraft armament is highly controversial. It is also one that is much easier to discuss with the technicians. As I have told him, they will be available at any time. The situation as it has been explained to me is this: About a year ago it was felt that the F-86E should be equipped with a gun larger than the 50 calibre. Long before that research and development work had been going on with various types of 20-calibre guns and rockets. However, the record still speaks for itself and indicates that the armament of the F-86E is still adequate to shoot down far more MIG's than the reverse.

The MIG-15 has three heavier guns, but they have a slower rate of fire and a much lower muzzle velocity. Therefore their lethal quality is quite different from that of the F-86E. In the hands of a good gunner the latter appears to be the better equipment.

The hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) referred to wastage and he mentioned a figure of 15,279 wastage as compared with an intake of 41,757. I would submit that statistically the correct operation is to relate wastage to the total strength. If you do that you get a figure of about 15 per cent which compares favourably with any figure we had during the second world war or in the period between world wars. Except in so far as it reduces the number of trained officers and tradesmen, wastage is one way of developing trained reserves. In countries which have compulsory military training of eighteen months or two years you have a very large proportion of the total trained personnel going back to civilian life every year. On a two-year basis 50 per cent will go back every year, and that is considered a part of the normal operation of building up trained personnel who act as a reserve. In Canada we have had 26,000 officers and men leave the armed forces since the end of the second world war, and a very considerable proportion of them are available for service in the event of an emergency.

The hon. member, at page 1130 of Hansard, referred to the situation at Claresholm, where he said:

> Apparently the housing situation was bad; houses were needed, so they sent in a whole bunch of metal prefabricated units. They came in and were put on a siding before the contracts had been let for their erection or for the plumbing, wiring and so on. As a result there was no one to unload them, so special people had to be hired to do that job.

Then he said a little later:

> So they sent a bunch of people to load these prefabricated houses on railway cars and ship them out; then they started all over again. I do not know where those houses have gone, but I have been led to believe I would not be far wrong if I said they may be in England at the present time. How much money was lost in that deal I do not know, but it must have been many thousands of dollars.

The fact is that 150 prefabricated houses were ordered and delivered in January in accordance with the order on the site at Claresholm. Tenders were called by Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation for the erection of the houses this spring with the beginning of the building season. The contract was awarded ten days ago. The contractor is on the job and about to start work. None of these houses has been taken anywhere. There is nothing whatever in the story.

The hon. member also referred to the question of reserves. I mentioned the total strength of the reserves as being 58,000. We have had really remarkable support of the active forces from the reserves during the year. Over 5,000 members of the reserve forces have gone active duing the year 1951-52. Despite that the number of the reserves has increased, and despite the loss of what must have been some of their most active and enthusiastic members the amount of training done during the summer months was about the same as the year before. About 11,000 personnel engaged in summer training.

The reserves have a role which has been explained so many times in the house that there is no need for me to enlarge on it. I have referred repeatedly to the really great contribution they make by devoting part of their time to the service of Canada. It was on the base of the reserve forces that the Canadian forces in the great war of 1914-18 and the second world war were built up. We are in a different position now with many more forces in being than we had before either of the two world wars.

The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) referred to batmen. Batmen are provided only for single men living in barracks or camps and the scale is one to four junior officers. Only in the case of officers of the rank of colonel or above living in married quarters is a servant allowed.

The hon. member referred to men joining the reserve forces as athletes. I would be glad if he would bring such cases to my attention. I have heard about this matter from time to time. It is strictly against the regulations and the practice, but if it happens, we will take action.

Then he referred to a situation I could not quite place but I rather took from what he said that he had reference to Kildare barracks on Laurier avenue. The squatters were put out of there a year ago and it was occupied as single men's quarters. A complaint was made by people in the neighbourhood that we had these soldiers living there and there were no curtains or blinds. So blinds were installed long before the provost corps moved into the building, and it is now occupied by three officers and thirty-six men.

A question was raised as to education in the armed forces, and in that connection I might refer the hon. member to the answer given in the house to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) on the 20th of November, 1951. Provision is made for the education of members of the armed forces. It is done under the same system as that under which the Canadian Legion educational services operated during the war. The same material is used, but instead of using Legion personnel, who were paid by the Department of National Defence during the war, we now use Department of Veterans Affairs personnel who are paid by the Department of National Defence. In addition, we have educational officers with the units and they have staffs who distribute literature about the courses, make books available, collect papers, forward them to the Department of Veterans Affairs for correction, and so on. It is the same arrangement we had during the war.

The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) referred to the bureau of current affairs. It is working well. Training courses have been given already for officers who are assigned to lead their men in discussion groups and the like, and periods of as much as an hour a week are provided for that activity.

The hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) raised several questions. One was as to the status of our troops in Germany. He expressed surprise that our troops are not there as occupation forces, but that is the situation. We were not an occupying power and we thought it would be most improper for our troops to go there with the status of occupation forces, to be brought in as an occupying power, as was permitted under the statute, within a matter of months possibly of the end of this arrangement and while discussions for the termination of the occupation were actually under way between the representatives of Britain, France and the United States and the representatives of Germany. It did not seem to be a sensible course for us to take up a special role for a limited period. On the other hand, from the point of view of immunity from criminal law, taxation and the like, we have the same rights as if we were occupying troops. The only difference is that we do not add to the cost of occupation. As I pointed out the other day, we pay for what we get. The suggestion was made that we pay the British for our rations and they keep the money. That is not so, of course. We pay those whom we have to pay, either to the British or the Germans, in such a way that the actual costs of occupation are not increased by reason of our being there. On the other hand we took the view that since the accommodation we went into in December was required anyway, our having to go there did not add anything to the cost of occupation in that respect.

The hon. member also referred to the fact that we were using Russian supplies. I have heard of this before and assume it is correct that some of our troops received some salmon which came from Russia, as part of the British ration that was issued to them. I do not know if it is seriously suggested that I should take this up with my opposite number, Lord Alexander, and suggest that our troops be not issued with Russian salmon. Such a course would not do the Russians any harm; it would not do us any good, and it would not do the British any good, so I do not think there would be much point in taking that course.

Finally the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) again referred to the fact that the armed forces do not have as high a proportion of senior officers of French origin as they should have. I wonder if he saw the answer I gave to the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) on December 17, 1951, as it appears at page 2056 of Hansard. The question was:

What were the ranks of officers of French origin who were in the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian army, and the Royal Canadian Air Force active forces and what are their present ranks?

The relevance of that question is that the senior officers of the armed forces today with hardly an exception have been promoted from the officers who were in the armed forces in 1939. The only exception that occurs to me at the moment is the chief of the air staff, who was then in the auxiliary air force. The way to judge the proportion of officers of English and French origin, if you want to go in for that kind of thing, is to compare the rank in 1939 with the rank they hold today. That comparison has been made, and I think the hon. member will see that officers of French origin have done very well indeed. I followed through the career of each, and found that on the whole they have achieved their present status at about the same time as or a little ahead of and at a little lower age than their English-speaking comrades. I found the same thing to be true on making an examination of officers of the rank of major and above now in the armed forces. Those of French-speaking origin have reached their rank with a little less service and at a slightly lower age than the officers of English origin. This I suggest indicates that any discrimination that exists is in favour of the French-speaking officers, which it seems to me is desirable, because, as I have pointed out so many times, the possession of French is a positive military asset.

The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) made a number of remarks. I think most of the questions he asked and most of his statements having to do with facts already have been dealt with, and I will not say anything about the rest.

I have only one or two things to say in conclusion. One is that I do not think it is realized to what extent the activities of our armed forces are being carried on outside Canada. Since Korea over 30,000 members of the navy, army and air force have seen service outside Canada. Of these over 14,000 have served in the Far East, and most of the rest in Europe and the United Kingdom or at sea, with some in the United States taking courses. This indicates something of the size of the operation in peacetime, and the wide extent of our commitments today.

I cannot help mentioning the reference by the hon. member for Kamloops to the picture of a paratrooping cook coming down with a kitchen range from Petawawa camp. I do not think that requires much in the way of answer or comment. We have cooking equipment at Petawawa, and we have cooking equipment for use by paratroopers and others in the field. Men receive training in the use of equipment of that character in field operations, but fortunately they do not spend all their time paratrooping. The troops have to be fed 365 days in the year, so it is not a bad thing to have cooks trained to cook on ordinary kitchen ranges at static establishments.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should say that I agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) that this was not the time to go into the figures in great detail, though I would have been prepared to do so had it been desired. Before the estimates are considered in detail in the committee of supply I expect to issue a paper, as we have done in previous years, which can serve as a useful basis for a full and detailed examination of the estimates.

Mr. Hees: I wonder if the minister would permit a question. I referred to the matter of payment of a clothing allowance to Korean veterans, but in his remarks the minister made no reference to that matter.

Mr. Claxton: I beg your pardon. At page 1156 of Hansard the hon. member said:

When a man is released from the Korean force he receives one week's rehabilitation leave. That means that a private, first class, who is single and who has served in the Korean force for at least one year receives $28, made up of pay and allowances for one week. Before his discharge he makes out an application for war service gratuity, but he is given no indication as to when he may expect to receive that gratuity, or even if he will ever receive it. He is simply given his $28, and out he goes.

Now, at the end of world war II every man or woman in the service was given a clothing allowance of $100 upon discharge—

The hon. member left out a good deal of what the man receives. First of all he receives thirty days' leave. Then he receives two and one-half days leave for each month of service in the Far East. Then if he is a member of the special force he receives seven days rehabilitation leave, all with pay and allowances. Then he receives a war service gratuity of fifty cents for each day in the Far East; and if he is in the special force that is paid at once. He receives seven days pay for each 183 days of service in the Far East, and then he gets a re-establishment credit equal to the war service gratuity or a similar benefit under the Veterans Land Act. In addition he gets the benefits that are applicable under the veterans charter, as they have been extended to the men who served in Korea.

With regard to the clothing allowance, that has been receiving consideration but no decision has yet been made.

Mr. Drew: There is one point which I do not think is quite clear on the record. In answer to a comment by the member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) concerning the production of airplanes for our associates in NATO, the minister said "Would you give them away"? Then, in response to a further question he said that we are giving them away, every one of them. It seems to me that may leave an incorrect impression on the mind of anyone reading that statement. I would refer the minister to a statement which was issued on February 14, 1952 and which said that the planes to which the minister is obviously referring are being produced—that is the airframes are being produced—in Canada as part of a three-way joint program under the NATO agreement. The announcement was made simultaneously in Ottawa, London and Washington. The announcement made on February 14 appeared in a Canadian Press dispatch, and I shall quote the first paragraph:

> Canada is joining in a three-way arrangement with the United States and Britain to build, equip and man squadrons of F-86 Sabre jet fighters for the North Atlantic treaty defence force.

Then the air force secretary in the United States, Thomas K. Finletter, was quoted in an Associated Press dispatch of the same date as saying:

> The partnership of the North Atlantic treaty nations was exemplified in a signal way today with the simultaneous announcement at Ottawa, Washington and London of an arrangement whereby the three countries will combine to equip and man squadrons of Sabre fighters.

Again reading from the Canadian Press dispatch, I quote the following:

> A spokesman, enlarging on the announcement, said Canada would supply the airframes for the Sabres, with all other parts, including engines, coming from the United States.

That, Mr. Speaker, does not seem to be a gift in the ordinary sense of the word. If the statement issued by the spokesman for the Department of National Defence on February 14 is correct, this is one of the arrangements growing out of the Lisbon conference about which perhaps we might have had more information in this discussion because the same spokesman informed the Canadian Press that this would amount to some hundreds of planes. I think all hon. members would have been very glad to have more of the details, and it does seem to me that this is certainly not a gift to Britain of planes. It is a three-way arrangement for the benefit of the general forces under NATO, and in fact it is said that it will be for the purpose of strengthening the North Atlantic treaty forces commanded by General Eisenhower.

Mr. Claxton: I am glad the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) raised this point, because I do not want to leave any incorrect impression. The statements from which he has just quoted were made by me, and of course I have no reason to correct them. The arrangement came about in this way. The air minister for the United Kingdom in the Labour government, the Right Hon. Arthur Henderson, on several occasions asked me if we could make some F-86E aircraft for them so as to fill the gap. After a good deal of discussion we agreed to do that on condition that the United States would supply what is called the government found property, which we are not ourselves in a position to provide. This includes engines, instruments and in the earlier aircraft, the armament.

Negotiations were carried out on a tripartite basis, and they resulted in an agreement being made before Lisbon, early in February, under which the United States would provide the government found property without which we cannot make the aircraft. We would build the aircraft and deliver them to Britain. The value of the government found property is approximately thirty per cent of the whole cost of the aircraft.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved:

> That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

He said: Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, I made a slight departure from usual practice by tabling the budget white paper which hitherto it has been customary to table during the course of the budget speech; and I would hope that the house would give me unanimous consent to have it printed as part of today's Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

I did this for two reasons. The first was to give all hon. members an opportunity to examine the basic facts and figures more carefully and in a more leisurely fashion, and to do so in an atmosphere free from the distractions that perhaps accompany the annual statement of proposed tax changes. My second reason was that by transferring to the white paper the greater part of the general economic review, which is an essential introduction to the budgetary proposals, it will not be necessary for me to take up so much of the time of the house traversing this ground orally. In these general matters I shall limit myself this evening to drawing some of the implications and indicating the probable trend of events in the year ahead of us, in so far as they impinge upon budgetary problems.

We can look back upon the past year with a considerable degree of satisfaction. It has not been an easy year, but it has been a year of solid achievement. We have passed through one critical period, but equally serious dangers still lie ahead. Although we and our friends of the free world are now somewhat better prepared to meet them, there is no room for complacency. We still have the more costly part of our defence program immediately ahead of us. However, if we are equally resolute, energetic and fortunate during this year and the next, there is good prospect of achieving in the not too distant future, perhaps not a world of genuine peace and good will, but at least a position of reasonable confidence and security that can be maintained at a somewhat lower cost than we are now compelled to carry.

Our major difficulties are international in their origin. We are playing a full and constructive part in all worth-while endeavours to build the foundations of a safe and peaceful world. We are co-operating in those aspects of the work of the United Nations where useful progress is possible. We are participating effectively in the Colombo plan, and our role in building up the strength and the health of the north Atlantic community is commensurate with our interests and capacity. On the broad principles of these policies we are a united country, and I am sure I am expressing the thoughts of all groups and parties in this house when I pay tribute to the work of our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) whose leadership, moderation and good sense have played an important part in world affairs during the past three or four years.

For the Canadian economy 1951 was a good year. Its first half was dominated by strong inflationary pressures, but as the year progressed these pressures became less severe, and by the end of the year they had been brought under control.

Gross national output in 1951 was 17 per cent higher than in 1950. About two-thirds of this increase was due to higher prices and about one-third to increased real output.

Capital investment in 1951 once again reached record levels, and was probably at or close to the limits of our present physical capacity to expand plant and equipment without materially reducing our production of consumer goods. Government policy has played its part in guiding or steering an increased proportion of this new investment into lines which made the best contribution to our defence potential and to the enlargement of the foundations of our future progress.

Like my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) I am satisfied that the deferred depreciation regulations have played an important part in restraining a good deal of capital investment that would have been of a less essential character in our present context, and in directing investment toward currently more essential ends. No changes in the principle of these regulations are presently contemplated, but I can assure the house that we do not like regulations of this sort and that we shall be most happy to modify or withdraw them when the proper time comes.

A year ago I stressed the importance of greater savings if we were to carry through our essential investment programs for defence and for resource development without increased inflationary pressures. In 1950 personal savings had fallen to about $700 million or less than 6 per cent of disposable personal incomes. In 1951 I am glad to report that despite higher income taxes and higher prices personal savings nearly doubled, reaching a total of almost $1,400 million, or more than 9 per cent of disposable personal incomes. To some extent the high rate of savings in 1951 was the counterpart of the low rate in 1950. The rate of saving was low in 1950 because of the heavy wave of consumer buying after Korea, and was high in 1951 because many purchases had been anticipated and quite a few consumers had to save more in 1951 to complete payments on goods purchased the year before. Higher interest rates and the more attractive terms of the sixth Canada savings bond series undoubtedly had some influence toward increased savings. I should also like to thank the National Council of Women and their affiliates in all parts of Canada for the excellent thrift campaigns they have been sponsoring during the past six months. Thrift and saving are still virtues, and I urge Canadians to keep up in 1952 the good record they made in 1951.

The restraints placed on consumer credit have also played an important part in reducing inflationary pressures and in improving the current savings ratio. These regulations were admittedly severe, but the inflationary pressures were such that strong measures were needed. As these pressures eased we were able to relax the regulations to some extent. I keep these matters under frequent review, and as soon as it seems sensible to do so we shall relax them again.

Preliminary estimates of net farm income in 1951 indicate a record level of more than $2,100 million, an increase of nearly 40 per cent over 1950. Excellent crops in all parts of Canada and higher prices for most farm products combined to produce this result. Due to unseasonable weather on the prairies not all this income was realized in cash, but the cash will flow in as the harvesting is completed this spring. Farmers are continuing to invest heavily in efficient modern labour-saving machinery. Farm implement purchases to the value of $137 million were financed under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, an increase of 35 per cent over 1950. These increasing investments in machinery and equipment are largely offsetting the decline in the numbers of farm workers, and given normal growing conditions I would expect farm crops and farm incomes to be well maintained in 1952.

The outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in a small area of Saskatchewan has been an unfortunate event, and has temporarily upset the movement of livestock and meats to their normal markets. Prompt and vigorous measures have been taken to eradicate the disease, and so far these have been successful in confining the outbreak within a very small area. To ensure that the disease is completely eradicated quarantine and other control measures will have to be continued for some time.

The government is compensating those whose animals or other property have to be destroyed and is prepared to use the Agricultural Prices Support Act to assist the livestock industry in this difficult period. It is expected that normal movements of meats and freer movements of livestock within Canada will be resumed very soon, except in the areas directly affected. The resumption of normal export business is still uncertain but it is hoped that it will be not too long delayed.

When I brought the budget down a year ago we were in the midst of a strong inflationary movement. At that time I described at some length the measures we were taking to bring this inflation under control. I referred to the economies in the government's non-defence spending, the reductions in the numbers of employees in the civil service and the increase in the civil service hours of work. I told the house we were determined to follow a fully pay-as-we-go fiscal policy. I referred to the actions taken to restrain credit expansion, both consumer credit and bank credit. I announced new regulations relating to deferred depreciation, and I made a special plea to all Canadians to raise their productive efficiency and to increase the volume of savings. I pointed out that while we could not wholly insulate ourselves from price increases in the outside world, we could and should control the inflationary forces generated within our own borders. I concluded by saying that the measures we proposed went to the root of the matter, but that in their nature they would take time to operate and could not produce dramatic results overnight.

I feel justified this evening in saying that our policies have proved to be wise and right. Events showed that the inflationary virus in our economic bloodstream had taken a stronger hold than I had anticipated, and that the price increases that occurred before our measures took full effect were about 5 per cent greater than the forecast on which the budget was based. Looking back now we can see that the rapid rise in wholesale prices began to moderate in April-May, the peak point was reached in July, and since then each month has shown a small but steady decline. The February, 1952, index was nearly 5 per cent below the July peak and 2½ per cent below the February, 1951, level.

The cost of living index normally parallels the wholesale index, but moves more gradually and lags a few months behind. The rapid rise in the cost of living index began to ease off in the late summer, though the highest point was touched just at the end of the year. In three of the last four months the index has declined. It is now back to the August, 1951, level, and is about 1½ per cent below the peak.

Inflationary pressures have also waned in the United States, but they remain uncomfortably strong in most of the rest of the world. As I have told the house on many past occasions we can hardly expect to have much less inflation than exists in the United States—our economies are too closely intermingled and theirs is so much larger—but unless we manage our affairs well we could have a great deal more. The return of our dollar by normal market forces to parity with the American dollar—at present indeed to better than parity—has also had its moderating effect on Canadian prices.

In 1951, Canada's foreign trade reached the highest level in our history, both in quantity and value. Our total exports during the past year rose by 9 per cent in quantity and by 25 per cent in value over 1950. There was a large increase in exports to overseas markets, with sales to the sterling area one-third greater than in the previous year. Imports from all countries also were sharply higher, and for the year as a whole exceeded exports by $120 million. However, during the past six months imports have tended to fall from the previous peak while exports have continued at a high level so that we have had a trading surplus in each of these months.

In the past year there was a sharp deterioration in the balance of payments of the sterling area. The United Kingdom and other sterling area countries have taken strenuous measures to right the situation. I am hopeful that these measures will bring about a fundamental improvement in the position of this great trading area. These developments are inevitably affecting our trade, and the markets for some of our products have been reduced. However, as my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce indicated, there is good reason to believe that our exports as a whole to the United Kingdom during 1952 will be larger than in the previous year.

While our balance on international current account showed an excess of payments over receipts amounting to well over $500 million, nevertheless there was a small increase during 1951 in our exchange reserves resulting from a continued heavy inflow of foreign capital into Canada, chiefly from the United States. Our net capital inflow in 1951 was about $560 million, as compared with over $900 million in 1950. About one-half of this inflow may be said to have been initiated in Canada, in the sense that the funds were borrowed by Canadians, chiefly provinces and municipalities. Most of the rest was an inflow initiated from abroad in the form of investment in new developments or the expansion of established projects previously financed from abroad. I am not one of those who view with alarm a considerable amount of foreign investment, but I welcome the fact that such a high proportion of our new investment was financed by our own people. Of our tremendous new capital investment program in 1951, the highest in volume ever reached, about nine-tenths was financed out of the savings of the Canadian people.

During the past three months our official holdings of gold and United States dollars have shown little change. On March 31 they stood at $1,787 million, or $8 million more than on December 31, and $134 million more than a year ago. Between January and August last year our reserves declined about $180 million. In the remaining four months of the year they went up by more than $200 million, and since then they have shown little variation from week to week. I may say, in passing, that I expect that the 1951 report of the foreign exchange control board will be ready for distribution immediately after the Easter recess. Since foreign exchange control terminated on December 14 last, this will be the final report of the board.

Employment and earnings have reflected both the impact of the defence program and the hesitations in the civilian sector of the economy. Taken as a whole employment and labour income have never been higher. Industrial employment averaged 220,000 above 1950, and unemployment averaged 60,000 below 1950. Total labour income was up by 17 per cent. Average weekly earnings in December 1951 were 12 per cent above 1950, and hourly earnings were 15 per cent higher. The average number of hours worked per week during the year declined by 1 per cent, from 42·3 to 41·8. During the past six months pockets of unemployment have developed, and during the past winter total unemployment was somewhat higher than a year ago, though lower than two years ago. As in the United States and elsewhere unemployment of greater than seasonal magnitude has occurred in textiles and in consumer durables, in both cases largely due to heavy anticipatory buying twelve to eighteen months ago and to consumer reluctance to pay higher prices. Price reductions in both these fields have resulted in some pick-up in buying during the past two months and I would hope that this trend will continue.

I have already described the past year as one of solid achievement. We have made substantial progress in our defence program, and the inflationary spiral has been brought to a halt. There remains, however, a strong inflationary potential, and any series of events that sharply increased either international or industrial tensions could revive these direct inflationary pressures and put our economic defences to a renewed test.

The present prospects for 1952 are for continued high levels of employment and business activity, but with some unevenness in their distribution. Some lines and some regions may experience demands that will fully or more than fully tax their available resources. Other lines and other regions may find their resources less than fully employed.

I expect 1952 to show further increases in total output. Last year our gross national output reached $21·2 billion. For budget purposes I am assuming that output in real terms will advance another 4 or possibly 5 per cent and that prices will lie somewhere between no change from 1951 and 2 per cent higher. If one takes the lower of both these assumptions, that is a 4 per cent increase in output and no change in prices, gross national product in 1952 will reach $22 billion. If one takes the higher of both, that is a 5 per cent increase in output and a 2 per cent increase in price, our gross national product will be about $22¾ billion. All these estimates assume good average crops, continued increase in general productive efficiency and no serious or prolonged industrial work stoppages. In the light of presently observable trends, I am basing my budget on an expected gross national product that will closely approach $22½ billion.

GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS, 1951-52

In reporting on the results of the past year I should point out that although the fiscal year ended a week ago it will be some time before the final figures will be available, and the figures I shall use tonight are necessarily preliminary and subject to revision. A great deal of detail is given in the white paper I tabled yesterday, and this evening I shall touch only on the main trends and highlights. But before I do so, may I first say something about the general problem of forecasting revenue and expenditure, and explain how these forecasts are compiled.

We have heard a good deal from some quarters in recent months about bad budgeting. Year by year my Conservative friends opposite have charged me with being too optimistic. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) not so long ago, when I was budgeting for a $20 million surplus, gravely rebuked me for being reckless. Only a moderate worsening of conditions, he warned me, would plunge the national treasury into a deficit. But year after year as we approach the end of our fiscal period these same hon. members join in quite a different chorus—we have overtaxed the Canadian people! Let me say quite plainly, Mr. Speaker, that so long as we have such years of rising prosperity as we have experienced while I have been Minister of Finance I am not going to apologize for having a surplus and making some reductions in the deadweight of our huge national debt.

I shall not repeat the figures which I have given and which my parliamentary assistant has given to the house on several occasions; but I will say, with all due modesty, that no minister of finance, provincial treasurer or any head of a national treasury with anything like comparable tasks has made as consistently good a record of forecasting of revenue and expenditure as has the Canadian minister of finance in the past five years.

How are forecasts made? First, take expenditures. Estimates have to be compiled by the departments in the autumn, six to eighteen months before the expenditures are to be made. Some of our operations are standardized and can be readily forecast from year to year. Such are family allowances or the interest on the national debt. In other cases, for example, compensation for the slaughter of diseased animals, payments on construction projects, or the deficit of the C.N.R., the disbursements to be made twelve or eighteen months hence are very difficult to forecast. However, experience has shown that it is usually possible to forecast total expenditures within 2 or 3 per cent. An exception, of course, is large scale defence procurement such as we are now undertaking. Last year we planned, and parliament authorized, defence expenditures in the total amount of $1,725 million. Actually we have spent about $1,441 million, or a shortfall of $284 million. How could this come about? Let me give an example. We had planned and expected to spend about $210 million on major defence construction projects; but because of difficulties of design and construction, and shortages of labour and materials we have found it possible to spend only about $165 million on these projects before the end of the year. The acquisition of machine tools, and of military equipment and its components in the United States poses exceptionally difficult problems of estimation as to final cost, delivery dates and dates of payment. In the year just ended the story has been one of unavoidable delays and postponements. This year it may be that deliveries will come forward much more rapidly than we now expect.

Considering all the difficulties, no one can be surprised that our total expenditures for the year just closed should turn out to be about 1½ per cent below what I forecast a year ago.

On the revenue side the problems of forecasting are closely tied to general economic trends which are not easy to predict. Practically all our revenues are from taxes which are in terms of percentages of incomes, of imports or of sales. To forecast the yield of the personal income tax we have to look ahead over the next twelve months and estimate how many people will be employed month by month, whether and to what extent wages and salaries will go up, the prevalence of much overtime or much short-time, the dividend policies of corporations, and the aggregate profits or losses of half a million farmers, tradesmen and professional men who are self-employed. A year ago I thought that there would be an increase of possibly 12 per cent in salaries and wages during the year and consequently I budgeted for an increase of $218 million in revenue. In fact, wages and salaries increased by 17 per cent, and personal income tax collections went up $328 million, or $110 million more than I had forecast.

Corporation income tax yields are still more difficult to estimate because, as is well known, corporation profits fluctuate much more widely, up and down, than do personal incomes. Last April I had expected to take in an additional $177 million under this head during the year. In fact our receipts increased by $335 million or $158 million above expectations. There is a special technical difficulty in forecasting corporate income tax yields. Each year the forecast has to be made on such facts as are available by the middle of March, at a time when most Canadian companies have not yet published their annual statements. Last year the preliminary March estimates of total profits in 1950, based on the limited evidence then available, turned out to be 12 per cent below the revised figures published by the dominion bureau of statistics many months later. The fact that I was forecasting from a base 12 per cent too low accounts for a considerable part of what proved to be a 16 per cent underestimate in this tax.

The yield of the customs tariff depends on the volume, the prices, the nature and the source of our imports. Our excise tax yields depend upon the ups and downs of prices and upon how much and in what form people will decide to smoke during the coming year, or how much they are going to spend on cars, radios, or a hundred and one other things. In the whole field of commodity taxes my forecasts a year ago have proved to be 12 per cent too low in the case of customs duties and 6 per cent too high for excise taxes and duties. On the sales tax I was almost exactly right. Grouping together all commodity taxes and non-tax revenues our receipts were just about 1½ per cent above the forecast. That, I should say, was a very close estimate.

All our tax yields, both income and commodity taxes, are directly affected by changes in the price level. If prices go up, our tax yields rise; if they go down, our tax yields fall. To show how sensitive revenues are to even small price changes let me give the following illustrative figures. Our present federal tax structure produced a revenue last year equal to about 19 per cent of the gross national product; but a general increase in incomes would yield more than 19 per cent of added revenue because our tax structure as a whole is progressive. In the year just ended gross national product was $1·2 billion greater than my forecast, and total revenue was $273 million more than I had originally expected. In other words, with an increase of 6 per cent in national product we took in 7½ per cent more revenue.

Every hon. member will agree, I hope, that it is not possible to predict with certainty the level of prices during any future twelve months to within one per cent. Yet on a GNP of $20 billion the difference between a one per cent rise and a one per cent fall in prices during the year is a difference of $400 million in GNP. Under our present tax structure, such a slight change in price could produce a difference of $80 to $85 million in our revenues.

Coming back now to our accounts for the year just ended, the over-all results are that our total revenues have been $4,003 million which, as the result of conditions I have just explained, is $273 million, or 7½ per cent higher than I forecast a year ago. Our total expenditures were $3,647 million, that is, $53 million or 1½ per cent lower than I had estimated. Our actual budget surplus for the year is, therefore, $356 million instead of the $30 million estimated last April.

There is little that I need add to what I have already said about revenues, but I should like to speak briefly about our policy in regard to expenditures—about economy.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Abbott: I am glad to hear my hon. friend say "hear, hear" because I shall have something to say to him in a moment.

An hon. Member: It is a long time coming.

Mr. Abbott: Since the outbreak of hostilities in Korea the government has felt a special obligation to restrict severely its demands on labour and materials for non-defence purposes, and to make more than usual efforts to secure economy in its operations and expenditures. We have been striving to apply this policy during a period of buoyant prosperity in the nation as a whole, when businesses and consumers alike were spending on a scale never equalled before. During this time the Canadian people, and nearly all of us here representing them in parliament, have demanded expanded services and functions from the government, just as expanded services have been demanded of business. These demands have brought about expansion in our services and our expenditures, ranging from such simple businesslike matters as postal operations to such major developments of national policy as the new old age security pensions. We have had further expansions in scientific research, in our immigration program, in our diplomatic service, in the work for the education and improved health of our Indians, in the surveying and development of resources—to name some of the outstanding cases where it has been the wish of parliament to expand. In other cases we have had to grow, along with the country and the volume of its business.

It has been against this trend, and in the face of rising levels of prices and wages, that we have had to seek economy and retrenchment, to make room for expansion in our defence effort. The results of our efforts are to be found in the details of our programs and expenditures and of the estimates for next year. Members who examine the tables of expenditure in the budget white paper will find many instances of reductions as compared with the previous year, notwithstanding an increase of about 10 per cent in the level of salaries and other costs. Allowance for this price factor will reveal more cases where the real content of expenditure is reduced. In other cases we have arrested an upward trend or natural growth. The results of these efforts, and of the more efficient carrying out of our continuing operations, have been overshadowed in the total expenditure figures by the increase in the levels of costs, and by those major decisions to which I have referred above.

The main problem in controlling our total expenditures lies with us right here in this house—and on both sides of it—in exercising restraint upon the constant demands for additional government services. It is much more a matter of broad issues of policy than of administration, important as that is. The scale of our defence budget is determined by policy developed in the light of the international situation. In its application there are of course real problems in securing economy and efficiency, especially when we must compete for men and for administrative ability with prosperous private industry. Apart from direct defence costs, our direct operating budget for this year is approximately $580 million, and our expenditures of a capital nature on government construction and equipment, including replacement of many buildings, ships and works worn out or outgrown, are only $157 million. Perhaps parliament can find items in these two categories where further economies can be made—and we shall seek them in day to day administration even after parliament votes the funds. But above and beyond these direct costs of government operations and facilities, we have now about $900 million in social security payments, $180 million for subsidies and tax rental payments to provinces, $440 million for interest, and over $100 million in contributions, grants and subsidies, including those to international agencies and programs. Any major reductions in expenditures can come only in some of these areas, or in defence. I believe that most Canadians want the government to do these things and are willing to pay what they cost. I wish to emphasize, however, that we cannot have all these and reduced budgets too. Canada is now a highly productive country and can afford these things we are doing—but only at the cost of forgoing expansion or improvement somewhere else. Just now there are more good, sensible things to be done in this country—by business, by governments and by individuals—than can be done all at once while the defence program goes on. Trying to do them all will only result in inflation. We must all hold some of our projects and programs in reserve, even though they are sensible or indeed profitable. For the government to share properly in this policy of self-restraint, it needs forbearance on the part of all those who have demands to make on the government for service, assistance, or public projects.

Because our budget surplus for the year was $356 million our net debt has been reduced by that amount. This is the sixth successive year in which we have had a surplus, and it brings to the very large and gratifying total of $2,344 million the amount by which we have been able to reduce the net debt of Canada since April 1, 1947. Applying the current average interest rate of 2·65 per cent on our outstanding debt, this represents interest savings of more than $62 million a year.

After adjusting the budgetary surplus for non-cash items and taking into account cash receipts from non-budgetary sources, we had sufficient cash available to meet essential non-budgetary cash outlays and provide for some reduction in funded debt. The non-budgetary cash outlays, all of which are of course authorized by parliament, totalled $653 million, and included such items as the following: advances of about $70 million to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for house construction and housing loans; loans of $139 million to the Canadian National Railways for necessary capital expenditures, including the refunding of securities; advances of $200 million to the exchange fund to finance the increase in our foreign exchange reserves consequent upon the flow of investment capital into Canada from abroad; and $95 million used to acquire materials essential to our defence program and held as current assets until charged as expenditures when embodied in finished goods.

After making these cash disbursements and drawing down our cash balances by $66 million, which left us only about $20 million cash on hand at the fiscal year end, we were able to retire outstanding funded debt to a total amount of $300 million as well as to acquire and withdraw from the market $156 million of our own securities, mainly for the unemployment insurance fund and the securities investment account.

The public debt operations of the government during the past year again included the redemption or refinancing of a large volume of matured or called bond issues in addition to the usual refunding of short-term securities. Funded debt payable in Canada amounting to $2,762 million matured during the year. Of this, $2,100 million was refinanced by refunding or conversion into new issues, and $362 million was covered by new money obtained from the very gratifying response to the Canada savings bonds campaign last fall. The remaining cash required—$300 million—came from our cash surplus. After taking into account certain minor non-cash transactions, the funded debt was reduced by a total of $324 million during the fiscal year.

FORECAST OF REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE, 1952-53

I turn now to a survey of our revenue and expenditure prospects for the new fiscal year. On March 19 I laid before the house the main estimates for 1952-53 providing for expenditures of $4,336 million, of which $2,106 million was for defence, $1,908 million for non-defence, and $322 million for old age security pension payments. These pensions, of course, are paid out of the old age security fund and consequently lie outside the scope of the budget proper, but they have been included in the estimates for purposes of record. The estimate of $2,106 million for defence is $665 million or 45 per cent more than our actual expenditures for that purpose last year. The estimates for our non-defence budgetary requirements are not comparable with last year's figures for they do not include provision for payments under the new tax rental agreements with the provinces which have not yet been concluded. If the eight provinces which came into the previous agreements all enter into the new agreements, as now appears probable, total payments under this head will amount to about $150 million in addition to the amounts shown in the estimates.

On the other hand, the estimates do include a number of items, such as the grant for assistance under the Colombo plan, which in the previous year were covered by supplementary estimates. Nevertheless, as in the past, some supplementary estimates must be expected, including provision for some items the nature of which is known but for which firm amounts are not yet available or final policy decisions have not been taken—the deficit of the Canadian National Railways, the grants to universities, and the subsidy on the movement of feed grains after the end of the current crop year, are examples of what I have in mind. I should also expect to make some further provision in our accounts for such items as the reserve against our active assets and the deficiency in the civil service superannuation account.

In line with past experience I expect there will be a shortfall of expenditures below the amounts provided by parliament in the appropriation votes. The amount of savings is difficult to estimate, particularly with respect to a defence program of the magnitude we are now engaged in. I should remind hon. members that the defence program necessarily involves very large long-term commitments, and the rates of expenditure under such contracts may be more or less rapid than we are presently estimating. My judgment, however, is that we are likely to have some shortfall rather than overrun, and I am budgeting on that basis.

All in all, I have concluded that I must expect total budgetary expenditures of $4,270 million, which excludes payments to be made from the old age security fund.

On the revenue side, forecasting is, as usual, difficult and subject to many uncertainties. However, on the premise that our gross national product for 1952 will approach $22½ billion and assuming no tax changes, I should expect that our total revenue, including old age security tax receipts, would be $4,630 million. The old age security receipts which I estimate at $235 million are, of course, earmarked for the old age security fund, leaving me about $4,395 million to cover our purely budgetary expenditures. I have had prepared the usual table showing a comparison of the revenue forecast for 1952-53 with the preliminary figures for 1951-52 for the convenience of hon. members. I would ask the consent of the house to have this incorporated in the record without my taking time to read it.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Abbott: The table is as follows:

With estimated expenditures of $4,270 million and prospective revenues of $4,395 million, it would appear that in the absence of any tax changes we would have a budgetary surplus of $125 million in 1952-53. However, before dealing with the tax changes which I shall propose to the house, it is essential to consider not only the budgetary position but also our prospective cash position in order to make a proper appraisal of the outlook for the coming year.

We shall require about $90 million for housing loans, possibly $125 million for advances to the Canadian National Railways, $40 million for financing the acquisition of materials for the defence production revolving fund, and smaller amounts for other loans, investments and advances. There may also be outlays on replacement of military equipment in excess of the value of equipment transferred to our NATO allies in the current year and charged to appropriations.

Offsetting these will be cash receipts, including repayments of loans and advances and the net cash receipts of the various annuity, pension and other accounts which the government holds and administers. Taking all these factors into consideration, I should expect that apart from any transactions in our own securities, and any advances to or repayments by the exchange fund resulting from increases or decreases in our exchange reserves, the total of the cash required for our non-budgetary disbursements will be somewhat greater than the cash available from our non-budgetary receipts.

On the other hand the budgetary expenditures include items which do not require the immediate outlay of cash, and consequently the burden on our cash resources will be correspondingly reduced. My general conclusion is that unless there is a substantial change in the amounts advanced to the exchange fund our over-all cash surplus will correspond fairly closely with our budget surplus.

TAX POLICY

From the figures I have given as the best estimates that can be made at this time of expenditure and revenue for the coming year it is clear that there is not much room for tax abatement. That this would be the case has been evident to me for many months, and I have done my best on every occasion to warn the public against undue optimism and against irresponsible and misleading interpretations placed upon the interim monthly surpluses reported during the course of the year. In this house and elsewhere hon. members opposite have used these monthly figures to criticize the government's tax policy without apparently making the slightest effort to check the reasonableness of their inferences. For example, they have repeatedly quoted the fact—and it is a fact—that the monthly statement showed an interim surplus on December 31 of $722 million. They have implied that on this basis the final surplus was likely to be almost $1 billion. My hon. friends knew, or should have known, that such an inference was wholly unwarranted. Almost at the beginning of our annual public accounts there are three pages of tables and charts explaining in detail the seasonal nature of our revenues and expenditures. Hon. gentlemen opposite are in the habit of expressing great interest in the public accounts, but apparently in their study of them they have not got through the first six or eight pages. If they had they would have learned that the final surplus is normally about half the interim surplus as of December 31.

Mr. Nowlan: Civil service superannuation.

Mr. Rowe: Just a million out.

Mr. Abbott: I am sure we shall have a very enlightening speech from the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) in due course. I can hardly wait for it.

Mr. Fulton: We shall do our best.

Mr. Abbott: A year ago, in the face of an extremely uncertain situation, I put forward what I described as a provisional tax program. This was done in the expectation that the outlook at home and abroad would become clearer. While the future is not free of uncertainty, the prospects are now sufficiently clear to justify moving toward a more stable pattern in our tax structure. The main essentials in a tax structure necessary to carry the civilian and the defence programs are that it should be adequate, efficient, fair and reasonably stable. To be adequate it is clear that I cannot offer any large net reductions in taxes this year. To be efficient and to be as fair as possible I shall be proposing quite a number of modifications, which on balance will provide some net reduction in tax revenues, though in certain instances adjustments in consumption may partly offset the adjustments in the tax rates. These modifications in tax rates, and some rearrangements in the grouping of tax commodities, will I believe put our tax structure into an orderly balance and, in the absence of substantial changes in the pattern of expenditure, provide some promise of reasonable stability in our tax structure for the immediate future.

Our total program of expenditure now consists, in round figures, of just over $2 billion for defence, nearly $1 billion for social security and pensions of various kinds, about $650 million for interest on the debt and payments to the provinces, and about $650 million for general administration and all the other varied activities of government. To this broad pattern of expenditures all parties in the house have subscribed in principle. While we will continue to press for maximum economies the only reasonable expectation we can have of real reductions in tax load must lie either in a lesser need for defence expenditure or in the steady increase in the wealth and incomes of our people, so that the present actual weight of taxation becomes a relatively lighter burden.

INCOME TAX CHANGES

Coming now to specific proposals I shall deal first with the corporate income tax. At present corporations pay, under the federal income tax law, 15 per cent on the first $10,000 of profits and 38 per cent plus 20 per cent of 38 per cent (the defence surcharge) on profits in excess of $10,000. This results in an effective rate of 45·6 per cent on profits over $10,000. In addition, corporations have been paying five per cent in the eight provinces with which we have had tax agreements, and seven per cent in Ontario and Quebec. Some time ago it was announced that the eight provinces would be asked to drop these five per cent corporate income taxes. They will be replaced by a five per cent increase in the federal rate. Concurrently provision will be made for a five per cent tax credit against the federal tax in respect of profits earned in Ontario and Quebec where provincial corporate taxes presumably will still be in force. This change will be essentially one of form rather than substance, and is designed to simplify administrative procedures. There will be no net increases in the taxes paid by corporations since the additional amount paid to the federal government will be only what they would have paid to the provinces. Our tax receipts will go up by $35 million on a full year basis, but our payments to the provinces will go up by an equivalent amount.

After this consolidation the federal rate on the first $10,000 will be 20 per cent with 50·6 per cent as the rate on the remainder. In the process of re-arrangement which will be effective as from January 1, 1952, the 50·6 per cent will be rounded off to an even 50 per cent. The revenue loss from this minor adjustment will be about $12 million in this fiscal year.

In considering the over-all tax position of corporations under this new structure it should be remembered that there is an additional two per cent tax on all corporate income imposed under the old age security act. To sum up then, the top corporate tax rate in Canada will be 52 per cent in eight provinces and 54 per cent in Ontario and Quebec.

Quite frankly, I am concerned that conditions make it necessary to maintain in our tax structure rates as high as this on business profits. My main concern is not with the current year or even possibly with next year. The ill effects of too high taxes can perhaps be endured for a year or two. But as I said last year, excessive rates of tax on corporate incomes if long maintained can do grave damage to the economy as a whole, and I say quite candidly that if I had more leeway for tax abatement it is to income taxes, both corporate and personal, that I would give first consideration.

The house will recall that in my budget speech a year ago, I expressed special concern over the effect of our present high corporate tax rate on certain public utility companies which are forced by the nature of their business and their franchises to raise large amounts of capital to finance expansion of services required to be performed for the public, and which because of public control of rates are allowed to earn only a modest return on their capital. At that time I had in mind that we would be able to work out the details of a formula which would give such companies substantial relief from the 20 per cent surcharge I was then proposing. After a great deal of investigation we found it impossible to devise a practicable formula of the type I had in mind and so the whole idea had to be dropped.

During the past year much further study has been given to the problem and I have now decided to recommend a change in our law which I believe can be administered and which will grant a measure of relief to certain of these companies as long as the present very high corporate tax rate continues to apply. This relief will apply to companies whose main business is the distribution to, or generation for distribution to, the public of electrical energy, gas or steam, and will take the form of a deduction from the tax otherwise payable of an amount sufficient to reduce to 43 per cent the tax payable under the Income Tax Act on that part of a corporation's taxable income that is derived from such distribution or generation. This, it will be recalled, is the group of companies in respect of which the government of Canada now turns over to the appropriate provincial governments half of its collections of tax on the specified income, after deduction of certain types of tax paid directly by the same corporations to provincial governments. It is also, generally speaking, the group of companies which for a variety of reasons finds the greatest difficulty in securing adequate income to attract the heavy volume of capital required to keep pace with public demand.

I am well aware that the degree of relief which I find it justifiable to grant may prove disappointing to those concerned but I do hope that it will make a real contribution to a solution of a problem we all recognize. It was only with the greatest reluctance that I reached a decision to apply a reduced rate of tax to a named class of companies and I decided it should be done only as a temporary expedient. Hon. members will have noted from the explanation I have given that as the corporate tax rate drops from its present 50 per cent level (that is, excluding the old age security tax) the formula I am proposing will result in a lessening measure of relief to this special class of companies and when the rate falls to 43 per cent, the formula will cease to operate.

There will be some revenue loss from this proposal but the net effect will be relatively small, as an amount equal to half of the tax abatement would otherwise, under present arrangements, have been turned over to the provincial governments.

An interesting change I am proposing under the corporation income tax is that those crown corporations of the federal government which are designated as proprietary corporations, and hitherto have been exempt from tax, will in future pay corporate income tax to the federal government in the same manner as any privately-owned corporation. "Proprietary corporations" are those so designated under the Financial Administration Act, and generally speaking are companies which are carrying on business operations similar to and in competition with private business. One desirable result of this proposed action will be to make the financial statements of these crown companies more comparable with private industry, and make it easier to assess the relative efficiency of their operations. I do not expect this change to have appreciable net revenue effects. It will increase our tax receipts and reduce our non-tax revenue. All crown company profits eventually find their way into the treasury, and many of them already remit all or the greater part of their profits year by year.

Other proposals under the corporation income tax include the extension for an additional year of the allowances now granted for mineral and petroleum exploration expenses, including the so-called "deep-test" well allowance, the addition of another year to the period during which new mines may qualify for the three-year exemption, and various technical amendments of lesser importance which will be covered in the bill to amend the Income Tax Act.

In the personal income tax field a new rate schedule will be introduced. Into this new schedule I propose to incorporate most of the weight of the present 20 per cent surcharge. There will be some over-all abatement although in saying this I should remind the house that the two per cent income tax imposed by parliament last session under the Old Age Security Act will be coming into force on July 1 of this year.

The Budget—Mr. Abbott

The house will recall that one of the criticisms quite properly directed at the 20 per cent surcharge method of increasing the personal income tax was that it increased in a distorted manner the rate of progression in the income tax schedule. For example, it resulted in levying a tax of more than 100 per cent in certain circumstances. Everyone would agree that such a result is quite wrong, and in modifying the rate structure this anomaly has been removed and a more reasonable scale of progression has been established. I expect the revenue loss as a result of these changes to be about six per cent in a full year and this loss in revenue is a general indication of the average gain to the individual taxpayer. In other words, the average taxpayer will pay six per cent less than he would otherwise have done under the income tax law as it now stands. With the consent of the house I should like to insert in Hansard at this point tables showing the effect of the new taxes on taxpayers at various levels of income.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Abbott: The tables are as follows:

Note: (1) The above figures show the actual income tax liability of a taxpayer with family allowance children but in order to arrive at his true net position the amount of family allowances received for his children must be offset against his tax liability.

(2) In calculating the above taxes it has been assumed that all incomes up to $30,000 are entirely earned incomes, and that incomes of more than $30,000 include earned income of that amount and additional investment income to make up the total. No account has been taken of the 10 per cent tax credit for dividends from Canadian corporations.

(3) The old age security tax of 1 per cent taxable income (maximum tax $30) in 1952 and 2 per cent taxable income (maximum tax $60) thereafter is not included in the above amounts.

As I mentioned earlier, no change has been made in the levy on personal incomes already enacted as a contribution toward the cost of old age security. This charge will apply at an effective rate of 1 per cent on taxable income for 1952 and at a 2 per cent rate thereafter, and will be in addition to the ordinary income tax. I am proposing that tax deductions under the new schedule will commence on July 1, concurrently with the commencement of deduction of the old age security tax. The tax liability for the full year 1952 will be determined in accordance with a special schedule of rates which will in effect represent the average of the rates now in force and the rates under the new schedule.

I think I should make clear that the reductions in income tax which I have announced will not be sufficient, for most taxpayers, to offset the effect of the old age security tax.

As a result of this change I anticipate that in the fiscal year which has just commenced revenue from personal income tax will be reduced by some $40 million from the amount of $1,240 million I estimated earlier that I would receive from this source.

I am proposing several other amendments of lesser importance affecting the personal income tax.

The existing maximum limits on the amount of medical expenses that may be deducted were established some time ago and there is evidence that these limits are imposing undue hardship in many instances of prolonged or serious illness, especially in cases where certain new and more expensive kinds of treatment are required. I am, therefore, proposing that these limits now be doubled. The effect of this change will be to raise from $750 to $1,500 and from $1,000 to $2,000 the amount which may be deducted in a year for persons having single and married status respectively, with corresponding increases in the allowance granted where there are dependents. The law also now requires that medical expenses be both incurred and paid in the same twelve month period to be eligible. I am proposing in the future to recognize expenses paid in the period no matter when incurred.

I gave most careful consideration to the suggestion contained in the resolution passed by this house that the provisions of the law limiting the deductible medical expenses to those in excess of 4 per cent of income should be removed. However, I feel strongly that the normal personal and living expenses of a taxpayer should never be deductible from income for taxation purposes. The requirement that only medical expenses in excess of 4 per cent of income are deductible will be retained, therefore,—

Mr. Knowles: Shame!

Mr. Abbott: —as a means of limiting, and I think properly so,—

Mr. Knowles: Shame!

Mr. Abbott: —the application of this provision to medical expenses of an unusual degree in accordance with the original purpose.

Mr. Knowles: Despite the unanimous vote of this house the other day.

Mr. Abbott: Some further technical changes will be made in the special tax system introduced for the armed forces last year. Experience with this new system has revealed certain problems which can be overcome by modifying its details in some minor respects. These will be discussed in detail when the amendments to the Income Tax Act are before the house.

The legislation governing pension plans will be amended to allow a deduction for payments under so-called terminal funding plans, and to introduce greater flexibility into the provisions governing the deductibility of employer's contributions in respect of employee's past services. Other minor technical amendments affecting the personal income tax will also be proposed in the amending legislation.

A word might be said here about the Succession Duty Act. Our law needs overhauling and I had hoped before now to have been able to bring forward a revision of the law for the consideration of the house. The fact is, however, that pressure of other matters has made this impossible. There are a few amendments of a technical nature that need immediate attention. They are not matters of policy and the effect will be merely to clarify certain provisions and remove anomalies. These will be found in the amending bill which will subsequently be introduced.

CUSTOMS TARIFF CHANGES

The budget resolutions relating to the customs tariff which I am tabling contain proposals to carry out certain recommendations of the tariff board and to provide for reductions which have been requested in certain duties to achieve economies in costs of productions. In a number of cases I am proposing changes in wording and classification which would remove anomalies and administrative difficulties which have arisen. I am also proposing to bring into the customs tariff a number of items which have been accorded reduced rates of duty for some time by order in council.

I am tabling with the budget resolutions four reports I have received from the tariff board. These reports are the result of references which I sent to the board during the past several years on plastics, glass, architects' and engineers' plans, and iron or steel shot and grit. In each of these cases I thought it desirable to have a thorough inquiry by the board, under the terms of the Tariff Board Act, before recommending any action.

In 1937, when the board last reported on the tariff schedule covering synthetic resins and plastics, it recommended that these schedules be reviewed from time to time in order to keep the classifications and rates of duty up to date. During the past decade the Canadian plastics industry has undergone a striking development both in the magnitude and range of its operations. As a result the classification, wording and rates of duty pertaining to the plastic items in the tariff have become obsolete. After an exhaustive inquiry into this highly complex and technical subject the board has proposed a revised classification and has recommended adjustments in rates of duty in order to bring the tariff items in line with the present position of the industry.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Last year the board presented certain interim recommendations on the plastic items which I tabled with my budget a year ago. The report which I am now tabling contains the final results of the board's inquiry and incorporates the interim recommendations which were implemented by parliament last year. The board's recommendations, which are now complete, regarding the structure of rates for the plastic items involve some increases and some decreases from existing rates of duty. The reasons which led the board to recommend these readjustments are fully set out in its report.

The second tariff board report which I am tabling relates to the tariff items covering glass in its various forms. The board has recommended reduced rates of duty on such widely used items as window glass, plate glass, certain forms of safety glass, and mirrors. The board has come to the conclusion, also, that if the recommended reductions are implemented, the drawback provisions granted to the mirror and safety glass industries are no longer necessary.

In 1946 parliament, upon the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, established a tariff item which provided for the duty free entry of certain engineers' plans, drawings or blueprints. Subsequently I received a number of representations asking for the restoration of the former rates of duty. I referred the matter to the tariff board for inquiry and report. The board heard extensive evidence from the interested parties and after careful study has recommended that duty free entry under the item in its present form should be continued.

The remaining report of the tariff board deals with the customs duty on iron or steel shot and grit. The item is now duty free. The board has recommended the imposition of a duty of five per cent on one classification of this item.

The first budget resolution relating to the customs tariff which I am submitting includes proposals to carry out all the tariff board recommendations respecting plastics and glass. I wish to consider further the recommendation for the imposition of a new duty on iron or steel shot and grit.

The second customs tariff resolution contains proposals for lower rates of duty on a list of items that enter into the costs of production of certain manufacturing and primary industries. A number of reductions are proposed in rates of duty on certain specialized equipment used in the mining industry. In respect of items used in agriculture there are several proposals for lower rates of duty, including some items of equipment used in the dairy industry, propane gas for use in tractors, clarification of the position of tractor tires and certain tractor accessories to ensure continued free entry, and ball and roller bearings for the repair of agricultural implements and machinery. I am also proposing that provision be made for the free entry of complete aircraft and engines of types and sizes not made in Canada. This is designed to be of particular assistance to the considerable number of smaller air transport companies which are anxious to re-equip with more modern aircraft. I am also proposing to widen the limit allowed from five dollars to ten dollars for the free entry of casual donations sent by persons abroad to friends in Canada.

In addition, the resolution contains a considerable number of proposals for improvements in wording and classification to remove anomalies and to keep the items in line with recent developments. The schedule pertaining to automobile parts has been extensively rewritten to bring it up to date with the present position of the automobile industry. The rates of duty proposed for automobile parts have generally been in effect for some time as a result of trade agreements negotiated under the general agreement on tariffs and trade. On the whole these rates are appreciably lower than the existing statutory rates.

Under the third customs tariff resolution I am tabling it is proposed to bring into the permanent tariff a number of items on which reduced rates of duty have been granted temporarily by order in council on materials used in Canadian manufactures. Authority for such temporary reductions is granted in section 284 of the Customs Act. Many of the items have been in effect for several years and experience has shown that it is desirable to place them in the permanent tariff.

I would expect no net change in our customs revenue as a result of all these amendments.

COMMODITY TAX CHANGES

Turning to commodity taxes, my purpose here as elsewhere is to make a number of adjustments and regroupings which will have the effect of reducing some tax rates, without seriously reducing our total revenues. They will also enable us to get back to the three broad groups of domestic commodity taxes which have become our accepted objective of a well-balanced, relatively simple, yet highly productive revenue system in this field.

Hon. members will recall that our commodity taxes fall into three main categories: first, there is the so-called general sales tax, of which the rate is 8 per cent with an additional 2 per cent levied for old age security; second, there are the special excise taxes, in general applicable in addition to the sales tax, which are now levied on a wide range of consumer goods at a rate which, with a few exceptions, is presently 25 per cent; third, there are the taxes and duties on liquor and tobacco products, both traditional and productive sources of revenue in the federal tax system.

Except for minor additions to the list of exempt goods, details of which will be found in the resolutions, I am not proposing to touch the sales tax. For reasons which I have discussed fully in the past I am satisfied that in its present form, with the numerous and extensive exemptions granted under it, the sales tax is a fair levy. We are constantly striving to make it even more so, and will continue to do so in the future.

The second broad group of taxes, the special excises, apply to a range of goods most of which are in the class of consumers' durables and are less essential in the sense that in most cases their purchase and enjoyment may be postponed without serious sacrifice. In 1949 we revised our rate structure so that on most goods the rate was 10 per cent. In the fall of 1950, after the invasion of Korea, we raised the general level to 15 per cent, and a year ago, when it appeared that our defence effort would make still heavier demands upon us, we raised the rate of broadest application to 25 per cent and brought three types of household appliances under tax at a 15 per cent rate. An exceptional instance in this group was soft drinks, which we raised to 30 per cent in the fall of 1950 and have retained at that rate since.

One reason for attempting a year ago to reduce the current purchases of most of the items in this tax group was that we were facing the prospects of acute shortages in steel and other essential materials which go in large volume into these articles. Due in part to reduced production of these consumer durables, but even more to the rapid increase in steel producing capacity and improved supplies of other critical materials, we no longer face these difficulties to the same acute degree, although I should add that that statement would have to be qualified if we had prolonged work stoppages in the steel industry either in this country or in the United States.

We can ill afford much loss of revenue, and I have given much personal study to this question. In this I have been helped by a considerable number of carefully prepared and thoughtful briefs from consumers, dealers and manufacturers. I am satisfied that a lower rate of tax will now meet our requirements, and I am proposing that effective from midnight tonight, the tax on all goods now bearing the 25 per cent rate under the Excise Tax Act will be reduced to 15 per cent, that the household appliances now taxed at 15 per cent will be exempted from this special excise, and that the 30 per cent rate on soft drinks be reduced to 15 per cent. In this connection the tax on carbonic acid gas will also be reduced, and products competitive with soft drinks, known as dry-powder drinks, will be made taxable at a 15 per cent rate. The tax on candies, which was reduced last year to 15 per cent, will continue to be taxed at that rate.

The details of the goods affected by these changes are given in the resolution, but for the information of the house I mention that included in the group on which the rate is reduced from 25 per cent to 15 per cent are automobiles, the smaller electrical household appliances, firearms, motor cycles, radios and phonographs, tires and tubes, golf clubs and balls and fishing rods and reels, cameras and supplies, lighters, cigars, luggage, pens and pencils, jewelry, ornaments, toilet articles, clocks and watches, and furs. The household appliances taxed at 15 per cent, and now to be exempted, are stoves, washing machines and refrigerators.

The net reduction in revenue from the changes just proposed is estimated at $78 million in the fiscal year.

Turning to the third main group of commodity taxes—those on alcoholic beverages and tobacco—the principal problem I have had to deal with has been the cigarette tax, and there is no subject upon which I have received more free advice. Hon. members will recall that a year ago taxes were increased on both cigarettes and cut tobacco, and the tax on cigarette papers and tubes was repealed. I had then expected that there would be a net increase in revenue of $28 million as a result of all these changes. Actually the increased revenue has turned out to be only $5 million, made up of a decrease of $1 million on cigarettes and an increase of $13 million on cut tobacco offset by the $7 million of taxes abolished on cigarette papers and tubes.

An hon. Member: Smuggling.

Mr. Abbott: I am coming to that.

In the case of cigarettes only I had forecast an increase of $21 million and I experienced a decline of $1 million. There are of course a number of reasons for this decline. I had expected that the higher prices resulting from the higher tax would affect consumption to some extent, but when they were combined with additional price increases announced by the manufacturers a little later, the effect on consumption was much more pronounced.

Mr. Fraser: Do not blame the manufacturers.

Mr. Abbott: I am not blaming anything. I know my hon. friend knows something about the tobacco manufacturing industry. Then our tobacco taxes are paid when the products are shipped from the factory and there were heavy but quite legitimate shipments from the factories in the several weeks preceding the budget. Further there was a prolonged strike during the summer in the plant of one large manufacturer. There has also been a considerable increase in the importation of American cigarettes, both legal and illegal, though in my opinion the volume of smuggling has been greatly exaggerated in much of the public discussion.

After saying all this, the real situation is that when the various provincial taxes on cigarettes and the manufacturers' price increases are added to the federal taxes we seem to have reached a point of diminishing returns. I therefore propose, effective immediately, to move the cigarette tax back to where it was a year ago, that is, a reduction of $1.50 per thousand, or three cents on the standard package of 20. As a result of this change and the consequential price reductions I would expect some recovery in cigarette sales, and I estimate the net reduction in revenue at $10 million.

The tax on raw leaf tobacco will be reduced by the amount of last year's increase. In recent years the use of tobacco in this form has been decreasing, and I have been impressed by the evidence that the present tax is unduly burdensome to the growers.

A minor technical change that will be made in the case of manufactured and raw leaf tobacco will be to modify the charges now imposed to vary with the exact amount of tobacco in a package rather than to apply at a flat amount per ounce or fraction of an ounce.

In the case of alcoholic beverages no changes of any consequence are proposed. Minor adjustments under the Excise Act will include the repeal of the duty on spirits used in fortifying wines or in any product that is subject to a special excise tax. It is proposed to change the duty on beer made from substances other than malt from 45 cents to 42 cents per gallon in order to give the two forms of product equality of treatment. The revenue effects of these latter changes will be unimportant.

As usual I give public notice that no claims for refund arising out of tax reductions in respect of goods on which tax has been paid will be entertained by my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue.

SUMMARY OF TAX CHANGES

I am now in a position to summarize the effects of all the proposed tax changes, and in doing so I ask leave of the house to insert in the record the two usual tables, one showing the effect of the proposed tax changes on revenue, and the other giving a revised forecast of total revenue after giving effect to the tax changes.

The tables show that the net reductions in taxation during this fiscal year will amount to $116 million. Hon. members will recall that earlier in my speech I estimated the prospective surplus before tax changes, at $125 million. After giving effect to my proposed tax changes budgetary revenues are estimated at $4,279 million, expenditures at $4,270 million, and consequently an estimated surplus of $9 million. What I am really doing, of course, is budgeting for a balanced budget, since the $9 million surplus is less than one-quarter of one per cent of revenues, and less than the normal mathematical margin of error in the estimates themselves.

A year ago, Mr. Speaker, I concluded my budget speech by saying that it would be too bold to hope that by this time circumstances would permit any reductions in tax rates, and the best hope I could hold out would be for no further increases in tax rates. I am glad that conditions have so turned out that I have been able to do a little better than I expected. I have not proposed any increases in tax rates, and I have been able to propose some downward adjustments.

Unless conditions at home exceed even my generous expectations, and unless the clouds that overhang the international scene lift more rapidly than we now have a right to expect, my hope for next year is the same as that I expressed a year ago—an expectation of no increases in tax rates, but not much likelihood of substantially lower rates. If we can do as well next year in bettering these expectations as we have this year, I for one would be content, and I am sure that the house and the country, knowing full well the great and serious responsibilities that we in Canada carry in partnership with others, would fully share that sense of satisfaction.

Mr. Speaker, I shall now table the resolutions which I shall move when the house is in committee.

INCOME TAX ACT

Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide, amongst other things:

1. That for the 1953 and subsequent taxation years there be substituted for the graduated rates of tax and the defence surtax that are at present applicable to the income of individuals, the following graduated rates of tax:

6. That crown corporations that are classed as proprietary corporations in the Financial Administration Act shall pay tax on income earned on and after January 1, 1952.

7. That the special deduction from income to a taxpayer whose principal business is the production, refining or marketing of petroleum or petroleum products or the exploring or drilling for oil or natural gas or mining or exploring for minerals, be allowed for expenses incurred in the 1955 operations on the same basis as for expenses incurred in the operations in the years 1951 to 1954.

8. That the special deduction from income and taxes of a taxpayer whose principal business is production, refining or marketing of petroleum or drilling for petroleum be allowed for expenses incurred in respect of deep-test oil wells in 1953 operations on the same basis as for similar expenses in operations of the years 1950 to 1952.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, as is customary I wish to thank the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) for the clear and interesting picture he has given of our affairs. I not only wish to thank him; I wish to say that I welcome seeing in what he has said certain signs of repentance. That give me great satisfaction. I know the minister will not expect me to go further than he went himself in praising him. In fact I do not know that there is anything I can add to that except to say I should like to hear the minister when he is not in a modest mood. Certainly I can say this to the minister, that if I ever have an unpleasant and nasty pill which I wish gilded I would hope I might have his assistance in doing it. I was particularly interested in the joy registered by those who have applauded the minister. Their constituents must be very different from mine.

Some hon. Members: They are.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): They evidently live in constituencies where people love high prices but in Greenwood as a matter of fact the people do not love high prices. I would ask these members if they have a formula to make the people in their constituencies like high prices will they disclose it to me, or still better, will they come and help me in Greenwood?

Mr. Sinnott: They like balanced budgets too.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): As the minister was speaking of millions, hundreds of millions and billions I was thinking of a different kind of people, people who do not deal in billions or hundreds of millions and who, as a matter of fact, in spite of the success story we have heard tonight, in spite of the glowing figures we have heard tonight, do not find they are sharing very greatly in this prosperity. They feel that it is passing them by. They are unhappy and perplexed. It is about them I wish to talk tonight. They hear a lot about the glories of our currency. They hear much said about our dollar being at par with the United States dollar, but they know that our dollar is not at par with the things they have to buy, with bread, meat, milk and clothes. They know it is at a 50 per cent discount with relation to those things, and that bothers them. As I say, they are bothered by high taxes and high prices, and recently they have begun to be bothered by unemployment too.

I should like to refer to certain things that are said by friends of the government in commenting on this situation but first I should like to say that so far as I can see the chickens are beginning to come home to roost, and they are not a very pleasant brood when you look at them. I think the people of Canada are going to look at them closely because one thing the minister has done—and in this he has had shining success—is that he has made the people of Canada tax conscious, tax puzzled and tax angry in a way that in my memory they have never been before. I think they will indeed welcome the suggestion of the mayor of Ottawa that in addition to a cost of living index there should be a cost of taxes index. All the soothing things that the minister says are not going to take their minds away from these things.

I come now to the amount that we are being asked to raise, and I should like to read a brief statement from the Winnipeg Free Press which, in spite of occasional qualms, supports this government through thick and thin. What has it got to say about the figure of $4,335 million plus, plus, plus, about which I will say something in a moment? The Free Press of March 22, 1952, has this to say:

> These figures will enable the public, all of whom in one or other form are taxpayers, to realize the disturbing and, indeed, appalling way in which federal expenditures have risen in recent years.

The Free Press later refers to government profligacy, and I shall refer to it too. The Free Press is right. These figures are appalling. The minister has explained to us how he is going to deal with them this year, and if we continue on the crest of a rising boom he will deal with them this year and undoubtedly even have another surplus. Maybe we will find it tucked away somewhere. Nevertheless it is an appalling thing because to begin with we have $4,335 million. Then you can add $100 million right away to cover the dominion-provincial tax agreements. Then there was $441 million in supplementary estimates this year. On that basis you would have $4,876 million, or say $4,800 million. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is $13,150,000 a day. It is $547,000 an hour and it is nearly $10,000 a minute. In other words, since I began to speak five minutes ago the minister has taken $50,000 out of our pockets.

Putting it differently, it comes to something like $343 for every man, woman and child on the average. I know that average figure is criticized but nevertheless it is a rough and ready guide. If you take a family of five it is $1,715 and that would come to about $30 a week in taxation. I admit that figure needs adjustment but it is a figure that people might just as well have in their minds. The minister takes it lightly and buoyantly. He speaks about buoyant revenues, and they are buoyant, although we must remind ourselves that they are produced very substantially by inflated prices. Sometimes I think the minister almost feels that taxes come like manna from heaven.

Last year we pointed out to the minister exactly what was going to happen if these extra taxes were imposed. On April 16, 1951, as found at page 2051 of Hansard I said:

> This budget, which is purporting to cure inflation, will cause as its inescapable first result a substantial increase in the cost of living.

We told the minister that, and it was true. We told him it would produce a surplus beyond what he expected, and that was true. Notwithstanding the formidable words used by the minister, I propose to say a little about the mystery of the surplus. In the beginning I would say to the minister that if it were not so serious this matter of the surplus would be rather amusing. Indeed, in certain quarters they are dealing with it as if it had become a kind of joke, not a very good joke. The Montreal Gazette had an editorial this morning beginning, "Button, button, who's has got the button".

That is partly because of a broadcast the minister made on February 19 in which he referred to the then surplus of $722 million and went out of his way to say what a good thing it was that this unexpected surplus had arisen. In his radio address he had this to say:

> Supposing we had not had this large budgetary surplus, where would we have got the money for all these necessary loans, advances and investments?

I thought that was an odd thing because after all the minister had these requirements in his mind in April when he budgeted, but nevertheless that is what the minister said. As I say, he explained that these moneys had been spent, and indeed he rather gloried in it. I want to point out that these moneys were used for loans and investments without any warning to the people who paid the taxes that that was going to be done. I think there is no question whatever that the people who paid the taxes would be in the highest degree surprised to find that their money had been used in this way. There is no other conclusion they could reach but that hundreds of millions of dollars were taken from them unnecessarily.

The situation in the public mind is well pictured by a cartoon I have here from the St. Catharines Standard. It depicts the minister—

Mr. Abbott: Put it on Hansard.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Unfortunately I have got to return it. On the whole it is not uncomplimentary at all. The minister looks firm and rather aggressive, but on the other hand he is depicted in this fashion. He is a conjuror on a platform. One can see a very interested spectator just below—there seems to be only one—and in his left hand the minister is holding up a rabbit which is inscribed "That embarrassing surplus." The minister is saying, "Now, watch this vanish." The caption at the top is "But they usually multiply." My own suggestion to the minister is that he should have this called "Abbott's rabbit", and have it set up in his room.

This surplus, this bad budgeting, was a joint effort. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) got more money than he expected, and the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) did not spend as much as he expected. I think they had better get together and see whether they cannot do a better job this time. I always thought the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) could spend an unlimited amount of money, but apparently he did not quite come through this time.

Now I want to come back for a moment to taxes, which are really our greatest national industry. The minister is in this fortunate position, that whereas other creditors may have to wait for their money the tax collector goes and gets his. The minister is going to get, let us say, $4,800 million. I would like to compare that for a moment with some other interesting figures in our national economy. In 1950—I could not get the 1951 figures—the manufacturing industry of this country produced goods to the value of $4,378 million. In other words the minister is going to spend more than the product of our entire manufacturing industry. In 1950 the industry of agriculture produced goods to the value of $1,792 million, only about one-third of what the minister is going to get. The people of this country should register in their minds the amount the minister is going to spend, for it raises this question which we should all keep before us. When we talk about the gross national product, it will be found that a very large part of that results from government expenditure. We are coming back to something like the war conditions, when we all remember that the government spent so much.

Now I want to say just a word about the cost of living. The minister did not say as much about that as I thought he would. Perhaps he was being modest, or perhaps the small drop in the cost of living calls up unpleasant memories of the foot-and-mouth disease scandal which has cut off our meat producers from the United States. It may even call up memories of unemployment, which now is rampant to some extent and which undoubtedly has had something to do with the drop. But I want to be fair; there has been a drop of 2½ points in food prices in the last month or two. I have tried to get the best figures possible from those who understand these matters, to show what that would mean to an average family. As far as I can make out it would mean .46 cent a meal saved, or just under half a cent a meal. So I want to bring that to the attention of the house.

The next question I want to ask is, do we need all this money? On that point I should like to read a few words, again from the Winnipeg Free Press of March 22, where they say:

> But the weak spot in the federal government's policy (and it now assumes a most aggravated form) is that it does not obey its own rules. It gives good advice and sets a thoroughly bad example. In this allowing expenditures to get out of hand Ottawa has failed to measure up to its own standard of what is required in these times.

And this also:

> When the figures are searched for an explanation of this profligacy, none is to be found.

The word "profligacy" as I understand it means wasteful extravagance, and that is the word used by the Free Press.

Now let us see what sign of economy there is. I observe one thing of interest. We sometimes complain that the government does not share responsibility with us, but this is one place where the minister is very anxious to share responsibility, and to evade it himself. He evades responsibility by saying that really this is our fault, and that we should be helping him. That is true enough: nevertheless this is a government responsibility.

Do we need all this money, this $4,800 million? The government tries to create the impression that it is all in defence and social security, and a great deal of it is; but as the Free Press is careful to point out, that is not a complete answer. When we come back to defence one or two things should be said there, too. I am sure everyone in this house wishes to spend for defence what is necessary to secure our safety; but that is not to say this figure of $2,100 million which is waved in our faces is necessarily a rock-bottom figure. During the defence debate in this house searching criticisms have been made which would suggest that this two billion dollar figure may be greatly exaggerated, and that is where some saving may be made. Presumably this gentle improvement in the tax situation which we have seen tonight may be taken as a preliminary to what is going to happen next year, when of course it will be very necessary to have some sweetener available.

I want to draw attention to just two or three of the items one finds in the estimates for next year. In the first place there is a figure of $46 million for travel and removal. I should be quick to say that includes moving troops to Korea and Germany; nevertheless $46 million is a lot of money and it is not possible for me to believe that something could not be done there. The next item I wish to refer to is $17 million for publicity. We all know what publicity is, of various kinds. It includes press hand-outs, films and all sorts of things; and I should point out that this amount does not include the salaries of that noble army who work in the various departments on publicity duties. This is merely what you might call out of pocket expenses.

A further figure, though it is not so large, which staggered me perhaps more than any other is an item of $4,891,000 in the defence department for telegraphs, telephones and other communications. I had a little illustration the other day which perhaps helps to explain that. A man who had been in the department years ago went in to obtain some information from an officer there. The officer said, "I don't know, but I will get it for you very quickly," and he reached for the telephone and telephoned to Vancouver. He did get the information very quickly. In these days of air mail I wonder if it is really so that there are urgent communications passing between the various officials of the government which require an expenditure of $4,891,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to comment briefly on the tax changes announced tonight. I welcome, as others will, the change in the corporation tax, though I regret very much it is still over 50 per cent which the minister has already stated more than once in this house he thinks too high. The relief is very little. It is rather like the hangman who, before the execution, offers you a cigarette. Still it is better than nothing, though not very much. We also welcome the minister's intention to try to help the utility companies, and I appreciate the fact that crown corporations are now going to pay their shot. On the personal income tax side, the correction of the inequity of having taxes running over 100 per cent was clearly called for. I think the minister's adjustments there will merit consideration, and presumably they will be a relief.

In connection with the sales tax it seems to me we find the minister not at his best. We find him here unrepentant and what I can only term perverse. It seems to me his pride is involved. He made statements last year with regard to the sales tax which we told him were wrong and which I submit in this last year have been abundantly proved wrong; nevertheless the minister persists. In connection with the excise tax I have already read to the house what we said last year; and I am glad to see that in this instance the minister has repented and that there is to be an adjustment. As to cigarettes, of course everyone knew that situation was impossible, but it is a pity that it had to be left to smugglers and bootleggers to correct it rather than those of us who regard ourselves as more respectable.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am sure that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) will agree with that anyway.

The minister has talked in billions to taxpayers who have to think in small amounts of five's and ten's. I believe he overlooked the fact that there are hundreds of thousands of voters in this country to whom his tax burden is a grievous one. They will feel again that, with this flood of expenditure, quite possibly, in spite of the check at the moment, prices may go up again if the spending develops in a big way, and that they may again be the victims of an unexpected surplus. They will certainly be on the lookout to see whether the situation arises in the coming year which they feel has arisen in the past year when they have been taxed to an amount far beyond what was necessary.

On motion of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood) the debate was adjourned.

JAPANESE PEACE TREATY

APPROVAL OF TREATY SIGNED AT SAN FRANCISCO SEPTEMBER 8, 1951

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament approve the treaty of peace with Japan, declarations (2) of Japan and Protocol, all as signed at San Francisco on the eighth day of September, 1951, and that this house do approve the same.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

He said: This motion which I have the honour to move gives to the house an opportunity to express its views on the Japanese peace treaty which was signed last autumn. The adoption of this resolution, which I think will commend itself to all sections of the house, will make it possible to bring the state of war with Japan to an end. I devoted some attention to this treaty, Mr. Speaker, in my remarks in the house on October 22 last, and at this time I do not want to repeat what I said then.

Since the signature of the treaty, it has been ratified by the Japanese Diet with the resounding vote of 307 to 47 recorded in the Japanese house of representatives. The United Kingdom government has also ratified the treaty—and deposited its instrument of ratification—as has the United States government. Parliamentary action has also been completed in Australia, New Zealand, Pakistan and Ceylon. The treaty will come into effect when a majority of eleven states, mentioned specifically in the treaty—a group which includes Canada—have ratified it. It seems likely, therefore, from the action which has been taken up to this moment, that the treaty will come into effect in the near future. This could happen whether or not Canada ratifies the treaty. I believe that no useful purpose would be served by this house delaying action in regard to the treaty at this time.

The treaty is a generous one. It has been represented by one of its main architects as a treaty of reconciliation, and that, I think, is what it is. Last October, when we were discussing this matter I referred to it as a good treaty, and I still believe it is a good treaty. It is, of course, not a perfect one, but I doubt if we had had months of discussion at San Francisco that we would have made it a better one. It restores Japanese sovereignty, but that sovereignty will be confined to the four main islands of the Japanese empire. It places no restrictions on Japan's economy or on Japan's ability to defend itself. Most important of all, the treaty sets Japan free to pursue a peaceful destiny, as we all must hope, and gives her an opportunity to contribute to the security and stability of the whole Pacific area.

The treaty was negotiated, as I explained last October, through diplomatic channels rather than through the more normal conference procedure. That was unusual procedure admittedly, but it was one which was made necessary by the circumstances. As early as 1947, the United States government had proposed to its allies a conference for the signing of the Japanese peace treaty in the usual way. This procedure was impossible because of the attitude taken at that time and subsequently by the Soviet union, which insisted that any such treaty should be negotiated not by a conference where all those who participated in the war against Japan would be present, but in the presence of the council of foreign ministers which would have given the U.S.S.R. and other members of the council a veto.

To avoid this procedure and the use of the veto in this connection, in September 1950 I believe it was the President of the United States initiated diplomatic discussions with the other countries represented on the Far Eastern commission with a view to negotiation by such discussion of a treaty, the final text of which we have before us today. The Canadian government participated in those discussions and was given ample opportunity to express its opinions on the various drafts as they were presented. These opinions of ours were not always accepted, Mr. Speaker, but the text which we have before us now does not represent the complete views of any one country which participated in those discussions, and is essentially a compromise document.

The Soviet union was kept fully informed of these discussions while they took place, but contributed little to them except abuse. When the conference was called in San Francisco to put the finishing touches on this process, not to negotiate a treaty but to sign one and go over the text of the draft which we have before us, the Soviet union and its satellite states were represented. As hon. members know, they refused, as indeed some other countries refused, to sign the draft.

The territorial adjustments are outlined in the treaty. The Potsdam proclamation of the treaty of peace Japan undertook to—surrender of Japan, provided that Japanese sovereignty would be limited to the four major islands and such minor islands as the allied powers would determine. Chapter II of the peace treaty carries out those surrender terms. Japan renounces all rights, title and claim to Korea, Formosa, the Pescadores, the Kurile Islands and South Sakhalin. In addition, she renounces any rights she had with respect to the islands which she held under the terms of a league of nations mandate. Under article 3 of the treaty Japan retains residual sovereignty in the Ryukyu islands and other islands to the south and southeast of Japan which were after the surrender of Japan under United States administration. Japan has agreed to concur in any proposal to place those islands under United Nations trusteeship, with the United States as the administering authority.

It might have been better, and it certainly would have been neater, if the final disposition of the former Japanese territories had been defined precisely in the treaty, but it was not possible for the allied powers to reach agreement on this score. It was decided, therefore, in order that the peace treaty should not be further delayed, to have Japan simply renounce her rights in these territories, as she was required to do, and to leave to future international agreement the final disposition of the territories in question—including, incidentally, Formosa.

In addition to our general Canadian interest in a peace settlement which would return Japan to normal and friendly relations with the free world, Canada had certain special concerns which were made known at every stage of the negotiations and indeed at San Francisco itself. My colleague the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew), who was with me at the San Francisco conference, gave the house a full account on March 11 last of the—as we think it to be—successful agreement on North Pacific fisheries which was reached with Japan and the United States in December of last year. Under article 9 of the treaty of peace Japan undertook to—

> . . . enter promptly into negotiations with the Allied Powers so desiring for the conclusion of bilateral and multilateral agreements providing for the regulation or limitation of fishing and the conservation and development of fisheries on the high seas.

The promptness with which Japan entered into these negotiations is, I think, an encouraging evidence of Japan's interest in living up to the trust which has been placed in her by this treaty of peace. I think it is also a good sign for future Canadian-Japanese relations which will be entering a new chapter when this treaty is ratified.

I do not intend to go into the substance of this convention since the house has already been given the details concerning it by my colleague the Minister of Fisheries. I would remind the house, however, that until the peace treaty comes into effect Japan will not be in a position to sign the fisheries convention. We can, therefore, by ratifying the peace treaty, assist in enabling Japan to sign and ratify this important convention.

A further question in which Canada was especially interested was that of Japan's undertaking with respect to commercial practices and agreements. I made clear the views of the Canadian government on this important matter in my statement in San Francisco. Possibly it would be desirable if

I now put on the record what I then said. At the San Francisco conference I said:

> Japan agrees in the treaty to conform to internationally accepted fair trade practices. It is the confident hope of my government that Japan, in the future conduct of its commercial relations with other countries, will avoid certain pre-war practices which were widely condemned at that time by other trading nations. Canada has no wish to see any discrimination against or any unnecessary obstacles to normal Japanese trade. On the contrary, as a trading nation ourselves we wish to see Japan develop its full trading possibilities. It is only common sense for us to wish for a prosperous rather than a poor Japan. Such prosperity, however, can never, in the long run, be established or even assisted by trading practices considered unfair by other countries and against which those countries have no alternative but to protect themselves if unhappily they should be adopted.

The peace treaty itself, as hon. members no doubt know, is not designed to settle questions of commercial policy but leaves this policy to be decided by the individual signatories of the treaty and Japan. Canadian attitudes and Canadian policy with respect to future commercial relations with Japan will, to a large extent, be influenced by whether or not Japan adheres to the declaration made in the preamble to the treaty of her intention, and I quote from that preamble:

> . . . in public and private trade and commerce to conform to internationally accepted fair practices.

Another important section of the treaty deals with reparations. Critics of the treaty of peace in some countries have concentrated their attentions on the reparations clauses which represent an attempt to make this treaty an important step toward breaking the vicious cycle of "war-victory-peace-war". The allied powers recognize in the treaty that Japan should in principle pay reparations for the devastation and suffering she caused during the war. They recognize in addition, however, that Japan lacks the physical capacity to recompense her former victims if at the same time she is to achieve a viable economy and contribute to the economic health of the Pacific area. For certain nations represented at San Francisco who had not only lost property valued in billions of dollars but also countless lives, as a result of Japan's military activities, the very limited reparations clauses could not but appear unsatisfactory. For others it was easier to understand that the exaction of even just reparations might impose such an economic burden on the defeated state as to vitiate the objectives of the treaty as a whole.

In the treaty Japan undertook to compensate those allied powers whose territories she had occupied, and I quote from article 14 of the treaty:

> . . . by making available the services of the Japanese people in production, salvaging and other work.

Negotiations are already under way at the present time on this matter between Japan and Indonesia and Japan and the Philippines. Japan further agreed in the treaty to make available certain of her assets to indemnify members of the allied forces who had suffered undue hardships while prisoners of war of Japan. This matter is covered in article 16. The details of this scheme are at the present time being worked out between the allied governments concerned and the international committee of the Red Cross which is to be responsible for the distribution of the funds in question.

Finally, the treaty provides that Japan shall return all allied property which she held during the war years upon application to be made within nine months of the coming into force of the treaty.

A highly important section of the treaty deals with security. Under article 5 of the treaty Japan undertakes to settle its international disputes by peaceful means, to refrain in its international relations from the threat or the use of force and to give the United Nations every assistance in action taken in accordance with the charter. In return, the allied powers recognize Japan's sovereign right of individual or collective self-defence.

Article 6 provides for the termination of the occupation not later than 90 days after the treaty comes into force. However, it is stated explicitly in the treaty that there is nothing in this provision to prevent the stationing or retention of foreign armed forces in Japan under the terms of any agreement made between Japan and one or more of the allied powers. The peace treaty simply recognizes for Japan the principle which article 51 of the charter of the United Nations recognizes for all sovereign states. Hence, on the very day of the signature of the peace treaty, a security treaty between the United States and Japan was signed under the terms of which Japan granted to the United States the right, upon the coming into force of the treaty of peace, to dispose United States land, air and sea forces in and about Japan. That is an exceedingly important provision. These forces are to be utilized to contribute to the maintenance of international peace and security in the Far East and indeed to the security of Japan itself against an armed attack. A United States-Japan administrative agreement implementing this security treaty was signed last month in Tokyo.

I believe the Japanese people are now aware of the tragic folly of aggressive war and that they would resist any attempt on the part of their leaders to follow the paths of conquest which they travelled in the thirties and in the early forties. In addition,

Japan is not now physically capable of following such a course; she has lost much of her former empire with all the raw materials it provided, her armed forces were completely demobilized during the occupation and her stockpiles of munitions were destroyed.

The way for the revival of aggressive militarism in Japan is not now, nor I hope will it be in the future, easy or open. It must be our hope that Japan will see the advantages to be gained from association with the free world and will co-operate in the collective defence arrangements already in being so as to contribute to the stability of that important area of the world.

Nevertheless, just as is the case with Germany in Europe, so we must at times worry about the emergence again in the Pacific of this great and powerful people, whose capacity for good can be great but whose capacity for harm, in the past, has also been great.

I have dealt only briefly with the most important provisions of the treaty, and I have not even attempted to consider some of its articles. Many of these articles provide for the necessary legal termination of the state of war which existed between Japan and the allied powers. I again commend the treaty and its attached documents to the approval of the house as a good treaty, and as an attempt to mark the end of the method of peace-making which has imposed rigid controls and galling restrictions, only to court evasion and eventual disregard.

The Japanese have, I think, in almost seven years of undisturbed occupation earned the right to have their freedom. The allied powers can at least hope by generosity to exchange a former enemy for a friend, in an area torn by strife and aggression at the present time, a friend with a proven ability which can be turned to the benefit of the Pacific area as a whole.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, in following the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) perhaps I shall be somewhat more expansive. However, at the beginning may I indicate to the house that the official opposition, for which at the moment I am spokesman in the debate, endorses and approves the resolution moved by the minister.

This peace treaty is perhaps the most unique of its kind in the whole of diplomatic history. It is unique, so far as its methods, procedures and negotiations are concerned. In addition to that it is unique in its constructiveness and in its lack of severe penalties inflicted upon a vanquished nation.

I was struck by the closing observations at the San Francisco meeting by the presidential representative, who had so much to do with the negotiation of the treaty itself. I refer to Mr. John Foster Dulles. I think his words, as reported from the conference, deserve to be placed on the records of this House of Commons. He indicated that this was a question of a good peace now or a better peace never, and went on to say this:

> It contains no doubt imperfections. No one is completely satisfied. But it is a good treaty. It does not contain the seeds of another war. It is truly a treaty of peace.

And at another point in his address he said this:

> This treaty is good to the point where it cannot be made better without its becoming worse. Better words might theoretically be found; but to seek these is to let escape what is now within our grasp. There come times when to seek the perfect is to lose the good. This is such a time.
> It was our common hope that out of the fiery purge of war there would rise a new Japan. That was no foolish hope. Japan has a great culture and tradition which are capable of producing distinctively, but no less authentically, those virtues which all nations and peoples must possess if there is to be a world-wide commonwealth of peace.
> In order, however, that that potentiality shall become actuality, Japan needs free political institutions in a climate conducive to their vigorous growth; social progress; an equal administration of justice; an awareness of human dignity; a sense of self-respect, of respect for others. Above all Japan needs the will to live at peace with others as good neighbours.
> All this is possible, if we make peace now. It becomes impossible, or at best improbable, if Japan's long deferred hopes are now blasted.
> There are, in Japan, new-born institutions of freedom. They will not flourish if military rule continues indefinitely to be supreme.
> The United States, which since the surrender has directed occupation on behalf of all the allies, says solemnly to each of the allies: unless you now give Japan peace and freedom on such honourable terms as have been negotiated, the situation will rapidly deteriorate.
> It is time to end the subjection of the Japanese government to allied command. It is time to end the occupation and to recognize that, henceforth, it is the Japanese people who exercise complete sovereignty in Japan. It is time to welcome Japan as an equal and honourable member of the family of nations. That is what the pending treaty will do.

It is on that general basis that this parliament may be expected to support the resolution now moved by the minister. When I am developing that point I should like to pay tribute to the work done by the presidential representative on that occasion, Mr. John Foster Dulles. It was a painstaking, it was a tedious, and I have no doubt at times it was a disappointing task. But his perseverance, his resolution and his determination to see that there was a peace treaty for Japan never ended, with the result that one of the newspapers in another country said that his success in connection with the Japanese peace treaty was a feather in the somewhat battered cap of American diplomacy and American leadership during these years.

That is not necessarily in all its terms a reflection of my thought with respect to American diplomacy and leadership. But I wish to indicate at least that Mr. Dulles' position is, I believe, appreciated by the free world on this occasion.

I wish if I may to mention another personality, and I hope that in doing so I shall not be accused of entering into the general election campaign in the United States. Our own campaigns are difficult enough without taking on the task in another land. But I do want to mention General MacArthur. Whatever one may think of his military or political judgment in fields other than the occupation of Japan, I think we must admit, and freely admit, that General MacArthur did a statesmanlike job with respect to his occupation duties in Japan from the end of the war until he was released from his duties. One of the most orderly and normal transitions from war to peace occurred during that period. It was I think an indication of where we could properly apply and did apply reason instead of revenge in our dealings with those who were the losers in a world war.

I think some of the things which he instituted have had a great deal to do perhaps with the present success of our friendly relations with Japan so far as the free powers of the world go. I need only to mention one or two in order to indicate what was done. There was the destruction of the power of the war lords and those politicians in Japan who had been responsible for the war itself; there was the breaking up of the family cartel system; a measure of land reform was introduced; female suffrage was granted for the first time; and in addition there was the breaking up of the insidious relationship between the government and shintoism. It was a sound bit of statesmanship and I think whatever may be said about General MacArthur in other fields he deserves credit for the kind of leadership that he gave in a very difficult and critical time in the relations of other free nations with the nation known as Japan.

I want to make reference if I may to what I think is our outmoded system of dealing with treaties such as this. I think our system borders on being a relic of yesterday. I do not think we should be handling a treaty like this one in the way we are, to have it appear simply as a government notice of motion on the order paper without the opportunity to discuss it fully even in committee of the whole house and the minister being able to answer questions only when he finishes the debate. I do not think that is good enough so far as our parliamentary procedure is concerned.

I am not critical in any way of the minister because after all he is simply following the dictates of our parliamentary procedure. We have in this treaty twenty-one pages of fairly closely written clauses, dozens of documents are cited and there are nine complicated protocols and conventions in the declaration alone which none of us have so far seen. In addition to that, several departments of government are involved.

When we have no machinery for dealing with it in committee of the whole I would be quite satisfied to have it dealt with in the standing committee on external affairs. I am supported in that by the fact that in our own Senate they have endorsed the principle of the resolution, as I am endorsing the principle this evening, and when they return somewhere around the end of April or the first of May they will proceed to deal with the treaty clause by clause in their foreign relations committee.

I notice that in Great Britain they deal with these things differently from what we do. I am not so sure that we should not follow Great Britain in dealing with treaties of this kind. There the treaty is brought forward in the form of a bill which is given first reading, second reading, considered in committee and then given third reading. It then goes on to the House of Lords. I read with a good deal of interest what was said on this treaty both on the second reading stage and during the committee stage. It received careful examination and I felt that those who took part in the debate had an exceptional knowledge of the situation as it existed.

Mr. Pearson: May I interrupt the hon. gentleman to inform him that a bill will be introduced in this house to give the government power to carry out the provisions of this treaty after it is ratified, just as was done with the Italian peace treaty.

Mr. Graydon: I am glad to have the minister's explanation on that. My point is that this resolution ought to go to the external affairs committee. It seems to me that before we endorse a treaty of this kind the fullest information ought to be available to the members and to the house. I do not think there is any desire on the part of anyone to place any obstacles in the way of the passage of this commendable treaty, but I do urge that this matter be sent to the external affairs committee before the bill is introduced.

I was interested in reading the debates which took place in the foreign relations committee of the Senate of the United States and also in the Senate itself. Perhaps this is a most appropriate time to mention this as we have just had a budget speech and there are signs of fatigue on every side of the house. When the Senate of the United States dealt with the Japanese treaty it was found that they did not have a quorum of senators. I think that indicates that so far as our national boundaries are concerned there is not such a great difference. The minister has hinted at some urgency in connection with this matter. I would point out that the sixth nation out of the eleven which is necessary to give a majority to provide for the implementation of the treaty was Pakistan. I understand that just a couple of days ago Pakistan approved and ratified the treaty with Japan. I should be glad to go further in my argument to have this referred to the standing committee on external affairs, but perhaps that will not be necessary.

As I see it, there are many questions in the public mind in connection with this treaty that will have to be answered. There is the question of trade, the question of commercial practices, the question of fishery rights, the question of reparations, the question of maritime enterprise, the question of immigration and other questions affecting the social and economic as well as the diplomatic side of the treaty. Some of these matters are extremely delicate in their complexion and design. I am going to leave that suggestion with the minister as it stands in the hope he will accept it. I think he will find there is no delay of a dangerous character involved because the Senate does not come back until the first of May anyway and they will only start to deal with the question at that time.

Following the minister's remarks with respect to the treaty itself in which he said that it did mark the formal conclusion of the state of war, it is also, if I may say so, a step in the right direction of rebuilding the stability and security of the Pacific area. If there is any area at the moment outside of Europe itself that needs attention with respect to rebuilding and security it is that very area. It was pointed out in the British house by Kenneth Younger, M.P., formerly minister of state in the Attlee government, that Japan was in the very nest of problems because there was great communist China on one side, Soviet Russia on the other, and Japan herself, all three at the one time major powers. In addition to that there is the legitimate interest of Britain and the United States and other powers in that very locality. Japan is in a sense sitting on almost the powder keg of the world. I have no doubt that is one of the reasons why this treaty is so unique in its provisions so far as leniency to the Japanese government and Japanese people is concerned.

I think one of the things one gathers from a reading of the treaty is that in a sense it serves as a base from which to approach the wider area of issues because we must not make the mistake of thinking that the treaty by any means settles all the issues either surrounding Japan or in Japan itself. It only takes a step towards solution of them, and Japan's relations with the free world on many fronts remain unsettled and undefined. But it does point the way to such settlement, and half a loaf of course is sometimes better than none. Giving Japan her sovereignty and admitting her into what we think is respectable international society has involved risks. Those risks of course belong to the military, economic and other fields, but on the other hand we had to take some calculated risks in connection with this matter.

One of the things that struck me most was the attitude of the Australian government. The Australian government has interests in that area that perhaps we do not have in quite the same measure. I do not mean to convey that our interests are not of a very important character too but Australia came within an ace of being occupied by the Japanese forces. In reviewing the Japanese treaty the prime minister of Australia, Mr. Menzies, says something which I think is significant. He has this to say:

> . . . it is simple to understand that the instinctive reaction of Australia to any proposal for a Japanese peace settlement is, "Keep them down! Don't let them rearm! Don't trust them!" It is true that history proves that such reactions are ephemeral and sometimes dangerous. But we are not living in a world of historians; we are living in a world of men and women, of widowed wives and bereaved mothers; a world tenaciously attached to a justice which precedes mercy, though it may be tempered by it . . . The United States and the United Kingdom, the two principal free nations, made it clear that they were not prepared to prohibit a substantial measure of Japanese rearmament. And if these great powers were not willing to prohibit, and to enforce that prohibition by supervision and occupation if necessary, how could Australia by herself make a prohibition effective? To that question there was, and is, no real answer.

Then he goes on to say:

> Japan is destined once more, and very rapidly to be a great industrial power. To prohibit this successfully would be to condemn the most virile people in East Asia to poverty, misery and revolution. No greater threat to Asiatic peace could be imagined. To prohibit it unsuccessfully would be to make the worst of both worlds, for power and hatred would be renewed together. Japan will again become a great industrial power more rapidly than she can become a military power; in her case the one depends so much upon the other. But during the intervening period an undefended Japan would be a constant temptation and an easy prey for the territorial imperialism of the communists. We must not forget that one of the checks upon aggression today is the fact that, with western Germany and Japan outside the Soviet orbit, the balance of heavy industrial production weighs down heavily in favour of the free world. Japan must therefore be defended. By whom? Putting aside the question of how far and how long any democracy will be prepared to maintain an army of occupation in a defeated country, a question full of not only economic but psychological and moral considerations, let me look once more at the pure sentiment of it. Armies of occupation in Japan must, having regard to the communist threat, have two functions. One is to keep the peace in Japan against the Japanese. So far our feelings are satisfied. But the other function must be to defend Japan against an external attacker. It would come as a shock to most Australians to be told that as a punishment for the Japanese, Australian troops were in future to defend Japan while the Japanese themselves went smiling and bowing about their affairs of production and commerce. . . The case for a measure of Japanese rearmament is thus complete unless the great powers, that is, the United States and the United Kingdom, are able and willing to do on the grand scale what I am sure Australia would not want to do for any length of time on the small scale.

Then he goes on further to say:

. . . we should be foolish to force a hard and bitter peace upon Japan because we feared that in fifteen or twenty years' time Japan might once more become an aggressor, when the real and deadly and present question is whether, inside the next two years, we shall between us be strong enough to resist, and therefore deter, a vast communist aggression against one manifestation of which we are actually now fighting in Korea. If the United States, with its tremendous world responsibility and its magnificent and unprecedented preparation to discharge it, chooses to see Japan not as a possible future danger but as a present and important factor in world defensive strategy against communism, who can with confidence gamble upon the future course of history and say that it is wrong? And in any case, the United States is taking its risk prudently. Pursuant to article 6 of the treaty the United States is entering into a defensive pact with Japan. Thus, by a double stroke, Japan is made a co-operator in the short-range defence problem and a potential friend in the long run. There are, of course, many people who feel that the Japanese people have, by the joint effects of defeat and occupation, "suffered a sea change" into democracy. I do not believe this for a moment. Democracy is a growth from the soil; it is never imposed from without. Witness the easy and swift collapse of parliamentary self-government in Germany and Italy. It needs a tree with deep roots in a deep soil to withstand the winter gales of tyranny. The real question is not whether Japan has already become democratic (a notion which I frankly do not believe), but whether, to quote the recent words of my colleague, Mr. R. G. Casey, "to permit the Japanese people to recover their self-respect and some measure of economic independence offers the best means of promoting the growth of a workable democracy in Japan."

Then Mr. Menzies goes on:

It is my own deep belief that, though slavery is the breeding ground of revolution, only freedom and free men can bring forth democracy.

Coming from the head of the state which perhaps has more reason to be nervous because of the resurgence of Japan as a great power than almost any other country in the free world, I think that at least gives some indication how far nations are prepared to go in endorsing this plan for dealing with Japan.

[Mr. Graydon.]

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the question to be asked concerning this treaty, which is sometimes described as the softest in the diplomatic history of the world, is simple; and we are giving it a simple answer. The question is, do we want and do we need 83 million Japanese people with us in our efforts to keep the world free and at peace? The answer we are giving is shown by our approval of the resolution now before the house. That answer is yes, as far as the people of Canada are concerned. This treaty will give Japan a chance, by entering into an alliance with the free nations of the world, to link her power in the Orient with that of the United Kingdom, the United States and other countries. I am satisfied, as I am sure the Japanese people are satisfied, that her future is better with us than it would be if she were absorbed into the net of Russian imperialism. If Japan behaves herself in the free world society she has an opportunity to again become a great leader in the Orient. With the soviet it would be a different proposition. Many reasons could be advanced as to why Japan would throw in her lot with us rather than with the soviet regime, to be interlocked and interwoven with that extensive international mechanism known as imperial communism. There she would lose not only her identity and her opportunity to become a great power again; she would also lose her internal relationship with her emperor, which to the Japanese people is still a very important consideration.

As the minister indicated a few moments ago, many of the United States forces will be remaining in Japan, not as occupation forces but under the terms of the security treaty which has been entered into between the United States and Japan. I think this has a bearing on one of the things some of us on this side of the house have been arguing for, without very much effect as yet though I am hoping the day will come when we will be able to tell the minister we are glad he has accepted our suggestion. I refer to the question of a Pacific pact. I am sure the minister must be thinking, "I have answered that fellow so often, surely he must be convinced by now that we cannot do anything about it at this stage." Nevertheless I mention the matter again because I think we have a further argument now by virtue of entering into the Japanese treaty. We cannot go on forever in the Pacific having all these pacts and alliances, without having some kind of master pact to combine them all. We now have a pact between the United States and Australia and New Zealand. We have a pact between United States and Japan, and we have a pact between the United States and the Philippines. These all being mutual security pacts, it seems to me the time is coming when we must have an over-all plan. I think I may interpret the words of Mr. Dean Acheson, Secretary of State for the United States, in that way when he appeared before the senate foreign relations committee during the debate two months ago. This was the only statement made by Mr. Acheson, I think, which has any relation to the problem I am discussing. This is what he said:

> The ratification of these treaties would give courage and hope to millions of people in the Pacific area, whose primary desire is to live at peace with their neighbours. It is our hope that these treaties will serve as a point of departure for the development of an effective system of regional security in the Pacific.

You will note the words "serve as a point of departure"; and with that I rest my case again. I am sure if the minister moves from his present rather static position with respect to the Pacific pact, he will find himself once more in the company of a man in whose company he finds himself perhaps more often than any other diplomat in the world. I am hoping he will follow some of these men who are more experienced than the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sinclair) who during a debate in this house some weeks ago chided the party I represent for advocating such expensive things as the Pacific pact. That was the first time anyone on the government side said it was money that was behind our delay, our reluctance, our refusal to join a Pacific pact. So I hope the minister will take to heart what has been said by a man whom I consider to be rather more experienced in foreign affairs than the hon. member for Coast-Capilano.

A glance at the map of this area will show the great problems which arise from a geographical point of view. There are four islands, Hokkaido to the north, Honshu to the south, Shikoku and Kyushu. I hope I am pronouncing them properly. The minister has not corrected me, so perhaps he does not know any more about it than I do. It is interesting to note that between the northern island of Hokkaido and Russian occupied island of Sakhalin there is a strait only some 60 or 75 miles wide. There is only 200 miles between Honshu and Korea, which indicates that Japan is in the very centre of trouble. She is a close neighbour of red China and also a close neighbour of soviet Russia, and all the time needing raw materials and markets. Those of us who have watched the progress of the Moscow trade conference during the last day or so will recognize, of course, that on the trade front the soviet are again attempting to make a dent in our flank. No doubt they are not overlooking in that meeting the problems which face Japan economically. Not only are they attempting to call a bluff on Japan so far as trade is concerned, but also to sabotage by a movement through the northern island of Hokkaido, which has its origin in Sakhalin to the north. In addition to that, at the moment Japan faces a need for food, for iron, for coking coal and for raw materials for the textile industry. As one member in the British house said, Japan is the only oriental country that has actually measured up to the western world in so far as both technology and production are concerned.

In the past one of Japan's problems has been to try to find the raw materials for 83 million people who are engaged in such extensive and intensive production. This problem got her into trouble before. During the depression Japan's trade practices were largely criticized from one end of the world to the other. She found herself in a very tight corner with respect to these markets and raw materials. One of the problems we shall have to face I think is this. If Japan gets into a tight corner economically, the soviets will take advantage of the situation at every turn. Already the soviets have offered coal to Japan for a third of the price at which it can be delivered from the United States. I believe that is an indication of what Japan, and incidentally this country, have before us by way of problems in the Far East.

In addition to that, of course, the pressure to recognize and deal with red China is great. Some time ago Premier Yoshida of Japan indicated his close attraction for the government on Formosa in contrast to that of red China. Nevertheless, it was not long ago, perhaps a year ago, that the same premier made a statement which I think is evidence of the danger that faces us in that area. He said:

> Red or white, China remains our next door neighbour—economical law will, I believe, prevail in the long run over ideological differences.

I had intended going somewhat further afield in connection with my argument concerning the treaty, but the time is getting late. I am going to close by leaving out the matter of Japan's problem with communism in that area. It is an interesting story, but it is a story that perhaps can be told on another occasion. One of the things we ought to consider very carefully is that Japan is going to need help, and she is going to need understanding from the other sections of the free world in order to restore her position and to permanently retain it. Whatever we may do by way of this treaty of peace, it still remains an uneasy peace for Japan. It is our obligation, it is our duty to do our best to make that peace as firm a peace for the Japanese people as we can.

The admission of Japan into free world circles poses hard-cored problems for Canada.

The minister mentioned two of them. Apparently the problem of fisheries has been reasonably well solved, according to the minister, but naturally one would like to examine more closely what that convention actually includes. I intended to put on the record tonight the story of the imports and exports so far as Japan and Canada were concerned both in 1938-39 and since the war. I believe it would show that the balance generally has been in our favour, which indicates I think that in most instances trade with Japan on a normal, proper and fair basis cannot do this country any harm and will do the Japanese economy a great deal of good. I believe our job will be to find a solution to the problem of preventing Japan from being thrown, economically and commercially, into the hands of communists. At the same time we must maintain our position with respect to trade so that our standard of living and the working people of Canada are protected. I am satisfied a solution of that problem can be arrived at without attempting in any way to throttle the economy of Japan. I believe that we can get together and, without harm to our own industries here, find a large field of trade upon which to draw in order to keep Japan free, even in that disturbed area.

One of the main problems is, of course, in connection with the arbitrary clause in our Customs Act respecting dumping. If Japan becomes a member of the Geneva agreement on trade and tariffs, that section may be put in jeopardy again. I am satisfied these are matters that can be solved, and I am not raising them except to indicate the serious problems that are ahead of us. For many long years the United Kingdom and Japan were faithful allies. Prior to the early twenties their friendship and ours was almost traditional. Today we are witnessing the restoration of that international bond of mutual understanding between the free world and Japan. All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is: May it usher in a new and more constructively peaceful era in our Pacific relations.

On motion of Mr. Coldwell the debate was adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE TO STUDY PROCEDURE

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have spoken to the leaders of the other parties and by leave of the house I move:

That the select committee to consider with Mr. Speaker the procedure of this house, provided by resolution of April 7, consist of: Messrs. Bradette, Brooks, Fleming, Fournier (Hull), Fulton, Harris (Grey-Bruce), Knowles, MacNaught, Pouliot, Quelch and Weir.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall continue this debate, and I understand there are not many speakers. Then, if the house would agree, we would take up the resolution which the Prime Minister put on Votes and Proceedings today concerning the readjustment of representation in the House of Commons. If that did not meet the wishes of the members, though I spoke to the whip of the opposition and he had no objection to that procedure, we could listen to speeches for a certain time and if a member wanted to adjourn the debate we would not object. Then, we would take up a small bill, the appointment of the auditors for the national railways, and resolutions Nos. 7 and 13 on today's order paper. Those would just lead up to the bills. If we had more time, we would find some non-contentious matters.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not think there is any objection to going on with redistribution, provided it is adjourned. There are so many members who are interested in this subject from various parts of the country who have left to go long distances home that I feel if the resolution is explained and, without further debate, is adjourned it would meet the desires and convenience of those members. We can proceed that way.

Mr. Drew: I would not want to give any undertaking that the debate would be immediately adjourned. I agree with the procedure outlined by the Minister of Public Works, but I think we can deal with that when we come to it.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not think we should attempt in any way to conclude it.

Mr. Drew: I agree with that.

Mr. Speaker: Do I understand that there is unanimous consent to proceeding tomorrow with the notice of motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), which will be in Votes and Proceedings but will not appear on the orders of the day. Is that the unanimous wish of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That order of business would come after this actual debate. The debate on the Japanese treaty would have priority.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

GENERAL REVIEW

The first part of 1951 was dominated by strong inflationary pressures, but as the year progressed these became somewhat less severe. The underlying inflationary potential is still high but for the time being, at least, it appears to be under control.

A brief review of the post-war years will put our present problems in perspective. The years 1946 to 1948 were a period of transition from war to peace. This transition was achieved more smoothly and with rather less disturbance than many Canadians had feared. In Canada, as in other countries, we experienced in this period a greater rise in prices than had been expected, but the redeployment of labour from the armed services and the war industries to the tasks of peace was accomplished with far less unemployment and industrial dislocation than most people had dared to hope.

By mid-1948 the reconversion of industry and the redeployment of labour had been largely completed, and for nearly two years, from the summer of 1948 to the late spring of 1950 Canada enjoyed a period of relative economic equilibrium at high levels of employment and income. Price levels remained stable and employment remained high, and not even the sharp United States recession of 1949 nor the devaluation crisis in September of that year seriously disturbed the balance of the Canadian economy.

The spring of 1950 saw the beginning of what seemed to be a new sustained upswing in Canadian economic activity, sparked by a rapid acceleration in the discovery and development of natural resources and re-enforced by the quick rebound in the United States from its recession of the previous summer. Even before the outbreak of hostilities in Korea, 1950 showed signs of developing a situation in which our resources would be fully extended in meeting the programmes of peaceful economic expansion which the Canadian people had set for themselves.

The Korean aggression, with the grave threats it exposed and the serious alarms it engendered, initiated a scramble for inventories all over the world. The world market prices of many staple raw materials—wool, tin, rubber, copper, lead, zinc, oils and fats, hides, cotton and chemicals—rose sharply, and within six months had gone up as much as 50, 100 and even 200 per cent.

The first phase of this new inflationary cycle was largely psychological, stemming as it did from a fear of shortages and higher prices and a consequent scramble for inventories and replacements. Consumers participated in this scramble, particularly in the field of cars and household equipment and appliances. But the real inflationary force created by Korea flowed fundamentally from the necessity and determination throughout the Western world to carry through a speedy and a heavy defensive rearmament programme. The magnitude of the defence programme adopted was clearly one that could not be inserted into an already fully extended economy. To accomplish this defence programme in the time allotted it was necessary simultaneously to restrain consumption, encourage savings, increase productive efficiency and capacity, forego less essential forms of capital expansion, and divert labour and materials to defence and to defence supporting industries.

In a free democratic country governments do not dictate the course of economic affairs, but governments can and should follow policies which guide or steer the economy in the right direction. The general import of government policies should contribute toward restraint where restraint is needed and toward expansion where expansion is needed.

Federal financial and economic policies have been designed to these ends. Consumer spending has been restrained by means of higher personal taxes and higher commodity taxes, especially on commodities that make heavy demands upon critical materials or other critical resources. Monetary policy has been such as to discourage the expansion of credit generally and consumer spending has also been restrained by the Consumer Credit Regulations. Greater savings have been encouraged directly through the more attractive terms of the sixth series of Canada Savings Bonds, as well as by the restraints on spending and by the increase in interest rates generally which has resulted from the rising demand for loan funds in the face of a limited supply.

Capital expansion in the form of new plant and equipment has been restricted in the case of projects which are less essential in the context of present conditions and encouraged in the case of projects related to the broad needs of defence. This selective approach has been made both through the priorities and allocations policies administered by the Department of Defence Production and through the operations of the "deferred depreciation" regulations administered by the Department of Trade and Commerce. In a limited number of cases essential expansion in defence industries has been facilitated by the granting of accelerated depreciation on specialized new plant and equipment, or by direct capital assistance with government funds.

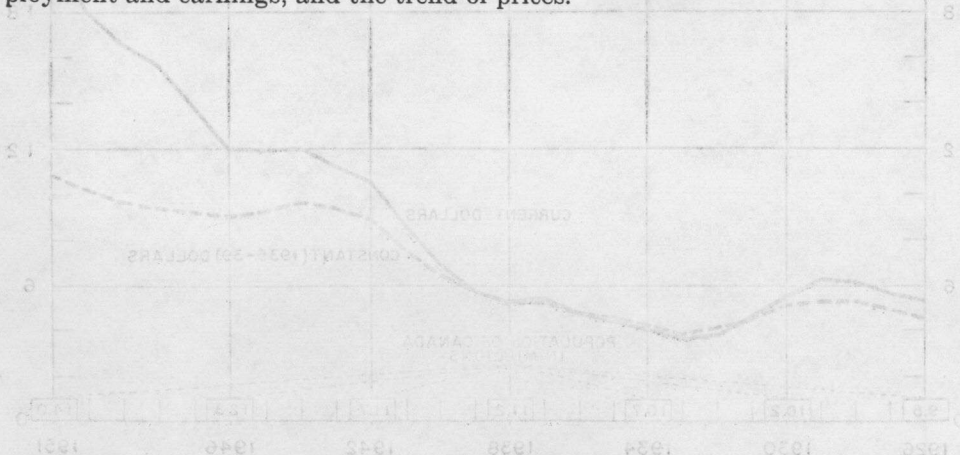
The greater difficulty of borrowing and the higher level of interest rates generally have had a moderating influence on investment in new capital projects, particularly marginal projects, and on investment in investments.

The following table summarizes some of the more significant monetary and credit statistics in recent years:

—	Money Supply (Currency outside banks plus active bank deposits)	Bank Loans plus banks' investments in non-gov't securities	Consumer Credit Outstanding	Long term interest rate (Theoretical yield of a gov't 15 year bond)
	(millions)	(millions)	(millions)	(per cent)
1948 December	$4,335	$3,341	$ 748	2·93
1949 December	4,422	3,419	892	2·75
1950 March	4,446	3,437	859	2·73
June	4,525	3,559	959	2·73
September	4,919	3,618	1,042	2·71
December	4,851	3,950	1,135	2·99
1951 March	4,669	4,101	1,097	3·25
June	4,750	4,133	1,107	3·25
September	4,765	4,112	1,068	3·24
December	4,843	4,085	1,090	3·50
1952 January	4,697	3,984	.....	3·54
February	4,730	3,930	.....	3·55

It will be observed that total money supply and bank loans, after a sharp rise in 1950, have levelled off or declined slightly during 1951, and this trend has been continued into the opening months of 1952. Consumer credit outstanding, which had increased by nearly 30 per cent in 1950, declined by about 4 per cent during 1951. Long term interest rates during the past 18 months have advanced about three-quarters of one per cent.

The following table relating to capital investment in business illustrates the degree to which less essential investment has been restrained and the more essential encouraged.



—	1950	1951	1952 Intentions	Percentage change from 1950
				1951	1952
	(millions of dollars)
Primary and construction industries	$ 697	$ 853	$ 859	+22	+23
Manufacturing	511	755	929	+48	+82
Utilities	720	916	1,130	+27	+57
Trade, finance and commercial	397	396	309	—	−22
Total	$2,325	$2,920	$3,227	+26	+39

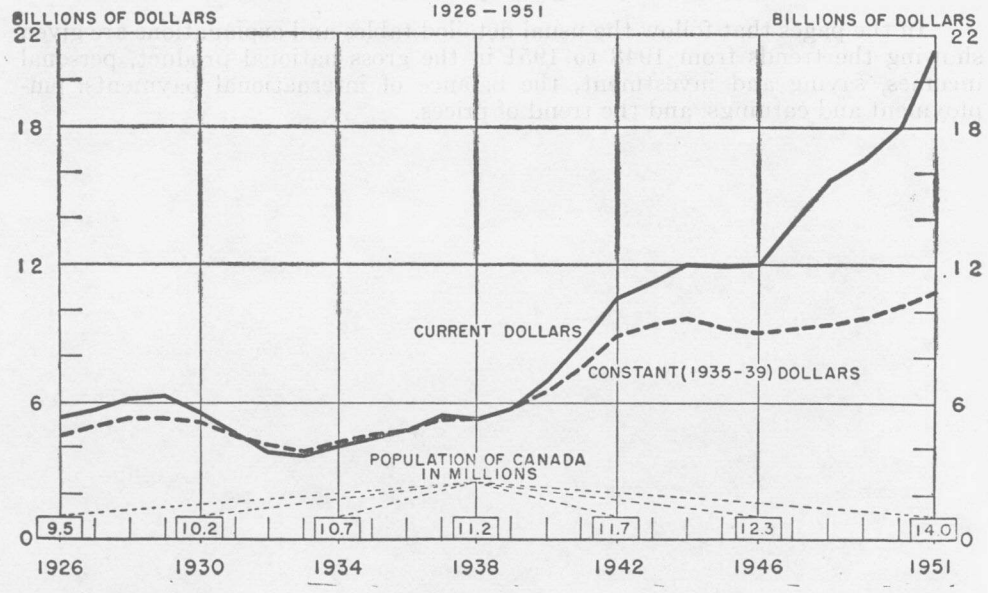
The Department of Trade and Commerce has further estimated that investment intentions for 1952 in the case of industries fully subject to "deferred depreciation" are 17 per cent below 1951, while in the case of industries eligible for normal depreciation they are 15 per cent higher.

The general economic position in the opening months of 1952 is that the inflationary pressures have been brought under control, but that at many points in the economy a strong inflationary potential still exists. Any series of adverse events which sharply raised the present international tensions could bring about a renewal of direct inflationary pressures that might seriously test our economic defences. But at the moment the prospects for 1952 indicate continued high levels of employment and general business activity, without any renewal of overt inflation, and with most of the increased output occurring in the defence and defence supporting sections of the economy.

The inflationary pressures that persist are not evenly distributed through the economy. At some points and in some regions the economy is likely to be fully or more than fully extended. At other points and in other regions the available resources are likely to fall short of full utilization. While these contrasting situations will not persist indefinitely, it may take time to adjust them since resources both in labour and in plant and equipment are not fully or easily transferable, either technically or geographically.

In the pages that follow the usual detailed tables and explanations are given showing the trends from 1948 to 1951 in the gross national product, personal incomes, saving and investment, the balance of international payments, employment and earnings, and the trend of prices.

THE NATIONAL ACCOUNTS



National Income, Product and Expenditure

National Income is the total of the annual earnings of Canadian residents from the production of goods and services. As such it includes salaries, wages and other forms of employee earnings in cash or in kind, as well as military pay and allowances. It includes corporation profits, interest, net rent, and the net income of farmers and others who are in business on their own account.

Gross National Product is the value at market prices of all the goods and services produced in a year by the labour, capital, and enterprise of Canadian residents. It is measured by adding together the costs of production. Part of these costs of production are the factor costs or, more simply, the earnings of the factors of production, labour, capital and enterprise; and the total of these factor costs is National Income. Indirect taxes and other costs such as depreciation allowances also enter into the cost of goods and services although they do not form part of the income of Canadians. They are, therefore, added to National Income to obtain Gross National Product. Subsidies on the other hand may be regarded as offsets to costs of production and are therefore deducted.

Gross National Expenditure measures the same aggregate as Gross National Product but in a different way. The goods and services produced in a year are either sold at home or abroad or added to inventories. Thus Gross National Expenditure is obtained by adding together all sales and adjusting them for imports and changes in inventories. While Canadian expenditure on imported goods and services is included in the total sales to consumers, to governments, and to business for capital account, it is not part of the disposition of Canadian production and is therefore deducted. But since foreign expenditures on Canadian goods and services, i.e., exports, form part of the earnings of Canadians in the Gross National Product, they are included in Gross National Expenditure.

GROSS NATIONAL EXPENDITURE
IN CURRENT AND CONSTANT (1935-39) DOLLARS

National Income and Product

Gross National Product reached $21,241 million in 1951, an increase of 17 per cent over 1950. After allowing for the upward movement of prices which amounted to 11 per cent, it is estimated that the real increase in product was rather more than 5 per cent.

Since the present estimates of change in real product are only approximate, they must be used with some caution in assessing the importance of the gain for a given year or in comparing it with other years. However, it appears that the percentage gain in real product for 1951 was greater than the increase during 1950 and comparable to the combined increases of the two years 1948 and 1949. A significant factor in the increase in product, and one which did not operate in 1950 was the growth in the employed labour force of about 2½ per cent. This was partly offset, however, by a decline of 1 per cent in average weekly hours worked.

A substantial part of the estimated 5 per cent increase in real product, perhaps one-quarter, was due to increased agricultural production, particularly the western grain crop. Because of poor weather, part of this crop remained unharvested in 1951 and thus constituted an involuntary addition to inventories. It is an increase in real product which remains to some extent in doubt, and one which had no positive impact on the economy in 1951. Elsewhere in the economy, although output was higher for the year as a whole, some significant changes occurred during the course of the year in both the pace and pattern of production. Thus while the index of industrial production averaged 212·0 for 1951, or 6·9 per cent above the average for 1950, it rose to a peak of 223·4 in May from which it declined to 200·3 in December. A very significant factor in this rise and decline was the change in demand for consumer goods, particularly durables and textiles which weakened greatly after the first four months of the year, and resulted in a sharp curtailment of production. The increase in expenditures for defence and resource development, which became more important as the year advanced, was not sufficient to offset the effects of reduced demand for consumer goods, so that the index fell at year end below the levels reached late in 1950. Real product for the year as a whole showed an increase over 1950 because of the steady advances in production for defence and resource development, and because the very heavy production of consumer goods in the first part of the year offset the declines in the last half.

Farm income showed a very large increase of 38 per cent. This was due to higher prices, particularly for livestock and to an increase in the volume of agricultural production. A very large factor in the increased production was the western grain crop, estimated at 30 per cent above 1950 and 35 per cent above the ten year average. A substantial part of this crop is still not harvested.

The earnings of wage and salary workers rose by 17 per cent during 1951, largely as the result of higher wage rates, although the number of paid workers was on the average about 6 per cent above 1950 levels. This gain in labour income is much larger than the increase of 7 per cent recorded between 1949 and 1950. Military pay and allowances increased by $64 million or approximately 50 per cent.

Investment income increased by 18 per cent over 1950 compared with an increase of 26 per cent between 1949 and 1950. This somewhat more modest advance was due to the less rapid increase in corporate profits which constitute the bulk of investment income. In 1950, for example, corporate profits before tax rose by 28 per cent compared with an estimated increase of 16 per cent in 1951. In contrast to labour income, corporate profits were more responsive to the upsurge of inflationary pressure after the outbreak of war in Korea and rather more sensitive to the lessening of that pressure in the latter part of 1951.

National Expenditure

In addition to the estimated increase of more than 5 per cent in Canadian real product, imports of goods and services exceeded exports by $534 million in 1951 compared with an excess of $329 million in 1950. Taking both these factors into account, therefore, Canadians used about 6 per cent more goods and services in 1951 than in 1950.

This increased product went for defence and capital purposes, many of which were defence supporting, rather than for consumer expenditure. It is estimated that personal expenditure on consumer goods and services rose by 10 per cent during 1951 but that all of this increase was accounted for by rising prices.

[2] Minor adjustments have been made to the figures of current receipts and payments shown in Table 12 and in "The Canadian Balance of International Payments, 1926 to 1950", Dominion Bureau of Statistics, to achieve consistency with the other component series.

Of all expenditures, those made by the federal government for defence showed the largest percentage increase rising from $493 million in the calendar year 1950 to $1,160 million in the calendar year 1951. This increase claimed about one-half of the nation's total gain in real output for 1951.

While federal government defence spending showed the largest percentage increase, the increase in expenditure for gross domestic investment was equally significant in absolute terms. Investment in plant, equipment and housing increased by $591 million, an increase of 18 per cent in value or about 7 per cent in volume terms. Investment for these purposes thus absorbed 18 per cent of the nation's total output in 1951, a proportion relatively unchanged from that of the previous year. In addition, inventory accumulation is shown at the record level of $1,650 million or $645 million higher than in 1950; but this figure needs qualification. Approximately $370 million of the total change in inventories represents the value of the physical change in farm inventories. Of the balance, however, a very considerable part reflects an increase in the prices at which year-end inventories are valued rather than an increase in the volume of inventories held. In volume terms business inventories increased by 12 per cent in 1951 compared with 10 per cent in 1950.

Personal Income and Its Disposition

For the purpose of showing the relationship between the incomes, spending and saving of Canadians, Personal Income is a more useful concept than National Income.

Personal Income differs from National Income in a number of ways. It is defined as the sum of current receipts of income regardless of whether these receipts are earnings from production. Thus it includes only that part of corporation profits which is actually received by Canadian persons as dividends. Similarly deductions must also be made from employees' total earnings for unemployment insurance contributions or pension contributions which, although forming part of the compensation for services performed, are not actually received by the employee within the year. On the other hand, transfer payments such as family allowances, old age pensions, veterans' benefits and charitable contributions of corporations, are part of personal income although they are not payments for services and, therefore, do not form part of National Income.

[2] Excludes undistributed profits of the Wheat Board and an inventory revaluation adjustment on a calendar year basis for grain held by the Wheat Board.

A special adjustment is necessary for farm income since the farmer does not receive full payment for his grain at the time it is delivered to the Wheat Board. An initial payment is made upon delivery and subsequent payments adjust for the full price realized by the Board. Thus for a time a part of the farmer's income accumulates with the Wheat Board. For purposes of national income, net farm income is shown in table 1 on an accrued basis and includes income accumulated with the Wheat Board on behalf of farmers. For purposes of personal income, however, an adjustment is necessary to exclude such accumulated income and to include only the disbursements of the Wheat Board whether in respect of current or prior years' deliveries.

Personal Income rose by $2,361 million or 18 per cent during 1951. The largest part of this increase was due to the gain of $1,312 million in salaries and wages net of employer and employee contributions to social insurance and government pension funds. Net income received by farmers rose very sharply by 52 per cent, while net incomes from other unincorporated business increased by only 5 per cent. The rise in farm receipts was accentuated by larger Wheat Board disbursements. Dividends paid out by corporations increased by 2 per cent. Transfer payments were the only source of personal income which fell below 1950 levels and the decline in these was slight. The gain in personal income on a per capita basis appears to have been greater than the rise in prices of consumer goods and services.

On the expenditure side, some significant changes took place during 1951. Personal direct taxes increased by $281 million or 38 per cent owing to the combined effect of rising incomes and higher income tax rates.

In spite of higher taxes, however, disposable income, or personal income after payment of taxes increased by $2,080 million or 16 per cent in 1951. Excluding the portion of this increase which is accounted for by the rise of $370 million in farm inventories, the balance of $1,710 million might have gone to swell the total of personal expenditure on consumer goods and services. In fact however, $641 million or 38 per cent of it went to increase the volume of personal saving. Thus personal saving, excluding change in farm inventories, increased from 5·7 per cent of disposable income in 1950 to 9·3 per cent in 1951, a ratio approximating those of 1948 and 1949. It appears that the rise in expenditure on consumer durables in 1950, which contributed substantially to the lower level of saving in that year, was accompanied by a sharp increase in consumer debt; and that repayment of this debt in 1951 was an important factor in restoring the savings ratio to 1948-1949 levels.

The extraordinarily high level of consumer durable goods purchases in the first quarter of 1951 gave way during the rest of the year to greatly reduced spending so that expenditures on these commodities were for the year as a whole unchanged from 1950 in value and significantly below in volume. A combination of several factors appears to have been responsible for this trend. In some fields the backlog of post-war demand had been met and in others the market had been narrowed by advance buying in anticipation of shortages or higher prices. Heavier excise taxes and restrictions on consumer credit were further deterrents. In the non-durable group clothing purchases were reduced, but food consumption remained close to 1950 levels. Only in the case of services was there a greater volume of purchases and this increase was on a moderate scale. After adjusting for price changes, the level of total consumer expenditure seems to have remained unchanged in 1951. In per capita terms the preliminary estimates indicate a decline of about 2 per cent.

Source and Disposition of Saving

Saving may be regarded as the source from which investment expenditure is financed. Income arising out of production may either be spent or saved. At the same time production will be absorbed either by consumption expenditure, or by investment expenditure at home for new plant, equipment, housing, or additions to inventory, or by investment abroad. Saving must therefore equal investment. It is, therefore, possible to construct tables which show, on the one hand, the sources of saving and, on the other, the use of these savings to finance gross investment at home or investment abroad.

In addition to personal saving which was mentioned there can be government saving and business saving. If, for example, governments have a surplus of revenue over expenditure, this surplus constitutes part of the nation's saving. If there are government deficits they are an offset to the total of private saving by individuals and businesses.

During 1951 the composition of saving changed substantially. Personal saving increased by $880 million, government saving by $371 million while business saving, including undistributed Wheat Board trading profits, declined by $37 million. As a result business saving in 1951 was relatively less important as a source of funds for the rapidly growing investment demand at home. Less than 45 per cent of gross domestic investment was financed from business saving during 1951, compared with almost 60 per cent in 1950.

Personal saving of $1,740 million in 1951 was equal to 12 per cent of personal income after payment of direct taxes. It constituted slightly less than 35 per cent of the nation's saving from all sources in 1951 compared with approximately 22 per cent in 1950, 30 per cent in 1949, and 27 per cent in 1948. Even excluding the large saving of $370 million in the form of farm inventories, which was to some extent involuntary, personal saving showed a marked recovery from the low level of 1950. While a good part of the increase in saving took the form of a reduction in consumer debt, there was also some increase in liquid saving.

In 1951 more than 21 per cent of the nation's saving was made up of the combined surplus of federal, provincial and municipal governments, compared with less than 18 per cent in 1950. This government saving was largely the result of the federal surplus, since little more than 3 per cent of it was due to the surpluses of all provincial and municipal governments combined.

In 1951, as in 1950, there was an increase in net foreign indebtedness since imports of goods and services again exceeded exports. The deficit on current account was financed by a net inflow of capital, largely from the United States, rather than by a reduction in Canada's reserves of foreign exchange. A good part of the capital inflow was the result of Canadian borrowing abroad. But to some extent the movement was initiated outside the country; and capital flowed into Canada in response to opportunities for direct investment, thus contributing to the deficit on current account while furnishing the funds to finance it. Looking at Canadian investment as a whole, the increase in net foreign indebtedness constituted a substantial offset to gross domestic investment in 1951.

Business saving consists for the most part of amounts set aside for depreciation and undistributed profits. In 1951 an increase of $400 million in corporation profits before taxes brought the total to $2,850 million. The rate of increase was much below the 28 per cent increase shown for 1950. While corporate profits increased by $400 million during 1951 the liability for corporation taxes is estimated to have increased by $421 million so that there was a reduction of 1 per cent in corporation profits after taxes. This, together with the increase of 2 per cent or $15 million in dividends paid out during 1951, brought about a reduction of $36 million or approximately 5 per cent in undistributed corporation profits.

Investment and Capital Expenditure

Investment in plant, equipment and housing continued to increase and formed a slightly larger share of gross national expenditure in 1951. In construction, a shift to non-residential uses took place during 1951, leaving residential building at a physical level about 16 per cent below 1950. The value of new machinery and equipment showed a very great increase, rising about 30 per cent above 1950 levels. The increase in investment in inventories constituted an even larger amount in dollar terms. Apart from changes in farm inventories however, a very large part of the dollar figure shown represents a change in the prices at which year-end inventories are valued, rather than the value of the physical change. As indicated above the volume increase in business inventories is estimated at 12 per cent for 1951 compared with 10 per cent for 1950. The very heavy demand for inventory which characterized the early part of 1951 gave way in the third and fourth quarters to a more cautious policy. Consequently most of the inventory accumulation took place in the first and second quarters and the record holdings at year-end appear to have been to some extent, involuntary.

Table 9 gives an industrial distribution of business capital expenditures and brings them together with public capital outlays included under government expenditure in Table 2. The total of public and private capital expenditure increased by $766 million or 20 per cent during 1951. In real terms the increase is estimated at 9 per cent. The increase in both value and volume of capital expenditure during 1951 was more than double the increase experienced in 1950.

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE CAPITAL EXPENDITURE

The pattern of investment during 1951 underwent a change in emphasis and was increasingly directed towards defence and defence-supporting industries. Well over two-thirds of the increase in total capital expenditure of $766 million was undertaken by three groups: manufacturing, utilities and government departments. The outlay in manufacturing showed an increase for the first time since 1948, expanding by 50 per cent over 1950. Major contributions were made to this increase by heavy industries, particularly steel, aircraft and shipbuilding as well as the chemical group. Expenditures made by utilities including transportation and communications advanced by about $200 million to a total of over $900 million and accounted for almost 20 per cent of all capital investment. Capital expenditure by government departments was up by $138 million or 31 per cent. About 70 per cent of this increase was accounted for by federal government outlays and went for defence purposes and capital assistance. Investment in the primary industries remained high in 1951, increasing by $142 million or 23 per cent. The expansion in the development of oil and base metal resources and in woods operations was particularly noteworthy. The service sector underwent practically no change from the previous year, while the outlay for institutions increased moderately.

Revenue and Expenditure of All Governments

In Table 10 "Government Transactions Related to the National Accounts" an attempt is made to bring together in one statement and under uniform headings, the activities of all governments in Canada on a calendar year basis.

The table is designed to include only those transactions which have relevance for the National Accounts, and consequently the surpluses or deficits shown here do not agree with those shown in the various public accounts. It has been necessary to adjust the conventional accounting statements of fiscal year revenue and expenditure to exclude purely bookkeeping transactions such as those relating to reserves, write-offs, amortization, and other non-cash items, as well as the purchase and sale of existing capital assets; and to include the transactions of extra-budgetary funds such as unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation and government pension funds. Government loans and investments, and debt retirement, are not included in government expenditure.

In the federal accounts, some of the more substantial adjustments are as follows: elimination of reserve for possible losses on active assets, elimination of reserve for veterans' conditional benefits, elimination of expenditures charged with respect to the assumption of Newfoundland debt in 1949, elimination of expenditures charged with respect to shipment of World War II military equipment to N.A.T.O. countries, addition of expenditures out of Defence Equipment Replacement Account, elimination of write-down of active assets to non-active account, adjustment of corporation taxes to an accrual basis, inclusion of the change in inventories of government commodity agencies and the Defence Production Revolving Fund, and elimination of sales of war assets. In addition, the federal figures are adjusted to a calendar year basis by using the monthly figures published by the Comptroller of the Treasury.

Municipalities are for the most part on a calendar year basis but the provincial figures are based on the provincial fiscal years. Because of the lack of current information the 1951 figures for provincial and municipal governments involve a considerable element of estimation.

Federal government expenditure on goods and services increased by $710 million or 73 per cent in 1951. More than 90 per cent of this increase was due to accelerated defence spending. Although the increase in defence spending was not as great as had been planned, it absorbed about one-half of the nation's increased product for 1951. This increase does not reflect the full impact of the defence program on the economy since the larger part of the increase in private capital investment during 1951 was also directed to defence and defence supporting industries. Federal non-defence spending on goods and services, on the other hand, increased by less than 10 per cent and when account is taken of price increases, the use of the nation's product for these purposes was approximately unchanged. The increase in provincial and municipal expenditure on goods and services for 1951 is estimated at 6 per cent. Here too no increase in real terms is indicated when account is taken of prices.

The combined total of transfer payments for all levels of government remained approximately unchanged from the calendar year 1950, with decreases at the federal level more or less offset by increases in provincial and municipal transfers. The major declines were in payments to veterans and in unemployment insurance benefits while increases occurred in family allowances, old age pensions and provincial and municipal grants to hospitals.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES ON GOODS AND SERVICES
AS A PERCENTAGE OF GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT

Although federal government expenditures were markedly higher because of the defence program, revenues rose even more sharply. This was due to a combination of higher rates and higher levels of prices and incomes with the influence of the latter factors predominating. Total federal revenues for the calendar year 1951 were $1,094 million or 36 per cent higher than in 1950. The largest increase was in direct taxes on persons and corporations which were $653 million or 41 per cent higher. The accrued liability for corporation taxes increased markedly because of higher corporation profits and the imposition of the defence surcharge of 20 per cent for the full year. It should be emphasized however that direct taxes on corporations are shown for purposes of the National Accounts on an accrued basis to correspond with estimates of corporation income and hence are considerably higher for 1951 than actual receipts of revenue by the government.

For all levels of government, indirect taxes exceeded direct taxes by 19 per cent in 1948, 22 per cent in 1949 and 14 per cent in 1950; but in 1951 the two were approximately equal. This change was brought about by the heavier liability for federal direct taxes in 1951.

As calculated for National Accounts purposes, federal government revenues increased a great deal more rapidly during the calendar year 1951 than did expenditures. Consequently, the surplus increased from $686 million in the calendar year 1950 to $1,031 million in the calendar year 1951. This federal surplus constituted 20 per cent of the nation's total saving and was, therefore, a very substantial anti-inflationary factor. Combined provincial and municipal government revenue and expenditure on the other hand were more nearly in balance.

The federal surplus shown for National Accounts purposes differs substantially from the public accounts surplus, not only because of the difference between the calendar and the fiscal year, but because of other adjustments made to both revenues and expenditures to make the presentation consistent with figures shown for other sectors of the economy. A reconciliation table has, therefore, been appended to the government table which summarizes the major adjustments.

GOVERNMENT DIRECT AND INDIRECT TAXATION
AS A PERCENTAGE OF GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT
1939 — 1951

Direct taxes include taxes on personal and corporate income, succession duties and personal fees.
Indirect taxes include taxes on commodities, services, real property and business fees.

BALANCE OF INTERNATIONAL PAYMENTS

When goods are exported, unless they are given away, they give rise to payments or debts in favour of Canada. Similarly, when goods are imported they give rise to payments or debts in favour of the rest of the world. Other transactions such as interest and dividend payments, the tourist trade, freight and shipping charges, also give rise to similar payments or debts in either direction. The difference between the debits and credits arising from these current transactions is referred to as the net balance of international payments on current account. When total debits exceed total credits within a year, as was the case in 1950 and 1951, Canada goes into debt to the rest of the world or the rest of the world pays off some of its debt to Canada. When total credits exceed total debits as was the case for many years previous to 1950, the net position is, of course, reversed.

During 1951, Canada's transactions on international account expanded greatly; exports of goods and services increased by 26 per cent and imports by 31 per cent over 1950. Largely because of the rapid rise of import prices in the first half of 1951, the annual index of import prices showed a slightly greater increase over 1950 than did the index of export prices. This is another way of saying that our imports were on the average a little more costly in terms of exports than they had been in 1950. However, the terms of trade, or the prices which we pay for imported goods and services in terms of our exports, moved very much in our favour during the latter part of the year. This is indicated by the fact that the index of export prices advanced more or less steadily throughout the year from 115·9 in January to 125·8 in December, while the index of import prices which rose rapidly from 119·9 in January to 129·9 in June, had declined by December to 121·6.

In volume terms exports advanced by 9 per cent and imports by 11 per cent. The growth in the excess of imports over exports in 1951 added about one-half of 1 per cent to the supply of goods and services available for Canadians. A large part of the increase in imports took the form of increased purchases of defence items and capital goods.

The deficit on current account for 1951 was $524 million, or $195 million more than the year before. Most of the change is accounted for in merchandise trade where the small favourable balance of 1950 was replaced in 1951 by a deficit of $153 million. The deficit on merchandise account arose in the first six months of the year when imports were exceptionally heavy. In the last half of the year a decline in the value of imports coupled with a sharp rise in the value of exports produced a substantial merchandise surplus and this change in the situation appears to have carried forward into 1952. The change in the terms of trade in the last half of 1951 was an important factor contributing to this surplus. All other current account items gave rise to a net deficit of $371 million in 1951 compared to $339 million in 1950. The most important changes within these figures were a decline in our adverse balance on interest and dividend account of $51 million and a reversal of our tourist account balance from +$49 million to −$9 million.

BALANCE OF INTERNATIONAL PAYMENTS

The geographical distribution of the net balance on current account changed substantially during 1951 and showed a reversal of the movement towards a closer balance with the principal trading areas which had occurred in the previous year. The increase in imports from the United States far outstripped the increase in exports and the deficit on current account increased from $403 million in 1950 to $955 million in 1951. In contrast with the large deficit with the United States, Canada's overall export surplus with overseas countries rose by $357 million to a total of $431 million. Of particular importance was the sharp advance of $228 million in exports of goods and services to the United Kingdom and of $183 million to other O.E.E.C. countries. Transactions with the rest of the sterling area, although on a higher level compared to the previous year, resulted in little change in the net balance while a small credit vis-a-vis all other countries developed during 1951.

Despite the current account deficit, Canada's official reserves of gold and U.S. dollars rose by $37 million. The capital inflow, largely from the United States, although considerably smaller than the capital inflow of 1950, was thus more than sufficient to offset the current account deficit. The available details of transactions on capital account in 1951 are compared in the following table with similar transactions in 1950:

EMPLOYMENT AND EARNINGS

Labour income during 1951 was estimated at $9,640 million, 17 per cent above 1950. The annual average earned income per paid worker rose from $2,316 in 1950 to $2,551 in 1951.

Average weekly earnings in nine leading non-agricultural industries averaged $49.61 in 1951 compared to $44.84 in 1950. The December figure was $52.41 for 1951 and $46.63 in 1950. Hourly earnings in manufacturing were $1.24 at the end of 1951 compared with $1.08 a year earlier. These gains appear to have been sufficient to maintain the real value of weekly earnings.

Part of the increase in total labour income is accounted for by the higher level of employment reached during 1951. The number of people employed throughout the year averaged 5,175,000, an increase of 129,000, or 2·6 per cent over 1950. The increase was more pronounced during the first half than during the second half of the year. In manufacturing, for instance, between January and June, 1951, employment was 8·8 per cent higher than during the same period of 1950; between July and December, it was 5·4 per cent higher.

The easing in the demand for labour during 1951 was especially marked in certain consumer goods industries where it resulted in non-seasonal lay-offs and a shorter working week. In manufacturing, the average number of hours worked per week fell to 41·8 from 42·3. The percentage of the employed labour force working 35 or more hours per week declined slightly.

Short-time and non-seasonal lay-offs are reflected in the increase in the number of persons registered at National Employment Service offices. During January and February, 1952, unplaced applicants averaged 332,000 and 369,000 respectively. The comparable figures for January and February, 1951, were 273,000 and 302,000. This is the period of highest seasonal unemployment.

Persons without jobs and seeking work averaged 109,000, or 2·1 per cent of the labour force during 1951, compared to 171,000, or 3·3 per cent during the preceding year.

The civilian labour force, which includes both the employed and unemployed, averaged 5,284,000, 67,000 more than during 1950. The rate of participation in the labour force was the same in both years: 53·7 per cent of the non-institutional civilian population over 14 years of age. The number of persons in the agricultural labour force continued to fall during 1951. The loss of 79,000 persons, however, was more than offset by an increase of 146,000 in the size of the non-agricultural labour force. The sex composition of the labour force was substantially unchanged. During 1951, 218 out of every 1,000 workers were women; in 1950, 214 were women.

In addition to the civilian labour force there were 85,000 in the armed forces at the end of 1951 compared with 60,000 at the end of 1950.

PRICE TRENDS

After the outbreak of war in Korea the period of relative price stability which had prevailed for more than 18 months, gave way to rapidly rising prices. This was particularly true for the latter half of 1950 and the early months of 1951. In the whole period from the outbreak of war in Korea to the present time the wholesale price index rose by slightly less than 11 per cent and the cost-of-living index by almost 13 per cent.

For the year 1951 as a whole, wholesale prices averaged 13·7 per cent above 1950. The larger part of this rise, however, was confined to the first quarter. Subsequent small increases carried it to a peak in July from where it steadily declined. Thus, in December 1951, wholesale prices were only 2·3 per cent above those prevailing at the beginning of the year. This decline has persisted into 1952 with the wholesale price index for February a further 2·1 per cent below December 1951, and a full 2·5 per cent below February 1951. Prices of fully and chiefly manufactured goods followed exactly the trend of the total index. The index of Canadian farm products, however, showed a more rapid increase during the first quarter of 1951 and, in spite of some decline in the spring, reached a peak in July at a point more than 10 per cent above the beginning of the year. By February, 1952, it had once more declined to the level of January, 1951.

Except for a slight decline of 0·1 points during December, the cost-of-living index rose in each month of 1951. For the year as a whole the increase amounted to 11 per cent but most of the rise was confined to the first two quarters in which there was an increase of 9 per cent compared with an increase of 2 per cent in the last two quarters. The increase in the cost-of-living index during the last six months of 1951 was offset by declines in February and March of 1952 so that the index at March 1 again approximated the level of August, 1951.

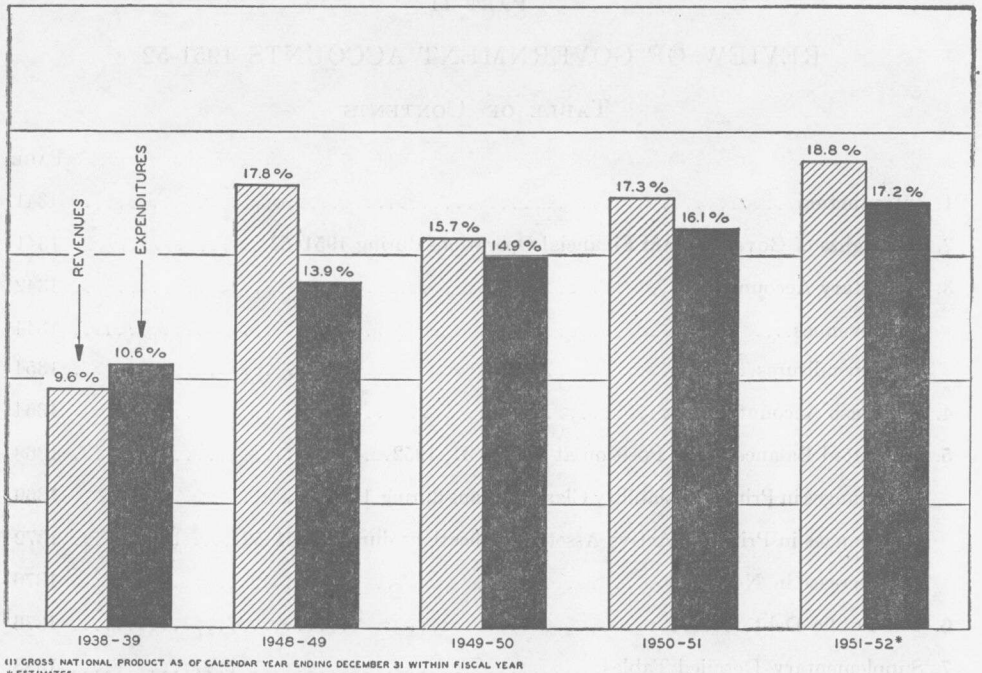
PART II



REVIEW OF GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS 1951-52

1. INTRODUCTION

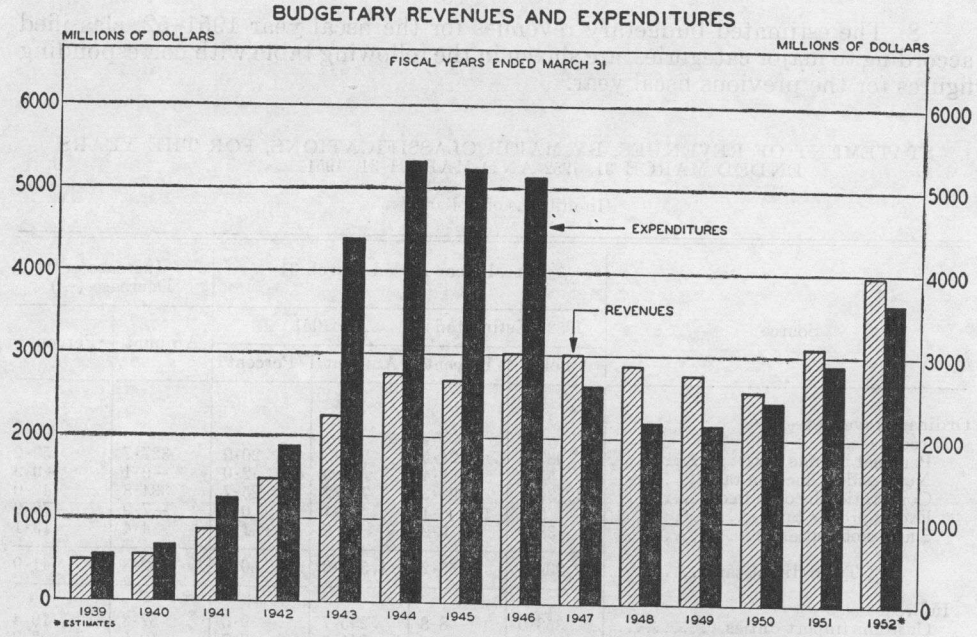
1. Although the Government's fiscal year ended on March 31st, the books must remain open for several weeks after that date in order to record various adjusting entries and to take into account all payments up to and including April 30th made on account of expenditures originating in, and properly chargeable to, the fiscal year 1951-52. Consequently, as it will be some considerable time before final figures for the year will be available, the figures appearing in this Part must be regarded as preliminary and subject to revision.

2. HIGHLIGHTS OF GOVERNMENTAL FINANCIAL OPERATIONS DURING 1951-52

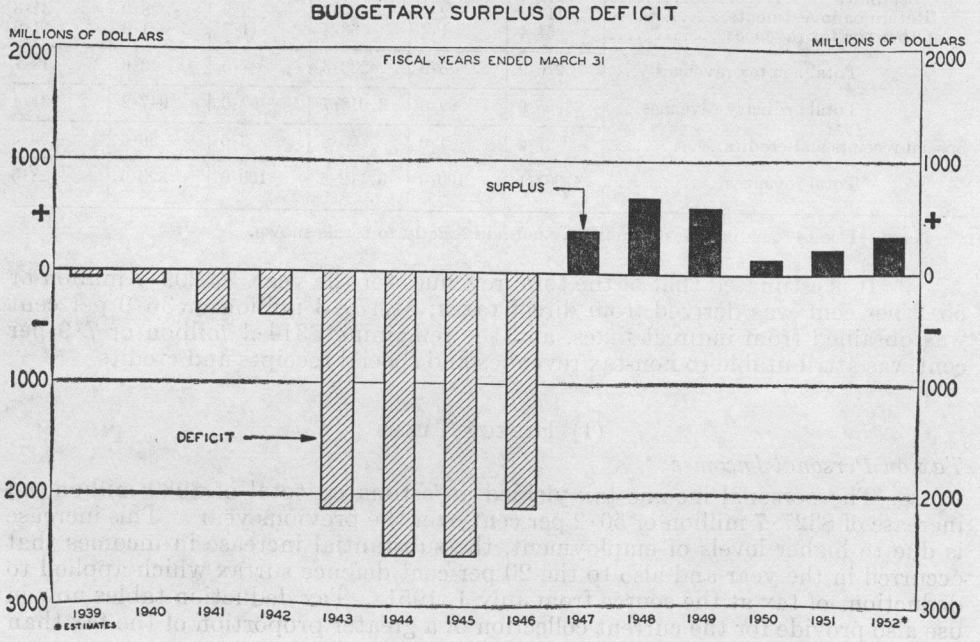
2. The revenues of the Government for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1952, which are now estimated at $4,003 million, were the largest total on record, and approximately $890 million or 28 per cent more than the total for the preceding year. Expenditures are estimated at $3,647 million, a total which was exceeded only in the four war years 1942-43 to 1945-46 inclusive. On the basis of these figures it would appear that the surplus is probably something in the neighbourhood of $356 million, compared with $211 million for the year ended March 31, 1951. The fiscal year 1951-52 is therefore the sixth consecutive year in which the financial operations of the Government resulted in a budgetary surplus. As a result, the Government's net debt (the excess of total liabilities over total active assets) has been reduced by an equivalent amount. This brings to a total of $2,344 million the amount by which the Government has reduced its net debt during those six years, a reduction approximately equivalent to the amount by which the net debt increased during the first three and one-half years after the outbreak of war in 1939.

3. Although the budgetary surplus for 1951-52 is estimated at $356 million, the Government made loans, advances and other non-budgetary disbursements of about $653 million, and, at the same time, purchased or retired outstanding funded debt in the hands of the public to the extent of some $456 million. The manner in which this has been achieved can only be understood by taking an over-all view of the Government's cash transactions for the fiscal year. As explained in greater detail in the section on "The Cash Accounts", all the Government's cash receipts and disbursements are not reflected in the budgetary accounts, nor do all budgetary transactions result in the inflow or outgo of cash. Substantial amounts are received and paid out for extra-budgetary purposes (such as the loans and advances which the Government is required to make and the transactions in connection with the many superannuation, insurance, pension, annuity and deposit and trust accounts which it has undertaken to hold or administer). On the other hand, a substantial part of the budgetary revenues and expenditures are merely of an accounting or bookkeeping nature and do not result in the receipt or disbursement of cash.

4. As would appear from the foregoing, the Government's estimated budgetary surplus for the fiscal year of $356 million does not reflect the full impact of Government operations upon the Canadian economy. After adjusting the budgetary surplus for non-cash transactions, it is estimated that an amount of $809 million remains. This sum, together with $234 million received from repayments of loans, investments and working capital advances, net insurance, pension and annuity contributions, and other non-budgetary cash receipts, made $1,043 million cash available for making necessary loans, investments and other extra-budgetary outlay. These non-budgetary disbursements are estimated at $653 million and include $200 million advanced to the Minister of Finance Exchange Fund to finance the increase in our foreign exchange reserves consequent upon the flow of investment capital into Canada from abroad; some $95 million used to acquire materials essential to our defence program; approximately $70 million advanced to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for house construction and for housing loans; $139 million loaned to the C.N.R. for capital expenditures on additions and betterments and the acquisition of new rolling stock and equipment, etc.; about $51 million to replace equipment furnished to North Atlantic Treaty countries under section 3 of The Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and net pension payments of $55 million out of the Old Age Security Fund.



5. After taking into account all these transactions it is now estimated that the cash surplus for the fiscal year amounted to approximately $390 million. By using this amount and by allowing the Government's cash balances to be reduced by $66 million, funded debt amounting to $300 million was retired and securities amounting to $156 million were acquired by the Government (mainly for the Unemployment Insurance Fund and the Securities Investment Account).



3. THE BUDGETARY ACCOUNTS

6. The table which follows gives a summarized statement of estimated revenues and expenditures and surplus for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1952, with the comparable figures for the four preceding fiscal years:

—	Fiscal Years Ended March 31
	1948	1949	1950	1951	1952 (Estimated)
	(In millions of dollars)

Surplus	676·1	595·5	131·5	211·3	355·7

7. Total revenues, estimated at $4,003·1 million for 1951–52, are expected to show an increase of $890·6 million over the total for the previous fiscal year. Total expenditures are estimated at $3,647·4 million or $746·2 million more than he corresponding total for 1950–51.

9. It is estimated that of the total revenues for the year, $2,209·7 million or 55·2 per cent was derived from direct taxes; $1,479·3 million or 36·9 per cent was obtained from indirect taxes, and the remaining $314·1 million or 7·9 per cent was attributable to non-tax revenues and special receipts and credits.

(1) Direct Taxes

Tax on Personal Incomes

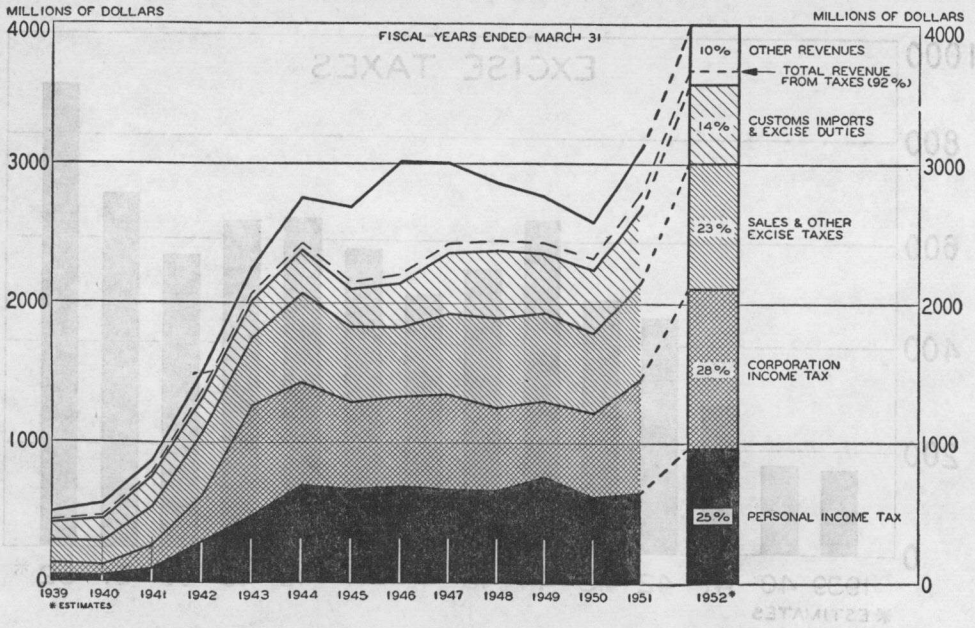
10. The personal income tax yielded an estimated total of $980 million, an increase of $327·7 million or 50·2 per cent over the previous year. This increase is due to higher levels of employment, the substantial increase in incomes that occurred in the year and also to the 20 per cent defence surtax which applied to deductions of tax at the source from July 1, 1951. Tax deduction tables now in use also provide for the current collection of a greater proportion of the tax than previous tables.

Non-resident Income Taxes

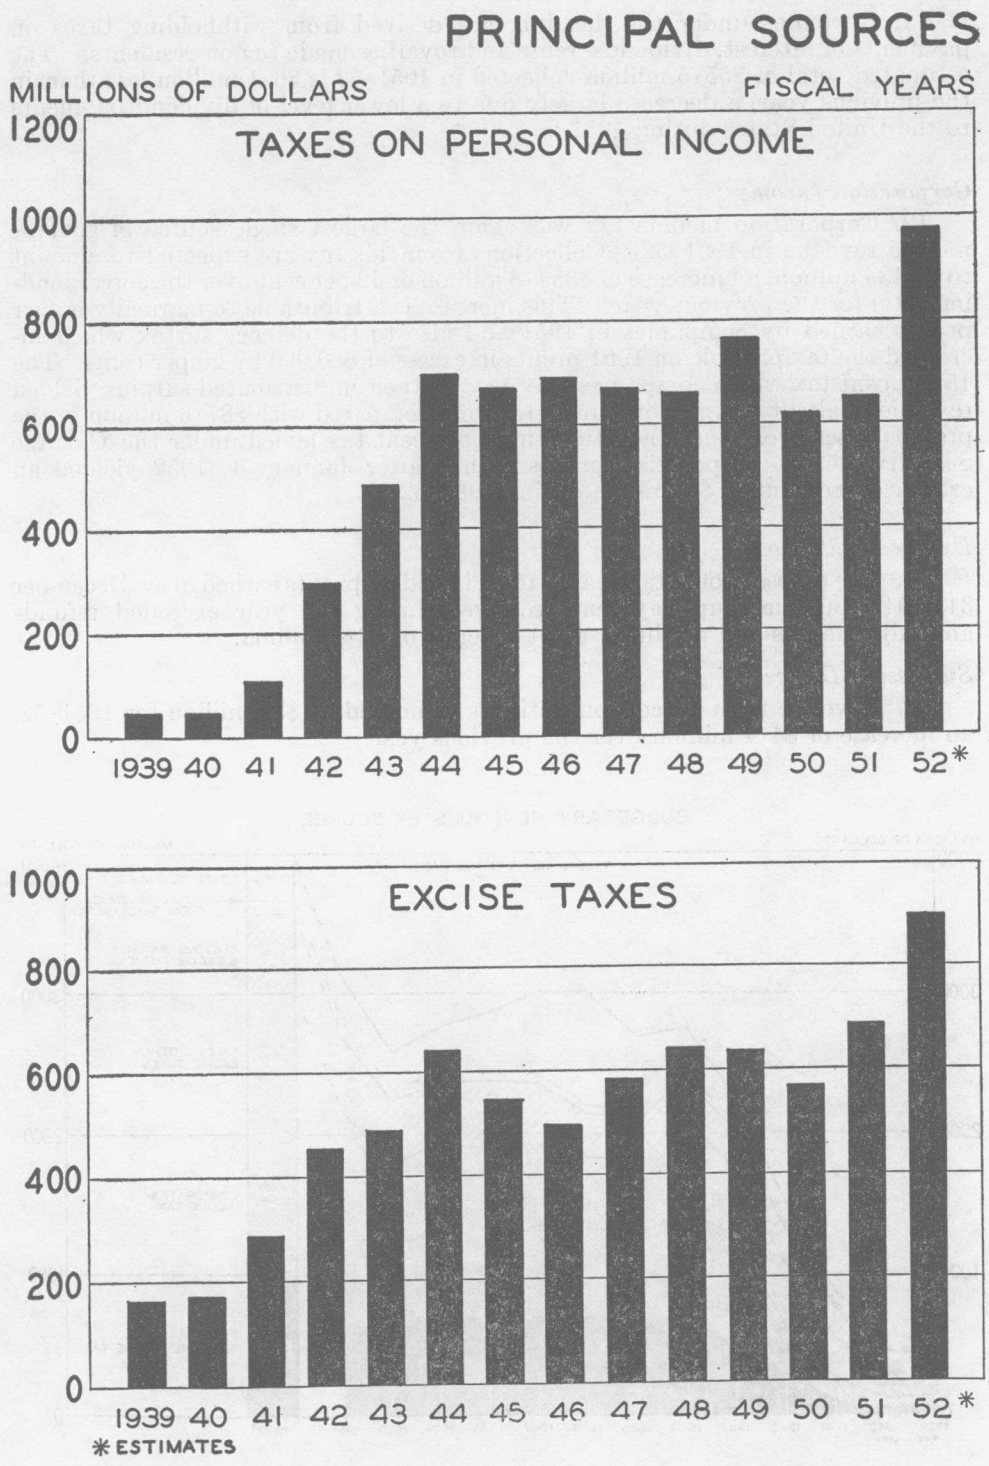
11. Revenues under this heading are derived from withholding taxes on payments of interest, dividends, rents and royalties made to non-residents. The estimated total of $55·5 million collected in 1951–52 is $6·1 million less than in the previous year, a decrease largely due to a lower level of dividend payments to the United States during 1951.

Corporation Income Tax

12. Corporation income tax was again the largest single source of governmental revenue in 1951–52. Collections from this tax are expected to amount to $1,134 million, an increase of $334·8 million or 42 per cent over the corresponding total for the previous year. This increase is attributable to markedly higher profits earned by companies in 1951 and also to the defence surtax which increased the tax payable on 1951 profits in excess of $10,000 by 20 per cent. The 15 per cent tax which companies may pay on their undistributed surplus yielded revenue of about $14 million during the year compared with $87·6 million in the previous fiscal year. (In addition the 2 per cent tax levied under the Old Age Security Act on corporation profits earned after January 1, 1952 yielded an estimated amount of $2 million during 1951–52).



Excess Profits Tax



13. The excess profits tax ceased to be levied on profits earned after December 31, 1947, but clean-up payments received during the year exceeded refunds and adjustments and produced a net revenue of $2·2 million.

Succession Duties

14. Revenue from succession duties is estimated at $38 million for 1951–52, an increase of $4·4 million over the previous year.

OF TAX REVENUES

ENDED MARCH 31 MILLIONS OF DOLLARS

(2) Indirect Taxes

Customs Import Duties

15. Net revenue from customs import duties for the year is estimated at $353 million, an increase of $57·3 million over the total for 1950–51. This increase reflects the increased level of imports at higher prices during the year.

Excise Duties

16. Excise duties are levied exclusively on alcoholic beverages and tobacco products. (Additional taxes are levied on tobacco products under the Excise Tax Act). The estimated total revenue from this source for the year is $222 million. This is a decrease of $19 million from 1950–51 due mainly to reduced sales of spirits and cigarettes. Gross receipts from excise duties, before deducting refunds, are divided as follows: $123 million from alcoholic beverages ($129·4 million in 1950–51) and $102 million from tobacco products ($114·5 million in 1950–51).

Excise Taxes

17. Excise taxes are levied on a variety of items under the Excise Tax Act. Total net collections for the year are estimated at $899 million, an increase of $212·2 million or 30·9 per cent over 1950-51. This increase is due in part to higher levels of production and increased prices during the year and in part to tax changes introduced in April, 1951. At that time the rate of tax on all those items which had previously been subject to tax at 15 per cent was raised to 25 per cent and refrigerators, washing machines and stoves using other than solid fuels, which were not previously taxed, were made taxable at 15 per cent. At the same time, the rate of tax on cigarettes was increased three-quarters of one cent for each five cigarettes; the rate on each ounce of manufactured tobacco was increased three cents; and the rate on each ounce of Canadian raw leaf tobacco when sold for consumption was increased three-quarters of one cent. The most important change was undoubtedly the increase in the rate of sales tax from 8 per cent to 10 per cent.

18. These increases in tax were offset to a small extent by the repeal of the tax on cigarette papers and tubes, and the reduction of the tax on candy and chewing gum from 30 per cent to 15 per cent. In addition, the rate of sales tax levied under the Excise Tax Act was reduced from 10 per cent to 8 per cent from January 1, 1952, when the sales tax of 2 per cent levied under the Old Age Security Act came into effect.

19. The most important tax under the Excise Tax Act from the point of view of revenue is the sales tax which yielded an estimated gross revenue of $596 million, an increase of $125.4 million over the previous year. (In addition, an estimated amount of $19 million was received from the 2 per cent sales tax levied under the Old Age Security Act).

20. The second largest revenue source among the excise taxes is the tax on tobacco products which yielded approximately $110 million. The increase of $24·8 million over the total for the previous year is due to the increased rates of tax introduced in 1951. (If the revenues from excise taxes and excise duties, including the tax on cigarette papers and tubes now withdrawn, are combined, the total revenue from tobacco products was $212·4 million in 1951-52 compared with $207·4 million in the previous year).

21. Almost all tax sources showed an increase in revenue over the previous year. The tax on automobiles and rubber tires and tubes, which yielded an estimated total of $99·6 million during the year, showed the largest increase, amounting to $28·8 million over the previous year. The increase in revenue of $11·8 million from the tax on soft drinks occurs because this tax was in effect for all of 1951-52 but for less than eight months in 1950-51.

22. The tax sources showing the largest increases, and the amount of the increase in each case, are given below.

—	Estimated increase over 1950–51
Automobiles, rubber tires and tubes	28,800,000
Cigars, cigarettes and tobacco	24,800,000
Beverages (soft drinks)	11,800,000
Toilet preparations and soaps	3,800,000
Jewellery, ornaments, etc.	3,500,000
Phonographs, radios and tubes	3,200,000

Other Indirect Taxes

23. Small amounts of tax revenue were derived from the tax on the net premium income of insurance companies ($4·5 million); from a tax on the export of electric energy from Canada ($0·7 million); and from a tax on the export of furs from the Northwest Territories ($0·1 million). Total revenue from all these sources in 1951-52 is estimated at $5·3 million, an increase of $0·4 million over the previous year.

(3) Non-Tax Revenues

24. Non-tax revenues for 1951-52 are estimated at $276·9 million, an increase of $43·6 million over the 1950-51 total. The following table presents a comparative summary of revenues under this heading for the past two years:

—	Fiscal year ended March 31		Increase or Decrease (−)
	1952 (Estimated)	1951
	(In millions of dollars)

Refunds of previous years' expenditures	5·2	2·1	3·1
Miscellaneous	2·0	2·2	−0·2
Total non-tax revenue	276·9	233·3	43·6

25. Gross Post Office receipts for 1951-52 are expected to amount to $124 million. After making authorized disbursements from revenue of $19 million for salaries and rent allowances at semi-staff and revenue offices, commissions at sub-offices, transit charges on Canadian mail forwarded through or delivered in foreign countries, etc., net post office receipts credited to budgetary revenues are estimated at $105 million. This would represent an increase of $14·6 million over the corresponding amount for 1950-51, due primarily to the new postal rates which came into effect on July 1, 1951. As costs of operating the Post Office during 1951-52 (excluding the $19 million charged to revenue) are expected to total $98·1 million, net revenue will exceed net costs by approximately $6.9 million. However, in making this comparison it is to be noted that the total shown for Post Office revenues does not reflect the value of services rendered free of charge to other departments, nor does the total shown for operating expenses reflect any charges for premises owned by the Government and occupied by the Post Office Department or for certain accounting and miscellaneous services provided by other departments.

26. Return on investments is expecte to yield $117·5 million, compared with the total of $89·5 million received in 1950-51. This increase of $28 million is due principally to the first payment of interest on the loan to the United Kingdom under the United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act, 1946, amounting to $23·7 million, and to increases of $4·3 million in the profits of the Bank of Canada for the calendar year, $2·5 million in interest on Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation debentures, and $1·7 million in interest on advances to the Canadian National Railways. These were offset in part by decreases of $2·2 million in the revenues from the Foreign Exchange Control Board and $2·2 million in interest on loans to foreign governments under Part II of The Export Credits Insurance Act.

27. A comparative summary of estimated receipts during 1951-52 with actual receipts during 1950-51 under this heading is given in the following table:

28. The amount credited as premium, discount and exchange in 1951-52 is estimated at $12 million compared with a credit of $17·6 million in 1950-51.

29. This revenue item was due mainly to bookkeeping adjustments in asset and liability accounts reflecting a reduction in U.S. dollar and sterling exchange rates from those operative in the fiscal year 1950-51.

30. The Canadian dollar equivalent of outstanding debt payable in sterling and in United States dollars was reduced in consequence of this revaluation by $20·4 million offset by $2·1 million reduction in assets payable in the same currencies. The result was a net credit in the premium, discount and exchange account of $18·3 million. Net differences in rates on gold and foreign exchange transactions further reduced the credit of $18·3 million by $6·3 million resulting in a net revenue item of $12 million.

(4) Special Receipts and Credits

31. The total of special receipts and credits for the fiscal year 1951–52 is estimated at $37·2 million as compared with total receipts of $93·8 million for the preceding year. The following table presents a comparative summary of the principal sources of special receipts and other credits for the last two years:

—	Fiscal year ended March 31		Increase or Decrease (—)
	1952 (Estimated)	1951
	(In millions of dollars)
Sale of surplus Crown assets	13·8	19·6	—5·8

Sundry other special receipts and credits	0·7	8·5	—7·8
	37·2	93·8	—56·6

32. The amount of $13·8 million realized from the disposal of surplus Crown assets represents the estimated receipts during the fiscal year from Crown Assets Disposal Corporation after allowing for transfers to active assets of amounts applicable to "Balances receivable under agreements of sale of Crown assets". It does not include the residual cash balances or the value of accounts receivable carried by the Corporation as at March 31, 1952.

33. The amount of $5·8 million represents a transfer to revenue of the amount now estimated to be in excess of requirements in respect of the final refundable portion of excess profits tax which was set up as a reserve in previous years.

34. The estimated amount of $12·5 million received from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation represents surplus funds in excess of the $5 million reserve established by the Corporation and the proceeds of the sale of Wartime Housing properties.

(5) Comparison of Actual Revenue with Budget Forecast

35. Total revenues as now estimated for the year 1951–52 will be about $292 million more than the forecast made in the budget speech of April 10, 1951. This represents an excess over the amount forecast of less than 8 per cent. Revenues from excise duties, excise taxes (other than sales tax), non-resident income taxes, succession duties and special receipts and credits were below the amounts forecast but the revenues from personal income tax, corporation income tax, customs duties and non-tax revenue exceeded expectations by a considerable margin. In making this comparison the revenue from the 2 per cent sales tax levied under the Old Age Security Act after January 1, 1952, is included with the estimate of revenue actually collected because the budget forecast was based on the assumption that the sales tax would remain at 10 per cent throughout 1951-52. The revenue collected from the 2 per cent Old Age Security Tax on corporation profits after January 1, 1952, is excluded because it was not part of the budget forecast. The following table shows in detail the extent to which actual revenues were different from the budget forecast.

(a) Excluding $2 million revenue from Old Age Security 2 per cent tax on corporation profits.
(b) Including $19 million revenue from Old Age Security 2 per cent sales tax.

36. In the Budget Speech of April 10, 1951, it was stated that on the revenue side the forecast of $3,730 million was based on the expectation that the Gross National Product would reach $20 billion, but it was indicated that should production and incomes rise beyond that level, as well they might, the forecast would be more than realized, but should they go not quite that high the revenues could fall short of the estimates then submitted. In fact, as it turned out, profits, incomes and imports were all at levels higher than expected and the Gross National Product reached a total of $21·2 billion in 1951, exceeding by 6 per cent the estimate of $20 billion on which the budget forecasts were based.

37. The forecast of revenue from personal income tax was based on an anticipated increase of about 12 per cent in salary and wages during the year. Salaries and wages increased by approximately 17 per cent and this in conjunction with the higher level of Gross National Product resulted in the deductions of income tax from salaries and wages exceeding the forecast by a substantial amount.

38. The actual receipts from taxes on interest, dividends, rents, and royalties going to non-residents fell short of the budget forecast which was based on receipts in the previous year.

39. Revised estimates of 1950 corporate profits now indicate that preliminary estimates available at the time of the Budget last year were about 12 per cent too low. Despite difficulties encountered in some secondary industries, disturbances in output arising during the year from the shift to defence production and curtailment of essential materials were not generally serious and for the majority of corporations production continued at full, or nearly full, capacity. These factors plus the higher than expected level of Gross National Product and the coming into operation of new plant and equipment as a result of the large capital investment in recent years resulted in corporation profits for 1951 exceeding the amount expected at the time of the forecast by about 15 per cent.

40. Revenue from succession duties did not quite reach the amount forecast. Rising property values and higher stock market prices had been expected to raise the value of estates to a greater extent than actually occurred.

41. In forecasting revenue from customs duties it was expected that the value of imports into Canada would increase about 10 per cent in 1951-52. Stimulated by the high level of purchasing power in Canada, the large capital investment programme, and the increasing value of the Canadian dollar abroad, the value of imports into Canada increased by nearly 20 per cent in the year. This resulted in the revenue from customs duties exceeding the forecast and reaching a total far in excess of any previous year in Canada's history.

42. The actual revenue from excise duties in 1951-52 fell well below the budget forecast because of a short fall of 24 per cent in the revenue from matured spirits and of 14 per cent in the revenue from the tax on cigarettes. (See paragraph 20 for the total yield of excise taxes and excise duties on tobacco products).

43. The estimate of revenue from the sales tax proved to be very accurate with the actual receipts being practically the same as the amount forecast.

44. The revenue from other excise taxes fell short of the amount forecast by about $11 million. This was more than accounted for by the fact that the additional revenue from the increased tax on tobacco products was about $10 million less than expected, and that the revenue from the new tax on stoves, washing machines and refrigerators was also about $5 million short of the $16 million expected at the time of the Budget.

45. The excess of non-tax revenue receipts over the budget forecast is partly due to the amount of $12 million for premium, discount and exchange arising chiefly from a revaluation of the Government's sterling and United States dollar assets and liabilities from exchange rates used in operations in the previous year. Receipts under the heading "Return on Investments" were also higher than expected mainly because of increased profits of the Bank of Canada for the calendar year 1951.

46. It is never possible to estimate revenue from special receipts and credits in advance with any degree of accuracy and the arbitrary budget forecast of $50 million for 1951-52 proved to be too large.

B. Expenditures

47. In previous years it has been customary to present a comparison by major categories of the expenditures for the current fiscal year with those of the previous year. In the accounts and estimates for the year under review the categories "capital expenditures", "special expenditures", "Government-owned enterprises" and "other charges" have been eliminated, and the items formerly appearing under these headings have been included under the headings of the appropriate departments. Consequently, to compare satisfactorily the expenditures of the two years, the expenditures for 1950-51 have also been adjusted to this basis.

48. The table which follows presents a comparative summary of estimated expenditures for 1951-52 with actual expenditures for the preceding fiscal year classified by departments and principal purposes.

National Defence and Defence Production

49. A more complete picture of Canada's expenditures for defence can be seen by considering together the expenditures of the Departments of National Defence and Defence Production. By adding to the estimated expenditures of $1,401 million for the Department of National Defence the sum of $39·7 million being the estimated outlay for the Department of Defence Production, there results a total of $1,440·7 million for defence, an increase of $658·3 million over the previous year. This constitutes approximately 40 per cent of all government expenditures for the fiscal year, making defence by a considerable margin, the largest class of government expenditure.

50. The following table shows a comparative summary of expenditures for the two departments for the last two fiscal years:

51. The estimated expenditures of $1,205·8 million for the Army, Navy and Air Services represent an increase of $660·1 million over the total of $545·7 million for 1950-51, reflecting the gathering momentum of the defence programme. Expenditures for Defence Research and Development are expected to amount to $34 million for 1951-52 compared with $23·4 million for 1950-51, an increase of $10·6 million.

52. The Government's contribution to the Permanent Services Pension Account for 1951-52 is estimated at $30·7 million or $18·7 million more than the corresponding amount for the previous year. Of the total, $16·7 million represents a government contribution equivalent to one and two-thirds times the current contributions by permanent services personnel, while $14 million relates to contributions for arrears.

53. Expenditures under the authority of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, section 3, are expected to amount to $125·1 million, or $70·3 million less than the total of $195·4 million for 1950-51. In 1950-51 under the provisions of this section of the Act, existing defence equipment and supplies were transferred to parties to the North Atlantic Treaty. The value of the equipment and supplies transferred was charged to this appropriation on the basis of the estimated present value, and an equivalent amount was credited to a special Defence Equipment Replacement Account from which payment might be made when replacements for such transfers were obtained for the Canadian Forces. The estimated expenditure of $125·1 million for 1951-52 consists of approximately $73 million for existing equipment and supplies transferred to North Atlantic Treaty countries and $52 million for direct cash outlays for mutual aid by the Government of Canada, representing costs incurred in the training in Canada of air crews from allied countries and for acquiring and supplying new military equipment to parties to the North Atlantic Treaty.

54. The Department of Defence Production was established at the beginning of the fiscal year 1951-52 under the authority of The Defence Production Act, to buy or acquire defence supplies and construct defence projects required by the Department of National Defence. The Department's major expenditures were for the provision of capital assistance to private contractors or Crown corporations undertaking contracts essential to the defence programme. While the table would appear to indicate that there were no comparable expenditures prior to 1951-52, it should be observed that the Department of Trade and Commerce was responsible for, and incurred expenditures relating to, activities similar to those which the Department of Defence Production now administers. For example, in 1950-51, expenditures of $1·3 million were made for research and development of jet engines and aircraft; $2·9 million for administration and operation of Canadian Arsenals Limited; $1·4 million for expenses incurred in purchasing materials, supplies and equipment for the Department of National Defence and $0·5 million for expenses incurred in procuring the construction of defence projects for that department.

55. It should also be pointed out that in addition to the foregoing budgetary expenditures, further substantial cash outlays were required in connection with the defence programme. It is estimated that net cash payments of $95 million in 1951-52 were made from the Defence Production Revolving Fund for the acquisition of materials for use in the manufacture of defence equipment. For purposes of accounting and control materials so purchased are treated as assets in the books of the government until such time as they are billed to the Department of National Defence or sold to defence contractors for use in the manufacture of defence equipment. Also an estimated amount of $50·6 million cash was disbursed for the replacement of equipment and supplies transferred to parties to the North Atlantic Treaty. This also involved a cash outlay during 1951-52 which was not reflected in the budgetary expenditures for the year under review. Instead it was charged to the special Defence Equipment Replacement Account which was credited with the estimated value of the original equipment and supplies when these were transferred to the recipient governments.

Public Debt Charges

56. Public debt charges again constituted the second largest single item of government expense. The estimated total for 1951-52 is $441·8 million or 12·1 per cent of all expenditures compared to $439 million or 15·1 per cent for 1950-51, an increase of $2·8 million.

57. Interest on public debt, estimated at $430·7 million, is $5·5 million greater than the previous year. Interest on deposit and trust accounts increased by only $0·2 million during the year but insurance, pension and guaranty accounts continued to increase substantially and as a result interest allowed on these accounts in 1951-52 was $6·4 million more than in 1950-51. Of this increase $2·4 million was for interest on the government annuities account, $0·6 million on the Permanent Services Pension Account, and $3·3 million on the Civil Service Superannuation Account.

58. Interest on funded debt payable in Canada showed a slight increase of $0·5 million, largely attributable to increased rates on short-term issues, while interest on debt payable in New York, amounting to $10·8 million, was $1·5 million less than during the previous year. This decrease was due mainly to the redemption of the $100 million 4 per cent 1930-60 New York loan which was called as of October 1, 1950, and replaced by the $50 million $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent 1950-75 loan.

59. Other public debt charges including the annual amortization of bond discounts and commissions, the cost of issuing new loans (not amortized) and other miscellaneous expenses incurred in servicing the public debt are estimated at $11·1 million for 1951-52 as compared to $13·8 million for 1950-51, a decrease of $2·7 million.

60. The following table presents a summary of public debt charges for 1951-52 and the corresponding figures for the previous year:

Subsidies and Tax Rental Payments to Provinces

61. Payments to provinces during 1951-52 for statutory subsidies, the transitional grant to Newfoundland, rentals under the Tax Rental Agreements, and the transfer of certain public utility tax receipts, amounted to $127·2 million as compared with $123·9 million in 1950-51. A comparative summary of the payments for the two years is given in the following table:

	Fiscal Year Ended March 31		Increase or Decrease(−)
	1952 (Estimated)	1951
	(In millions of dollars)
Statutory subsidies	20·1	18·7	1·4
Transitional grant to Newfoundland	6·5	6·5
Rentals under Tax Rental Agreements	96·9	94·1	2·8
Transfer of certain public utility tax receipts (sec. 7, Chap. 58, Statutes of Canada, 1947)	3·7	4·6	−0·9
	127·2	123·9	3·3

62. Statutory subsidy payments in 1951-52 were based on the 1951 census totals of population, while in 1950-51 payments were calculated on the basis of population according to the 1941 census or in the case of the three prairie provinces, the 1949 estimates. The increase in subsidy payments of $1·4 million reflects the increase in population as recorded in the 1951 census.

63. Payments under the tax rental agreements increased by a net amount of $2·8 million, reflecting the appropriate adjustment in the relevant ratios of population and estimates of gross national product on which the payments are based. Under the provisions of the Dominion-Provincial Tax Rental Agreements Act the Government of Canada collects provincial 5 per cent corporation taxes for the seven provinces participating in the 1947 agreements. Although levied by the provinces, these taxes are administered and collected by the Government of Canada and the proceeds thereof, when finally assessed, are paid to the provinces in lieu of an equivalent (or approximately equivalent) portion of the stipulated tax rental. Gross payments required under the tax agreements increased by $10·5 million, but as the payments to the provinces out of the provincial 5 per cent corporation tax suspense account amounted to $7·7 million more than similar payments made in 1950-51, the net increase was reduced to $2·8 million.

64. There was a decrease of $0·9 million in payments of public utility tax receipts. Section 7 of the Dominion-Provincial Tax Rental Agreements Act, 1947, authorized the payment to the provinces, whether participating in the agreements or not, of a portion of the taxes collected from corporations, whose main business was the distribution to, or the generation for the distribution to, the public of electrical energy, gas or steam.

65. A summary of payments, by provinces, during 1951-52 is given in the following table:

Government Contributions to the Civil Service Superannuation Account

66. Amounts totalling $110·9 million were transferred to the civil service superannuation account in 1951-52, an increase of $29·1 million over the Government's total contributions in 1950-51.

67. In 1951-52, as in the previous fiscal year, an amount of $75 million was credited to the account as a special government contribution of a portion of the amount by which the liabilities as estimated by the actuaries exceeded the balance in the account. In addition, $23 million, being the additional liability due to the upward revision of civil service salaries effective December 1, 1951, has been transferred to the account.

68. The remaining $12·9 million represents a government contribution of an amount equal to the estimated payments by individual contributors in the previous year on account of current and prior service. This increase of $6·1 million over the contribution of $6·8 million in 1950-51 is due, mainly to the fact that in previous years the Government has matched only the current contributions of individual contributors.

69. For a more complete explanation of transactions affecting this account, see the comments on "Insurance, Pension and Guaranty Accounts" in the section on the "Estimated Balance Sheet Position at March 31, 1952."

Provision for reserve for possible losses on ultimate realization of active assets

70. An amount of $75 million was again transferred to the general reserve for possible losses on the ultimate realization of active assets with a corresponding amount being shown as an expenditure in the Government's accounts. There was no charge or write-off to the reserve during the fiscal year. The balance at March 31, 1952 was $470·9 million which is equivalent to approximately 7 per cent of the aggregate active assets.

Family Allowances, Old Age Pensions and Pensions to Blind Persons

71. Payments for family allowances are estimated at $320·5 million for 1951-52 representing approximately 8·8 per cent of the total expenditures for the fiscal year. The estimated increase of $11 million over the previous year is attributable to the natural increase in population in the eligible age groups.

72. Payments in respect of old age and blind pensions for 1951-52 (excluding pensions paid from the Old Age Security Fund) are estimated at $83·5 million resulting in a decrease of $19·7 million from the total of $103·2 million for 1950-51. The Old Age Pension Act provided for the payment by the federal government of 75 per cent of the lesser of $40 monthly or the amount of pension paid by the province monthly up to December 31, 1951, to eligible persons in need who were 70 years and over or 21 years and over if blind. On January 1, 1952, the Old Age Assistance Act became effective under which the federal government paid the provinces 50 per cent of $40 monthly or of the amount of assistance paid by the province monthly, whichever was the lesser, to eligible persons in need who were 65 years and over. After January 1, 1952, the blind continued to receive pensions as before but under the new Blind Persons Act. Under the Old Age Security Act which also came into effect on January 1, 1952 the federal government paid $40 monthly out of the Old Age Security Fund to all eligible persons of 70 years and over irrespective of need commencing in January 1952. Consequently, payments to the provinces for the last quarter of 1951-52 were substantially reduced, but the full effect of this change will not be apparent until the conclusion of 1952-53.

73. A comparative summary of the estimated payments for 1951-52 and the actual outlay for the preceding year is given in the following tables:

(1) Less than $50,000.
(2) In addition to these payments under the Old Age Pension Act there were Federal contributions to the provinces under the Old Age Assistance Act, 1951, estimated at $2·5 million. A breakdown of this total by provinces and a comparison with 1950-51 would be meaningless because of differences in provincial legislation and consequent varying application of this Act from province to province.

Deficit—Old Age Security Fund

75. Payments of pensions of $40 per month under the Old Age Security Act to all eligible persons seventy years of age or over without a means test commenced in January 1952. Expenditures during the three months of the fiscal year in which the Act has been in operation are estimated at $76 million. Payments are made from the Old Age Security Fund which was established by the Act and into which are paid the proceeds of a 2 per cent sales tax, a 2 per cent personal income tax and a 2 per cent tax on corporate profits levied under the Old Age Security Act. Revenues from these taxes during 1951-52 are estimated at $19 million for sales tax and $2 million for corporation income tax. Owing to the fact that revenue from the corporation income tax is slow in coming in during the first months of the year, the yield is disproportionately low. The deficiency of $55 million representing the amount by which the pension payments of $76 million exceed tax collections of $21 million was covered by funds voted by Parliament.

Unemployment Insurance Act Administration and Government's Contribution

76. Estimated expenditures relating to the Unemployment Insurance Act (excluding the Government's payment as employer) are estimated at $54·2 million for 1951-52, an increase of $1·3 million over the total of $52·9 million for 1950-51.

77. Unemployment insurance benefit payments are not charged directly to budgetary expenditures, but to the Unemployment Insurance Fund which is financed by contributions from employers and employees, by interest earned on investments, and by the Government's contribution of an amount equal to one-fifth of the combined employer-employee payments.

78. In addition, the Government assumes the cost of administration and, pursuant to the Terms of Union with Newfoundland, the cost of unemployment benefits to certain residents of that Province. Qualification for benefit under the Terms of Union terminated as of April 1, 1951, but expenditures estimated at $0·3 million were made during 1951-52, representing the payment of claims pending on April 1, 1951. Corresponding expenditures in 1950-51 were $3 million. The Government also reimburses the Fund for certain supplementary benefits under section 87 F of the Act. Supplementary benefits were $1·8 million in 1950-51, but as persons in the class in respect of whom the greater portion of the claims arise now qualify under the general provisions of the Act, corresponding expenditures for 1951-52 are estimated at only $40,000.

79. The Government's contribution to the Fund for 1951-52 is estimated at $30·1 million compared with $26·1 million in 1950-51. Administration costs for 1951-52 are expected to amount to $24·1 million, a decrease of $2·7 million from the total of $26·8 million in the previous year.

Agriculture

80. Expenditures for the Department of Agriculture are estimated at $66·9 million for 1951-52 compared with $142·8 million for the previous year. The decrease of $75·9 million is mainly accounted for by the absence of any payment in the accounts for the fiscal year under review comparable to the payment of $65 million in 1950-51 to the Canadian Wheat Board to be added to the amount available for distribution to holders of participation certificates in settlement of the 1945-50 wheat pool. In addition, there was a decrease of $4·3 million in advances to the Prairie Farm Emergency Fund.

81. The following table presents a comparative summary of the expenditures of the department for the last two years:

External Affairs

82. Expenditures of the Department of External Affairs are estimated at $38·1 million for 1951-52, as compared with $22·1 million for the previous year. The increase of $16 million is attributable mainly to an increase of $14·1 million in assistance to other countries and to international organizations from $11·5 million in 1950-51 to an estimated total of $25·6 million in 1951-52. In 1951-52 this assistance consisted chiefly of grants to the governments of India and Pakistan under the Colombo Plan, to assist these countries in their economic development programmes. During the fiscal year it is estimated that a total of $25 million was made available to these governments.

Mines and Technical Surveys

83. Expenditures of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys are estimated at $27·5 million for 1951-52, compared with the total of $21·1 million for the previous fiscal year. The increase of $6·4 million is attributable chiefly to increases of $4·3 million in the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act payments and of $1·7 million in expenditures of the Dominion Coal Board.

National Health and Welfare

84. The major items of expenditure for this department during 1951-52 have already been dealt with under the headings "Family Allowances, Old Age Pensions and Pensions to Blind Persons" and "Deficit—Old Age Security Fund". It is estimated that $46 million was spent for the remaining services including administration of the department compared with $36·2 million for the previous year. This represents an increase of $9·8 million, of which slightly over $6 million is accounted for by increases in general health grants to assist the provinces in hospital construction, strengthening of general public health services and the control of disease.

Transport

85. Expenditures of the Department of Transport are estimated at $102·1 million for 1951-52, an increase of $17 million over the corresponding total of $85·1 million for 1950-51, as shown in the following table:

—	Fiscal year ended March 31		Increase or Decrease(−)

Deficits and non-active advances— Government-owned enterprises	18·2	7·3	10·9
Departmental administration and sundry	4·5	2·5	2·0
	102·1	85·1	17·0

86. The net increase of $17 million is attributable mainly to increases of $10·9 million in payments for deficits of, and non-active advances to, certain wholly owned governmental enterprises and of $3·5 million in expenditures for air services which are estimated at $37 million for 1951-52 as compared with $33·5 million for 1950-51.

87. The following table presents a comparative summary of expenditures for deficits of, and non-active advances to, government owned enterprises for 1951-52 and 1950-51:

—	Fiscal year ended March 31		Increase or Decrease(−)

	17·0	5·8	11·2
Loans and Advances, Non-Active—National Harbours Board	1·2	1·5	−0·3
	18·2	7·3	10·9

88. The deficit of the Canadian National Railways was $15 million for the calendar year 1951 compared with $3·3 million in the preceding year, an increase of $11·7 million. However, it should be noted that the over-all C.N.R. deficit includes all interest charges paid on government advances, and an amount of $23·5 million received from the Railways for interest on advances is included in the government's revenue under the classification "Return on Investments."

Veterans Affairs

89. Total expenditures for the Department of Veterans Affairs are estimated at $216 million for 1951-52, a decrease of $0·4 million compared with the total of $216·4 million for 1950-51. The table which follows presents a comparative summary of the expenditures for the last two fiscal years:

—	Fiscal Year Ended March 31		Increase or Decrease (−)
	1952 (Estimated)	1951
	(In millions of dollars)
Pensions (World Wars I and II and Northwest Rebellion 1885)	103·8	95·6	8·2

Provision for reserve for conditional benefits under Veterans' Land Act	7·6	7·1	0·5
Departmental administration and sundry	2·5	2·4	0·1
	216·0	216·4	−0·4

90. An increase of approximately $15 million in payments of pensions, expenditures for hospital accommodation and treatment and after-care of returned soldiers and allowances to veterans and dependents was offset by an equivalent amount in post-discharge rehabilitation benefits, war service gratuities and Soldier Settlement and Veterans' Land Acts expenditures.

91. The provision for the reserve for conditional benefits under the Veterans' Land Act is estimated at $7·6 million, an increase of $0·5 million over the previous fiscal year. Sales of land and chattels are made to veterans at less than cost, conditional upon the terms of the agreement of sale being fulfilled for a period of ten years. The amount charged to expenditures during the fiscal year under this heading covers one-tenth of the conditional benefits included in sales to veterans prior to April 1, 1952.

4. THE CASH ACCOUNTS

92. In the preceding sections of this Part the budgetary accounts of the Government for the fiscal year 1951-52 have been described in some detail and the estimated budgetary revenues and expenditures and surplus have been analyzed and compared with the actual figures for the preceding fiscal year. However, the budgetary accounts do not reflect the full scope of the Government's financial operations: cash receipts from and cash payments to the public and the consequent cash surplus or deficit, or increase or decrease in available cash, are more significant factors in determining the Government's borrowing requirements and in assessing the impact of the Government's transactions upon the other sectors of the Canadian economy. However, before proceeding to analyze the cash transactions, two preliminary comments should be made.

93. In the first place, it should be noted that some of the revenues and expenditures, that are taken into account in determining the Government's budgetary surplus or deficit, consist of current provisions to meet liabilities for future payments and other items that are merely bookkeeping or accounting entries not requiring the current receipt or outlay of cash. In the second place, it should be pointed out that the financial operations of the Government are not confined to the collection of revenues or the making of expenditures in the strict or narrow accounting or budgetary meaning of those terms. While a substantial part of all governmental activities are directly reflected in the budgetary accounts, large amounts of cash are received and disbursed in connection with extra-budgetary transactions and these receipts and disbursements must be taken into account when measuring the impact of the Government's financial operations upon the economy or analyzing the implications of Government spending and the methods by which that spending is financed.

94. Examples of non-cash budgetary expenditures are the annual provision for the reserve for possible losses on the ultimate realization of active assets; the write-off of a loan or advance where the debt has been cancelled or is no longer collectible; government contributions and interest transferred to the Government Annuities and the Civil Service Superannuation Accounts and other insurance, pension, guaranty and deposit and trust accounts; interest accruals on War Savings Certificates, and the amortization of cash outlays made in one year applicable to subsequent years (such as payments for premiums, discounts and commissions on loans). Examples of non-cash budgetary revenues are interest accruals added to principal on the consolidation of loans, and the transfer to revenue of balances held in deferred credits, deposit or reserve accounts, such as the excess provision for the refundable portion of the excess profits tax.

95. The extra-budgetary receipts and disbursements relate to transactions which result in increases or decreases in the Government's assets and liabilities. They do not appear in the Government's income account nor do they enter into the calculation of the annual budgetary surplus or deficit. On the assets side, they consist, for the most part, of advances to and repayments of loans by Crown corporations and other government agencies, foreign, provincial and municipal governments and other borrowers; investments in government securities and of outlays for the acquisition of inventories of materials which will be used in the future, and for services rendered in one year but applicable to the accounts of subsequent years. On the liabilities side, the transactions relate primarily to the issue and redemption of securities representing the funded debt of Canada, and to receipts and payments in connection with the numerous deposit and trust, and annuity, insurance and pension funds held or administered by the Government.

96. The following comparative summary shows the nature and extent of the adjustments to the budgetary accounts for these non-cash and extra-budgetary transactions and their effect upon the government's net cash position for the last two years.

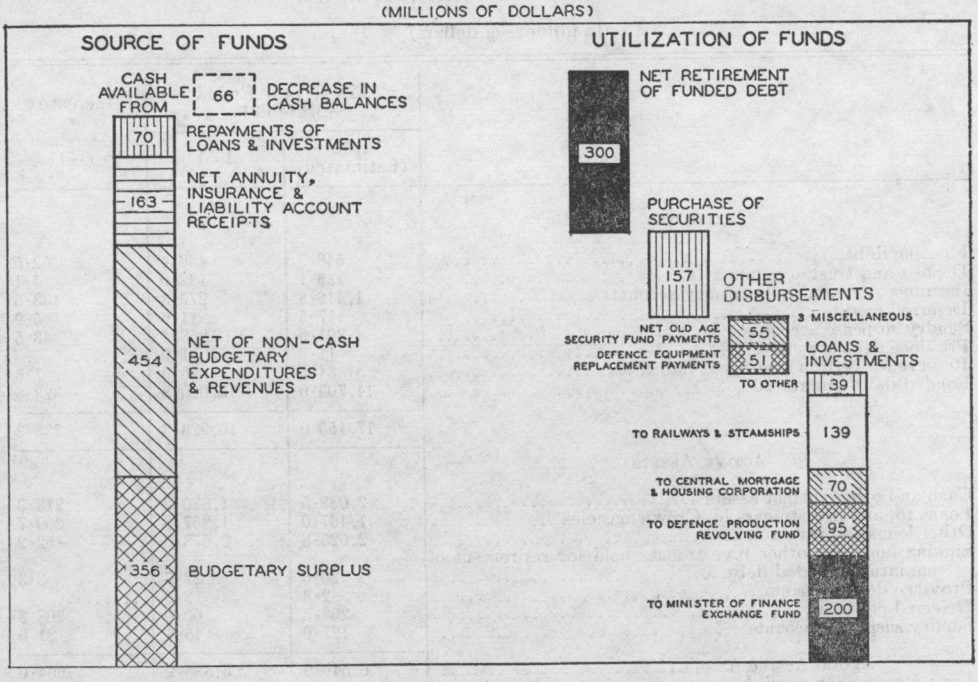
97. The figures indicate that after adjusting the budgetary revenues for non-cash credits and non-budgetary receipts, a total of $4,217·9 million cash was available to the Government during 1951-52, an increase of $1,005·5 million as compared with the total of $3,212·4 million in the previous year. Out of this, budgetary cash expenditures of $3,174·7 million and non-budgetary disbursements of $652·8 million were made, a net increase of $785·6 million, leaving a cash surplus of $390·4 million available for debt reduction or increase in cash balances as compared with $170·5 million in 1950-51.



98. The total of non-budgetary receipts is estimated at $233·7 million, made up of $163·4 million from net annuity, insurance and liability account receipts and $70·3 million for repayments of sundry loans and investments, of which $66·1 million was from the United Kingdom and other governments.

99. Non-budgetary disbursements, which amounted to $652·8 million, consisted of $200 million for advances to the Minister of Finance Exchange Fund, $95 million for advances to the Defence Production Revolving Fund used in part in the stockpiling of defence materials, $69·7 million to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for housing construction and housing loans, $138·6 million for advances to the Canadian National Railways, $38·7 million for miscellaneous loans or investments and working capital advances (including $9·4 million for loans to veterans), $4 million for discounts and commissions on loan flotations, $50·6 million in purchases of equipment through the Defence Equipment Replacement Account, $55 million in net disbursements from the Old Age Security Fund representing the excess of pension payments over tax receipts, and $1·2 million in disbursements from sundry accounts.

SOURCE AND UTILIZATION OF CASH: 1951-52

(MILLIONS OF DOLLARS)

100. As a result of total cash receipts exceeding total cash disbursements by $390·4 million and by letting cash balances run down by $66 million, the Government was able to retire or acquire funded debt outstanding in the hands of the public to a net amount of $456·4 million. A reconciliation of the cash surplus of $390·4 million, the reduction in outstanding funded debt, and the net change in the Government's cash position, together with the corresponding figures for the previous fiscal year, is shown below:

101. The following table presents, in summary form, the Government's estimated balance sheet position at March 31, 1952, with the comparable figures for March 31, 1951.

102. The aggregate liabilities of the Government as at March 31, 1952, are estimated at $17,156·6 million, an increase of $233·3 million over the corresponding total at the end of the previous year. Unmatured funded debt outstanding, including bonds, treasury bills and deposit certificates accounts for $14,703 million or approximately 86 per cent of all liabilities. Of the total unmatured funded debt now outstanding, only $401·6 million or approximately 2·7 per cent is payable in foreign currencies—$348 million payable in United States dollars and $53·6 million in pounds sterling. A complete statement in tabular form of the Government's unmatured funded debt at March 31, 1952, with details of interest rates, dates of maturity, annual interest charges, and amounts of principal outstanding for each loan may be found at the end of this Part.

103. Floating debt, consisting of outstanding cheques and interest, matured funded debt outstanding and similar obligations payable on demand, is estimated at $548·9 million. Amounts at the credit of annuity, insurance, pension and guaranty accounts are expected to total $1,412·8 million.

104. The other items on the liabilities side of the balance sheet are: sundry suspense accounts (where some uncertainty as to disposition exists), $301·9 million; deposit and trust accounts (consisting of moneys deposited with or held in trust by the Receiver General for various purposes), $126·1 million; reserve for conditional benefits under the Veterans' Land Act, $34·5 million; province debt accounts (representing settlements arising out of agreements at the time of confederation), $11·9 million; and deferred credits (consisting of balances whose ultimate accounting treatment is known, but which are held until certain conditions are fulfilled), $17·5 million.

105. Offsetting these liabilities, and in a measure explaining their existence—as a substantial portion of the total debt is attributable to them—are the Government's active assets. For the most part, these consist of assets that yield interest, profits, or dividends, very liquid assets such as cash and departmental working capital funds, and certain prepaid expenditures and sundry suspense accounts.

106. Although some of the items are very difficult to forecast, it is expected that the active assets will aggregate $6,549·9 million at March 31, 1952. The totals of the principal active asset categories at that date are estimated at: cash and other current assets, $2,033·5 million; loans to, and investments in, Crown agencies, $1,467 million; other loans and investments (including loans to provincial, municipal, United Kingdom and other governments, subscriptions to international organizations, and a number of miscellaneous advances to veterans and others), $2,625·8 million; deferred charges, $268·3 million; province debt accounts, $2·3 million; and sundry suspense accounts, $127 million.

107. The reserve for possible losses on the ultimate realization of active assets which now stands on the books at $470·9 million is shown on the balance sheet as a deduction from the total of the active assets, bringing the net active asset total to $6,079 million.

A. Changes in Principal Liability Classifications during 1951-52

108. It is estimated that there was an increase of $233·3 million in the gross liabilities of the Government during the fiscal year. The three most important increases were $433·5 million in the insurance, pension and guaranty accounts (attributable principally to increases of $330·9 million in the Civil Service Superannuation Account, $57·2 million in the Government Annuities Account and $43·9 million in the Permanent Services Pension Account), $43·5 million in sundry suspense accounts and $62·5 million in floating debt.

109. The most significant reduction in the liabilities was the substantial decrease in the outstanding unmatured funded debt of the Government from $15,026·8 million at March 31, 1951 to an estimated amount of $14,703 million at March 31, 1952. This net reduction of $323·8 million compares with similar reductions of $161·4 million in 1950-51, $396·9 million in 1949-50, $372·3 million in 1948-49, and $584·5 million in 1947-48.

Floating Debt

110. Floating debt shows an estimated increase of $62·5 million in 1951-52. Increases of $84·3 million in outstanding cheques, $0·9 million in interest due and outstanding and $0·9 million in Post Office account are offset partially by decreases of $16 million in matured funded debt and $7·6 million in the non-negotiable non-interest bearing demand notes issued to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development as part of Canada's subscription to the Bank. The changes in floating debt during the fiscal year are summarized in the following table:

FLOATING DEBT AS AT MARCH 31, 1952 AND MARCH 31, 1951

	Balance at March 31		Increase or Decrease (−)
	1952 (Estimated)	1951

Interest due and outstanding	77·2	76·3	0·9

Post Office (net liability for money orders, etc.)	11·4	10·5	0·9
	548·9	486·4	62·5

Deposit and Trust Accounts

111. It is estimated that there was an increase of $4·1 million in deposit and trust accounts. Increases of $7 million in contractors' security cash deposits, $3·5 million in the Prairie Farm Emergency Fund and $1·8 million in the National Capital Fund are offset, in part, by a decrease of $8·3 million in Province of Newfoundland Financial Surplus account.

Insurance, Pension and Guaranty Accounts

112. Insurance, pension and guaranty accounts show an estimated increase of $433·5 million during the year. The changes in various accounts in this category are shown in the following table:

INSURANCE, PENSION AND GUARANTY ACCOUNTS AS AT MARCH 31, 1952 AND MARCH 31, 1951

	Balance at March 31		Increase or Decrease (−)
	1952 (Estimated)	1951
Government Annuities	677·6	620·4	57·2
Permanent Services Pension Account	110·4	66·5	43·9
Civil Service Superannuation Account	520·0	189·1	330·9
Other	104·8	103·3	1·5
	1,412·8	979·3	433·5

113. The principal increases were $57·2 million in Government Annuities, $43·9 million in Permanent Services Pension Account and $330·9 million in the Civil Service Superannuation Account.

114. Of the increase of $330·9 million in the Civil Service Superannuation account, $312 million represents a transfer to the account of the amount by which the liabilities at December 31, 1951, as estimated by the actuaries, exceeded the balance in the account. Of this sum of $312 million, $98 million is included as a charge to budgetary expenditures in the year's accounts, and $214 million has been set up as a deferred charge, which will, with Parliamentary approval, be written off to expenditures in future years. The amount of $98 million consists of two items. The first is the Government's second special contribution of $75 million towards making up the substantial deficiency which had accumulated in the account over many years due for the most part to increases in the general level of salaries and to the practice formerly followed of not matching employees' prior service contributions with an equal Government contribution. The second is a contribution of $23 million in respect of the additional liabilities of the account consequent upon the salary increases to civil servants effective December 1, 1951.

115. The further $18·9 million increase in the account during the fiscal year represents the amount by which employees' current and prior service contributions, the Government's contribution of an amount equal to the estimated current and prior service payments of individuals in the previous fiscal year, and interest accretions exceeded payments from the account.

Deferred Credits

116. Deferred credits are expected to show an increase of $5·9 million during the fiscal year, one of the more important factors contributing to this net increase being the balance of the amount due from the Government of France in connection with military relief settlements, an offsetting entry being included under "Loans to the United Kingdom and Other Governments".

Sundry Suspense Accounts

117. Sundry suspense accounts are expected to record an increase of $43·5 million during the fiscal year. Of this total $22·8 million is due to an increase in the Defence Equipment Replacement Account representing the undisbursed balance of the credits to the account under section 3 of The Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and Vote 246 of The Appropriation Act, No. 4, 1951. Under the terms of The Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, the value of defence materials and supplies transferred to members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization may be credited to the account and these credits may be used in subsequent years to purchase equipment or supplies for the naval, army or air services of the Canadian Forces. The net increase in the account during the year represents the amount by which the value of defence materials and supplies transferred exceeded cash disbursements for replacements.

118. Also recorded under this heading is the Government's liability for collections of provincial 5 per cent corporation income taxes under The Dominion-Provincial Tax Rental Agreements Act. As collections during 1951-52 were higher than during the preceding fiscal year, and assessments and payments to the provinces were somewhat less than collections, the estimated amount of $77·9 million at March 31, 1952 was approximately $14·6 million more than the corresponding amount at March 31, 1951.

Province Debt Accounts

119. There was no increase or decrease during the fiscal year in the Government's liability in respect of the province debt accounts. These amounts have remained unchanged for many years.

Reserve for Certain Contingent Liabilities

120. The reserve for certain contingent liabilities is expected to show an increase of $7·6 million during the fiscal year reflecting an additional provision for conditional benefits which may accrue to veteran borrowers under the Veterans' Land Act.

Funded Debt Unmatured

121. It is estimated that there was a net decrease in unmatured funded debt from $15,026·8 million at March 31, 1951 to $14,703 million at March 31, 1952. The over-all reduction of $323·8 million reflects decreases of $303·7 million in debt payable in Canada, $17·4 million in debt payable in New York, and $2·7 million in debt payable in London. The details of the various loan redemptions, flotations and adjustments which resulted in this net decrease are described more fully in the section on "The Public Debt".

B. Changes in Principal Active Asset Classifications During 1951-52

122. It is estimated that there was an increase of $664 million in the total of the active assets during the fiscal year under review. However, with the provision of an additional $75 million for the reserve for possible losses on the ultimate realization of active assets, active assets are expected to show a net increase of $589 million when the books are closed. Estimated increases of $213·3 million in cash and other current assets, $209·7 million in loans to, and investments in, Crown agencies, $81·6 million in sundry suspense accounts, and $208·3 million in deferred charges were off set by a decrease of $52·2 million in other loans and investments.

Cash and Other Current Assets

123. Cash and other current assets increased by approximately $213·3 million during the fiscal year as shown in the following table which summarizes the changes in the various accounts in this category:

CASH AND OTHER CURRENT ASSETS AS AT MARCH 31, 1952 AND MARCH 31, 1951

(In millions of dollars)

—	Balance at March 31		Increase or Decrease (—

Other	33·7	22·7	11·0
Crown corporations	24·3	17·8	6·5
	2,033·5	1,820·2	213·3

124. The principal changes were increases of $118·2 million in the Minister of Finance Exchange Fund Account and $49·6 million in the Securities Investment Account and an amount estimated at $95 million in the Defence Production revolving fund. These are offset, in part, by a reduction of $67 million in cash in current and special deposits.

125. The increase in advances to the Exchange Fund represents additional cash advances of $200 million during the year to finance the purchase of gold and foreign exchange, reduced by $81·8 million equivalent to the increase in the Fund's revaluation deficit during 1951 which was deducted from the total advances and carried to sundry suspense accounts. The Fund's revaluation deficit at December 31, 1951, was $125·6 million compared with $43·8 million at the end of the preceding year.

Loans to, and Investments in, Crown Agencies

126. Loans to, and investments in, Crown agencies increased by $209·7 million during 1951-52 from $1,257·3 million at March 31, 1951, to an estimated amount of $1,467 million at March 31, 1952. The changes during the fiscal year in this category of assets are summarized in the following table:

—	Balance at March 31		Increase or Decrease (−)
	1952 (Estimated)	1951
Bank of Canada Capital Stock	5·9	5·9	.....
Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation—

Polymer Corporation Limited	38·0	41·0	−3·0
Other Crown Agencies	30·3	27·3	3·0
	1,467·0	1,257·3	209·7

127. Loans to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation increased by $69·6 million during the year.

128. Loans to railways and steamship companies represent in the main advances by the Government to the Canadian National Railways for capital expenditures (including the purchase of railway equipment under hire-purchase agreements), for the retirement of maturing debt, and for the temporary financing of current operations. The net increase in advances to C.N.R. during the year is estimated at $138·6 million.

129. The amount of $106·9 million shown for the National Harbours Board represents the net outstanding advances in connection with harbour developments at Montreal and Vancouver. These are the only advances to the National Harbours Board which are classified as active assets in the Government's accounts.

130. The Government's investment in Polymer Corporation Limited, a Crown corporation engaged in the manufacture of synthetic rubber, was reduced by a repayment of $3 million during the fiscal year, the balance at March 31, 1952, being estimated at $38 million.

131. The amount of $30·3 million shown for other Crown agencies, represents subscriptions to the capital stock of, or advances to, sundry government agencies for capital, construction and other purposes. The total includes loans to, or investments in, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation ($9·2 million); Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation ($1·8 million); Eldorado Mining and Refining (1944) Limited ($8·2 million); Export Credits Insurance Corporation ($5 million); and Northwest Territories Power Commission ($6·1 million).

Other Loans and Investments

132. This group of assets includes loans to the United Kingdom and various foreign governments, the Government's subscriptions to the capital of the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, loans to provincial and municipal governments, and a number of miscellaneous loans and investments, the chief of which are the loans to veterans under the Soldier Settlement and Veterans' Land Acts. A table summarizing the loans and investments in this category and showing the changes during the fiscal year follows:

OTHER LOANS AND INVESTMENTS AS AT MARCH 31, 1952 AND MARCH 31, 1951

Miscellaneous Loans and Investments	17·2	15·3	1·9
	2,625·8	2,678·0	−52·2

133. The loans to the United Kingdom and other governments consist of loans to the Government of the United Kingdom under the authority of The War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942, and The United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act, 1946, loans to other countries under Part II of the Exports Credits Insurance Act, and miscellaneous foreign loans. A summary of the changes in each of these categories is shown in the following table:

	1,925·5	1,985·0	−59·5

134. It is estimated that during 1951-52 the Government of the United Kingdom will have repaid $31·1 million of the $700 million interest-free loan granted under the provisions of The War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942, reducing the balance outstanding of this loan to $220·4 million at March 31, 1952. During the year a repayment of $14 million was made by the United Kingdom Government on account of the $1,250 million loan authorized by The United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act of 1946. As the total amount advanced was $1,185 million the amount outstanding at March 31, 1952 was $1,171 million.

135. The advances under Part II of the Export Credits Insurance Act represent loans made to certain foreign countries to assist them in purchasing goods and services in Canada. It is estimated that the total of outstanding advances under this Act was $480·9 million at March 31, 1952, representing a net decrease of $19·7 million from the total of $500·6 million outstanding at the end of the previous year. A classification of these advances by recipient governments, showing the repayments during the year, is given in the following table.

Sinking Fund and Other Investments held for the Retirement of Unmatured Funded Debt

136. There was an estimated increase of $3·3 million in these assets which are held for the retirement of the 3 per cent Newfoundland 1943-63 guaranteed stock.

Deferred Charges

137. Accounting in large measure for the increase of $208·3 million in this category is the amount of $214 million which has been credited to the Civil Service Superannuation Account and set up as a deferred charge to be written off to expenditure in future years, subject to Parliamentary approval.

138. Discounts and commissions of $4 million paid during the fiscal year on new loans were more than offset by the annual amortization of $9·6 million applicable to 1951-52 and charged to the year's expenditure.

Sundry Suspense Accounts

139. The increase of $81·6 million in this asset classification is due mainly to the change in the deficit arising from exchange revaluations of the assets and liabilities in the Minister of Finance Exchange Fund Account as at December 31, 1951 which amounted to $125·6 million at that date as compared with $43·8 million at December 30, 1950.

Reserve for Possible Losses on Ultimate Realization of Active Assets

140. For the fifth successive year $75 million was added to this reserve with a corresponding amount being shown as an expenditure in the Government's accounts. There was no charge or write-off to the reserve during the fiscal year, the balance at March 31, 1952, being $470·9 million.

C. Decrease in Net Debt

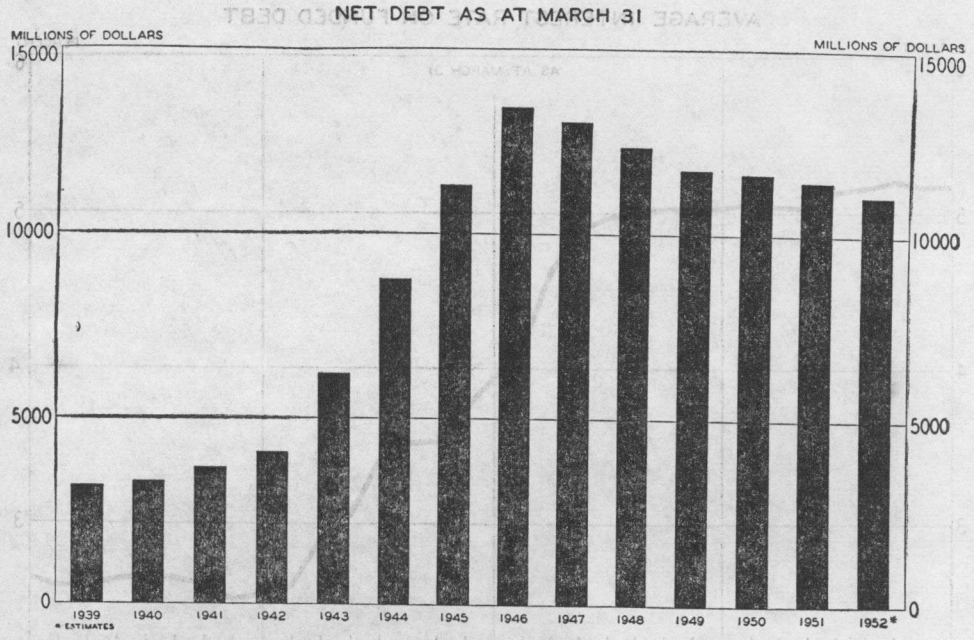
141. The estimated surplus of $355·7 million for the fiscal year will result in a corresponding decrease in the net debt of Canada, reducing it from $11,433·3 million at March 31, 1951, to $11,077·6 million at March 31, 1952.

6. THE PUBLIC DEBT

Gross and Net Debt

142. The unmatured funded debt of Canada was reduced by $323·8 million during the fiscal year, of which $299.8 million represented cash retirements and $24 million net revaluations and adjustments. However, due to increases of $557·1 million in other liabilities—principally in insurance, pension and guaranty, floating debt and sundry suspense accounts—the gross public debt of Canada increased by $233·3 million from $16,923·3 million at March 31, 1951, to an estimated total of $17,156·6 million at March 31, 1952. During the same period, the net active or realizable or revenue-producing assets increased by $589 million, with the result that the net debt—which is the gross debt less the active assets—was reduced by $355·7 million.

143. The following table shows the amount of net debt as at March 31, 1939 to March 31, 1952 inclusive, with the amount of annual increase or decrease:



NET DEBT

Unmatured Funded Debt

144. The estimated total unmatured funded debt of Canada outstanding at March 31, 1952 was $14,703 million. This was $323·8 million less than at the end of the previous year and $2,104·2 million less than at March 31, 1946. Notwithstanding this substantial decrease, it was still $11,317·3 million more than, or approximately four times, the total of $3,385·7 million at March 31, 1939, the end of the last pre-war year. However, while interest charges on the funded debt increased by approximately 229 per cent from $118·1 million in 1938-39 to $389 million in 1951-52, the gross national product rose from $5,165 million in 1938 to $21,217 million in 1951, an increase of approximately 310 per cent. Consequently, while the unmatured funded debt, measured as a percentage of the gross national product, rose from 65 per cent in 1938-39 to approximately 70 per cent in 1951-52 the relative burden of the funded debt, measured in terms of interest charges as a percentage of the gross national product, actually decreased from 2·3 per cent in 1938-39 to 1·8 per cent in 1951-52.

Summary of Security Issues and Redemptions during the Year

145. During the fiscal year Government obligations excluding Treasury Bills in the amount of $2,762 million matured. The financing of these retirements which were all payable in Canadian dollars was effected as follows:

By refunding or conversion into new issues	$ 2,100·0
By sale of Canada Savings Bonds Series VI (net)	362·2
From available cash	299·8

146. Funded debt payable in Canadian dollars decreased by an estimated amount of $303·7 million during the fiscal year. The retirement of $299·8 million out of available cash and the transfer of $5·8 million to revenue of the excess provision of the reserve for the refundable portion of the excess profits tax less $1·9 million of accrued interest added to principal of War Savings Certificates account for the net reduction achieved during the fiscal year.

147. The Canadian dollar value of the Government's external funded debt decreased by $20·1 million during the fiscal year. Of this amount $17·4 million was in respect of indebtedness payable in United States dollars and $2·7 million in respect of sterling debt. These reductions were consequent upon the revaluation of liabilities payable in those currencies to reflect the change in the exchange rates in effect at March 31, 1952 as compared with March 31, 1951.

148. From the foregoing it will be seen that the over-all reduction of $323·8 million in the outstanding funded debt was due to cash payments of $299·8 million, revaluations to reflect changes in the exchange rates of $20·1 million and sundry other non-cash adjustments amounting to $3·9 million net.

149. The average coupon rate of the Government's outstanding funded debt at the close of the fiscal year is estimated at 2·65 per cent compared with 2·60 per cent at the close of the previous fiscal year.

Indirect or Contingent Liabilities

151. It should be noted that the Government has certain indirect or contingent liabilities which are in addition to the direct debt set out in the balance sheet. Included under this heading, for example, are the Government's guarantees of certain securities issued by various Government owned enterprises such as the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited, and the Saint John Harbour Commission; the guarantee of deposits maintained by the chartered banks in the Bank of Canada; guarantees of certain loans made by chartered banks to veterans or farmers for certain authorized purposes; guarantees under the Export Credits Insurance Act; and certain commitments under housing legislation.

152. The following table gives details of the bonds and debenture stocks guaranteed by the Government, and also indicates the nature and approximate extent of the Government's other guarantees and contingent liabilities.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, April 9, 1952

The house met at three o'clock.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF ADDRESS IN REPLY

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a message from His Excellency the Governor General, signed by his own hand, reading as follows:

Government House, Ottawa,
9th April, 1952

Members of the House of Commons:

I have received with great pleasure the address that you have voted in reply to my speech at the opening of parliament. I thank you sincerely for this address.

Vincent Massey

VACANCIES

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a communication informing me that the following vacancies have occurred in the representation:

Of Joseph Alfred Dion, Esquire, for the electoral district of Roberval, consequent upon his acceptance of an office of emolument under the crown.

Of Henri A. Gosselin, Esquire, for the electoral district of Brome-Missisquoi, by decease.

Of Heber Harold Hatfield, Esquire, for the electoral district of Victoria-Carleton, by decease.

I accordingly issued my warrants to the chief electoral officer to make out new writs of election for the said electoral districts respectively.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES OF THE WHOLE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as you know, standing order 56 requires that if a vacancy occurs in the office of chairman of the committee of the whole house the house shall forthwith proceed to elect a successor. In conformity with that rule I move, seconded by Mr. Howe:

That Louis Rene Beaudoin, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Vaudreuil-Soulanges, be appointed chairman of the committees of the whole house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent: I need not say, in view of the way in which this motion has been greeted by the house, that we all appreciate the experience the hon. gentleman has acquired in his role as deputy chairman of the committees of the whole and we hope he will be able to exercise in his new role the same urbanity and impartial fairness he displayed in his role of deputy chairman of committees.

Motion agreed to.

CONCURRENCE IN REPORT OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION RESPECTING CERTAIN EMPLOYEES

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State) moved:

That the report from the civil service commission respecting certain employees of the House of Commons, tabled on April 8, 1952, be approved.

He said: The report was presented by you, Mr. Speaker, yesterday.

Motion agreed to.

TELECOMMUNICATION

ANNUAL REPORT OF CANADIAN OVERSEAS TELECOMMUNICATION CORPORATION FOR 1951, AND BUDGET FOR 1952

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to section 23 of the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation Act I beg leave to table the annual report of the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation for the calendar year 1951, along with the budget of the corporation for 1952.

Printed copies of the annual report in English are being distributed, and copies in French will be made available as soon as received from the printers.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

FINAL REPORT OF MACQUARRIE COMMITTEE

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on March 31 last I informed the house that I had received the report of the committee appointed to study combines legislation, which has come to be known as the MacQuarrie committee. I explained at that time that I was delaying the tabling of the report until we could get the French translation of it. I am now tabling the final report, mimeographed in French and in English.

I may say that in the interests of early tabling the appendices, which consist of present and past legislation, are not included in the French copy, but will be tabled later as soon as they become available. While it is convenient to have them appended to the report for ready reference, they are not necessary to an understanding of it.

It is the intention of the government after the Easter recess to introduce legislation based upon the report.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the minister whether the report recommends the setting up of some body to examine matters coming under the Combines Investigation Act, which body will be an intermediate stage between the investigation division and the combines branch.

Mr. Garson: No, I do not think I would put it quite in that way.

Mr. Drew: I am sorry—between the combines branch and the minister.

Mr. Garson: The report, which will of course speak for itself, proposes that the present functions exercised by the combines branch—of starting a preliminary inquiry, making an investigation and then reporting to the minister—shall be divided between two bodies. One body will make the inquiry and investigation, and then the reporting body will consider the evidence and make the final report to the minister.

Mr. Drew: This is the last day before the Easter recess and the minister has indicated that legislation will be introduced. Inasmuch as consideration is being given to the form of the legislation, I should like to point out that when a similar proposal was put forward with respect to broadcasting it was turned down by the government as being a method that would not be satisfactory. It would seem that if it is consistent in the one case it would be consistent in the other. I hope the minister will bear that in mind in drafting the legislation he will bring forward.

BEEF

ESTABLISHMENT OF SUPPORT PRICES FOR CATTLE

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): I should like to make an announcement with respect to beef support prices.

The agricultural prices support board has been authorized to establish support prices for cattle on the basis of $25 per hundred pounds for good steers at Toronto, with appropriate differentials at other markets and for other classes of cattle. This price will remain in effect until July 1, 1952. The results of the policy will be reviewed before that date and monthly thereafter with a view to providing a proper measure of support until the United States embargo against Canadian cattle is lifted or modified sufficiently, or other markets are found to enable trade in livestock or meat to be resumed.

Differentials between markets will be based on differences which have prevailed in normal trade practice. In addition, cattle will be grouped into broad classes, and prices of the different classes will be supported in fair relationship to the price established for good steers.

While the support price will undoubtedly help to stabilize the cattle market and thereby give farmers the confidence necessary to enable them to spread their deliveries over a longer period, it must be clear that our cattle marketing difficulties can only be overcome by the reopening of the United States market or by some other arrangement for the disposal of surplus meat. In the meantime it is hoped and expected that large numbers of cattle which would normally come to market in the next few months will be retained on farms. With a holdback of even 15 per cent to 20 per cent of normal marketings there should be practically no surplus, and such a holdback would give the farmer the advantage of additional returns due to gain in weight which cattle will make pending the reopening of the United States market.

One purpose of this support price is to discourage heavy sales while the United States border is closed and thus prevent a chaotic condition in the market. If farmers and marketing agencies co-operate in the management of deliveries, well-finished cattle should be readily absorbed at reasonable rates in relation to the support price.

To assist the agricultural prices support board and the officers of the marketing service of the Department of Agriculture during the next few months, a special management committee will be set up. This committee will deal with operating policy. Officers of the marketing service will be responsible for all details of operation. In addition to the management committee there will be an advisory committee to which all provincial governments may appoint representatives. These special arrangements have been made to ensure that the interests and needs of each area will be fully considered.

Mr. Coldwell: Has the management committee been appointed? If so what is its personnel? Are the producers of livestock represented on that committee or indeed on the advisory committee? In the latter case I understand appointments may be made by the provincial governments.

Mr. McCubbin: The members of the management committee have not all been appointed yet but as soon as they are appointed their names will be announced.

Mr. Coldwell: I hope consideration will be given to the appointment of producers.

Mr. McCubbin: Yes.

Mr. Fulford: Is consideration being given to stabilizing the dairy industry which finds itself in a predicament as a result of cattle being excluded from the United States market?

Mr. McCubbin: All these things are given consideration. I have no doubt this announcement will assist the dairy industry as well as the beef industry.

Mr. Catherwood: Will the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture say when these floor prices on cattle will become effective?

Mr. McCubbin: They will come into effect immediately.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. H. B. McCulloch (Pictou) moved:

That the second report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, presented to the house on Tuesday, April 8, be now concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, it does seem that there should be some explanation. Yesterday when this matter was brought forward some explanation was called for, and it should be forthcoming now.

Mr. Abbott: The report was tabled.

Mr. Robinson: The report was tabled yesterday.

Mr. Drew: May I simply point out that I regard you, Mr. Speaker, as the Speaker of the house, and I was directing my remarks through you to the member moving the motion. If the reason for the motion is that the report has been tabled, and that is adequate, then I think the house could be told that by the member who is moving concurrence in the report.

Mr. McCulloch: Yesterday the hon. member for Kamloops made a mistake, and he admitted to me he had made a mistake. This report was moved and adopted in the committee, and the same report was presented to the house yesterday.

Mr. Chevrier: And they are routine.

Motion agreed to.

1. Have any orders in council been issued at the instance of both the Departments of Defence Production and Trade and Commerce, or either of them, that have not been published, and are not to be published, in the Canada Gazette, nor made public?
2. If so, how many?

Mr. St. Laurent: I am tabling an answer with an explanation. If there is any question about it, after Easter the hon. gentleman can either mention the matter again or place another question on the order paper.

The answer is as follows:

1. All orders in council, including those emanating from the Departments of Defence Production and Trade and Commerce, which are required to be published by the Regulations Act or by any other statutory provision, have been and are published in the manner prescribed in the relevant statute, unless exempted from publication under section 9 of the Regulations Act, in which event the exempting order itself is published. In addition, all orders in council, including those not required to be published, are listed in the summary of orders in council which is tabled in the house monthly.

2. Since this question contains no limitation as to time, it could not be answered without conducting a lengthy search dating back to the origins of the Department of Trade and Commerce. As a matter of current practice and since the Regulations Act came into effect on January 1, 1951, all orders in council made in the exercise of a legislative power conferred by or under an act of parliament or for the contravention of which a penalty of fine or imprisonment is prescribed by or under an act of parliament, are published in part II of the Canada Gazette unless specifically exempted from such publication under the Regulations Act. Other orders in council, such as those authorizing contracts, leases, purchases, etc., are not usually published.

HOLLINGER-HANNA LIMITED—REFUND OF CUSTOMS DUTIES

Mr. Diefenbaker:

What is the total amount of customs duties paid by Hollinger-Hanna Limited which have been refunded, or for which refunds have been claimed and as yet have not been paid, since the first of January, 1951?

Mr. McCann: No refund claims for customs duties have been filed by or on behalf of Hollinger-Hanna Limited since January 1, 1951, nor have any claims been paid.

IMMIGRANTS FROM BRITISH WEST INDIES

Mr. Noseworthy:

1. How many persons of British West Indies origin are at present living in Canada?
2. How many persons have entered Canada from the British West Indies during each of the five years 1947-1951, inclusive?
3. How many applicants for entry to Canada from the British West Indies have been refused entry during each of the five years 1947-1951, inclusive?
4. For what reasons were these applicants rejected, and how many were rejected for each of these reasons?
5. How many students were admitted to Canada from the British West Indies for the purpose of studying in Canada during each of the years 1947-1951, inclusive?
6. How many of those students applied for permanent residence in Canada?
7. How many of these student applicants were granted permanent residence in Canada?
8. Are any statistics available to show how immigrants to Canada from the British West Indies compare with immigrants from other warm climate countries in the following respects (a) health records; (b) wages or salaries earned; (c) unemployment records; (d) profession and occupation followed; (e) public liabilities?

Question stands.

Mr. Fair:

2. How many of those were (a) single annuity contracts; (b) joint annuity contracts?
3. In those cases where a husband purchased a single annuity contract for his wife or a wife purchased a single annuity contract for her husband, were the amounts involved in each case assessed for gift tax by the Department of National Revenue?
4. In how many cases in each of the above years were such assessments made?
5. Were the amounts assessed in each case collected?
6. If so, for what reason?

Mr. Bradley: Return tabled.

4. Does any Canadian institution offer post graduate special studies in specific animal diseases?

Mr. Bradley: Return tabled.

GOVERNMENT VETERINARIANS IN GREATER WINNIPEG AREA

Mr. Viau:

1. How many veterinarians are employed by the federal Department of Agriculture in the greater Winnipeg area?
2. What are (a) their names; (b) date of appointment; (c) grade on appointment; (d) present grade?

4. If so, in what grade?

Mr. McCubbin: Return tabled.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

RED DEER RIVER PROJECT

Mr. Quelch:

For a copy of the final reports by P.F.R.A. officials to the federal government on the Red Deer river project.

Mr. McCubbin: I wonder if this could stand until after Easter, until the minister returns?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

FISHERIES

MARITIME, QUEBEC AND NEWFOUNDLAND SALTED FISH TRADE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. G. W. Ashbourne (Grand Falls-White Bay): I would like to direct a question to tne Minister of Fisheries. Is he in a position to report on the outcome of the meetings held in Ottawa with the Newfoundland and maritime salted fish trade?

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): The hon. gentleman was good enough to let me have notice of his question, and I am pleased to make the following answer:

For the past two days, useful discussions have taken place in Ottawa with representatives of the maritime, Quebec and Newfoundland salted fish trade concerning all matters affecting the salted fish trade of the area.

For the past several years the financing of sales of Newfoundland salted fish to certain European markets has been handled through an arrangement with the United Kingdom, whereby payment could be made in sterling rather than in dollars. This arrangement, which has always been considered as a transitional measure, has now come to an end. Therefore consideration was given these changed circumstances so this trade can continue without interruption. The new situation is simply that from now forward the sale of salted codfish to these markets will be on the same basis as all other Canadian exports to such markets.

Fortunately this situation has arisen at a time when the salted fish marketing picture is sound. There is no carry-over of last year's fish in Canada or other exporting countries. Demand on importing countries is good and prices have been rising throughout the past year. The 1952 world supply gives every indication of being below that of 1951. Canada's codfish is highly regarded in the European markets and consumer demand is strong. There is no reason to expect, therefore, that the changed position respecting payment should affect the volume of shipments to these markets. Indeed, in 1951 a substantial proportion of Canada's sales of salted cod to Italy was paid for in dollars.

In the light of these market conditions, we are confident that the changed position in European markets will not affect prices to be paid to fishermen this year. Production and marketing trends of salt fish will be carefully watched and the trade kept informed.

AMERICAN AIR LINES

REPORTED MOVEMENT OF CANADIAN EMPLOYEES TO BUFFALO FOR LIE DETECTOR TEST

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Has the Minister of Justice an answer to the question I asked on Monday of this week in reference to some Toronto employees of American Air Lines?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I have made the investigation I mentioned then. Of course the Royal Canadian Mounted Police had no official notice of this matter, but on my instructions they made inquiries through their Toronto office, and the following are the facts they have gathered and reported to me.

American Air Lines found a shortage in a cash drawer to which only their office employees had access. The Toronto police were called in, but neither they nor the company's own detective were able to identify the person responsible for the shortage. The manager of American Air Lines in Toronto then called in the employees and asked them to submit to a lie detector test. All eight office employees went to Buffalo for that purpose and were subjected to this test, which did not reveal any employee as being responsible. The manager of the company then wrote a letter of apology to each of the employees involved. It was only after this letter of apology was written that any publicity was given to this matter.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this is a problem affecting the administration of justice in the province of Ontario; and to the extent that it may involve possible claims by the employees against the employer company it is also a matter within provincial jurisdiction. Section 92 of the British North America Act reads in part as follows:

> In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say:
> 13. Property and civil rights in the province.
> 14. The administration of justice in the province, including the constitution, maintenance and organization of provincial courts, both of civil and criminal jurisdiction, and including procedure in civil matters in those courts.

It would seem that matters arising out of the relationship between an air line doing business in Toronto and its employees would fall under either or perhaps both of these heads. So the matters the hon. member for Hamilton West has raised would appear to come within these two classes of provincial jurisdiction and therefore are not within the matters assigned to this parliament. I think her question might more properly be asked in the legislature of the province of Ontario.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I must ask that I be permitted to point out what is really the effect of the statement made by the Minister of Justice. What happened in this case—

Mr. Garson: Is my hon. friend asking me a question?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I submit it is time we took the muzzle off this parliament.

Mr. Chevrier: Order. You can't get away with that.

Mr. Drew: Oh, is that so?

Mr. Chevrier: No, you can't.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is nothing before the house at the present time. The orders of the day have been called but have not been proceeded with. At this time it is permissible to ask questions of the ministry. I understand a question was asked by the hon. member for Hamilton West the other day, and today she asked the Minister of Justice if he had an answer. He has now given the answer.

Mr. Drew: If it is not going to be possible to deal with a statement which disposes of something that could have very serious consequences, then I submit that to a substantial extent we should agree that questions and answers produce no result whatever. The suggestion that one could deal with statements of this kind by subsequent questions, by coming in through the back door as it were, simply disposes of the effectiveness of questions and answers of this kind.

Mr. Abbott: A flagrant breach of the rules.

Mrs. Fairclough: May I proceed now to ask a supplementary question? In his answer, has the minister taken into consideration the fact that these employees were taken across an international boundary line and interrogated in a foreign court?

Mr. Garson: In matters of this kind it is always difficult to get at the real facts. My information, and it may be inaccurate, is to the effect that when this suggestion was made to the employees they went voluntarily to receive this test.

Mrs. Fairclough: No, Mr. Speaker; they were under the impression that this test was to be taken in the city of Toronto. It was not until after they had given their consent that they were aware they were being asked to go out of the country.

Mr. Garson: All I can say is that the hon. member's source of information differs from my source of information.

Mrs. Fairclough: That may well be.

Mr. Drew: Will the Minister of Justice state whether he has considered the fact that the air line concerned can only operate under agreement with the dominion government; that the conduct of that company is of necessity constantly under the supervision of the dominion government, and that the dominion government can therefore at all times exercise some measure of direction over the company's conduct in Canada?

Mr. Garson: My impression is—and on several occasions I have understood the hon. member himself to say—that in carrying on our business in Canada, we invite foreign companies to come into Canada to do business here. Those companies usually do business under our laws and are answerable to our courts as regards their relationship with their employees. Answering the hon. member's question, I had not thought he would regard it as proper that we should use licensing by an entirely different department of government to discipline a company in respect of a matter which one would have thought that the proper provincial authorities and the company would if necessary have determined by the proper courts.

Mr. Drew: Has the minister made inquiries as to whether in any event the lie detector test and this fantastic procedure could at any time have been a method in Canada, no matter what arrangement was made?

Mr. Cruickshank: It has never been made to apply here in any event.

Mr. Garson: I am very glad to answer the hon. member's question. I have made that inquiry and my information is that a lie detector test has no probative value in our courts, and I believe it has no probative value in most United States courts.

HOUSING

CO-OPERATION WITH PROVINCES ON LOW RENTAL ACCOMMODATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Resources and Development. In view of the statement in the Ontario legislature yesterday, is the government considering co-operation with the provinces to make possible low rental housing in centres of less than 5,000 population?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): The hon. member was kind enough to send to my office the clipping to which he has referred. I have no knowledge of the statement beyond what was in the clipping. I presume the particular point the minister of planning and development in Toronto was discussing —in fact, as I recall it, the clipping so stated—was operations under section 35 of the National Housing Act, and, as hon. members know, that is the public housing section. This section is designed to meet a need normally arising out of metropolitan conditions wherein it is considered that all the taxpayers should be asked to provide housing for those citizens who are not otherwise able to obtain it. In such cases it is the responsibility of all the levels of government concerned to determine whether such conditions exist in any municipality.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SUGGESTED HOLIDAY ON SATURDAY FOLLOWING GOOD FRIDAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): On Tuesday, April 1, the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Richard) asked the Secretary of State if a holiday would be granted to civil servants on the Saturday following Good Friday. I understand that yesterday the cabinet discussed this matter. Will the minister state what action has been taken?

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): Consideration has been given to the suggestion of the hon. member for Ottawa East, but in the circumstances it has not been found feasible to accede to his request.

JAPANESE PEACE TREATY

APPROVAL OF TREATY SIGNED AT SAN FRANCISCO SEPTEMBER 8, 1951

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament approve the treaty of peace with Japan, declarations (2) of Japan and protocol, all as signed at San Francisco on the eighth day of September 1951, and that this house do approve the same.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, we have before us this afternoon what is indeed a very important resolution. I regret that, because of the arrangements for debate in this house during the first part of this session, it has not been found possible to debate this resolution before.

I want to join immediately with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) in expressing the hope that the treaty now under consideration will do all that they, and all the rest of us, desire.

The treaty before the house is, I suppose, one of the most magnanimous in history. So far as I am able to discover, what we usually call punitive clauses are almost entirely absent, and presumably the treaty is intended to lay the foundation for the building of a democratic and peaceful nation. Indeed, I think that is what the Department of External Affairs had in mind when, on page 23 of their report for 1951, they said this:

The treaty was generous, restoring sovereignty to Japan and placing no restrictions on its economy or on its ability to defend itself. Reconciliation, and not revenge, was the main goal. The signatory powers agreed that Japan should, in principle, pay reparations for the devastation and suffering it caused during the war.

Then, it added this:

However, they recognized that Japan lacked the physical capacity to recompense its wartime victims if it was to achieve a viable economy.

We join in the hope that the generous treatment thus accorded to Japan under this treaty will produce the desired results. Canadians generally, I am certain, will support the principle of treaties of this kind—treaties of reconciliation rather than revenge.

When we look back over the post-war years we remember that certain military and political leaders were tried and executed for what one must describe as the terrible atrocities and indescribable conditions which were made known to us both during the war and upon the return to their respective countries of those who suffered at the hands of the military arm of imperial Japan. And I want to make that distinction, because I do not think that the atrocities and cruelties that were inflicted on our nationals, and those engaged with us in the war, represented the will of the Japanese people.

I do not propose to recount the horrors reported from Hong Kong, Singapore and other parts of the Orient which the Japanese invaded. Suffice it to say that these were a repetition of the barbarities which the late prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, described to this house on March 10, 1942, which had aroused the horror of the civilized world at the time of the Nanking massacre in 1937, but of which the rest of the world took little heed when they occurred, and were perpetrated on the Chinese.

We accept the treaty, and we support, with some reservations, Canada's approval of it. We remember, too, that the armament of Japan was assisted by powerful commercial interests in North America including our own country. We of the C.C.F. protested against the export of vital war materials to that country in the years prior to the attack upon Pearl Harbor.

I do not propose to place upon the record the numerous references that can be found in Hansard between 1930 and 1941 to that effect, to confirm the attitude I say we consistently adopted throughout those fatal years. Suffice it to say that we protested vigorously against the strengthening of the Japanese army and armaments industry by large and continuous exports of basic materials such as copper, nickel, scrap iron and the like, all of which left our shores almost until the time of the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, and our declaration of war.

I remember that a clever versifier who writes under various names in British journals said this, shortly after the attack upon the Dutch East Indies:

We sent too little and too late
To save ourselves, to save the Dutch,
Because, unconscious of our fate,
We'd sold the enemy too much.

I think that little verse describes exactly what happened prior to the attack on Pearl Harbor. It is true that Canada was the first of the allied nations to declare war on Japan. The Canadian cabinet, as I remember it,—and I remember it well—after consultation by telephone with the then leader of the official opposition, the late Hon. R. B. Hanson, with the then leader of the Social Credit group, the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) and with myself, issued a proclamation on the evening of Sunday, December 7, the very day Pearl Harbor was attacked. Canada thus proclaimed that a state of war existed some hours before the United States or any other country was able to make a similar declaration.

Nor must we forget today, or fail indeed to pay tribute to, the ill-equipped Canadian troops at Hong Kong who suffered such serious casualties by the unprovoked attack, and the several thousands of them who languished, suffered and died in Japanese prison camps. We should remember these things—not for the sake of demanding revenge, but to remind us that any steps we take now should make it certain that neither we nor the rest of the world shall again be subjected to sudden and unprovoked attacks from that quarter.

So, in approving the generous treaty now before us, we are, as it were, forgetting and forgiving the sufferings which a militarized Japan inflicted upon a large section of the world. And I hope that no nation will endeavour to persuade the Japanese people again to militarize themselves. Indeed, the first acts of their own post-war Diet indicated that it was their wish to pursue a peaceful course; and we should help them in that desire.

This, I may say, is in line with our attitude throughout the post-war years, and indeed, if I may say so, stems too out of the feeling we had during the war that Canadian citizens of Japanese origin were subjected to hardships in our own country—but, of course, nothing comparable with what happened to our nationals who happened to be in Japan and the countries controlled by Japan during wartime.

Well, we are happy to note that there are indications that the Japanese people appreciate the fact that there are no humiliating and punitive provisions such as were to be found in the Versailles treaty signed with Germany in 1919. This of course is owing to the desire of the people in the democratic countries to promote good will among their former enemies, and also to the realities of the world situation. Japan is too vital a country strategically to be alienated from friendship with the democratic powers.

I have read carefully the testimony of Mr. John Foster Dulles before the committee on foreign relations of the United States senate when he appeared before that body on January 21 of this year. It is obvious that in his opinion the treaty has been made with an eye to the international situation, the struggle for men's minds, and the necessity of strengthening Japan against the possibility of communist aggression from the mainland.

Mr. Dulles implied—and from what I have been able to read of his statements from time to time, this opinion of mine is confirmed—that all encouragement must be given to the overthrow of the present government at Peking in China. In order to confirm my opinion, or at least to bring some authority to it, I think it would be well to place on the record a more extended quotation of what Mr. Dulles said before the senate committee on foreign affairs in the United States. At page 12 of the official report Mr. Dulles is quoted as having said:

> I can say to you with complete assurance that the best informed Japanese are totally convinced, as I think we are, that the alien doctrine of communism cannot permanently conquer the Chinese spirit or liquidate the innate individualism of the Chinese race. The Chinese nation will not permanently suffer the imposition of a tyranny which places it in the service of alien masters.
> There will be an end to a tyranny which the Chinese themselves will come more and more to hate. We should assume the impermanence, not the permanence, of the present Moscow oriented rule of China.

And note this:

> We cannot expect that this change in China will take place automatically.
> To realize that change will require something besides negative and purely defensive policies in Asia on the part of the free world, notably the United States. It will require a determination to promote freedom and independence in Asia and—

Note these words:

> —action consistent with that determination as opportunities arise.
> "The mood of the people of Japan, like the mood of other free peoples who are close neighbours of Asian communism, will, in the long run, largely depend on the attitude and action of the other free nations. If they persevere in positive policies in support of real national independence in Asia, Japan will be a dependable and able coadjutor."

I think this bears no other interpretation than the one that I placed upon it in my speech of March 6 last. This, too, I think, was emphasized by the United States approval of the tentative decision of the Japanese government to recognize the Formosan administration headed by Chiang Kai-shek as the government of China.

Of the Formosan situation and possible settlement Mr. Walter Lippmann says in his feature article in the Montreal Gazette today:

"First, that the Cairo declaration must be honoured, and that the Chinese suzerainty over Formosa will have to be recognized in a final peace settlement; and, second, that the Formosan people, who have never been governed from China, should not now be put under Chinese administration, but should be made into an autonomous state, guaranteed by the United Nations though under Chinese suzerainty —demilitarized except for a local Formosan militia, neutralized for military purposes against all the great powers including China, Japan, Russia and the United States; and, third, that Gen. Chiang Kai-shek and his family and retainers should be allowed to depart in safety from Formosa and granted asylum, preferably not in the Far East; and, fourth, that Chiang's troops should be demobilized and that those wishing it should be repatriated to their homes in China.

Proposals of this sort, if they were agreed to, could provide a basis for an armistice and a working arrangement in Korea, and for an approach to a cease-fire and an arrangement in Indo-China."

These are Mr. Lippmann's views with regard to the final settlement of Formosa's future as part of the general Far Eastern settlement after the Korean armistice has been achieved; and it is indeed in line with the policy that we have from time to time suggested here and elsewhere in the last six or seven months.

Of course this treaty with Japan, which is now before us, cannot be excluded from the discussion when the nations make any permanent Far Eastern settlement. I wish to say at once, as I have said before, that we support the policy enunciated from time to time by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on Canada's neutrality in connection with Formosa and the Formosan situation. The treaty now before us is not one which has been enthusiastically accepted by some nations which attached their signatures to it at San Francisco. I do not think we can accept it enthusiastically either.

It will be remembered that the French foreign affairs commission of the French national assembly, on August 10 of last year, passed a resolution, by twenty-one votes to two, deploring the fact that France had had no part in drawing up the outline of the treaty from the beginning. On August 3 last the Netherlands government made serious objections on the ground that no provision was made for reparations and there was no protection of the tuna fisheries off the coast of Dutch New Guinea.

The Australian government, as the hon. member for Peel said last night, when he quoted so extensively from Mr. Menzies' address on the occasion of the treaty coming before the Australian house, accepted it as a reasonable basis on which to bring about a settlement. But Dr. Evatt, who was the Australian minister of external affairs during a good part of the war and in the post-war period, strongly criticized it—and I use his words—as "appeasement of a cruel enemy", and stated that Australians of all parties viewed—and again I quote—the "clearly intended rearmament" of Japan with the deepest anxiety and resentment.

New Zealand made a somewhat similar protest. All parties in the Philippines joined on July 14, 1951, in a unanimous statement describing the treaty as calculated to restore Japan to a dominant position in Asia. Burma refused to sign it, as did India. On August 27, 1951, Prime Minister Nehru sent a message to the United States, in which he gave the reasons why India would not participate in this treaty. He said then:

"Throughout the negotiations that have taken place between the two governments—

That is, the government of India and the government of the United States. I continue:

—on the subject of the treaty, the government of India have laid emphasis upon two fundamental objectives: (1) The treaty terms should concede to Japan a position of honour, equality, and contentment among the community of free nations; (2) They should be so framed as to enable all the countries especially interested in the maintenance of a stable peace in the Far East to subscribe to the treaty sooner or later.

It goes on:

The government of India have, after most careful thought, come to the conclusion that the treaty does not in material respects satisfy either of these two criteria.

3. Condition (1)

(a) It is only natural to expect that Japan should desire restoration in full of her sovereignty over the territory of which the inhabitants have a historical affinity with her own people and which she has not acquired by aggression from any other country. The Ryukyu and Bonin islands fully satisfy this description. Nevertheless the treaty proposes that, until the United States government seek and obtain trusteeship over these islands, they should continue to be subject to the legislative and administrative control of the United States. It is apparent to the government of India that such an arrangement cannot but be a source of dissatisfaction to large sections of the Japanese people, and must carry the seed of future dispute—and possibly conflict—in the Far East.

(b) The government of India recognize that, as a sovereign nation, Japan should have the right to make arrangements for her defence as provided in article 5 of the treaty. If, in exercise of this right Japan should decide to enter in defensive agreements with friendly powers, no one could reasonably object to this. But such right should be exercised by the government of Japan, when Japan has become truly sovereign.

I think the point Nehru is making is that defensive alliance should await full sovereignty. I continue:

The provision in the treaty which suggests that present occupation forces may stay on in Japan as part of such defensive agreements is bound to give rise to the impression that the agreements do not represent a decision taken by Japan in full enjoyment of her freedom as a sovereign nation. The effect of this, not only on the people of Japan—

In my opinion what follows is equally or even more important.

The effect of this, not only on the people of Japan, but upon large sections of the people of Asia, is bound to be most unfortunate.

4. Condition (2). As already stated, the government of India attach the greatest importance to the treaty providing that the island of Formosa should be returned to China. The time and manner of such return might be the subject of separate negotiations,—

This is of course in line with what our Secretary of State for External Affairs has said. The paragraph goes on:

—but to leave the future of the island undetermined, in spite of past international agreements, in a document which attempts to regulate the relations of Japan with all governments that were engaged in the last war against her, does not appear to the government of India to be either just or expedient.

Again, I say, perhaps expedience may be a consideration which in the eyes of some might be the more impressive.

Mutatis mutandis, the same argument applies to the Kurile islands and to South Sakhalin.

The final paragraph which I shall read goes on to say:

For the foregoing reasons the government of India have decided with regret that they cannot be parties to this treaty. It is their sincere hope that a lasting peace will prevail in the Far East, and to that end they will continue to co-operate with the United States and other governments in such a manner as may be open to them consistently with the principles on which their foreign policy is based. As a first step, it is their intention, as soon as this may be practicable, to put an end to the state of war between them and Japan, and to establish full diplomatic relations with that country.

As I have said on more than one occasion, in dealing with Asian problems we should give considerable weight to the opinions of the government of India. Here we have a treaty which the governments of India and Burma have refused to sign and which that other great Asian nation, China, has not been invited to sign. We can see therefore that the great populations of Asia are not in agreement with this treaty, which is more vital to them than it is to Canada or perhaps even to any of the nations which attached their signatures to the treaty at San Francisco.

Thus the Pacific nations which ordinarily might be considered to be the most concerned in the provisions of the treaty were either critical, like the Philippines or Indonesia or some of the other powers that were interested, or refused altogether to approve it. As I have said, Japan's great neighbour, China, had no part in it. I say that this is a serious matter for the rest of the world.

What Canada's part in the actual making of the treaty was, of course, we do not know. We do know that consultations were held between our minister of external affairs and the Department of External Affairs, and Mr. Dulles and the state department of the United States; but what suggestions, what considerations or what modifications were advanced we do not know. Certainly our interest lies to a very large extent, not only in the political implications of this treaty, which are great, but in certain specific fields which are mainly economic.

Our trade with Japan prior to the war placed us in the position of fourth among the nations trading with that country in 1938, and third in 1951. Perhaps 1938 is not a good year to take as a criterion of our trade with Japan, because in that year our exports were largely of raw materials and potential war supplies, but 1951 is a criterion. In both those years our exports were mainly minerals, lumber and other raw materials. It is certain that if Japan is to improve her standard of living she must have raw materials. To improve her standard of living is in our opinion the best way to combat totalitarianism of any description. It must be remembered that there is more than one form of totalitarianism and Japan may be threatened by more than one form. Consequently she must have access to raw materials and to markets. Indeed her main market must be China and the Asian mainland.

Competition from low living standard areas is a threat, of course, to the higher standards of living of other countries. Japan's main market should be where manufactured articles from Japan are so badly needed, on the Asian mainland.

Indeed the United States as the occupying power has recognized this because she has not forbidden all trade with the Chinese mainland. The Japanese are trading with the Chinese today for raw materials and food in return for certain manufactured goods and materials.

To what extent the occupation forces in Japan have been able to improve living standards since the end of the war is problematical, but I believe they have done something toward this end. It is in this field that I think every effort must be made by the western powers to raise as rapidly as possible the standards of living of the Japanese workers, peasants and people generally. Indeed that is our protection against competition from all low living standard areas.

Canada's principal interest, as I said, is at the moment economic. Canada's principal economic interest in the text of the treaty is in connection with the conservation of our halibut, salmon and herring fisheries off the Pacific coast. I know that an agreement was made subsequently, but I contend that this treaty should have contained specific clauses binding the Japanese to observe any international conservation treaties that exist or are essential to the well-being of this great industry and this great source of food supply, not only for Canada but for the rest of the world.

Article 9 of the treaty only compels Japan to negotiate with the nations interested in conservation policies in the north Pacific, not to accept a treaty. I repeat that we believe the treaty should have committed her to the conclusion of a comprehensive treaty or treaties in this regard and on a long-term basis. I think our government can be criticized for its failure to secure a more specific understanding on this important matter before we attached our signature to the treaty. The temporary five-year agreement signed in December will be reviewed by our standing committee on marine and fisheries and then we shall have a better understanding of it. I hope it is a better agreement than I believe it to be at the moment.

What we are doing in approving this treaty, I take it, is to make a gesture of unprecedented good will and to help build a democratic Japan which will co-operate with the rest of the democratic world in promoting peace and good will among men in the Far East, in North America, in Europe, in Africa or wherever men may live. That is our hope in giving approval to this treaty, and only time will tell whether we are justified or not in placing so much faith in this country so soon after a long and aggressive war which brought so much suffering and inflicted so much cruelty upon the rest of the world, a war carried on under the leadership of the former militaristic government of imperial Japan.

I should like to read another comment by Walter Lippmann in an article from which I have already quoted appearing in today's Montreal Gazette. While at the moment it applies to Korea I think it has equal application to the treaty with Japan that we are now discussing. Indeed if we substituted Japan for Korea I think it has a bearing which we should take into consideration. Of course he is dealing with the present situation in Korea, but it applies equally to the Japanese treaty we are discussing now.

He says:

> A Korean treaty, which was not underwritten by the real government of China and the real government of Japan, is manifestly not going to be more than a very provisional arrangement. Fictitious governments can make only fictitious treaties. No matter how superior they may be morally to the actual governments, the treaties they could sign about the Far East would be like the cheques drawn by a high-born gentleman who has overdrawn his account.

To what extent the present government of Japan is, in the sense in which he uses the word, a fictitious government I am not in a position to say, but it is a government that has been elected while the country has been under the control of an army of occupation. It may not of course be a fictitious government, but the point he makes is well taken. Let us hope that the cheque we are endorsing this afternoon will not one day prove to have been drawn on an already overdrawn account.

Mr. Fraser: A rubber one.

Mr. Coldwell: While we have, as I have said, important reservations about this treaty, we accept it. We accept it as a gesture of reconciliation and an expression of our desire for a peaceful settlement not only of the war with Japan but of Far Eastern problems. That under the circumstances is indeed all that we can do, though we are far from satisfied with the treaty and far from satisfied, in view of the absence of India, Burma and China from the signatories of the treaty, that it will endure. However, with such reservations we accept it.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, at first glance the Japanese peace treaty, which is before us for consideration today, appears to be a soft treaty. Perhaps that is why so many people have spoken of it as a soft treaty, meaning, I take it, that they think it does not impose upon the vanquished nation the same kind of retributive conditions which we are accustomed to seeing victor nations impose in the form of so-called peace treaties. I have learned that there is much resentment amongst the Japanese people over this soft treaty talk. They do not think it is an easy treaty in any respect, and unless the rank and file of the Japanese people can feel easy in their minds about it and can be brought to accept it without too many reservations then the treaty itself is bound to fail.

In my opinion there are features of the treaty which indicate that we have learned a few things as a result of the mistakes that victor nations have made in the past. The treaty in some respects does mark progress toward real enlightenment since the days of the treaty of Versailles which ended the first world war. The severely retributive nature of the treaty of Versailles prepared the soil and sowed the seeds of world war II. But I cannot agree with those who claim that the Japanese peace treaty is soft and that it does not contain the seeds of future war. I am convinced that it does contain seeds of discontent which may lead to war in the future. In my judgment in one respect at least the treaty is retributive; and, since it is retributive, no matter to how small an extent, then I claim it does not lay down a solid foundation for peace nor a reasonable basis for firm faith and good will between the Japanese people and the western Christian nations.

Today the Japanese people are openly and volubly complaining about the territorial losses imposed by the treaty. I have to ask myself whether these complaints are justified or whether they are merely the protest of a people who are expected to put on a show but who know that they have not much, if any, real reason to kick. I suggest that the answer must be sought in the facts about Japan's productive capacity, her food problems, her population and her history. I should like to refer briefly to the section of the treaty purporting to adjust territories, chapter II. The first subsection of article 2 reads as follows:

Japan, recognizing the independence of Korea, renounces all right, title and claim to Korea, including the islands of Quelpart, Port Hamilton and Dagelet.

With respect to Korea, Mr. Speaker, note that according to the treaty Japan recognizes the independence of a Korea the southern part of which Japan has held more or less tightly or loosely since the Empress Jingū put it under Japanese rule late in the fourth century. That is a long time. Japan has never abrogated the rights she obtained by conquest in Korea. Yet we come along and shear away territories she has held and rights she felt she was justified in holding and in claiming that have their roots away back in the fourth century. Subsection (b) of article 2 reads:

Japan renounces all right, title and claim to Formosa and the Pescadores.

I would point out that according to Japanese history Formosa has been held by Japan since it was ceded to her by the treaty of Shimonoseki, I think it was called, in 1895 at the conclusion of the war with China. That goes a long way back. Suppose we began to shear away territories from Great Britain that she obtained through treaty no longer ago than 1895.

Mr. Blackmore: Or the United States.

Mr. Low: Yes. I wonder what the situation would be. Subsection (c) of article 2 reads:

Japan renounces all right, title and claim to the Kurile islands—

[Mr. Low.]

Let me interpolate that Japan exchanged Sakhalin for the Kurile islands in 1875.

—and to that portion of Sakhalin and the islands adjacent to it over which Japan acquired sovereignty as a consequence of the treaty of Portsmouth of September 5, 1905.

That goes back a long way, to the end of the Russo-Japanese war.

So it goes on. I will not weary the house by reading the remaining portion of article 2, but I do point out that we are doing a serious thing when we shear away territories to which Japan obtained right and title many years ago, which historically she has never abrogated at any time. Then it seems to me article 3, still dealing with territorial adjustment, gives Russia and the communist leaders every opportunity to say here is a fine example of high-handed United States imperialism. Are we going to play into the hands of Moscow? I feel we should have used better judgment than this. Note the words:

Japan will concur—

How? By having her nose stuck right in it.

—in any proposal of the United States to the United Nations to place under its trusteeship system, with the United States as the sole administering authority, Nansei Shoto south of 29 degrees north latitude (including the Ryukyu islands and the Daito islands), Nanpo Shoto south of Sofu Gan (including the Bonin islands, Rosario island and the Volcano islands) and Parece Vela and Marcus island. Pending the making of such a proposal and affirmative action thereon, the United States will have the right to exercise all and any powers of administration, legislation and jurisdiction over the territory and inhabitants of these islands, including their territorial waters.

That gives these people in the communist nations behind the iron curtain plenty of scope to make the claim, and document it to some extent, that the United States is indeed imperialistic in its designs. I should have thought we would avoid such a thing in days as dangerous as these. I believe some of these territories have been of tremendous importance to Japan for many years. They are areas in which Japan has been very largely able to build up her population, and when contemplating this treaty I am led to ask myself: Can Japan afford to lose them? Can she possibly feed, clothe and shelter her present population without these territories? Can she do that with any degree of success, as measured by the happiness and well-being of the Japanese people? Let us just take a quick look at the population of Japan and the food problem, in order to reach some sort of judgment on these questions. The estimated population of Japan today is 83 million, exclusive of Korea and Formosa. The average density of population for the whole country is close to 500 per square mile. Think of that. Then when we calculate the density of that population in relation to the cultivated area, the Japanese density is around 3,000 per square mile, which is twice that of Belgium and four times that of England.

Let us look at these things squarely. Japan has experienced a tremendous increase in population since 1852, when Commodore Perry signed a treaty with the shogun. At that time the population stood at 27 million; but after 1852 improved living conditions, progressive improvement in agriculture, industrial growth, the expansion of their territory and the intelligent colonization of the territories that were acquired stimulated the population increase so that by 1927 there were 61,316,000 people in Japan, again exclusive of Formosa and Korea. So that we can have a basis for comparison. Since 1927 the population is estimated to have increased at the rate of 750,000 per year.

What about emigration? What has it done to relieve the situation? Emigration has been negligible. Not more than 20,000 a year of that 750,000 increase have emigrated from the country.

Mr. Blackmore: Or been permitted to emigrate.

Mr. Low: By nature the Japanese have been a stay-at-home people. They have not been inclined to settle even in Korea and Formosa, their own territories, without having considerable pressure brought to bear upon them. The question is this, and in my judgment it is a very serious question: how to feed the rapidly growing population of Japan. I say that is the beginning and the end of the population problem for Japan; how to feed and clothe them. The country must be considered poor by comparison with most countries of the world. Japan has only a small tillable area with fertile soil, as everyone knows who is familiar with her geography. Most of Japan is rough volcanic rock; and the climatic conditions and soil are such that no edible animals have ever been indigenous to the country. Few acres of grass lands exist on which to pasture cattle or sheep or other meat producing animals. Consequently the Japanese have rarely been able to consume much meat. In 1931 the per capita consumption of meat in Japan was two and one-half pounds. That seems unbelievable, doesn't it, when we realize that in the same year the average American consumed 280 pounds of meat. Stop to think about it and you begin to see the magnitude of the problem faced by 83 million people. It is true the lack of meat is compensated for to some extent by rather extensive fisheries, and of course we recognize that fish is good food.

The main universal article of diet in Japan is rice; but in spite of a fairly large production of this grain Japan has by no means become self-sufficient in its diet. Even while holding Korea, Formosa and the islands and territories now being shorn away by this treaty, the Japanese were greatly worried over the problem of feeding their hungry millions. The ever normal granary in that country, I would think, decade after decade was never more than 25 million bushels of rice. That is a rather slim resource with which to take care of 83 million people.

So I say that even before the war the Japanese were greatly worried about the rapidly growing population in relation to their available food supplies. Even at that time the Japanese people realized only too well that it is difficult to be happy and contented on a beggar's ration. So even before the war of 1939-45 considerable scientific discussion took place in Japan as to the possible need to return to the birth control measures which were practised fairly extensively and in various forms in earlier times. I imagine if one were to travel through Japan today he would find such discussions going on in intellectual circles.

In the light of all I have said about food and territories, and many other things that could be cited—of course I am only touching the surface—what terrible consequences are bound to follow the imposition of the territory reduction clauses of the treaty now before us? Is it to be considered that the Japanese race have not the right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness? Or are we to force upon them a peace treaty parts of which must be couched in punitive terms because Japan went to war against the United States in 1941 and lost that war?

Let us make it abundantly clear that in anything I have to say in connection with this treaty this afternoon I want it to be understood that I deplored at that time the growth of Japan's military junta which, in so many respects, resembled the German war lords, the Junkers machine. I did not in any way defend the sudden development of fascism and the fascist state which was Japan in 1941, nor did I excuse Japan's lightning attack on Pearl Harbor nor the bestial atrocities committed during the war. I condemned those things in the strongest possible way then as I condemn them now. In spite of all those reprehensible things I must say that the territorial adjustments in this treaty are punitive. If Japan had a hard time feeding, clothing and housing her millions of citizens while she held Korea, Formosa, the Kuriles and all those other territories that are being shorn away by this treaty, how can anyone in his right mind expect her to look after the people adequately after such drastic territorial reductions as we are now asked to approve? If that does not contain seeds of discontent and war, then I should like to be set right.

Let us take a look at another feature of the treaty which I feel sometimes escapes notice. For just a minute or two I am going to speak about trade, which takes me over to article 12 in the treaty. In my judgment article 12 definitely puts a limitation upon Japanese trade. In the first subsection, Japan declares its readiness to promptly enter into negotiations for the conclusion with each of the allied powers of treaties or agreements to place their trading, maritime and other commercial relations on a stable and friendly basis. Well, that is good.

Section (b) of article 12 states:

> Pending the conclusion of the relevant treaty or agreement, Japan will, during a period of four years from the first coming into force of the present treaty,
> (1) accord to each of the allied powers, its nationals, products and vessels
> (i) most-favoured-nation treatment with respect to customs duties, charges, restrictions and other regulations on or in connection with the importation and exportation of goods;

And so on. This only imposes what the United States has been itching to impose upon other nations in the world, the unconditional most-favoured-nation trading clause in treaties. Let me say this. This section of the treaty imposes a serious limitation in Japan's trade. It imposes or seeks to impose upon Japan utopian ideas which, because of the United States refusal to be realistic, are utterly impossible of successful application in a world such as we live in today. That being the case, Mr. Speaker, it contains the seeds of discontent which may at any time—

Mr. Pearson: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Low: Yes.

Mr. Pearson: Will he read section (c) of article 12 on that point?

Mr. Low: Yes, I noticed the escape clause. But, Mr. Speaker, just let me suggest as a reply, and I do so without strong feeling one way or another, that the minister say whether it is not true that the sole judge as to what constitutes essential security or unreasonableness will be the United States of America, who imposed the most-favoured-nation clause upon Japan in the first place. Now, it is quite correct, and I shall read section (d)—

Mr. Pearson: Section (c).

Mr. Low: Sections (c) and (d). I should like to read section (d) as the answer to any application of this article. It reads:

> In the application of this article, a discriminatory measure shall not be considered to derogate from the grant of national or most-favoured-nation treatment, as the case may be, if such measure is based on an exception customarily provided for in the commercial treaties of the party applying it, or on the need to safeguard that party's external financial position or balance of payments (except in respect to shipping and navigation), or on the need to maintain its essential security interests, and provided such measure is proportionate to the circumstances and not applied in an arbitrary or unreasonable manner.

Now, Mr. Speaker, who is it that judges that? It is one nation. Under those circumstances, the escape clause means nothing. If Japan is going to trade at all she will have to accept what is set out in article 12, section (b) (1), the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause. We hope that Japan in the days ahead will do just exactly as the minister said he hoped she would do last night, that is follow internationally accepted fair trade practices. I hope that that will be true, and I feel quite sure that unless her trading relations are too severely circumscribed Japan will have that will. But imposing upon Japan the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause in trade treaties is not the way to ensure this fair trade practice. This clause will place drastic limitations upon Japan's trade, and Japan is already having plenty of trouble in this field.

For a moment I should like to point out an article in the April 5 issue of "Foreign Trade", put out by the Department of Trade and Commerce. On page 411 we find this information concerning Japan's trade pattern changes:

> Japan's exports for 1951, according to the Ministry of Finance, were valued at $1,365 million, 64·9 per cent above the 1950 total of $828 million. On the other hand, imports were valued at $2,043 million, 111·3 per cent over the previous year's total of $967 million.
> The uneven distribution of Japan's imports and exports between the dollar and sterling areas presents a serious problem. In 1950, 47 per cent of Japan's exports went to the dollar area, 29 per cent to the sterling area, and 24 per cent to the open account areas. Japan's imports that year followed much the same pattern: 44 per cent from the dollar area, 31 per cent from the sterling area, and 25 per cent from the open account areas.

Let me emphasize this part of the article on page 411 of "Foreign Trade".

> The pattern changed in 1951, with 24 per cent of Japan's exports going to the dollar area, 42 per cent to the sterling area, and 34 per cent to the open account areas. Against this, 56 per cent of imports came from the dollar area, 25 per cent from the sterling area, and 19 per cent from the open account areas. As a result, Japan's foreign trade with the dollar area showed a large unfavourable balance, while trade with the sterling area showed a substantial credit balance. The sterling balance accumulated rapidly in the final quarter of the year and the government took action to encourage more imports from the sterling area and, where possible, to switch the purchase of essential materials from the dollar to the sterling countries.

Then, in conclusion the article says this, and it seems to me it is very pertinent:

Japan cannot continue to buy from the dollar area and sell in the sterling area. Efforts must be made to increase exports and to bring prices into line with those in world markets. The country must be able to produce, economically and efficiently, goods of a standard acceptable in world markets.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, how can they do that if they suffer limitations on their trade, and if they are circumscribed by the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause which I think aggravated, if it did not cause, the war between that country and the United States. I do not wish to take up too much time on this occasion, but once again let me say that I believe the treaty, in many of its features, is a good treaty. I believe that in perhaps most of its features it can be said to be a fair treaty, and it is gratifying to me today to see the end of a state of war with Japan.

We approve of the resolution, but we do so with some reluctance and with some reservation. It may be, as the minister said last night, the best possible treaty under all the circumstances. I do not know. But we warn all men that the treaty, generous as it is in some respects, still contains the seeds either of another war or of the destruction of the nations and the peoples who, with reasonable Christian treatment, could be induced to stand solidly with the democracies and the western nations, and to contribute substantially to the welfare of humanity. We denounce, of course, those parts of the treaty which we believe sow the seeds of dissension and possibly of war.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise at this time to make a lengthy speech, but merely to say that I have been keenly interested in what has been said by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), and the aspect of the matter with which he dealt. I do hope the minister will, as I have no doubt he intends to do, answer in considerable detail what has been said.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped there would be considerably more discussion of this important treaty, and a great many more members in the house to consider it than we see here this afternoon. As the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) has indicated, now is the time when we lay or do not lay the foundation for world war III—when we are considering the treaties of peace, by, through, and as a result of, which we terminate recent wars.

This treaty must be judged in the light of the answer to these questions: To what extent is the treaty likely to sow the seeds of an inevitable future war? To what extent is it likely to give the Japanese encouragement to become the great and friendly Christian nation we hope for—or, if not a Christian nation, at least a religious and God-fearing nation, observing the principles of righteous living?

Before proceeding to what I intend to say, I am tempted to refer briefly to the atrocities committed by the military caste in Japan. I believe in this connection I can use a homely illustration. If you torment a bull until you get him so angry that he is almost utterly mad, do not be surprised by anything he does to you, once he starts.

That must be borne in mind. The great question we need to ask ourselves is this: In what sort of absolutely impossible position were the Japanese people placed, and for how long had that impossible position been developing? What evidence did they have that there was utterly no way out of their difficulty, except by the bloody arbitrament of war, and how fully were they convinced that if they did not destroy their enemy, then ultimately their enemy would utterly destroy them?

Those are the questions which must be asked. If a man is sufficiently convinced that another man wants to destroy him, and is going to destroy him, then the first man will do everything within his power to destroy the second, before that second man acts. It is much the same with nations.

Having said that, I think we must look with a measure of indulgence or, shall I say, charity, on the atrocities committed by the Japanese as well as by the Germans in the great struggle. I am not condoning those things. I am merely seeking to understand, and to make allowances for them.

Turning to the treaty under consideration I would say that as an instrument having for its purpose the termination of hostilities, the present peace treaty might be acceptable; but as an instrument for establishing peace and prosperity and freedom among men, it is gravely deficient, and therefore unacceptable. This does not mean I propose to vote against it. The position I shall take has been expressed admirably by the hon. member for Peace River.

Let me lay down a few general and fundamental principles—and for anyone who happens to be interested I would refer him to my speech of April 2 which, in a way, was simply the procedure of laying the foundation for the speech I intend to deliver today. This is a practical application of the principles I therein laid down.

Every nation, every people, every community on earth has an inherent right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness—pursuit of happiness regardless of race, colour, creed or geographical position. This is the situation, provided, first, that the world's resources are adequate to support such a standard of living and, secondly, that the community under consideration is willing to pull its full share of the load of production, distribution and management of the goods and services required by mankind.

There is some argument among men as to whether the world has the resources. I think from the evidence at my disposal it is beyond all shadow of doubt that the world does have the resources from which people now living on earth can, if they so choose, produce all the goods that all the people of the whole world need, in order to give them life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

Anyone who is at all familiar with the Japanese will freely acknowledge that individually and collectively the Japanese willingly and effectually pull their share of the load, and have done so ever since we first knew them. They are energetic, skilful, resourceful, sober, industrious and patient. They are highly intelligent, highly conscientious, highly talented, honourable and highly ambitious. They are earnest, sincere, self-sacrificing and realistic. They are deeply religious and reverent, nobly proud, sensitive and loyal. They are admirably cultured, refined and law-abiding.

I have had the advantage of having taught scores upon scores of Japanese boys and girls in schools. I have the honour of representing thousands of them who live in my constituency, whom I have seen in action, and who have proved the truth of what I say concerning them.

Beyond all shadow of doubt the Japanese have pulled adequately their load, or their share of the load, and are willing to continue to do so if we white people can only somehow or other acquire sense enough to set up an economic system in the world under which they will have a chance to pull their share. And this latter "if" is a major consideration in all our discussions at the present time. Such facts being borne in mind, we must agree that the Japanese have, and should be guaranteed—and I repeat "guaranteed"—their inherent right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. By that I do not mean that we necessarily need to give them goods. I do not even mean that we need to accept their goods in exchange for our goods. I mean that we must set up such an arrangement of circumstances as will give them the full chance to work to earn their way. That will be all they will ever ask. Does this present Japanese peace treaty adequately support them in that right which I have laid down and which I believe all people will freely concede?

To all those who have read through the treaty with impartial care, and who have studied the meaning and implication of certain of its clauses, studied them with understanding and appreciation, against the background of Japanese and United States history over the century just past, to all those, it is patently evident that in the economic field the treaty deprives the Japanese of that economic freedom of action which is indispensable to them, if they are to gain for themselves a fair share of the good things which the world's peoples could and would and should produce.

Furthermore, the treaty makes no apparent provision for the removal of the great basic, inescapable, unsupportable and intolerable cause which impelled the Japanese to enter world war II. That cause, as I will later develop, was the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause, as insisted upon by the United States, and I propose to prove it.

The punitive, the punishing clauses of the treaty, as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) has so well pointed out, wrest from Japan numbers of possessions which, in her struggle to make a living, were of substantial assistance to Japan. They thereby leave Japan, economically speaking, much more vulnerable than she was before world war II, unless compensatory measures, ample and adequately perpetual, be guaranteed that nation, until such time as Japan might, with realism, be said to have acquired the actual means of earning her living among the nations.

Unfortunately, I had to be out of the house for a minute or two. I was called out and I am not just sure what the hon. member for Peace River put on the record, but I am impressed with article 10 of the treaty. Let me read article 10 to show how far afield the great United States went to wrest from Japan the advantage which she had gained through the years:

> Japan renounces all special rights and interests in China, including all benefits and privileges resulting from the provisions of the final protocol signed at Peking on September 7, 1901,—

Imagine going back there. I continue:

> —and all annexes, notes and documents supplementary thereto, and agrees to the abrogation in respect to Japan of the said protocol, annexes, notes and documents.

It would take a panel of "Philadelphia lawyers" to prove that that was not punitive; it strains in the matter of being punitive. It looks as though it were dictated by a nation which was literally determined to destroy Japanese power and national independence and efficiency outright, regardless of the pretty words—most of which are weasel words—which might be used by the United States in this or any other connection by that nation.

Are such punitive measures warrantable? Some will say: "Well, look what the Japanese did to us. They deserve to be treated that way!" Well, those who know history raise this question: Look at what we did to the Japanese for fifty years! Let us get that out into the open and see what allowances we ought to make for that.

Is this neglect to provide for the removal of the fundamental cause of Japanese participation in world war II justifiable? I will say certainly it is not.

This brings us to the question: What caused the Japanese to strike at the United States at Pearl Harbor? The cause of world war II between Japan and the United States was the United States' insistence, as I indicated a moment ago, upon Japanese acceptance of the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause in trading.

Japan is a "have-not" nation. Long experience had convinced the Japanese that if they were ever to be able to give their people a standard of living consonant with an age of abundance through machines, technological skills such as plastics, and the use of solar power, in a world as richly endowed as this in which we dwell, if she were ever to be able to give her people an equitable share of the good things our world can produce, then she must co-operate with other "have-not" nations by the use of devices resembling imperial preferences which the British empire had employed so successfully through the years, and especially since 1932.

Now, the great question when we undertake to appraise the iniquity, or lack of it, in the Japanese, in attacking at Pearl Harbor, the great question we have to look at is this: Did the Japanese have a perfect right to work with other little nations, other "have-not" nations, by the use of imperial preferences or something resembling them? Did they have the right to do that? Were they committing a crime which deserved to be punished by the outrageous measures which I have indicated, when they insisted they ought to be able to use imperial preferences, preferential treatment, such as the British had used? I doubt whether any member in this house would rise and say that they did not have the right to use preferences such as we had used, and such as we shall use again if we have right good sense, and can ever get ourselves out from under the domination of the United States long enough to do it. That is what Japan insisted on, the right to work with other little fellows like herself through employment of preferences.

Because the United States refused to grant her that right, and insisted, as I will show, then the Japanese decided there was only one thing to do about it. Probably we should be appreciating the fact that they were so long-suffering before they made up their minds to that extent. Japan conceived of making such arrangements as imperial preferential arrangements with her neighbour "have-not" nations, particularly China. The United States was determined that the Japanese people should not use imperial preferences in dealing with China. The Japanese held out with the obstinacy of despair, just as, Mr. Speaker, I will warrant any group of men from this house would do if they were placed under the same set of circumstances. The United States insisted right up to November 26, as I will show, if I have time enough to put on record the quotations at my disposal.

The United States had already seriously hurt the Japanese. How? First, she froze Japanese credits in the United States in 1938. Second, the Anglo-American trade agreement which she forced upon Great Britain in 1938 rigidly applied the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause against Japan. Third, she gave notice to Japan in July 1939 that she would terminate in six months the United States-Japanese commercial treaty of 1911 because the United States felt that that treaty was not affording adequate protection to United States commerce, either in Japan or Japanese-controlled areas in China, and because the most-favoured-nation clause in that treaty—not unconditional in that case—was a bar to the adoption by the United States of retaliatory measures against Japanese commerce—what do you think about denouncing a treaty because of those two reasons? Fourth, she applied moral embargoes against the Japanese in 1938 and 1939. The result of this move on the part of the United States, together with the conditions prevailing generally throughout the world as a result of the depression, rendered the position of Japan practically intolerable.

The United States, because of her economic strength, was in a position to hurt the Japanese even more seriously. The Japanese chose what appeared to them to be the most advantageous time for success, and they struck. They struck while we were occupied with Germany and Italy so that they had the best chance of succeeding that probably they would have in a hundred years.

What evidence can be brought forward in support of my position? There are three main classes of evidence. First are the documents bearing directly upon the United States-Japanese war which provide unanswerable evidence that the United States demands as regards the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause caused the war. Second, incidents from recent history illustrate the results of United States policy as a result of the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause from, we will say, 1922, when she declared it, and began to put it into operation, right down to the present time. All of which goes to show that the United States was already causing painful difficulty to nations all over the world because she was insisting on the application of that iniquitous unconditional most-favoured-nation clause.

The third set of evidences would be made up of the pronouncements of United States public men during the last twenty years which proved that they were convinced of the efficacy of the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause and were resolved to force it upon other nations. Their declarations concerning the Bretton Woods agreement are a good example. Their declarations concerning the importance of the Geneva trade agreements and the international trade organization, which I referred to the other day, are also evidence. Probably I shall not have time enough to go into these two latter matters in detail, although I have the information under my hand so that I could do so if it were considered fitting, or if we had time.

Now, what caused the Japanese to go to war? I should like to read from a United States source, the conclusions of the U.S. army Pearl Harbor board issued on October 20, 1944, and published on August 29, 1945. I shall read only one conclusion, which is as follows:

C. We turn now to responsibilities:

1. The secretary of state—the Honourable Cordell Hull. The action of the secretary of state in delivering the counter-proposals of Nov. 26, 1941, was used by the Japanese as the signal to begin the war by the attack on Pearl Harbor. To the extent that it hastened such attack it was in conflict with the efforts of the war and navy departments to gain time for preparations for war. However, war with Japan was inevitable and imminent because of irreconcilable disagreements between the Japanese empire and the American government.

No statement, as you see, as to what is the nature of the disagreement! I shall have to turn to other documents to find that. I read now an extract from a "memorandum of a conversation between the secretary of state and the Japanese Ambassador Nomura" on October 2, 1941, in Washington. I quote:

The ambassador said that he felt that the only point on which he anticipated difficulty in the two governments reaching an agreement was in regard to the question of retention of Japanese troops in China. He thought that, with regard to the question of discrimination, the Japanese government would meet us. The secretary emphasized that in his opinion no country would stand to gain more than Japan from the general universal application of the most favoured nation principle. The secretary added that he would like to give the ambassador a report of the Lima conference containing the resolutions adopted in regard to economic matters and he suggested that the Japanese government might be interested in adopting similar policies in the Far East. The ambassador said that Japanese present-day thought with respect to regional economic blocs—

Which of course is the principle of little-boy nations getting together and playing the game according to their own little-boy rules.

—was the result of circumstances, that is to say, of measures taken by other countries such as the empire preferences introduced at Ottawa. The secretary replied that he had been fighting such measures as those taken at Ottawa and he would like to have Japan join with the United States in fighting for liberal economic policies.

How could the cause I have named be more clearly indicated than in that passage? I turn now to an extract from a memorandum of a conversation between the secretary of state and Japanese Ambassador Nomura and Mr. Kurusu at Washington on November 18, 1941, and I quote:

The secretary pointed out also that we are even now engaged in efforts to induce the British empire to reduce its empire preferences. He said that what we desire is to put our people back to work in a way that can never be accomplished through permitting armies to overrun countries. The secretary observed that many Japanese spokesmen had spoken of Japan's desire to have a controlling influence in Eastern Asia, but the only kind of controlling influence which was worth anything was one which could not be achieved or maintained by the sword. He dwelt briefly upon what we have accomplished in South America through our peaceful policies and through renouncing the employment of gunboats and armed forces.

Once more we have a reference to the imperial preferences which the British had been using, measures which would be in violation of the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause!

I quote now from a document handed by the secretary of state to Japanese Ambassador Nomura at Washington, November 26, 1941. I think I shall have to give these excerpts more in detail than I intended because otherwise people may think that I am not quite fair. This reads:

Outline of Proposed Basis for Agreement Between the United States and Japan

Section 1.

Draft Mutual Declaration of Policy.

The government of the United States and the government of Japan both being solicitous for the peace of the Pacific affirm that their national policies are directed toward lasting and extensive peace throughout the Pacific area, that they have no territorial designs in that area, that they have no intention of threatening other countries or of using military force aggressively against any neighbouring nation, and that, accordingly, in their national policies they will actively support and give practical application to the following fundamental principles upon which their relations with each other and with all other governments are based:

I skip the first two principles and read the third. It is as follows:

The principle of equality, including equality of commercial opportunity and treatment.

These are the same weasel words which the United States uses all the time and which mean the destruction of the imperial preference principles and the application of the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause. I continue:

4. The principle of reliance upon international co-operation and conciliation for the prevention and pacific settlement of controversies and for improvement of international conditions by peaceful methods and processes. The government of Japan and the government of the United States have agreed that towards eliminating chronic political instability, preventing recurrent economic collapse, and providing a basis for peace, they will actively support and practically apply the following principles in their economic relations with each other and with other nations and peoples:

1. The principle of non-discrimination in international commercial relations.

That is just as clear as words can make it.

2. The principle of international economic co-operation and abolition of extreme nationalism as expressed in excessive trade restrictions.

3. The principle of non-discriminatory access by all nations to raw material supplies.

4. The principle of full protection of the interests of consuming countries and populations as regards the operation of international commodity agreements.

5. The principle of establishment of such institutions and arrangements of international finance as may lend aid to the essential enterprises and the continuous development of all countries and may permit payments through processes of trade consonant with the welfare of all countries.

A well informed person reading No. 5 thinks immediately of Bretton Woods, the international monetary fund.

Section 2.

Steps to be taken by the government of the United States and by the government of Japan.

The government of the United States and the government of Japan propose to take steps as follows:

(1) The government of the United States and the government of Japan will endeavour to conclude a multilateral non-aggression pact among the British Empire, China, Japan, The Netherlands, the Soviet Union, Thailand and the United States.

From No. 2 I select the following words in the interests of brevity:

Such agreement would provide also that each of the governments party to the agreement would not seek or accept preferential treatment in its trade or economic relations with Indo-China and would use his influence to obtain for each of the signatories equality of treatment in trade and commerce with French Indo-China.

Once more the most-favoured-nation clause simply screams out. Then I come to No. 6 which reads:

(6) The government of the United States and the government of Japan will enter into negotiations for the conclusion between the United States and Japan of a trade agreement, based upon reciprocal most-favoured-nation treatment and reduction of trade barriers by both countries, including an undertaking by the United States to bind raw silk on the free list.

May I make the comment that the United States has a tariff protection and a system of import restrictions which is so high and so efficient that any other nation on the earth can reduce its trade by a certain amount and the United States can reduce correspondingly and still beat that nation hands down. No. 8 reads as follows:

(8) Both governments will agree upon a plan for the stabilization of the dollar-yen rate, with the allocation of funds adequate for this purpose, half to be supplied by Japan and half by the United States.

That is pretty conclusive, is it not? It does not leave very much room for doubt.

I come now to quotations from a memorandum handed by Japanese Ambassador Nomura to the secretary of state at 2.20 p.m., December 7, 1941. From this rather extended document in which the Japanese realistically and factually, and I believe truthfully, discussed the issues at stake between the United States and Japan I select one or two salient passages. The Japanese are talking. My first quotation reads as follows:

The American government advocates in the name of world peace those principles favourable to it and urges upon the Japanese government acceptance thereof. The peace of the world may be brought about only by discovering a mutually acceptable formula through recognition of the reality of the situation and mutual appreciation of one another's position. An attitude such as ignores realities and imposes one's selfish views upon others will scarcely serve the purpose of facilitating the consummation of negotiations.

How could the case be more beautifully and realistically put? I find my time is passing. I shall have to leave out some of what it would be appropriate to read into Hansard. I shall however read two more passages from this document:

Apart from the fact that such a proposal totally ignores the position of France, it is unacceptable to the Japanese government in that such an arrangement cannot but be considered as an extension to French Indo-China of a system similar to the nine power treaty structure which is the chief factor responsible for the present predicament of East Asia.

This is the Japanese speaking. I should like to read one more quotation, the closing words, reading as follows:

Thus, the earnest hope of the Japanese government to adjust Japanese-American relations and to preserve and promote the peace of the Pacific through co-operation with the American government has finally been lost. The Japanese government regrets to have to notify hereby the American government that in view of the attitude of the American government it cannot but consider that it is impossible to reach an agreement through further negotiations.

That is pathetic, is it not? There are the last words that passed between the two nations before they were in a state of war.

I should like now to read a quotation from a memorandum with respect to the conversation between the secretary of state and the Japanese Ambassador Nomura and Mr. Kurusu. It reads as follows:

After the secretary had read two or three pages—

That refers to the document I have just been quoting.

—he asked the ambassador whether this document was presented under instructions of the Japanese government. The ambassador replied that it was. The secretary as soon as he had finished reading the document turned to the Japanese ambassador and said, "I must say that in all my conversations with you (the Japanese ambassador) during the last nine months I have never uttered one word of untruth. This is borne out absolutely by the record. In all my fifty years of public service I have never seen a document that was more crowded with infamous falsehoods and distortions—infamous falsehoods and distortions on a scale so huge that I never imagined until today that any government on this planet was capable of uttering them.

The Japanese all the way through had been realistic and truthful. The Americans simply imagined they themselves were, just as they do today. It must be obvious that the reason why the Japanese struck was, as they said in the closing words of the second last document from which I quoted, that there was just no real use of trying to reason with the United States in a realistic manner at all. Having been brought to that conclusion by decades of experience and by months of negotiations and conferences, what is the degree of culpability which must be attached to the Japanese for the attack on Pearl Harbor? And what is the degree of inescapable culpability which must be attached to the United States? I suppose no person or combination of persons alive can possibly answer that question exactly right. Even if they did, the answer would probably be disagreed with by pretty nearly everybody. Nevertheless I quote all this to show that the trouble is not all on one side, and that the trouble is not going to be all on one side in the days yet to come, if the United States insists on the senseless attitude she is now adopting in respect of the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause in the trade arrangements among nations.

Just before I conclude, in addition to the fine array of evidence the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) marshalled before us this afternoon I would like to recall to hon. members that the Japanese people are living in a territory no larger than the state of California. Tell me, any member on any side of the house: how would you feel about trying to cram 83 million people into California and provide for them? How would you like to govern California with 83 million people in it? If you did have 83 million people crowded into the state of California, under such restrictions that not one of them could leave and go to any other country because the other countries would not accept them, any more than Canada would, so they had to stay there and ultimately die there—

Mr. Sinnott: That is why they attacked Pearl Harbor. They wanted to get out of Japan.

Mr. Blackmore: How would you feel about that? And suppose you were ruling California with 83 million Japanese in it trying to find food, clothing and shelter for them, cut off from all the world; suppose you were able to create industrial plants as a result of which you could produce nearly any manufactured product better and cheaper than almost any other nation in the world, and then found yourself hampered and trammelled on every hand by a monster nation like the United States, with not quite twice the number of people in the most productive and resourceful land on earth. If you found the United States interfering with you at every turn when you undertook to trade with other nations to get the raw materials you needed and sell your products: what would you think?

Would you consider a treaty which fixed you in such a restricted and unjust position a good treaty? Would you consider it a generous treaty? Would you consider it a fair treaty? Would you consider it a treaty in the interests of the future welfare of mankind?

Then if you knew that only one nation, your mortal enemy for decades, had drafted the treaty and imposed it upon you, and that this nation by reason of its predominant position in the world was going to impose it upon the various nations of the British commonwealth so they would pass it like a rubber stamp as we are going to pass this treaty soon without careful examination at all, how would you feel? Then if you saw Russia not very far away, making the promises she has been making of late to India and other countries, and apparently ready to keep those promises, I ask how long you would be able to resist the temptation to go behind the iron curtain, as Czechoslovakia did.

I am not altogether condemning the treaty, Mr. Speaker. I am merely stating reasons why we should give this treaty the utmost study. I am glad we are going to be at peace with Japan; but I urge with all the sincerity of my being that we give the most careful consideration to the realities which confront Japan and ourselves in looking towards the world of tomorrow.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In a very few minutes I am going to try to deal with some of the points which have been raised in the course of this discussion. I need hardly say, I think, that I do not agree with the interpretation of the events leading up to the Japanese war or the analysis of the politics and history of the United States in regard to this matter which were given by the last speaker. Nor can I agree that this treaty in some of its territorial aspects is an evidence of what was referred to by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) as high-handed United States imperialism.

Mr. Low: I know the minister wishes to be fair in all these statements. I said that would give the Russian bolshevik leaders some ground upon which to make that claim.

Mr. Pearson: I recall that. I thought the hon. gentleman used those words in describing not the treaty as a whole but one or two of the territorial aspects of it; but I gladly accept his explanation of his use of that phrase. Territories mentioned in this treaty, Mr. Speaker, which were taken from Japan, and which were described by the hon. member, were won by Japan as a result of conquest, at least as far as Formosa and Korea and one or two other islands were concerned. On the same basis by which the Japanese acquired these territories the victors in this war might very well have taken them themselves. Instead of that, the islands mentioned were not taken as territorial acquisitions by the victors but were put under United Nations trusteeship, with the United States as the trustee.

Reference was also made to article 10 of the treaty as an example of rather high-handed injustice against the Japanese. Article 10, which refers to the Peking protocol of 1901 and abrogates that protocol as far as any benefits acquired by Japan are concerned, merely releases the Chinese from an intolerable situation under which they have suffered, if you like to use that word, for fifty years. The Peking protocol gave not only Japan but other countries the right to station their own troops in China, a right arising out of the Boxer rebellion; and I do not think it is any injustice to Japan to have that right abrogated in this treaty as far as Japan is concerned.

Also a good deal has been said by one or two previous speakers about the tyranny of imposing upon the Japanese the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause; and for that purpose article 12 was read. But though I tried to tempt the hon. member for Peace River into reading section (c) of that article, he read only sections (b) and (d). I would like to read the first part of section (c), which I think will throw a rather different light on the matter.

> (c) In respect to any matter, however, Japan shall be obliged to accord to an allied power national treatment, or most-favoured-nation treatment, only to the extent that the allied power concerned accords Japan national treatment or most-favoured-nation treatment, as the case may be, in respect of the same matter.

It is a reciprocal engagement, not a unilateral engagement, which Japan undertakes as a result of that article.

The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) mentioned one or two matters last evening to which I should refer. Incidentally he indicated that definitive action had not been taken in the other place in regard to this treaty. That is not quite accurate. If he will read the proceedings of the other place for April 2 he will find that the motion of approval was adopted on that date and action was taken in that respect. The treaty itself is to be referred to a committee of the other place for subsequent examination, even though approval has been given.

Then, as I was expecting, the hon. member for Peel mentioned the Pacific pact. He indicated that as a result of this treaty another link has been established in the security of the Pacific, and he hoped that we might use this treaty, in the words of Mr. Acheson which he quoted, as a point of departure for a general Pacific security pact. I have very little to add to what I have already said on that matter. If the hon. member were interested enough to read an article by Mr. John Foster Dulles on a Pacific pact which appeared in the issue of "Foreign Affairs" from which he quoted Mr. Menzies last evening, he would get a very good argument from Mr. Dulles himself against the practicability of a Pacific pact at this time. In that article Mr. Dulles, who is a great advocate of Pacific security, said:

. . . it is not at this time practicable to draw a line which would bring all the free peoples of the Pacific and East Asia into a formal mutual security area.

Then he went on to explain why, and I shall not quote from his explanation except the last part of the paragraph where he says:

Lastly, but perhaps not least, is the fact that the United States should not assume formal commitments which overstrain its present capabilities and give rise to military expectations we could not fulfil, particularly in terms of land forces.

Mr. Dulles repeated that point of view in a radio broadcast on February 10 last when he was asked whether a Pacific security pact like the Atlantic pact was, in his judgment, feasible. He replied:

I don't think it is feasible on any quick timetable to put together the countries of Asia in the same way as the countries of the Atlantic.

That remains the position of the government on this matter, Mr. Speaker. Ultimately it may perhaps be the best, most practicable and most useful way of guaranteeing security in the Pacific but at the present time, like Mr. Dulles, we do not think so.

There has been general approval given in the house to the treaty, although that approval has been qualified by the leader of the C.C.F. and the leader of the Social Credit groups. Of course we must all feel, whether or not we approve of this treaty, that there are possibilities of danger arising out of it. It is a calculated risk we have to take. In this case I believe it is a calculated risk towards peace rather than towards war, because I do not believe this is a punitive treaty which has in it the seeds of future war. Nevertheless, we should not indulge in any excessive optimism as to what may happen now that Japan is going to be free to conduct its own affairs. The Tokyo correspondent of the Economist writing in the last edition said something which is very true and which we should keep in mind. He said that the lacquer-thin coating of occupational reform is cracking and peeling off in most places. Japan, then, is beginning to withdraw into itself. I believe this is inevitable once occupation comes to an end.

We hope that this process will not result in the consequences for peace that Japan's policy had in the years before the war. There are of course problems ahead. In the case of Japan, these are both political and economic. There is a problem of Japan's relations with the continent of Asia and the western world. We in the west must do everything we can to make it in Japan's interest as well as to our advantage to choose the western democratic world as her vehicle of international co-operation rather than the Asiatic communist world.

The economic aspect of the treaty, which has been so often emphasized in this discussion and quite rightly so, has within it elements of danger. As was pointed out, Japan is a country of 83 million people and must trade with the rest of the world in order to survive, even to feed herself. It is interesting to note in this connection that food production in Japan has steadily increased in the last few years, and that of course is an encouraging sign. But Japanese material prosperity does not necessarily mean that Japan will not develop the aggressive tendencies which, unfortunately, she developed in the past. The higher standard of living which we must hope the Japanese people will be able to achieve does not necessarily make for peace. In our discussion of international affairs we sometimes overlook the fact that a nation does not have to be underdeveloped to be overaggressive. In the years before world war II Japan had the highest standard of living of any Asiatic people, and whatever may have been the reason they were the most aggressive of Asiatic people.

Although we must do our part to assist Japan to build up her economy, I suggest we must not take it for granted that Japan's prosperity, of itself, means peace in Asia. It depends upon how that prosperity and how that power will be used. It is the purpose of those who drew up this treaty, and it is the hope of those who are in favour of it, that because this is the ending of a chapter Japan will use its new power and developing economic strength not for those purposes which have caused so much harm, so much damage, so much cruelty and so much suffering in the past but for the purpose of international co-operation in a great area of the world, which will lead not only to peace but to prosperity for all of us.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask the minister a question? Has he given consideration to finding some means whereby we can have this treaty referred to the committee on external affairs, if the minister prefers, in a way similar to that which is being followed in the Senate.

Mr. Pearson: I see no objection, Mr. Speaker, when the committee on external affairs meets—I hope to be present at its next meeting—and when we discuss items in our estimates perhaps referring to diplomatic representation in Japan, why we should not discuss this treaty to our heart's content.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH PACIFIC FISHERIES

REFERENCE OF SUBJECT MATTER TO STANDING COMMITTEE ON MARINE AND FISHERIES

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): I should like to have unanimous consent of the house to move the following:

That the subject matter of the Japanese fishing treaty, negotiated in Tokyo last December between the United States, Japan and Canada, be referred to the standing committee on marine and fisheries.

Motion agreed to.

REDISTRIBUTION

READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That a select committee be appointed to consider the results of the census of 1951 and the readjustment of the representation in the House of Commons necessitated thereby, with power to consider whether the said readjustment should be made in strict accord with the rules presently set out in the British North America Acts 1867 to 1951 and the other statutes in that behalf, or whether it is desirable

(a) to provide that the representation of any province in the House of Commons on the readjustment of the representation of the provinces therein on the completion of each decennial census including that for the year 1951 shall not be reduced by more than 15 per cent below the representation to which such province was entitled under rules 1 to 4, inclusive, in subsection (1) of section 51 of the British North America Act at the last preceding readjustment of the representation of the province; and that there shall be no reduction in the representation of any province as a result of which that province would have a smaller number of members than that of any other province which, according to the results of the then last decennial census, did not have a larger population; and

(b) that there shall be assigned separately two members instead of one to the Yukon and Northwest Territories or any part thereof, and that the total number of members as provided by the aforesaid section 51 of the British North America Act and the terms of union between Canada and Newfoundland from time to time be increased or decreased accordingly; with instructions to prepare a bill or bills with schedules to give effect to its findings and conclusions and to contain and describe the several electoral divisions entitled to return members to this House of Commons; with power to send for persons, papers and records and to examine witnesses, and to report from time to time; and that notwithstanding standing order 65, the committee shall consist of thirty-seven members to be designated by the house at a later date.

He said: In the few minutes that are left before six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I do not expect to be able to make all the statement that I intended to submit to the house on this motion. Perhaps I can just outline the situation and complete it then at the earliest opportunity after Easter. I understand that the Monday of the first week we return here is private members' day, and that on Tuesday the financial critics of the official opposition and of the other groups wish to deal with the budget. I would hope that, if we cannot dispose of that motion to go into committee of ways and means on Tuesday, after the position of the various critics has been stated to the house and to the country, the debate may be adjourned so that we may revert to this motion to set up a committee to deal with this problem of redistribution. I am not asking the house to make any decision, but I am just throwing that out as a suggestion, because I think it would be desirable to have this committee set up at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Drew: Without interrupting the Prime Minister, I do feel it is the wish of the house that the committee be set up as soon as possible. I think that consideration might be given even to the possibility of this debate's proceeding on Monday, if that is agreeable to the house. However, I will leave that as a suggestion for consideration.

Mr. St. Laurent: If that were the wish of the house, then on Monday I would be happy to comply with that wish and to try to have the committee set up at that time.

This motion is being submitted to the house in furtherance of the statement I made on March 10 about redistribution. I stated at that time that it was at least my view that this matter of redistribution, the matter of the readjustment of representation in the House of Commons, was not a responsibility of the executive branch of our constitutional set-up, but that it was a responsibility placed by the constitution on parliament, generally. I pointed out that it had always been the custom for the leader of the majority group in the house to provide an opportunity for members to discharge that responsibility, by submitting a bill for consideration by the house and which was drawn in accordance with the rules then applicable to the matter of readjustment and which, after it had received second reading, was referred to a committee composed of members of all the groups in the house, to determine the schedules that would describe the territorial divisions entitled to return members to parliament.

I therefore had a bill prepared in that form, and it received first reading on March 10. That bill was prepared in accordance with the rules set out in the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1951. Those rules now fix the membership of the house at 262, of which 255 were provided by British North America Act of 1946, and seven additional members being provided by the British North America Act, number one, which confirmed the terms of union with Newfoundland, and provided that that province would be entitled to seven members in the House of Commons, and would be thereafter subject to the general provisions of the rules in the British North America Act.

Because of the results of the last census, there would be a reduction in the present membership from the province of Saskatchewan to the extent of five, in the representation from the province of Manitoba by two, and in the representation from the province of Nova Scotia by one. On the other hand, the province of Quebec would be entitled to two members more than at present, the province of Ontario to two more than at present, and the province of British Columbia to four more than at present, and all other provinces would remain with the same numbers.

This is because, from the very outset, the principle has been that representation from the various provinces was based upon the population as ascertained in the decennial censuses. That rule was set out in express terms in the Quebec resolutions, numbers 17 and 19—and I shall not take the time to read them now. But they provided in express terms that readjustment would be based upon the population of the respective provinces.

The same was set out in express terms in the London resolutions, numbers 18 and 20, and also in the original section 51 of the British North America Act. Hon. members will recall that the original rule was that Quebec would have a representation of 65 members, and that to determine the representation of the other provinces the population of Quebec would be divided by 65. The quotient thus obtained would serve as a divisor, and would entitle the other provinces respectively to as many members as the quotient went into the number of their population.

That quotient in 1871 was 18,331; in 1881 it was 20,908; in 1891 it was 22,900; in 1901, it was 23,367; in 1911 it was 30,858; in 1921 it was 36,317; in 1931 it was 44,225; in 1941 it was 51,259; and, according to the last census, it would have been 62,395.

The application of the rule with respect to proportionate representation was qualified in the original British North America Act by the one-twentieth rule. In the resolution it had been provided that, by the readjustment, representation of a province would not be reduced unless the proportion of its population, as compared with that of the total population, had diminished by five per cent. "Five per cent" were the words used in the resolutions—the Quebec resolution and the London resolution—but in the statute, instead of using the percentage, it was stated that the representation would not be diminished unless the proportion of the population had diminished by more than one-twentieth.

That was intended, I am confident, to carry out the view of the fathers of confederation that representation should be roughly in proportion to the population. It will be recalled that "Rep by Pop" was one of the motivating reasons for wanting some different constitution from that which resulted from the Act of Union between Lower Canada and Upper Canada.

The one-twentieth qualification, as expressed in the British North America Act, though perhaps it had not been intended to operate in that way, was not cumulative. Unless the reduction in the proportion of population of a province was more than one-twentieth or more than five per cent between two censuses, there was no reduction in the representation of a province.

The result was that the rule did not protect the smaller provinces, but it did bring about for Ontario this curious situation, that from 1911 onward there were progressively at each census diminutions in the proportion of population in Ontario as compared with the total population, but at no one census did it reach five per cent, or one-twentieth. On the other hand, by 1911 the proportion of the population of the maritime provinces had commenced to decrease between censuses by more than five per cent. In 1911 the population of Prince Edward Island, which was 93,728, was only three times the quotient arrived at by dividing the population of Quebec by 65, and Prince Edward Island would appear to me, from my calculation, to have then been entitled to only three members, or a reduction of three from the number it had at the time of confederation. There were serious controversies and debate over that reduction and the contention that Prince Edward Island had come into confederation with six, and that their representation should never go below six, and that if readjustment applied to them, it would apply only when they had gone beyond six, but could not apply to reduce them below six. They were so confident in that point of view that they carried their contentions to the foot of the throne. The privy council having decided against them and made the decision from which it was afterwards understood that the five per cent diminution had to apply between one census and another, and that otherwise there should be no reduction, the contention was made in parliament that some floor should be provided to prevent Prince Edward Island from getting too small a representation in the Commons.

In 1914 an address was submitted to the houses of parliament to increase the number of senators for the western provinces, and at the same time to provide that no province would at any time have a smaller representation in the House of Commons than it had in the Senate. That was to apply immediately. I do not know what the reasons were—I have not read all the debates—but the Senate at that time refused to agree to the resolution in that form unless it were provided that it would not take effect until after the dissolution of parliament, and the resolution was not adopted in 1914. But the next year—the matter, I have no doubt, had been considered perhaps more calmly during the recess and all parties were agreed—an address was moved requesting that there be passed a provision which became section 51A of the British North America Act, and which provides that no province may at any time have its representation reduced below the number of senators it is entitled to have appointed from its territories. That was the situation at this time. By 1941 the representation from Ontario had remained at 82 by virtue of the one-twentieth rule. To apply proportionately the representation based on 82 for Ontario and its population would have given Saskatchewan 19 instead of 16, Manitoba 16 instead of 14, British Columbia 18 instead of 16, Alberta 17 instead of 16, Nova Scotia 12 instead of 11. Hon. members will recall that an address was presented to His Majesty in 1946 asking the parliament at Westminster to amend section 51 to provide that there would be a total membership of 255, one number being allotted to the Yukon and Northwest Territories, and the others distributed in the proportion of the population of each province, but to respect the rule of section 51A, and that if the rule of 51A operated for any province the population of that province would be deducted from the total population in making up the quotient which would determine what representation every province would have.

That restored the principle of representation in proportion to population but without any qualification other than section 51A. If the old rule which applied before 1946 were applied to the census of 1951 the result would be that Ontario would still retain 82 instead of the 83 that it got under the rule of 1946; Quebec would remain at 65; Saskatchewan would lose 7 of its 20 members; Manitoba would lose 4 of its 16; Nova Scotia would lose 3 of its 13; Alberta would lose 2 of its 17; and Newfoundland would lose 1 of its 7. It is therefore quite apparent that the new rule is not as harsh as the application of the old rule would be; nevertheless, applying the new rule of 1946 has appeared to some to be harsh, though Bill No. 8, which I introduced, was made up in accordance with the new rule just as it is.

Now, it was suggested that there had been from confederation and right through to 1946, some qualification to prevent too rapid a reduction in the numbers of members representing any province. I had thought that on the motion to set up a committee, after the second reading of the bill, any member who felt that the rule should not be strictly adhered to, but that something else should be done, might move an amendment to consider some other solution, because since 1949 parliament has jurisdiction to do something else if it is the will of parliament to do so. But it was pointed out to me that once Bill No. 8 got second reading it would probably be contrary to the precedents and standing orders to accept any such amendment.

I did not want to do anything else but put before the house the problem in such a manner that the views of hon. members could be expressed and the decision of the majority obtained. It was in an effort to do that that I drew the notice of motion which was withdrawn yesterday. It had been suggested that there might be a ten per cent limitation on the reduction that could take place in the membership from a province at any one time. Well, at this time that would not have worked for two reasons. It would have left Saskatchewan with a larger representation though it has in this census a smaller population than Alberta. I think it would be an intolerable rule that brought about a situation where a province with a smaller population was entitled to a larger representation than a province with a larger population.

There was another objection to ten per cent. It would have given Newfoundland a permanent floor of seven. Under section 51A as it stands, Newfoundland can, if circumstances of the growth of population require it, see its membership reduced to 6, and it would then be getting the benefit of the same rule that applies to the other maritime provinces, and it seemed to me it would not be proper to introduce a rule that would give Newfoundland a preferential floor over the other maritime provinces.

Then, fifteen per cent was suggested as the maximum reduction. Well, at the present time fifteen per cent does not bring about that kind of a result. Fifteen per cent would still leave Saskatchewan to be reduced to seventeen, which would not be greater than the representation of any province having a larger population, and would not affect the floor of Newfoundland. I drew the first notice on that assumption, but it was pointed out that, if parliament decided that would be the rule that would govern future redistributions, it might very well in the future, because of the cumulative effect of applying the fifteen per cent more than once, bring about the result where one province with a smaller population would have a larger representation than another province with a larger population. It was for that reason that the present motion was drawn.

It has been suggested to me that the suggested new rule is not very clear in its terms. It was intended to be as clear as possible in its terms and was intended to provide that if parliament decided that there be a change and decided to make a rule to apply to the future, that rule could not bring about a situation where a province with a smaller population would have a larger representation than another province with a larger population.

When this motion is submitted I am not going to argue for the adoption of the motion. I am going to vote for it because I feel that I could not sponsor something before the house that I could not vote for. I am prepared to vote for the resolution as it is, but I am not arguing that anybody else should. I am only submitting that each one of us has his own responsibility in that regard and should adopt the position which he feels in conscience will discharge his responsibility to the country and to his own constituents.

Possibly parliament will decide that there will be no change whatsoever, that in spite of the fact that it requires a reduction of 25 per cent in the representation of Saskatchewan, that being the rule, it should be applied. On the other hand, parliament may decide that there should be some limitation on the proportion of reduction made in any one redistribution.

I have tried to draft this in such a way that if there are other views that hon. members feel should be applied to this problem they can be substituted for the consideration of the house. The house will decide by its majority, and not I hope a party majority but a majority reached because each individual member will feel that he is free to express his own opinion as to how he should discharge his responsibility to the country and to his own constituents.

I hope that there will be that kind of decision and that the committee set up will be able to carry it out. I have avoided any suggestions as to what procedure should be followed. I think the committee should have the power to send for the law officers of the government and then make its own decision as to how its conclusions can be carried out in a reasonable manner.

I would hope to have some further information to put on the record when the matter is called again, but I would hope that it could be disposed of by the majority of the house, made up of individuals who will each decide what is best to be done under the circumstances. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent: If it is the desire of the house to have the debate continued on Monday I would be prepared to move that it be so continued. Of course that would require unanimous consent because Monday is a private members' day. If not, I would suggest that after one day's debate on the budget, that debate might be adjourned so that we could deal with this motion to set up the committee.

Mr. Knowles: May I say a word with regard to the suggestion of continuing this debate on Monday, April 21? If the government does accede to the request of the leader of the opposition that that be done, would the government consider substituting some other day later on in the session rather than taking away another private members' day? I am not asking for a decision now. But when the Prime Minister asks for unanimous consent on Monday, April 21, it would make it easier for hon. members to decide what to do if some alternative suggestion could be made with respect to—

Mr. St. Laurent: It might not be unfair to provide that as soon as it could be arranged without too much inconvenience such time as was taken on Monday for public business be taken on some public business day for private members' business.

Mr. Knowles: Fair enough.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, until 3 p.m., Monday, April 21.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, April 21, 1952

The house met at three o'clock.

CHINA

TREATMENT OF CANADIAN NATIONALS BY COMMUNIST AUTHORITIES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to make a short statement regarding the treatment of Canadians in China.

The house will wish to know that the United Kingdom chargé d'affaires in Peking today presented a note to the Chinese vice-minister of foreign affairs on behalf of and with the approval of the governments of Canada, Australia, the United Kingdom and the United States, regarding the treatment accorded their nationals in China.

The note referred to previous communications on this subject which had expressed grave concern for the widespread arrests and frequent detention incommunicado of foreign nationals, and also drew attention to the hardships suffered by persons who were prevented or delayed from leaving China. The note pointed out that new arrests had taken place and listed the names of fifty-five United Kingdom, Canadian, Australian and United States citizens who are now understood to be in jail. In addition, there is an undetermined number of persons who are understood to be undergoing one form or another of house arrest.

The United Kingdom chargé d'affaires has asked the Chinese ministry of foreign affairs for information regarding the charges against those persons who have been arrested, the sentences, if any, which have been passed upon them, and their present whereabouts and welfare. He has also asked for facilities to enable him to communicate with them.

Of the fifty-five, seven Canadians are known to be imprisoned. They are Bishop Cuthbert O'Gara, Bishop Gustave Prevost, Sister Ste. Marie-Germaine, Sister Ste. Alphonse du Rédempteur, Sister Raymonde Marie, Father Eugène Lauzon, Father Arsenius Mullin.

Reports received during the past eighteen months from individuals leaving China had indicated that Canadians had not in general been physically maltreated, although some had been subjected to imprisonment and to the humiliation and indignities of what we would call mock "trials". We are therefore greatly shocked to learn of the death of Father Joseph Léon Arcand at the Franciscan mission hospital at Chefoo on February 8. He had been serving a six months' jail sentence and was brought in a deplorable condition to the hospital where he died shortly after his admission. This is the first case which has come to our attention in which there is reason to believe that the death of a Canadian missionary has been caused or hastened by serious neglect or maltreatment on the part of the Chinese communist authorities.

The fate of the five Sisters of the Immaculate Conception who were tried publicly in Canton on December 2, 1951, has of course been a continuing cause for anxiety. I know all Canadians were relieved to learn that the three sentenced to deportation had reached Hong Kong safely on February 28. However, when we received a first-hand account of their ordeal we were profoundly shocked by the deliberately callous treatment meted out to the sisters, apparently for the purpose of discrediting western humanitarian institutions in China. It seems to be the long-term policy of the Peking government to expel all western missionaries from China, or to make their lives so difficult that they will leave the country. In fact there has been a steady exodus from China of missionaries of all nationalities. According to our information, only 145 Canadians remain in China today, of whom about 100 are missionaries.

I know all hon. members share the concern of the government for the safety and well-being of Canadian missionaries in China and will be glad to be assured that everything within our means will continue to be done to assist them until they can get out.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I am sure that all members of this house share the concern felt by the government as to the plight of Canadians who have been serving in China. We welcome the information we have received which is of a reassuring nature, but learn with great regret of the death the Prime Minister has reported. Canadians will be shocked to learn of the circumstances under which this occurred, and will hope it may be possible, by joint action of the governments associated in the defence of our free way of life, to obtain assurances from the communist government that those now in prison will be released. I am sure no member of this house and no loyal Canadian believes for one moment that the charges preferred against these representatives of various religious bodies have any foundation whatever in fact.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

IRREGULARITIES IN ENGINEER DETACHMENT AT PETAWAWA

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, following the discovery and investigation of grave irregularities in the engineer detachment at Petawawa camp, charges have been laid in the civil court against five civilians and one service officer, and it is expected that further charges will be laid. Mr. J. W. Pickup, Q.C., of Toronto, has been appointed by the Department of Justice as special counsel in these cases.

In view of the rule that a member while speaking must not refer to any matter on which a judicial decision is pending, I shall not refer to that aspect; but hon. members will recognize that this matter has two aspects, one, criminal, with which the courts will deal, and the other, administrative. I am sure the house will permit me to report on the situation and what I am doing to rectify it.

The irregularities first came to the attention of the department several months ago and arose out of the disposal of scrap under contracts made by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation for the sale of thirty tons in 1950 and fifteen tons in 1951.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On what date was it first ascertained that there was any trouble?

Mr. Claxton: In October, 1951. An investigation was started immediately, and it was found that under cover of these contracts about 380 additional tons were taken out. Had all the material illegally taken been scrap, it would have had a value of about $9,000, but it included some used shower stalls, stoves, wash sinks and steel rails. The shower stalls, stoves and sinks had been salvaged when replaced with new equipment or when old wartime buildings had been taken down. They had not yet been declared surplus pending a further survey to determine which of these items might be useful on a temporary basis. So far as ascertained, the only new material removed was some 600 lengths of soil pipe having a value of about $6 per length. Seizures have been made of the material that has been traced, and a considerable part of it should be recovered. It also included a used weighing scale and shovel boom, but these have been recovered.

The investigation has disclosed no foundation for the reports alleging irregularities and deficiencies in the construction of buildings in the twenty-two major construction projects under way at Petawawa. However, other irregularities were found arising out of the employment of engineer civilian and service personnel and equipment, and these are still being investigated by the R.C.M.P. and provost corps. These irregularities also included the sale to contractors of some timber and gravel in the camp area.

It is not possible yet to estimate accurately the loss to the public caused by these irregularities so far discovered, but from the reports so far made it would appear that the total loss to the public may be as much as $50,000. Reports so far indicate that no personnel are involved outside of the engineer detachment at Petawawa and the employees of the civilian contractors.

In addition to the investigation being continued by the R.C.M.P. and the provost corps, I have engaged Mr. George S. Currie, chartered accountant of Montreal, a former deputy minister of national defence, to make a full investigation of the situation, security and accounting procedure for engineer stores, equipment and services at Petawawa and elsewhere; his powers and terms of reference have no restrictions whatever. Everything possible will be done to get to the bottom of this situation and take such action and adopt such remedies as may be required.

In conclusion I would like to add that if in the course of its work the select committee on defence expenditure would like to look into the stockkeeping, accounting or auditing procedure, or any other matter relating to its work, on the spot and anywhere, all facilities will be provided.

THEFT OF STORES AND OTHER IRREGULARITIES—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, since the subject has been introduced at this time, and since hon. members are anxious to know as much as they can about the circumstances which have been disclosed, I feel I should point out that it is not within the competence of the minister or of any other member of this house to vary the terms of reference of a committee which has been set up to discuss defence expenditure. Therefore I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), under standing order 31, the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the necessity for an immediate inquiry into the administration, and especially the accounting methods, of the Department of National Defence, the laxity of which has been revealed by the wholesale looting of military property, and by continuing incidents such as:

(a) the looting and disappearance of the Farnham military training centre down to and including the buildings, disclosed as early as December, 1949;

(b) the theft of stores and paints reported by the member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) to the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Justice, and the failure on the part of such ministers to take effective action upon the information which they had received;

(c) the theft by carload lots of hundreds of tons of supplies including such military equipment, according to press reports, as a baby tank;

(d) the theft of property at various military establishments throughout Canada, with the revelation that officers had been ordering men under their command to assist in acts of theft and fraud;

(e) fraudulent government inspection of military property;

(f) the outbreak of incendiary fires in military storehouses, significantly timed in such a way that they could have hidden the extent of any looting and thefts which had taken place in these storehouses.

Mr. Speaker: May I refer hon. members to standing order 31, under which this motion is made. It reads:

> Leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the house (when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance) must be asked after the ordinary daily routine of business has been concluded and before notices of motions or orders of the day are entered upon.

The ordinary daily routine of business has not been concluded, and even if I considered the motion in order I could not accept it at this time. May I also mention that I have received a similar notice of motion from the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), who no doubt proposes to move it at a later stage. His motion is not as lengthy as this one, but it is along similar lines.

It occurs to me that this matter can be discussed in the near future. It is a very important matter, but the motion must relate to something which has occurred in the immediate past. The motion before the house refers to incidents which took place some time ago. The matter must be one of such urgency that the regular proceedings of the house should be interrupted because there will not be an opportunity of discussing the subject in the near future.

If I recall correctly, on the last day the house sat it was decided that tomorrow we would proceed with the debate on the budget. No doubt that debate will continue for a number of days, and ample opportunity will be given at that time to discuss this question. The motion has not been made at the proper time and I will have to rule that the motion cannot be considered at this time in the day's proceedings. Even if it were in order I could not allow the motion to stand on the ground of urgency.

Mr. Drew: At the moment I am not questioning the ruling, Mr. Speaker; but if it were merely a question of complying with the timing of the motion I could read it again. Do I understand that the ruling is that it could not be presented again after the introduction of bills?

Mr. Speaker: I thought I should decide that question now. I quite understand the purport of what the leader of the opposition has been saying—that he could introduce the motion at a later stage. I thought I should point out now that even if that were done I could not allow the motion to stand. The matter is not of such urgency that the regular proceedings of the house should be disturbed because there will not be an opportunity in the near future to discuss it. As I have said, the debate on the budget will commence tomorrow, when there will be ample opportunity to discuss this question.

Mr. Drew: In view of the fact that you have expressed your opinion, sir, in regard to the time at which the resolution was introduced, I might explain the purport and content of the resolution itself by saying that I introduced it at this time because the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) had introduced the subject. I wonder if, in view of the ruling, Your Honour is willing to hear any views as to the reason why this matter should be discussed at this time.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think I could do that, but I think I should allow the leader of the opposition, if he feels so disposed, to ask further questions of the Minister of National Defence with regard to this matter. He could do so now, or when the orders of the day are called.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

TABLING OF BUDGETS FOR 1952

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to table the budgets of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, for the calendar year 1952.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT AS TO LIABILITY OF DIRECTORS OR OFFICERS OF CORPORATIONS

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 180, to amend the Criminal Code and the Combines Investigation Act (liability of directors).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Argue: The purpose of this bill is to strengthen both the Criminal Code and the Combines Investigation Act in preventing monopolistic practices in trade and business by providing for a penalty to be imposed not only on the corporation but also on any director or officer who assents to or acquiesces in such trade practices. As the law now stands, only the corporation is liable for an offence committed under these two acts. This bill would in effect therefore make a director or officer of that corporation guilty of that offence personally and therefore liable, along with the corporation, to penalties as provided under the law.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

THEFT OF STORES AND OTHER IRREGULARITIES—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the motion I have already asked leave to move, I do not wish a ruling made which is related to the time of its introduction; therefore, I propose to ask leave now to move the same resolution. If it is Your Honour's wish or the wish of the house, I could read it, or the resolution could be taken as originally read. I wish to present it at this time in the same form so that the decision will be made directly on the resolution and not on any question as to the time of its introduction. Does Your Honour wish me to read the resolution again?

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Mr. Drew: May I say, in presenting the resolution at this time, that the debate on the budget relates to the budget itself, and that the leave I have asked is that this house adjourn for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the continuing of the looting of public property. I submit that this is not covered by the announcement made today, and there should be an opportunity in this house to discuss a situation which is of great concern to every Canadian at a time when half of the budget which will be under consideration is being placed under a department which has disclosed its inability over several years to protect the property which it already possesses.

Mr. Speaker: Any motion for adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance is made at this stage in the proceedings. The house has heard the motion. May I point out that it refers to a number of incidents, one of which dates back to 1949 and has already been considered in this house. I believe that some of the other matters referred to have also been considered in this house. The motion could not therefore be allowed to stand. It does not relate to matters which have taken place in the immediate past. They must be of recent occurrence. (See Beauchesne, third edition, paragraph 176).

I might also point out that the house will be considering the budget tomorrow, and the debate on the budget will probably continue for some time. In the budget debate it is not the practice of members to confine their remarks to the details of the budget. In fact, as hon. members will recall, almost any subject which is not before the house is debated at that time. As the leader of the opposition has said, the matter is an extremely important one but it is not one of urgency according to the definition of the word "urgency" which we must give it under this rule.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Speaker: Did I understand that the house was prepared to consider today the Prime Minister's motion with regard to redistribution?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: Can the Prime Minister say now or tell us soon when the time taken today on government business will be made up so far as private members' motions are concerned?

Mr. St. Laurent: When the house was about to adjourn for the Easter recess I said that if we took the time today for public business I thought it would be fair to take, on a day that would otherwise be devoted to public business, an equal amount of time for the business of private members, but that it would have to be done in such a way as not to inconvenience or disturb the arrangements being made for public business.

I think all hon. members would regard it as fair if, within as short a time as possible, there was made up the time for private members' business that would be taken today on the motion for readjustment of the membership of the house; but I think we would have to give consideration to the other business before the house in order to fit it in in such a manner as to cause the least inconvenience.

GERM WARFARE

ALLEGED STATEMENTS BY DR. ENDICOTT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question, either to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of Justice, about the dastardly statement alleged to have been made by Dr. Endicott in regard to the use of germ warfare in Korea and Canada's participation in the production of the means for carrying on germ warfare. Has there been any investigation to determine whether or not these alleged statements were made? Is such an investigation now being made, and what is the intention of the government with regard to a matter as serious and as dangerous to world peace as were those alleged statements?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I was in the west during the Easter recess, and returned to my office only this morning. I have not yet received from the mounted police any report concerning this particular episode. I might add, however, that the activities of such men as Dr. Endicott are kept under surveillance. I have no doubt that this matter has been investigated and that the report concerning it will come forward in due course. When it does, I shall be glad to make a statement.

CHEESE

QUESTION AS TO PRICE ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Blair (Lanark): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Will he make a statement on the assistance to be given to the cheese producing industry? Will the assistance given to them bring the price in line with that of the concentrated milk producers who are at present receiving $3.30 on local sales?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I think it has been decided in the courts that questions having to do with the price of milk are under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments. The question of cheese and milk in general has, I think, been fairly well taken care of by the government of Ontario. As to cheese production and other related problems, they are dealt with accordingly.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. Did I understand him to say that there will be no floor price with regard to cheese?

Mr. Gardiner: I am not in a position to say whether there will or will not be. I understand that in Ontario there is an established price under provincial law. I do not know that anything we would do about it would override that law.

FLYING SAUCERS

PRESS REPORT AS TO USE OF JET PLANES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Will he make a statement to the house on the news report to the effect that jet planes were engaged last night in chasing flying saucers over southwestern Ontario?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I take it that my hon. friend's question is predicated upon the assumption that flying saucers exist. I am not in a position to say that they do. I know, however, that the planes over which I have jurisdiction in the Department of Transport were not chasing flying saucers in southwestern Ontario or in any other part of Canada.

Mr. Noseworthy: Then may I direct the question to the Minister of National Defence.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): This report was drawn to my attention. I looked into it and find that it almost certainly refers to an ordinary service flight of an R.A.F. Canberra plane across Canada and the middle west of the United States at a speed of something of the order of 500 miles an hour.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INCOME TAX OFFICES—FIVE-DAY WEEK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Have the employees of the income tax department at Toronto been granted a five-day week? If so, will the employees at the income tax office at Winnipeg and other regional offices be granted the same work week?

Redistribution Committee

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I have not had any notice of the question which the hon. member has asked. In some of the offices throughout Canada the five-day week prevails. As to other offices, consideration is being given to the matter of the five-day week. The office in Winnipeg will be given that consideration.

BEEF

SUPPORT PRICES FOR CATTLE—PROVINCIAL EMBARGOES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture with respect to a statement made by his parliamentary assistant on April 9 as to support prices for beef. Have the various provincial embargoes been cleared so that the support price is now operative, and does the support price now operate in the various markets throughout this nation?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Like many other hon. members here, I returned to the city only this morning after the week end. There has not been a council meeting since I came back to Ottawa but I expect that tomorrow I shall be able to make a complete statement on that question. If the hon. member will permit me to do so, I will deal with the matter then.

Mr. Ross (Souris): That is fine.

REDISTRIBUTION

READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house resumed, from Wednesday, April 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for the appointment of a special committee on readjustment of the representation in the House of Commons.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this motion was called just a few minutes before the house rose for the Easter recess, and I spoke briefly upon it. On looking over the report in Hansard of what I said at that time, I feel that there is not much that I could now add. It would not be proper for me to repeat anything I said then, and I do not think it would be particularly useful to elaborate on it. There is, however, one aspect of the matter about which I should like to take just a few moments of the time of the house, and that is with regard to the form of the resolution on the order paper.

Hon. members will recall that I tried to make it as clear as possible that I was not presenting this motion as one on which I would ask those who usually support the government to support my views, but was doing so to provide an opportunity for hon. members to express their own convictions in the light of the responsibility they felt they had to the country and to their own constituents with respect to fair representation in the House of Commons. I stated then—and I wish to repeat it—that I tried to draft a motion that would allow all the views that hon. members might entertain on that subject to find expression in this house, but that I was not prepared to put forward a motion that went beyond what I myself would feel it possible for me to support. Therefore I had not presented a motion which would restrict the diminution in representation of any one province to 10 per cent, because that was something which I personally could not support, in view of the fact that it would conserve to Saskatchewan a larger representation than Alberta would obtain, though Saskatchewan at the present time has, according to the last census, a smaller population than Alberta; and also because it would increase the floor of Newfoundland over that of the other maritime provinces; but a restriction in the diminution at any one readjustment of 15 per cent would not have at this time any such undesirable feature.

The motion was drawn for the purpose of restoring to the constitution a provision that was in it originally to temper to some extent the rigidity of the principle of representation by population when there had been rather a small change in the relative population of the provinces. It was felt, though that had been the intention of the one-twentieth provision in the original constitution; that the one-twentieth provision had operated only between two successive censuses, and the consequence had been that there had arisen a disproportion of more than one-twentieth over a period of more than that between two censuses, and that that disproportion was not taken into account. Therefore I tried, in drafting this motion, to make it clear that there would be no such possibility here, and that every time the restriction of 15 per cent applied it would be upon what the representation of the provinces would have been under the rules of section 51 as they stand.

Just to illustrate: under this new principle, if it were adopted, though Saskatchewan would otherwise see its representation reduced by 25 per cent, it would not be reduced by more than 15 per cent. But if there were no change in the situation at the next census, the 15 per cent would apply not to the membership of seventeen that would be saved to Saskatchewan at this time under this rule, but would apply to the membership of 15 which it would have according to the strict application of the rules in section 51 of the British North America Act. That is the explanation for the language used in this draft resolution:

(a) to provide that the representation of any province in the House of Commons on the readjustment of the representation of the provinces therein on the completion of each decennial census including that for the year 1951 shall not be reduced by more than 15 per cent below the representation to which such province was entitled under rules 1 to 4, inclusive, in subsection (1) of section 51 of the British North America Act . . .

So that if the situation were to remain—

Mr. Knowles: At the last preceding census.

Mr. St. Laurent: At the census that is being considered for the purpose of the readjustment. Under this language, if it is adopted, you would find out what the representation would be, and you would find out what the representation was under rules 1 to 4 of section 51. The last time that was 20 for Saskatchewan. You would apply the 15 per cent to 20, and that would mean that it could be a reduction of three, but not more than three. If there were no change in the trend, and the same situation repeated itself the next time, you would apply the 15 per cent to 15 and not to 17, because 17 would be the number not in accord with the rules, but something saved by the new principle.

Even that might not always overcome the intolerable situation of giving one province with a smaller population a larger representation than another province with a larger population. At the present time Saskatchewan has a larger population than Manitoba, but during the last ten years Manitoba's population increased by 5·8 per cent. If that situation were to continue up to the time of the next census it would mean that the population of Manitoba would be about 45,000 more than it is at the present time—it would be somewhere around 821,000. If there continued, which I think is unlikely, to be a diminution in the population of Saskatchewan —during this decade it was a diminution of 7·5 per cent; even if it were a diminution of only one-third of that, or 2·5 per cent, it would mean that the population of the province would not be equal to Manitoba's 821,000. Nevertheless, by applying the 15 per cent rule to both provinces without any qualification whatever, Manitoba could be reduced from 14 to 12, and Saskatchewan only from 15 to 13, because 15 per cent of their respective representations would bring about that limitation.

Well, in that event the suggestion for the committee to consider is whether it should not provide that Manitoba could not be reduced—if its population were equal to or greater than that of Saskatchewan—below the representation of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the Prime Minister permit a question? Was there any representation from the legislature of Saskatchewan that the 10 per cent figure should apply? Has there been any consultation with any of the other provinces in regard to the resolution which was introduced in the legislature by Mr. Tucker, the leader of the opposition in Saskatchewan, and passed unanimously? Has there been any consultation with the other provinces as to the acceptance of the unanimous recommendation of the legislature of Saskatchewan?

Mr. St. Laurent: As to the first question, representations have been made to the federal government that there was this unanimous resolution passed by the legislature of Saskatchewan. As to the second question, there has been no consultation by the federal government with the other provinces. The hon. member realizes that that is the position this party has always taken—that representation of the people in the House of Commons is not a matter which concerns the governments of the provinces but is a matter which concerns the people of Canada and their representatives in parliament.

The reason for my finding it impossible to put forward the proposal that was made in the legislature of Saskatchewan was that that would result in giving Saskatchewan, with a smaller population, a larger representation than Alberta. The house, of course, is free to do that, if a majority wishes to do it; but I would not be able to support it, and since it is something I cannot support, I cannot put it in the proposal which appears under my name on the order paper.

Personally I do not think this trend is apt to continue; I think the population of Manitoba is apt to increase at a greater rate than 5·8 per cent, which was its increase during the last decade. I think the population of Saskatchewan is going to reverse the trend and that in future it will increase rather than diminish. But, as I say, if this is to be provided as a rule to apply to future readjustments, we should guard against what theoretically could happen, so that if there was the same trend in those two provinces, with the representation of both of them having to be diminished, that of Manitoba could not be diminished below that of Saskatchewan if its population was equal to that of Saskatchewan.

So that there would be two limitations. First there would be the 15 per cent limitation—it could not go beyond that; and, second, it could not go beyond the effect the 15 per cent limitation would have upon a province with the same or smaller population.

It may very well be, as quite a large number of newspapers throughout the country have suggested, that there should be no interference whatsoever with the rules provided in the amendment made in 1946. I would be sorry if that were the conclusion of a majority in the house, because I think that, whether it be justified or not, there would be resentment among the people of Saskatchewan at the loss of 25 per cent of their membership in one readjustment. I think it is desirable, in this united nation, that all sections feel that their special situations receive consideration from the body politic generally, and that we are disposed to take what can be regarded generally as a reasonable attitude in that connection.

This will bring about some small increase in the total representation in the house. First of all there would be an increase of one for the Northwest Territories. That, I think, is something that is apt to be permanent. Indeed, it is possible that the increase by one may, at the time of the next census, be found to be insufficient, because there is development going on in the Northwest Territories, to the advantage of those localities and the advantage of the economy of the nation as a whole.

It will provide Saskatchewan with two more members than it would otherwise be entitled to; but that small increase is not very serious. And, looking over the censuses since confederation, one would feel that the adoption of a rule like this could not mean a variation of more than two or three from the 262 now provided by the constitution. This time it would provide for two for Saskatchewan; but I would hope that, next time, the population of Saskatchewan would entitle it to its full membership of 17—perhaps even more than that. However it could not mean any substantial variation in the total membership of the house. I think it is something which would not be entirely satisfactory to our friends from Saskatchewan, but which will, I hope, make them feel that their fellow Canadians throughout the whole country sympathize with the fact that there has been a diminution in the population, while there has been a growth in the populations of all other Canadian provinces.

It is worthy of consideration, I think, to remember that although there has been a diminution in the number of people counted in Saskatchewan in the last census, there has been no diminution in the contribution of new wealth to the Canadian economy provided by the people of that province. The diminution results from the fact that a lesser number of people have been able to carry on agricultural pursuits, and to provide the same return from the soil that was provided before.

It is my hope that there will come for Saskatchewan, as there has come for Alberta, and as there has come for Manitoba, some diversification in their economy which will make Saskatchewan the home not only of an agricultural population—although that is absolutely essential to the well-being of the country—but the home also of some people whose pursuits will be industrial and commercial, and who will work alongside their fellow Canadians in Saskatchewan who are devoting their energy to the tilling of the soil.

This resolution, of course, does not give binding directions to the committee to be set up. The house may decide at this time that it will have no departure whatsoever from the rules at present in the constitution. Under those circumstances the committee would have nothing to do but to determine the limits of each constituency within each province.

If on the other hand the house feels that a certain variation in those rules might well be considered by the committee, then under the terms of the resolution it will allow the committee to give consideration to such modification. I inserted in their resolution the provision that the committee would have the right to call for persons and papers; because if it came to the conclusion that some alleviation should be made, it might want to consider whether it should be done only to meet an exceptional case, in one instance, or whether it should be a new principle which would apply to future redistributions and readjustments.

In that event the committee would want to know how that should be done. It may be the committee would find it expedient to recommend some permanent change in the rules affecting readjustment, and would want to know from the law officers of the crown and the law officers of the House of Commons what would be the correct procedure in order to bring this about. Then it would be for the house to determine whether or not it should be done.

I think there is nothing further I could add that would be of any assistance in coming to a conclusion. I wish to repeat merely that this is the constitutional responsibility of each one of us, not only of members of the government as members of the House of Commons, but of every other member in the house, and probably in the same degree as it involves the responsibilities of those who form the present government.

It is not something which can be determined as an act of executive government. It is something which must be dealt with by legislation which is the responsibility of the house, and about which I wish to make no plea other than to state what my own views are, and to ask each of my fellow members of parliament to make up his mind and to express his views in the light of his own conception of his responsibilities to Canada at large and to his own constituency in particular.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Before the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) takes his seat, I should like to ask whether any special consideration has been given to the province of Nova Scotia which has had a substantial increase in its population but a diminution in its membership.

Mr. St. Laurent: I can assure the hon. member the figures were all gone over. I had intended to ask for the permission of the house to place on Hansard the results of the last census as tabulated by the chief electoral officer, showing the calculations that have been made for each province and the way in which they have been made.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. St. Laurent: The table is as follows:

Total members	262	Population of Canada		14,009,429
(a) Less representation of Prince Edward Island	−4	(a) Less population of Prince Edward Island	−98,429
(b) Less representation of electoral district of Yukon-Mackenzie River	−1	(b) Less population of Yukon	−9,096
		(c) Less population of N.W.T.	−16,004
	257			−123,529
				13,885,900

The quotient obtained by dividing 13,885,900 by 257 is: 54,031 and the representation of each province is determined by dividing the said quotient (54,031) into the population of each respective province.

Provinces	Population	Quotient	Remainders	Number of Members	Present number of members (Representation Act 1947)
Ontario	4,597,542	85	4,907	85	83
Quebec	4,055,681	75	3,356	75	73
Nova Scotia	642,584	11	*48,243	12	13
New Brunswick	515,697	9	*29,418	10	10
Manitoba	776,541	14	20,107	14	16
Saskatchewan	831,728	15	21,263	15	20
Alberta	939,501	17	20,974	17	17
British Columbia	1,165,210	21	*30,559	22	18
Newfoundland	361,416	6	*37,230	7	7
	.....	253	.....	257	257
Prince Edward Island	.....	4	.....	4	4
Yukon-Mackenzie River	.....	1	.....	1	1
	.....	258	.....	262	262

* In order to bring the total number of members to 262, the four provinces having the largest remainders are each entitled to an additional member.

Consideration was given to the case of each province. Nova Scotia gets the benefit of one additional member for something less than the ordinary quota. It has eleven times the quota, which is 54,031, plus a remainder of 48,243, and it gets an additional member for the remainder of 48,243.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of this motion is not only one of very great importance to every member of the house but one of the utmost importance to all Canadians. As the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) emphasized on different occasions during his remarks, the desire of the members of the house at this time should be to provide a system of representation which will meet with satisfaction in every part of Canada and leave the impression not only in every province but in every locality within every province that the system of representation gives as fair an expression of the thoughts and desires of the people of Canada generally as may be devised by the members of parliament at this time. I can only express my regret that, with full knowledge of the fact that this extremely important subject would be coming before the House of Commons for consideration, the government has not seen fit to place before us any new method of dealing with this problem which would give to the people of Canada, as well as to members of parliament who are now called upon to express their opinions, a feeling that we have a system which will stand the test and that it is one which over the years is going to avoid any unfairness or any suggestion that it produces any other result than the most effective representation of our people that can be introduced.

During this session we have heard a speech by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) which I am not at liberty to quote in detail under the rules of the house, but it was a speech which placed before us in clear and cogent terms the necessity for some continuing body to deal with this subject as a continuing process so that at such time as redistribution of the seats of the House of Commons becomes necessary under our constitution the plans for that redistribution will have been laid upon an impartial basis which will be likely to find general acceptance by every member of the house as well as by the people of Canada generally. It would appear that such method of dealing with this essential part of our democratic system is not to be placed before us at this time. Nevertheless the very fact that so many people are thinking about the need for a new system, and the very fact that so many Canadians are expressing the hope that there may be nothing savouring of gerrymandering at this or any other time, indicate that in our consideration of this subject we should be seeking some method which will be satisfactory at least until such time as a new and more satisfactory system is introduced, and that whatever we do we should not deal piecemeal with the problem but should attempt to find a working arrangement that respects our constitution and is in keeping with the very special form of federal system established in this country in 1867.

May I emphasize both personally and on behalf of the members of the Conservative party in this house that we are anxious to see the problem dealt with as quickly as possible. We will support every reasonable measure to deal with the subject expeditiously and justly, not so much for the members of the House of Commons as for the people of Canada whose servants we are. Nevertheless we should not seek any shortcuts which may cause difficulties afterwards, and above all, when we are doing something that is related so directly to the processes of democracy, I submit we should show the utmost respect for that constitution which has settled for us the form of democracy under which we carry on our public affairs.

The resolution now before us calls for the setting up of a select committee and then introduces certain special considerations to be placed before that committee. Although the resolution itself by its wording does not exclude consultation with the provincial governments in dealing with this question, the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) this afternoon left no doubt that his opinion is definitely against such consultation. This is not the first time he has explained his own opinion in regard to consultation of that type. At page 1936 of Hansard for Tuesday, May 28, 1946, the Prime Minister, who was then minister of justice, in introducing a motion which had as its purpose changing the representation in this house, had this to say:

> The provinces, that is to say the people of the provinces, are all represented in this parliament, and for the purposes of such matters as are confided to the jurisdiction of this parliament it is by those representatives here that the people of the provinces speak.

That statement was similar in meaning to the statement by the Prime Minister this afternoon. I do suggest, however, that the question was not settled finally in 1946, and that hon. members should very carefully consider what it is we have before us and whether in fact, with our particular federal system, the provinces as represented by their own governments have not some interest in the subject at this time. In fact I find it difficult to follow the arguments of the Prime Minister through to their logical conclusion because in effect he is taking into account the representation made by the legislature of Saskatchewan, which representation expressed the unanimous opinion of the members of that body no matter to what party they belonged. Before us in this resolution we have in fact an attempt to meet in part the representation which has been made on behalf of the people of Saskatchewan through the legislature and government of that province. The Prime Minister has explained that he is not prepared to go as far as the resolution of the Saskatchewan legislature went, but he has included in the resolution now being introduced a request that the committee give consideration to the proposal that the number of seats in any province shall not be reduced by more than 15 per cent below the representation to which such province was previously entitled. He has explained why he is prepared to put forward the figure of 15 per cent instead of 10 per cent.

The Prime Minister said he was placing this resolution before the House of Commons with the request that hon. members express their opinions freely and without regarding themselves as bound by the fact that this has been presented by the leader of the government. That is a suggestion with which I am in agreement; in fact I would welcome a wider application of the same suggestion on many other occasions, and I hope this may be a precedent which will be followed in future. I also hope this indicates an increasing belief on the part of the Prime Minister in the effectiveness of committees to deal with matters that require attention, so that in future he will not only be ready to propose other committees but will also suggest on those occasions that whether or not hon. members ordinarily support the government they should regard themselves as completely free to express their opinions as to the way those committees should deal with the matters referred to them. I am not in any way taking issue with the Prime Minister's statement that he brings the resolution before us in this manner when I suggest that a very large number of members of this house have formed the habit of favouring his suggestions when they are placed before us; and for that reason I recognize that when he gives his opinion as to what he would regard as satisfactory, it will at least be given very earnest consideration by those hon. members who ordinarily support him without question.

The Prime Minister indicated, as I understood his words, that he would find it quite satisfactory if the conclusion of the committee should be that the number of seats should not be reduced by more than 15 per cent below the previous figure. That being so it would seem that the Prime Minister has accepted the principle put forward by the province of Saskatchewan, though he has not been prepared to go quite as far as the legislature of that province went in making this representation. After all, this resolution merely calls upon the committee to consider the proposal. I do suggest that if consideration is to be given to the views of the Saskatchewan legislature, which quite obviously prompted this proposal—and I do not think the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) would challenge that—

Mr. St. Laurent: If the hon. gentleman will allow me, the proposal had been discussed and considered even before it came to us in the form of a resolution from the legislature of Saskatchewan. The members in this house representing constituencies in Saskatchewan were quite as much concerned about it as were the members of the legislature, and from the very day they arrived in Ottawa and were informed of the results of the census they suggested that every attempt be made to avoid what they considered would be an unfair action, that is to say a reduction of 25 per cent in their numbers in this house.

Mr. Gardiner: If the hon. gentleman will permit me also, the remarks of the Prime Minister relieve me of any further responsibility for answering what has just been stated by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Drew: I was not in any doubt but that the right hon. Minister of Agriculture had been making very vigorous representations to the government. In fact I was quite sure that the delay in getting this resolution before us was occasioned by an attempt on the part of the government to meet his representations. I do not know whether or not they have, but at least I am quite sure he was making very vigorous representations. It may well be that the consideration of this subject had been before the government for some time, in view of the interest which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has in it. I know that there are other members in this house extremely interested in this subject. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has already discussed the matter on different occasions. These members have expressed their opinions, but what I am pointing out is that reference has already been made this afternoon to representations made by the Saskatchewan legislature. I believe that the committee should not be tied on this matter but that they should be free to consider the representations of the government of Saskatchewan. If they are to consider those representations the figure should be 10 per cent and not 15 per cent, because that was the figure stated in the resolution adopted by the Saskatchewan legislature.

Most certainly if I were supporting this resolution in its general form, I would wish the figure of 10 per cent to be substituted for the figure of 15 per cent. But there are other considerations. The very fact that the Saskatchewan legislature has passed a resolution, and that the effect of that resolution has been presented to this government, the fact that the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) has this afternoon raised a question about Nova Scotia and that questions have already been raised about Manitoba, suggests that this is not a matter which affects any one province. It is a subject that affects every province and the people in those provinces.

The Prime Minister says the people of those provinces are represented by members in this house. He went further and said that this had always been the position of his party. I must take issue with that, Mr. Speaker, because I am under the impression that until 1946 the position of his party was the very opposite. I think we are confronted here with a question as to whether there is or is not a provincial interest affected. If there is a provincial interest affected, should the provinces be consulted? I should like to quote the words of an earlier leader of the Liberal party in Canada, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. In 1907, as reported at page 2198 of volume II of Hansard for that year, he had this to say:

> The question we have to deal with at the present moment is this. In parliament here we can do as we please; we are in the majority; but are the members of this house prepared to say that if any province finds itself aggrieved by the terms of confederation, which have been accepted by all the provinces, they will ask the British parliament to alter the constitution in the way desired by that particular province? Such a course might be followed by very serious consequences. Confederation is a compact, made originally by four provinces, but adhered to by all the nine provinces who have entered it, and I submit to the judgment of this house and to the best consideration of its members, that this compact should not be lightly altered. It should be altered only for adequate cause, and after the provinces themselves have had an opportunity to pass judgment on the same.

In those words, Mr. Speaker, Sir Wilfrid Laurier was reiterating what he had said on many earlier occasions, namely that the British North America Act is a compact, originally agreed to by the four provinces which started Canada on its course but subsequently adhered to by all the nine provinces which joined to make one great nation. Now that there are ten provinces and that the whole of the area which might be incorporated within Canadian boundaries under the original concept of the fathers of confederation has in fact adhered to that compact, I submit that our obligation to respect its provisions and to respect the spirit of that compact is greater today than ever before.

Nor was that view expressed on behalf of the Liberal party alone. In 1914 Sir Robert Borden was speaking on a motion for leave to introduce the Representation Act of 1914. A subject similar to that which we have before us today was under consideration on February 10, 1914, when he had this to say, as reported at page 612 of Hansard for that date:

> The terms which were then fixed between the four original provinces undoubtedly constituted a compact between those provinces, and up to the present time they have, of course, been carried out according to the true intent and meaning of the statute.

Sir Robert Borden then dealt with further developments by way of adding new provinces. He had this to say, as reported on page 614 of the same volume of Hansard:

> Speaking for myself, I do not see how it would be possible for this parliament to attempt any alteration in the representation of the provinces without the consent of the provinces themselves. It was in that connection that the question was taken up before the interprovincial conference held last autumn in the city of Ottawa, and the result of the proceedings of that conference amounted to this, that the conference declined to take any action on the subject, saying that the matter was one for the consideration of parliament. It is absolutely, in one sense, for the consideration of this parliament, although this parliament has no power to amend the British North America Act. On the other hand, if I apprehend the situation correctly, so far as the four original provinces are concerned, it was also a question for these four original provinces to say whether or not any change could or should be made in the compact under which the first provinces entered into the confederation. The province of Quebec having been fixed as the pivotal province for representation retains the exact number of sixty-five members in this house under all conditions.

Then at a later date in 1924, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen had this to say as reported at page 520 of Hansard for that year:

> The British North America Act and the limitations which are imposed upon our powers, if there are such limitations, are made of our own free will. There is no inferiority in that. It is the result of a treaty as my hon. friend from Lotbiniere (Mr. Vien) said. It is a treaty between various colonies which entered into an agreement. They fixed what the powers of the central parliament should be, and they also fixed what the powers of the various provinces which succeeded the colonies of that time would be, and this was ratified and accepted by the Imperial parliament of the time. Everything we have or have not is because we wanted it so. Now this treaty cannot be changed, it has been the contention of many constitutional authorities, and I think it is only fair that no change should be accepted, without the consent of all those who were parties to it. It is a sacred treaty just as is any other treaty; it is no "scrap of paper."

Then in 1925 the house was dealing with an address asking for power for the Canadian parliament to amend the British North America Act, with the limitation that it could not make amendments affecting rights guaranteed to minorities. At page 300 of Hansard of February 18, 1925, Mr. Ladner interrupted Mr. Lapointe with a question:

Mr. Ladner: If the minister will permit me, will that not apply in the case of each proposed amendment? Does the minister consider it advisable to lay down general clauses which will enable the provinces and the dominion to amend the constitution, or would it not always be a question of amending the act only after consultation with the provinces?

That question was answered by Mr. Lapointe as follows:

Mr. Lapointe: I submit that this should be a matter for understanding between the dominion and the provinces, and it is a matter upon which, I am sure, agreement might and should be reached. I heard an hon. member say the other day, speaking, I believe, of the suggested law concerning the eight-hour day, and evidently being impatient of the obstacle put in the way of that enactment in the difficulty of knowing the respective fields of jurisdiction on the part of the dominion and the provinces—I heard him say, "Well, where there is a will there is a way." I was surprised at that statement. That was the spirit which inspired the invaders of Belgium in 1914, and the world was precipitated in a sea of blood. Surely the British North America Act cannot be made a scrap of paper, as that treaty was made at that time. There is a way, perhaps, yes; but the only way is the friendly way, is the legal way, is the constitutional way. It is to approach the various parties to the agreement with a view to arriving at an understanding as to the changes which may be necessary and which may be agreed upon by all the parties to the pact. As I have said, I do not think there could be any other way; I believe that any arbitrary action in the matter would simply defeat its own purpose and would strike at the root of our national unity. I think I cite history correctly when I say that every time there has been a dispute in Canada as regards provincial rights, those who were on the side of provincial rights were victorious in the end. I do not think there can be any attempt to change the mutual charter of both the dominion and the provinces by the arbitrary action of this parliament. I do not think it is possible to do it. To those who want changes, and I am willing to admit that there might be the necessity for changes, I would say that the only way to get them is the constitutional way, to ask the consent of the various parties to confederation. Mr. Speaker, after sixty years of confederation I think we may safely say that notwithstanding the great obstacles which were in their way the Fathers of Confederation who gathered in 1865 did a great work; I think we may boldly say after sixty years that their work has been a very satisfactory one. It was not perfect; there is no perfection in human devices, but certainly they did the best they could.

As I have said, I would not like to leave the impression that my own view is that no changes should be made at any time, or that no changes are possible. I agree that we are living in 1925, and not in 1865. The problems of Canada must be settled in the light of the present situation.

Mr. Speaker, may I say that we are living in 1952, not in 1865. But again I suggest that every argument put forward by a great member of the Liberal party in this house at that time bears consideration by the members of this house today.

On the very next day following the one to which I have already referred, on February 19, 1925, Mr. T. A. Crerar, who was then the leader of the Progressive party, spoke on this subject. I wish to quote from what he said on that day as reported at page 317 of Hansard for that year:

I quite agree with the argument advanced by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) yesterday that the confederation pact was in the nature of a treaty. It was the result of different provinces getting together and agreeing upon a solution that would lead them out of their difficulties. But while that was one of the reasons behind the confederation understanding or agreement in 1867, there was also another aspiration behind it, and it was voiced, perhaps most strongly, by the great architect of confederation, Sir John A. Macdonald, for in large measure he was the architect of confederation, even if he could not claim credit for originating the idea.

Then again on the same day, Right Hon. Arthur Meighen spoke as follows, as reported at page 335 of Hansard of 1925:

The resolution itself calls upon this house to petition the British parliament to give us power to amend the British North America Act by a majority vote. I have not heard any hon. member, save the mover, support the resolution in those naked terms. The speech of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is decisive in the negative. He raised only one objection—no other is needed. He laboured it, perhaps, too long, but he presented it most forcibly and well. No one in this parliament of Canada could dream, for a moment, of asking the British House of Commons and House of Lords to tear up the securities to which we and others are parties on the mere demand of this house itself. Undoubtedly, the pact of confederation is a contract and there are rights involved therein not represented by the parliament of Canada. We could not put ourselves in the position of asking that rights so secured should be disturbed on our motion alone. The speech of the Minister of Justice determines, I think, without power of dispute, that there should never be suggestion of amendment affecting other parties to the contract save after conference and consent of those other parties.

I have read those quotations at this length for two reasons, Mr. Speaker. The first was to answer the suggestion that it has always been the policy of the Liberal party that the provinces are represented effectively through the members here in relation to matters of this nature, and the second was to lay the foundation for an amendment I shall introduce, and which has as its purpose the redeclaration of what I believe to be the proper principle in dealing with a question of this kind.

To my quotations from Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Mr. Lapointe and Mr. Crerar, I know that the answer may be given that in 1946 the then minister of justice, who is now the Prime Minister, (Mr. St. Laurent) introduced another method; and that following his assertion that the provinces are all represented in this parliament, he then went on to make an argument in support of a resolution which had as its ultimate result a change in the basis upon which the provinces of Canada would be represented, without consulting the provinces themselves. I do not accept that resolution as binding or as final. I think this house followed a wrong course in 1946. I think that the house would have been well advised to adopt the amendment introduced at that time by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he sought to have the provinces consulted before the final decision was made. I believe that at that time the amendment which he introduced to the motion presented to the house by the present Prime Minister, who was then minister of justice, was not only consistent with the traditional position of the Conservative party but was also consistent with the traditional position of the Liberal party from confederation up till that time.

Either there are questions affecting the interests of the provinces or there are not. Certainly, the legislature of Saskatchewan think that there are questions affecting their interests. It is certain from what we have already heard in this house that there are those in Manitoba who think their interests are affected. It is certain from what we have heard in this house that there are those who think that the interests of Nova Scotia are affected. It is certain from what we have heard from other hon. members in this house that the interests of all provinces are affected. And there is another reason why I think that consideration should be given to the position of the provinces in this matter.

The representation of the four original provinces was based upon the Quebec resolutions. The province of Quebec was used as the arithmetic basis upon which computations would be made, and, for the purpose of determining the representation of all provinces, the province of Quebec was to have 65 members. In 1946 that number was increased. I am not questioning at this time the desirability of the increase of the number of seats in Quebec or in any other province; but I do challenge the wisdom of making a change at this time without consulting the provinces, and I challenge still more strongly the wisdom today of making any other changes at this time without consulting the provinces, because it is apparent that further changes in the number of seats affecting the larger provinces are going to have serious consequences for the provinces with smaller populations because of the immense growth of population in the provinces of Ontario, Quebec, British Columbia and Alberta.

Nothing would be unnecessarily delayed by calling the provinces into consultation at this time and having their representations right here in Ottawa. It is possible that the provincial governments would be quite satisfied to place their views before a select committee set up by this house. Nevertheless, whatever system is adopted should be a system which would be satisfactory to them.

We will support a separate resolution setting up a select committee, and would hope that that would be introduced without any unnecessary conditions attached to it. Then it would be possible for a committee to proceed with the basic work and have representations made to it, either directly from the provinces or from a conference jointly representative of the dominion government and the provincial governments. One of the reasons why it would seem wise to follow such a course at this time is that the Minister of Agriculture, who has already indicated his interest in this proposal, thought that finality had been reached in 1946 at the time when the hon. member for Lake Centre was pointing out the desirability of consulting the provinces. The Minister of Agriculture was quite satisfied not to follow that course, and he felt that finality had been reached. I quote from what he said on this subject at page 2475 of Hansard of June 13, 1946:

> This resolution provides for an amendment to the constitution which retains the membership of the House of Commons at exactly the same figure when we have forty million people as it provides for at the present time when we have less than twelve million people. In other words, the membership of the house would not under this resolution ever increase beyond 255. It would remain at that throughout all time until someone undertook to amend the constitution further in order to provide for something else. But we in this parliament cannot take into consideration all the things which people may do fifty years hence, or all things they may do even twenty years hence. We can only act in the light of the information and the knowledge we have and do the thing which we think advisable. Under this resolution what we are proposing as advisable is to have the House of Commons composed of 255 members, and we are providing the means under which it will not increase beyond that figure but will remain at it.

I should point out that the increase to 262 resulted from the addition of Newfoundland as the tenth province of Canada; but that in no way changes the effect of the words of the Minister of Agriculture in this house on June 13, 1946. May I remind hon. members that no matter what the Prime Minister thought then, no matter what the Prime Minister thinks today, the Minister of Agriculture had this to say:

> It would remain at that throughout all time until someone undertook to amend the constitution further in order to provide for something else.

Unless the Minister of Agriculture has some new opinion in regard to this matter, it is clear that he would support the position we take, that this is a subject upon which the provinces should be consulted, and most certainly that there must be an amendment to the British North America Act. If there is to be an amendment to the British North America Act to change the number of seats in this house, then I do submit that, no matter what was done in 1946, we should go back to the principles accepted by the Liberal party for many long years, as stated by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and later by Mr. Lapointe and by other Liberals as well, and recognize that the agreement between the provinces—call it a compact, call it a treaty, call it a covenant, call it an agreement, call it what you will—did represent the basis upon which the provinces of that day agreed to form one nation, and the basis upon which all the other provinces which have joined this nation since that time have entered confederation.

I can only repeat what I said before. If we were to deal with a resolution which introduced the figure of 15 per cent as the limit of reduction of the number of seats of any province, we would be partially recognizing the request that has been made: whether it came first from members from Saskatchewan, or not, or whether it came first formally from the government of Saskatchewan, wherever it came from, it goes partly along the road toward recognition of their recommendation but does not go the whole way. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if the committee is to give consideration to matters of this kind, this house should not tie the hands of the committee by dealing with the figure of 15 per cent. It should be quite ready to consider the resolution presented by the legislature of Saskatchewan, and have before it that resolution in its original form, asking that 10 per cent be the figure which would be the maximum reduction in the number of seats in that province.

What the committee will do will then be obviously for it to decide, as it will be for this house ultimately to decide what it shall do, following the report of the committee itself. I do urge that in a matter of this kind it be recognized that while today Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick may be concerned about the effect of the law as it now stands, it might be any other province at some other time—yes, it might be Quebec or Ontario or British Columbia at some time in the future. I do not think we should deal with this on the basis of casual expediency, seeking partly to meet requests for justice which have been made by one province or another, and then limiting the measures to which concession is made to the request put forward by any provincial government.

I think this is the time to bring all the provincial governments together, recognizing that those provincial governments—or certainly some of them—were not satisfied with the course followed in 1946, and with that knowledge seek a basis for redistribution which would be satisfactory not only to members of the House of Commons but to the people of Canada generally, as well as to the provincial legislatures representing the people in the provinces within the provincial sphere, as do members of the House of Commons representing the people of the whole of Canada within dominion jurisdiction.

Before I move the amendment I am about to propose, may I anticipate any suggestion that this will delay matters. If the amendment I offer is adopted by the house, then a motion to set up a select committee can be put forward, the committee can be set up and can be dealing with the routine procedure and the basic material connected with this subject, while independently a conference can be held which would seek the opinions of the ten provinces and some basis which would accept the sanctity of the British North America Act as the great agreement which laid the foundation for Canadian unity.

Therefore I move in amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer):

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"whereas there is presently before parliament a bill to provide for representation of the House of Commons which inter alia allots to the several provinces of the dominion the number of members they may elect to the said house;

And whereas it has been represented to the government and parliament of Canada that provision should be made for minimum representation of individual provinces;

And whereas provision for such minimum representation cannot be made without first amending the British North America Act;

And whereas the British North America Act interpreted in statutory form the agreement made by the four original provinces and subscribed to by all the other provinces on entering confederation,

Therefore be it resolved that in the opinion of this house appropriate steps should be taken for dominion-provincial consultation so that the views of the several provinces may be made known to this house before consideration is given to changing their electoral representation as presently provided by the British North America Act."

Mr. Speaker: I am wondering whether the amendment is in order. Does not this amendment negative the motion before the house, and set forth another proposal?

Mr. Drew: May I speak to that question?

Mr. Speaker: There is another point, but I shall not mention it for the time being.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I submit that this does not in any way negative the motion. That was the thought to which I was directing my repeated reference to the fact that there need be no delay in proceeding with this whole question.

The setting up of a select committee can be proceeded with, either under this or under a similar motion, once this principle is decided upon. If this amendment were adopted—and, after all, the matter before Your Honour is the possibility of its adoption—it would assert that the provinces should be consulted by means of a dominion-provincial conference. The house, by whatever procedure might be considered desirable, could go forward with all the details relating to the essential statistical information called for by the committee itself at any time.

I would point out however that unless a motion of this kind can be made in this way and at this time—and this is the only time I see when it can be made, so that the subject matter can be dealt with expeditiously—then we have no way of asserting in relation to this subject that consultation with the provinces should be an essential consideration in relation to changes which will affect the interests of every province, changes which we believe relate to the very foundation of this federal system of ours.

I have already referred to the fact that at the time the motion was introduced in 1946 by the Prime Minister, who was at that time minister of justice, an amendment was introduced by the hon. member for Lake Centre calling for consultation with the provinces. That amendment was voted down, but was not ruled out of order.

I submit the whole effect of the amendment now before the house is to give consideration to the desirability of consulting the provinces before anything is done which would affect the structure of the British North America Act. And may I add to what I have already said that, while changes were made in 1946 by another procedure, I submit we are not bound by that procedure. I submit further that on many earlier occasions another procedure was regarded as desirable, and that the principle accepted in the house until 1946, by both the Liberal and Conservative parties, was that the provincial governments should be consulted in regard to any matter of this kind.

I am suggesting it is of the utmost importance that such consultation should take place. This amendment provides an opportunity to express that opinion, without negativing the resolution itself, and thus leaving it open to proceed with the principles contained in the resolution.

The reason I have dealt with the subject in this way, and have not left part of the resolution to stand and then added this to it, is that there might be some question at a subsequent time about part of the subject matter having been dealt with by the house, and thus subsequent consideration of these other matters that had been introduced would be prevented.

Mr. McIvor: I should like to ask a question. Does it affect provincial constituencies or is it for the dominion only?

Mr. Drew: It affects the constituencies from which members are sent to this House of Commons. Those members are members of this house. They are not subject to the direction or control of any provincial legislature or of any other body outside of this house. Nevertheless I am re-emphasizing my own belief that the basis upon which the provinces would be represented in the house was an essential consideration at the time the provinces came together to form one nation, that today we should respect that sacred treaty which made this country one nation, and that no matter what may have been done on any single occasion in the past we should get back to the principles which were so clearly stated by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir Robert Borden, Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, and Mr. Lapointe, as well as Mr. Crerar, who later became a member of the Liberal party.

Mr. Sinnott: That is not an answer to the question.

Mr. St. Laurent: The leader of the opposition was speaking to the point of order but he was arguing for the merits of the proposal that there be consultation with the provincial government before anything is done with respect to representation.

Mr. Drew: I would remind the Prime Minister I was answering a question by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor).

Mr. St. Laurent: It was an argument in support of the principle that this house should not deal with the matter of representation of the people of the provinces without the consent of the provincial governments. The leader of the opposition cited a statement I made in 1946. Then he cited statements made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, Hon. Mr. Crerar, Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe and others, but they had to do with the proposals that there be taken from the provinces and transferred to the federal parliament jurisdiction which, by the British North America Act, was given to the provinces. I am sure the leader of the opposition did not want to do me any injustice. In what he cited there was the statement that with respect to the matters which were within the jurisdiction of this parliament the people of the provinces were represented by the members whom they elected to this parliament and not by the members they elected to their provincial legislatures. That was the extent to which I went.

With respect to the point of order concerning the amendment, it is clearly an expanded negative of the motion. It proposes that all the words in the motion after the word "that" be wiped out. The motion is a motion to set up a special committee. All the words providing for the setting up of the special committee are going to be wiped out if the amendment is accepted, and there will be a general statement with a lot of whereases that the opinion of the provincial governments be obtained at a dominion-provincial conference. It is always very much the same thing. In putting that proposal forward hon. gentlemen opposite have never said whether or not there should be unanimous consent of the provinces before any change could be made. They have always shied away from that. They say there should be consultation with the provinces, but "what will you do if one of them says no?" "Oh well, we will wait and see if one does say no before we answer that question."

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, I agree with what the Prime Minister is saying, but can we have it clear whether this discussion is on the point of order or on the substance of the amendment?

Mr. Speaker: Order. We cannot have two points of order before the house at the same time.

Mr. St. Laurent: My submission pertains to the point of order. Acceptance of the amendment would constitute an assertion to this effect:

> . . . that in the opinion of this house appropriate steps should be taken for dominion-provincial consultation so that the views of the several provinces may be made known to this house before consideration is given to changing their electoral representation as presently provided by the British North America Act.

If that is passed, that is all there is to it. There is no other decision. The hon. member says that there could be another motion to set up a select committee although I do not know what Your Honour would decide in that event. There would have been a vote striking out the words that provide for the setting up of the committee, and I do not know whether Your Honour would consider that another motion could be made to restore what a vote of the house had struck out or to do the same thing in another form. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment is an expanded negative of the proposal that we proceed to have the house consider readjustment of the representation of its membership as required by the constitution, and that it do not consider doing that until there has been a dominion-provincial conference.

The hon. member referred to the fact that there was a vote on the amendment submitted by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). I have not the record here but my recollection is that the hon. member for Lake Centre proposed to insert before the words of the original resolution, which was one for an address to His Majesty to lay a certain proposed bill before the parliament at Westminster, words to the effect that there be a dominion-provincial conference to consider the matter, and that upon a satisfactory understanding having been reached an address be then submitted to His Majesty. There it was really a modification of the procedure that had been proposed, not to the effect that there should be no address at all but that prior to its presentation there should be a consultation of the dominion and provincial governments. Even then, as I remember it, the hon. member would not say that his views were that there could not be any change whatsoever if one province refused to agree to that change. There was to be a consultation to see how the provinces felt about it.

But if it is a contract, treaty, compact or anything of that kind that cannot be changed without consent, it requires the consent of all, and if the proper parties are the provincial governments responsible to members elected to the provincial legislatures then you have to have the consent of each and every one of them before anything can be done. As I recollect it, that has never been stated by the opposition as the proper principle. On the point of order, I suggest to Your Honour that the amendment cannot be considered as one pertaining to the motion now before you. It is something entirely new and would constitute a denial by the house of the proposal contained in the original motion.

Mr. Drew: Since the Prime Minister has raised the question as to what we would consider necessary to achieve results, perhaps he would simplify it for all of us by indicating what measure of agreement he expects from the provinces if there are to be any results from the dominion-provincial conferences now under way.

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not think it would be possible nor that it would be in conformity with the constitution to attempt to take from any provincial legislature without its consent any right given to that legislature by the constitution; and I think it is quite unnecessary to consult provincial governments with respect to the exercise of the jurisdiction given by the constitution to the federal parliament by the representatives of all the provinces elected to this house.

Mr. Drew: Before you give a ruling, Mr. Speaker, may I refer you to page 993 of Hansard for the session of 1918. At that time a very long motion was before the house, setting out a number of details; and an amendment was moved similar in form to the one now before the house, simply providing that all the words after "that" be struck out and something else substituted therefor. That amendment is at page 956 of the same Hansard.

I mention this because on that occasion the amendment would have disposed of the whole resolution originally presented to the house, and would have substituted a representation which related to the same subject but which of course did not carry forward the original resolution. The subject matter was entirely different from that now before us, but I am placing that resolution and amendment before you because the procedure was the same. That amendment wiped out the whole motion after the word "that" and substituted another proposition. That was permitted and was voted upon. I submit the situation is exactly the same today.

Mr. Speaker: Would the leader of the opposition tell me whether any point of order was raised at that time?

Mr. Drew: If the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) might be allowed to proceed, I will look that up.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Some reference was made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to what happened in 1946. On May 28 of that year the right hon. gentleman, for the then prime minister, moved:

> That, whereas by the British North America Act, 1867, it is provided that in respect of representation in the House of Commons the province of Quebec shall have the fixed number of sixty-five members; and whereas the said act provides that there shall be assigned to each of the other provinces such a number of members as will bear the same proportion to the number of its population as the number of sixty-five bears to the number of the population of Quebec—

Then after dealing with the various portions of the British North America Act it goes on:

> And whereas it is considered that a more equitable apportionment of members to the various provinces could be effected if readjustment were made on the basis of the population of all the provinces taken as a whole.
> A humble address be presented to His Majesty the King in the following words:

Then are set out in detail the operative words requesting the imperial parliament to amend the British North America Act in accordance with the request of this parliament. At page 2235 of Hansard for June 6, 1946, I moved that the motion be amended by deleting the words "An humble address be presented to His Majesty the King in the following words" and substituting therefor:

> And whereas it is desirable that the government should consult with the several provinces in respect of the said matter.
> Now therefore be it resolved that the government be required to consult at once the several provinces and upon satisfactory conclusion of such consultations be authorized to present an humble address to His Majesty in the following terms.

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes; that is as I remembered it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was just placing it on record because the Prime Minister made reference to it. The amendment I moved at that time was couched in those terms.

Mr. Drew: In answer to the question you raised, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the procedure was challenged. I believe it was accepted as a procedure which had been followed on earlier occasions.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened attentively to what has been said by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) as to the regularity of the amendment. I followed the remarks of the leader of the opposition in which he stated that if this amendment carried, then a committee could be set up; but I think he and the house would agree with me that if the amendment carried the proposal now before the house to set up a committee would be defeated. The amendment does not add to the motion now before the house but destroys it, and sets forth a different proposal. I can see that if our rules provided for what the leader of the opposition has suggested the amendment might be in order, but I am unable to find any such procedure. In view of that fact I am forced to rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, now that the amendment has been disposed of, I rise to speak to the motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). As I see it that motion and the debate which has developed thus far raise three main questions. First is the question as to what is the best and most desirable way to tackle the problem of redistribution. In the second place we have before us the precise terms of the Prime Minister's motion, which we must consider and on which we must express our views. In the third place we have the constitutional question which I submit is in fact raised by the motion and has also been raised in the course of the debate by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). My remarks may involve some crossing of the lines between those three questions, but at any rate they are the three points to which I wish to address myself at this time.

In the first place I want to express once again as strongly as I can the view of this group that redistribution should not be the business of parliament nor of a parliamentary committee. We share to the full the views which have been expressed on a number of occasions by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) to the effect that redistribution should be handled by an independent commission.

The last time redistribution came before this house was in 1947. Parenthetically, I might point out that it was in 1946 that a resolution seeking an amendment to the British North America Act was passed so as to change the basis of redistribution, but it was in 1947 that the redistribution bill itself came before us. On the second reading of that bill in 1947 I moved an amendment to the effect that the bill be not then read a second time but that the house express as its opinion the view that the whole question of redistribution should be dealt with by an independent commission. One of the first members to speak after I moved that amendment was the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). He pointed out that this idea of an independent commission was an old one so far as he was concerned, and that he had in fact prepared a bill in that direction some years before when he had been a member of the government. He referred to that bill again in a speech he made in the house during the course of this session.

In other words, in 1947 the member for Quebec South indicated his support of the principle of the proposal contained in my amendment to the second reading of the redistribution bill, but he pointed out that it was too late then, when redistribution was on our doorstep, to consider any other method of dealing with it. I was therefore disappointed that the member for Quebec South, having said that when redistribution is on our doorstep is no time to deal with the problem but that it should be dealt with in between, waited from 1947 until redistribution was on our doorstep again before he raised the matter in this house, either by a speech or by the bill he has placed on the order paper. I agree with him that this problem should be dealt with by an independent commission, but I feel that this business of forever saying there is some other time to deal with it is irresponsible. There is no time like the present for parliament to take a stand on this important question. Thus it is that with respect to that part of the Prime Minister's motion, Mr. Speaker, which takes it for granted that it is proper to refer this matter to a committee of this house, I am in disagreement.

The other day when the member for Quebec South was speaking, he had occasion to quote from Professor Norman Ward of the university of Saskatchewan, who has written quite a number of articles and works on parliamentary democracy and in particular has recently written a number of articles on the redistribution question. One of those articles appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of February 9, 1952 and was entitled "Too big for parliament." I should like to quote a few sentences from that article.

> The problem of redistribution has become too vast and complicated to be handled satisfactorily by a committee of the House of Commons, which, like all house committees, has no staff trained in research techniques or anything else. With the best will in the world, a group of M.P.'s drawn from many occupations, provinces and political parties would find it extremely difficult to face objectively the problems connected with sharing seats fairly among the provinces and sharing seats fairly among the people within each province. Population density, homogeneity and topographical features and area, are all factors which ought to be considered seriously. But under the normal circumstances in which redistribution takes place in the House of Commons, with all parties jockeying for position, all factors become entangled in what Hon. C. G. (Chubby) Power, M.P. who ought to know, has called an "unseemly, undignified, and utterly confusing scramble for personal and political advantage."

I agree with what the member for Quebec South has said, and I agree with the views expressed by Professor Norman Ward in his advice to us that this problem should be dealt with not by a committee of those who are interested in the boundaries of seats for which they are potential members in future parliaments but rather by an independent commission.

I would point out that most democratic countries have moved on to the idea of an independent commission, and in particular I draw attention to the practice that has been in vogue at Westminster since about 1916 or 1917. It was at that time that a conference of members of all parties in the British House of Commons was convened to go into this whole matter. They recommended the appointment of an independent commission to deal with the problem. This conference recognized that there should be an element of parliamentary representation, but the recommendation confined that element to the Speaker of the British House of Commons. Although the reports of the boundary commission of the United Kingdom are subject to perfunctory approval of the British house, nevertheless any changes that have been made in the boundaries in the United Kingdom since that time have been made by that independent commission. I feel that we, as members of this House of Commons, owe it to this country to take steps as speedily as we can in the direction of setting up an independent commission to deal with this matter.

I should like to point out that in the quotation I read from Professor Norman Ward, he referred not only to the impossibility of members of parliament dealing objectively with the problem of sharing seats within a province, but he said it was equally difficult for members of parliament to be objective in sharing seats fairly among the provinces. Both of these problems, Mr. Speaker, are before us at this time. The Prime Minister's motion pinpoints the problem of sharing seats in this parliament among the provinces. If the motion passes and the committee is set up, in addition to dealing with the problem of sharing seats fairly amongst the provinces, that committee will have to deal with the problem of sharing seats fairly within each province. The latter problem is one that every redistribution committee has had to deal with, and the results are too well known to all members.

However, the main issue before us in the Prime Minister's motion is the question of whether or not members of parliament are competent to make a decision as to what is a fair way of apportioning seats amongst the different provinces of this country. I feel that we should have an independent commission, not only for the problem we have had every ten years of drawing the boundaries properly within the provinces, but we should also have an independent commission to grapple with the fundamentals of the question that has arisen because of the serious loss of seats in certain parts of this country. The question of the sanctity of the "Rep by Pop" formula is raised. Adherents of the democratic process across the years have believed in this formula. In the main there is no question but that it is a principle from which we should depart with the greatest of caution. Yet there are times when, by oversimplifying a principle, a wrong can be done. That seems to have been recognized by the Canadian parliament because we have departed from the "Rep by Pop" principle in a number of ways. We have departed from it in apportioning the seats amongst the provinces. From 1867 down until 1946 there was in the British North America Act what was known as the one-twentieth rule which very definitely varied the "Rep by Pop" principle. Since 1915 there has been in the constitution of this country the rule that no province can have fewer seats than the number of senators assigned to that province. That rule definitely upsets the "Rep by Pop" idea. On several occasions when new provinces were admitted into confederation, they were allotted members in excess of the number to which their actual population would have entitled them. That is the basis upon which Yukon-Mackenzie River was given a seat; while in terms of area all of us feel that there should be more than one member up there, nevertheless in terms of population we have upset the "Rep by Pop" rule for that large area.

Those who have advocated these various deviations from the "Rep by Pop" rule have had good arguments for them, and have always said that we should use plain, ordinary, common sense. I quite agree that there has been some common sense in some of these departures from the "Rep by Pop" rule. But, Mr. Speaker, let us honestly face up to what has been done. Let us face the fact that we have found fault with that rule from time to time and that we have found it necessary to develop certain overtones or deviations in order to deal with actual problems. That is what is happening now. In 1943 and in 1946 the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), who was minister of justice on both occasions, spoke favourably of the "Rep by Pop" rule. I have the quotations here on the desk in front of me. Particularly in 1946, when it was decided to do away with the one-twentieth rule, the Prime Minister, speaking for the government, said it was felt at that time that we should get our representation more nearly on the basis of the population of the country.

We lay down these rules but we change them every ten or twenty years. Now, within less than a decade since the last change was made, presumably for all time, the Prime Minister is confronted with this problem created by the loss of five seats in Saskatchewan, two in Manitoba and one in Nova Scotia. He realizes that the strict application of that rule produces an unfairness or a wrong, and so he feels—as does the government with him—that perchance consideration should be given to some variation in the rule of "Rep by Pop" in order to avoid creating an anomaly or perpetuating a wrong. If we have reached the point where we recognize, through the experience of this country from 1867 on, that "Rep by Pop" oversimplified and applied strictly does not meet the bill, is it not time that we referred this whole matter to an independent commission for a study of the basic factors involved in the representation in the House of Commons?

At this point I want to say that it is my intention to support the Prime Minister's motion. There is a change which I think should be made and which I believe would make it better, but either in its present form or with the change which I shall suggest, it is still an expedient to deal with the problem rather than the setting up of a commission to deal with the problem in terms of fundamentals.

The Prime Minister today referred to the loss of population in Saskatchewan, and yet said that that was not any indication that there was a decline in the contribution of the people of Saskatchewan to the life and the economy of this country. I agree with him. But does that not suggest that maybe we have got to take into consideration other factors besides that of population? Is that not so, particularly in a far-flung country like this, in a country like Canada where we have some areas that are thickly populated and others that are sparsely populated but are still making a great contribution to the life of this country? The situation in our land is unique and, as I say, it seems to me there are other factors than that of population that should be taken into consideration. But I think that consideration should be given not by way of a snap judgment on a resolution which is at best an expedient but rather that that consideration should be given by a really independent body studying the whole problem.

Anyone who has read works such as those of Professor Ward will realize that there is room for real study of this problem. That study might produce a set of rules which would be satisfactory and which would make us all feel happier in that they would be fundamental and basic rather than just expedients. I want to say again, Mr. Speaker, that I feel strongly that we should have an independent commission not only for the job that is proposed in the bill that is on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), namely the drawing of the boundaries of the constituencies within our provinces, but we should also have it to deal with this basic and fundamental question of what should be the factors taken into consideration in deciding the representation from the various areas in this country.

A few minutes ago I was giving examples of the way in which we violate the principle of "Rep by Pop". In particular, I was doing it with respect to the division of the seats among the provinces. I might also add that within the provinces we do not worry a great deal about the principle of "Rep by Pop". There is one member in this House of Commons who represents a constituency which, according to the last census, had a population of 9,999 persons, less than 10,000. There is another member who sits two or three seats away from me who represents a constituency in which there are nearly 160,000 persons. That is a proportion of 16 to one. That is the variation in the size of constituencies in terms of population represented by members in this house. I should point out that those two constituencies are in different provinces but even in one province like Ontario, the population goes all the way from less than 20,000 to nearly 160,000.

Mr. Ross (Souris): At present from 17,000 to nearly 160,000.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) should not interrupt at this point or I will mention how many he represents.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I will tell you myself.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Souris represents only about one-third of the number represented by those of us from the constituencies in the city of Winnipeg. In view of all that, and particularly in view of the situation to which I have referred in Ontario, where members represent constituencies with populations which run from less than 20,000 to nearly 160,000, this is no place for anyone to stand up and prate about "Rep by Pop". That situation is defended here—20,000 in one constituency and 160,000 in another; really no one defends that extreme case, but there are members in the house who will defend variations from 40,000 to 60,000, we will say, on the ground that it is easier for a member to give service to a compact constituency like mine, for example, than it is for a member who represents a far-flung constituency that may cover half of a province. There is one constituency in my province of Manitoba that covers, in terms of area, nearly two-thirds of the province, I believe. I would be the first to admit that the member for that constituency has a much more difficult time in serving it than I have in serving a constituency that is only a mile wide and two or three miles long. There is room for some variation in cases such as I have just mentioned, but not for the extremes I referred to earlier.

However, if we accept that principle within a province I suggest that the day has come when we are going to have to accept that principle as among the various areas in this country. Here in central Canada—shall I say from Three Rivers down to Windsor—you have an area where the population is heavily concentrated. If you look at the map of those constituencies you will find that they are all fairly small. I do not think there is a doubt in the world that members in that whole area could give service as members of parliament to a larger number of people per member than is possible, shall we say, in the whole area from the great lakes to the Rocky mountains.

I do not think it is our right as members, affected as we are, to make decisions of that kind. I think, however, that there are basic principles that have got to be gone into, and that the type of body to go into them is an independent commission with some good judges on it or some good students of this matter, such as a man like Professor Norman Ward whom we have been quoting, and others, including geographers and statisticians—people who could really look at this problem objectively. I hope that it will not be long before that approach will be made.

If the hope of getting such an independent commission to deal with this problem at this time is dim, in view of the fact that the Prime Minister has put this motion on the order paper, that means that we have to express our views on this particular way of dealing with the problem. I think I made it clear that I regard it as an expedient; certainly, a poor second to the type of proposal that I have been making. But if the independent commission is not forthcoming, what about this expedient? Well, at least it does attempt to face up to the fact that "Rep by Pop" as among the provinces, while it sounds good, does create anomalies and cases of unfairness. That is particularly true, and very obvious, when the result of the strict application of section 51 of the British North America Act results in a province like Saskatchewan losing 25 per cent of its membership at one fell blow, five seats, and the province of Manitoba losing two seats at the same time, even though we in the province of Manitoba have had an actual increase in our population in the last ten years of over 5 per cent. Well, if that is the basis—

[Mr. Knowles.]

And Mr. Deputy Speaker having taken the chair:

Mr. Knowles: I am very happy to be interrupted by that applause for you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to have the honour at this time of extending publicly to you my congratulations on your recent election to the high office which you now hold.

I was about to say that the proposal that is now before us is worth consideration as a second best, in that it faces up to the problem and tries to solve it, if you accept the basis that this is parliament's job. But if we are going to deal with the problem in this way, I feel very strongly that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) should have given more consideration to the 10 per cent floor which was suggested by the resolution that was passed unanimously by the legislature of Saskatchewan.

I do not take the view of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) that because the legislature of Saskatchewan passed the resolution that means that it has to be presented as it is to the committee, for this is clearly a federal matter; but I still think the government should have given more favourable consideration to the terms of that resolution. I listened carefully, both on Wednesday, April 9, and again this afternoon, to the two arguments which the Prime Minister advanced against the 10 per cent floor rather than the floor of 15 per cent, and in my view both of his arguments can be answered quite easily.

First, his argument was that the 10 per cent floor would result in Saskatchewan having 18 members, and Alberta 17, despite the fact that Alberta's population is a little larger than that of Saskatchewan. Well, Mr. Speaker, that argument would have been valid on the basis of the Prime Minister's resolution in the form in which he first placed it on the order paper. But he withdrew the motion in the form in which he first placed it on the order paper, and submitted a substitute motion, which has this extra proviso to the effect that the operation of this floor must never result in a province with a smaller population having more members than some other province with a larger population. But that proviso is there now, and if he changed the figure of 15 per cent to 10 per cent in the new form of his motion—and that is what we have now, and not the original form—if he changed it in the new form the result would be that Saskatchewan would have 18 members instead of 17 or 15, and the application of the proviso would give to Alberta the same number of 18 members as would be given to Saskatchewan.

The same 10 per cent floor which I am now advocating would of course result in Manitoba losing only one member instead of two. I realize I am from Manitoba and it may be said I am speaking on behalf of my own province, but I think hon. members will have to admit the justice of this argument. I submit that for a province to gain population to the extent of 5·8 per cent and then be asked to take a loss of two members is not fair, and that a proposal such as the one I am making that we have a 10 per cent floor so that we would lose only one seat with our 5·8 per cent increase in population is one to which further consideration should be given. I have been tempted to move an amendment to that effect, but you know we have the experience now and then in this house of having amendments or motions which are made from the opposition side defeated. Even when they are passed unanimously sometimes the government rejects them, but we will get to that in another debate. Therefore rather than move it in the form of an amendment, at this time at any rate, I put this 10 per cent proposal forward as a suggestion and I ask the Prime Minister to consider it seriously.

I say to him again that his first argument against the 10 per cent floor was an argument that he thought up and was valid in relation to the original form of the motion, but it is not valid in relation to the present form, because the result would be as I have indicated, of Saskatchewan retaining its 18 seats. It would result as well in Alberta having 18, and Manitoba would end up with 15 which, as I say, is a loss of one seat. Surely, that is loss enough for us to take when we have had an actual increase in population to the extent of 5·8 per cent in the last ten years.

The other argument that the Prime Minister used against the 10 per cent floor was that it would provide in effect a floor for Newfoundland of its present 7 seats. It is obvious that that is what it would do. If you had the 10 per cent floor a province with 7 seats could not lose one member, and so 7 would be the floor. The Prime Minister said that that would give it a floor higher than the other maritime provinces. I think he meant that it would be a floor higher than the floor of the other maritime provinces. But that does not apply except in the case of Prince Edward Island. New Brunswick already has a floor of 10; Nova Scotia also has a floor of 10. Prince Edward Island has a floor of 4, but that is two above the number of members it would be entitled to mathematically. I do not think it would be unfair for Newfoundland, as a result of the 10 per cent formula, to have a floor of 7. What is so sacred about those senatorial floors? I would say that we should not disturb them in the sense of reducing them, but there is no law against providing a higher floor above the present floor, which is what even the present 15 per cent clause could do with respect to some of the provinces eventually.

But let me get back to the senatorial floors and to the situation in the maritime provinces. If you were to take the present population of Prince Edward Island as a basis for its senatorial floor, or for its floor of 4 in the number of members of parliament it must have, on that basis New Brunswick's population is such that it should have a floor of 20, Nova Scotia a floor of 26, and Newfoundland a floor of 14. On the other hand, if you were to leave out Prince Edward Island because of its very small population and take New Brunswick on the basis of its present population and say that its present population entitles it to a floor of 10, on that basis Nova Scotia would be entitled to a floor of 12 and Newfoundland to a floor of 7. So, Mr. Speaker, on no count can you make it out that it is unfair for Newfoundland to have a floor of 7 rather than its present floor of 6, particularly when Nova Scotia and New Brunswick already have their floors of 10. I might also point out that a 10 per cent floor under the reduction to be effected as a result of any census would also provide a floor of 9 for the western provinces. I cannot envision a day when the mathematics of the situation would reduce us down to that figure. At the present time the senatorial floor is not much use to us out there. It gives us a floor of 6 in each western province. If we had a 10 per cent floor that at least would give us a floor of 9 rather than the present floor of 6.

And so, on all counts, I do not see any argument at all against the resolution submitted by the legislature of Saskatchewan. I strongly urge the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to reconsider that part of his motion. He might consent even to someone on his side amending his motion, not necessarily changing the 15 per cent to 10 per cent, but putting both figures in, and thus giving the committee the right to consider both propositions, as alternatives. Surely that is little enough to ask.

As I say, I am not, at this stage, moving an amendment. Rather I make this suggestion to the Prime Minister, because if we are going to follow this method, this use of an expedient, that of having a floor in terms of percentage, then I think we are fully justified in asking that it be 10 per cent rather than 15. And I plead for that, not only for my own province, which it would certainly affect, but for the province of Saskatchewan and other areas that might be affected now or at any time in the future.

I turn now to the constitutional aspect of the question, touched upon by inference by the Prime Minister and touched upon very directly by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). I would point out first that since confederation there have been four amendments to the British North America Act which dealt directly with the problem of representation or redistribution. Those four amendments are the amendments of 1886, 1915, 1943, and 1946.

The amendment of 1886, which is dealt with at page 99 of Dr. Ollivier's book, in which he deals with the British North America Act and Selected Statutes, was an amendment giving the parliament of Canada the right to provide for representation in the House of Commons—and the Senate, too, if they wished—from territories not included within the provinces. That certainly affected representation in the House of Commons and also affected the ratio as between any one province and the rest of the country.

The amendment of 1915, which is dealt with at page 111 of this same volume, is the amendment which dealt with the senatorial floor. It now operates in the case of Prince Edward Island, and certainly did have and still has a bearing upon the representation in the House of Commons, and the ratio of seats among the various provinces.

The amendment of 1943, which is dealt with at page 118 of this same volume, was one which most of us will recall as having postponed the redistribution which was to be made following the census of 1941. The result of that amendment was that the election of 1945 was fought on a redistribution worked out on the basis of the census of 1931. In effect it was contrary to the original provision of the constitution. So there again was a constitutional change having a bearing upon representation in the House of Commons.

The last of the four to which I have referred is the amendment of 1946, to which reference is made at page 119 of this same volume. It is the amendment that provided a membership of 255—that was before Newfoundland came in—and made provision for the basis upon which we are now operating.

There are other amendments to the constitution which might be said to have a bearing on representation. I refer to the statutes which brought in the various provinces—Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and so on, and, more recently, in 1949, the amendment bringing in Newfoundland. In each case we added members to the House of Commons and upset the ratio or the relationship which previously existed between any one province and the rest of the country.

I would point out however that in all these cases the changes in the constitution were made on motions of this parliament and this parliament alone. I wish to speak particularly with respect to the four that directly affected redistribution, namely the amendments to the British North America Act made in the years 1886, 1915, 1943 and 1946.

As I said before, in not one of these cases was there any consultation with the provinces. The changes were made here, by this parliament, on the basis of section 51 of the British North America Act which says, quite clearly—and this is the wording as provided by the Statute Law Revision Act of 1893:

> On the completion of each decennial census the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted by such authority, in such manner and from such time as the parliament of Canada from time to time provides.

In other words this was not something that was to be discussed with the provinces. This was a matter to be dealt with by the parliament of Canada. I would point out that parliament has taken it to be its right, under section 51, not only to change the boundaries within the provinces by the method we have followed, but also to change the rules governing the apportionment of seats among the provinces. That has been done with respect to each of the four amendments to which I have referred, as well as with respect to amendments admitting the various new provinces.

What was the record with respect to the attitude taken by parliament and, if you will, taken by the various parties in the house, on each of those four occasions? Perhaps that would be a good question for me to answer when we resume at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I had just referred to the fact that there have been four amendments to the British North America Act dealing directly with the problem of redistribution. I pointed out that those were in 1886, 1915, 1943 and 1946. I ended my remarks at six o'clock by asking the question as to what had been the attitude of the house toward those changes on each of those occasions. May I say that on not one of these occasions were the provinces consulted. The action of sending a resolution to Westminster was taken by the parliament of Canada under the terms of section 51 of the British North America Act. On the first two occasions, 1886 and 1915, Conservative governments were in power. The first one was during the regime of Sir John A. Macdonald. The second one was during the days when Sir Robert Borden was prime minister. The third and fourth occasions were when a Liberal government was in power, Mr. Mackenzie King being the prime minister at both times.

It is true, as was pointed out this afternoon by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), that in 1946 the Progressive Conservative party in this house opposed seeking an amendment to the constitution with respect to redistribution without first consulting the provinces. Nevertheless by an overwhelming vote of the house it was decided to amend the constitution in that way in the belief in the minds of the majority that this parliament had the right to do so under the terms of section 51 of the British North America Act. That leaves one other case, namely, that of 1943, when the British North America Act was amended in order to postpone the redistribution consequent upon the census of 1941. The result of that amendment was that the election of 1945 was fought on the basis of the census of 1931, clearly contrary to the spirit and the provisions of the original constitution. When the 1943 amendment came to a vote in the house on July 5 of that year it carried by a vote of 115 to 9. The group of nine consisted of a few then independent or semi-independent members from the province of Quebec, but all the Progressive Conservatives who were then in the house voted for the resolution to amend the constitution at that time in respect of redistribution.

Let me read a few of the names that are listed amongst those voting for the motion. Since they are listed here by their names I think it is in order for me to read them that way. The following names appear: Black, Cardiff, Casselman, Diefenbaker, Graydon, Green, Ross, Tustin, and many others. In other words, I am simply pointing out that on that occasion there was no question so far as the official stand of the Progressive Conservative party was concerned. They supported this change in the constitution having to do with redistribution.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, section 51 of the British North America Act is clear. Redistribution is a matter that comes within the responsibility of the federal parliament. The precedents, all four of them, are equally clear, namely, that the changes made in the constitution dealing with redistribution have been made by the parliament of Canada without consulting the provinces. I feel that is the course that it is still the right and the duty of this parliament to pursue.

Redistribution Committee

There is one other matter I should like to deal with briefly. The question has been raised both by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and by the Leader of the Opposition as to how we would go about a move of this kind assuming that it does involve a change in the constitution. To my way of thinking there is no doubt but that a change such as is suggested in the Prime Minister's motion does involve changing the constitution, whether that change is made indirectly or directly. After all, section 51 of the British North America Act now stipulates the basis upon which the membership of the House of Commons is to be determined. If the committee set up by virtue of this motion recommends some other basis then that is either repugnant to the constitution or involves changing the constitution. We now have the right to do that in this parliament, and we have had that right since the fall of 1949. As hon. members will recall, in the first session of this parliament—which met in the fall of 1949—we passed a motion which resulted in an amendment being made at Westminster whereby sub-section 1 of section 91 of the British North America Act now gives to the parliament of Canada the right to amend our own constitution with respect to matters that are clearly federal except for a few items specifically listed as entrenched clauses. Therefore we now can do what was done in 1886, 1915, 1943 and 1946. We can amend the constitution with respect to redistribution but, unlike what had to be done in those years, we do not now have to go to Westminster. We can do it ourselves right here in the parliament of Canada.

If I may say so, I think the method to be followed has been indicated to the house in another bill on the order paper in my name having to do with the quorum of the House of Commons. A study of that bill will make it clear that we do not have the right in this parliament to amend a statute of another country, namely, the British North America Act itself, but after all the constitution of Canada does not consist only of the British North America Act. It consists of a number of statutes, some of them British, some of them Canadian, some of them pre-1867, some since 1867. After all, Magna Carta, the Bill of Rights of 1688 and many other statutes are in effect part of the constitution of Canada. Dr. Ollivier tells me what we now have the right to do by virtue of the new subsection 1 of section 91 of the British North America Act is to pass Canadian legislation which, when added to that body of statutes comprising our constitution, does in that way amend the constitution of this country.

Therefore it seems to me we can deal with this matter in either one of two ways. We can do it in an indirect way which I think is second best. We can pass a bill changing the representation of the house in which we include a preamble saying that notwithstanding the provisions of section 51 of the British North America Act, and by virtue of the power contained in section 91 (1) of the British North America Act, we enact as follows. Then we can spell out the proposed redistribution as planned by the committee. However, I feel that the better way to deal with the matter would be for us first of all to pass legislation amending section 51 of the British North America Act in the same way that my Bill No. 179 seeks to amend section 37 of the British North America Act with respect to the quorum of the House of Commons. Having amended section 51 of the British North America Act in that way to provide, as is our right, a new basis for adjusting the representation in the House of Commons, we could then bring in a redistribution bill based upon the provisions of the amendment to the constitution which we had properly enacted in the way I have suggested. If a change is to be made I hope such a course will be followed.

I thank the house, Mr. Speaker, for the attention and perhaps the extra few minutes that have been given me. I repeat that I earnestly hope consideration will be given the idea of setting up an independent commission to review the whole problem, both the question of drawing the boundaries within a province and that of apportioning the seats among provinces and areas. If that cannot be done at this time by virtue of the decision of the government, we will support the motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent); but once again we would make our plea to him in the strongest possible terms to reconsider the figure set out in that motion. We feel that if a floor is going to be established it would be far more justifiable, far more in keeping with fair play to all concerned, to set the floor at 10 per cent instead of 15 per cent. The proposed floor of 15 per cent would seem to have the effect of assisting only one province. A 10 per cent floor would assist at least one other province now, if not two, and other provinces in the future, and I feel that a 10 per cent floor would appeal to all as a fairer way of dealing with this problem, pending a settlement of it on a more fundamental basis, which I hope will come soon.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): I listened with great interest to the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on April 9, and again to all that was said this afternoon in connection with this question of redistribution. I was a member of the last committee to deal with this matter, and I hope we may have as easy a time in 1952 as we had then. As far as Alberta was concerned we had a very pleasant time. The hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene) and I got together in his office for a very few minutes, and we were the first committee to bring in a unanimous report with respect to our province, a report which I may say was accepted by the main committee and later by the house.

We in this group will support in principle the resolution that has been brought in by the Prime Minister. I am not sure that as it stands it is in the best possible form; but because we are making the laws here I feel that we can change it if a majority of the house finds it necessary and advisable to do so. For that reason we do not intend to tie ourselves down now to the exact terms of the resolution.

Three proposals have been suggested. One is the constitutional method under which Saskatchewan stands to lose five seats, Manitoba two and Nova Scotia one. I do not feel that this is quite fair to those provinces. Saskatchewan has suffered in the past and is suffering today, not because of bad weather but from floods, foot-and-mouth disease and the agricultural policies laid down by this government. It would not be right to take five seats from them now, as would be the case under the constitutional method.

The proposal by the Prime Minister that no province should lose more than 15 per cent of its seats seems an improvement on the constitutional method. But a still better method has been suggested; that is that no province should lose more than 10 per cent of its seats. Since the province in which I live would not lose any representation under any of these methods I feel that I am perhaps freer to speak on this matter than some others may be. As things stand I believe we might very well consider the 10 per cent reduction rather than the other two methods. It may be possible that some of the other provinces, the maritimes or perhaps some provinces even closer to Ottawa, are ready to take advantage of such a provision; in fact one of the eastern provinces has already taken advantage of similar legislation passed under the British North America Act. While I have no desire whatever to take away that right, I do not believe there would be any discrimination against any other part of the dominion by having this 10 per cent floor put into effect at this time.

I believe it is fully understood and recognized by the people of Canada that the west, as a part of Canada, suffers as a result of its representation here, or rather I should say its lack of representation. We have in the west a small population in comparison with the wealth produced, but to my knowledge that has never been taken into consideration. When you want men to go overseas you go west and get the very best men to be had. When you want the best bread in the world at the lowest price in the world you go west, and you certainly get that too. When you want to collect enormous sums in income tax, especially from the farmers, you go west and get it from them. So I think we should have some little compensation to make up for some of those things.

I feel that if this matter is sent to the committee without some of the limitations imposed at the present time; if the committee will face its work in a co-operative spirit; if it will take the advice given three or four weeks ago by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) and cut out the skulduggery, a very satisfactory job can be done. I hope to be a member of that committee. I hope to do my work in a very fair manner, and I hope to have the co-operation of all the other members in the committee.

We in this group appreciate the privilege given by the Prime Minister to his followers to vote freely on this question. That is not ordinarily the case, and I hope hon. members will take full advantage of it. Somebody suggests that it may be hard to overcome habit, but members are sent here to represent their constituents and to work for their constituencies first and their parties second. That, of course, is not the rule here with the party in power, and in that the official opposition might be included. I believe that laws are made by men and women for the benefit of the community as a whole. While we in this house are supreme, I feel that we have a responsibility to all Canadians to do a fair job in connection with the redistribution of seats in the House of Commons.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): I would like to congratulate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) on the splendid speeches he has been reading lately. It has been said that the more you read about a person the more you get to like him, so there is great hope for the hon. gentleman.

As far as this amendment is concerned, to me it is quite clear. I do not think the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) should be expected to ask the provinces to come and help him settle his redistribution difficulties, any more than the province of Manitoba or any other province should ask the dominion to help with its redistribution bill. I think that point is quite clear.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): I should like to take a very few minutes in this debate following what was said by the previous speaker. I am one of those who, having read history, believe the provinces should be consulted when we make changes of this kind. There has been confusion in some minds as to whether or not the provinces should be consulted about this matter of federal representation. In his statement the other day the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) laid down the principle that the allocation of seats was by provinces according to their population. Coming from Manitoba I am naturally very interested, not only in Manitoba but in all the prairie provinces. While it has been claimed that we have representation by population, that has never been altogether true. Several amendments have been made deviating to some extent from that principle.

We go back to the census of 1911 when an amendment was passed assuring certain provinces that their representation should not fall below their senatorial representation. You have Prince Edward Island with four members representing less than 100,000 people. I am not trying to quarrel with that, but I am pointing out the disparity that will exist in the prairie provinces under this proposal. I must say that I followed the arguments of the Prime Minister very closely. I was rather impressed with his argument that no one province whose population was smaller than another province should be granted members on a basis that would give more members than the larger provinces. However, as I looked into that argument, I thought there could be a lot of flaws. Even with the proposed 15 per cent formula it would mean giving Saskatchewan 17 seats and Manitoba 14 seats. This would leave a difference of some 6,430 of population per riding in those two provinces alone. I am not objecting to saving as many seats as possible for Saskatchewan, but I am pointing out the disparity that will exist between these two adjoining provinces under this 15 per cent formula. I think that would be unfair.

As was pointed out by another member from the west, it does seem unfair that when we have a gain in population of 5·8 per cent or almost 47,000 people, we should have to lose these two seats. I would think, therefore, in view of the Prime Minister's very fair statement, he might yet reconsider and introduce an amendment to his resolution whereby the 10 per cent would be applicable rather than the 15 per cent. Certainly, this would benefit Manitoba. It might benefit Nova Scotia, and I think it would be fairer in the future, although none of us can predict exactly what will happen in future years. It was pointed out this afternoon that when you get down to the subcommittees for the provinces you find very great disparities in the population of the various ridings. Someone said that in one riding in Quebec there were 9,999 people according to the last census.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Which riding was that?

Mr. Ross (Souris): I believe it was Iles-de-la-Madeleine. According to the last census one riding in Ontario has slightly over 17,000, as compared with one of the Yorks which is just under 160,000. These illustrations point out the tremendous difference you find once the general committee is broken up into provincial subcommittees. I know it is quite a chore.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) made reference to the very small riding I have the honour to represent. I happen to have had the privilege of being a member of the last redistribution committee, so I know some of the controversies and difficulties that are experienced. My own proposition was for a considerably larger riding than the boundaries of Souris enclose today, but there were other people who were quite concerned about other ridings who did not want to give up parts of their ridings, despite the size of those ridings. There are all of these conflicts with which you have to deal, and I realize how serious that is. I just want to take this opportunity to make a plea, especially for the prairie provinces, for some reconsideration of this formula so that the 10 per cent formula could be made applicable rather than the 15 per cent.

As was pointed out, under this proposal no harm would come to anyone and it would assist more provinces than does the 15 per cent formula. I trust that the members of the committee will deal with their duties as fairly as possible when the committee is set up. I am making this appeal at this time because we are desirous of saving as many seats for the prairie provinces as we can. While we are supposed to have representation by population it has been recognized, not only in this country but in many other countries, that where you have a concentration of population such as in urban centres, a representative can represent a larger number of people than he should be called upon to represent in a rural area in which there is great difficulty in travelling.

In view of the fact we are now to have two members from the Yukon and Northwest Territories, I believe we have set up a good example. I am not opposing that idea. I feel it is only right that there should be two members, despite the very small population which I think is about 25,000. I believe it is right because of the geographical conditions. The same idea should be carried out for the western provinces.

The contribution that these areas make to the welfare of the whole nation should also be taken into consideration. I was happy to hear the Prime Minister say that in Saskatchewan and the other prairie provinces fewer people are producing just as much today and making as great a contribution to the welfare of this nation as had been done in the past by a greater number of people. I think that point should be borne in mind. I wish to make a last appeal to the Prime Minister to give some direction to the committee allowing them to use the 10 per cent formula rather than the 15 per cent, because it would be more beneficial to a greater number of areas than the 15 per cent would be.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): After the brilliant exposition by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I feel somewhat diffident in speaking about this matter, but I come from that province which will probably be affected more than any other province and I suspect my people may expect me to say a word or two. At the outset may I say that this whole idea is so tangled up that I should like to make it clear that I, too, support the 10 per cent as opposed to the 15 per cent formula. In saying that, I need not say that I am opposed to the bill which we have seen, and which I think has had first reading in this house.

Under the British North America Act, and under the strict rules of representation by population, each province would be given the number of members to which its population entitled it. This appears to be fair, and it would be fair if it were adhered to, but we know it is not adhered to. The British North America Act sets forth the basis for calculating the representations according to the population of the province, but in practice representation by population is not being carried out. I have the statistics for three or four electoral districts in Canada and the number represented by an individual member varies all the way from 10,000 to 100,000. This afternoon I looked up some of those districts, and I found this. According to the 1941 census the electoral district of Welland has 93,836 of population and Glengarry, on the other hand, has 18,732. Then going down to Quebec, we have Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm with 63,462 of population and Iles-de-la-Madeleine with 8,940. These discrepancies surely should be ironed out.

Then there is a difference in the matter of the representation of the provinces themselves. Representation by population was abandoned when the first members of parliament were admitted to this house from certain provinces, notably British Columbia, Manitoba and Prince Edward Island. Thus, these are precedents for the abandonment of the idea of strict representation by population as such. In particular, Prince Edward Island is favourably and particularly protected by the abandonment of that principle which is and indeed should not be the sole determinant.

Then we come to the size of the territories over which a single member has care and to the interests of whose people he must attend. While I have with me no statistics in regard to this matter, I would say that in the west the large constituency is the rule and not the exception whereas in the east we have the exactly opposite position. I think someone has mentioned the comparative wealth-producing ability of those particular areas. We find this thinly populated area of the west and we know the reason for that loss in population. We know, for instance, that in Saskatchewan it is one of the greatest problems, if not the greatest. It is a problem which has been caused by the mechanization of the agricultural industry, as a result of which one man or a man and a boy can take off more wheat in these days than could a crew of 26 or 36 men some years ago. That does not mean, however, that the amount of wealth which those areas are producing is less than that which was produced by the larger number of workers.

If one looks at the map, particularly, of, shall we say, that bend in the St. Lawrence river and including the city of Montreal, and counts the number of members in that area as compared with the number in that vast territory in the west, I think he will appreciate what I mean. If we are now to reduce the number of seats occupied by western members, we shall aggravate rather than help that condition which I have just described; for obviously such alteration would aggravate that situation in the west, and would make large areas into still larger areas to be represented by individual members. I often think that if some of the members representing city districts in Montreal, around Toronto or in some of those other thickly-populated areas, had to look after districts such as Maple Creek in Saskatchewan or Skeena in British Columbia or some of these other places, they would realize what a tremendous task confronts a member of parliament for such places.

As I said, certain provinces have had their interests protected by artificial means. When I say "by artificial means", I mean by principles other than that of representation by population. Saskatchewan and Manitoba have never had that protection nor have they it at the present time. The one-twentieth clause or the 5 per cent clause—the clause which says that there should be no diminution of seats unless there was more than a 5 per cent diminution in the population—was, I think, designed, as a matter of fact, to help the maritime provinces; but the province which benefited—and I do not know to what extent the maritimes benefited—was the province of Ontario.

Adherence to the principle of representation by population would have lessened Ontario's seats by these figures: from 82 to 81 after 1921 and to 78 after 1931. Instead of that happening, that province held 82 seats from 1914 to 1947. That protection is not at present available to Saskatchewan. Then we have New Brunswick whose representation cannot drop below 10 members of parliament and Prince Edward Island whose representation cannot drop below the number of 4. I am not saying anything against it, but of course it is over-represented at the moment in that it has four members whereas its population would justify the possession of only two. One protection is that a province cannot have a lesser number of members of parliament than of senators. But that provision certainly furnishes no immediate protection for either Saskatchewan—or Manitoba—which, on a consideration of population alone would lose —and it has been mooted; it was mooted in the bill—at one blow one-quarter of its total representation. I do not think there is anyone in this house who thinks such a thing should happen. I am pleased to see that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) does not think it should happen either. But we are afraid that when that bill is submitted to the committee, the committee might report favourably upon it.

I agree with those who do not believe that the work of redistribution should be done piecemeal. I agree with what many of my hon. friends have said when they have indicated that it should be a matter of national consideration by those who have nothing to gain or nothing to lose by the particular transaction; in other words, that it should be a work for scientists, technicians, statisticians, geographers and perhaps particularly for men who know something about political science.

It is my opinion—and I say this without malice toward anyone—that I do not think that members of parliament are particularly qualified to do that particular job; and in saying that I am leaving quite out of consideration the idea of any prejudice which they might have. But since we are deprived of the benefit for the moment—because there seems to be no immediate prospect of having a committee of that kind, but I hope that it will be set up in time for the next redistribution—in the meantime we have to follow expediency and do the best we can. Coming from Saskatchewan I am naturally interested in seeing that Saskatchewan should hold, as far as possible, the representation which it now has. Saskatchewan has already suffered in the matter, as indeed has Manitoba. Owing to the timing of the election in 1921, an election was held there before redistribution could be brought about. So it was the redistribution which was based on the 1911 census that was carried on up until the election of 1925. Since the election was held before the redistribution of 1921, those two provinces of the prairie west were deprived of 7 seats for at least four years. I am not saying of course that it could be prevented. I am merely showing that we have had some hardships in the past in this regard, and perhaps should have some consideration at the present time. The fact which I have just stated surely does away at least with the argument that we must have redistribution immediately in order to do justice to the provinces of British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec, which have found their populations increasing. In view of all this, and in view of the fact that for the first twenty-five years of this century those prairie provinces were systematically under-represented, owing to the rate of immigration into them—I am talking now about the government of 1921 which knew that the prairie provinces were under-represented; I shall not quote the passage I have in mind, but it is clearly shown in the remarks of Mr. Meighen, the prime minister of that day, which can be found at pages 38 and 39 of Hansard of the year 1921—I, like other members who represent not only Saskatchewan but all of that prairie west, hope that at least there may be an option as between the 10 per cent and the 15 per cent which the committee can study and report on.

I like the idea too that it is not only Saskatchewan that will be favoured by any such decision. As I understand it, the province of Alberta would gain one by such a decision, and also the province of Manitoba. As I understand it, the whole prairie section would receive some benefit.

Mr. Harkness: Will the hon. member permit a question? How would Alberta gain one under this formula?

Mr. Knight: The 10 per cent, as explained by the Prime Minister, would add one to the representation of Alberta.

Mr. L. A. Mutch (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister introduced this motion he pointed out that it dealt with a matter which concerned the individual members of the house, and one which they could deal with in accordance with their own conscience. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) to the contrary, I can assure you, sir, and through you the house, that the few words that I have to say would have been uttered in about the same language whether or not that declaration had been made. It is written: "Blessed are the meek; for they shall inherit the earth." I think that we in Manitoba have, over a period of years, taken that text a little too literally, and we are finding it out from time to time. This is another example of the truth that it is poor consolation to have title if you cannot get possession.

I am not to be trapped by my own words into opposing a compromise which will secure for western Canada two members which it would otherwise lose, and gain an additional member for the western area through the territories; but at the same time I am not to be understood to believe that the suggested recommendation to the committee goes far enough to satisfy me, or indeed, in my view, to do justice to a part of this country which has made its contribution, and which now in this compromise is left outside.

I think I have been have here long enough to suggest that so far as I am concerned the compromise suggested by this motion—acceptable as it is in part—is subject to criticism on the ground that it departs from what we had accepted as fixed procedure without general application. It is something commendable in itself, but it does not go far enough. In other words, to me it has something of the unbalance of a half measure. As a matter of fact the proposition reminds me a little bit of Jack Horner's pie. Everybody who stands to gain as a result of the present redistribution will find his plum in the pie. There is even one for the territories, and again I say that I concur in that.

British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec are being asked to make no sacrifice. Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Newfoundland are entrenched in their present position. Alberta has no interest at the moment except should it develop as a result of the committee being permitted to recommend the 10 per cent regulation rather than the 15 per cent one. Saskatchewan will stand to gain at least something from this compromise.

If I wanted to be critical of the arguments which have been used in support of this compromise, I think I would base the criticism of the arguments on the fact that whenever this situation arises in redistribution, whether it be within a province itself or whether it be in the dominion as a whole, we are faced with the suggestion that we are bound by some shadowy thing which is called representation by population. Anyone who has been here as long as I have—not many have been here longer—and anyone who has made a study of the history of this country will realize that representation by population never was anything but a political slogan, and has no reality either at the present time or in that plan which is projected for the future.

I do not think that in any method of redistribution it is possible to be absolute in the application of principle, any more than it is possible to be absolute very often in the application of any other principle in our daily endeavours here. There are factors in this suggestion which seriously violate the principle which is basic to the concept of representation by population; factors which make it possible to have a disparity of two or three members, depending upon which of these expediencies is used, in two provinces with less than 60,000 of a difference in population.

Consequently I rose to point out that in so far as I am concerned, having decided to compromise with the present regulations with respect to redistribution, I do not think it is good enough to make a compromise which asks no sacrifice from those who benefit by the redistribution system, and which makes no concession to at least two of the provinces which are asked to make a sacrifice. Therefore I urge that in consideration of this resolution I hope it will be possible for the committee which is to be appointed when the resolution carries—as I suppose it will—to consider not merely the 15 per cent loss proposal but to take into consideration the possibility that if we abandon the present system some consideration may be given to a 10 per cent protection for a province which has made its contribution, as my own province has throughout the years. I hope that we shall not be faced again as we were in 1921, and ten years later, with the fact of under-representation. I have no solution to offer by way of an amendment to the motion; but I do urge that the committee be empowered, in wider terms than they are now given, to consider a 10 per cent loss limit, in order that this compromise, which apparently we have decided is to be effected, shall apply to all of those who would otherwise suffer, in comparison with the other provinces.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I had not the slightest intention of taking part in the debate. However, a remark of the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) has caused me to say only a word or two.

The hon. member said that under this 10 per cent formula Alberta would gain a seat. So far as I can see, Alberta cannot gain a seat under the 10 per cent, the 15 per cent or any other percentage formula. We have 17 seats now, and on the regular basis of redistribution we shall continue to have 17 seats. So, as we were never going to lose any seats, there is no possibility of our gaining one through any percentage application that may be made.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch), who has just taken his seat, confused me somewhat by his argument. He started out by saying something to the effect that representation by population never did exist, and that therefore it was foolish to talk about it as a principle. Well, I happen to have had a couple of ancestors who suffered considerable hardship fighting for that as a principle. Therefore, for that, as well as for many other reasons, I have a considerable amount of respect for the principle of representation by population.

Mr. Mutch: I did not say the principle was bad; I said it was never applied.

Mr. Harkness: I think that principle should be maintained so far as it is reasonable and practical to maintain it. However where the hon. member for Winnipeg South confused me was when, just after making that statement, he said it should be followed in some respects—I have forgotten in just what respects.

If we are going to tinker with the constitution every time the matter of redistribution comes up—and this seems to be the modern trend, because we did it before in 1946 or 1947 and we are doing it again at this time, only a few years later—then I think our tinkering should be done with as much fairness as possible.

I do not think there is any question about it, that tinkering with this matter can only be fair if, when you desert the strict principle of representation by population, which was done in respect of Prince Edward Island in 1911, you produce a formula which will not put any province with a larger population in a position where it has fewer representatives than has a province with a smaller population. Reference was made to that situation this afternoon by the Prime Minister.

I think that certainly should be a basic principle in any change in the constitution which is made. I have a considerable amount of sympathy with the position taken by members from Saskatchewan, that they should not lose 25 per cent of their representation at one stroke. I have considerable sympathy with their contention that they should not lose more than 10 per cent of their membership in the house at one time. But if this 10 per cent rule is put into effect, or a 15 per cent rule—and, as I say, I think Saskatchewan has some argument in favour of the 10 per cent rule—I think at the same time there should be put into effect a rule whereby this would not operate so that a province with a larger population would have smaller representation than a province with a lesser population.

Just exactly how that could be done, I am not sure. Looking at it roughly, however, I should think all that would be needed would be a provision to that effect, so that we would have a situation wherein, if a province lost 10 per cent of its population and therefore 10 per cent of its representation, and were thus reduced to 20 seats, another province with a larger population but which, under the ordinary rules, would have only 19 seats, should also have 20 seats—or 21, as the case may be.

Inevitably this would increase total representation. We must keep in mind however that the present proposal will cause a certain increase in the representation. My personal view is that it was possibly a mistake to change the base, as was done at the time of the last redistribution. We had had a base in operation since confederation in 1867. There had been some inequalities, unquestionably, chiefly through the operation of the 5 per cent or one-twentieth rule. However, by and large it had worked out reasonably well. Rather than adopt what I would describe as a slick formula in order to satisfy two provinces at the time—in 1946—I believe we would have been much better off if we had retained the old formula and, if necessary, increased the base.

If the base for the province of Quebec had been increased to 75 rather than 65 and then, apart from the maritime concession which had already been made, more or less strict representation by population had been carried out, I do not think anyone would have complained. We would have had something based upon our tradition, since confederation, and something which probably would still be working satisfactorily today.

The only other point I should like to make is that when the distribution of constituencies within the provinces takes place I would hope that on this occasion a more strict regard would be had to representation by population than there was at the time of the last redistribution, so that we would not have a situation such as that described by several hon. members today wherein on the one hand there are constituencies with only eight or nine thousand people and on the other constituencies with as many as 160,000.

It seems to me that so long as we have a situation of that kind we are only giving lip service to the principle of representation by population. From the practical point of view, we are setting it at nought and placing some people in a situation where their votes are eight or nine or ten or fifteen times as good as the votes of people in other constituencies. That situation is not good enough. Surely the worst we should have would be a situation whereby the vote of a man in one constituency would be only half as good as that of a man in another. In other words my suggestion is that we should reach a position where discrepancies between constituencies should not in any case be greater than two to one.

Mr. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to speak in this debate. However, since I come from a province protected by a special clause in the British North America Act perhaps I may be forgiven if I make a few observations at this time.

It seems to me that when the question of representation is being discussed hon. members seem to feel that parliamentary representation consists only of representation by population. I am afraid I must disagree with the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) to a certain extent, because it is my view that, in addition to representation of individuals, there is the matter of representation of areas and political units. There is also the matter of representation of natural resources.

These are principles recognized in practically every parliamentary assembly in the world. Indeed, there is a certain nodding admission of this fact as it applies to representation in this House of Commons, although it would appear that in Canada we do not seem to have any regularly systematized method of dealing with the problem.

First there is the matter of representation of isolated areas. It is recognized that if an area is isolated and cut off, even though its population may be small, it would be impossible for one man to represent it properly if it is almost impossible for him to travel from one part of his constituency to another. Therefore in such cases it is thought advisable to give these isolated areas a representative of their own. In Canada the Magdalen islands are a perfect example of that very thing.

Then there is the question of the proper representation of specialized areas where there may be a minority of a particular racial extraction or even a particular religious belief, or other fairly small groups having some special interest. Their point of view can be exterminated and brought to nought by combining them with another group holding contrary opinions. Therefore in actual fact they are not represented. In many countries that condition is recognized and these minorities are given their own representation in parliament even though they are not numerous enough to make up a unit of representation.

Another most important thing to be considered is the representation of large, sparsely populated areas which, although they have small populations, are of great importance. The suggestion that the constituency of Yukon-Mackenzie River should be given two members instead of one is a practical example of the carrying out of that principle although there again there is no recognized system whereby such a principle will be followed from time to time so that on all occasions after every census the same results will be gained from a fixed formula.

There also falls in that category a principle recognized in most countries, namely, that rural areas are entitled to more representatives on a population basis than urban areas. It is interesting to realize that in this country that principle has been recognized in the past. During the redistribution of 1892, when the government of that day proposed that the representation of Montreal should be increased from three to five, Sir Wilfrid Laurier took great exception to that suggestion although even the increased representation would leave Montreal with much larger units of population per constituency than was the case in the rest of Canada. On that occasion Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

> I am not prepared to admit for my part that Montreal is at all entitled to increased representation. It is admitted generally, it is admitted specifically in this bill, that there is to be a difference between the representation of urban populations... and rural populations. That object is obvious. Urban populations are represented generally to a greater degree than are rural populations, because urban populations generally furnish to rural populations many of their members . . . Montreal is represented in this house by no less than thirteen of its citizens.

That is a principle that should be recognized. New Zealand and Australia have a systematic way of recognizing it. In those countries the population of rural areas is increased by a certain percentage to arrive at the unit of representation for such areas. In New Zealand the population of a rural area is increased by 20 per cent to give a fictitious higher population than it actually has before dividing the unit of representation into the population of the rural area to arrive at the number of its representatives. It is also generally recognized that it is much easier for a member of parliament or of any other legislative body to represent a small compact area than it is for him to represent a large sparsely populated region. Therefore in the thinly populated agricultural areas, where most people are land owners and have a real and fundamental stake in that part of the country, the unit of representation should be smaller.

Before New Zealand and Australia adopted the principle of having a smaller unit of representation for rural areas a great deal of debate was provoked in the parliaments of those countries. It was even suggested by one member of the New Zealand parliament that perhaps they should arrive at a principle of representing sheep in parliament rather than men because then they could have a fixed unit of representation which would be more suitable in its application than the representation of human beings. Someone suggested that perhaps men should represent sheep but there was no suggestion on that occasion that sheep should represent men in their parliament.

I think that the most important principle we must recognize in dealing with representation is that of the representation of political units. Almost every country in the world including Canada, although sometimes we do not want to admit it, recognizes that principle. In the British House of Commons the unit of representation for both Scotland and Wales is smaller than the unit of representation for England. They have a greater number of members than they would on a straight representation by population basis because it is felt they have certain local interests which might be discriminated against by the overwhelming weight of representation in the British House of Commons from England.

In the United States the representation of the states in congress is protected. Each state elects two senators and also sends a number of members to the house of representatives, that number depending on their population. But if the population of the state is smaller than the unit of representation it still sends at least one member. The population of New York state is many times greater than the population of Nevada. Yet they each send two elected senators to congress. As a matter of fact the population of Nevada is practically the same as that of Prince Edward Island. If the question were decided on a straight representation by population basis Nevada would be entitled to a fraction of one representative. In other words, it would be a small fraction of one constituency. In actual fact Nevada sends a member to the house of representatives and two members to the Senate although its population is roughly the same as that of Prince Edward Island. Therefore it has a much greater relative voice in the congress of the United States than Prince Edward Island has in the parliament of Canada.

In Canada on many occasions we have recognized that principle in a sort of way, and the very system of representing provinces in parliament is proof of that point. After all, if the size of Canadian constituencies was arrived at purely on a population basis there would be no justification for making the boundaries of constituencies coincide with provincial boundaries. If you had a fraction of a constituency left over in one province there would be no reason why you could not tack it on to a constituency in the next province, but we recognize that we should not have constituencies partly in one province and partly in another. There are provincial interests to be represented in this parliament.

Then, too, on occasion special concessions have been given to certain political areas. British Columbia and Manitoba were given representation in this parliament much greater than that to which they were entitled by reason of population when they joined confederation. As a matter of fact British Columbia was given six members in the house when on a population basis it was entitled to something less than one. Moreover there was a clause in the agreement under which they joined confederation which made it impossible for the representation of British Columbia in this house to ever fall below six.

On the other hand when Prince Edward Island joined confederation it was given only one more member than its population required. It was given six instead of five, and it was not very long before that extra member was taken away. Many of the people in the province in which I live were under the impression that on joining confederation their representation was protected, and that it would never fall below the number at which it stood when Prince Edward Island came into confederation.

The same was true of Manitoba. It was given a representation of four though on the basis of population it was entitled to only one or at the most two. It was protected in its representation for a period of time, but British Columbia's protection is permanent. Therefore I see no reason why any thought should be given, if anyone has done so, to unnecessarily cutting the representation of any province in this house. I think we are quite justified in making special exceptions in certain cases to assure that particular political areas will be properly represented here, and that their area interests also will be protected.

That is all I have to say at this moment, Mr. Speaker, except that I would support most heartily not only the proposal to add another member for Yukon-Mackenzie, but also the suggestion that the representation from any province should never be reduced by more than 10 per cent at any one time.

Motion (Mr. St. Laurent) agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): If it were the pleasure of the house to revert to motions, the whips of the various groups have prepared a list of members to make up this committee, and if it were the pleasure of the house to have this done at once I would move that these gentlemen constitute the special committee.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. St. Laurent: Then I move:

That the following members comprise the special committee on redistribution: Messrs. Argue, Balcer, Blair, Boucher, Brooks, Decore, Denis, Dewar, Diefenbaker, Fair, Fleming, Fulton, Gauthier (Sudbury), Gauthier (Portneuf), Harkness, Harris (Grey-Bruce), Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough), Knowles, Laing, MacDougall, MacNaught, McCubbin, McIlraith, McWilliam, Murphy, Murray (Cariboo), Nowlan, Picard, Robinson, Ross (Souris), Shaw, Viau, Welbourn, Whiteside, Whitman, Winkler, Wright.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS

MARGARET ELIZABETH STRANGE COLTON

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved the second reading of Bill No. 37, for the relief of Margaret Elizabeth Strange Colton.

Mr. Speaker: I notice a number of divorce bills on the order paper. Is the house prepared to deal with these bills in one motion?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I would point out that of the 77 divorce bills posted for second reading, the evidence in connection with 60 has been placed in our hands, leaving 17 in connection with which the evidence though it may have been delivered to this house in typewritten form has not been printed or distributed. I believe the hon. member for Lisgar is prepared to let those 17 stand, and if so I would have no objection to second reading being given the other bills.

Mr. Winkler: Before I ask to have those bills stand I would like to draw the attention of members of this house to this pile of evidence concerning the 17 bills in question that have been considered by the divorce committee in the other place and sent to this house. I would earnestly ask those who object to waiting for the distribution of the printed evidence to consult this typewritten evidence in the meantime. It is available on application to the Clerk of the House, who will give hon. members access to it or, if they so desire, custody of it. I am anxious to see these bills get before our committee on miscellaneous private bills rather than have the affair drag on for a considerable time, as it well may since the printing appears to be slow. These 17 are scattered through the list but I believe if hon. members would co-operate and consult this evidence which has not yet been distributed, we would get along very much faster. However, if I have unanimous consent I would ask that the 17 bills to which reference has been made be allowed to stand.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

QUESTIONS

INCOME TAX—DEDUCTION OF CERTAIN EXPENSES

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the government been advised of a decision of the Exchequer Court of Canada to the effect that the expenses of lawyers attending conventions of the bar association are to be allowed as deductions for income tax purposes?

2. If so, what was the date of such decision, and by whom was it given?

3. Has the government taken any steps to amend the Income Tax Act in respect of the matter noted above?

4. Has the government received any requests from trade unions that a similar deductibility be allowed in connection with the expenses of trade union delegates attending trade union conventions?

5. Has the government taken any steps to amend the Income Tax Act to put trade unionists and other similar groups into whatever position obtains for lawyers with respect to the deductibility of convention expenses for income tax purposes?

6. If not, is consideration being given by the government to such an amendment?

Mr. Sinclair:

1. No. It is aware, however, of a decision of the income tax appeal board on this subject. In the case of H. F. Parkinson v. Minister of National Revenue, an appeal was allowed against a previous disallowance by the minister of a claim for deduction from the appellant's personal income of expenses incurred and paid personally by him in attending a convention of the Canadian Bar Association. The minister disallowed the deduction as the appellant had personally paid the expenses and sought to deduct them from his income in reporting his personal income rather than as an expense against the partnership. It was held that there was no reason to differentiate between the procedure of deduction adopted by the appellant and that of deduction in the accounts of the partnership.

[Mr. Winkler.]

2. August 30, 1951. Mr. W. S. Fisher, Q.C., member of the board.

3. No.

4. Yes.

5. No. Lawyers on salary are in exactly the same position as trade unionists and others working for salary or wages with respect to the deductibility of expenses for income tax purposes.

6. It is not the practice to disclose government policy in giving answers to questions in the house.

PHYSICAL FITNESS ACT—EMPLOYEES

Mr. Thatcher:

1. How many employees are there across Canada employed under the National Physical Fitness Act?

1. The 1952-53 estimates (see page 346) provide for eleven employees whose duties relate to the administration of the National Physical Fitness Act. Of these eleven positions three were actually vacant during the month of April, 1952.

The eight provinces with whom agreements are in effect under the National Physical Fitness Act, employ their own staff in carrying out the physical fitness program within their respective provinces.

2 and 3. The duties of the eleven employees referred to in (1) above are listed in the 1952-53 estimates as follows:

1 national director (vacant); 1 administrative officer grade 3 (assistant director); 1 technical officer grade 3; 1 reference assistant (vacant); 1 principal clerk; 1 stenographer grade 3; 1 stenographer grade 2A (vacant); 1 stenographer grade 1; 1 clerk grade 2A; 2 typists grade 2A.

The assistant director is responsible for the general operation of the division of physical fitness and serves in addition as executive secretary of the national council on physical fitness. The technical officer grade 3 is a specialist in the field of recreational drama who serves in a consultant capacity to the provinces in this specialized recreational field. CANADA

SUGGESTED CHANGE TO KINGDOM OF CANADA

Mr. A. Phileas Cote (Matapedia-Matane) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the advisability of taking the necessary steps so that this country be called the Kingdom of Canada.

He said: This resolution will not receive unanimous consent, and I was not prepared to argue it tonight because I never thought it would be reached. I shall try to convince my hon. friends on the other side of the fence that, according to tradition, they should be the first to say "Aye, aye." The introduction of this motion is a mere gesture by a minority in this country. The descendant of a great Frenchman once said that those who would be the first and last to fight to defend the British crown would be French Canadians from Quebec. Since our beloved Queen and the British government saw fit, at the time of the proclamation of Her Majesty's accession to the throne, to use the word "realm" in that proclamation, I thought this motion would be in order. Our proclamation was one day ahead of that of the British government, and obviously that is the reason our proclamation did not contain the same terms.

If one looks at a dictionary one finds that the word "realm" can be translated into French by the word "souveraineté". When you translate "souveraineté" into English it is "kingdom". One can see that I have, therefore, not invented anything. I do not intend to impose any invention upon my colleagues. I thought, as a member of a minority group represented in this house, that it would be a nice gesture if we in this country, having the same Queen as Great Britain but on the understanding that she is the Queen of Canada, were to step into line with the desire expressed in the proclamation. I thought also that I would please my hon. friends on the other side of the gate, because I thought they knew enough of history to realize that one of their greatest leaders, Sir John Macdonald, also desired this country be called the kingdom of Canada. One has to remember, and this is no secret, that when confederation was being discussed at Quebec and Charlottetown Sir John Macdonald thought this country should be called the kingdom of Canada. For many reasons beyond his control, it was not. I thought the Tories would grab this occasion to give to their former leader, the greatest leader they ever had not counting the one who is with us today, something that he wanted. They could line up with us and please Sir John.

Mr. Harkness: Did Sir John's ghost appear to you to instil this idea into you?

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Did you call Sir John a ghost? We have a St. Jean, but it is St. Jean Baptiste.

Now, some members will say, "Why bring that up at this particular time when we have so many problems with which to deal which are of such great importance and magnitude? I will tell you, sir, why I brought this matter up, in addition to the reasons I have already mentioned. Looking at what is taking place in many more important assemblies, looking at all the big problems that have been dealt with with regard to conditions throughout the world, it seems to me, at least, that in many a country today if they consider trade plans, imports and exports, armaments, defence or anything which is tangible, there are some people who have thought maybe it would not be so bad a thing after all if we would pay some attention to something in some other direction; and that something in another direction is education of the masses of the people. I refer to education not only in terms of having people able to read or to write but national education or national comprehension in so far as national education is concerned with regard to this particular matter.

May I suggest, sir, that in the minds of the immigrants that come into this country there is a great deal of confusion, to say the least, with regard to our status. They do not know whether we are still a summer kitchen to Great Britain or to another country. Some of these people are so confused that they believe we are only a transit swing board, and therefore they wait either on the railway platform or on the pier to go to the United States. How about the next generation of these people? Even if they stay here, are they going to be in a position to teach their children that this is a country by itself; that even if we are, in the matter of trade, the third country in the world, we are adult and not merely a branch of another country, either of the United States or of Great Britain. It is no secret to anybody that since 1931, after the discussion of 1927 with regard to the Statute of Westminster, we established ourselves not only as the third largest country in the world with regard to trade but also as a sovereign country. What is the reason, fundamentally speaking, emotionally as well as mentally, that is preventing us from establishing ourselves in the eyes of the world as being what we are? Are we ashamed of ourselves? We should do this even if only to satisfy the wish of the government of Great Britain to which we gave so much trouble during the last war by the confusion that was created throughout the world—with the air force, for instance, going to the four winds of the world and creating that confusion—so that people did not know that there was such a country as Canada.

I have a hunch it is a secret to our government that when the proclamation was issued it was not made by the government of Great Britain without an afterthought that would indicate to Canada that it was about time that we ourselves should do something in that direction. There may be another reason why Great Britain would like us to do that. In our international relations nowadays we have to define not only to the people within Canada—whether the old loyalists or the young loyalists—but to the outside people either in NATO or elsewhere—and I would even go a step further and say within the iron curtain—that we stand on our own feet, and everybody ought to know it.

I still remember vividly the experience of one of my friends in the press gallery who was at the time representing a London newspaper and who went to central Europe. At the meeting there he was asked what was our national anthem and what was our flag. He said that we had none. This gentleman, coming from England, was the most embarrassed man in the world. That means to say that we are creating more embarrassment to the British than maybe to ourselves. I therefore say that I would quash the idea that it is a sort of thing to satisfy our selfishness but is in keeping with the desire, as I understand it, of our beloved Queen and of the British government. As far as our government is concerned, I hope the membership of this house will express to our government the desire that something be done in that direction. As I said before, it is obvious that we need something of the sort in order to establish a Canadian identity, a unique front towards a unique end and also to promote Canada not only through shipments, trade and commerce, and so forth, but also to promote Canada as a nation which can be easily identified. Many people throughout the world are nowadays bewildered to see that the third nation of the world has not yet found an opportunity to establish itself without any confusion amongst the nations of the world. This occasion has been given to us by the highest authority, by our Queen and the British government, not by the member for Matapedia-Matane. I hope the house will indicate, by passing this resolution, that our government should take these steps.

Immigrants come into this country from several countries on the continent that do not know us at all. We have only to go to the United Nations to find that out. I think the best identification we can give to the nations of the world is to establish what we are once and for all, which will eliminate a great deal of resentment even among our good friends to the south.

In my opinion there is one thing that should be borne in mind. Up to the present time we have never been able to get accepted in the Pan-American union. Why? Because the Americans think that it would mean the destruction of the Monroe doctrine. They thought that we were an annex of Great Britain. Therefore they said that Great Britain should not have a foot in that door. If that change could be brought about I believe we would be welcomed at the Pan-American union, and that is most important.

How is it that we are accepted in NATO but we are not accepted by the nations of our own continent? Who can understand that in Europe? Who can understand it in Asia? I am sure that we shall soon be invited to form on the Pacific what we have formed on the Atlantic. If we do that these people will say: How is it that you are welcomed outside your own house but you cannot find a seat in the living room thereof?

There is another thing, and with this I will conclude. It is necessary for us to create a nation here as they have done in the United States. Let us call it a potpourri, a melting pot, or whatever you wish. When you meet a young boy in the United States, or an immigrant who has been there for only six months, he never says to you that he is a Czechoslovakian or a Pole; he says: I am an American. Well, let us see to it that everybody in this country calls himself a Canadian. The only way in which we can create such a spirit and a national consciousness is first of all to establish a definition of our own character, of what we are. The second thing is to try by all ways and means, as they have done in the United States and elsewhere, to create a spiritual aim for Canadians all. I remember that in 1946 I warned this parliament that if we did not have the courage to face the problem of having a Canadian flag, Quebec would soon have one. Look at what is happening in Quebec. Are we going to balkanize Canada, or are we going to unite this country and make it bigger and better, because we have more resources and more advantages than even the United States have today? Therefore I say we ought to do something toward creating that Canadian spirit. We have to take the ways and means, and this is one step in the right direction.

Mr. Fraser: In the wrong direction.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): This is our greatest opportunity.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall I put the question? Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it. I declare the motion lost.

Motion (Mr. Cote, Matapedia-Matane) negatived.

EDUCATION

EQUALIZATION OF OPPORTUNITY— ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES

The house resumed, from Thursday, March 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Knight:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration means of expanding and equalizing educational opportunity across Canada, by the granting of financial assistance to the various provinces for that purpose.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I am particularly fortunate in being able to close this debate—I understand that under the rules of the house that is my privilege. I shall not delay the house very long, since I am anxious that the matter come to a vote.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must inform the house that if the hon. member speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Knight: That, Mr. Speaker, is exactly what I am doing. I have already spoken at some length on this measure, and on various occasions. One of the ambitions which I have constantly had was to bring the matter to a vote in this house. We were fortunate in being able to do that on one occasion, and I am glad that we are fortunate again in being able to do the same thing.

I shall not take more than a minute longer, except to explain the object of this motion and to give a statement on one or two points. First, it is my idea that every child in Canada should have, in education, equality of opportunity with every other child. I am told of course that that is purely a provincial matter, and that education is purely a provincial matter. Some of my Saskatchewan friends often say to me: Why do you not get your own provincial government to give some assistance to education? Sir, I welcome assistance from our own provincial government. I have pressed the question of assistance upon them continually. I am glad that in the last day or two they have announced that they are going to give a million and a half dollars, or thereabouts, extra this year for education from some tax revenue that they have abolished for next year. In the meantime the proceeds are going to go to education. I am happy that that assistance is given to education by the province; but to me this is a national thing. This is wider in its scope than purely a provincial matter.

I am anxious that the children in every province shall have an equal opportunity of education with the children in every other province. Let me emphasize once more that we who believe in this motion have no idea whatever of imposing on any province in Canada any interference whatever with either the curriculum or the administration of education within any province. One can say that education is a provincial matter; but I should like to point out that the products of education in the various provinces are the concern of this nation. I have said before that when they go outside this country, or travel here or there within the country, they are not considered as provincial—although some speeches one hears in the house lead one to believe that that is so.

As I said before, they are considered as Canadians, whether they are born and educated in Quebec, British Columbia, Saskatchewan or Ontario. That is all I wish to say in the matter tonight.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Knight) which was negatived on the following division:

DIVORCE JURISDICTION ACT

EXCHEQUER COURT TO HAVE JURISDICTION IN ACTIONS ORIGINATING IN QUEBEC AND NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 4, to provide for the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court of Canada in matters of divorce.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak once again in support of this bill which would give to the Exchequer Court of Canada jurisdiction in matters of divorce with respect to persons residing in provinces where there are no divorce courts. I am sure that hon. members are familiar with the terms of the bill. Nevertheless there are a few things I should like to say about it even at the risk of repeating what I have said on former occasions. In the first place, the bill does not alter any laws with respect to divorce so far as the basis for divorce in this country is concerned. In the second place, I would point out that the bill does not make available to persons in the two provinces where there are no provincial divorce courts any facility that is not now available to them.

There is at the present time available to persons residing in provinces where there are no provincial divorce courts the right to come to the city of Ottawa and obtain a divorce from the parliament of Canada. This bill, because it has in it a special clause which provides that the jurisdiction of the exchequer court in matters of divorce would have to be exercised only at the city of Ottawa, would still make it necessary for those persons to come to this same city of Ottawa. The only difference that would follow from the passing of this bill would be that those persons residing in provinces where there are no provincial divorce courts on coming to Ottawa to seek a divorce would, instead of appearing before a divorce committee of the Senate of Canada, go to the Exchequer Court of Canada.

As hon. members are aware, my reason for introducing the bill is to provide relief for parliament from the task of processing hundreds of these divorce cases every year. There is no doubt about the attitude of members of parliament to divorce bills. We do not like dealing with them. No one feels that it is a part of the job for which he was elected. As a matter of fact, on recent occasions in this very session when votes have been called on certain divorce bills we have had the lowest attendance in the House of Commons for a vote for a good many sessions. I suggest that is indicative of the feeling on the part of a great many members that this business of divorce is not the business of members of parliament. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, all that my bill proposes is that the handling of divorces be transferred from this building and from the jurisdiction of parliament to another building in the same city of Ottawa and to the jurisdiction of a court upon which we can confer the right to deal with these divorces.

I knew before I ever came to parliament, and no one could be a member of parliament for a number of years and not recognize even more fully, how strong is the feeling in the two provinces where there are no divorce courts against the establishing of divorce courts in those provinces. I have said on two or three occasions that I think it might be argued for my bill that one of the things it would do would be to put an end to any agitation for the establishing of divorce courts in those provinces. I have read editorial comments in support of my campaign to get divorce out of parliament which have gone so far as to suggest that the matter of divorce in those two provinces should be looked after by those provinces. Well, we know that is an utterly impractical suggestion, and I should think the people in those provinces who are so overwhelmingly against such divorce courts would welcome a bill like this which would put an end to any agitation of that kind. In other words I feel that this is not only a bill to relieve parliament from the handling of divorce; it is a bill to protect the two provinces concerned from any suggestion that they should have provincial divorce courts.

I am also aware, Mr. Speaker, of the loyalty of the Quebec members in particular to the Quebec civil code, section 185 of which reads as follows:

Marriage can only be dissolved by the natural death of one of the parties; while both live, it is indissoluble.

That is part of the Quebec civil code which is part of the law of the province of Quebec, and I fully recognize it. I also recognize that the right of the province of Quebec to have maintained in force in that province the Quebec civil code is protected by section 129 of the British North America Act, and I certainly have no desire in any way to run counter to the susceptibilities or the feelings of Quebec members, or any other members, with respect to section 185 of the Quebec civil code or section 129 of the British North America Act.

I suggest that my proposal solves this problem without running counter to that section of the Quebec civil code or that section of the British North America Act. It does not set up a divorce court in the province of Quebec. If it can be said to set up a divorce court for Quebec and Newfoundland, at least it sets it up here in the city of Ottawa, where there is already a divorce court for the people of those two provinces.

I know that another argument put forward is to the effect that as matters now stand divorce has not been recognized as a right as far as the people of those two provinces are concerned. It is argued that each bill that goes through parliament is a separate law standing on its own feet; and those who oppose my bill say that in their view it is wrong in that it would establish legally in the exchequer court a right to divorce for persons in those two provinces which they do not now enjoy.

I suggest with all respect, but I suggest it for honest and serious consideration, that this is splitting hairs. There is a court now. We call it the Senate divorce committee; we call it the whole machinery of parliament, if you will, but it is there as a right of which hundreds of citizens from those two provinces are availing themselves each year. Lest anyone still try to argue that this right has not been codified and formalized I would ask hon. members to take a glance at the rules, orders and forms of proceedings of the Senate of Canada. This is a little red book corresponding to the green book we have in this house. I suppose it is red to match their carpet as green matches ours. This is not Beauchesne but it corresponds to Beauchesne, for the other place. I find that this book contains some 83 pages of their standing orders, of which 27 pages are devoted to divorce. So divorce is not just something that happens over at the other place. It is not just something that is dragged in under the provisions of standing orders relating to private bills. No; there is a separate section in the Senate manual dealing with divorce. Of 152 standing orders in the other place, 20 relate solely and exclusively to divorce. The 27 pages devoted to divorce are made up of the 20 standing orders to which I have referred together with 11½ pages of forms which are spelled out in this book I hold in my hand.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that is evidence that already we have here in the city of Ottawa a recognized court for divorce for persons from the two provinces in which there are no provincial divorce courts; and I press my point that to transfer the handling of these matters from this building, this parliamentary machinery, to another building, and to the exchequer court, does not alter by one iota the present position, or introduce any facility not now available, or establish any right not already recognized, regularized, codified and spelled out in the law of this land. Since that is the situation I feel that hon. members should give pretty serious consideration to the terms of my bill.

I have said before and I repeat tonight that I am not wedded to this bill. I hope I may be pardoned for a bit of punning if I say I would even be prepared to be divorced from it if someone could show me a better way of dealing with this matter. I well recall many years ago when the present Prime Minister—at the time he was minister of justice—entered into a debate about this divorce business in which hon. members were complaining about the procedure of handling divorce bills in parliament. At that time he said to those who were complaining, "Well, if you are going to complain about the present practice, produce some other method." It was in response to that challenge that I gave some thought to the matter and came up with this suggestion for transferring the matter to the exchequer court. If anyone has a better suggestion I will welcome it most heartily. As a matter of fact if anyone has a suggestion not quite as good as mine but which would receive greater support, I would even welcome that. In other words I think my view is the view of hon. members generally, that if there is any way we can get rid of the handling of divorces as we now handle them in parliament, it would be a good move. Just as the present Prime Minister threw out a challenge when he was minister of justice to think up a better way, and as I tried to meet that challenge, now I throw out the same challenge to those opposed to this bill. I suggest that they find a better way or provide some other method, even if it is not as good, which will enable us to get rid of this business from parliament, and from this House of Commons in particular.

As I have already said, there is no doubt about the views of most hon. members on this question. Nobody really wants to keep divorce here. As for the views of the country generally, hon. members are aware of the considerable amount of editorial comment there has been on this question, almost wholly favourable to the idea that some way other than the present method should be found. I hope we will not just continue year after year, going through the farce of passing these divorce bills in batches and droves, but that we will find a solution to the problem.

Once in a while I notice in the daily paper from my home city a little note that such and such a court granted six divorces or eight divorces. It is news that in one day a court has managed to deal with and grant five, six, eight or ten divorces. Look at what we do. We can pass fifty or a hundred. Members here have seen us pass two hundred or three hundred at one stage, and that is not even news. In this place it is only news when divorces are held up.

Again I say, Mr. Speaker, that the reluctance of members to deal with the matter, the reluctance of members even to vote on a bill when those who are opposed to divorce might actually have defeated some of the bills, makes it clear that members do not like what is going on. I suggest it is time we solved the problem by having the matter referred to some other body. Until members produce some other suggestion, therefore, I press the point that serious consideration should be given to this bill. I have already said tonight, as I have said on other occasions but perhaps as I sit down I should repeat it, that I am sure no member in this house will accuse me, in presenting this bill, of trying to ride rough-shod over the feelings or susceptibilities of persons in the provinces of Quebec or Newfoundland, or indeed over the susceptibilities of persons in any part of Canada with respect to divorce.

I have made it clear that in this bill I am not trying to change the basis for divorce. I have made it clear that I do not want to impose upon the soil of Quebec or Newfoundland any divorce court. I have made it clear that no new facility would be made available to these people. I have made it clear that we do not seek to regularize something that is not now regularized. I submit that after one has faced up to all the facts of the situation it is clear that something should be done about this matter, and until a better way is provided I suggest that serious consideration should be given to my bill. I hope that members will allow it to go to a vote and give it second reading so that it can go to a committee and be studied thoroughly.

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): Every time there is a move to grant more facilities to persons seeking divorces or a bill presented to establish another court for the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland, I have been on my feet to speak against these measures. I am going to do that tonight, and I ask the house to be very patient because I must tell the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that I will do my utmost, first to stop the bill from coming to a vote tonight and, second, to try to defeat the bill. Then, I hope we shall not hear any more about this matter in the future.

The hon. member is very able, a good speaker and very persistent in his opinions. I must tell him, however, that we in Quebec, and I could include Newfoundland, might be as persistent as he is in our refusal to accept a divorce court, even it it does not sit on the soil of those two provinces. It is very easy to speak about the establishment of a court that would not be on the soil of those provinces, but the results will be the same. In granting to the people of these two provinces the right to divorce in the exchequer court, the hon. member is really establishing a new divorce court for these two provinces. Whether or not he wants it, whether or not he likes it, that is what he is doing.

In establishing a new divorce court the hon. member is granting more facilities for divorce to the people of these two provinces. To support my contention that he is granting more facilities by establishing another court, I shall quote what happened in various years in Canada when there were proposals to establish divorce courts in the various provinces. In 1875, Mr. de Cosmos, the member for Victoria riding, proposed the creation of divorce courts for the provinces. I was not in the house at that time, but some other political men were here and they opposed the establishment of those courts. When Mr. de Cosmos proposed the establishment of these courts Alexander Mackenzie said:

> It is proposed to establish a court which a great number of persons are opposed to and, although I have personally no objection to the establishment of such courts, at the same time I do not desire to afford additional facilities for obtaining divorces and I hope that the resolution will be withdrawn.

Sir John Macdonald said:

> I would be sorry to see any tribunal established which might be the means of inviting other dissatisfied couples to apply for divorce.

Those quotations can be found in the debates of 1875 at page 859. In 1888 Jones of Halifax put a motion asking if it would better serve the interests of the country at large if we were to establish divorce courts. At page 1414 of the debates for that year Sir John Macdonald said:

> I think it would be a great misfortune for Canada to have that established.

At page 1416 Sir William Mulock said:

I think the facility with which divorces are granted in England and in other countries does go a long way to interfere with the sacredness of the marriage tie.

Mr. Northrup, in 1914 and 1916, was speaking on the jurisdiction of parliament over divorce cases when Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

For my part, I rather agree with the statement made by my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, that up to this time, the law does not know divorce and we had better stand by that position.

I have quoted these various Canadian men to show the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that by permitting the people from these two provinces to go before the exchequer court rather than the Senate—which is an altogether different thing—he is imposing upon them a divorce court which will be called the exchequer court. These provinces have repeatedly opposed the establishment of such a court. It is quite a different thing for those in the province of Quebec or Newfoundland who want a divorce to go to the Senate. This is a special dispensation granted to the people of those two provinces who want a divorce. If you allow these people to go before the exchequer court, you have increased the facilities for granting divorces. That is what we do not want in those two provinces. I hope my hon. friend and all those who want more facilities for divorce will understand once and for all that we do not want them.

Mr. Knowles: Then you had better abolish the Senate.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): No; it is not a question of abolishing the Senate at all. I have here figures contained in a declaration from England for the time before divorce courts were established in England. The first bill to create a court of divorce in matrimonial cases in England was passed in 1857. I am giving these statistics to prove that the establishment of divorce courts gives more facilities for obtaining divorces. During two centuries prior to 1857, only 317 divorces by act of parliament had been obtained in England. Thirty years after the bill was passed to establish divorce courts in England —not two centuries but just thirty years— 6,381 decrees absolute for dissolutions of marriages were allowed. This is to prove that the establishment of divorce courts gives more facilities for the obtaining of divorces. In his "History of our own Times", Justin McCarthy wrote as follows:

The divorce act, judging by the public use made of it, certainly must be held to have justified itself in a merely practical sense. It seems to have been thoroughly appreciated by a grateful public. It was not easy,—

And those words are to be noted.

—after a while, to get judicial power enough to keep the supply of divorces . . . up to the ever increasing demand.

That is strengthening my contention, sir, that the establishment of divorce courts gives more facility for divorces.

Gladstone said—and this can be found in Lathbury's "Letters on Church and Religion of W. E. Gladstone", volume 2, page 362—as follows:

Unquestionably, since that time (1857), the standard of conjugal morality has perceptibly declined among the highest classes of this country, and scandals in respect to it have become more frequent. The decline, as a fact, I know to be recognized by persons of social experience and insight who, in no way, share my abstract opinion on divorce.

Here is another quotation, Mr. Speaker, from a man who was in favour of the establishment of divorce courts in England. I refer to Sir Cresswell Cresswell, the first judge of the new divorce court and formerly a pronounced advocate of the statute of 1857 which created it. I quote Sir Cresswell Cresswell:

I have been taught a lesson of experience. I have come to the conclusion that it is better for society to treat the marriage as indissoluble, considering it merely as a social question.

Theodore Roosevelt had this to say in the United States. Divorce courts were established in the United States and I will quote figures to prove that the more facilities there are, the more divorces there are. Theodore Roosevelt said:

Divorce is a bane for any nation, a curse on society, and a menace to home.

This is to prove from England, sir, that more courts mean more divorces, as they mean more facilities to obtain divorces. I have here the figures given to me by the bureau of statistics of the Canadian government. They are statistics for the various provinces of Canada and may be compared with the statistics for the United States. In 1941, in Prince Edward Island there was one divorce. Since the court was established in 1945 there have been 104 divorces. In 1941 the number of divorces in Nova Scotia was 68; in New Brunswick, 87; in Quebec, 48; in Ontario, 949; in Manitoba, 242; in Saskatchewan, 146; in Alberta, 311; and in British Columbia, 609. In that same year in the United States there were 293,000 divorces.

We will take the figures of 1946 in order to see the increase in the number of divorces permitted in Canada in those different provinces which I have mentioned. In 1946 the number of divorces in Prince Edward Island was 4; in Nova Scotia there were 68 in 1941 and 260 in 1946. In New Brunswick in 1941 there were 87 and in 1946 there were 382. In Quebec in 1941 there were 48 and in 1946 there were 290. We have no divorce courts in Quebec. In Ontario in 1941, there were 949 and in 1946 there were 2,639. In Manitoba in 1941 there were 242 and in 1946 there were 636. In Saskatchewan in 1941 there were 146 and in 1946 there were 505. In Alberta there were 311 in 1941 and 962 in 1946; in British Columbia there were 609 in 1941 and 2,005 in 1946. In the whole of Canada in 1941 there were 2,461 divorces and in 1946, 7,683. More facilities and everywhere more divorces! In the United States in 1946, instead of 293,000 divorces as in 1941, there were 610,000. In 1950, in the whole of Canada there were 5,208 divorces and in the United States there were 385,000. Suppose for the moment the people of Quebec and of Newfoundland, through their members in the House of Commons, would accept the bill of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). This goes to show that unquestionably it would give more facilities for the people of those provinces to get more divorces. Unquestionably that is so. So we would have the same picture in these two provinces that they have in other countries where there are more facilities for divorce. I think, sir, that it has been shown, and repeatedly shown for a fact, for ten or twenty years, that we from Quebec do not want divorce courts. I do not see why the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre always comes back with that bill to impose on us the exchequer court as a disguised divorce court, because it would be a disguised divorce court. We do not want it, and Newfoundland does not want it either. It should be kept in mind by my hon. friend, and those who support this bill, that we do not want it.

The hon. member asked a moment ago: Well, can you give us a better way of disposing of the divorces that come before the Senate? I know that he has been building up a case for the last few weeks to show the people of Quebec, and probably the people of Newfoundland, that it would be much better to have the exchequer court deal with the divorce cases that come before the Senate. I do not say that he does it maliciously, but I understand very well. I do not believe I am mistaken when I say that he has shown much persistence in building up his case—it is very well done—to show the people in those two provinces that we should do away with the committee on divorce in the Senate, and bring the divorces to the exchequer court. I am positive that the great majority of the people in those two provinces will not fall for that. They do not like the ordinary divorce courts on the soil of their provinces, to use that term, any more than they would like a divorce court called the exchequer court to deal with the divorces that are passed by the committee of the Senate at the present time.

Mr. Knowles: Do they like the Senate as a divorce court?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): They do not like divorce.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): No, they do not like it either.

Mr. Knowles: Have you any other suggestion?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): No; we do not like divorce; we are against it; we do not believe in it.

Mr. Knight: Do you vote against it?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I have always stood up on my two feet and voted against any move to give more facilities for divorce. I have made my stand very clear since I have been in this house, and I have been here for seventeen years. I have always made my stand very clear on that. We do not believe in it because we say, and our Catholic faith says it, that to disrupt marriage is killing the union, is to a certain extent killing the children and killing the nation. That is what we believe.

I know that divorces are requested in the name of liberty and freedom because, as some people say, nobody will tell us what is evil and what is good. It has been said in this house and in various committees of the house—I was there to hear it—we cannot know what is evil and what is good. And when we say that divorce is evil they say: Who is going to tell us what is evil? Well, if disrupting the family, dividing the father and mother, separating them from their children is not evil, I do not know what evil is. No one is obliged to have a friend or a neighbour come and tell him that that is evil when speaking of divorce, disruption of the family, the killing of the nation and the separating of the children from their father and their mother. If that is not evil, well, words do not mean anything to me.

I am going to quote one of the Conservative members, a very able man, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). He was speaking in Montreal. I think I should quote this because it comes within the scope of my speech. He spoke on Monday, March 17, 1952. The article in the Gazette says in big type: "Real religious renaissance Diefenbaker cure for reds." That is a very good title because the communists of Russia have had experience of divorce, and they had to throw it away. They had to go back on their philosophy, but only to a certain extent of course because they are atheists. But they had to come back and try to do something to prevent millions of children from wandering about the streets of Russia without a father and a mother to take care of them. The state had to do something for them. The burden became too heavy for the state, and they had to go back on their laws. They had to throw away some of their laws so as to render divorce more difficult in the future. It has been abundantly proven. The hon. member for Lake Centre called for a real religious renaissance. I think he should have added that this real religious renaissance should mean that we would think that it is a spiritual malady existing on our continent and on other continents of the globe. It is a spiritual malady to give more facilities and to admit the dissolubility of marriage on earth. I think he should be complimented on that because certainly he gave a lead so far as spiritual leadership is concerned in this country and in all countries of the world.

I remember that in 1950 the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) spoke on this question and gave a very clear picture of what we of Quebec understood in respect to this matter. I believe the same bill was presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I should like to read that quotation of the Prime Minister, but before doing so I am going to give a few figures. I gave figures a few moments ago on divorce in the United States. From December 31, 1906, to December 31, 1916, there were 975,728 divorces in the United States. There were that many divorces in that ten-year period in the United States. From December 31, 1876, to December 31, 1916, there were 2,250,069 divorces in the United States. I have taken these figures from the "Voice of America". The "Voice of America" adds this, that the total number of persons separated in fifty years—and the word "separated" is absolutely accurate—was 4,500,138. The total number of minor children made orphans in fifty years—and, through divorces, they are really made orphans—was 1,689,662. Then the "Voice of America" makes this reference—and I ask hon. members to note the expression used—that the total number of persons bereft and dishonoured in fifty years was 6,189,800.

Those are strong words. I agree with them. Because I believe that if in this country we are going to follow the example of other countries in the matter of divorce, then in Canada we will have the condition that we see in other countries—a condition of national disaster.

We should be more careful. I see my hon. friend smiling. He has his opinions; I have mine. It is a national disaster to allow divorce, and to give more facilities for divorce.

Mr. Knowles: Would my hon. friend permit an interjection?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I do not quote the hon. member. I am giving an opinion.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps he would permit a word, because he made reference to my smiling. He is right, but I would not want his observation to be misinterpreted. I would not want my smiling to be taken as disagreeing with his suggestion that to multiply divorces in the proportions he suggested would be a national disaster. I agree that it would. My reason for smiling was that, while I respect my hon. friend's right to disagree, I do not agree that my bill moves in that direction, for it does not provide any new facility.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Yes it does; it gives more facility.

Mr. Knowles: How?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I shall quote the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on that.

Mr. Knowles: My suggestion might make it even more difficult.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): No. This is what the Prime Minister said on June 20, 1950:

> I do not intend to take very long, and I am not rising to talk this bill out, but to bring before the house certain facts . . . There is no doubt that under the British North America Act parliament has jurisdiction with respect to divorce. That is one of the express provisions of the act. There is also no doubt that before confederation there were in force in the province of Quebec laws which by virtue of the British North America Act continue in force until they are amended or repealed by the jurisdiction having authority to deal with them.

If we have authority to deal with them as suggested here, and if we give permission to those two provinces to go before the exchequer court, we are amending the law, whether we like it or not. Yes we are.

Mr. Knowles: No, not at all.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): The Prime Minister continued:

> That is to be found in the explicit terms of section 129 of the British North America Act. Among the laws which were in force in the province of Quebec, and which have not been dealt with by the legislature of Quebec or by this parliament up to the present time, and which continue to be in force, is section 185 of the Quebec civil code. That is in force in the province of Quebec, and it is not in force anywhere else, and any legislation to deal with it is legislation for the province of Quebec and for the province of Quebec alone.

If the hon. member insists upon parliament accepting his bill, then he is asking parliament to overlook section 185 of the Quebec civil code. It would no longer be applicable in that province, because the hon. member would be saying to the people of Quebec, "You now have a divorce court known as the exchequer court. You are now allowed to go there, and with greater facilities available." It has been proven, and I say I have proven tonight conclusively from the quotations I have read, statements by political men in England, the United States and Canada, that in establishing divorce courts greater facility is given.

If that is done in the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland, then more facility is offered to those provinces. Section 185 of the Quebec civil code would no longer be applicable. The hon. member would be saying to the people of Quebec, "This law of yours is no longer applicable. You are now allowed to go before the exchequer court, and to obtain divorces as often as you wish." That is what my friend's bill is doing.

We do not want that. The Prime Minister had this to say:

> That section of the code is very clear, and I think the shortest way to bring its content before hon. members is to read it. It is as follows:
> "Marriage can only be dissolved by the natural death of one of the parties; while both live, it is indissoluble."

We believe that in Quebec.

Mr. Knowles: And the Senate overrides that section 300 times a year.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): The question of whether the Senate is or is not a divorce court was established long ago. It is a special provision that has been accepted—but not by and for the Catholics, because we are against it. We are against it. Then the Prime Minister continued:

> Such is the Quebec law at the present time, and until that law is amended or repealed, the matter is not one of who will have jurisdiction to hear a divorce case; the matter to be dealt with consists of a fundamental declaration of the law and that is why the hon. members who introduced this bill took the precaution to declare that the exchequer court would have jurisdiction and would have the right to dissolve a marriage. That however would be legislating for the province of Quebec.

I suggest the authority of a statement by the Prime Minister is much better than anything I could say. He is speaking; I am only quoting him. I believe he is right, because he knows what he is talking about. Again quoting the Prime Minister:

> That however would be legislating for the province of Quebec. It would be within the power of this parliament, but still it would be legislating on a matter which is extremely distasteful to the large majority of the people of that province.

He is telling my hon. friend, through my mouth, that it is distasteful to our province.

An hon. Member: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Why not withdraw the bill? Why not withdraw it, once and for all, and do away with it?

On motion of Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will resume debate on the budget.

Mr. Fleming: What about Wednesday?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The budget.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

LIVESTOCK

ANNOUNCEMENT OF FLOOR PRICES ON CATTLE

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as recently announced in parliament, the federal government has agreed to establish a floor price on cattle until the United States embargo on Canadian cattle and beef shipments is removed. This price, until July, will be on the basis of $25 per hundredweight for good steers at Toronto, Montreal and Moncton; $23.35 at Winnipeg; $22.80 at Saskatoon; $22.55 at Edmonton and Calgary, and $23.40 at Vancouver. At the beginning of June a floor price for the month of July will be announced, and at the beginning of each month thereafter the floor price for the next month will be announced in order that the producer may know what the floor price on his cattle will be for the next two months.

In 1951 Canada exported about 400,000 head of cattle, either as cattle or beef, for which no outside market is at present available although it is hoped that domestic consumption will increase with the lower consumer prices for beef. If the market is oversupplied, it means the price to producers will remain at the floor. With the fixing of a floor price, it will be possible for the producer to market his cattle in an orderly manner with only finished cattle reaching the market, and if this is done the producer may expect to continue to sell all his cattle without undue market gluts, and may from time to time receive prices higher than the floor.

There are various reasons why it will be in the best interests of the cattle industry to delay the marketing of cattle while the United States embargo is still in effect, and attention is drawn specifically to the following:

1. When the American embargo is lifted, that market will again be available.

2. Orderly marketing will relieve market congestion and undue pressure on prices received by farmers.

3. The establishment of a floor price means the producer will always be in a position to obtain a minimum price for the particular grade of animals which he has to market until such time as the United States embargo is lifted. It is possible that the extra feeding, with the resulting weight gain, may improve the grade and therefore increase returns to the producer.

4. During the pasture season, cattle make their most economical gains on grass, and this is available on most farms and also in community pastures in western Canada.

Mr. Charlton: With reference to the floor price on beef, can the minister say whether or not the government has set any differential for the grades, or is that being left to the packers?

Mr. Gardiner: No, the prices for the different grades are related to the $25.

Mr. Quelch: Will the minister say whether the floor price is in operation now, or is it dependent upon the removal of all provincial embargoes?

Mr. Gardiner: The floor price is in operation now.

Mr. Fulford: In view of the fact that floor prices have been set for beef cattle, is the minister in a position to state whether any consideration is being given to stabilizing the market for dairy farmers?

Mr. Gardiner: There is a floor price under butter, of course, and, as I said yesterday, there is a legalized position in Ontario in relation to cheese. Since most of the cheese is made in Ontario, the cheese position is quite well governed by that.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask a supplementary question with respect to this grading which will be based on the floor price? Will there be any close supervision by the government of the grading methods as a result of the institution of the floor price policy? The minister will appreciate that it means a great deal to a farmer how these grades are applied.

Unless there is some supervision, with a floor price of $23.40 in Vancouver a farmer may get a price far below that for the cattle marketed.

Mr. Gardiner: There is always supervision when there is a floor price. I can best illustrate that by saying it is only a few weeks ago that it was found that a floor price was established on hogs. Immediately following that it was found that at certain places a price of 25 cents less per hundred pounds was being paid. This was immediately checked and in a very short time it was levelled out at 26 cents. The same kind of supervision will be applied to cattle as has been applied to hogs.

Mr. Cardiff: Will the minister state whether the 25 cents a pound is for red brand beef?

Mr. Gardiner: That is for good steers; choice is above that, and there are red and blue in the choice.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE—FURTHER OUTBREAK IN SASKATCHEWAN

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I am sorry to be required to announce that we have one more case of foot-and-mouth disease. The case was first reported on Saturday, April 19, and veterinarians visited the premises immediately and quarantined them. Dr. Carlson, of Regina, and Dr. Mulhern, United States foot-and-mouth disease specialist, on clinical examination diagnosed the disease on Monday morning as foot-and-mouth.

The herd is located six miles south and five miles east of Ormiston, Saskatchewan. The livestock involved is made up of twelve cattle and one hog. There is one contact herd belonging to a neighbour in which there are ten head of livestock. There are very few animals in the district, and no other contacts have yet been established. The burial pit is being dug today and slaughter is planned for tomorrow.

It has been reasonably established that the disease was transmitted from the area where it was originally found. May I say by way of further explanation that Ormiston is located five miles almost straight west of the southwest corner of the quarantine district.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How far is that from Regina?

Mr. Gardiner: It is about fifty miles straight south of Moose Jaw.

Mr. Argue: Since the new outbreak is just a few miles from where I live, may I ask the minister what effect this will have on the opening of the Ormiston P.F.R.A. pasture, which normally takes about 2,500 head of cattle?

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member probably knows that this question was under consideration last week—that is, whether stock would be allowed into the pasture out of the buffer zone immediately adjacent to the pasture. At that time it was thought that probably stock would be permitted to enter the pasture, but I doubt very much whether stock will be permitted into the pasture now.

Mr. Argue: I have a further question. Will the government assist those farmers in obtaining whatever local pasture there is, and if there is not pasture available will some other compensation be made in the way of provision of feed supplies?

Mr. Gardiner: The authorities who are taking care of the situation there will, I am sure, give every possible consideration to the matter. There are other pastures, and some of them are so located that stock probably could be put in them from that district; but that is a matter which would have to be handled entirely by the men who are in charge of control of the disease.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is this the case to which the minister made reference yesterday in his speech to the Rotary Club in Ottawa?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

ALBERTA HEALTH SURVEY

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I should like to table copies of the Alberta health survey concluded in 1950.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 8, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the answer is to the applause from the government benches.

An hon. Member: Silence.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): One answer, of course, could be not to make a speech at all. Such an answer might be very effective so far as this house is concerned, but one always has the hope that what one says may attract some small attention outside the house.

I shall, therefore, go ahead with the speech. As I proceed I very much doubt whether I shall have anything like the feeling of good will surrounding me that prevails at the moment, or indeed as large an attendance. I will say that if the intention was to make it extremely difficult to be critical, I shall strive to resist it as well as I can.

There may be some good things about this budget, Mr. Speaker, but I have not been able to think of any, except a few cases where the minister repaired mistakes which he made last year in spite of the warnings that we then gave him.

So far as I can find, my feelings are widely shared throughout the country. When I spoke on April 8 I said that the taxpayers of this country were becoming tax-angry, and the last two weeks have convinced me that I did not exaggerate. In choosing the date for his speech, I presume the minister thought that by throwing the remainder of the debate over until after the recess there would be a cooling-off period; but I am inclined to think he will find that actually there has been a bit of warming up.

The following extracts from the press, a few of which I shall read briefly, I think will go some distance toward indicating what I mean.

The Hamilton Spectator that well-known independent paper says:

> If Mr. Abbott ever again has to perform the income tax sleight-of-hand he achieved on Tuesday's budget we suggest that he let us know in advance so we can get in the mood for it.

The Globe and Mail, in more serious vein, says:

> He (Mr. Abbott) has had time to study the government's need of revenue for its three major spending activities, administration costs, social security plan and the defence program, but in none of these categories has he given any evidence of relating fiscal policy to either the means of taxpayers or the ends to be served.

I myself have felt that to be one of the great difficulties confronting us now, and I propose to say a little bit more about it later.

The Toronto Telegram says:

> Douglas Abbott has bewildered the public by his juggling of the personal income tax rate.

I doubt if the minister realized quite what a job he was doing two weeks ago tonight.

The Calgary Herald refers to the minister in very spirited language, as follows:

> It can be said without fear of contradiction that Mr. Abbott makes most vaudeville magicians look clumsy. His hand is indubitably faster than the eye . . . With a casual wave of his hand he can shrink an elephant of a surplus to half size in a twinkling. And when he places a glittering gold piece in the palm of the little guy in the audience, he is not content like ordinary magicians just to make it disappear. He not only gets the gold piece back, but he simultaneously extracts a few nickels from the little guy's back pocket.

I do not know whether the minister recognizes himself in this guise, but the feeling is very widespread.

Then, again in more serious vein, the Ottawa Journal quotes Mr. Muir, president of the Royal Bank, as questioning whether the government was justified in raising "such vast revenues". I think that is a thing that bothers us all, Mr. Speaker. It quotes Mr. Muir further as questioning whether the large amount slated for defence might not be spent this year and thus another large surplus be realized. That also is a question that I think is in many people's minds.

I have noticed a great change of heart. First of all the press showed an inclination to say: well, whatever we criticize, we must not criticize defence or defence production. That inclination has been abandoned and I think people are now looking carefully at this $2 billion and feel that we need to know a great deal more about it.

L'Action Catholique raises a far-reaching question which really goes to the root of the matter. It says:

> If the federal government has so many taxation powers that it prevents the provinces and the municipalities from functioning normally, this certainly goes against the spirit of the fathers of confederation.

L'Action Catholique gives an illustration, and a vivid one, of what it means. It goes on:

> On the 28th of March of this year, when the municipal budget of the city of Quebec was brought down, Alderman Mr. Henri Beaupré said:
> "During the last few weeks, we did everything we could to cut down the estimates—"

That is the estimates of the city of Quebec.

> "—in order to be able to make both ends meet and during all that time some administrators in Ottawa were sweating in their efforts to find means to dispose of a huge surplus. Is that not enough to ask ourselves if there is not something wrong with our taxation system?"

In the light of what has happened, it is not surprising that these questions are being asked. As I said, people are warming up, and I think they should be warming up, because what is happening is that we seem to be getting back—in the lukewarm or cold war—to something like the war conditions that we had a few years ago when we spent over fifty per cent of our national income on war measures. The percentage is smaller today, of course, but on the present basis, say $4,800 million, as I said before, expenditure will amount to $13,150,000 per day, $547,000 per hour, nearly $10,000 per minute, or, putting it differently, $343 for every man, woman and child, or $1,715 for a family of five, and, taking a rough figure, about $30 per week in taxation.

We can see that in spite of ourselves we are drifting back into the position in which we were in wartime, and we can also see that in wartime there was—and inevitably so—a great deal of government domination. We can remember also that at that time an enormous percentage of the business of the whole country was carried on by government, that the government was the great source of business to individuals, the great source of contracts; and of course the persuasive power of that huge amount of spending gave the government a tremendous hold over the people. I think it is fair to say that in retrospect we can see that in wartime we had not a few of the characteristics of the total state, and this could recur, if we are not watching it, in what I call a lukewarm or cold war.

There may be those who profit from government contracts and who think this is a pleasant state of affairs, but on the other hand I think critical voices will become more and more critical, as they are doing in the United States; they will realize and point out that the government's taking over industry is not the only way by which socialism can come; that we can have virtual socialism by reaching a stage where the government has taken such a large part of the whole income of the country that they would have unlimited power, or virtually so. The "point of no return" is hard to fix, but it is interesting to point out that even now taxation has become the biggest industry in the country so far as income is concerned. If we take the federal taxes at $4·8 billion, that amount is greater than the total value of all manufacturing in Canada in 1950, which was $4,378 million; and it is nearly three times as great as the value of agricultural production that year, which was $1,792 million.

As the Winnipeg Free Press says, these are appalling figures. They are appalling figures, they should stagger us, and they are staggering people and making them think about the cost of government as possibly they have never done before.

There are three questions I should like to ask and attempt to answer. First of all, is all this expenditure really necessary? Is there no hope of retrenchment anywhere? In my opinion the answer is that not all of this expenditure is necessary and that we should press for retrenchment to the point that we get it.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

The second question is: Can the Canadian economy stand the strain? The third question is: What is the effect of the present high taxation on our people?

As to the first question—is all this expenditure necessary—I am going to leave it until later. I will deal now with question No. 2—can we afford it? My trouble is that there is nothing in the minister's speech which asks that question. I find no attempt to say whether we can afford it or not. In our private affairs when we make commitments we have to try to reckon up whether we can afford them and how we are going to meet them. But apparently in government affairs that is not so. I have no doubt that members of the government will agree that there is some point at which expenditures would become too heavy for free institutions, some point at which, in spite of ourselves—and without any intention of doing so, if you wish—we would slip virtually into a collective state, a socialist state, with freedom gone. But at any rate I say that the question, can we afford it, has not been answered by the minister; indeed, so far as I can see it has not been seriously asked.

There are some people who try to work out a formula. There is an economist, an Australian, I believe, who is called Clarke, who has tried to fix the danger point, which he says is 25 per cent of the national income; when you take more than 25 per cent, the danger signals are up.

As I said a moment ago, the point of no return is very difficult to fix. The only answer we get from the government is this. The attitude of the government seems to me to be inevitably the answer of the restaurant keeper in the southern states, who, in those dim days when pies sold for 5 cents apiece, asked a dollar for a piece of pie, and when the customer expressed outrage, the answer was: "Stranger, we need the money." I have a feeling that that is about the only answer we can get now.

What is the effect of the present situation on our own people? Well, we know the usual answer. The usual answer is to picture to us the tremendous capital investment, the increase in G.N.P.; and then we have pious admonitions that we should be thankful to live in such a country and under such a government, and we are told to compare ourselves with those who are less fortunate —and indeed, of course, most of the world is less fortunate. But, as I said the other night, there is not much satisfaction to many of our taxpayers to hear these millions and billions bandied about—they do not live in a world of millions and billions; they live in a world of fives and tens, and less than that. It is the ordinary taxpayer that I am interested in, and it is the ordinary taxpayer that this house exists to protect.

As I said, many have done well out of inflation and currency debasement, and I regret to say that some of those who are doing well out of it seem content and practically say: It is not hurting me; I am getting by, and why should I worry? Before I sit down I want to suggest that we should all be much worried about it, not merely because many of our fellow citizens are so greatly affected, but because, if it goes far enough, it may ruin us all. But at any rate, our duty is to protect our people, and at the present time a great body of them are suffering.

It is always good to get an outside view of your position. In the Atlantic Monthly for May I ran across what struck me as an interesting and unusual assessment of our Canadian situation. Most of what comes from across the border seems to me to have not very much thought behind it. They seem to be dazzled by figures of investment and gross national product; but here is a statement from a responsible periodical which certainly tries to go to the mat. I quote from it briefly:

> The dominion government, which last year anticipated a surplus of $30 million in a budget of $3·7 billion, found itself embarrassed by a whopping surplus that exceeded $500 million.

The minister will have to look into this, Mr. Speaker, because apparently they have not heard the news that the surplus is not $500 million; it is some smaller figure. The minister, I am sure, will observe this figure. I continue with the quotation from the Atlantic Monthly:

> If Canadians were living through the most prosperous year in history it was certainly a queer kind of prosperity that nobody enjoyed. It was a twilight hazy kind of thing that fell rods short of everyone's notion of what prosperity should be like. Employers faced with cost of living statistics caved in before demands for higher wages. Prices kept rising.

The article goes on:

> The combination of pockets of unemployment, agrarian discontent, and a continued rise in the cost of living made trouble for the Canadian Liberal government.

The article concludes:

> More than likely Canadians are destined for more of the things they experienced last year—

I should have said that they pointed out the American investment in Canada, and then the article went on:

> More than likely Canadians are destined for more of the things they experienced last year—higher wages and less real income, more jobs and more unemployment, greater farm income in dollars and less to show for it at the end of 1952. And if all this adds up to prosperity, Canadians at the moment would as lief try something else.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not asking people to accept that statement as necessarily the last word, but I would state without hesitation that we do have in this country, despite our glowing figures, those grandiose figures, uneasiness, and the feeling that we have been on the crest of a boom year after year, and there is the fear that one day the boom will end and the reckoning come. Perhaps some people remember the old song no bird ever flew so high it didn't have to light.

The Atlantic writer was of course speaking of those elements in the community best able to take care of themselves, wage earners with a cost of living bonus, and that sort of thing. What he would say about the position of those of our fellow citizens whose income is still related to the dollar before its debasement, our citizens who have had no protection against the inflationary storm, but have had to bear the full fury of the blast—what he would say about them is hard to imagine. But what it means is that in spite of our fortunate position, which we talk about so much, in spite of our great natural wealth, we are out of balance, rather grievously out of balance. And of course one great reason, to which I shall add a word later, is the inflation of our currency by what the Winnipeg Free Press calls government profligacy of expenditure, as well as by other things.

I have tried to provide a background against which we can assess government tax policy, what it has been in the past year, and what it is proposing today. A year ago the government increased sales, excise and income taxes. We pointed out that this would increase prices. I give an illustration. Washing machines before the budget speech last year sold for $159.50; after the budget speech for $184.50. Before the speech, sales and excise tax on washers were $5.91; after the budget $20.30. Take toasters. The price before the budget was $9.95; the price after the budget was $10.95. The tax before the budget was 98 cents; the tax after the budget $1.50. There is not much room for doubt as to what happened there.

The fact was that the taxpayer got hit again and again. The higher taxes, instead of being deflationary as the government predicted, raised prices. Taxes went up; prices went up; national revenue went up, and of course the minister in a way is a beneficiary of it all, because his revenue went up and his surplus went up.

The feelings of the taxpayers who were taxed so heavily were keen enough. But, to add to their distress, the taxpayers, groaning under the minister's exactions, watched with amazement and irritation the surplus which had been estimated at $30 million grow in nine months to $722 million. If the minister, when he spoke on the air in February, had contented himself with explanations, even if the taxpayers had not accepted his explanations entirely, they might have had sympathy with him; but the minister took a very different line, a very bold line. He said the surplus was a fortunate thing. He said he was pleased that he had taken several hundred millions more than were necessary, and he must not be surprised if the impression grew not only that the surplus was welcomed, but that it was not entirely unexpected. And of course when the Prime Minister also said it was a fortunate matter, that strengthened the impression.

Here are some excerpts from the Minister of Finance's words, taken from his radio broadcast. He said:

It—

That is, the surplus.

It has been an excellent thing, not only for the government but for each and every one of you.

He was talking then to the citizens of Canada. Again he says:

We had to use $300 million of our budgetary surplus to meet non-budgetary expenditures—

And that means the loans, advances and investments.

—leaving about $400 million of the total surplus available for paying off a part of the national debt and increase in our working cash balance.

Later on he says:

Supposing we had not had this large budgetary surplus. Where would we have got the money for all these necessary loans, advances and investments?

Then he goes on to explain that the money would have had to be borrowed.

In other words what the minister told us in February last was that in April of 1951 he did not provide for these other expenses, which he now takes care of out of this unexpected windfall.

But, secondly, and even more surprisingly, in his broadcast the minister said, while warning us that the surplus might be reduced by the end of the fiscal year, that he had spent virtually all the money in the surplus, that he had used virtually the whole of it.

The minister's comment on that was that it was used for purposes which had been approved by parliament. No one of course suggests that the minister had misappropriated the money, or that the money was not used for things which in themselves were useful. But that does not alter these following facts:

1. That the minister in April last did not provide in his budget for the items which he took care of out of this unexpected surplus.

2. That he told us that he had used virtually all of the $722 million and—

3.—and this is important—that this amount will have to be replaced; and there is only one place to get it, in the end, and that is out of the pockets of the hard-pressed taxpayer, who will have to find roughly $700 million more than he would have had to do at this time. Or, to put it differently, if this money had not been used by the minister it would have been available at this time of peak expenditure to give some relief to the taxpayer.

Instead of this, the taxpayer's money has been used for various loans and investments which need not have been taken out of the taxpayer's dollar, and also for the paying off of debt, which is good in itself, but which should be done according to plan and not because a blunder has been made in budgeting. That is the position; and the taxpayer will only get his money back indirectly and over the years.

In the circumstances, it is not surprising that there is confusion and indignation, wide confusion and indignation and that the taxpayers still believe that to this extent they were taxed unnecessarily in the last year.

I just mention this in passing, because I am sure the minister would like to have it on the record, that in a recent cartoon he was shown as a juggler making the surplus rabbit disappear.

Mr. Abbott: That is the one the hon. member was going to put on Hansard.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Unfortunately I cannot put a cartoon on Hansard. But the title I gave to it can be placed on Hansard, namely Abbott's Rabbit. I am sure that will be remembered for a long time.

So much for last year. I now come to the minister's proposals for this year which, if I may say so, are introduced with a mixture of well-assumed self-satisfaction and well-disguised repentance. When he said, "I feel justified this evening in saying that our policies have proved to be wise and right," I could not help asking: Is this the man who has already gone into reverse on so many of the things he did only a year ago?

And, to point up the irony, the very next sentence contains a really devastating argument against his own words, because in that sentence he said:

Events show that the inflationary virus in our bloodstream—

I think that is a good phrase.

—has taken a stronger hold than I had anticipated and that the prices increases that occurred before our measures took full effect were about five per cent greater than the forecast on which the budget was based.

Now, where does the minister think this virus came from? We told him where the virus was coming from; that it came out of his own taxes imposed last year. He did not have to be a clairvoyant to see that. Anyone could see what was going to happen—and what did, in fact happen.

I come back to the phrase "wise and right". Was it "wise and right" to retain the sales tax? Of course the minister seems to have a fixation on the sales tax, and refuses to admit his error. Or is he keeping it there in order to keep prices up and add to his revenue?

"Wise and right"—were the excise taxes of last year, which raised prices and caused unemployment, wise and right? The only wise thing was to abandon them. The minister, of course, gives high-sounding reasons for introducing them a year ago, ignoring completely the criticisms we made. And he now says:

We can ill afford much loss of revenue and I have given much personal study to this question. In this I have been helped by a considerable number of carefully prepared and thoughtful briefs from consumers, dealers and manufacturers. I am satisfied that a lower tax will now meet our requirements.

I think the minister might have been generous enough to give us some of the credit for his change of mind. The truth is that the course of events, which we accurately predicted, has proved too much for him.

We now come to the cigarette tax—another mistake. The minister said:

In the case of cigarettes, I had forecast an increase of $21 million and I experienced a decline of $1 million.

That does not seem very wise and right. However, we will agree that the minister recognized that he had received a "knockout" and later he said:

I therefore propose, effective immediately, to move the cigarette tax back to where it was a year ago.

If he had applied the phrase "wise and right" to his actions this year, instead of last year, we might have been able to go along with him. I am sure in due time the minister will come to the point where he will be much more ready to accept our advice, and not to delay it for a year. Because to delay for a year often causes trouble.

I now come to the income tax reduction. I was going to call it trivial, but you cannot call a thing "trivial" which does not exist at all. Actually when you include the social security tax—which, after all, is the same kind of money, and comes out of the same pockets—it results in a $12 million increase.

Of course we realize what a difference an election year makes. It is interesting to go back to 1949, when the minister had a surplus of $410 million. Of this he "translated into tax reductions"—and that is a nice phrase, so I shall repeat it—he "translated into tax reductions" $323 million. But at the same time the minister gave this assurance, one which I think should be bracketed with the modest statement he made the other night, that the government had "carried through a program of tax reduction such as no parliament has ever made before, here or anywhere else." Well, that is an expansive phrase from an expansive minister on the eve of an election. I suppose we have not time this afternoon to carry the study far enough to make sure whether we can find a greater reduction. At any rate we realize why it was made then. And I point to the fact that this year, with a surplus practically as large, the minister has given virtually no tax reduction at all.

Then, as to the corporation tax. Of course we need not spend more than a minute on it. Everybody knows that 52½ was lowered to 52. The question is whether the minister, who told us how much he disliked the corporation tax, had any feeling of discomfort when he watched this surplus roll up, a surplus based so much upon taking taxes from corporations, taxes which he himself admitted were unwise.

No one knows better than the minister what a disaster it will be if, by reason of taxation, corporation earnings begin to shrink, so that his tax returns will begin to shrink—and there are some indications, which we certainly hope will not prove true, that corporation earnings may not survive the tremendous onslaught made upon them last year. And this, of course, is another reason for urging the need of retrenchment.

Then, we come to the income tax changes. We need not spend more than a minute on them, because already they have been laughed out of court by the public.

The minister, after his cat-and-mouse game of April 8, went on on April 15 to make another statement. I think the only comment one could make on that is that those who followed the vagaries of the surpluses, beginning at $722 million and then ending up at $356 million, would say that they are prepared for anything. Of course, in so far as the taxes which were over 100 per cent are concerned, they have been remedied. That is something which should never have been done a year ago, but obviously it should have been set right. We hope that there is no catch in it.

There will be criticism of the apparent discrimination against people with smaller incomes. If we compare the income tax rates, including the two per cent for social security, we find that for the first half of 1952 with the new rates, in the case of a taxable income of $1,000 the taxpayer will pay $10 more; in the case of a taxable income of $2,000 he will pay $16 more; in the case of an income of $7,000, he will pay $20 less, and in the case of taxable income of $10,000 he will pay $52 less. From there on the disparity increases.

Just one further word as to corporation taxes, which of course are making it most difficult for new businesses to start up, something which we are urgently in need of. Also a word to remind ourselves that corporation taxes of necessity go largely into prices.

There is one other thing I should like to point out. Repentance is a good thing. Of course when you repent of a sin you cannot repent of all the things that have happened by reason of your actions. The minister's repentance cannot relieve the sufferings already caused in this last year. We must remind ourselves that the taxes last year were not imposed mainly on luxuries but were on household necessities such as stoves, washing machines, and so on, with the result that those who were establishing homes either had to pay the extra prices or do without.

Even now the trouble is not over, because when the tax reduction was made the other day it hit many merchants who had articles in stock on which they had paid the old price and in many cases they will be unable to recover.

Nor should we pass this item without dealing with the aspect of unemployment in the electrical appliance industry, which makes washing machines, stoves, refrigerators, vacuum cleaners, and many other electrical articles. In January of this year employment was only 52·6 per cent of January 1951, and production was 40 to 45 per cent of January 1951. The figures would have been lower still except that the industry, hoping for better days, had continued to manufacture beyond their needs and to increase their inventories.

I was quoting from the Atlantic a little while ago. The Atlantic was concerned with those who were in the best position to protect themselves. If they had been dealing with those people who are really the victims of inflation no doubt they would have spoken much more emphatically than they did. I wish now to say a word about those victims of inflation, partly because I think there is great danger of their being forgotten, and partly because I think it is most desirable that we should still be on our guard against further measures of the kind which have already debased our currency.

These people that I speak of are experiencing the sad truth about inflation, that it makes the rich richer and the poor poorer. It is not too much to say that there is widespread havoc among certain elements in the community who have no means of protecting themselves. We know who these people are who are being victimized. In many ways they are the backbone of our country. They are the people who have sought to provide their own social security by means of personal savings, insurance policies and what not. They have tried to provide for their own old age and the security of their families.

Consider the case of those who are living on the benefits of life insurance policies or under wills. Take the case of a widow whose husband has saved so that they might live decently and educate their children. These are the people who have depended on what I would call the honest dollar. All these people have been betrayed. I do not mean intentionally; I mean by the unwisdom of the policy which has debased our currency.

You have only to take the case of people who were persuaded by propaganda in the last few years to buy government bonds on the assurance—it was virtually an assurance —that three per cent government bonds would not go below par. Those words were not actually used, but they came very close to it. I will read what was said, because I think we should keep these people in mind. Many of them have suffered; many of them have seen their securities go down almost ten points in some cases. That is the extreme case. Here is what they were told by a prominent and respected official of the Bank of Canada:

> Government bond prices reflect the level of interest rates. A decline in bond prices could happen only if interest rates were to rise. In my opinion the needs of the future will require and enable the kind of monetary policy which has brought about the current level of interest rates. Continuation of this policy means stability in victory bond prices.

If the English language means anything that was virtually saying to these people that their three per cent bonds would not go below par. I think we can probably feel that the salesman, having been given a statement that went ninety-nine per cent of the way would not have much difficulty in going the extra one per cent. To me the amazing thing is that a statement like this could be made. It could only be made by one who believed in the omnipotence of the financial authorities—that they were going to be able to maintain this rate and that there would be no change. It is wise for us to remember that, because nothing could show more clearly what happens to people who enjoy almost dictatorial powers in wartime.

It is no exaggeration to say that those whom I have described, those who depended on the steady value of the dollar, have taken the rap. They are really the people who are carrying the heat and burden of the day.

Let us consider for a moment the position they are in. Their goods cost more, nearly twice as much. The money which they invested is worth less today. This would apply to money invested in an insurance policy. The three per cent they receive on their victory bonds is worth only about one and a half per cent on the basis of the 1939 dollar. When the bond matures and the $100 capital is paid, it will be worth only about $50.

It is interesting to remember that the people holding these bonds will get $3 interest but in effect they have lost ten per cent because during the past year prices have risen to that extent. Do not forget also that these people pay taxes. It is therefore no exaggeration to say that these people are suffering dreadfully.

There is one other thing we should remember—that nothing has been done in any way to relieve them. It is a difficult problem, but we must bear in mind that many other people have the benefit of cost of living bonuses or wage or salary increases. Professional people have increased their fees, but these people are left, as I say, to take the rap. The government should never be allowed to forget the part which inflation, owing to the policy of debauching the currency, has played in this. It is the same as when kings used to clip the currency.

I believe it is essential to recall this. Serious people should be trying to remind their fellow citizens of this because it seems to me that little attempt has been made to help these people. I know there are a great many—I know some personally—who practically take the line: I am doing very well and I am not going to worry yet. These people should not forget the history of currency during the last twenty years and realize that if inflation really gets out of hand it will ruin everything. Another reason I think it is important to emphasize this is that we have no guarantee the government will not resort to inflation again. After all, at the present time members of the cabinet are not seeing quite eye to eye. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) says he is drawing up his budget on the basis of a small rise in prices; I think he said two per cent.

Mr. Abbott: No; I said either no rise or a maximum of two per cent.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We will say a small rise. On the other hand the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) tells us there is good reason to believe that the thing which sent the cost of living index up last year now is working in reverse. I suggest the ministers get together and tell the same story.

It is useful to have a realistic picture like that in the Atlantic Monthly, because we get so much rather indiscriminate praise from the United States, usually from people who have made rather a mess of things themselves. I always think it is a little like the pot calling the kettle white.

Now I come to the question I reserved. Is all this expenditure necessary? A year ago when the minister placed before parliament his estimates for this year he foresaw a reduction of $35 million below last year. That seems a long, long time ago; and of course it was only a few months until that hoped-for reduction was replaced by an increase. I suppose if the minister felt free to do so he would say, "We should not have promised retrenchment and at the same time put on taxes which shoved prices away up," but that is a hard thing to expect the minister to say, and I certainly would not expect him to stand up and say it now. We sympathize with the minister in his task, or rather we would sympathize with him if it were not that all our sympathy must be reserved for the taxpayers.

As I said before, we are in danger of getting back into a semi-war atmosphere, where economy is outmoded. The other evening I quoted the rather strong words which had been used by that great government supporter, the Winnipeg Free Press. It spoke about government profligacy, which means wild and unrestrained expenditure. That is a strong word, especially coming from the mouth of a friend. What I am afraid of is that we are back in a war atmosphere again, and I am a little afraid that the familiar phrase uttered some years ago by the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) may have infected the whole service.

I propose to refer just briefly to a few items which seem to me to rather stick out. There is an item of $46 million for travelling and removal expenses. I think that might easily stand some investigation. Of course it includes the cost of transportation to Korea and Germany; but as I recall those figures they are not staggering in themselves, and would still leave a very substantial portion of this $46 million for other purposes. It seems to me there has been an awful lot of moving around. The impression I get from those who have more to do with public servants than I have is that years ago if a public servant were going to travel, a certain amount of formality had to be gone through. You did not just do it all on your own. I understand now it is very much easier, and they are apt to descend upon one like a cloud of locusts, not just one person but that they travel in very considerable numbers. I should think that item would bear investigation.

Then, of course, we come to our old phrase, and what wonderful words they are: "Publication of departmental reports and other materials. Films, displays, advertising and other informational publicity." I find those words hard to pronounce, but we all know what they mean. They really mean that the public gets a certain amount of information and the department gets a certain amount of advertising. I should think it would be about one for the public and two for the department. Well, there we have these millions of dollars; yet I find that is not quite the whole story, because that figure does not include some of the people in the departments who get paid for working on publicity. It is very hard to find out how much of a man's time is devoted to publicity and how much to other things. It is very difficult to press that beyond a certain point of inquiry, but I do think this matter would repay investigation.

There is another thing which interested me very much and which I think will interest all people, particularly those who are not economists, as I am not. I think the ordinary man would be interested if he knew there were a dozen or fifteen departments of government each with its own economics department. External affairs, for instance, has 15 economists; agriculture has a staff of 125. As compared with those we are almost relieved to find that the finance department, where one would expect to find economists, has many less than the Department of Agriculture. Finance has only 24. I think that department had better buck up; it is being left away behind. In the labour economists research branch we have 141. I have not added all these figures, but if that were done I am sure we would get a very imposing total. Whether there are fifteen branches of economics, I do not know. Whether economics in the Department of Agriculture is different from economics in the Department of External Affairs, and whether that again is different from the economics in the Department of Labour, let us say, again I do not know. But it would seem to me there might be some sort of central bureau anyway.

I remember being given this bit of advice years ago when I was in business and a small new department was being set up. My wise chief said to me, "Now remember, that means you are going to create a new king, and he will want to have as many subjects as possible." So I think when you have similar branches in fifteen departments you are bound to have a lot of overlapping.

Well, now we come to national defence. I want to make some comments later on about the big, broad figure of $2 billion, but there are some other matters, trifling in the face of $2 billion, I would like to mention first. Here is a figure that interests me. Apparently national defence spends $4,891,000 on telephones, telegrams and other communication services. This seems to me to stick out like a sore thumb, when we recall that after all almost any part of Canada can be reached by air mail within 24 hours. It seems to me you could send an awful lot of telegrams and other information and make a lot of telephone calls for $5 million; and I would have thought a good deal of the information could have been supplied by using Her Majesty's mails, royal or otherwise.

Now I want to say just one thing about the Petawawa incident because it calls up something we in this party tried to do, with an utter lack of success. When we learned that quite apart from military personnel nearly 40,000 civilians were employed one way or another in the Department of National Defence we urged that some kind of expert assistance should be brought in to organize this huge enterprise. Well, we got the brush-off, as we in the opposition are accustomed to getting the brush-off; but the explanation was very unconvincing. I remember being told that efficiency firms could not deal with anything as big as this, that they could deal only with small companies. As it has turned out, that was just 100 per cent wrong. Now we have this incident which apparently makes it perfectly clear that it would have been wise if the department had taken our advice at that time, just as it would be so wise if the Minister of Finance would take our advice from time to time. At any rate here we have a splendid instance of locking the door after the horse has been stolen. Apparently the minister has known for some months that things were not good, but of course we could not expect him to tell us. Now he is getting Mr. Currie from Montreal to investigate, and a most competent person he is. I hope Mr. Currie's investigations will cover a lot of territory.

Just as one small straw to show the way the winds can blow I should like to mention a little incident that took place in the defence expenditure committee last autumn. It came to my attention that an invitation had been sent out to tender for 63,000 serving forks. The man who got it felt that this was a strange request, and he sent it down to me. I made some investigation about serving forks, and I found that a serving fork is apparently something which is used at a formal dinner where the waiter comes along and takes meat from a platter with this special fork to put on the guests' plates. I was told that a large hotel might need a score or two. I would not have imagined that in any military mess, outside of the officers' mess, there would have been a large number of serving forks used. I have had some experience with military messes, and I believe it is mainly a case of rugged individualism there; everyone looks after himself. I must say that this number of 63,000 was questioned and the defence department did reduce it to 40,000, but apparently there was still no doubt that they wanted tens of thousands of serving forks.

I produced this serving fork at the committee. I took great risk because I carried it in my pocket, and it extended out in such a way that if I had fallen I would have injured myself. I did, however, at great personal risk to myself bring this fork into the committee. It was presented there, but so far as I know no action has been taken.

Mr. Croll: At the committee meeting this morning a statement was tabled showing the number to be 14,000 and not 40,000; action was taken.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I congratulate you. I do feel that this is progress. The number was reduced from 63,000 to 40,000 and now down to 14,000. If we strike off a few more zeros we may get it down to somewhere near the right figure. Speaking seriously again, this is a case where obviously something incredibly foolish was done. The action was questioned, and it seems to me if there had been any efficiency in the organization at all they would have jumped on it in a second. They would have found at once what a foolish thing was being done. If there had not been some complaint we would apparently never have had this figure reduced to 14,000. All I can say is that the more one hears about this matter the worse it is. I am not going to risk my life by taking this fork around any longer, but I hope the department will do something about it. A colleague points out to me that there is now one fork for every five men. It may be that we now have such refinement in the service that the men are going to wait upon each other, and perhaps they will need these serving forks.

Perhaps this case affords some explanation of another thing. It is not surprising, if there is a need for 40,000 serving forks, that the department needs such a large number of civilians to look after these things. It turns out that in the defence department we have something like 23,000 permanent and temporary civilians, and in addition something over 14,000 casual civilian employees. This figure represents about 20 per cent of the total of all the rest of the civil servants in all departments including the post office. I do not know how it strikes hon. members, but at least to me it suggests the need for careful inquiry.

I come now to the $2 billion figure for defence and defence production. I want to make some comments on that. I think it should be fully explored. I want to make it clear that in this party we wish to make an all-out effort on defence. There is no question about that, but that is not to say that we should mechanically assume that the figures given to us are the final word in economy. We must inquire into that.

What about the defence department itself, I mean the personnel? We have been given the picture of the multiplication of officers, and how well we know that picture! One instance in Calgary was cited where a staff was sent in at an estimated cost of $50,000—the minister did not question that in his reply—and the work was done by a colonel and several other officers. If I recall correctly the work had been previously carried on by a reserve officer and some N.C.O.'s at a suggested cost of well under $1,000.

We should not expect men in the services to be interested in expenses, Mr. Speaker. I think we would be naive to expect that. It is not their job, but the job of parliament. As a matter of fact, we ask the man in the service to provide us with protection. I have some knowledge of the army and I would think that anyone who expects military officers to be careful about the money they spend is naive to an extreme degree. Add to that the fact that most of the officers got their training in the recent war and you realize that, as those of us who have been in the army know, when a country is at war the idea of having regard to the money cost of what you are using is rather remote. Being of a thrifty nature myself, and tainted with a certain amount of Scottish blood, I did try to look after government property as well as I could, but I was regarded as something in the nature of a lunatic. This is not the job of the officer, it is the job of parliament.

To whom do we look? The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton)? He is completely surrounded by the spenders. He has to be in the hands of his technical advisers. As I said, their business is to strengthen defence and not to ask how much can be spent to strengthen it; that is our job.

We come now to the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe), and he will understand the way in which I am using these expressions. I think his history is very much the same as the history of these military officers in so far as money is concerned. He is inoculated with the same virus; he is a kind of war baby, too. He blossomed and flourished in wartime. In those days he had all the money he wanted. The question was not, "how much will it cost?" but "can we get it and how soon?". Therefore, we must not be surprised if he talks in an offhand way about large sums of money which, however important they may be to the rest of us, seem to him rather like the small dust in the balance. How can he worry about the odd millions? He has other things on his mind, and that may be one of the reasons that he was $284 million wrong in his estimates of expenditures during the last fiscal year. I should like to refer to that because in the defence expenditures committee we had somewhat of a close-up of one or two items which gave me an understanding of the difficulty which faces the department. This experience also made me feel how foolish we would be if we regard the figures which are shown to us as ascertainable and well established figures.

I am going to read a little bit of the evidence given at the meetings of the defence expenditures committee last December. We in the opposition would have liked to go a little further with the inquiry but the committee was shut off on December 13 because we had to begin getting ready for Christmas! —although some hon. members will recall that we were here beyond that time. The civil servants were extremely co-operative in getting us the information and I want to make it clear that what I have to say is no criticism of them. Nevertheless, the results were profoundly disappointing. They certainly made one feel that estimates were little more than guesses.

Mr. Mackenzie, the deputy minister of defence production, in discussing construction contracts said:

> The estimated values that are given are in some instances too low, although it is not yet possible to revise those estimates in any firm way.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Mr. Harkness then questioned Mr. Mackenzie as follows:

> Q. What do you mean by estimated values there? As I understand this you have a list of the contracts that have been let. A. That is right.
> Q. That is not an estimate is it? A. The first column of figures in each case is the estimated value of the contract.
> Q. In other words, these are not firm contracts then? A. Oh yes, these are firm contracts.
> Q. I mean, as far as the total amount is concerned? A. Many of these contracts do not state a firm price.
> Q. That is what I mean—I should have said a firm price. A. We have had to estimate what the ultimate cost would be.

Later, Mr. Mackenzie said:

> Some of the contracts are as I said in my earlier statement cost-plus contracts, where we do not know at all what the ultimate is going to be.

Later, questioned by Mr. Wright regarding purchases of howitzers:

> Q. And for the United States government there is an item of 38 105mm. howitzers, with an estimated value of $1,457,646. Approximately the same amount of money is being paid for only 88 of these howitzers bought from the United States government as compared with $1,500,000 for 138 of these howitzers being paid to Sorel Industries Limited. Might we have an explanation for that?
>
> A. This is just an illustration of what I was saying, that the estimated values can be very misleading. The 88 howitzers were being bought from the United States government and that is the estimate we got from them on what we would have to pay. That is not a firm contractual price, that is an estimate which was received at the time. Now in addition to buying 88 howitzers from the United States, it was decided to manufacture this particular type of howitzer in Canada and it was thought at the time that the order would amount to one and one-half million but whether that will prove to be the case only time will tell.
> Q. Then these figures do not really mean very much?
>
> A. I was particularly careful to say that, when talking about these orders for equipment that are being made for the first time in Canada, it is practically impossible to be categorical as to what the items are going to cost.
> Q. You will notice that there is a vast difference in these two items. A. It may well be.
> Q. It would look as if they could be made much cheaper at home than brought in from outside the country.
> A. It may well be that the purchase from the United States will not amount to as much as that, or it may well be that the cost of manufacturing them in Sorel will be higher.

Mr. Speaker, I draw attention to the fact that this is not an order for some new type of radar gadget which was just invented the day before yesterday. I suppose that howitzers are 50 years or 60 years old. This order is for the manufacture of howitzers.

Hon. members will notice the utter vagueness of the figures which are given. Apparently they are not contracts. They are —what shall I say?—expressions of intent. Yet with vague figures like that, I presume, we have built up this figure totalling altogether $2 billion.

There is one other item that I should like to mention in passing, namely the item of $213 million for the acquisition of land and the construction of buildings in Canada. That amount apparently is in addition to the $311 million spent for that purpose last year. The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) mentioned that matter and raised the question whether, in these times when we are so greatly extended, we need to spend this huge amount. The gossip, of course, is that we are going to have our own Pentagon building all dressed up in modern fashion, underground and all that; that is the talk. One wonders whether these expenditures have to come. If we were as far astray as $284 million in 1951, heaven knows where we will be in 1952 with the larger figure.

In this same Atlantic Monthly from which I read I was interested to note one or two things from the United States experience which I should like to mention briefly. Speaking of waste in military procurement the Atlantic Monthly said:

> A decision to change the design of a plane or tank when production is under way can cost hundreds of millions of dollars.

An efficiency drive is in progress there and two instances of what they have done are worth mentioning. The secretary of defence who is an active fellow, whose name begins with "Mac", has reduced catalogue items carried by the armed forces from 15 million to 1·5 million. Another interesting incident is that they have discovered how to manufacture a certain part going into an airplane, which formerly cost $2, at a cost of less than one cent. The Atlantic report goes on to say:

> The real elimination of waste will come through a combination of constant probing plus consistency in policy decisions.

These illustrations from the United States should be useful in two ways. First, they should make us doubly and triply critical of all estimates put before us; and second, they should give us great confidence that economies can be made if those who are spending the money are forced to make every effort to find them.

Mr. Speaker, the situation in which we find ourselves reminds me greatly of the situation of a year ago. We then had before us a surplus estimated at $30 million; now it is $9 million. Having regard to the huge amount involved, they are both what you call nominal surpluses. At that time we reminded the minister of the surpluses, so unexpected, in the years past. Now we have a fresh instance. The minister therefore must not be surprised if we are dubious about accepting estimates at their face value. I should like to remind the house of the surpluses which we have had in the last five years. They are as follows:

	Million
1948-49	595
1949-50	131

That was the big year—the year of the election—that we had the tax melon cut.

	Million
1951-52	355

The total for the five years is $1,970 million. Nothing the minister has said to us this year makes one feel that this might not happen again. I read to you, Mr. Speaker, the shrewd comment of Mr. Muir of the Royal Bank who was not born yesterday and who suggests what I am sure many of us thought, namely that the surplus for next year may be in the $2 billion. There is a lot of room for economy in $2 billion. I have indicated some soft spots, and I have no doubt that there are a great many more.

There is one other consideration which should not be overlooked and that is that it is not reasonable to suggest that a minister who may quite well be facing an election next year has stripped himself of all hope of a surplus, with 1953 as a possible election year. After all, let us remind ourselves again that there was $284 million shortfall in defence expenditures last year. For these and other reasons I think it proper to ask again and again that retrenchment should still be sought, particularly in this $2 billion, and that we may still have hope for a reduction in these appalling expenditures.

Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Lennard):

> That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
>
> "the proposals of the Minister of Finance are unsatisfactory because they would continue to levy excessive and unjust taxation instead of assuring substantial tax reductions.
> This house condemns the government for taxing far beyond actual requirements and for its waste and extravagance.
> And this house regrets the failure of the government to assure efficient administration in all departments of the public service."

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in following the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) I do not propose to cover quite the same ground, but in several respects I shall underline some of the points that he made so ably in the course of his remarks. When I listened to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) introduce the budget my mind went back to the first budget which was introduced in 1936 after my election to the House of Commons. That budget, including interest on the national debt, loans to our railways, and every other expenditure of government for the year 1936-37, amounted to approximately $530 million. The budget now before us, again in round figures, amounts to almost $4,300 million or approximately eight times as much as the budget which I heard introduced by the Hon. C. A. Dunning in 1936. Both of these budgets were peacetime budgets. And what a strange twist of fate it is that in this period of peacetime the Canadian people should be called upon to raise, one way or the other, the enormous sum of $4,300 million. Of course the levels of the income cannot be compared, they are so different. At the present time we are spending over $2 billion for defence, defence against external aggression—and I am not complaining of these expenditures so long as they are carefully made, and so long as they are necessary, but I would point out that we had grave internal dangers in 1936, with hundreds of thousands of people on the verge of starvation or of want, with young men herded in relief camps getting 20 cents a day, and people being sent out to the backwoods of our prairie and other provinces and receiving allowances amounting to as little as $6 a month for a family. In other words, we can find, when we have to do it, money to protect ourselves from external aggression, but apparently we cannot find money in other times to protect the people of this country from the burden of poverty, of misery and of want such as they experienced during those fateful years between 1930 and 1939.

I could not help but think of these matters and make this contrast when the minister delivered his budget speech the other night. While I am going to criticize what he said, once again I think the drafting of the statement he made, his speech and the manner of delivery left nothing to be desired. I think that we could follow it intelligently and understand what the minister was saying, although at times he seemed to be saying quite contradictory things.

First of all, I want to agree with the hon. member for Greenwood when he said that the minister, in bringing down the budget, spoke as though he were actually effecting a reduction in personal income tax. Indeed, in describing the new change in the income tax structure, namely, the incorporation of the 20 per cent surcharge tax for defence into the regular taxation rate, the minister said this, as reported at page 1254 of Hansard:

> I expect the revenue loss as a result of these changes to be about 6 per cent in a full year and this loss in revenue is a general indication of the average gain to the individual taxpayer. In other words, the average taxpayer will pay 6 per cent less than he would otherwise have done under the income tax law as it now stands.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

However, a comparison of the 1952 tax rates with 1951 rates will soon show that the minister's statement was, in my opinion at least, entirely misleading. It is true that by incorporating the 20 per cent surcharge into the regular tax structure in the manner in which the minister has done, we shall pay in a full year, beginning this July, approximately 14 per cent instead of the 20 per cent we would otherwise pay under the existing law. But the minister has found it convenient to overlook the fact that the full 20 per cent defence surcharge has never yet been imposed. Last year, for example, we paid a 10 per cent surcharge, and now by the minister's indicated change we shall pay roughly 17 per cent for 1952 and 14 per cent in the full year commencing in July.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend wants to be accurate. He knows that the 20 per cent surcharge will have been in force for a full year on July 1.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes.

Mr. Abbott: That covers 95 per cent of the taxpayers. They will have a full year.

Mr. Coldwell: But different calendar years. I still say this cannot be considered as a reduction in the sense that the Minister of Finance used the words. What the minister has done is to use the originally imposed 1952 defence surcharge tax of 20 per cent instead of the actual 10 per cent surcharge tax figure in effect up until the end of 1951 in his comparison of the 1951 tax rates with the tax rates for 1952.

The changes in personal income taxes are therefore deceptive, for while they ostensibly reduce income tax, in reality they have the effect of increasing them. For example, a single person with an income of $2,000 last year paid $165 in tax. This year he will pay $175, or an increase of $10 before the social security tax of 1 per cent is levied. And in the same way a married taxpayer with no children and having an income of $3,000 paid $165 last year, but will, under the new changes, pay $175, exclusive of the social security tax. I think this demonstrates very clearly that our income taxes have been increased over the 1951 rates before the social security tax is included. The minister has, however, given the impression that if it had not been for the social security tax the income tax rates for 1952 would be lower.

Mr. Abbott: What are my hon. friend's figures again? To what bracket is he referring?

Mr. Coldwell: The bracket I used was for a married man without children with an income of $3,000.

Mr. Abbott: I will have to check this.

Mr. Coldwell: I would like to stress another point—

Mr. Abbott: The increase is owing to the imposition of the old age security tax.

Mr. Coldwell: No.

Mr. Abbott: Well, it is.

Mr. Coldwell: No; the increase I have shown is before the old age security tax is imposed.

I would like to stress one other point before I leave the subject of income tax. It is with regret that we learn that the minister has imposed a heavier tax increase on the lower income groups than he has done in the case of those in the higher income brackets. For example, a taxpayer who is married and without children and earning $3,000 per year —and that is the same category—has had his over-all personal income tax for 1952 increased by 12 per cent over his 1951 rate. On the other hand, a taxpayer who is married and without children, and receiving $20,000 a year—earning $20,000 a year, I should say—finds that his taxes have risen only about 6 per cent above what he paid in 1951.

I say that is hardly fair. Certainly it is not a fair way of allocating the burden of raising government revenues, if it is to be on an equitable basis, and on the basis of ability to pay.

It is interesting to note, too, that our criticisms of the so-called 2/2/2 formula introduced at the last session of parliament for the purpose of financing old age security become more than ever justified in the light of the minister's indicated sources of revenue to pay for this pension. Let us look at the sources of revenue that will be tapped in order to pay for this social security.

The minister has estimated that the 2 per cent sales tax allocated for this purpose for the present fiscal year will yield $135 million; that 2 per cent of the taxable personal income will yield another $52 million; and that 2 per cent of corporation income will produce an additional $48 million. This adds up to a total of $235 million, and leaves a deficit therefore of roughly $87 million necessary to finance out of general revenue to meet old age security.

Last autumn, when the old age security bill was before parliament, we of the C.C.F. criticized those features of the bill which imposed the flat rate of 2 per cent on the taxable portion of personal incomes, with a maximum payment of $60 a year; and we criticized, too, the 2 per cent on corporation incomes. At that time we pointed out in particular that contributions could only be made equitable if this maximum of $60 were removed and a graduated tax on personal incomes levied for this purpose.

If that had been done, not only would the social security tax have been made more equitable, and consequently more fair to all concerned, but there would have been less than $87 million to be made up from the general revenue. As it now stands, 42 per cent of the amount necessary to finance this pension must come from the sales tax, which is a particularly oppressive tax for the lower income groups to bear. We have said that before, and I wish to repeat it. We see that 16·1 per cent is to be derived from personal income tax and only 14·9 per cent from corporation tax levies, with the remaining 27 per cent to be derived from the general revenue.

Indeed, if we examine the manner in which the personal income tax for assisting in the financing of old age security is apportioned, we find that this tax lies most heavily on those in the lower income groups. The house will remember that last fall we of the C.C.F., as well as others in the house, criticized the unfairness and discrimination of exempting from this tax that portion of a taxpayer's income above his taxable $3,000. This means that the burden of financing this program falls upon those with taxable incomes up to $3,000 a year, to a greater extent than upon those with more than $3,000 a year of taxable income. Above this income tax level the tax stops with individuals paying the maximum of $30 for this year, whether they make $10,000 or $100,000.

I say it is disappointing that this unfair apportionment of income, together with the sales tax out of which most of the money will be found for financing this social security program, will, as I have noted, cause the cost of the program to bear most heavily upon the lower income groups, and the middle income groups, which in our opinion are at the present time quite hard enough pressed.

The minister's abolition of the 15 per cent excise tax on various commodities imposed by the last budget, and the reduction from 25 per cent to 15 per cent on other commodities, are in themselves to be commended heartily. However, as the hon. member for Greenwood indicated, putting these taxes on one year and taking them off in the next points up the grave injustice which has been inflicted upon those who furnished their homes last year. I wish to say to the minister that this shows either incompetence or the governments disregard of the needs of the people who must furnish their homes in this highly inflated post-war period.

The Minister of Finance has once more demonstrated the government's disregard—and I wish to emphasize this—of the expressed wishes of the House of Commons by his failure to remove the four per cent floor on medical expenses. Just two weeks prior to the introduction of the budget the House of Commons unanimously adopted a C.C.F. resolution, moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), which in effect would permit taxpayers to deduct from their incomes before computing the amount of income tax to be paid the aggregate of their medical expenses, rather than only the portion in excess of four per cent of the taxpayer's income, as now provided in the act.

Mr. Abbott: I think the resolution asked the government to consider doing that.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes; I put it that way.

Mr. Abbott: I did not think you did.

Mr. Coldwell: I put it that way; I said that the Minister of Finance had demonstrated the government's disregard of the expressed wishes of the House of Commons.

Mr. Abbott: And what did you say after that?

Mr. Coldwell: That is exactly what I said.

Mr. Abbott: What did you say after that?

Mr. Coldwell: I said that just two weeks prior to the introduction of the budget the House of Commons unanimously adopted a resolution which would, in effect, permit taxpayers to deduct—

Mr. Abbott: "which would, in effect"—those are the words to which I take exception.

Mr. Coldwell: Oh, that is quibbling; that is really quibbling.

Mr. Abbott: The Minister of Finance never refuses to consider any suggestion, whether it is from the House of Commons or from any other place. That was the reason that resolution was not voted down.

Mr. Knowles: You voted down my motion for the deductibility of trade union dues a year ago.

Mr. Coldwell: As a matter of fact, what I say is perfectly clear—

Mr. Abbott: I want my hon. friend to be fair.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. Coldwell: Let no one quibble over the matter; the House of Commons expressed the desire that this should be done. And that desire was—

Mr. Abbott: The House of Commons expressed the desire that this should be considered by the government.

Mr. Coldwell: As a matter of fact—

Mr. Abbott: And the parliamentary assistant, who spoke on the motion, made it perfectly clear that that was the case. I heard my hon. friend on the radio misrepresenting it, as he is doing now.

Mr. Coldwell: The minister should not lose his temper. I have not lost mine.

Mr. Abbott: I am not losing my temper.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not intend to lose my temper over it; but the only way in which a resolution of this description can be presented to the house is through asking for consideration, and by expressing a desire; and that is precisely what the resolution did. And I say that in this respect there is disregard by the government of the expressed desire of the House of Commons—and that, I suggest, is a statement of fact.

The increase in the total amount of medical expenses which can be deducted, namely $750 to $1500 in the case of single, and $1000 to $2000 in the case of married people, will provide benefits to some people who are hard-pressed, but it will provide little if any benefit to those in the lower income brackets who in most cases could not afford, even if they were pressed, to pay these amounts themselves for medical aid. The removal of the four per cent floor would have benefited everyone who incurred medical expenses. I want to say—the minister may not like my saying this—that the ignoring of the house on this matter emphasizes the lack of respect the government has shown for parliament from time to time. For example, in August 1946 the house voted to ask the government to consider the continuance of the milk subsidy, but as soon as the house adjourned the subsidy was discontinued by order in council. I want to say that if we are to maintain our democratic institutions and traditions the authority of parliament must be restored by electing members who respect and believe in the authority of the elected representatives of the people.

I want now to turn to a relatively small matter, the tax reduction of from 30 to 15 per cent on soft drinks. In our opinion this was done to placate the manufacturers who, we are told, will benefit rather than the consumer. No reduction is to take place in the tax on children's candy bars. I always thought that that was a very petty tax. The tax reduction of three cents on cigarettes will prove negligible in benefiting those who use cigarettes. While the government saw fit to change the corporation income tax in the interests of some corporations, it did not see fit to alter the sales tax which, as I have said already, hits the purchasers of large groups of commodities and is especially burdensome to people in the low salary and wage brackets whose necessities of life are indeed so heavily taxed.

I regret to say that the minister gives us no other alternative but to conclude that the result of this budget will be to militate against the interests of those in the lower salary and wage brackets and the farm groups. We find that in some parts of Canada very few farmers have incomes which place them in taxable brackets. I say that this aspect of the budget is most unfortunate. We had hoped that the lower income groups who have suffered the main burden of taxation, the weight of the special excise and sales taxes, who are unable to save little if anything as insurance against sickness or other unforeseen events, would have been given a much better break than the government has seen fit to give them in this budget.

I was interested to note that the minister has estimated that nearly $1,000 million is earmarked this year for social security purposes. On the other hand, his estimated gross national product for the year is $22,500 million. In other words, this $1,000 million will be equivalent to approximately 4·4 per cent of the country's gross national product. This is certainly an indication that Canada is far from having become a welfare state, as some would have us believe, when such a small percentage of our total national product is used for that purpose. On this point I was interested to read an address entitled "The Pattern of Canadian Progress" which was delivered recently in Toronto by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). The minister underlined what I have just said, when he used these words:

> In 1937, 30·6 per cent of Canada's federal budget was for social security. In the fiscal year just ended, this percentage was only 22·9 per cent—a drop of 5·3 per cent since 1948. In other words, social measures today account for a smaller percentage of our federal budget than they did four years ago or fourteen years ago.

That is a statement by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I think it is the clearest evidence possible that we are far from doing all we could to provide Canadians with decent social security. As our economy expands surely we have the right to expect that the government will effect a greater distribution of this increased wealth by providing better old age pensions and, most of all, a national health insurance program. These are social measures which an expanding economy should be able to afford.

I want to turn to something that I have raised in the past and which has been raised by others, although not actually included in the present budget. I refer to the matter of farm implement prices. I make this reference particularly in view of the fact that we are witnessing a fall in farm returns and farm prices. Floor prices for cattle to be adjusted month by month were announced this afternoon by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), which may be an indication that we may see falling cattle prices because of surpluses that may be piled up.

In that regard I should like to make a suggestion which I have made in the house before. In fact, I think I made it on the address. If the surpluses of beef and other meats pile up they are bound to have a depressing effect on our markets and may cause the government to lower the floor prices. I am afraid that we have lost the United States market for longer than we anticipated a short time ago since a new case of foot-and-mouth disease has been discovered in western Canada.

Consequently I think an effort should be made by the government to enter into some arrangement with the United Kingdom. We may have to finance payment to the farmers in the sale of cattle on the Canadian market or if necessary take sterling or make loans as the case may be so that we can get these surpluses into the hands of people who need them badly, people who would be glad to take these depressing surpluses off our hands should they arise. I think the government should consider a plan of that description. We have an obligation under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to assist the economic welfare of those who are allied with us under that agreement. This might be one way of fulfilling it.

I wanted to say something about farm implement prices. I have just examined a copy of the final report submitted by the Saskatchewan legislative committee on farm implements and passed unanimously by the legislative assembly of that province on April 4. This committee was appointed to inquire into the prices of farm machinery with the object of determining the possibility of establishing parity in prices between farm machinery and the prices of farm products.

Its significance can be determined when one considers the importance of machinery to those engaged in modern mechanized agriculture. The trend toward mechanized farming, not only in Saskatchewan and the prairie provinces but indeed all across Canada, has progressed with great rapidity over the years with the result that farm implements are more important than ever to the farmer. Yet despite the importance of this subject to a large section of our economy the committee reports that the four major companies of the farm implement industry, namely, John Deere, International Harvester, Cockshutt and Massey-Harris, failed to provide the committee with the necessary information to carry out its inquiry. However, this did not prevent the committee from obtaining evidence which clearly indicated high prices and resulting high profits in that industry.

A provincial legislature, of course, cannot undertake investigations to ascertain whether a combine is in existence or whether a combine did exist. It is handicapped by not being able to secure certain information because of lack of provincial jurisdiction. As the committee in its report points out, a provincial authority can only act within the province, whereas a federal authority is legally entitled to obtain evidence, written or oral, anywhere in Canada. The committee recommends, therefore:

That, in view of the failure of the above companies to comply with the committee's request for information, and in view of evidence submitted indicating very high prices and profits, the federal government be urged to immediately institute an investigation of the farm implement industry by a parliamentary committee.

The committee further recommends in its report that the federal government take the necessary steps to prevent additional increases in the price of farm implements or, failing this, to increase the price of farm produce to offset the present adverse effect of high machinery prices on the farmer. This report calls to mind the inquiry that was made by a select special committee of this house, of which I may say I was a member, appointed on February 1, 1937. The authority given the committee was——to continue and complete an inquiry begun by the standing committee on agriculture and colonization, pursuant to a resolution of the house on March 2, 1936, into the causes underlying the high prices of farm implements—

It is interesting to note that the conclusion reached by the parliamentary committee in 1937, fifteen years ago, with regard to the prices of farm machinery, coincides with the conclusion of the Saskatchewan legislative committee of 1952, namely that prices on farm implements are out of proportion to the returns received by the farmer on his produce. The parliamentary committee in its report of 1937 declares that it——is of the opinion . . . that there is competition in the matter of securing sales but little or no effective competition in the matter of prices as between companies. It is true that one company cannot increase its price unless other companies, particularly the larger ones, follow suit but, as illustrated in January, 1936, and throughout the period, increases in the prices or maintenance of prices when a decrease should have been expected, occurs simultaneously in all the companies. The companies insist that no understanding existed between them in the matter of the January, 1936, increase and that the increases resulted from the same conditions arising in each company. It is extremely difficult for the committee—

So the committee reports.

—to understand the remarkable coincidence of the increase occurring in the same month of the same year and, generally speaking, on the same implements and to the same extent. The companies state that it is the practice in the industry to exchange price lists, and it may well be that this practice enables the companies to quickly gain uniformity in the matter of price levels.

In one of its findings the parliamentary committee says:

—that over the period 1891 to 1936 retail prices of farm implements have been maintained at too high a level as shown by the financial returns to the companies engaged in the industry during that period.

It should be noted that shortly after the report was tabled in this house in 1937 the companies showed their contempt for it by further increases in implement prices. When one turns to the present report of the Saskatchewan legislative committee on this subject, one finds evidence to the effect that the farm implement industry continues to be guilty of maintaining too high a level of prices, and prices that bear little or no relation to the prices the farmer receives for his products. The parliamentary committee of 1937 recommended that since such corporations tend to limit free competition in so far as prices are concerned——a well managed, well financed and independent co-operative movement might be encouraged by the consumers.

Interestingly enough, the report of the Saskatchewan legislative committee notes that Canadian Co-operative Implements Limited, created by the farmers after the 1939 inquiry of the Saskatchewan legislature, found retail prices of farm implements and repair parts to be excessively high, and had——succeeded in establishing efficient manufacturing operations and were producing implements which were closely related to the needs of prairie agriculture.

The committee goes on to point out that with regard to the whole question of distribution and the larger and more important question of the contribution of Canadian Co-operative Implements Limited to the Saskatchewan economy—

—it was apparent to the committee that this organization had afforded large savings to its members. This was indicated in the submissions by C.C.I.L. representatives which showed that a minimum dividend of 16 per cent had been realized by members in the period 1946-51.

I should add that the dividend referred to, of course, was the patronage dividend, not profit or return on capital but a return of what are in effect overpayments for farm machinery made by members. In view of the serious nature of this problem and the difficulties encountered by the Saskatchewan legislative committee as a result of its legal limitations we of the C.C.F. urge—and I want the government to note this—that the federal government immediately undertake to complete the inquiry begun by Saskatchewan into the causes underlying high prices on farm implements. We further recommend that if a parity cannot be established between prices of farm implements and the prices the farmer receives for his products, the government assist farmers in the implementation of the recommendation made in 1937 by a select committee of this house pertaining to the establishment of a nation-wide co-operative movement in connection with the farm implement industry.

As I have already said, in view of the situation developing in the dairy industry and in the cattle industry, and since we cannot know what kind of world agreement there will be on the price of wheat, I think it is particularly important that every possible step should be taken not only to find markets but to see to it that the implements of production are available to producers at reasonable and proper prices.

Now I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the amendment be amended by adding thereto the following words:

"This house further regrets that the government has ignored the wish of this house, as expressed by a unanimous vote on March 26, that the 4 per cent floor under medical expenses deductible for income tax purposes should be abolished."

There is one other matter I would like to discuss particularly, since it affects not only my own province but my own constituency. I want to say a few words about the South Saskatchewan river project. I think there is an urgent need not only to come to a decision but to undertake this important project as quickly as possible in order to provide water for irrigation and reclamation purposes for a large area in the province. This spring we have seen an unprecedented demonstration of the tremendous flow of water that occurs; yet perchance in the course of a few weeks the land will lack moisture. By that time the water will have gone down the river to the sea, having done incalculable damage as it moved on. It is expected that the project would provide for the irrigation of approximately 431,000 acres of land, thereby improving agricultural conditions in a large area of central Saskatchewan. It has been estimated that the productivity of the land to be brought under irrigation may be more than doubled with a consequent major increase in farm revenue. It is also expected that, as a result of this irrigation, the number of farms in the district would more than double. I believe that is a very conservative estimate. I would say that they would multiply because there are some very large farms in that area, and under irrigation those farms would be divided up into much smaller acreages. Instead of a declining population in those areas, as has been the case, both rural and urban populations should show some substantial increase.

Of course, in addition the irrigation project might also—and I say might also because I think that this is incidental to the plan—provide electric power to supplement the electric power that may be generated by gas, oil or steam, and thus provide cheaper and more abundant power to the people on the farm and the rural and urban centres. I hope that the commission will soon complete its inquiry and make its recommendations, and that those recommendations will be favourable to the undertaking. I do not think I have had the opportunity of saying this before, but I believe the government chose a very able irrigation expert from Salt Lake City to advise them in this regard. I hope that if the advice the expert on irrigation gives is favourable, the undertaking will be proceeded with at a very early date. As a matter of fact I think perhaps the time has come when, not only in the interests of the area to which I have referred, a great part of which is in my own constituency, but of Saskatchewan, the whole of Canada should receive consideration. We know quite well that periods of dry weather occur in that part of Canada. We know that this involves not only suffering to the people who live in the area but also often involves the country in large expenditures of money. It seems to me that this is one of the forms of insurance that could be undertaken by this parliament against the recurrence of the conditions that we knew in the thirties. I know that all the available information has been placed before the commission by the government of Saskatchewan, and that the commission itself said it required no further submission from that government until the public hearings were held across the province. I know that the people of the area wish to co-operate in every possible way with the federal government in this regard.

Before I sit down, Mr. Speaker, I merely want to say, as I said earlier in my address, that we are disappointed with the budget. We think it emphasizes inequities in the imposition of federal taxation. We believe that the expenditures that are to be made should be very carefully scrutinized by this parliament. I cannot deal with the matter at any length, but I want to add to what the hon. member for Greenwood has said regarding the necessity of looking carefully into military expenditures. I was in Pembroke last night and met a group of prominent citizens there. My mission was a non-political one. Afterwards I had the privilege of chatting with them for a couple of hours, and they told me that they believe that the matters that are now under investigation should not be the only matters investigated, but that the accountants and so on should inquire into expenditures that have been made on equipment that has gone on over the past number of years. Apparently the common rumour in Pembroke, which is in the neighbourhood of Petawawa, is that what has been uncovered lately has been going on for a considerable time. I hope, therefore, that every effort will be made by the government to investigate this matter at Petawawa, and indeed at other military establishments from one end of this country to the other.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): The rules of the house, Mr. Speaker, limit the number of amendments that can be moved to the budget to two. Since there are two before the house now we will not be moving an amendment—not that there are not some further regrets that could be added to those that have already been proposed in the amendment and subamendment. I shall have to content myself, however, with dealing with some of the things by pointed criticism and not by way of amendment.

I listened with very great interest to the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) this afternoon. There were many things in what he had to say with which I find myself in thorough agreement. His criticisms, as usual, were pointed and I thought logical in the main. In some respects I believe, Mr. Speaker, he did lighten them with his delightful humour which we all enjoy. I am not going to deal at length with this whole matter of defence expenditure, but I should like to say that I thoroughly agree with both of the speakers who have preceded me that every effort should be made to investigate to the fullest possible extent what has been happening in military camps across Canada. Every effort should be made to run down the rumours that do exist with respect to wrongdoing. Let us make the wisest use we possibly can of our committee, and I believe that our vigilance will be well repaid.

The hon. member for Greenwood did say that the people of this country are tax angry, and that is true. I like to recall how triumphantly the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) came into the house on the evening of April 8, bearing under his arms the great document, and the jaunty way in which he proceeded to present his budget. He was happy then, and he received a well deserved round of applause for the way he did present his budget and for his usual good nature while presenting it. But this afternoon I have witnessed some rather pointed criticism and I am afraid that the Minister of Finance has been flinching just a bit under that pointed criticism. He has nobody to blame but himself because his budget stinks. I do not think there is any question about that. The people of this country have only that word to say for it: it stinks. As I say, the minister cannot blame anybody for the criticisms that are being levelled at him this afternoon.

I should like to refer just briefly by way of additional testimony to the income tax statement that has been declared as misleading. To do so I should like to repeat briefly what the minister said as recorded, I think, at page 1254 of Hansard for April 8. These are his words:

> In other words, the average taxpayer will pay 6 per cent less than he would otherwise have done under the income tax law as it now stands.

I quite agree with what the minister had to say about abolishing the 20 per cent surcharge method of increasing the revenues from the personal income tax. I too think that it is not a good thing to continue that surcharge method permanently. It had served its purpose temporarily and should have been abolished. There seems to have been no good reason, however, why the minister should have made the statement he made and which I have just quoted.

I took the trouble to check the tables that are to be found at page 1811 of Hansard for April 10, 1951, with the table at page 1254 of Hansard for April 8, 1952, and this is what I find. Let us take into consideration married persons without children, those in that category. If the taxable income—that is, after the deduction of their $2,000 exemption—is $250, the 1951 tax is shown as $42; the 1952 tax is $44 plus the old age security levy of $2.50. This is an increase of $4.50 and a percentage increase of 10⅞ per cent. If the taxable income is $1,000, the 1951 tax was $165; the 1952 tax, $175; the old age security levy, $10. The increase in 1952 over 1951 is $20, and that is a percentage increase of 12⅑ per cent. If the taxable income is $3,000, then the 1951 tax was $561; the 1952 tax, $596; the old age security levy, $30; the increase in 1952 over 1951 is $65 or 11·6 per cent increase. If the taxable income is $8,000, the tax for 1951 was $1,826; the 1952 tax, $1,946; the old age security levy is $30, which is the ceiling for the old age security levy this year. That is an increase of $150 for 1952 over 1951, which would be a percentage increase of 8·2 per cent. Then if you jump up to the $98,000 taxable income category, $58,370 was the 1951 tax; the 1952 tax will be $61,220; the old age security levy, $30. The total increase for 1952 over 1951 would be $2,820 or a 4⅑ per cent increase. Then if you go up to the $398,000 class, the 1951 tax was $301,600; the 1952 tax will be $326,690; plus the $30 old age security levy, which would make a $16,120 total increase in 1952 taxes over 1951 or a 5⅑ per cent increase.

That is quite a different picture, Mr. Speaker, from that presented by the minister when he said there would be an average of 6 per cent decrease this year.

Mr. Abbott: Not this year.

Mr. Low: I just read exactly the words the minister used.

In other words, the average taxpayer will pay 6 per cent less than he would otherwise have done under the income tax law as it now stands.

Mr. Sinclair: Quite right.

Mr. Abbott: Not less than he paid in 1951.

Mr. Low: Mr. Speaker, what the taxpayers of this country want to know and what they are entitled to know is exactly, in dollars, what they have to pay in income tax in 1952, and by how many dollars that sum is greater or less than what they actually paid in 1951. That is exactly what the people want to know and that is exactly what the minister did not tell them. In fact, he told them something from which they simply could not get those figures and it left them completely up in the air.

An examination of the two schedules which I have already placed before the house reveals the fact that the picture presented by the minister is a far different one from the average or a 6 per cent decrease in personal income tax which was announced on budget night. There is no decrease, Mr. Speaker, in income tax from last year's payment by individuals. I repeat that there is no decrease. It is all increase all the way along the line. What the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said is quite true. The people in the lower income categories are getting it in the neck far more heavily by way of increase than are those in the upper income groups; and so it is all the way along in this budget. It is not a poor man's budget at all. It is a rich man's budget.

Mr. Knowles: It is just a poor budget.

Mr. Low: Even when you exclude the old age security tax of one per cent of the taxable income, the individual taxpayers of Canada will pay more in 1952 than they did in 1951. I repeat that when you exclude this payment, they will pay even more in 1952 than they did in 1951. I say that no juggling of figures in schedules, and no parenthetical expressions slipped in in various places in his budget speech—in rather queer places, in my judgment—can change that fact. As a matter of fact, the taxpayers of Canada, I think, resent the misleading statement made by the minister on budget night more than they resent the actual increase in the taxes that they will have to pay. They were quite prepared to face the facts but they wanted the facts. Their resentment is therefore extremely strong. The people generally are fast waking up to the fact that the Liberal party have developed to a high degree the hidden tax complex. This is just another demonstration of it. Down the years since this government came into office, there has been a continuous increase in the number of hidden taxes imposed upon the people as well as in the volume of revenues that have been derived from hidden taxes. It continues, as any study of the budgets down the years will show.

I am sure that the Canadian people had every reason to expect that the minister would include in his budget a provision making it possible for taxpayers to deduct the total of their medical expenses from their net income in order to arrive at a taxable income. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has dealt with that matter very well, and I agree entirely with what he says. Inasmuch as I agree, it follows that I shall support his subamendment.

In the light of the unanimous vote of this house on the resolution presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and also, I might say, in the light of the encouraging statement made in this house on March 26 by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, I think that we had every reason to expect something very different—

Mr. Sinclair: No; it was only a resolution to give the proposal consideration that we voted on.

Mr. Low: Maybe that is another misleading statement.

Mr. Knowles: Quibble, quibble, quibble!

Mr. Sinclair: That is what we voted on.

Mr. Knowles: They voted for it that day; maybe they will vote for our subamendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Peace River has the floor.

Mr. Low: I repeat that, in the light of things that went on here on March 26, we had every reason to expect something very different from these meagre concessions that were granted in the field of medical expenses. What the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) did in the budget will certainly be of little or no use to the taxpayers in the lower income brackets. They are not getting anything beyond what they have now. Considerable relief, of course, is there for those in the upper crust of income. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said, it is quite evident that the minister is not prepared to take any direction from the members of this house who represent the sovereign people of Canada.

I am justified in wondering whether the present Minister of Finance is not following in the wake of his predecessor who told this house in no uncertain terms that the cabinet of this country derived their powers from the king and not from this sovereign parliament. It is about time that that issue was settled. I maintain that the sovereign power of this country is the people of Canada, and that the elected representatives in this house must be obeyed by the executive council in any matter where a majority vote or a unanimous vote is taken from the members in this house.

I should like to have something to commend the minister on. I would not like to criticize him all the way along. I want to commend him for taking off the 15 per cent tax on washing machines, electric stoves and refrigerators; but I have to remind him that when this tax was imposed last year we of the opposition—I think perhaps every speaker on the opposition side who spoke—protested vigorously on the ground that the tax struck unfairly at young married couples, as well as established householders in the lower income brackets.

Mr. Knowles: It stank.

Mr. Low: Yes, it stank. The minister at that time scoffed at us, just as he scoffed at our suggestion that his tobacco tax had passed the point of diminishing returns and would likely cause him trouble. A year later the minister says that we were right in both cases, but I suspect that he would not have taken off the 15 per cent special excise on household appliances if the work of the opposition in this house had not aroused the people to a tax consciousness, the like of which they have never had before—and I say that advisedly. I have met it everywhere in Canada more strongly than I have ever before, and I say the opposition in this house has justified itself and its existence on that one point alone of arousing the people from one end of Canada to the other to a tax consciousness. I think it is high time. That is the main reason I think for that concession being found in this budget. Public resentment is making itself felt, and when the taxpayers become more fully aware of what the government's hidden sales tax is doing to them by way of enhanced prices and by way of placing an unequal or uneven burden on them, particularly those in the lower income brackets, as was so well said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, I think they will show such displeasure that even the most callous minister of finance will be forced to reduce the rate or abolish the tax altogether. And believe me, I am going to try to get that done. I think that every hon. member in this house who understands anything at all about the ill effects of the imposition of the sales tax will go out with the same idea. Let us get that thing out of the way just as soon as we possibly can. I have dedicated my efforts for some years to achieve no less than the complete abolition of the sales tax, because I believe it is a vicious tax. I believe that it bears most heavily upon the poor. I believe it pyramids prices for all consumers, and it has within it a shadow tax, a substantial shadow tax that the government does not get at all. It goes to inflate profits where perhaps they should not be inflated. I think the minister should be censured for neglecting something very important in connection with his removal of the 15 per cent excise tax on household appliances and the reduction in excise on automobiles, soft drinks and some other things. I think he should have made the reductions conditional upon the manufacturers handing on to the consumers a corresponding reduction in price, and he failed. It is quite clear now that the purchasers of automobiles are not receiving the full benefit of the reduction from 25 per cent to 15 per cent in excise tax on cars and trucks. It looks as if industry is taking advantage of the leeway that the minister has given them to enhance their prices. I did have some sympathy for the soft drink manufacturers when they put on a real clamour some time ago for the return of the five-cent bottle of pop for the kiddies, and I believe on that occasion I spoke of it here in this house. But when the minister cut the tax from 30 per cent to 15 per cent on the soft drinks themselves and also reduced substantially, I believe by 50 per cent, the tax on carbonic acid gas, and the soft drinks people decided to hold consumer prices at the seven-cent level, I am afraid I lost a great deal of my sympathy for their cause. I am afraid they will have a hard time convincing members of the House of Commons in the future that they are sincere when they go out for the nickel bottle of pop for the kiddies. I do think the minister acted wisely when he put competitive products like soft drink powders on the same tax basis as the soft drinks themselves. That was only fair, and perhaps it should have been done some time ago.

In the spring of 1951, Mr. Speaker, I appealed to the minister on behalf of thousands of sick people who have to buy quantities of certain drugs and medicines in order to live. I asked at that time especially that the minister place di-alpha tocopherol on the sales tax and duty-free list along with such things as cortisone and ACTH. Alpha tocopherol is at the present time very widely used by Canadians in the treatment of heart and vascular illnesses. I personally in the past year have seen remarkable results from its use by patients suffering from such diseases as phlebitis, varicose ulcers and various forms of heart ailments. The trouble is that there is only one manufacturer of the base product in America, and that is at Rochester in the state of New York. When the substance is brought into Canada it is subject to a heavy customs duty and sales tax of 10 per cent. As a consequence, the sick who need the substance have to pay greatly enhanced prices for it, prices they simply cannot afford to pay in so many cases. It would not be serious for them to have to pay duty and sales tax, plus the high price that they do have to pay, if they had to be treated only for a short time with it, but if deterioration of the heart and the vascular system has gone to the point where di-alpha tocopherol is needed, the patient as a rule must take heroic doses of it every day for the remainder of his life, and that is the special circumstance, Mr. Speaker, which would justify the minister in placing the remedy on the tax-free and duty-free list. I want to hasten to say that if di-alpha tocopherol were placed on the duty-free and sales-tax-free list the loss of revenue to the government would be negligible, but the benefit to the thousands of heart and vascular sufferers who are getting relief from the use of the concentrated vitamin "E" would be tremendous.

I am convinced that more good results are being derived from the direct use of di-alpha tocopherol in heart cases and in preventing thrombosis than can be demonstrated from the use of cortisone in the treatment of arthritis, and that is going a long way. There is certainly at least just as much justification for putting di-alpha tocopherol on the free list as there was for putting ACTH and cortisone on. I am appealing to the ministers concerned on behalf of the 1,500 members of the vitamin E society of Canada, and the many more thousands of heart sufferers who are not members of the society, to make provision in their budget resolutions for the free entry of vitamin E concentrates under the tariff, and for remission of the sales tax on the same substance.

The Minister of Finance appears to think, because Canada's gross national product was high last year—$21.2 billion, I think he said in his budget—and because it is expected to rise to more than $22 billion this year, and also because prices have remained very high, that our Canadian people are exceedingly prosperous and have few if any worries. I should like to spend a few minutes of time to present the whole picture.

I think it does us good occasionally to take a look at all sides of the case. It may prove enlightening to some of us to learn, and it is a tribute to our enterprise in Canada, that we were able to produce $21.2 billion worth of goods and services in 1951. The efficiency and capacity of our machine power are particularly evident in that achievement. And it is all the more challenging, to my mind, when we remember that fairly large numbers of Canadians were unemployed for substantial periods during the year. The minister himself admitted that there were certain areas of unemployment. I have heard the numbers variously estimated up to 400,000 in Canada. I say that achievement is all the more remarkable in the light of those unemployment figures, and it does bear vocal testimony to the efficiency and capacity of our productive powers here in this country.

The minister seems to take great comfort from the fact that the cost of living index has shown infinitesimal declines over the last three months, and that the index is now back to the August 1951 level. Well, he is optimistic about inflationary pressures, too, and their having been brought under control at least for the time being. I must say that his optimism certainly could not have arisen from the amount of the decline in the cost of living index. I would be surprised if that were the case. Perhaps the registering of any decline at all is considered remarkable; I think so. Maybe that is what caused the minister to be somewhat optimistic.

This question arises: What has happened to the purchasing power of the dollar since the cost of living began its steady climb back in 1939? It will do us good to take a look at it. The purchasing power today of the Canadian dollar is only about 52 cents, as compared with the 1939 dollar. But the value of the dollar today depends upon what one wants to buy.

For instance, the food dollar is worth only 40 cents in terms of the 1939 dollar. And if one wishes to build a house his dollar is worth only 39 cents. A dollar spent in home furnishings will buy only 50 cents' worth, and the clothing dollar is worth only 47 cents. The rent dollar is higher, having a value of 70 cents in terms of the 1939 dollar.

Of course the minister or his parliamentary assistant will reply immediately to me, and I hasten to take it up right now because I know they will reply, by stating that although the purchasing power of the dollar has shrunk to the levels I have indicated, the average Canadian is earning considerably more dollars in 1952 than he did in 1939. I hasten to say that that is true. The figures show that the per capita income in the fiscal year 1938-39 was only $381, while in 1951 it was more than $1,000. So, while the value of the dollar has shrunk by nearly a half in twelve years, on the other hand the per capita income has increased 2½ times since 1939.

I imagine the minister would think he had us by the scruff of the neck in the light of those figures. It would appear, then, that Canadians generally are financially better off now than they were at any other time. And they probably would be, all right, if it were not for taxation.

Let us take a look at what happened to tax rates since 1939—and this is the third factor we must take into consideration. In the financial year 1938-39 the federal government taxed the average Canadian $39.12. Let that figure sink in, because it is important. Provincial and municipal governments taxed him another $30; so that the total for 1939 by municipal, provincial and federal taxation was $69.12.

By 1951 federal taxes alone amounted to $260 for every man, woman and child in Canada. When one adds to that what the provincial and municipal governments took by way of taxation—another $100—it appears that the total tax load carried last year by the average Canadian was $360. That figure is more than five times what it was in 1939.

[Mr. Low.]

So that when we consider all three of the factors—that is, the decline in the value of the Canadian dollar, the increase in the average earnings of the Canadian people, and the terrific increase in the tax load that has been imposed upon each citizen—there is only one conclusion that can possibly be drawn, and that is that the average Canadian is certainly very little, if any, better off today than he was thirteen years ago, in spite of the great progress our country is supposed to have made since the beginning of world war II.

So what good does it do us to boast to the world of an expected $22.5 billion of production this year? If this is going to go on, what good does it do us?

I have to ask this question: Why is it that on the average our people are little if any better off than they were thirteen years ago, while we boast of the wonderful progress our nation has made, our tremendously increased productive power, our new and expanded factories and machinery, and our new skills? But our citizens are not getting the advantages that these things should bring.

We Social Crediters make the claim that failure to hand on to the average run of Canadians the results of our technological progress flows mainly from an outmoded financial system which is incapable of reflecting in a financial way the abundance of real wealth which our people are capable of producing, and which they are willing and anxious to produce.

The financial policy which the minister persists in following produces, in the main, a ghastly fear of over-production. That fear grips the farmers of Canada today; and they dare not produce to the extent of their capacity because they fear—and quite rightly so—that the present situation would destroy their market. It certainly would.

Fear of overproduction is beginning to manifest itself not only in the farming industry but also in many fields, in spite of the world's need for food, and other necessities of life, and in spite of hunger and suffering in many lands. Did anyone ever hear of anything more paradoxical than that? Did anyone ever hear of anything crazier than that? And so long as the present financial policy governs Canada, that fear of overproduction will constantly be present to overshadow any short periods of prosperity that we may experience.

Back in the early thirties the low prices of farm produce made it almost impossible for even the most efficient farmer of that day to stay in business, and keep his head above water. The situation then was very largely the result of a large-scale withdrawal of purchasing power from circulation and, I might say, out of existence, coupled with a rigid restriction of credit.

These two things were then, as they are today, the only methods which orthodox financiers recognized to correct inflation. They will not recognize anything else. The inflation of the years immediately prior to 1929 was a direct result of the financial policy in effect during the first world war, and those years especially between 1924 and 1928.

Today farm prices, it is true, are relatively more fair in relation to taxes and interest rates; but the general price level is so high that there is widespread fear that the present abundant situation will come to a sudden collapse. This fear I am sure will prevent continued steady progress in our economic development unless something very different by way of a financial policy is laid out and followed in this country. Consequently the financial interests are doing their best today to convince the people that the remedy lies in heavier taxation and restricted credit. That is exactly the policy that did so much to bring on the depression of the hungry thirties. How are we going to change the end result by applying the same policies today?

When people begin to fear a business recession or depression some of them stop buying because they think prices are too high and probably will soon be lower. Others think that now is the time to make their hay and so they help to boost the inflationary spiral by charging all the traffic will bear by way of prices. The Minister of Finance and his advisers think that they can improve things by confiscating more of the people's purchasing power through heavier taxes, especially commodity taxes; but instead of helping the situation they succeed only in increasing prices.

It must be apparent to any thinking person who has delved into the mysteries of finance that all these distresses which I have mentioned, and more too, have been brought about by the mismanagement of Canada's financial policy. Inflation is the result of mismanagement in the issue and withdrawal of money purchasing power. Inflation is a man-made muddle and the only way it can be cured is by a man-made solution. The only solution that I know of, or anyone knows of, for inflation is the proper management of the financial policy of our country. I do not think there is any other way it can be done.

The government has blundered along for many years under the delusion that somehow money comes automatically into the consumer's hands in sufficient quantity to enable him to buy back all the goods that are produced. This just is not so. I would like to have some of the people who think that this is so accept my challenge and in this debate lay bare all the facts concerning that proposition.

The proper management of financial policy of Canada demands that the money to buy goods as fast as they come on the market should be supplied to the consumers, either in the form of wages and salaries, price discounts or tax remissions, or dividend arrangements including family allowances, old age pensions and perhaps others. If wages and salaries are insufficient then other forms of income would make up the deficiency. In this way, if the goods are wanted they will find a ready sale.

If enough purchasing power is in circulation, just enough and no more, to buy the goods we produce at fair prices, then business in the country will be steady and a general confidence is bound to result. I see no real reason why prosperity cannot last just as long as production can continue at a high level, provided of course a realistic financial policy is laid down and followed. That realistic financial policy must be a kind that will encourage productive effort. It must impose only a minimum tax on the efforts of the primary producers so that they will feel that it will pay them well to produce to the limit. That is what we must have if we are to supply the world's needs. Taxes that discourage wage earners from putting in their full time must be avoided.

What we need in Canada is a financial program that will induce enthusiastic production without the fear of punitive taxation or unemployment and depression, which are the inevitable consequences of the present financial policy. I bear testimony to this fact: There is a school of economic thought that would and could change the present policy so that abundance would not carry the present threat of unemployment, and so that inflation would not arise to rob the people of a large percentage of their wages. I commend to hon. members of this house a study of the social credit financial policy which I am certain would do the job.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

ROYAL CANADIAN ACADEMY OF ARTS

Mr. A. J. P. Cameron (High Park) moved the second reading of Bill No. 143, respecting the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Cameron: The purpose of this bill is very well set out in the explanatory note, which reads as follows:

> The principal purposes of this bill are to increase the number of academicians and to grant the associate members a larger voice in the affairs of the academy.
> It is proposed also to clarify the language of sections 2, 3, 4, 5 and 10 of this act.

A short historical review of the academy may be in order. The Royal Canadian Academy of Arts is the oldest official art institution in Canada. It was founded by the Marquis of Lorne, Governor General of Canada, in 1879, and was chartered by act of parliament on May 17, 1882. A new charter was granted in 1913. Its objects were and are:

> The encouragement of design as applied to painting, sculpture, architecture, engraving and the industrial arts, and the promotion and support of education leading to the production of beautiful and excellent work in manufactures.

Among its earlier achievements was the founding of the national gallery, and for a long time it was the only organization which sponsored regular art schools or classes in Canada. For 50 years it was the prime influence in promoting progress and taste in architecture.

Times have changed, and many of the original purposes for which the academy was established have been fulfilled or superseded by new purposes suited to modern needs. But its principal function remains that of "encouraging, improving and cultivating all the arts of painting, et cetera." Its present membership includes about 40 academicians and about 75 associate members, architects, painters, sculptors and designers in the graphic and decorative arts, leaders in their profession.

The 1913 charter is now found to be an impediment to development of the primary aims. The new constitution proposes changes in the construction and operation of the academy which will permit a more liberal approach to modern conditions and make its membership more inclusive and its management more elastic and democratic. These purposes it hopes to accomplish by increasing the number of academicians and by granting the associate members a larger voice in the affairs of the academy. The proposed bill also is intended to clarify the language of certain sections of the present act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

[Mr. Cameron.]

DIVORCE JURISDICTION ACT

EXCHEQUER COURT TO HAVE JURISDICTION IN ACTIONS ORIGINATING IN QUEBEC AND NEWFOUNDLAND

The house resumed, from Monday, April 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles for the second reading of Bill No. 4, to provide for the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court of Canada in matters of divorce.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time dissatisfaction has been expressed in this house over the method of handling divorce bills. I was looking at Hansard for February 16, 1914, when there was an interesting discussion, at which time Mr. W. B. Northrup, then the member for East Hastings, moved the following resolution:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the procedure under which divorces are granted by parliament and the subsequent unreasonable expense thereof are so unsatisfactory, besides being prohibitive to the great majority of the people of Canada, that the same should be taken into immediate consideration by the government with a view to reform, during the present session.

I might repeat if not the words at least the sentiments there expressed, that something should be done about this matter by way of reform and at this session. I listened with tremendous interest last evening to the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier), whose speeches I always follow with pleasure. In criticism of the hon. gentleman, however, I must say he spent most of the time attacking divorce as such. As far as I know no one was defending divorce as such. As far as we are concerned we simply want the consideration of divorce matters removed from this place, and we are not too particular where it may be removed to as long as the cases get proper consideration.

With a great deal of what my hon. friend said I can agree. He deplored the growing prevalence of divorce, and I have no doubt the headline will make good reading for my hon. friend's constituents in Quebec: "L'honorable député de Portneuf attaque le divorce." That is always a popular subject. He argued that transplanting divorce from the established divorce court of the other place and this house would facilitate divorce and result in more and more cases coming from the two provinces with which he was concerned. But my hon. friend made no attempt to prove that statement. It was merely an assertion, and I, for my part, can make the contrary assertion with equal vehemence and conviction.

The hon. member asserted that we must not set up a divorce court for the province of Quebec. With that I am in complete agreement. This house has no right to impose anything of the kind upon any province. But already we have a divorce court for citizens of Quebec and Newfoundland, which divorce court is to be found in the Senate and this house. We simply wish to transfer that court to another place, though certainly not to the province of Quebec. I think the statement that there would be any essential difference in the strain upon the conscience by transferring that court elsewhere, as compared with the method we now follow, is if not double-talk at least certainly the splitting of hairs.

The hon. member quoted with satisfaction and evident respect the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) when he spoke on this subject not long ago. I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister spoke on the rights of minorities, and said that the minority which generally speaking in Canada comprises the population of Quebec, which for religious reasons is opposed to divorce, must not have anything like this imposed upon it. I think that we all agree their rights must be respected. No one has suggested that the court should be imposed upon the province of Quebec or upon Newfoundland.

Then the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) went on to speak—I was proud to hear him—about the rights of the smaller minority, those who, in their personal lives, feel that a divorce is necessary. The Prime Minister said that for them some way must be found, and some way had been found in the procedure which we now use. But I would remind the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Portneuf that there is another minority that I think should have some consideration, and that is the minority of members of parliament in this house who accept their responsibility, and who try to give to these cases with which they are saddled proper consideration as they pass through our hands. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, why should we be asked—yes, I know in violation of some of our consciences—to deal with these matters when the hon. members who object on religious grounds abstain from having anything to do with them? I know that they have good precedents for such abstention. In the debate to which I have referred, and which can be found on page 828 of the Hansard for 1914, Mr. Rodolphe Lemieux, when addressing the Speaker, stated:

> You, sir, will have noticed that when a bill granting a divorce comes from the Senate to this house, the members who belong to my church do not take part in the debate and do not vote.

There is a precedent for the actions of many hon. members in this house. I am going to suggest to my hon. friends, who through their consciences and their religion are opposed to divorce, that they should prove their sincerity by remaining in this house and voting against these divorce bills as they are presented.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Wait and see.

Mr. Knight: The hon. member says that they will, and in a few cases I know that they do. In my experience, however, the majority do not take any action at all. May I make another suggestion, and it is this. If anyone is to abstain from voting then those who come from the other provinces ought to have the greater reason to abstain because the greater responsibility for dealing with these cases should rest with the representatives from the provinces from which these applications for divorces come. I come from a province in which there are local legal arrangements for handling divorces. Why should I occupy my time in dealing with cases which come here from Newfoundland?

Mr. Stick: It is the law of the land and you are supposed to carry out your duty.

Mr. Knight: The hon. member says it is the law of the land. We change the law of the land every day that we live and come into this house.

An hon. Member: And the constitution.

Mr. Knight: Oh, the sacred constitution.

Mr. Fulton: Every other day we change the constitution.

Mr. Knight: I have heard the constitution put up as an excuse for every form of reaction in this house, the sacredness of this constitution. Have we not made our arrangements during my time here so that we can change that constitution independently? To me no constitution is sacred. Constitutions change as time goes on. Tempora mutantur, nos et mutamur in illis. Times change, and we change with them. As we grow we change our constitution. When the present arrangement for divorce was set up, I am sure that no one visualized the state of affairs which the hon. member for Portneuf so vividly painted for us. If a procedure were being established today, with this growing number of divorces, no one would set it up on this basis because we could not handle such a large number of cases. If this House of Commons is to be turned into a divorce court, not a pseudo or phony divorce court as we have it now, but a divorce court giving decent consideration to the affairs of these people, then we shall have no time to deal with anything but divorce cases.

When this procedure was established no one visualized this state of affairs, yet my hon. friends say they must stick to the constitution. The constitution must bend to the exigencies of the times. Was man made for the constitution or was the constitution made for man?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): It is certainly more important than divorces.

Mr. Knight: I read in one volume of Hansard that when the arrangement was set up to handle divorces the hon. members of that day took two years to decide one case. Here we have forty, fifty or a hundred of these divorce cases passed en bloc, without any consideration whatever or, so far as I know, without a reading of the evidence in any particular case. Here we are passing them by the dozen or by the hundred without any consideration, at least in this place; the wheels of this divorce mill, which is the parliament of Canada, are grinding out these decisions.

We talk about the dignity and decorum of this house. In my time nothing has detracted from the dignity of this parliament more than this divorce business. Some members approach it with levity, some approach it with shame, but I think the most of us approach it with a feeling that we would be well rid of it. I was not elected to be an adjudicator in divorce cases; that is not what my people sent me here to do. I doubt if most of them know whether I have to deal with divorce cases at all. We are saddled with these cases, and I would urge that the members get them off our back, and the sooner the better. I agree with the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux when he said that we should reform this thing and we should reform it at this session.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Why not reform the people?

Mr. Knight: The hon. member for Portneuf, who seems to be seriously concerned about this thing, does not want to make the transfer to the exchequer court. He thinks that will be an unsuitable court. He may be right. I do not know anything about courts. I do not know anything about the law. I only know the things that I think and the things that I feel. Since the hon. member has interrupted me, I would like to ask what he has to suggest as an alternative?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I said it last night, no divorce at all.

Mr. Knight: The hon. member has nothing to suggest because he knows, whether or not he likes it, there is always going to be a scheme for the obtaining of divorces in this country and for the citizens of his own province. He has nothing to suggest. What he did suggest was that if we could not do away with divorce altogether, then we should leave the present arrangement as it is. This arrangement, as I have described it, is certainly not an ideal condition. I say that if we were to assume our responsibility—I believe I said this before—and give to those cases proper—and I emphasize the word "proper"—consideration, we would have time to do nothing else. I deplore the number of divorce cases just as much as my hon. friend.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): That is a good point.

Mr. Knight: The number of them is so great that it is a full-time job for some institution or some court, but I say that the court should not be this House of Commons which is, after all, fundamentally a legislative body. I therefore urge that this thing which has become a scourge to all of us should be removed from this House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will say "yea".

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will say "nay".

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

STATUTORY HOLIDAYS

PROPOSED OBSERVANCE OF DOMINION DAY AND VICTORIA DAY ON MONDAYS FOLLOWING JUNE 30 AND MAY 23

The house resumed, from Friday, March 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacDougall for the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Dominion Day Act and the Victoria Day Act.

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member speaks now he will close the debate.

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Statutory Holidays

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): When this bill was last discussed sometime before the Easter recess I said, just before nine o'clock, that in view of the divergence of opinion which had been expressed as to whether or not the days on which these holidays are celebrated should be changed from the actual dates, namely, May 24 and July 1 respectively to the Monday nearest to those dates, I felt it was not an appropriate time to proceed further with consideration of the matter. I think I said on that occasion that as far as I was concerned no other time would be any more appropriate. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I still hold that opinion; but since I have seen that the hon. member who sponsors the bill is anxious that debate should be closed—and I presume anxious that a decision should be taken—and since I am certainly not disposed, even if I were capable of thinking of sufficient things to say about it, to occupy the remainder of the time allotted for private members' subjects this evening, and if the hon. member is still of the same opinion, and unless somebody else shares my view, then undoubtedly a decision on the matter will be taken and we shall have the opportunity to indicate by our vote how we feel on the matter. Therefore I shall just take a very few minutes to summarize my reasons for opposing the bill at this time.

The subject matter of the bill asks us to authorize a change in the effective dates of the two holidays, both Victoria day and Dominion day. As to Victoria day itself, I must confess that I have not a very settled feeling that the date should not be changed, although I have a very definite feeling that the date of Dominion day should not be changed. After all, this country became one dominion under the name of Canada on July 1, 1867, and I have not yet heard any valid reason advanced why that date should not continue to be celebrated as the national holiday of this country, the date upon which in fact we became a nation.

The point is that if we make it the Monday nearest to that date we shall have six other dates besides July 1 on which that holiday could be celebrated; and I do not see that there is any other conclusion that could be drawn than that if we do that the holiday will lose its national significance. I share fully the views of those who feel that the question of giving another long week end is of entirely secondary importance. If it is our desire to give ourselves, the people of Canada, a long week end, that matter should be discussed as a separate issue. Just because somebody feels that it is desirable to have a long week end I certainly do not see that we should change the effective date of the celebration of our national holiday. As has been pointed out in the course of the debate, it may well be that Dominion day would be celebrated on the fourth of July, which would be the same day upon which people in the United States celebrate Independence day. Someone has to think of that possibility. We must realize just how meaningless under those circumstances Dominion day would become.

I understand the hon. member sponsoring the bill has indicated privately that he would be prepared to accept the suggestion that the bill be separated into two parts, so that the part affecting Victoria day might be considered separately from that affecting Dominion day. As I said before, I have no strong objection to that part of the bill dealing with Victoria day, although I feel to some extent the same argument applies. My feeling would be that if Victoria day is to be celebrated as a holiday it should be celebrated upon the day the occasion arises, namely May 24. If on the other hand we wish simply to have another long week end, and if that is the object of the bill, then to be logical let us not celebrate them as Victoria day or Dominion day but simply fix a long week end about that period of time, without any mention of the name of the holiday or the occasion being celebrated.

At the moment I would be inclined to vote against the suggestion to change both days, but I would not oppose a suggestion that the bill be divided into two parts, if within the rules of the house that can be done, so that the two matters could be considered separately. It is my information, based upon discussions I have had with hon. members, that perhaps a majority would oppose changing the date of Dominion day, while perhaps not so many would be inclined to oppose a change in the date of Victoria day.

As I have said, I feel the same argument applies to both days. While I have strong views in regard to Dominion day, and would vote against the bill in its application to that day, if for no other reason, I would not oppose a suggestion that the bill be divided into two parts so that the two matters could be considered separately. If that is the desire of the sponsor of the bill, and if there is any way in which that can be done, perhaps we might proceed with that in mind.

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall), the sponsor of the bill, is prepared to separate it, I shall have very little to say. But if he is going to interfere with Dominion day, then I am prepared to talk the bill out tonight. However, it will be all right if he is going to split it.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the unanimous consent given to my speaking at this time. Before the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) spoke, it was my intention to ask unanimous consent to make a statement. My statement is this, that I have listened to the objections made by various members to changing the date for the celebration of Dominion day. I rise to my feet with a scalpel in my hand, not only, with unanimous consent of the house, to amend the bill, but also to bisect it. If the house is prepared to give second reading, then immediately upon reaching the committee stage I would move that the title of the bill be changed to "An Act to amend the Victoria Day Act", that section 1 of the bill be deleted, and that section 2 be renumbered section 1 so that the bill would apply only to Victoria day, or May 24.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Dominion day.

Mr. MacDougall: It is my intention to move that the title of the bill be changed to "An Act to amend the Victoria Day Act."

The Chairman: I would point out to the hon. member that the proper procedure would be to move first that the present section 1 be deleted. We will come to a discussion of the title later.

Mr. MacDougall: In conformity with your suggestion I move:

That section 1 of the bill be substituted by section 2, and that section 2 be renumbered as section 1.

Mr. Graydon: If the substitution of section 1 by section 2 means the adoption of that section, then I should like to take this opportunity to make a suggestion. I made it in the debate last session. It will be understood that I am working against time, and with no desire to hold up the bill. I do not believe however that it should be passed in its present form. This year the queen's birthday is to fall on June 9, the Monday after June 5, when it is celebrated in the United Kingdom. This brings about a condition whereby the two holidays would come very close together.

I was wondering if the sponsor of the bill would consider having the holiday on the Monday before May 24 rather than the Monday after. Otherwise we would be hiving the holidays into a comparatively short space of time. It might be found at some stage that they were only a week apart.

I know this matter was discussed before, at which time the objection was raised that the suggested date for the celebration of Dominion day would interfere with the school year, and the examinations at the end of June. That would not apply however in respect of May 24. I would ask the mover to consider my suggestion, because I believe it would be preferable to have the holiday on the Monday preceding May 24, so that the holidays would be more staggered and would not come on succeeding week ends.

Mr. MacDougall: My only objection to the suggested amendment would be that there are ten provinces in Canada, all claiming banana belts. We know that all of them are not in banana belts. We know, too, that frequently May 24 comes in comparatively cold weather. I am thinking about the real benefit that would accrue by having the holiday later rather than earlier. I would not wish to mention any province that might be snowbound on the 24th of May, but I think all hon. members recognize that in some provinces the weather is still cold at that date. That was why I felt it would be more adequate if it were made "Monday following the twenty-fourth day of May."

Mr. Graydon: When we considered this bill before the question of the queen's birthday was not quite so prominent in our minds and it would seem to me that there is now an additional reason for the change which perhaps was not so obvious when the bill was being discussed before. I urged the mover to accept that change because it does seem to me to be rather ridiculous having two statutory holidays coming in the one week end, certainly in one year.

Mr. MacDougall: I accept the suggested amendment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has the hon. member given consideration to adding a clause providing that the bill shall not apply this year? In the event that it does pass I cannot see how it could apply this year having regard to prior commitments and plans and reservations that have been made.

Mr. MacDougall: I had not given particular consideration to that because I did not expect the bill would get as far as it has tonight.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that section 1 shall be deleted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that section 2 shall be renumbered as section 1?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that the section shall be amended by substituting—

Mr. Graydon: May I suggest that the word "following" in line 2 be deleted and the word "preceding" substituted therefor?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask why it is the "twenty-third day of May" instead of the "twenty-fourth day of May"?

Mr. Sinclair: The twenty-fourth could be a Monday.

Mr. Lennard: You will have your chance.

Mr. Graydon: Parliamentary assistant in a hurry.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On the title.

The Chairman: The title must be amended in conformity with the suggestions made.

Mr. Fulton: I wonder if the hon. member would consider another amendment by adding a new clause providing that the bill shall come into effect on the first day of January, 1953?

Mr. Knowles: I realize that the hon. member is a lawyer but it should be "act" instead of "bill".

Mr. Fulton: I stand corrected.

Amendment agreed to.

Title as amended agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the amendments be read the first time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the amendments be read the second time and concurred in?

Mr. Fleming: It is a little difficult for some of us to hear what has been said during the discussion of the amendments and I wonder if we could have the precise wording of section 1 of the bill as amended?

Mr. Speaker: The motion before the house is not debatable.

Mr. Fleming: I was not debating, I was simply asking that the amendments on which we are to vote should be read.

Mr. Speaker: I think that it would be quite in order to read the amendments, but they are not debatable. The title as amended is, "An Act to amend the Victoria Day Act." The preamble remains the same. Clause 1 has been deleted. Clause 2 is now clause 1 with the word "following" deleted and the word "preceding" substituted. A clause has been added reading:

This act will come into effect on the first day of January, 1953.

Amendments read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: It being nine o'clock, the house will resume the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to take part in this budget debate principally because I have had an opportunity during the last ten days to discuss the budget with the people whom I have the honour to represent. I found that they were not surprised, but they were disappointed. Newspaper articles had indicated that there were not likely to be any great changes, but the people in the lower income groups were hoping for some relief in the way of income tax because of the ever-increasing cost of living. Apparently the political calendar was such that it was deemed advisable to reserve these deductions in taxation until a more important time.

Mr. Murphy: Call a spade a spade.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): We may have an election in 1953 or 1954 when these so-called surpluses can be brought out to perform the service they have performed before and help to win the election. I recall that in 1949, at the most critical moment, the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) came through with a $25 million contract from Britain, to which I referred at the time as a phony contract. Today the farmers would be glad to see a real contract come through, because now we have lost every contract we had with Britain except in connection with wheat.

Yesterday, I understand, the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) threw into the laps of the provinces the problem of the cheese producers. Only this week in my own village a cheese factory which has operated for many long years closed its doors. Farmers are wondering just where this is leading, because after all the cheese industry was the market for much of the surplus milk produced during the summer months, and Canada's reputation as a producer of the finest Cheddar cheese was known far and wide.

The budget is a review of Canada's financial position and of the proposals to increase or decrease the income of the government for the ensuing year. As I said, many taxpayers hoped that a bit of relief would be forthcoming, but such was not the case. The only relief was given to pressure groups, of which I could mention three. Today we heard the Minister of Agriculture announce that there had been a further outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in Canada. That is another serious blow to agriculture, coming just at a time when everyone hoped the disease had been brought under control and that in the not too distant future we would be able to re-enter at least one of our exports markets.

In my opinion the tax burden is becoming unbearable. It is said, as I think I mentioned in this house once before, that about one-third of our working hours are required to pay taxation. In the minds of many people there is a question as to how far this can be carried. If we were to go the whole way and do as Russia does, and work for the government all the time instead of one-third of the time as we do in Canada, it would not be a very big step to take as things are today. People do not mind taxation to meet the pressing needs of the country. They do not mind taxation for national defence or to carry on the regular business of government, but they do resent being taxed for things that are not budgeted for. They do resent taxation when they see money wasted or thrown away. I am going to mention once again the $49 million provided for public relations, information, leaflets and publications that are sent out. In my opinion the press of the country could do the job as well, if not better, without any expense to the taxpayers. Probably more people would read it, too, because today most people take a look at all the literature they receive in the mail from government sources and unless it comes from the income tax branch they throw it into the wastepaper basket. Some would like to throw their mail from the income tax department there also, but they dare not. After the first shock was over and people had time to digest the budget a bit, and see that while the government were giving with one hand they were taking away with the other, I heard this comment. People were reminded of the funeral service, and the words "the Lord has given; the Lord has taken away". Another thing the taxpayers resent is the sort of thing which was announced just recently, the pilfering and looting going on at the military camps, especially Petawawa. When they begin to take railways and everything else they can lay their hands on, it becomes a serious matter.

I want to come back to our loss of markets, because after all it is only through exports that we are able to pay our taxes. Now that we have lost the markets for our agricultural products and prices are decreasing, I am wondering where the government is going to get all the money it needs. I have here a clipping from the London Free Press of April 16, and perhaps instead of interrupting the members from British Columbia will listen to this:

> Salmon contract with the United Kingdom not renewed, the canneries say. Great Britain will buy no canned salmon from British Columbia this year, it was confirmed today by a spokesman from the canneries.
> In 1951 Britain bought $6,700,000 worth of B.C. salmon. Australia, New Zealand, South Africa discontinued salmon orders some time ago, and other foreign buyers decreased their purchases.

Not long ago in the supplementary estimates we voted something over $1 million for the apple industry in Nova Scotia and British Columbia. The apple growers of Ontario and Quebec are paying their share of that amount. In other words they are subsidizing the growers on both coasts, and then finding themselves competing with this subsidized fruit which is sent into these two provinces. Of course one thing the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has achieved since 1939 is a fifty-cent dollar.

I feel quite sure Canadians would be prepared to buy a goodly amount of British goods in order to build up a market there for Canadian farm products, because in that way Canadian dollars would be made available to purchase goods in this country. But apparently it is the avowed purpose of this government to have nothing to do with the empire or the commonwealth, or with Britain, though for many years they have been the market for Canadian farm products. Since 1939 we have had 143 contracts in those markets. Now nothing is left but wheat. The contracts for apples, cheese, bacon and everything else have disappeared.

When we were dealing with the supplementary estimates an amount of $35 million was also set aside for the refinancing of Polymer at Sarnia. It was my understanding that this plant had been already financed, so it would seem that this $35 million has been just swept under the carpet so it can be dragged out again for the next election. Then there was the building up of the civil service pension fund, $75 million. I see no reason why that could not be used to assist. It was a way to hide an extremely embarrassing surplus that the minister had on his hands. I noticed that in his budget speech he forecast that in the years that lie ahead taxation could be reduced. I wonder if he is any more accurate in that forecast than he was in the forecast of a $30 million surplus for this year which turned out to be—you see so many representations about it that I do not know exactly—around $356 million. At one time it may have been ten or twelve hundred million. If the minister can be that wrong in one forecast, he can be just as wrong about the reduction in taxes in the years that lie ahead. I can forecast when taxes will be reduced, and that is just before the next election. I think the electors of this country are just as much aware of that as I am. They were taken in in 1949 by that method, but I do not think they will be caught so easily the next time.

The Minister of Finance was greatly concerned about having a healthy state, but it is just as necessary to have the taxpayer in a healthy state. If the taxpayer is not in a good financial position, certainly the tax collector's income is not going to be very good.

A day or two ago I asked a question of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) concerning the possibility of some aid to Pelee island. I am glad that on that occasion, while I could not debate the issue, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) took it upon himself to reply. The press mentioned the fact that I was the fifteenth Tory who had asked for some relief for the dwellers along the Great Lakes because of the damage being done by high water. Under the rules I was not able to discuss the issue, but could only ask questions. I want to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the government that not so long ago aid was given to Rimouski and Cabano because of the loss through fire. Fire insurance was available to the people of that area but Pelee island is in a different position, different even from the coast line on the great lakes. The principal part of the island is below the level of the lake so that once the water gets over the outer rim the whole of the island will be under water.

This island produces a lot of agricultural wealth. I suppose there is more income tax per farm paid into the coffers of this government from that area than from any other like agricultural area in Canada. In addition to that it is a spot where many United States tourists spend a lot of money during the summer months. We are always anxious to obtain United States dollars. Then those tourists, and some of the Canadians I presume, buy some of the spirituous liquors on the island. Not only the provincial but the dominion government gets some income from that. If this island were situated in the arctic or on the other side of the world, we would have a research group, technicians, military observers and experts on it. We would be spending money on it, but here we have an island which is peopled by taxpaying Canadians and the government refuses to spend any money on it. I believe that is one of the things that are bothering a lot of people back home, the fact that we have money for every other place in the world but we cannot protect our Canadian taxpayers at home.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): In view of recent press reports indicating a decidedly unconventional disposal of government property under the jurisdiction of the Department of National Defence, prior to yesterday it was my intention to move the adjournment of the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance. However, quite naturally the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) had the first go at that proposal and he was ruled out of order. I am taking your advice, Mr. Speaker. When you ruled the proposal of the leader of the opposition out of order you suggested that we would have an opportunity to discuss this matter of urgent public importance during the budget debate. This evening, therefore, I am going to take that opportunity for a few minutes and deal with a question which, in my opinion, and in the opinion of quite a number of the members of this house, is of considerable public importance.

In my opinion the Department of National Defence at this time has a tremendous responsibility to this house and to the people of Canada. When you realize that, under these conditions, the department will be spending over $2 billion of the Canadian taxpayer's money or something over half of the Canadian budget, I think that huge expenditure means that this house has to give the closest scrutiny to the estimates of the Department of National Defence. This house must not, because of time or personal convenience, attempt to limit discussion of this important matter. I believe that the members are entitled to complete and detailed information from the minister when his estimates are before the house. There is no question about that. Mr. Speaker, as a result of the recent press reports and the statement the minister made in the house yesterday, public attention across Canada is now focused upon the Department of National Defence.

[Mr. White (Middlesex East).]

I am sure that every member in this house was glad to hear the minister's statement concerning the recent unfortunate happenings at Petawawa, and the fact that a complete investigation was to be held at Petawawa and other places across Canada. I trust that even at this late date the minister's investigation will be thorough and complete and will cover all parts of Canada where national defence expenditure is taking place. I was very pleased also to hear that the minister has engaged a former deputy minister, who is known across Canada as an exceptionally competent chartered accountant, to assist the departmental officials in an examination of the records, accounts and accounting system. The members of all opposition parties in this house, particularly during the last two or three years, have expressed their concern over the methods and procedures and expenditures of the Department of National Defence. I think I am safe in saying that the minister has been inclined to brush aside those criticisms and those suggestions advanced by members of the opposition. More than that, I think members of this house have repeatedly expressed concern on a number of occasions about expenditures. Evidence from the Department of National Defence, as presented by officers of the various branches of the Department of National Defence, indicates that some of these officials were aware of the deficiencies in the administration of the department and were concerned about them. They were aware of and concerned about waste. They were aware of and concerned about duplication; and they realized that there was a certain lack of co-ordination within the various services of the Department of National Defence. They were aware of expenditures without any thought of the taxpayer who is footing the bill. To support that statement I just want to quote briefly from a few excerpts in order to indicate that even some of the minister's prominent officials were aware of the deficiencies in his own department. For instance, a naval memorandum dated October 26, 1949, read in part as follows:

> Instances are continually being reported of excessive demanding by ships and establishments for consumable stores. A good example is the extravagant use of paint without reference to the limitations imposed by naval general order 23.00/10.

I might say that the memorandum also drew attention to the growing tendency of asking for two things when one would do. When the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) was speaking in this debate this afternoon I think he gave a good illustration of this tendency when he mentioned the number—I forget the exact original figure;

I think it was some 60,000—of serving forks that were ordered for the use of the Department of National Defence. After protests on the part of the member and possibly on the part of others we finally were informed this afternoon that the order for approximately 60,000 was reduced to 14,000.

Then, Mr. Speaker, I can produce further evidence of the department's own willingness to admit waste. A national defence memorandum of May 11, 1950, stated in part:

> It is noted with great concern that the use of Form HQ 48, Department of National Defence envelopes, has reached the fantastic figure of approximately 300,000 a month.

That statement was made before the public accounts committee on May 24, 1951, and is to be found at pages 460 and 462 of the committee's reports.

In that connection I might say that my opportunity to investigate national defence is circumscribed and limited, but I remember on one occasion being at a certain headquarters. There I saw stacks and stacks of unused forms; there was a supply of forms that I would say was in excess of the ten years' requirements of that establishment. In the ordering of these forms, in the way they were stored, in the way they were being wasted—in one case even being used to light the fire—there was indicated a complete lack of concern about the costs of these forms and these supplies to the taxpayers.

Mr. Claxton: Which war was that?

Mr. Herridge: I will give the minister the name of the establishment after I have finished speaking. Once more, Mr. Speaker, I want to give proof of the unconcern about the costs and the waste of the taxpayers' money. Department of National Defence memorandum from the vice-quartermaster general to the deputy chief of the general staff dated December 13, 1948, as tabled before the public accounts committee on May 24, 1951, found at page 465 of the committee's reports, reads in part as follows:

> The question of whether or not we can afford to undertake these projects does not seem to come up for examination until they are reflected in our annual estimates.

I think that attitude of mind has been proven, Mr. Speaker, on a good number of occasions across Canada. I want to make this point. I am not this evening speaking of the Department of Defence Production. I have no hesitation in saying that I think Canada has been most fortunate in having as deputy minister of the Department of Defence Production Mr. Mackenzie who, from all accounts, has done an excellent job for this country. I might say at this time that I think it is most unfortunate that the public service of this country is in the near future going to lose his services to private business.

I think that attitude on the part of the military to plan extravagantly without concern about the cost to the taxpayer, to plan elaborately, or as this statement says, "to undertake projects that do not seem to come up for examination until they are reflected in our annual estimates", has been indicated on a number of occasions. I think the minister will know that on a number of occasions across this country the Department of National Defence has indicated the necessity for a certain building and then the tenders to construct that building have been too high for the money provided. Then the Department of National Defence has had to trim its sails a bit, do away with some of the frills or some of the unnecessary things, and finally the building has been constructed at a cost within the estimate and has proven quite satisfactory, and sufficient.

I want to be quite fair. I think the situation is rapidly improving, from what I have been given to understand; and I think the present minister has done a great deal to improve the co-ordination between the different branches of the various services of the Department of National Defence. But in my opinion there is no question that there is still a certain amount of interdepartmental jealousy that prevents the best of efficiency, and that is not to the advantage of the taxpayer or of the defence effort as a whole.

Even the Industrial Preparedness Association mentioned this fact in its bulletin of April, 1951, and at the same time said that the army was being starved for the benefit of other services. I understand that the Industrial Preparedness Association is an association of manufacturers working together with a view to securing some efficiency in the production of defence needs. You do not usually expect them to be critical of defence procedures; but in that bulletin of April, 1951, even they were critical of this aspect of the administration of the Department of National Defence. To indicate further that there has been interdepartmental jealousy and some lack of co-ordination, I want to quote as follows:

> At the air force's 25th anniversary banquet in Ottawa on April 1, 1941, a former chief of air staff, Air Marshal L. S. Breadner, publicly deplored the fact that the navy had infringed on air force priority in the air, and said of the decision: "It is ridiculous—absolutely ridiculous. Air forces the world over are not too well recognized even yet. The other services have not given up the fight to subordinate us one iota." The next day an embarrassed government official said that Canada's navy would continue to invade R.C.A.F. skies "whether Air Marshal Breadner likes it or not."

I think that this house must insist on intelligent co-operation and planning between all the services, regardless of the jealousies that may arise from latent traditions, priorities and things of that sort. We must insist on intelligent co-operation and planning in this department if we are to get value for the taxpayer's dollar.

I have quoted a few excerpts and given a few illustrations of the opinions of persons in important positions in the Department of National Defence. Before proceeding I want to quote one more person's opinion on matters of defence, an opinion that is respected in this house and in the country, an opinion of a gentleman with a long and excellent record as a professional soldier, and with an excellent parliamentary record. I refer to the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes). I find that on page 2810 of Hansard of May 8, 1951, the hon. member for Nanaimo said:

> I have never known an admiral, a general or an air marshal who did not begin by asking for more than his share of anything.

Who speaks with better experience in this house than the hon. member for Nanaimo? To ask for more is a natural failing. Perhaps some of us practise it in other directions. But who should know better than the hon. member for Nanaimo, and to whose advice should we listen more than to the hon. member for Nanaimo when it comes to speaking from experience in military affairs? This attitude mentioned by the hon. member for Nanaimo, and attitudes indicated by other statements I have mentioned, show a state of mind that spells waste and unnecessary expenditure of the taxpayer's money, unless it is arrested by the supervision of the minister's senior officials, by constant vigilance and by the greatest co-ordination between the various services.

This waste and unnecessary expenditure are caused without doubt, on the evidence of what has happened recently at Petawawa, by lack of satisfactory and adequate supervision, by lack of co-ordination, and without a doubt by the state of mind that I have mentioned, which has little regard for the cost of this service to the taxpayers; by the state of mind that fails to remember from day to day that this money is provided as a result of the work and the toil and the sweat of the producing and working people of this country.

Well, I have attempted to give some evidence to prove that waste and lack of co-ordination exist. I wish to give one or two illustrations of the state of mind that I have been talking about, the state of mind that I would say illustrates a complete lack of understanding of the working of the processes of democracy, of an understanding of the principles of government economy, and an understanding of responsibility to the Canadian people. The incidents I shall mention will be trifling in some instances, because this department is different from other departments. As I said before, it is different from the Public Works Department, where you can go and look at the wharf and see what you got for your money, or where you can go and look at the public building and see what you got for your money. Because of the necessity, and the proper necessity, for secrecy in some respects in the Department of National Defence, and because of the innate nature of the expenditure and the purpose of the expenditure, it is very difficult for a member of parliament, or for any person, to detect the expenditures of the Department of National Defence and be at all certain that the people of this country are receiving value for their money. It is on that account, Mr. Speaker, that I maintain that the heaviest responsibility, so far as public expenditure is concerned at this time, rests upon the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), and also because of the vast amount of expenditure and the peculiar nature of the department which he is called upon to administer.

I frankly admit, Mr. Speaker, that we all recognize the minister has a very heavy task, and that he has been working long hours for many months. We give him credit for that, and any suggestions we have to make from this side of the house are not made in a harping or critical spirit, but they are made in an effort to be constructive and co-operative in the administration of this department.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, the average member in this house, or the average citizen, has little opportunity to deal with big things, and in fact, in many respects, he is not competent to do so. But sometimes small events, small incidents, indicate a state of mind, as I said before, the direction in which the wind blows. I am going to bring to the attention of the house a few things that have come to my notice in travelling about this country, and I trust that in his examination of the situation the minister will continue to do all he can to stamp out this state of mind and to arrest its development. This is the state of mind that I mean, that does not consider the public purse. I got on a train once, a branch line, meeting a main line train. This is not recently. A colonel got out of the drawing room on the main line track and got onto the branch line train. The branch line train had no chair car. It just had two day coaches. He arrived on the train and he said to the conductor: "Where is the chair car?" The conductor said: "There is no chair car on this train, sir. You have to sit in this coach." In the coach there were the ordinary working men and their wives, the ordinary people of Canada. Well, this self-appointed nobleman straightened up and said "Impossible! I am not going to ride with these people." And he got off the train and he telephoned, and this country paid for a car to travel forty miles along a road parallel to the railroad because this gentleman was not going to ride in an ordinary day coach twenty miles to his destination. I just use that as an illustration. I am not suggesting that there are large numbers like that. That is the type of man who is not concerned with the expenditure of the people's money and does not understand responsibility in the real sense of the word.

I was coming to Ottawa for a session, and the train stopped at a prairie city for 40 minutes. Like most people, I got out of the train and walked around the station. I went to get back about twenty minutes before the train left. A C.P.R. constable was standing there. He said: "I am very sorry but you cannot get on. They are switching sleeping cars, or something." So we stood there. In front of me was a lady with a baby in her arms. Along came a brigadier and he said: "Stand aside, please." So the lady with her baby in her arms stood aside, and he went on to the platform and got in a coach. I said to the C.P.R. constable: "Why did you let him through and keep the mother with her baby in her arms standing here for twenty minutes?" He said: "Sorry, sir, that is orders; he is a brigadier." That shows a complete lack of democracy and of the things we stand for.

Mr. McCusker: Will the hon. member permit a question? I want to ask the hon. member whether that is the same colonel that he stated he had cleaning out his pigsty and his cow barn last year?

Mr. Herridge: No, it is not the same gentleman at all.

Mr. McCusker: That was recorded in Hansard.

Mr. Herridge: Quite right. I have just mentioned that a group of people were irritated by this lack of consideration, this thoughtlessness. You should have heard the comments of some of the elderly ladies around there, because they were not at all complimentary. One lady said, "Where does that red-headed woodpecker think he is going? What does he think he is?"

I mention this in all seriousness, because little things are things that disturb people and do not add to unity or to the development of a spirit in which we are all working together to the same end. When I got on the train I thought that I would see where this gentleman had placed himself. I found he had a drawing room although he was going only a hundred miles. Is it necessary to have a drawing room to travel a hundred miles on a train? I say that was a totally unnecessary extra expense.

I mention these things realizing that while the sums involved may not be large, they indicate the state of mind involved. I do hope the minister will do everything possible to check that sort of thing, because, while the amount involved may be small, it does bring about considerable public irritation and does not improve our defence effort.

I should like to deal with another matter brought to my attention because, while it is only a minor thing, it does indicate a lack of thought for the expenditure of public money. I was talking to a permanent army sergeant who is to be retired at the end of this year. This man told me he was going on a course which would last six months. I said, "What for?" He said, "It is a course in modern weapons", to which I replied that I thought it was a useless expense. Here was a man who was approaching 21 years of service and was being sent on a six months' course on the latest type of weapons, with a view to instructing others in the use of those weapons. Surely it is not in the interests of economy to give a course to a man who is about to go on pension. The giving of the course would have no value to the Canadian taxpayer, because in a short time this man would not be in the army. I mention this to show a lack of consideration for the taxpayer's dollar. When I mentioned my view to the man he said, "Well, why should I worry?" I had told him that I thought it was a totally unnecessary expense. However, I did not tell him who I was because, as I said before, I like to travel incognito.

All this indicates that there has to be a determined drive from the top to have some persons realize that this money is the taxpayer's money, and that it should be spent to the best possible advantage. I have every respect for the minister and his deputies. I believe his deputies are striving to do their best, and, while possibly under some handicaps, are making every effort to improve the services.

Then, I would pay my respects to a number of men I know who are serving in the reserve army. I know some good officers and men who are giving their evenings, and some considerable time in the summer, to assist in the reserve army, and I am convinced that they do not receive the credit they should. Those men give careful consideration to expenditures, and are trying to carry on with limited equipment, and with a view to developing a corps which can give service to this country.

I was greatly impressed recently by the keenness shown by some young engineering officers, and the concern they showed with respect to expenditures, and what equipment would cost. We have large numbers of those people in the services, and I pay my respects to them, to their efficiency and their integrity.

While it is our right and duty to criticize, I must say that in this country we are very fortunate, when we stop to compare the situation in this country with that in the United States.

Mr. Sinclair: Or anywhere else.

Mr. Herridge: No one questions the integrity of the minister or his officials. One does not hear things said in Canada about ministers and officials that he hears in the United States. All we question is procedure, methods, supervision and administration, and we bring these important things to the attention of the minister.

Mr. Claxton: It would be nice to have some names, too, so that we could check on the stories related. I would be glad to have them.

Mr. Herridge: I will give them. The hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker) seems to think this is a laughing matter. I would point out to him that this is a question involving the taxpayers' money, and that it is not a laughing matter.

Mr. McCusker: I was not laughing. When the hon. member spoke last year he referred to having two senior officers, a colonel and a major, cleaning out his pigsty and cow-barn; and when he was talking about the great expense of transporting staff I was wondering if, perchance, he was referring to those two officers who were cleaning out the pigsty and the cow-barn. I do not consider it a laughing matter when an hon. member is making insulting allusions to the army.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You were laughing, and several others, too.

Mr. Herridge: I did not make any insulting allusions to anyone; and I hope that is the last time the hon. member will play that record.

Mr. McCusker: Mr. Speaker, if we are to have it on the record, then let me say that I did not try to break the record; the hon. member tried to efface it from Hansard last year.

Mr. Herridge: I am trying to suggest some reforms here this evening. I am always in favour of reforms many of which we have not obtained to date. But, in so far as the hon. member for Regina City is concerned, I would have no hesitation in advocating chloroform.

Mr. Knowles: Pentothal is quicker.

Mr. Herridge: I suggest the minister should investigate such things as this, including the hours of work put in by administrative officers who are doing clerical work, with a view to finding out whether there are too many men doing too few jobs. I make that suggestion because I have heard a good deal of talk, and I do not know the facts.

I suggest that the minister should investigate qualifications for the receipt of flying pay. Along with the hon. member for Greenwood, I say there could be an investigation to see if there is any excessive use of telegrams and telephones. I believe the hon. member made a good suggestion this afternoon when he said that possibly many of these communications could be carried out by ordinary airmail.

Then, in connection with unnecessary travel, I realize of course the difficulty in centralization, that if there is too much centralization there is often not as much flexibility and efficiency. Unless there is a watchful eye on them all the time, there is a tendency on the part of some people to travel unnecessarily and to use expensive forms of travel. I do suggest the minister should go into this matter of travel, and any unnecessary expense in connection therewith.

Then the hon. member for Greenwood made a further reference to the unnecessary and wasteful use of paper and stationery. Waste occurs even in businesses of any size which are not checked up. It is so easy to stack forms, waste them and fail to use them properly. Also I suggest that he investigate the purchasing of gasoline for army motor vehicles, particularly when it has to be purchased in relatively small quantities.

We recognize that it is the minister's responsibility to have a complete investigation made of all the instances that have been brought to light. It is the minister's responsibility to adopt methods and procedures that will provide adequate supervision with adequate local responsibility. It is the duty of the minister and his officials to do everything to eliminate waste.

It is the duty of members of this house to get the facts and details so far as possible from the minister when his estimates are under discussion. We must watch as carefully as we can over expenditures and make constructive suggestions. Further than that, I think the Canadian people have a responsibility. At the present time their attention is focused on the Department of National Defence as a result of recent happenings at Petawawa, but that is not sufficient. If government, if parliament is to remain at a high level of efficiency and function properly the Canadian people must be concerned about the administration of the various departments of government. The Canadian people can play a great part by showing the government that they are interested and concerned, on this particular occasion, about the affairs of the Department of National Defence. They must show by continued interest that they are concerned that we obtain good value for the taxpayer's dollar.

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, there are two matters I should like to place briefly before members of the house. The first is one which I have brought up on other occasions during the past few years, the serious erosion of the shores of our great lakes. On February 12 of this year an important meeting was held at the Brock hotel, Niagara Falls. This was attended by municipal authorities and land owners along the shores of lake Ontario from Niagara-on-the-Lake to Toronto and by members of the Lake Land Development and Beach Protective Association Incorporated of New York state.

After considerable valuable discussion it was decided that the two governments should be petitioned to take immediate action. As far as the United States end of the business was concerned, the United States department of state approached the Canadian government on February 22 requesting that this matter be brought before the international joint commission. According to press notices of the following day the Department of External Affairs stated that this was not by any means the way to deal with this matter, that it should be dealt with in some other manner concerning which so far I am a bit in the dark. I have requested that correspondence between the two governments be produced but so far this has not been done. Sometime in the future we may learn the true picture.

Most certainly this is an international matter, it is not one for Canada to deal with alone. This business of passing the buck between the province and the dominion in connection with lakeshore erosion has been going on for the past seven or eight years. I feel that this matter is of such vital interest to Americans and Canadians living along the shores of our great lakes that it should be taken up by the international joint commission. I am unable to understand why the Canadian authorities did not agree to this when they were approached by the state department.

When the opportunity arises later this session I shall probably have a great deal more to say on this serious matter of lakeshore erosion. It is a serious matter because people are losing their homes and farmers are losing their fruit land. The great Niagara fruit belt is gradually being worn away, as I have stated before. Nobody seems to care very much about it as far as our governments are concerned, and I am referring to the provincial as well as the dominion government.

Another matter with which I wish to deal momentarily this evening will also likely receive attention later on. I think this calls for some answers from the government. Sessional paper 18A was brought down as a partial answer to some questions which I had asked this session. One question was:

> How many contracts for defence footwear were let from April 15, 1951, to February 29, 1952?

I also asked the amounts of the contracts, to whom they were let and at what price. I did not secure all the information that I desired because the return does not indicate the number of pairs of shoes contracted for, simply stating the amounts of the contract, the different firms to which contracts were let with the amounts, and the total amount.

At the present time the total number of our armed forces is under 100,000, and that would include all men, women and children. The total of the contracts awarded for footwear in this ten-month period was $15,292,241.70. I do not know whether members of the armed forces are provided with walking-out shoes, combat shoes, mess footwear, dress shoes and all that sort of thing, but if the shoes were contracted for at a cost of $15 per pair that would mean over one million pairs of shoes for the 100,000 personnel in our armed forces. That is over ten pairs of shoes for every man, woman and child. I include children because some of the contracts were let with baby footwear companies.

I think it is the duty of the government to inform this house as to the number of shoes contracted for in this period. I regret that I did not ask for the contracts let in a longer period but I thought that my questions would provide the information I desired. I think it is the duty of the government to provide this house with detailed information in respect to this huge quantity of footwear contracted for during that ten-month period, because to me that seems enough shoes to equip the armed forces for the next six or seven years at the present rate of enlistment.

As I say, my questions were not fully answered, and I would ask that the Department of Defence Production look into this matter a bit more thoroughly. I also understand that this answer merely indicates the amount of leather footwear procured for the armed forces, and does not include the rubber footwear also contracted for during that period. If the whole picture were shown, the amount might be far greater than is indicated by these contracts.

In conclusion I repeat that it seems to me an expenditure of more than $15 million to equip our armed forces with footwear, when they number well under 100,000, is exorbitant. This would seem to be just one more indication of the lavish way in which these defence contracts are being let and have been let for several years past.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Before I begin to talk about the budget I would like to say a few words in reference to what was said by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) and others in regard to defence expenditure. When the present defence set-up was discussed in this house I, along with others, argued that no one man in this country could handle the business of national defence and look after the interests of three departments, the army, the navy and the air force; and I have not changed my mind. Any man who tries to do that job, I do not care how brainy he is or how strong he may be physically, is not going to last very long. Anyone looking across the house at the present minister will realize that he has been asked to carry a load that has just about got him down.

When this set-up was being discussed I argued that at least there should be another minister, a minister for air. We are practically back to where we were in 1940. We are starting to re-organize our air force on a new basis, and judging by the recruiting campaign that is going on it is not going to be a small force. No minister can handle those three departments, check and sign the requisitions himself, and determine whether or not the money is being spent wisely. We did not get much support for our suggestion that another minister be appointed. Three deputy ministers were appointed, however, and they are doing a good job. They can handle the correspondence, but don't forget that when decisions are made or large requisitions come in, the minister has to look at them and decide. He has to make all the decisions; he also has to run around the country doing the inspecting and so forth.

At that time we suggested that a defence committee be set up in this house; not the public accounts committee, who merely take a look at the public accounts and try to check expenditures and so on, but a competent committee of this House of Commons. In my opinion such a committee should have been sitting, dealing with defence expenditures only as they are made from month to month. I believe such a committee would have been very helpful to the minister; and it might have helped prevent the sort of thing we are seeing at Petawawa. That leaves a pretty bad taste in the mouth of the average man who is paying high taxes. He does not object to paying high taxes if he knows he is getting something for them; but when he reads the sort of story that came out of Petawawa the average man is led to believe that instead of organizing an army, spending your money wisely and doing a patriotic job, you are just setting up a gangster machine which is in there to get everything it can for itself. It is pretty bad, and I hope the situation will be cleaned up soon.

However, I have no intention of taking a whip and starting to beat the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). I have a fairly good realization of what he is up against. I know it is not humanly possible for any one member of this house or any one man outside this house to go in there and do the kind of job that man is expected to do. The sooner the government smartens up and realizes that more help of a ministerial nature is required, the sooner we will get away from this gangsterism that is going on in connection with the unwise spending of our money. I still think that defence committee should be set up in this house. It should be meeting continuously and examining national defence so the house would be assured the money was being spent wisely, and kept informed as to the plans of the department.

I got up primarily to talk about the budget. Whether or not we agree with the minister, I like to see a job well done; and I do not think any member can deny that when the minister presented his budget he gave one of the best exhibitions of footwork I have ever seen in this house. I think that was the best speech he ever made, and I compliment him on it. He was right on the bit and was inspired that night. I admire a good job, whether or not we agree with all the minister said. It was pretty hard to catch him out then, but we have had a lot of time to think it over since.

I am not going into the facts and figures the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) dealt with this afternoon. I do not like to duplicate a job done by somebody else. To the extent that he could pull something out of the mess of words the minister put on the record, I think the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar did an excellent job of showing that taxes were not lowered but that in fact in the over-all picture there would be an increase this year. The hon. member showed that the budget was not popular and was not an election budget. But it is a good let-down now for a build-up later on, and that is not bad strategy either. I believe the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar made a good case this afternoon, and I am not going to duplicate it. We gave him the job of giving the main talk, and I think we should leave it with him.

However, I should like to say this on the question of medical expenses. I believe the minister slipped up a bit there. I believe that floor should have been taken out altogether. It seems to me a person should be able to charge all his medical expenses, and that there is a great deal of discrimination in the application of that feature of the budget. For example, in upping the ceiling the minister did give relief to the person who is able to go to the Mayo clinic, and who can write a cheque for a couple of thousand dollars. If you can go to Dr. Penfield and write a cheque for a couple of thousand dollars, you get some relief under the change made by the minister. However, by leaving that floor in the act the person who can merely take care of ordinary medical expenses gets little relief. In a lot of industries throughout this country there is a system of paying the doctor and the hospital by the check-off, just as you pay your taxes. In my end of the country that system has been in operation for a good many years. It is a group system whereby the doctor is paid $52 a year and there is a subscription rate for the hospital of $52 a year. This $104 is paid as an insurance, and perhaps 50 per cent of the people who pay it never receive any benefit from it because fortunately they have no sickness. They pay in order to help the fellow who is sick most of the time. Out of an income of $1,600 or $2,000, that $104 per year is a heavier burden than the $2,000 for the man who can write that cheque and who receives exemption for it under this new regulation.

If the minister had removed that floor and had permitted the deduction of the type of payment I have described for medical expenses—the system I am talking about only covers ward charges and there is an addition to that if you happen to go into hospital but at a lower rate than if you were not a subscriber—the ordinary man would have obtained some relief. I still think the minister should give consideration to that. It is seldom that a budget is changed, but if the minister wants a good election budget next time he should remove that floor so that those in the lower income brackets who try to maintain some kind of insurance for themselves against sickness will be able to write that off for tax purposes.

There are other items that I should like to bring to the minister's attention. Practically every business in this country is allowed to write off the purchase of new equipment or a Neon sign in so far as income taxes are concerned. These things can be charged to operating expenses. Commercial travellers can write off their expenses in travelling, and make certain deductions for the use of their cars. I should like to bring a specific case to the minister's attention. In this budget he has permitted the deduction of union dues for tax purposes, and that was welcome. I have had representations, and no doubt the minister's department has also always had representations from industrial workers on many occasions. I am going to take the coal miner as an example. He has to purchase his explosives with which he blasts the coal. This runs into quite an amount of money during the year. Secondly, he has to purchase a certain type of hat which he buys from the company. It is a hard fibre hat to protect his head and save compensation costs in the event something falls on him. In addition to that, he has to purchase a certain type of shoe with a metal toe-cap. Then, if a 180-pound machine falls on his toes it will not crush them but merely jam them up a bit. The explosives, the hat and shoes are the tools of the miner's trade. They are a part of the machine of production. It is necessary for him to spend that money and secure the equipment in order to produce coal.

If the merchant and the commercial traveller, all those persons doing business, are permitted for tax purposes to write off the money spent on expansion or improvement of their business, I do not see why the minister would not give serious consideration to permitting the coal miner to deduct the cost of purchasing that type of equipment. I am putting this on the record so that when the next budget is being prepared the minister can give some consideration to what I have said.

While I am on that point, I should like to say that democracy is never taken from you in one blast. It is slowly but surely chiselled off a little at a time. I was rather disappointed that the government did not give serious consideration to the vote of the house concerning deduction of medical expenses. I say that in all sincerity. I remember the vote of this house on the milk subsidy. Later on, it was changed by order in council. I remember that the veterans affairs committee brought a recommendation into this house that a half acre of land would be the requirement to come within the scope of the small holding section of the Veterans Land Act. This recommendation was accepted in the house and a short time after we left here, to my disappointment, the land requirement was stepped up by order in council to three acres, thus eliminating hundreds of applicants who would have qualified under the recommendation made by the veterans affairs committee. I am afraid that in this day and age, when the tendency is to usurp the powers of parliament as a government by the people, you are setting precedents, and if you allow that to continue you will arrive at the position where the House of Commons will be a place in which people can talk but not much attention will be paid to them. Slowly but surely the supremacy of parliament is being lost. It is a development that I do not like to see.

When there is a free vote in this house I believe the government is morally obligated to accept the results of that vote. If a vote were taken in most fraternal organizations or trade unions across the country, I do not think there is any officer or any executive who would for one moment consider that they could take action contrary to the vote cast by the membership. I am a little bit leery of this business of a small group like the cabinet taking the power unto themselves to say that the House of Commons did not know what they were doing when they voted. Three times since the end of the war that type of action has been taken, and I suggest that members on the government side, particularly the cabinet, stop and think about it. If that sort of thing continues there is not much use in the members being here. I want to leave that thought with the members of this house because democracy is chiselled off very slowly. For some considerable time I have seen growing up in North America, not so much here as in the United States, a kind of managerial society. They are managed from the outside. This business of not paying attention to what goes on in the house, and ignoring the votes of this house, is in my opinion a bad development. It certainly should be stopped by the members.

There is another item which I should like to bring to the minister's attention. I went through his budget speech and the resolutions, but it is rather difficult to find anything that you can get your teeth into. As I said before, the minister did a good job in presenting it. It is not popular in the country; but when you ask someone to tell you just exactly what is wrong with it, the only thing he can say is that we did not get a tax reduction but we got a slight increase. When you go over the budget, it is not easy to say what is wrong with it. It is generally the things that are not in it that you have to quarrel with.

On several occasions I have had correspondence with the department about allowing as a tax reduction the housekeeper of a person who maintains a home and who is obliged, through sickness—his wife being ill and in hospital—to hire a housekeeper. I have written to the department about the matter and I have a letter here in my hand—I am not going to read it—with bills attached, wherein this person showed that the cost of maintaining his home had gone up considerably because he had to hire a housekeeper, pay her wages and maintain her, and at the same time had his wife in hospital and was paying a hospital bill.

I figure that that housekeeper is a legitimate expense. In my opinion it is a more legitimate one than new equipment and that kind of stuff that is purchased at a plant. The home is a first requisite of the nation; without the home to hold you together as a nation you have not got anything. That man is struggling to maintain his home for himself and his family while his wife is ill. If you can write off the expense of maintaining your father or mother who may be dependent on you—and that is just a minor expense compared with the cost of maintaining a housekeeper, paying her wages and maintaining your wife in an institution—in my opinion you should be able to write off this expense.

I wrote to the department and I have a reply dated as late as April 16 of this year. I am just going to read that reply because I think it is rather cold-blooded. It reads:

Dear Mr. Gillis:

In reply to your letter of April 7 on behalf of Mr. Fraser Goodwin of Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, you are advised that the amount expended by Mr. Goodwin for a housekeeper is a personal living expense of the taxpayer.

The Income Tax Act specifically provides that no deduction can be allowed from income for personal living expenses.

It is not personal living expenses at all. It is an abnormal expense that cannot be budgeted for. It is likely to hit you at any time, or it may never hit you. I agree that the person who wrote that letter for the director general of the assessment branch is correct when he says that there is in the Income Tax Act no provision for exemption for that particular type of expense; but I am asking the minister now to give consideration to permitting that type of deduction if and when he has the problem under consideration. Maybe he could bring in an amendment when the budget resolutions are up for consideration, and I strongly suggest that he should do so. This is the type of case that creates a great deal of hardship in the home where a person with a small income is obliged to employ a housekeeper in order to maintain his home.

I have here another resolution, and no doubt the minister has it. It is from the office of the city clerk, Fort William, Ontario. It has been circularized all over the country. The copy that I have comes from Sydney, Nova Scotia, and it deals with that question of federal aid to education. I am not going to argue that question. It has been argued by several members in this house, through a resolution. I put my opinions on the record, and I stated that it is a matter of either federal aid or a revision of the tax agreements as between the provinces and the dominion. I am convinced that there is no way to solve the problem of the cost of education in this country unless it is centralized with the federal government and grants are made to the provinces, earmarked for that purpose, the administration being done in the provinces.

In this resolution it is suggested that the total cost of education in the country should be paid out of income tax. I am not particularly anxious about specifying what particular tax it should come from; I think it should come out of general revenue. I am bringing that matter forward again because it is a serious problem, particularly in the maritimes, and I hope that the minister is thinking about it when the new tax agreements are finalized, so that the provinces which desperately need aid may get a proper revision in their agreements until such time as some of the provinces who oppose federal aid smarten up and get around to the point of realizing that it is absolutely necessary.

I have quarrelled a bit with odds and ends, and I never like just to oppose without having something to propose. Tonight I am going to say a few words with regard to new methods of financing that I think are necessary. I have spoken before in this house on the same matter. The reason that I cannot quarrel so much with the minister over the budget that he brought in is that, following the methods of financing in this country as agreed to by most of the members in the house, he has to get his taxes in a certain way and he has to spend them in a certain way; it is the orthodox method and it has to be carried on in that way. When the Industrial Development bank was proposed in this house I think maybe I was about the only one in the house that opposed it. I opposed it on the ground that it was just another adjunct to the chartered banks, that it was never going to mean much in the development of this country, and that it was an organization that was being set up to underwrite doubtful investments. I said that it would provide some plant expansion but that it would create no new industry in this country. That has been the history of it since it was set up. In the maritime provinces the bank did not even establish an office. Anyone who could get a loan from that Industrial Development bank could get it through the chartered banks because he had to have collateral to back it up. As to creating any new industry, or as to being of much value in the creation of small subsidiary industry at least, the Industrial Development bank has not accomplished much.

At that time I suggested that, instead of an Industrial Development bank, what was needed in this country was a national co-operative bank, creating a new chain of finance. I am firmly convinced, and have been for a good many years, that changes are coming in the economic structure of North America, whether we like it or not. There is only one way in which you are going to expand democracy and hold onto it, and that is by giving the people of this country more ownership; by that I mean more ownership in homes, in financial institutions and in the development of the general co-operative movement. I have been convinced of that for a good many years. When a man owns his home he has his roots in the soil; he is a citizen; he belongs to the country and to a certain part of it.

There are thousands of credit unions across this country. They have developed a lot of brains in that field of finance in the way that they see it. They have amassed a lot of capital. The co-operative movement is today proposing—and I know that representation has been made to the government—the setting up of a national credit society to co-ordinate all of the credit movement across this country. They have been turned down on that application; but the time is coming, in my opinion, when it should be done. Just while I was home over the Easter recess I attended a meeting in the city of Sydney where the Sydney credit union—there are four of them in that city—with a membership of about 2,000 had purchased a new hall. It is fitted up like a modern bank. It is as good looking inside as any of the banks that I see in this city. It is modern in every way, and fully staffed. We had Dr. Watson Kirkconnell, president of Acadia university at the present time, there. He was the main speaker. Well, nobody can accuse him of being a socialist. I just want to read a little bit about what he had to say at that meeting. Knowing the gentleman as well as I do, I was a little bit surprised to hear him express the views that he did express at that gathering. In one part of his speech Dr. Kirkconnell had this to say:

> Dr. Kirkconnell said one of the most notable features of the credit union system is the extremely small margin of losses through bad debts. In Prince Edward Island, for example, loans from 1936 to 1949 totalled nearly $1,500,000 and the uncollectable loans $1,041, a loss of one-fourteenth of one per cent. New Brunswick in 1946 reported loans written off since inception of $2,116, or one-fortieth of one per cent of a total of over $8 million.
> The Sydney credit union was launched in October, 1935, and since that time has acquired 2,000 members and assets of slightly over $350,000. Since its inception it has loaned out $1,750,000 and during that time has written off less than $900 in bad loans.

That is only just one small credit union in that city where there are four of them. The island of Cape Breton has a chain of them. The province of Nova Scotia has a chain of them right across the province, linked up with a central credit union league in the province, where they are trying to arrange long-term loans. That is true in New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and clean through to British Columbia.

This is a new chain of finance, and what I suggested, instead of the Industrial Development bank, was to set up a national co-operative bank. This is not new. They have had it in Europe for years. The United States has a national credit union act today, similar to the one that the Canadian credit movement is looking for at the present time. If that organization was set up on a national scale, all of the credit unions across the country could be members of it. If shares were sold to the general public at anywhere from $10 to $100 it would give everybody in the country who wanted to participate an opportunity to become members of the new chain and use that co-operative money to develop small subsidiary industries across this country that you cannot find risk capital to undertake. If that were done it would, in my opinion, be driving the roots of democracy further into the ground by giving people ownership in the development of new wealth in the country. It would also help by setting up a yardstick for the chartered banks.

In my opinion the government annuities have done much to keep the old line insurance companies in balance in regard to their rates, and so forth. The government has already set a precedent by going into crown corporations. In my opinion Trans-Canada Air Lines would never have been developed if it had not been for government initiative and government money. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is another example and so is the Polymer Corporation at Sarnia, and also Canadian Arsenals and atomic energy, and now television. These are good examples, in my opinion the best examples on the North American continent, because every one of them is successful. They were properly developed. In my opinion the government should give serious consideration to the request from the credit union movement across this country to set up a national credit union act to utilize the brains and the money that are now found in that movement, to give it proper national direction and assist in developing industry in this country that risk capital will not touch.

I hope the minister is listening, and I hope that he will give today's Hansard to some of his advisers, and check the whole matter, because the credit union movement has arrived at the position where it is demanding this. They know they are ready for it. I consulted them three years ago as to whether this kind of thing should be pursued, and they said they were not ready for it. But they are ready, and they made application for it, and they have been rejected by the government. Of course it may be that the government was not ready for the presentation because they had not studied the matter as well as they should. I trust that the government will give serious consideration to what I am talking about at the present time, because I think the time has come when we shall have to start giving the people more ownership.

I myself have never objected to the wealth that the big corporations had. What I have always objected to is the power they had to prevent the creation of new wealth by the people themselves. This credit movement now has sufficient capital at their disposal. They have linked themselves up on a national scale so that they can act for interprovincial purposes and develop small industry or big industry. It is a step in the right direction. It is driving the roots of democracy further into the soil, and in my opinion that is the only way democracy can plan, because you will go either backward or forward. A backward step is a step back towards fascism. Do not make any mistake about it; fascism or communism is not the product of any particular country; it is the product of a system, and the system being older in the countries where they capitulated to these ideologies is an indication of what can happen on this continent unless we smarten up and get more ownership into the hands of our people, give them some incentive and establish them as good citizens with roots in the soil of this country. In my opinion that is the only way you can continue to expand democracy. The only way it can be done is through that ownership as far down as you can get it in the proper direction.

I still think that the minister is not out of the woods so far as inflation is concerned. He has a right, a legitimate right, to ask me: Well, what do you think should be done. You do not think that we have got inflation stopped, and all that kind of thing. I am going to put back on the record what I think should have been done. We recommended this in the last budget and in the budget before. Before we are through with this business of inflation and deflation we are going to have to carry out this kind of program.

I believe there should have been a renewal of price controls with subsidies to bring down the cost of essentials. I believe that will have to be done sooner or later. I believe that there should be some regulation preventing any further general increase in rents. That is another scare to most of the people of this country who are renting homes. Go to Montreal, Toronto, or to any of the larger cities where rent controls are handled by the provincial governments or by the municipalities. They are not very effective, and there is a general fear of eviction on the part of our people at least once a year.

I believe you have taken some steps to prevent price fixing by monopolies, and I hope that this resale price maintenance will be followed up. It is at least bringing the rule of law for the first time into the field where most of the money of the average person is spent. We enact laws to prevent people from picking our pockets, robbing banks, slugging us on the street, hijacking, and all that sort of thing. But where 80 per cent of our money can be filched from us by inflated prices and crooked practices, we have done nothing. I believe that if resale price maintenance is followed up it will establish a rule of law that will be respected by those who have been fixing prices and who have been robbing people indirectly in the past.

I believe the Winnipeg grain exchange should have been closed to eliminate speculation in foodstuffs. I believe it was LaGuardia who said some years ago, in discussing the possibility of feeding the rest of the world, that if he had his way he would close down every grain exchange in North America.

I believe in a wage program worked out with trade union representatives to help hold the price line, while assuring workers of a fair income, and I have stressed that time and again. I have said that each industry should have an industrial council which would meet with the Department of Labour, and that would have full knowledge of the economic picture, and what the continued demand for wages would mean in the field of inflation. I believe that an industrial council should have been set up right after the war, and in time we will have to get around to it.

Then, I believe in a minimum price program worked out with farmers' representatives, to ensure primary producers a fair share of the national income. The committee on agriculture does that to some extent, but I believe farmers would be more satisfied if they had direct representation.

Then, there are other measures such as credit restrictions, and the like. The government has already taken some steps in that direction.

In conclusion I would urge that the minister and his department take a look at the possibility of introducing a national credit union act. They should examine the movement right across the country, and get the facts and figures. Let them see the large number of people who, voluntarily and in their spare time, have studied this system of finance, through groups, and have perfected an organization second to none across this country today. Let the minister see if such an organization could not be advantageous to the whole country, if it was linked up on a national scale, so that interprovincial negotiations could be carried on for the development of the country and the benefit of small industry—and perhaps for big industry, too, because there is a considerable amount of money involved in it today.

I trust the time is not far distant when I will see the minister introduce a bill along these lines—because, if he does not, sooner or later I shall do it myself, and have a vote of the house recorded in connection with it.

Mr. Sinclair: I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Fulton: There is a quarter of an hour yet.

Mr. Abbott: It has been a long day.

Instructions have also been given to forward to the department for examination before permitting entry a sample from any shipment which might reasonably be considered as prohibited under the provision of tariff item 1201, if not on the prohibited list. The result has been that publications on the prohibited list have not been allowed entry into Canada.

TREATY OF PEACE (JAPAN) ACT

PROVISIONS FOR CARRYING TREATY INTO EFFECT

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide that the governor in council may do such things as to him appear to be necessary for carrying into effect the treaty of peace between Canada and Japan; and for that purpose the governor in council may make appointments, establish offices and make orders or regulations; and to provide further that any expense incurred in carrying out the treaty shall be defrayed out of moneys voted by parliament.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS AND ESTIMATES OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED TRANSPORTATION LINES

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved:

That a sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, be appointed to consider the accounts and estimates and bills relating thereto of the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, and Trans-Canada Air Lines, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys; and that the said committee be empowered to send for persons, papers, and records and to report from time to time and that notwithstanding standing order 65, in relation to the limitation of the number of members, the said committee consist of Messrs. Benidickson, Bourget, Carter, Cavers, Churchill, Cleaver, Dumas, Follwell, Fraser, Fulton, George, Gillis, Healy, Helme, James, Knight, Macdonald (Edmonton East), Macdonnell (Greenwood), McCulloch, McLure, Mott, Mutch, Picard, Pouliot, Thomas.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before this motion is voted on, Mr. Speaker, may I say just a few words? They will be in the form of a question which I hope the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) will be prepared to answer.

The minister will recall that a few weeks ago, during the course of this session, a delegation on behalf of the retired employees of the Canadian National Railways presented the claim of pensioners in the lower brackets for some increase in the amount of their pension. That delegation waited on him after the announcement had been made of the new Canadian National Railways pension plan which makes provision for improvements in the pensions of those still in the service. The new plan also makes provision for improvements in the pensions of those who have already retired if they were members of a contributory plan when they were at work, but, as the minister knows, there is no provision for improving the position of those who are already retired on the sum of only $25 a month.

As the minister will recall, a day or so after that delegation waited on him I asked him, on the orders of the day, whether consideration would be given to their request that something be done to increase the amount of their pension. I pinpoint the whole question that I am now addressing to the minister to that one group, namely, those for whom no other provision has been made—in other words, those who are still on only $25 a month and at the moment have no prospect of any increase. When I asked the minister in the house, on the orders of the day, whether consideration would be given to that request, he said that it would. I forget whether he made that as a promise to me across the floor of the house or whether he simply reported that he had promised to the delegation itself that the consideration would be given. At any rate, that was the indication. I wonder whether the minister can now say whether that consideration has been given and whether any progress is being made.

From such information as has been made public, I think it is fairly clear that nothing can be done for this group that I am speaking about—those on only $25 a month—by the Canadian National Railways itself. If anything is to be done it will have to be done either with the assistance of the government or by the government itself.

The minister knows how serious is the plight of this group of people. It seems unfortunate that when others have had their position improved, those who need it most have had no assistance at all. I hope the minister is in a position to give us a report of some progress on their behalf.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Probably it might be more in accordance with our proceedings if the minister spoke at the end and closed the debate. If any other members wish to speak, I think they should do so now.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, last night when the order of business was announced by the leader of the government, no mention was made of the motion which has now been brought before the house. Some of our members made inquiries with respect to this motion, and took it for granted that it would not be proceeded with today. Some of them are anxious to speak on the important matters with which this resolution has to do. In view of the fact that we did not have the ordinary notice, I would ask the minister to agree to adjournment of the debate. We are not anxious to delay the matter in any way, but we did not have any intimation that the motion was coming on today. For my part I should be glad to move the adjournment of the debate in order that we may take it up again as soon as possible.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I say to the hon. gentleman that my experience has been that in the past it has not been the practice of the leader of the house to announce the discussion of this resolution. It has I believe been taken for granted that it would be discussed on the day on which it is presented, or the following day. However, I am not going to raise any objection to my hon. friend's suggestion. If he feels that there are some members on his side of the house who should have an opportunity to speak, I am quite satisfied that such should be the case.

I would hope, however, that it would be possible to have the debate tomorrow, because I have already indicated to the officers of the Canadian National Railways that we would be ready on Monday to deal with their budget and other matters concerning the business of the railway. It is therefore important that the resolution be disposed of as quickly as possible.

Mr. Graydon: Tomorrow will be quite all right.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

CHINA

TREATMENT OF CANADIAN NATIONALS BY COMMUNIST AUTHORITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister with reference to the statement he made to the house on Monday, April 21, concerning the conditions of treatment of Canadian missionaries, largely, in China. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is in a position to make any further statement amplifying what he said at that time. The reason I ask the question is that information has just reached me, which I have not been able to pass over to him, to the effect that both the numbers of those in prison and the conditions of imprisonment are considerably more disturbing than would appear from the Prime Minister's statement. There have, I believe, been factual reports in the past on which my information is based—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fulton: As I say, I have not had an opportunity to send this information over to the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Fulton: I would appreciate it if he would indicate whether he would look into the matter and perhaps make a further statement at a later date.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I never give the house anything but the information I get. My sources may not be the same as those of the hon. member, but I can assure him that the information I gave him was that obtained through official and semi-official sources; and to the best of my knowledge it is accurate information. If the hon. member has other information and will communicate it to me, I will pass it on to those from whom I obtained what I communicated to the house, and will report later upon it.

LIVESTOCK

FLOOR PRICE ON HOGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture in connection with the floor price on hogs; I have already brought it to his attention. In the province of Saskatchewan—and I think it is general—although the floor price has been fixed, as low as $14 a hundred is being paid by the packing companies. Will the minister say what control the department has over the packing companies to make sure that the farmer receives the floor price? What is to be done by farmers who are being denied the price fixed by the government? I think this abuse is generally taking place and it deserves consideration.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to notify me of his question and to send me the slip which the farmer sent to him. It indicates that on the 17th day of April the farmer received $14 per hundred for three extra heavy hogs. I would just point out that a special arrangement was made after the foot-and-mouth outbreak to the effect that hogs could be allowed to get heavy, and that would not affect the grading. Notice was given three weeks in advance that the condition would end on the 19th day of April. It was two days prior to the 19th day of April that these hogs were delivered, but, according to the records on this slip, they were extra heavy.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The three of them weighed how much?

Mr. Gardiner: They dressed at 204, 205 and 201 pounds, and the extra heavy runs from 186 to 195 pounds. I think the only thing for this farmer to do is to write to our department; we shall check with the packing house, and if there is any possibility of adjustment, the adjustment will be made. It has been made in a number of cases.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE—FURTHER OUTBREAK IN SASKATCHEWAN—MEETING OF AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): May I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture? It arises out of his statement yesterday in connection with the foot-and-mouth disease outbreak in Saskatchewan, in which he said it has been established that the disease was transmitted from the area in which it was originally found. I seem to recall that the minister or someone said that it came from frozen meat which originated in the original quarantine area. That may not be right, but I should like to have the minister clarify it and indicate how the disease was transmitted from one area to the other, and on what date it left the original area to go to the new area of outbreak.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I hesitate to make a statement on a report of this kind, which may not be absolutely in accordance with the facts—because you can scare people too much these days by saying certain things. I am quite prepared to discuss the matter with my hon. friend and give him any facts which I have, rather than make a general statement with regard to it at the moment.

Mr. Wright: Can the minister give us any indication as to when the agriculture committee will meet to deal with this matter of foot-and-mouth disease? We were told it would meet immediately after the Easter recess.

Mr. Gardiner: I had hoped to be able to suggest to the chairman of the committee that the committee be called the week after next, until this new case was discovered. I am not too sure now that we could get the officials away from the area to bring them here that soon. My suggestion would be—and I think it has already been discussed with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe)—that the committee be called together, and, if we are not able to deal with that question at that time, that we go on with the report of the wheat board or with some other matter which is to be referred to the committee, and bring the matter of foot-and-mouth disease on as soon as we can.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ASSISTANCE TO WESTERN FARMERS IN SEEDING AND HARVESTING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour. Will the government take immediate steps to provide necessary help for farmers who must carry out seeding and harvesting operations in western Canada within the next few weeks? Will the government again make members of the armed services available for such work?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): The hon. member kindly sent me notice of his questions. As to the first question, there will be rather a special farm labour situation in some areas of Saskatchewan over the period of the next several weeks, arising particularly from the additional requirements of spring harvesting operations now in process, which are in addition to the usual spring farm labour needs.

The agricultural employment officers of our national employment service in the prairie region are working hard on the recruitment of labour to meet this shortage, in conjunction with provincial agricultural officers. A concerted effort is being made to meet the short-time requirements—because it will only be a short time—from within the prairie region. Our officers are optimistic that as a result of these efforts there will be no serious shortage.

I would ask my hon. friend to suggest to any farmers in need of help that they get in touch with their provincial agricultural officer or with our nearest national employment officer, if they have not already done so. While the list of unemployed at our offices in the prairie region is down by 4,677 as at April 17, as compared with April 3, two weeks before, there are still in the prairie region listed for employment some 33,000 male workers. Our officers will continue to do their best to deal with this situation.

Now, as to the second question, this is of course a matter of government policy, and therefore even though I were sure, which I am not at this moment, that the necessity existed, I would not be able to make any comment on it because it affects other departments, particularly the Department of National Defence.

BRIDGES

QUESTION RELATING TO THE APPROVAL OF PLANS FOR THE CONSTRUCTION OF A BRIDGE IN THE MAGDALEN ISLANDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Charles Cannon (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) a question.

Under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, has the minister received from the province of Quebec a request for the approval of the plans of a bridge to be built at Havre-aux-Basques, in the Magdalen islands, between Grindstone and Amherst islands?

If so, will the minister grant, at the earliest possible moment, the approval required under the act, since this bridge is urgently needed and has long been asked for by the people of the Magdalen islands?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question.

In reply, I must say that the provincial authorities, under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, have requested the approval of the plans for that bridge. Their request was referred to departmental engineers, who reported that the project would in no way be prejudicial to navigation.

Once the provincial government have assured us that all public notices have been given in accordance with the requirements of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, we shall ask council to authorize the plan of the proposed bridge.

CAMP BORDEN

QUESTION AS TO OUTBREAK OF TYPHOID

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence in regard to Camp Borden. Are there any cases of typhoid fever among the troops there?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Two cases of suspected typhoid fever have been found, and show the clinical symptoms of that disease, but so far the laboratory tests are negative. It is not known yet whether in fact the patients have typhoid, though they show the clinical symptoms of it, and they are being treated as if they have typhoid.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

CHARLOTTETOWN, P.E.I.—STEEL FOR CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. My question arises out of a Canadian Press dispatch that I received just a short time before I came into the house. It is short, and if you would give me permission to read it—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. McLure: All right.

Mr. Speaker: That will establish a very bad precedent. The hon. member might put his question.

Mr. McLure: I will just ask the question. My question is this. From a Canadian Press report of April 17 I quote—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Cannon.]

Mr. Speaker: Probably the hon. member will put his question without quoting the dispatch.

Mr. McLure: All right. My question is: Will the contractors for a large eighteen-storey building in Vancouver, to cost $5,500,000, use Canadian steel in its construction? If so, would that not be a good opportunity to secure sufficient steel at the same time for the dominion public building at Charlottetown?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I was sure the hon. member had a serious question to put, because he has not put a question to me in the last three weeks. I was getting lonesome. I have not seen the plans for the eighteen-storey building in Vancouver.

Mr. Sinclair: Private.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Then I would have to ask a minister of private works to answer. I have no knowledge of the specifications of such a building, and I am not quite sure of the specifications of the building in Charlottetown, because the plans have not yet been completed.

NATURAL GAS

SUPPLY FOR ATOMIC ENERGY INSTALLATIONS IN UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Defence Production, prompted by a rumour now circulating in Alberta. Have any representations been made to the Department of Defence Production by the United States government with regard to a supply of natural gas from southwestern Alberta for the atomic energy installations at Hanford, Washington, and Arco, Idaho? If so, what volume of gas is desired, and spread over what period?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): I have had no notice of this question. I remember vaguely receiving such a request probably a month or six weeks ago. I simply replied that no gas was available, that the gas is controlled by the province of Alberta and that until the province releases it for export outside its boundaries, I could not discuss the matter.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 22, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this budget debate I think I should first of all recall the very warm and well-earned round of applause from this side of the house which greeted the financial critic of the official opposition (Mr. Macdonnell) when he rose to his task yesterday. I mean, in all sincerity, that it was well merited.

All of us, through the years, have watched the financial critic go about his task. We know it is a difficult one. Each year we have heard his Cassandra-like prophecies of calamity and a poor year ahead, only in the intervening year to see that production has increased, employment has increased, capital investment has increased—

Mr. Fleming: And the surplus has increased.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, and the surplus—and no Tory deficit. But members of the House of Commons do admire the manly way in which the financial critic of the official opposition does go about his difficult task. This year's speech was no exception. He covered a wide field. He livened his speech with a little whimsy, a bit of poetry and anecdotes, and a few quotations. But one thing struck me—and because it struck me I have decided to change my form of speech today. The major part of the early portion of his speech, which he devoted to finance, was directed not so much to the budget as to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott)—anecdotes about him, cartoons about him, and a prolonged discussion of the minister's last radio address.

I thought to myself that I am not guiltless in that connection, either, because in my speeches on budgets I often stray away from the subject and take a swipe at the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) or perhaps the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). So I decided to set hon. members a good example today—unless, of course, I am interrupted by the hon. member for Eglinton—and to devote myself entirely to a discussion of the budget and the criticisms of it which have been made since the debate began.

I would begin by referring to the amendment moved yesterday by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of the C.C.F.; and so that there will be no illusions about it I should like to read its opening words as they are set out at page 1489 of Hansard for yesterday. They are:

> "This house further regrets that the government has ignored the wish of this house, as expressed by a unanimous vote on March 26, that the four per cent floor under medical expenses deductible for income tax purposes should be abolished."

Now I should like to refer to the resolution debated at that time, and put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Hansard for March 26 records the resolution in part, in these words:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the advisability—

And so on—leaving out those parts I shall not discuss at this time. I do not think there is any need to repeat the thirty-minute speech I made that day in the debate, when I dealt with the history of medical deductions in our income tax laws, and the various extensions of those exemptions, as well as the four proposals currently made to extend these exemptions. That is all to be found in Hansard.

Perhaps I should repeat the instructions which were given to me by the Minister of Finance. He was in the house with me, and told me to accept the resolution asking that consideration be given. In his own words, he said to me; "We will accept consideration of any proposal or any resolution put forward by anyone in Canada on tax matters." That, of course, has been the policy of every minister of finance in this and other British countries.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Even parliaments.

Mr. Sinclair: I will come to parliaments, because parliaments are members considered collectively, and then there are the responsibilities of the individual members of parliament under our parliamentary system, as contrasted with the United States system. In our system of government, responsibility for the imposition of taxes and for public expenditures rests solely with the government.

We have the British form of responsible government, as practised here in the House of Commons. It is unlike the United States system, where responsibility for taxes and expenditures rests with congress, not the government, and where there is often difficulty between the government and congress, especially when congress is of a different political complexion from the president.

I have wondered what would have happened if the minister had said to me about this resolution: We will not consider it. No doubt there would have been a real howl condemning an arrogant minister for failing even to give consideration to a perfectly right and proper request. The minister was right in saying that he would accept and give further consideration to this proposal. I mentioned at that time the various proposals which had been made to the department throughout the year. I mentioned also that it was not a member of parliament but a member of the Department of Finance who had first suggested the incorporation in our Income Tax Act of this special provision for deductions for unusual medical expenses.

The leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) had this to say yesterday, and I quote from page 1491 of Hansard:

—in the light of the encouraging statement made in this house on March 26 by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, I think we had every reason to expect something very different...

I think the fairest way to answer that is not to summarize what I said on this four per cent proposal but to actually read from the record of March 26 three paragraphs in which I discussed this matter.

Mr. Fulton: Are you in order?

Mr. Sinclair: I am perfectly in order. If the hon. member will look at the rules he will find that if something in a previous debate is under discussion in a later debate, it is perfectly proper to quote the earlier debate. Otherwise the Speaker would have ruled out of order the amendment of the leader of the C.C.F. I should like hon. members to listen to see if anywhere in my statement I indicated the encouragement which the hon. member for Peace River implied. I quote from page 820 of Hansard of March 26 as follows:

The first suggestion is part of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre: Why do we not remove the four per cent average entirely? There are two or three fairly good reasons for that. First of all, four per cent is quite a bit less than the average medical and hospital expenses across this nation, so we are giving some allowance even to average costs. Our main tax exemptions of $2,000 for a married man and $1,000 for a single man are in part to cover actual expenses, such as the usual expenses of food, clothing and transportation. This specific exemption we are now discussing was put in for unusual expenses. Once that door was opened, then of course there would be demands for exemptions of other unusual amounts in the ordinary man's budget. The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) raised this proposal of removing or lowering the four per cent item, and pointed out that this would give the maximum help to the little man, the man with just enough income to place him in the income tax bracket.

A point—which I mentioned in the beginning—is the fact that this tax must not only be good in theory and good in the House of Commons but must be good in practice as far as the Department of National Revenue is concerned in the collection of the tax and in the verification that there is no abuse through fraud or evasion. When you expect the department to attempt to verify and spot check the endless amount of small bills which will be turned in if all medical expenses are to be deducted, you are imposing on them a large administrative task, and a costly one by reason of the salaries of the civil servants who would have to be employed for what would be a comparatively small tax relief.

A third objection is the fact that in most of these medical schemes it has been found necessary—whether it be a state scheme, a company scheme, or a private scheme—to place some sort of check against too free use, which actually becomes abuse, of the facilities offered. For example, in British Columbia, in connection with the hospital insurance they have had to bring in co-insurance, a small initial charge in hospitals to prevent unnecessary use of hospital beds. Most of the company hospital health insurance schemes in my riding insist that a man pay half the cost of drugs, again to prevent abuse and waste of drugs if provided free. Most of them too make the request for a small payment from the man on his first visit or on his family's first visit to a doctor to check waste of the doctor's time with trivial visits. I think perhaps this present four per cent is in that category, of a check on unnecessary expenditures.

So much for the encouragement I am alleged to have given at that time.

In the rest of my speech I made mention of other objections. There is the objection to giving a broad exemption which applies all across the country because in giving such an exemption you remove from the taxable income of the country a certain amount of income, which of course immediately reduces the tax returns from that income. Taxes and expenditures are not in two separate watertight compartments. If we reduce taxes we still must meet the cost of operating the nation, and so taxes will have to be imposed in some other field to compensate for the loss of revenue through the tax exemption given.

In this instance, if the four per cent, which is less than the national average of hospital, medical, dental and drug care, was removed, that would remove four per cent of the present taxable income of this nation. It would result in a reduction in our personal income tax receipts of four per cent or approximately $48 million. That $48 million would certainly have to be recovered through increased taxation in some other field. So the net effect as far as the average individual is concerned would be zero. It would certainly be an illusion to say that they were getting tax relief in that way.

That applies to any particular exemption which extends across the taxpayers in the country. I pointed out the weaknesses in the proposal—this is perhaps the Department of Finance or a student of taxes speaking—of trying to do indirectly through tax relief what could be much better done otherwise directly. In this instance, there is no doubt that the better way for the individual to protect himself against this hazard of unusual medical expenses is for him to act as he does when he protects himself against the unusual hazard of losing his home by fire—by taking out insurance. I pointed out at the time that the problem in Canada is a diminishing one because each year a great many more Canadians are coming under such schemes, whether they be state schemes such as they have in British Columbia and Saskatchewan, industrial schemes such as many of the great industries of this country have set up, Blue Cross schemes or even insurance with private companies. Then I suggested, as reported on page 822 of Hansard, that the minister would be very glad to give still further consideration to the representations which had been made by the speakers who had taken part in the debate.

The position of the Minister of Finance is a little different from the position of other ministers as far as representations being made to him are concerned. I suppose every hon. member of this house has been part of a delegation which has called on other ministers to present projects or proposals. A trade delegation might appear before the Minister of Trade and Commerce and lay its problem before him; the minister would comment on it and say whether it was within his powers to deal with it. He might point out the weaknesses. If he could come to a decision, either favourably or against it, he might do so at the time, or he might say that the matter would be further investigated and the delegation would be informed of the results.

The Minister of Finance is in a very different position. When a delegation comes before him, or when members of parliament write him letters on tax changes, or when parliament asks for the consideration of tax measures before the budget is brought down, obviously he cannot indicate what he is going to do about it, either acceptance or rejection. Secrecy of the budget is one of the most important factors in the financial control of the country through parliament. It would be incredible if one group in the country knew of tax changes in advance of other groups.

Under our British parliamentary system great attention has been paid to secrecy in connection with the budget. We all remember how Right Hon. J. H. Thomas lost his position as chancellor of the exchequer because of a leak, apparently through his family. We have the more recent dramatic example of Chancellor of the Exchequer Dalton, who, just as he was coming into the house to give his budget speech, made a casual remark to a newspaper reporter that his smokes were going to cost him less. He immediately resigned when the issue was raised. If the minister was to indicate in advance of the budget that tax relief was to be given in any field it would put him in exactly the same position as the gentlemen in the examples I have given. Therefore I say that the minister carried out the undertaking given by me on his behalf, in the only way he properly can. Consideration was given to the proposal when the minister and his budget committee were discussing the personal income tax field. Further consideration was given to it by the minister and his budget committee after the resolution had passed the house.

For reasons such as those I have indicated, and for other reasons, it was decided that the floor should remain but that the ceiling should be raised. That is an interesting thing because, as I pointed out in my last speech on this matter, last year only eight members got in touch by letter with either the minister, the deputy minister or myself on the matter of exemptions and deductions for medical expenses. There were six members on the government side and two on the Conservative opposition side. Five of those wrote about special cases in which people had abnormally high bills which were beyond the present ceiling. They asked if relief could not be given by increasing the present exemptions. Three of them asked for consideration in the case of the purchase of special drugs. Relief was asked by way of increasing the ceiling in order to meet the increased costs of medical services and drugs. This has of course been done in the present budget.

I want to draw attention now to one special remark by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to be found at page 828 of Hansard. I had said that the minister would certainly consider the resolution, that it was not going to be defeated and there was no point in wasting the time of the House of Commons talking it out. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had the opportunity to close the debate. I was listening very closely to what he said, because he is a very accomplished parliamentarian. He ought to be; he is on his feet every day. He had this to say:

> The particular point that the house is voting on is the request that the four per cent floor be wiped out.

What happened? I jumped up immediately and said:

> No, no. I must make this correction. What the house is voting on is that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) should give consideration to this proposal.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, "That is right". He does not say that is right today. The Minister of Finance gave consideration. After giving consideration a second time he presented the form of relief given in the increase of the ceilings on deductions.

I should like now to turn to the other point which is causing considerable debate, the matter of the changes in the personal income tax. Each speaker has questioned whether or not we are to get a reduction in income tax this year under the new bill which of course is not yet law. The difficulty perhaps arises because of two things. One is—and it is understandable—that the people who are dealing with taxes all the time take for granted that everybody understands them as quickly and easily as they do. It is a common failing with almost every group of professional men. The second difficulty arises because of two points in connection with our present income tax procedure. The first is the division of the tax year, and the second is the impact of the social security payment contained in the old age pension bill.

Let me deal with the first difficulty, the matter of the tax year. When we collected taxes from individuals in the same way as today we collect taxes from corporations, at the end of their fiscal year, there was no problem. We could make changes in taxes effective this year and the individual did not have to make any payment until next April. During the war however we turned to deduction at the source, payroll deductions each week, fortnight or month. I think both the taxpayers and certainly the government agree it is a great improvement. The taxpayer is not faced each spring with a debt he cannot pay, and the government is assured of even revenue throughout the year. But this system has difficulties. For example, last year the income tax bill with the surcharge was not formally approved until June, but income tax deductions at the previous rate had been going on in that year since January 1. We approved a 20 per cent surcharge on the old rate.

Let me trace it through in sums. I shall use the example the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar used yesterday, the simple case of the married man with an income of $3,000. He has an exemption of $2,000. His first $1,000 of taxable income in 1950 was taxed at the rate of 15 per cent, and in 1950 he paid $150. That rate was also in effect for the first six months of 1951 until the change was made by parliament. We then voted a 20 per cent surcharge on that, which actually made the increase 20 per cent of 15 per cent, or a total of 18 per cent. If we had wanted that to apply to the whole tax year, having regard to the fact that deductions in the first half had been made at the rate of 15 per cent, we would have had to set up tables of deduction at the rate of 40 per cent surcharge for the last half of the year.

In January of the next year we would have to withdraw all those tables from every industry in the country, get them to change all their payrolls and substitute new tables going back to the 20 per cent figure. Therefore we only made the 20 per cent surcharge apply to the last half of the year, which was a gain for the taxpayer in that year. There was no change until the 20 per cent surcharge became law last June. On the first half year's income no surcharge was paid, and on the last half year the surcharge was 20 per cent, or an average over the year of 10 per cent. Therefore while in 1950 he paid $150, he paid $165 in 1951. The 18 per cent rate has been in effect since last July, and the present tax tables used for deductions this year are on the 18 per cent rate.

If the minister made no change whatsoever in the present budget in the income tax law our man this year would pay $180. Here again we have exactly the same problem because of existing tax tables and deductions already made. The minister has decided to remove the surcharge and get back to a revised scale. He has reduced the basic rate from 18 per cent to 17 per cent, but at the present time, and up until June when the present bill will be passed and become law, deductions at the rate of 18 per cent are being made. After July 1 deductions at the rate of 17 per cent will be made. Over the year therefore the individual pays 18 per cent on the first half of his taxable income and 17 per cent on the other half. The net change is that this year he will pay $175 in income tax, but next year when we will not have this division and will have got down to the 17 per cent for the full year, his tax will be $170, this is down 6 per cent on the $180 he pays under the present law. This taxpayer's tax before Korea was $150. The surcharge brought it up to $180 for a full year. The reduction in the budget brings it back to $170 for a full year. However, just as last year with the split between no surcharge and surcharge, this year with the split between surcharge in the first half of the year and the 17 per cent rate in the second half an intermediate stage will be reached where his tax is $175.

The other point is the matter of the social security tax. The social security tax, the old age pension tax of two per cent of taxable income, does not even appear in the Income Tax Act. That is by design. We all know the story of the demand and desire for social security in this country. We all know there are many people on the hustings who claim that social security is free, that the government pays for it. Therefore we have a demand for bigger and bigger payments out of the treasury, apparently with blind ignorance of the fact that the treasury can only be supplied by taxes from the taxpayers. I think most people in Canada who are in favour of social security realize that there must be some direct connection so far as the individual is concerned between what he pays and the benefit he gets. That is why the old age pensions committee, which did such good work two or three years ago, recommended the method of payment they did, the 2-2-2 principle—two per cent income tax, two per cent sales tax, two per cent corporation tax.

It could have been done in another way. The cost of old age pensions at 70 to the federal government today is $322 million. Today in Canada there are about 5,200,000 people gainfully employed. If each man working in this country had to pay a direct old age pension tax, contribution, premium, whatever you care to call it, it would amount to $62 a person a year. We generally think, however, of taxpayers as those who pay income tax, and there are between 2,500,000 and 2,600,000 income taxpayers today. If only income taxpayers paid for old age pensions by direct contribution it would amount to $124 each a year. For very good reasons, however, the old age pensions committee did not want a direct payment as you would pay an ordinary private insurance premium and they arrived at the 2-2-2 principle. The two per cent on income is the premium for that insurance, and it is the only premium directly visible to the individual. If people want to lump that two per cent for old age pensions into the general income tax, then with equal logic they should lump the unemployment insurance premium into the general income tax, with equal logic workmen's compensation premiums, and with equal logic the payments they make for other insurance.

One obvious exception is family allowances, where we do not in any way attempt to separate the contribution, premium, or whatever you want to call it, from general taxes. There again I think the figures are interesting, because in the case of family allowances we do acknowledge in the tax tables that these are paid directly out of taxes and compensate for this in the children's tax exemptions. As you know, we have two different types of exemptions for children. There is an allowance of $400 if the child is not in receipt of family allowance. That is in the case of a child over 16 or a child of a family that has not been in the country for a year. Again taking the example of a man with two children, that means that the man with two children not in receipt of family allowance actually get an income exemption of $2,800 a year. On the other hand, the man with children eligible for family allowance does not receive as big an income tax exemption. He receives only $150 a year for each child, therefore on the face of it his total exemption is $2,300. However, when the tax he pays to the government is equated against the family allowance he gets in cash from the same government we find that he has to earn more than $3,147 a year before he actually makes any net payment to the government. Just as a matter of interest, a man with five children, if they are not on family allowance, has no income tax payment to make until he earns $4,000. If he is in receipt of family allowance, he does not pay any net payment until after he has earned $4,750. These are, without a doubt, the highest income tax exemptions in the world.

Turning now to corporation taxes. It is true that we were only able to reduce that by ·6 per cent. I think the businessmen and industrial leaders of this country still believe that, high though this corporation tax is, it is much better, gives greater encouragement to production and less encouragement to waste than if we had introduced an excess profits tax.

Another interesting point is the relief given to a certain class of corporation, those public utilities which are controlled by the provinces and regulated so far as their rates and profits are concerned. We already pay half of the corporation tax on the earnings of these public utilities back to the provinces. Of course, this comparison can only be made in some provinces because in others, notably Ontario, these utilities are for the most part publicly owned and pay no corporation tax. This puts the private utilities at a disadvantage. This 14 per cent reduction in corporation tax to them is a measure of relief because of that situation.

Then, at the other end of the scale the minister has commenced something which I think is very laudable. In this country today we have this combination, side by side, of privately-owned companies and crown companies. The great advantage these crown companies have, of course, is that they do not pay corporation taxes. When the corporation tax is 50 per cent in eight of the provinces and 52 per cent in the other two, that is a considerable handicap to private industry so far as comparison is concerned. This year the proprietary corporations of the federal government are going to pay corporation tax to the government. True, it is only a matter of taking the money from one pocket and putting it in the other so far as the federal government is concerned, but for the first time it will put these corporations on an equal footing with private industry so that we can compare the relative efficiency of private corporations and crown corporations.

Turning now to the indirect taxes, there was an interesting comment made by the leader of the Social Credit party last night. On page 1491 of Hansard for April 22, 1952, he said that since the Liberal party came into power they have relied more and more on indirect taxes. Then he said:

> It continues, as any study of the budgets down the years will show.

I would say that the hon. member's study was not a very deep one. I do not want to be unkind, since I have reformed, but he could have gone to the library and found the facts by looking up the last budget before we took office, that is the Rhodes budget on page 1989 of Hansard for 1935. In that year only $76 million out of the tax revenue of $336 million were direct taxes. In other words, 22·6 per cent of the tax revenues in 1935 were direct taxes. If the hon. member will then look at page 1259 of this year's Hansard, he will find in the minister's statement that $2,600 million out of $4,095 million of this year's tax revenues are direct taxes. Today 63 per cent of the tax revenues of Canada are from direct taxes. We have gone from the 23 per cent we inherited from the Tories to 63 per cent this year—a remarkable change.

If the hon. member were even to study the present budget he would see that the only substantial tax cuts are in the field of indirect taxes, excise taxes, special excise taxes and the tax on cigarettes. Undoubtedly if we could have a single tax today, the best single tax would be the income tax. Fifty years ago they thought the best single tax would be Henry George's single tax on land. Their criterion was different. They thought a tax should be related to the benefit received, but today we think that ability to pay is the soundest criterion of taxation. At the same time I think most of us here appreciate the reasons why a single income tax to replace all other taxes, no matter how desirable it might be academically, is neither desirable nor practical. I remember Mr. Ilsley in 1944 or 1945 giving a very fine statement to the house on this matter.

In so far as excise taxes are concerned, of course the general excise tax has been cut back from 25 per cent to 15 per cent. I remember that last year the member for Eglinton never mentioned the increase in the general sales tax to take care of old age pensions from 8 per cent to 10 per cent as being a 2 per cent increase, but always mentioned it as an increase of 25 per cent. I hope that this year the hon. member will not mention the reduction from 25 per cent to 15 per cent in excise tax as a reduction of 10 per cent but on the same grounds he used last year will call it a reduction of 40 per cent. The reasons, of course, for the increase last year and the decrease this year were given in the two budget speeches of the minister. This tax was put on last time when war came in Korea, and it was primarily for revenue. A secondary reason was the shortage of steel and copper and the need to restrain spending. Well, in the past year the country has been more buoyant, production has been greater, prices and wages have been up, and so of course, tax revenues have been better. The second thing is, of course, an increase in the ability of the steel mills and copper mills of Canada and the United States to meet the demand for steel and copper, and this, to a degree, has relaxed pressure. Moreover the cost of living has levelled off. I do not want to prophesy, but I think that this level will continue, because of the fiscal and monetary actions which were taken by this government to curb inflation. All these factors give the opportunity to give this relaxation in excise taxes.

The customs tariff changes are best discussed when the schedules are before us. Here again there is a very interesting pattern. I came across it because of the remarks of the member for Peace River (Mr. Low) on indirect taxes. In 1867 over 90 per cent of the revenue of this country came from customs tariffs. In 1914 it was 57 per cent and in 1935 it was 26 per cent. In this budget it is down to 9 per cent. In the old days it was a principal source of revenue. It was also a weapon for protection, but primarily it was for revenue. Today it is a minor source of revenue. Because of our adherence to the general agreement on tariffs and trade, and because of the policy of this party towards reducing tariffs especially on primary production, we have steadily reduced the protection aspect of our tariff schedule.

The other comment I would like to make is on the opening remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) when he recalled the budget introduced when he first came into parliament in 1935. The minister in his budget speech made an analysis of the present expenditures on page 1249, and I think it is interesting to compare 1935 and 1952. This year we are spending roughly $2 billion on defence, and that of course was unknown in 1935. This $2 billion defence expenditure has been acknowledged as a necessity by all parties in this house, and some parties would go farther than that. There is $900 million for social security which the minister mentioned, and that was almost unknown in 1935. Today old age pensions, old age assistance, family allowances, veterans benefits as a consequence of the war, unemployment insurance, and national health grants are with us and I think every party in this house approves of those things. The greatest check, and I think a necessary check from a taxation point of view, is that with the social security benefits there should at all times be a realization of the cost. The best way to do that is to directly associate the benefits with some definite contribution as we have done with the old age pension.

There is $180 million for provincial subsidies and tax rentals. Subsidies, of course, were known in 1935 but tax rentals were unknown. Tax rentals have been, for eight provinces at least, a very forward step in spreading across the country extra revenue because of increased national production and increased population. There is $440 million for interest on debt. The main reason for that great increase was the last war. The only way to reduce that burden is the way the Minister of Finance has been following since the end of the war. There has been $2,300 million taken off the principal and $62 million a year off the interest. We have actually paid the total cost of the first three and a half years of the last war.

Then, finally, there is $100 million in grants and subsidies, subsidies on freight rates, coal, lime and all these various subsidies which the groups in this country urge upon us and which members of parliament, especially the opposition, think are too niggardly. Of all these amounts almost $1,500 million are transfer payments and not expenditures by the federal government. They are actual transfers of cash passed to the provinces and individuals for them to spend. That leaves out of our present budget about $580 million for direct operating budget, and $157 million for capital construction and replacement. In relation to 1935, when you take into account first of all increased costs and prices and, second, the expansion of this country, that is not at all an unreasonable expansion, in direct operating costs. It is in the other directions —directions approved by this parliament— that our budget costs have gone up so greatly since 1935.

In conclusion I want to turn back to the financial critic of the opposition.

An hon. Member: Oh, do not bother about him.

Mr. Sinclair: I was interested in his quotations. Ten times he quoted from the Winnipeg Free Press. For 50 years the Winnipeg Free Press has been the scourge of the Tory party in the prairies and still is and when they run their next stinging editorials about the Tory party and the party leader, I hope he will again favour us with ten quotations from the Free Press.

The other opinion he quoted was of a magazine. There were eight references to the Atlantic Monthly. I know the Atlantic Monthly, slightly; it is a magazine devoted to literature, poetry and the arts. I have never heard the Atlantic Monthly regarded as a journal of standing in the economic, financial and business worlds. I went and read the article. It is not even a signed article. Right in the same reading room, however, are many other American papers and business and financial journals such as the New York Times, the New York Herald Tribune, the Daily Mirror, the Wall Street Journal, the Journal of Commerce, right across the country to the Seattle Post Intelligencer. All of them were carrying laudatory editorials and comments in their issues after presentation of the budget. The financial critic of the opposition has reason to smile. He remembers the hard work it was for him to find just one lone literary magazine which criticized the Canadian budget. Perhaps he read the interesting proposal in an editorial of the New York Daily Mirror which, after the presentation of the budget, vividly contrasted the Canadian position and the American position to the great advantage of Canada. Then they finished up by saying that if nations operated like a baseball league, they thought they should do what baseball teams do when they are weak and want to improve their team. They said they should offer three of their American cabinet ministers for Doug. Abbott in a swap. They might actually be doing that now because the minister is now down in the United States as guest speaker at the annual meeting of the American chamber of commerce.

I will not weary the house with American praise and analysis, however objective and impartial. In conclusion I will just come to the home town of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) and quote from a paper which is the leading financial paper not only of that city but of Canada. It is a paper that I am sure he has read every week for the last forty years of his life. I refer to the Toronto Financial Post. In the issue of April 12, 1952, the leading editorial—right after the budget—is headed "It Hurts, but it's Sound" and it reads as follows:

> Under the circumstances most must agree that Mr. Abbott is following sound fiscal policy for a period when the country is enjoying a very high degree of real prosperity and when government revenues were never more buoyant. We are paying our heavy defence bills out of current income and not out of loans.

Or out of deficits. That is my own comment.

> We are using surpluses to reduce the national debt. It is down a very creditable $2·3 billions since the end of the war. There are people in other countries who only wish that their own governments would or could follow our example. Painful as it may seem to be, this tough fiscal policy makes Canada the envy of the world.
> No one likes paying taxes, and our taxes, judged by any standard, are certainly high. But if we are honest, we must admit that our capacity to pay is also high.
> As all taxes, federal, provincial and municipal have risen so has national production, savings, wages, salaries and profits. The proportion of all taxes paid (federal, provincial, municipal) to gross national product is almost exactly the same as it was in 1939—about 15 per cent.

If I may interject something there, I should like to point out that the financial critic in his speech mentioned a quite well-known paper by an Australian economist Clarke, saying the danger point would come for a nation when its total tax collections came close to 25 per cent. The Financial Post estimated all Canadian taxes at 15 per cent, so we still have an ample margin, through good management.

> Our country was never more prosperous than it is today. After making all allowances for the rise in prices, there has been very real expansion in real output of goods and services.
> The development of new resources is proceeding at a pace never before approached. Capital investment has reached new levels in the past year and notwithstanding a record inflow from other countries, the remarkable fact is that nine-tenths of that new investment has been by Canadians. These are vital factors to be considered along with any national budget this year and in the years ahead. No budget is likeable; none is perfect. In the days and weeks ahead, before the amendments are enacted, it is to be hoped responsible citizens will present their views to the legislators. There are some administrative amendments which could well be made.

With that last sentence members may agree.

In conclusion my last word is to the financial critic of the opposition whom I should like to ask this one question. We have listened to his Cassandra-like prophecies, which may be found at pages 1494 and 1496 of Hansard, such as that we were living in a fool's paradise, that the boom would burst and that trade was going to fall off. We have had that sort of thing from him for five years. Let me ask him this one question. Where, in the world today, is there any country whatsoever with a sounder economic position, a better fiscal policy, better development, or a higher level of employment than this country of Canada under the present Liberal administration?

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all members of the house have felt a certain sympathy this afternoon with the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, who has just taken his seat. He had great difficulties to contend with in supporting the budget.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: I am sure that no one was more conscious of those difficulties than he was. The role which he has chosen for himself, apart from this great initial difficulty, is certainly a new and unparalleled role for him, namely the role of moderation in speech in the house.

An hon. Member: You follow it.

Mr. Fleming: The parliamentary assistant has today chosen to follow the good example I have set him on former occasions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming: I followed his speech with great interest. In his new role of moderation it perhaps did not have quite the same interest as usual for the house. I noticed that the Liberal supporters in this house were just waiting for one of those customary slashing attacks on the opposition but somehow or another it did not come, and those disappointed colleagues of his had to sit back until the conclusion of the speech in order to have their long-awaited opportunity to contribute their cheering.

I have a simple belief that all things should be in season. This budget is out of season. This budget was introduced in April, but it should have been brought down at Hallowe'en, for it is a budget with a false face. One would have supposed that those who have listened to the hon. gentleman this afternoon would have been struck with astonishment that the people of Canada do not entertain the opinion of the budget with which he closed his speech this afternoon. That public opinion is one of the finest examples to be found anywhere of the application of intelligent thought in a democratic country to the errors of a government in its budget.

When the hon. gentleman calls for cheers for our opportunity to live in Canada I join with him in expressing appreciation to Providence that my lot is cast in Canada because here, among other blessings that we enjoy, the Canadian people still have the opportunity, as they have the intelligence, to see through this budget and to see it for what it is. This budget has not succeeded in fooling the Canadian people. Hon. gentlemen opposite ought to get that fact clearly in their heads right now. Public interest which had been fanned to a high degree by public impatience over the intolerable load of taxation under which the Canadian public has been suffering under the present government, has had the effect of fixing the glare of public attention—yes, and I think parliamentary attention—on the essence of this budget. And the verdict of the Canadian people, which has received wide expression, is that this budget, if possible, sir, is even worse than last year's. There is no principle in this budget; there is no guiding aim in it. It is a budget of expediency, and nothing better. The public indeed has lost all confidence in the present government's budgeting.

Mr. Sinnott: No, they have not.

Mr. Lapointe: Moderation.

Mr. Fleming: What shall we say of the speech in which the budget was offered to the house? Well, as has been pointed out in this debate and in newspaper articles, it was accompanied on the part of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) with a good deal of sleight-of-hand, of juggling, and I think we may compliment the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, if it be a compliment, that he has added to the minister's sleight-of-hand some sleight-of-tongue today. I am prepared, too, to leave that public verdict on the basis of a summary of press opinion which appeared in Le Soleil, in the issue of April 12. This is the way in which the budget commentaries appearing in the press were summed up in this newspaper:

La presse française du Québec a accueilli avec une impression teintée de désappointement le budget de M. Abbott. Aucun journal ne lui manifeste de l'enthousiasme. La note générale est celle d'une déception.

If I may attempt a translation of that article, Mr. Speaker, I would say that it runs like this:

The French press of Quebec has greeted the budget of Mr. Abbott with an impression tinged with disappointment. No newspaper manifests enthusiasm for it; the general note is that of a deception.

I am prepared, sir, to put the verdict of the Canadian people on precisely that basis. One goes back in memory to that day in somewhat similar circumstances in April, 1949, in this house when the Minister of Finance said: "Let us not fool ourselves, even if we are trying to fool the people". Sir, on this occasion the people have not been fooled, and hon. gentlemen opposite, as I have said before, ought to have that fact clearly impressed upon their minds by now.

Mr. Sinnott: Nobody is trying to fool them at all.

Mr. Fleming: And with all the air of mock modesty with which the minister approached his task one failed to find anything very modest in the essence of his statement. What of the 1951 budget, sir? It was the worst in Canadian history up to that time, without exception. And the Minister of Finance showed himself extraordinarily and unusually sensitive to criticism in respect of the inaccuracies and the blunders of last year's budget. He says that the policies of the government had been proven to be wise and right. Well, it took him a long time that night, Mr. Speaker, in the course of his speech, to try to justify the wisdom and the correctness of those policies. Certainly it was not apparent to anyone else, and he had to labour hard and long to prove that there was any wisdom or anything correct in these policies. I think the Canadian people know by this time that the way in which they should measure the accuracy of last year's budget is not by the figures that have been given by the minister as to the surplus, but they should measure last year's errors by the extent to which overtaxation, as compared with estimated expenditure, resulted in a budget surplus which has been whittled away now by additional expenditures and by non-budgetary allocations which have had the effect of creating a certain diminution in what is otherwise shockingly and unjustifiably bad budgeting.

Sir, we have seen the effects of last year's budget manifested in downright hardship on the part of the Canadian people, restriction in development, unemployment, smuggling. And the credit restrictions, the minister tells us, are to continue. Credit restrictions have hampered and restricted enterprise in many directions, have been discriminatory in their effects as between different kinds of businesses, and have also been discriminatory in favour of the larger interests at the expense of new businesses and smaller enterprises.

But what has become of the budget surplus? It was $721 million on December 31 after the fiscal year had run but nine months of its course. The great Ottawa mystery of this spring of 1952 is, where is the vanished surplus? The minister has announced a budget surplus of $356 million. Well, what has become of this surplus? That bears some examination, Mr. Speaker.

In launching upon that inquiry it is no amiss, I think, to recall the variety of the approaches that the government has manifested with respect to the virtues of budgetary surpluses. Last spring, a year ago now, when the minister was budgeting for a surplus of $30 million he and those associated with him had not a good word to say for surpluses. They did not budget for a surplus of more than $30 million. Where then were the virtues of debt reduction? We did not hear anything about that, because only $30 million was to be provided for by way of surplus. Then, as the year progressed, of course the tune changed, and we heard from the minister declamations about the virtues of big budget surpluses and debt reduction. Yes, we heard the minister say on the radio last February:

It has been an excellent thing—

He was referring to the budget surplus which then stood at $721 million. I continue:

It has been an excellent thing not just for the government, but for each and every one of you.

He was referring to the hard-pressed taxpayers of this country. Well, so much for the contrast between the minister of April, 1951, and the minister of February, 1952. But then the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) joined the chorus when he spoke in this house in the throne speech debate on March 6. He not only lauded the surplus, but in taking up the remark of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) that the effect of the surplus showed that every family in Canada had in those nine months been overtaxed to the extent of $250 each, the Prime Minister rose and proclaimed the benefits of that overtaxation of every family to that extent. At page 172 of Hansard we find the Prime Minister using these words:

And if the amount of commodities had remained what it was, and there had been $250 more purchasing power for every family of five—well, in my simple logic I would come to the conclusion that that would have added to the inflationary pressure instead of the fact of its having been withdrawn as purchasing power adding to the inflationary pressure.

But now, sir, we have moved forward again another six weeks. We are now in April, 1952, and the tune has changed again. We no longer hear of the virtues of planning for debt reduction or planning for surpluses. The minister is now content to plan for $9 million, which he says is tantamount to a balanced budget. Well, it is very difficult, I am sure, for the house. I fancy hon. members have long since given up any attempt to keep pace with these frequent changes on the part of the minister, these kaleidoscopic changes that occur almost from month to month. The minister now says, according to his radio speech on April 15:

The government does not think it is necessary to plan for a surplus under present conditions.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Therefore all the oratory we heard about the value of the surplus, and all the oratory we heard from the other side about the virtues of debt reduction, have been put aside now in favour of a new doctrine, a new theory on the part of the Minister of Finance. Well, I suppose when the new surplus in the new fiscal year begins to mount up in another two or three months we will again hear, brought out of the mothballs, the familiar music of the virtues of the big surplus and the debt reduction. We in this party, sir, have said that we believe in debt reduction, but we do not want to see it left to adventitious circumstances arising accidentally or as the result of blunders on the part of the government. We want to see this debt reduction planned for and planned wisely.

Where is the surplus? How has it shrunk? We know now that the big surplus, as it developed, tempted the government, as we in this party said it certainly would. That big surplus tempted the government into big expenditures in the closing days of the fiscal year. And so they had to find a means of disposing of a quarter of a billion dollars, and relieving themselves of the embarrassment of this grossly excessive surplus in that way. And then, of course, they found ways of expending another $300 million in non-budgetary expenditures, which means that the money rests in the consolidated revenue fund, but it does not appear in the surplus. They just dumped these $300 million in various pockets of the consolidated revenue fund, and announced to the public that the surplus had been reduced by that amount.

The disappearance of the budget surplus is not explained in the minister's speech. And if the house will simply put together three figures it will find a solution of the current mystery on parliament hill, and in this way: Additional expenditures by the government in the closing days of the fiscal year, $247 million; non-budgetary expenditures, $300 million, and an admitted budget surplus of $356 million, making a total of $903 million. And that is the measure of error and blunder of the government last year in its budgeting—$903 million. And that, sir, is the measure of the extent of overtaxation of the people of Canada.

Lop off some of that, if you like, for some of these items; the fact remains that the people of Canada, in the fiscal year 1951-52, were overtaxed, grievously overtaxed, to an extent never paralleled in the history of this country. And may heaven protect us from a repetition of grievous blunders of that kind and grievous impositions of that kind on the part of this government!

This new budget, what in reality does it involve? Strip off the masquerade and the false face, and what do we find?—not that taxes have been reduced, but that the people of Canada are to be submitted to an increased burden of taxation.

Look over the totals. Last year the government took from the Canadian people $4,003 million; this year they estimate to take from us $4,279 million for general purposes and $235 million for social security, making a total of $4,514 million, or an increase of over $500 million. Now, leaving out entirely the social security amount, and simply putting it on the basis of comparing expenditures last year with expenditures in this coming fiscal year, and apart from the additional social security tax, the budget will increase taxes this year to the tune of around $275 million.

And let the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance note this, that the people of Canada are going to realize—yes, indeed they do realize now—that this is not a budget that brings them any relief from the burden of overtaxation. This is a budget which adds to that grievous burden. Well might this budget, looking back to its parent the 1951 budget, say, as King Rehoboam did, as it is recorded in the first book of Kings:

> My father made your yoke heavy and I will add to your yoke: my father also chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions.

And when the Minister of Finance says that this year he simply is balancing his budget, that his surplus will be a nominal $9 million, I am sure the memories of hon. members are not so short that they will forget that last year, with an equal parade of concern, the minister said that he was budgeting for a surplus of only $30 million.

Well, if we have the same kind of error this year as we did last, we will find at the end of the year that this estimate is out $903 million, less $21 million, which will leave him out roughly $882 million, according to my mental arithmetic. The House of Commons will be very sceptical, indeed, of that $9 million surplus, because they no longer have any faith or confidence in the budgeting by this government.

Now, what about this vaunted reduction in the excise tax? Well, let us strip the masquerade off this. Let us remember, sir, that those increases were applied last year and the previous year in the face of warnings from the official opposition that they would result, as they most certainly did result, in feeding the fires of inflation in this country. What has the government done by way of removing the tax that it heaped on last year? Sir, they have not even gone back to remove the impositions of the fall session of 1950. They have simply eliminated the additions to these excise taxes in 1951—the additions. Oh no, I have been too generous. It was only the additional excise tax they removed; because the sales tax, about which the parliamentary assistant did well to remind us today, is still 10 per cent. It remained. And the people of this country know, from their unhappy day-to-day experience, that that sales tax of 10 per cent applies to many of the basic necessities of life, such as clothing, boots and shoes, many prepared foods, household furniture and the like. There is not one cent of relief from that excessive taxation.

And we will not forget the late Mr. Mackenzie King, who went up and down this country in the election campaign of 1935 denouncing the sales tax as "that iniquitous tax." And when the parliamentary assistant today talks about what this government inherited from the Tories, I will remind him, for apparently he has forgotten, that what the Liberals inherited from the Tories in 1935 was a 6 per cent sales tax, which the Liberals have since increased to 10 per cent. And that, according to my simple calculation, is a relative increase of 66⅔ per cent.

We have heard much about the decreases, or the removal of the additions made last year in these excise taxes. Those Liberal members in the house who cheered the other night when the minister announced that they were coming off are the very same members who stood in their places in this House of Commons and voted solidly last year to impose those increases. And let the electorate at home not forget that fact, Mr. Speaker. The government have not undone the wrong they did last year.

Hon. members will have in mind those words from Isaiah:

> Cease to do evil; learn to do well.

The government in this instance has proposed simply that the evil they did last year should not be continued now; but they have yet to learn to do well. They have not attempted to repair any of the injury they did last year. That remains. And I tell you from my seat in the House of Commons that one cannot exaggerate the harm that was done to those upon whom those grievously excessive and discriminatory increases in excise tax applied last year. It affected their businesses; it affected their employment; and it did untold harm, which no member in the house can appreciate adequately.

And, sir, that harm remains done; the minister has done nothing to repair the injury that was done last year. He has simply ceased to do evil by ceasing to continue to impose those burdensome and improper additions. We will not give any credit to a man who simply removes taxes that he imposed last year, despite the warnings we gave him that they would feed the fires of inflation—as feed the fires of inflation they certainly did.

Now, what about the income tax? Again here, instead of going away with the cheerful impression the minister invited in his budget speech that night, what we see when we remove the masquerade from the budget is that what the minister has done is to increase the income tax. As I have said, the total burden of taxation is greatly increased. The burden of the income tax is also severely increased. And I am content to accept the dictum as set out in Le Soleil of April 12, in this particular aspect, when it said:

(Translation):

The general note is that of a deception.

(Text):

Speaking of the note that runs through the press Le Soleil indicates that the reaction to this budget is that of a deception.

(Translation):

Mr. Chevrier: Your speech is another deception.

Mr. Fleming: No indeed, I am not mistaken; but it gives me great pleasure to read to the house, and more particularly to the minister himself, the excerpt which I have just read from Le Soleil, a worthy newspaper from the province of Quebec.

(Text):

The iniquity of this budget is shown in no particular more than in the fact that whereas it pretended to decrease the income tax, it in fact increased it. And those increases are found to be heaviest upon those with lower incomes. I am not going to go over the whole story because yesterday afternoon the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) put figures and detailed calculations on the record. The argument is unanswerable that this budget has committed a cardinal sin. Having disguised itself as a budget that reduces the income tax, having been exposed as a budget that increases the income tax, it has committed the sin of imposing those increases most heavily upon those with lower incomes.

Let us look at the corporation tax. Was that worth all the time spent on it today by the parliamentary assistant? There is a reduction, but what does the reduction amount to? Instead of paying 52·6 per cent the corporations are going to pay 52 per cent next year. They are to be expected to throw up their hats in the air and cheer the budget. Our eyes are not closed to the fact that when the government heaps up taxes upon corporations, in the main those taxes ultimately rest upon the shoulders of the consumers. What were the effects of the increases last year in the corporation taxes? They were passed on where possible and the effect was inflationary as it added to the cost of living. It did not matter that the minister was warned about this, because the minister does not listen to anybody. He is not even here now because of an engagement to address the American Chamber of Commerce, if you please. Apparently that is more important to the minister than to be present in the House of Commons when his budget is being debated. There is nothing unusual in that because the minister would not listen to us even if he were here.

Mr. Sinclair: As the minister is not here perhaps I should rise to say that this engagement is at least three months old and the minister told both the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and the financial critic. I am sorry he did not also inform the junior financial critic.

Mr. Fleming: I suppose the parliamentary assistant thinks that it is an end of the matter when he says that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) after the thing was done came over and acquainted the leader of the opposition and the financial critic of the official opposition with the fact that it had been done. Let me make it perfectly clear to him that that is not good enough. Surely the Minister of Finance has a first obligation when the budget introduced by himself is under debate in the house to be here throughout that debate. I have said that it would not make any difference if he were here because he would not listen to anybody, anyway.

Mr. Sinclair: On a question of privilege, I suggest that the leader of the opposition has an obligation to be in the house to listen to the junior financial critic.

Mr. Fleming: I am sure the parliamentary assistant derives satisfaction from taking up my time.

Mr. Sinnott: Where is he today?

Mr. Fleming: He will be here, do not have any fear. I think the hon. member will have his hands full looking after himself and explaining to his constituents how he comes to support a budget of this kind which adds to their already excessive burdens. There are only two ministers in the house during this present discussion.

What is the result of these present taxes on corporation profits? There is this fact which the minister would do well to ponder. He treated the house last year to a pious expression of regret that taxes on corporations were so high. The country needs something more than a pious expression, especially when we see the results that flowed from last year's budget. We see the Bell Telephone Company obtaining authority to increase their rates by over $14 million, of which nearly $8 million went for direct taxes. It was so also with the increases in railway freight rates. The minister boosts the taxes, but who pays them? The consumer.

The taxation which the government is heaping up in this present budget means that every man, woman and child in Canada will on average pay in excess of $300. As the financial critic of the official opposition pointed out yesterday, it means that the average Canadian family of five will be paying about $1,715 in federal taxes alone. Is it not about time that the people of this country had an opportunity to say that they do not want to be smothered by the impositions being heaped upon them by the government at Ottawa?

In order to show what this taxation means in terms of burden on the Canadian people I turn to newspapers published in the province of Quebec which have passed accurate and pungent comments upon the scale of taxation applied during the fiscal year just ended. I look forward to hearing their comments on the much heavier taxation that is proposed for this new fiscal year. Here is the comment made by Le Devoir:

Les impôts règlent l'activité économique d'un pays. Quand les impôts deviennent excessifs, ils tuent l'esprit d'initiative et le commerce aussi sûrement que les détruit le socialisme.

If I might attempt a ready translation of that it would be that taxes regulate a country's economic activity. When taxation becomes excessive it kills industry and trade as surely as does socialism.

In a recent editorial L'Action Catholique had this to say:

Le gouvernement fédéral saigne le contribuable canadien à blanc.

I translate that to mean that the federal government is bleeding the Canadian taxpayer white. That was for the fiscal year just closed. How much whiter can this government bleed the Canadian taxpayer in the fiscal year 1952-53? The Minister of Finance is at least going to try.

Let us remember also what this is doing to the whole fabric of confederation. The distinguished premier of Ontario pointed out in a speech on April 21, as reported in the Toronto Daily Star, if you please, of April 22 as follows:

A dozen years ago the federal government took 49 cents of every tax dollar; the provincial and municipal governments took the remaining 51 cents. Now the federal government is taking about 73 cents of every tax dollar and the province and the municipalities divide the balance of 27 cents.

The way this government is going on to bleed the Canadian taxpayer white is having the effect of upsetting the whole scheme of confederation. While they go ahead and levy these impositions they try to make a great thing of the fact that having overtaxed the people they are ready to hand back certain amounts. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), who is not here today either, made a press announcement on February 19 that out of approximately 3,500,000 taxpayers more than 2,000,000 individual taxpayers will be entitled to refunds on their 1951 income tax of a total amount in the neighbourhood of $60 million.

What does that mean? Does it mean that the federal government is doing right by the Canadian taxpayer in making refunds? Rather it means that even in the face of its outrageously heavy rates of taxation last year levied through the income tax the federal government overtaxed two million taxpayers, or more than half of those subject to income tax. Now they make great fellows of themselves and make a great display of handing back the excess. The best reaction to that kind of tactic that I have seen appeared in the St. Catharines Standard of February 22, 1952. The article reads as follows:

The Minister of National Revenue, Dr. McCann, made a nauseating little speech the other day about all the lucky taxpayers who were going to get some money back from the government. Two-thirds of the nation's taxpayers, he indicated, would get some sort of rebate on the taxes sucked out of them during the past year . . . This noble gesture on the part of Dr. McCann is something like a bank robber returning to the scene a year later and handing a surprised manager a few of the greenbacks he stole. The manager doesn't get down on his knees and lick the bandit's boots in thanks, and neither do we. If they don't mind a suggestion up at Ottawa, we'd as soon keep possession of our own dough, instead of having them look after it for a year and then return it when it isn't worth as much as it was when we earned it.

Mr. Graydon: Without interest.

Mr. Fleming: It continues:

If there were no hidden taxes, and we were all made aware at many points of just what we are paying in taxes, there would be a greater demand for careful spending and an end to extravagance in government.

So much for the Minister of National Revenue. The expenditure that I have indicated as contemplated by the budget will be boosted to record heights. Never in the country's peacetime history has there been anything approaching it, and if I recall correctly even in wartime there were only three years when expenditure, even when we were in the throes of a life and death struggle, exceeded the expenditure budgeted for by the minister for this present year. Profligacy is written all over the acts of this government. This is a spendthrift government. Yet it even has the temerity to preach thrift, and item 587 in the recent supplementary estimates is a vote of $10,000 to assist a particular organization to carry on a thrift campaign. I wish the minister were here because I should like to say to him: Physician, heal thyself.

Mr. Sinnott: The parliamentary assistant is just as good.

Mr. Fleming: Thrift is a great thing for other people to practise, in the view of this government. It is high time the government practised a little of its own abysmal preaching. The mentality shown by the budget is just that shown by the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) in 1945 when he said, "What's a million dollars?" It was not worth saving. Hon. members will recall that in the fall of 1948 during the negotiations with Newfoundland somebody mentioned a figure of $180 million and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said, "What is $180 million? That is just peanuts." When methods can be so loose that a budgeted surplus of $30 million can expand to $900 million you have some measure of the utter unreliability of this government.

When we, of the official opposition, in decrying the extravagance of the government and the shocking wastefulness with other people's money, money of the Canadian taxpayers, call for up-to-date methods that would afford parliament an opportunity of applying the searchlight of publicity to these expenditures, what are we met with? We are baffled at every turn by the government's refusal to permit the introduction of methods that would enable us to really get at these expenditures and expose the extravagance in them. When the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) a fortnight ago asked the Prime Minister if he would agree to the estimates of the Department of National Defence amounting to over $2 billion being referred to the special committee on defence expenditures for review, he was met, as he has been met repeatedly, with the same old answer—no. Why does the government not want parliament to have an efficient and up-to-date method of reviewing these expenditures? I leave that question to the house.

Look at social security. It has been made quite plain that the government has bungled the financing of that the same as they have bungled the financing of everything else. The old age security plan was to be on a pay-as-you-go basis. The plan has already become a deficit plan. There is a deficit of $58 million this year. The basis of the scheme has so far not been honoured by the government.

I have time to mention only one other matter. I should like to have spent some time on what the government has done in ignoring, yes, defying the clear expression of opinion of the house given on March 26 that the four per cent limitation on medical expenses as deductions from income tax should be removed. What the house said on that occasion in the clearest—and unanimous—expression of opinion was that the four per cent limitation should go and that all medical expenses should be recognized as deductions from taxable income. But the minister has ignored, yes, he has defied, the clear expression of opinion of the house, and in the face of the kind of sophistry that we heard on this subject today from the parliamentary assistant to the minister we can only be left with the conclusion that either the house has been defied or the house was hoodwinked on March 26. There has been no attempt on the part of the government to address itself even to the merits of the subject. On that occasion the parliamentary assistant sought to belabour the hon. member who introduced the resolution and said: Oh, this will increase the ceilings. Then, if you please, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) not only ignores the request for the removal of the four per cent limitation but he boosts the ceilings, the very thing his parliamentary assistant had decried in the house on March 26.

Mr. Sinclair: That is not true either.

Mr. Fleming: These two hon. gentlemen, the minister and his assistant, ought to get their heads together. They are not working together. It is high time they got their trains running on the same track.

We have had enough of this defiance of parliament. We have had enough of this attempt to override and ignore parliament. I hope that by this time the house is sick and tired of the insults the government is deliberately heaping upon it.

I think I have justified what I called the budget in the first place, a budget that should have been introduced in season, at Hallowe'en, because it is a budget with a false face.

Mr. Sinclair: Full of sound and fury and signifying nothing.

Mr. Graydon: He put the light in the pumpkin for you.

Mr. Sinnott: The Tory light is out.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) moved, and I had the honour to second, the subamendment now before the house. That subamendment reads as follows:

> This house further regrets that the government has ignored the wish of this house, as expressed by a unanimous vote on March 26, that the four per cent floor under medical expenses deductible for income tax purposes should be abolished.

Despite the tortuous and circuitous effort of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sinclair) to justify the failure of the government to carry out the unanimous wish of the house as expressed on March 26, I can tell him that the people of this country feel that they were tricked. The plain fact of the matter, despite all the technicalities upon which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and his parliamentary assistant may seek to rely, is that this house expressed a definite opinion when it accepted my motion on March 26.

Mr. Sinclair: To give consideration.

Mr. Knowles: The parliamentary assistant is still trying to trick the people of Canada. But he certainly cannot fool the members of this house.

Mr. Sinclair: It is not that I object very much, Mr. Speaker, to the assertion that I tried to trick. The only thing is that the hon. member has placed the blame in the wrong place. He is the author of the trickery in the resolution asking for consideration.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member has been here quite a while and professes to be an expert in a number of matters—

Mr. Sinnott: He is, too.

Mr. Knowles: —and he should know that the rules of parliament deny to private members, including himself, the right to introduce motions involving the expenditure of money or loss of revenue to the treasury.

Mr. Sinclair: I mentioned that in my speech.

Mr. Knowles: But he also knows that it is the established right of members of parliament to introduce what are referred to in the authorities as abstract motions which technically do not bind the house but which if passed express the opinion of the members of the house. I agree that technically the motion of March 26 did not bind the house or the government, but it did express the opinion of the members of this House of Commons. I would remind him that Bourinot, in his fourth edition, in discussing these abstract resolutions, after having pointed out that it is impossible for members to move motions that involve directly the expenditure of money, says that they are intended to point out to the government the importance and necessity of such expenditures. An expenditure or a reduction in taxation amount to the same thing. The point I am making is that when members of this house vote on a motion asking the government to consider something they are, in fact, expressing their opinion on the substance of the question which the government is asked to consider.

The parliamentary assistant tried today to make a great deal out of the fact it was only a request to consider. He parroted the words of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) yesterday, when the minister interjected a remark in the speech of the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). As recorded at page 1486 of Hansard for April 22, 1952, the Minister of Finance said:

> The Minister of Finance never refuses to consider any suggestions, whether it is from the House of Commons or from any other place. That was the reason the resolution was not voted down.

Most of us did not come to this house yesterday. We have been here for some time and we know what the practice is with respect to private members' resolutions. If the government does not like them and is not prepared to consider what their substance calls for, they are either talked out or voted down. In some cases, they are withdrawn at the request of the government, when the sponsor is a government member.

Let me remind the parliamentary assistant and the minister what happened a year ago. On February 26, 1951, I moved a motion asking the government to consider the advisability of introducing legislation to amend the Income Tax Act so as to provide for the deductibility of trade union dues. The opening words of that motion were identical, to every jot and tittle, to the motion that I introduced this year on March 26 with respect to the deductibility of medical expenses. I made sure that the wording was identical. My motion of a year ago asked for consideration. Did the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) say on that occasion, as he said to my leader yesterday, that the Minister of Finance never refuses to consider any suggestion whether from the House of Commons or any other place, and that is the reason the resolution was not voted down? Not on your life; the resolution was voted down on February 26, 1951, by the majority on the government side. I was very pleased that in that particular case the Minister of Finance changed his mind some time between February 26, 1951, and the date of his budget. When he brought down his budget of April 10, 1951, he did carry out, in part at least, the request in that resolution, even though the resolution itself had been defeated.

Let me remind the parliamentary assistant and the house generally of some other private members' resolutions. I had one that was defeated on October 3, 1949. It asked the government simply to consider the appointment of a royal commission to look into the loss of pension rights by Canadian Pacific Railway workers who were involved in the 1919 strike. Did the government say they were prepared to consider anything, and therefore would not vote that down? No, they were against the substance of what was involved in that resolution, and so it was voted down by the government majority.

On February 19, 1951, the member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) introduced a resolution which merely asked that the government consider the advisability of establishing a committee to consider certain aspects of cigarette smoking. It was only a request for consideration. Did the government say, as the Minister of Finance said yesterday, that the government is prepared to consider anything? No, they said, through the mouth of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), that no doubt the member for Fort William would be satisfied that his case had been made. He was asked to withdraw his motion. When some of us refused to give unanimous consent to the withdrawal of that motion, it was put to a vote. Was it allowed to pass because it was simply a request for consideration? Not on your life, it was defeated by the government majority.

The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) has on a number of occasions introduced a private member's resolution with regard to soldier settlers. I am thinking particularly of the one on February 21, 1951, which asked for all that a private member can ask, that consideration be given to the granting of clear titles to certain soldier settlers. Did the government say, in the words of the Minister of Finance or of the parliamentary assistant, that the government will consider anything and therefore allow it to pass? No, it was defeated by a recorded vote with the government majority seeing to it that it was defeated.

On February 22, 1951, the member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pinard) introduced a motion asking that the government consider, just consider, the abolition of tolls on certain bridges in the Montreal area. When the debate was just about over the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) indicated that a very good case had been made, that it would be studied, and perhaps in view of that undertaking the member for Chambly-Rouville would be prepared to withdraw his motion. Why did not the Minister of Transport do what the Minister of Finance said yesterday and say that the government was prepared to consider anything, so the motion could pass? No, they did not want to commit themselves to the substance of the motion so the member for Chambly-Rouville was asked to withdraw it. He was prepared to do so, but when some of us said we were not prepared to give unanimous consent to the withdrawal of the motion it was put to a vote and it was defeated, despite the fact the Minister of Transport had just spoken sympathetically about it.

I could go on referring to motions put by other hon. members, such as the one by the member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) asking for the decentralization of industry. This motion has not come to a vote as yet; it has been talked out and that is another means that is employed from time to time to defeat these motions. What is crystal clear to anyone who wants to face the facts is that when a motion has in it something which the government does not want to have itself committed to, it sees to it that that motion does not pass, even though it technically asks simply for consideration. It either sees to it that it is defeated by the government majority in this house or if it is a Liberal motion it sometimes persuades its sponsor to withdraw the motion. Or again, the motion may be talked out. Therefore, I contend that though my motion asked for the only thing a private member can request, consideration, nevertheless the fact that it passed unanimously means that this house expressed its view not only that consideration should be given to my proposal but expressed its thought on the substance of that motion.

Hon. members who were in the house on the afternoon of Wednesday, March 26, will remember the general feeling that was around the house. They will remember also the general feeling of satisfaction that the government had seen fit to accept the motion, and the hope that that would result in the principle being implemented when the budget was brought down. A short while ago the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sinclair) read his interjection in what I had to say on March 26, as recorded at page 828 of Hansard. May I read some of the rest of what I had to say on that same page, making it crystal clear that I fully recognized the technicality of the position but also that the house accepted the spirit of what I was advocating on that occasion. I said:

> I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I realize full well that the passing of this resolution does not mean the immediate legislative enactment of what it asks for. The resolution asks for all that a private member, under the rules of the house, can ask for, namely that the government give consideration to the proposal that the four per cent floor, in connection with medical expenses in relation to income tax, should be wiped out.

I take it that if this resolution is passed, since it has won the support of the government, the government will do what the resolution asks, namely will give consideration to that proposal. Naturally I hope the fact that this resolution is passed unanimously by this house will suggest to the government that that consideration should be favourable.

The parliamentary assistant, who says today that he was watching me like a hawk, did not interrupt at that point. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that at that time I stated the position with exactitude. The position was that technically it was a request for consideration; but in spirit, in terms of what was the thinking and the opinion of the members of this house, we were expressing our unanimous view on a specific idea and we were hopeful that the government would go along with that idea when it brought down the budget on April 8.

People outside the house are not impressed with the technical aspect of this matter even to the extent that I have been prepared to spell it out. People outside the house see this whole picture in terms of parliament, which consists of 262 members, which they believe to be superior to the cabinet of 20 members. People outside this house—and most of us have been home during the Easter recess and have obtained the views of the man in the street—simply understand that the 262 of us, the entire house, expressed a view but then one member in the cabinet rejected that view. The man in the street simply cannot understand such defiance of parliament.

In the press of the country many references have been made to this affair. That is natural, because the morning after the motion passed on March 26 in support of the abolition of the four per cent floor, it was headline news in most of the papers in the country; and within the next few days a great many papers editorialized on it favourably. They were pleased to see that the government had accepted a private member's motion and in particular a motion from the opposition side of the house. Editorial writers in general approved of the substance of that motion and anticipated that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), after giving it his consideration, would certainly carry out the wish of the house.

It is therefore only natural that many of these newspapers are annoyed over what happened and are now beginning to express their views. For example, I have here an editorial that appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune of Thursday, April 17. The heading of that editorial is significant; it is "Parliament be Blowed". The editorial reads in part as follows:

Just how much influence parliament has with the government in some things was clearly shown by what happened to deductions from income tax for medical expenses in the current budget.

The Budget—Mr. Knowles

On March 26 Stanley Knowles, M.P. for Winnipeg, introduced a resolution urging the government to consider the introduction of legislation to permit taxpayers to deduct from their incomes, before computing the amount of income taxes to be paid, the entire amount of medical expenses rather than merely the portion in excess of four per cent of their taxable income, as the act now stands.

The editorial goes on to point out that this motion received the support of members in all sections of the house. It points out also that there was some discussion on other aspects of the problem, notably references to the ceiling, but says that in the end no change was made in my motion and that it passed in its original form asking for the one change, namely the removal of the four per cent floor. Then towards the end of the editorial the Tribune says:

Mr. Abbott chose to ignore what amounted to a directive from the Commons and followed something that had been merely mentioned in the debate. He raised the ceilings—something that would benefit only taxpayers with phenomenal ill health.

This is another instance of the parliament-be-damned attitude of the present administration.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the parliamentary assistant and those on the other side can argue, if they wish, that it is not technically correct for the Winnipeg Tribune to say that that motion was a directive. But that is the view of people who look objectively at the functioning of parliament. They see these 262 members pass a motion unanimously. To them—and in practical terms they are correct—it amounted to a directive from the Commons and the Minister of Finance chose to ignore that directive.

I have here another editorial. This time it is from the Globe and Mail of Toronto and it appears in the issue of Friday, April 11. The heading is "A Loaf and a Stone". I will read only two or three sentences of it:

A minor item in Finance Minister Abbott's budget precisely illustrates the contempt with which the federal cabinet treats the views of parliament and the needs of the public. In this instance, it seems to have made a special effort to express that contempt, to assert its lordly disregard of the taxpayers and their elected representatives.

Then the writer goes on to point out that a change has been proposed in the budget to raise the ceiling to $1,000 and to $2,000. Then he says:

This is exactly the opposite of what parliament wants; and in fact, has asked for.

Then the editorial goes on to spell out the terms of the resolution in language similar, as a matter of fact, to that in the editorial that I have just read. Then I quote this:

The cabinet was not satisfied merely to deny that request, but cynically twisted it right around, giving parliament what it did not seek, and refusing it what it did . . . It accepted the principle endorsed by parliament, but handed it back in such a way as to make parliament look absurd. Asked for a loaf, it grinningly gave a stone.

If parliament must accept the insult, it is the taxpayers who must accept the injury; particularly those in the middle income brackets.

I have here as well a letter to the editor that appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press. I really would not expect the Winnipeg Free Press to take my part against the Liberal government, but at least they went this far. They ran this letter a few days ago. It appeared on Saturday, April 19, 1952, and it is over the signature of J. W. Gilbert of Hanover, Ontario. This is an exceedingly interesting letter because it deals not only with the amazing situation that the cabinet could ignore the unanimous vote of the members of the House of Commons but also deals with an important point of substance in relation to the question itself, namely that of abolishing the four per cent floor.

I will come back to that matter in just a moment. Before I do so, I want to sum up this part of my remarks by saying that I regard what the government did in this respect as one of the worst exhibitions that I have seen in this parliament for a long time. This government is asking the people of this country to spend billions of dollars for the defence of democracy, yet the government is scuttling democracy right here in the House of Commons. The whole approach of this government to parliamentary democracy is such as to spread cynicism in the minds of our people and to weaken the support of our people for what is so often called our way of life. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that times like the present call for greater adherence than ever to the principles of democracy; and when a group of 262 members of parliament unanimously express their view as to what should be done, it should be carried out by the government of the day.

I now want to go on and say a bit more about the substance of the matter itself because I dare to hope that the government may reconsider its position on this matter even at this session, even before this budget is put through. I would say that one of the ways to bring that event about is for a good deal to be said about this matter, not only by those of us on the opposition side of the house who perhaps feel most annoyed by what has happened but also by members on the government side of the house, many of whom probably feel the same way. We all have the experience in parliament of knowing that copies of letters written to us are sometimes sent to members in other parties. It happens both ways. There have come to my desk copies of letters that have been sent to members on the Liberal side of the house, asking their views on what happened, and urging them to call upon the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) during the course of this budget debate to change his position with respect to this four per cent floor, and I hope that that will be done and that the government will yet give favourable consideration to the request of this house, which was expressed in that vote on March 26.

Now, with respect to the question itself, the parliamentary assistant has not yet dealt with the point that we made in the previous debate as to the unfairness of allowing the deduction for charitable expenses right from the first dollar up to ten per cent of income; whereas in the case of medical expenses the first dollar is not allowed; in fact, nothing is allowed until you reach this four per cent floor. I need not go into that again at length; I have done it on two or three occasions when I have spoken on the matter. But may I say that many of the letters I get on this subject deal with it, and people generally simply do not understand that unfairness. We urge that if people are allowed to make deductions for charitable donations, which they make voluntarily, without any floor, the same attitude should be taken toward medical expenses, which are made involuntarily and of necessity.

The Minister of Finance and the parliamentary assistant have a great deal to say about four per cent being the average medical expense. Well, that same concept might be applied to charitable donations, but it is not. As for this whole concept of averages, Mr. Speaker, surely anyone like the Minister of Finance or the parliamentary assistant who deals in mathematical matters must know how deceiving averages can be. I believe the average personal income in this country at the present time is something over $1,000 per year per person, including every man, woman and child. That would work out to an average personal income per family of about $5,000 per year. But it is no help to the family on $2,000 a year to know that the average is $5,000 a year. As for average medical expenses, the fact of the matter is that what hits the person is not an abstract average but the fact that if he has medical expenses at all, he is probably paying more than the average because somebody else is fortunate enough to go through a year without medical expenses. Statisticians tell us, for example, that about one out of every seven persons is hospitalized every year. Well, to those who are the ones in the seven and who need assistance it is no help simply to be told that four per cent of their income spent on medical costs is an average and therefore cannot be allowed.

This whole business of averages being deceiving was brought out again today in what the parliamentary assistant tried to do, which I thought was not a very sound analysis. He suggested that if we removed this four per cent floor it would reduce the taxable income by four per cent, and would reduce the income tax accruing to the federal treasury by four per cent of the amount estimated by the Minister of Finance. I take it that is where he got his $48 million, which is roughly four per cent of the $1,200 million odd which it is expected will accrue from the personal income tax in the current fiscal year. But I would point out to him that when you abolish the four per cent floor it does not mean that every taxpayer in the country reduces the amount of the income on which he then pays by four per cent, because a great many people will have no medical expenses at all during the course of the year. Then, after you have accounted for that mistake in the parliamentary assistant's reasoning you have to look at another fact. People pay different rates of taxes on their income, depending upon what bracket they are in. Some will be in higher brackets; some in lower. I submit that he has done something that amounts to oversimplification in just assuming that the loss would be $48 million. But whatever it is, Mr. Speaker, his point of course was not concern for the amount, as to whether it was small or large. He sought to make the point that the $48 million would apparently come off everybody on the average, and everybody on the average would in turn have to make it up. My point is that it would not be a saving spread evenly; it would be spread according to the individual taxpayer's medical expenses. I submit that, like all the rest of his argument about averages, what he said was no argument at all.

I said a few moments ago that this letter to the Winnipeg Free Press from Mr. J. W. Gilbert touched on a very important point. He points out that people who have to use certain drugs right along like insulin, for example, in many cases get no benefit at all of the deduction for medical expenses. A year ago, when the Minister of Finance added insulin, cortisone and ACTH and one other drug to the list of items that could be classified as medical expenses, a great ado was made of it by the government. But a great many people who have to use these drugs find that that provision is no help to them, because their expenditures on these drugs in the course of a year, while they may be heavy, while they may be a blow to them, and while it is a blow that they have to meet year in and year out, will not in any one year add up to more than four per cent of the taxpayer's net income. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, my point is that these people are not comforted at all by being told that four per cent of their income for medical expenses is an average. Indeed you are giving no benefit to people who are faced with recurring medical expenses and recurring costs for drugs of this nature. You can only do it if you are prepared to wipe out that four per cent floor.

The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance quoted again today the remarks that he had quoted from the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), and which he gave to the house on March 26. I was very glad when he made that quotation in the first place, and I was glad that he repeated it today, because it indeed is the whole point of our asking for the removal of the four per cent floor, and our suggesting that that is more important than raising the ceiling or making some of the other changes that might be suggested.

Let me read again what the parliamentary assistant said as reported at page 820 of Hansard for March 26:

> The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) raised this proposal of removing or lowering the four per cent item, and pointed out that this would give the maximum help to the little man, the man with just enough income to place him in the income tax bracket.

I concur wholly in the sentiment expressed by the hon. member for Spadina, and I must say that it was about at that point in the speech of the parliamentary assistant on March 26, when he quoted the hon. member for Spadina, that it dawned on me that my motion had a chance of passing. Here was an admission by the parliamentary assistant, despite the difficulties that he had listed, and other difficulties he might add yet, here was an admission that what I was asking for would be of assistance to the little fellow. So I began to realize there was a possibility of my motion passing, and sure enough, a couple of pages later, he indicated that the Minister of Finance was prepared to give consideration to that proposal.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, I need not take the time to repeat the arguments with respect to substance that are in the speech I made on March 26, and that are in the speeches that I have made in former years on this subject. But I do make this passing reference to them, because I think it is our job now in this House of Commons not only to condemn the government as strongly as we can for having hoodwinked the people of Canada on this matter, but it is our job to try to persuade the government to repair this damage at this session. I emphasize the words "at this session", because there is no doubt in my mind that if it is not done at this session it will be done next year, or in whatever budget that comes on the eve of an election.

This will not cost the federal treasury a great deal of money; but it is an issue of concern to the little man, as the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) has said. It is of concern to the people right across this country; and there is no doubt in my mind that this four per cent floor will go before the government goes to the country in another election.

I suggest that that is not a proper discharge of responsibility. That is not loyalty to the principles and practices of democracy—just to fool around with budgetary and taxation matters in that way, leaving desirable changes until election time. If the principle I have set out is good—and it is good, because the whole house said so on March 26, and the newspapers from coast to coast are saying so, as well as the little people of Canada from coast to coast—then let us have it at this session of parliament.

Another reason for my continuing to make this plea for action at the present session, despite the fact that the budget has come down and that it is only very seldom that changes are made after its presentation to the house, is that there have been exceptional occasions when changes have been made. One of those exceptional occasions was one to which I made reference on March 26, because it related to this very question. At the risk of repeating what I said then, I would state briefly that in 1944, when Mr. Ilsley brought down his budget, he included in his budget resolutions two resolutions relating to the deductibility of medical expenses for income tax purposes. They were resolutions numbers 4 and 5 in the list he tabled on June 26, 1944. I shall not take time to read them, but I will point out that neither of those resolutions included any reference to lowering the floor or raising the ceiling. Despite that fact, when we reached committee of ways and means to consider the budget resolution, and got down to resolutions numbers 4 and 5, the committee witnessed a lengthy debate in which the minister of finance was asked to raise the ceiling and to lower the floor.

Hon. members from all sides of the house and in all parties participated in that debate. Indeed, I pointed out on March 26 that even the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) participated in it. I said at that time that in those days he was somewhat closer to the taxpayers' point of view than he is today. He wanted funeral expenses to be included as medical expenses for purposes of the act.

The then minister of finance took part in the debate and accepted the reasonableness of some of the arguments. In the main, however, he stood up against them, and most of us in the house at that time thought that it would be the same old story, that we were making a case for something we would get, but that we would get it one or two sessions later. To our pleasant surprise, however, following the debate which took place in midsummer—July, I believe it was—a bill was brought in to amend the Income War Tax Act, in conformity with what had been contained in the budget resolutions. We found, however, that the bill included something that had not been in those resolutions, namely a section to raise the ceiling and a section to lower the floor.

Prior to that time the floor had stood at 5 per cent, and we had pleaded that it be reduced to 2 per cent or 3 per cent. Mr. Ilsley met us part way—I admit it was only a little way, but at least it was part way—by reducing the floor to 4 per cent. This was welcomed as a demonstration of the fact that once in a while the government does pay attention to a debate in the house. My hope is that there will be sufficient debate at this session with respect to medical expenses so that, when the bill to amend the Income Tax Act is brought in, the government will go a step farther than is provided for in the resolutions, and will make the change asked for on March 26, by way of abolishing this floor altogether.

I do not know what the cost to the treasury would be, but I am satisfied the parliamentary assistant is not correct in suggesting that it would be $48 million. I am satisfied he is not following a correct method of computation, when he arrives at that figure. But whether it is greater or less than that amount, it is a principle of justice and of fairness we are asking for. And in this case it is even more than that. We are asking for a recognition by the government of the clearly expressed wish of parliament, instead of sheer defiance.

Let us not have any more of the attempts we had yesterday, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) interrupted my leader, or the attempt today by the parliamentary assistant, when they tried to hide behind a technicality. Certainly the motion asked that the government consider the matter, as do all private members' motions. The government knows that is as far as private members' motions can go; but it also knows that it looks at each and every one of these motions—and not just at the words down to the word "consideration." It looks at the substance following that word. If the substance is one to which the government does not wish to commit itself, the motion does not pass. But in this instance the government allowed the motion to pass, and to pass unanimously. We had every right to believe that that meant approval of the proposal contained in that resolution.

I submit the criticism we level at the government for ignoring that clearly expressed wish is one which reflects the thinking of the people of this country. I call upon the government to pay attention to that thinking, to make the change at this session and to abolish the four per cent floor under medical expenses in relation to income tax.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, it is well known that I am not a financial critic, but I appreciate the ability of those who are able to do that which I cannot do. I congratulate the financial critic of the official opposition on pulling the budget to pieces, and leaving it as a whole. I think he did a good job.

Today the parliamentary assistant did what I was going to do, when he read from the Financial Post. By doing so he has saved me from that necessity. I read the Financial Post because I can learn something from it, and because usually it tells the truth. I would add to that, that outside the House of Commons the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is held as an outstanding financial expert.

I know we do not like to pay taxes; nobody does. I would rather spend a dollar on cigarettes than on taxes. But taxes have to be paid; and I am one who did not expect the budget this year to contain many reductions in taxation. I did expect there would be reductions in some respects, especially on articles connected with household needs. And those taxes have been reduced.

The people of Fort William know that I have worked for the last number of years to have old age pensions brought to the point where they would be helpful to people over seventy years, and to those in need. Because old age pensions and old age security measures were passed, almost unanimously, I cannot for the life of me see how the amount of taxes could fail to be higher. We congratulate the Minister of Finance upon his taxation measures, and his ability to reduce the national debt. Taxes have been increased since we came into this house. Not long ago I was criticized in Fort William because of the amount of taxes being collected by the dominion government and the surpluses that had been built up. I asked this man what taxes he paid in 1935, 1936 or 1940 and he wanted to send me to the hot place. I said that I was not going there, neither was I going to take our taxes there.

We should realize that taxes are insurance against war, unemployment, poverty, old age, crime and the growth of unpleasant ideologies. If this insurance is being increased to include other ways of helping Canadians then our taxes must go up.

I want to tell the Minister of Finance one place where he can get more money. The Shebandowan district contains large quantities of nickel, gold, iron ore, chromium, tungsten and other minerals. The International Nickel Company should be encouraged to open up the claims they have in that district instead of allowing them to remain idle. I expect to see the minister of mines and ask him his advice.

There are two ways in which the minister could spend a little more. I am not going to ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) to build a gymnasium for the House of Commons, but it is needed. Members who are interested in keeping their health have found other ways of doing that. I was thrilled today to receive from the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) a challenge from members of the opposition and the press gallery to members on this side of the house to meet on the first Thursday in June for our ball game. I accepted willingly.

There is another important way in which the minister could spend some money, to take care of our incapacitated. I am going to lay this matter on the doorstep of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) because I remember how he blotted out little nests of Irish, Scotch, English, Ukrainians, Italians, Russians, Germans and others and made us one Canadian nation. That was a fine thing to do. I remember also how he brought in the scheme to aid hospitals with construction and hospitalization costs. Then last year he brought in his old age assistance and old age security measures.

I am going to lay on his doorstep a problem that is just as important, the taking care of those who are incapacitated. I have a number of letters here but I shall not read them all. I have a long list of incapacitated which I received from the trades and labour council of Fort William, but I shall not read it. However, I should like to read one letter from outside Fort William, from Cape Breton. This is a mother writing, and she said:

> I have a girl 35 years a victim of polio, and a boy 32 years. They are both helpless cripples. They have never had a cent they could call their own. Their father was hurt six years ago in the mine and will never be able to work again. You can imagine the hardships they endure.

Mr. Speaker: Probably I should remind the hon. member—

Mr. McIvor: Do you want me to give the name?

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member wishes to read the letter the house may feel that he should give the name of the writer.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. McIvor: I shall be very glad to do it. The writer is Mrs. Neil K. McNeil.

I think the incapacitated can be divided into three classes. First are those who can get around in wheel chairs, on crutches or in some other way in order to earn a living. Then there are those who cannot get around but who have the use of their hands, their mind, their eyes, their speech and are able to earn a little. Then there are those who cannot get around at all and who cannot earn one cent.

Up to a day or two ago I thought that these were the forgotten people. We have old age pensions, mothers' allowances, family allowances, workmen's compensation and unemployment insurance, but these measures do not touch these people at all. Many of these people have relatives who are mighty proud and do not want to send them to homes for incurables. They want to keep them in their own homes just as John Bunyan held in his heart his little blind girl and kept her with him. These people do everything in order to keep their own folks in their own homes.

While I do not want an extra session this year I think the government would be well advised to take up this matter at this session and see that something is done this year, or at least at the beginning of next year. This is one of the outstanding needs of Canada. To think that we have such people in a Christian country whose program is to feed the hungry, clothe the naked and visit the sick! These people cannot earn a cent. I can take you into a home where a pretty little girl, who is completely helpless, just sits in the corner. She must be fed, she must be dressed, she must be carried everywhere. Yet there is not a dollar for her. Surely the Minister of National Health and Welfare has enough heart to feel that these things should not be.

As I said, I thought that these people were not recognized, that no attention was being paid to them, but the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) has indicated that something is being done. He informs me that officials of the appropriate provincial departments, officials of welfare agencies and officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Department of Veterans Affairs and the Department of Labour are co-operating under a national council to promote as a joint effort the medical and vocational rehabilitation of the disabled.

The first meeting of this council was held in Ottawa in February last. The object of the council is to co-ordinate all existing facilities for helping the disabled to overcome their handicaps and to equip themselves for work and wage earning as was so successfully accomplished with Canada's veterans. At the February meeting Dr. McNally, chancellor of the University of Alberta, was elected chairman and Father Beaudin of Montreal, vice-chairman, with a very strong executive. This indicates that the three dominion departments are combining with the provincial governments to provide for the incapacitated. I like to refer to the suggestions of people on the other side when they suggest something good. Premier Frost of Ontario is going all-out to help the incapacitated of that province, and I am sure that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), and the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) will co-operate. I appreciate very much what has been done for the Fort William district by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). Many things have been done which have helped us. Now this further need is faced not only in Fort William but all over Canada. We think it is an outstanding need, and I will not support an increase in any other pension until this matter is thoroughly considered and settled.

On motion of Mrs. Fairclough the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will continue the debate on the budget. Members may want to know when the house will replace the time taken from private members for the setting up of the committee on redistribution. Tomorrow we expect to put in Votes and Proceedings a notice of motion which will take away next Monday as a private members' day but with the understanding that on that day we will give private members the same time as was taken for government business last Monday.

Mr. Graydon: So that there will be no misunderstanding with respect to the motion of the Minister of Transport to set up the committee having to do with Canadian National Railways, will that be the first order of business tomorrow or the budget?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I think we should take the motion of the Minister of Transport first because from the way he explained it today I think it is urgent. Therefore that will be the first item tomorrow.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. T. G. W. Ashbourne (Grand Falls-White Bay) presented the first report of the standing committee on marine and fisheries, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

OPERATING BUDGET AND CAPITAL BUDGET FOR CALENDAR YEAR 1952

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to lay on the table the operating budget of Trans-Canada Air Lines for the calendar year 1952, together with the capital budget of the company for the same period.

QUESTIONS

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What is the amount recommended to be paid or paid to each of the farmers in the Regina area for cattle that have been destroyed in the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease?
2. How many head of cattle did each of said farmers have?
3. How much has been paid or has been recommended to be paid to the Burns company by way of damages for (a) destruction of buildings or other facilities; (b) for cattle?

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, might I ask the hon. member to allow this question to be dropped, on the understanding that I will give him the full information that is asked for? I do not think it is fair to these people to print that information and to display it to the public in general, but I think it is all right for members to have it and to use it freely.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As long as the information that is furnished may be used, I have no objection to dropping the question, Mr. Speaker. It is to be made clear, however, that any information given privately can be used publicly.

Mr. Gardiner: That is quite all right. It will be given in writing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is satisfactory.

Mr. Speaker: Question dropped.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—DISTRIBUTION OF DRUG RIMIFON

Mr. Gingues:

1. Will the Department of National Health and Welfare make available to the sanatoria the new drug rimifon, as it did for streptomycin, P.A.S. and tibione?
2. When will such drug be made available to patients?

Mr. McCusker:

1. Yes, if present trials prove satisfactory.
2. When requested by the provinces under the federal tuberculosis control grant.

PENSION ACT

ADJUSTMENT OF CLOTHING ALLOWANCE IN CERTAIN AMPUTATION CASES, ETC.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Pension Act (a) to adjust the allowance for excessive wear and tear of a pensioner's clothing, when he wears a prosthesis, to correspond to the increase in the basic scale of pensions; (b) to make more adequate provision when there are two dependent parents of a deceased member of the forces; and (c) to provide for some administrative changes.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

FIRES

VANCOUVER WATERFRONT—DAMAGE TO GOVERNMENT PROPERTY—EFFECT ON SHIPPING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is he in a position to make a report on the disastrous fire on the Vancouver waterfront yesterday? In particular, can he tell us to what extent national harbours board or other government property has been damaged, to what extent shipping from the port will be interfered with, and whether there is to be any investigation by the government?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member was good enough to telephone me this morning that he was going to ask this question, and last evening the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall) spoke to me about the subject matter.

I have before me a wire which gives the general situation, in so far as it can be ascertained at this time, and perhaps I might be allowed to read it to the house:

A serious fire broke out at about 11.45 a.m., yesterday, in Vancouver, destroying jetty No. 3 and loading galleries serving elevator of the United Grain Growers Limited as well as their warehouse on Burrard inlet. The adjacent warehouse, belonging to Buckerfields Limited, containing feed grain and fertilizer, was damaged. The fire was reported under control at 2.45 p.m. The United Grain Growers Limited expect to continue operations by using Kerr Gifford elevator, which is not busy at the present time.

Elevator No. 3, leased to the United Grain Growers Association of Canada, is the property of the national harbours board. It is estimated the damage, together with all other damage suffered by the national harbours board, amounts to from $1 million to $1,500,000. The elevator is covered by insurance to the extent of $1,949,000, with loss payable to the national harbours board. Over and above this there was some damage suffered to the property of the Canadian National Railways. Five box cars were destroyed. One other box car was completely destroyed on an adjacent elevator track, and two other box cars were damaged, but they can be repaired.

The position in so far as shipping is concerned is that the shipping in the harbour is not interfered with in the slightest, with the exception of course of the jetty and pier at which the fire took place. From there shipping has been prohibited. The national harbours board began yesterday the conduct of an investigation into the cause of the fire, but it will be some days before a report is available.

Mr. Green: Could the minister have included in that investigation an inquiry into the adequacy of the protection against fire by way of fire boats? I refer to protection from the water side, if possible.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to remind my hon. friend that the national harbours board has always taken the position that the question of fire protection is not its responsibility. During the war years, by virtue of the powers under the emergency act, provision was made by the national harbours board for protection such as this in our harbours, but that was withdrawn after the war. In the case of Vancouver, the national harbours board does contribute, I think, the sum of $20,000 or $25,000—I think it is the latter amount—

Mr. Campney: It is $25,000.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed it is $25,000—for the maintenance and operation of a fire tug by the city of Vancouver.

Mr. Green: I suggest to the minister that that subject be included in the investigation.

CAMP BORDEN

QUESTION AS TO OUTBREAK OF TYPHOID

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked me about cases of typhoid at Camp Borden. It has now been ascertained that the two men are not suffering from typhoid.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

RECOVERY OF OVERPAYMENTS OF ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs? In view of the assurance that changes in the War Veterans Allowance Act will be made retroactive to January 1, 1952, is it not possible to delay the recovery of any overpayments alleged to have been made since January 1 to recipients 70 years of age and over, until the proposed changes have been enacted?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): It is hoped to introduce the legislation to which my hon. friend refers at a very early date. There is a resolution on the order paper standing in my name on this subject. I hope to be able to bring in a resolution to set up the committee within a few days, and then this could be completely looked into. I certainly will look into the possibility of doing what is suggested by the hon. member, but offhand it would seem to me that following this course might create some uncertainty and confusion among the veterans. I shall have it looked into, and in the meantime I feel sure that no recoveries are being made which are reducing the amounts payable below the recipients' necessities.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a supplementary question? I thank the minister for the assurance he has given that he will have this matter looked into. If I send him the particulars of a case in which recovery is being effected, will he look into it?

Mr. Lapointe: I certainly will.

KOREA

PRESS REPORTS OF EARLY ARMISTICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary for External Affairs. Will the minister comment on the Canadian Press report that the 8th army officials and the general headquarters in Tokyo see possibilities of an early armistice in Korea?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of this question, but I am afraid it does not make an answer much easier. According to the last reports received, agreement has been reached on all but three points with regard to the armistice in Korea. These three points are: first, the nomination by the communists of the Soviet union to be a member of the neutral organ of inspection which is to help to supervise the carrying out of the armistice; second, the conditions under which prisoners of war are to be exchanged, and, third, the claim of the communists that they should be allowed to rebuild and enlarge airfields in North Korea while the armistice is in force.

All three of these problems, Mr. Speaker, are susceptible of solution. Whether they will in fact be solved at an early date is another question. All I can say now is that I know of no recent developments which would cause me to alter the opinion I have expressed previously, that there is a fifty-fifty chance of achieving a satisfactory armistice in Korea.

CANNED PORK

QUESTION AS TO APPLICATION OF FLOOR PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the government's floor price for canned pork ceased to operate? Will the floor price be extended to the canning of more than the original twenty million pounds?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member was kind enough to send me copy of his question. The answer is that there has been no special floor price for pork entering into cans. There is a floor price under hogs, and incidentally, we did put some of the surplus pork into cans. The amount which is set aside for that purpose took care of the twenty million pounds, but surplus pork is now being frozen as Wiltshire sides. The floor price is related only to the hogs themselves.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister allow a question in connection with floor prices? What protection has the farmer who has delivered his pork products to a packer when the returns he receives are less than the amount of the floor price? I think that is becoming more general, and it deserves the attention of the government.

Mr. Gardiner: Farmers are writing in continuously and drawing attention to any cases in which they think that they have not been paid the floor price. These cases are investigated, and in a number of instances adjustments have been made.

Mr. Charlton: Will the minister tell us what they propose to do with Wiltshire sides that are frozen? Is there a possibility of selling some of them to Great Britain?

Mr. Gardiner: We hope that there is a possibility of selling them somewhere as soon as possible. Wiltshire sides frozen can be sold in any form later on. Once they are put into vats for curing of course they make only bacon. As long as they are just frozen they can be used for any kind of pork cut and can be sold anywhere.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

PRESS REPORT AS TO SERVING OF FREE LIQUOR TO PASSENGERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Will the minister comment on the editorial in the United Church Observer of May 1 next, which I have sent him? Is it true that free liquor is being given to passengers by Trans-Canada Air Lines on its run to Trinidad? If so, on whose authority and at whose expense? Is it government policy to permit sales promotion of this kind for particular firms? Will the minister comment on this practice in relation to passenger confidence?

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that this is a question that should come before the house when the minister's estimates are being considered. I do not think it should be asked at this time.

Mr. Graydon: Is there an item in the estimates for it?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I submit there is a feeling of some concern and some urgency in the matter on the part of a body such as the United Church of Canada, which has made editorial comment on it in the current issue of its publication. I am sure there are those who would like to hear from the minister on this question.

Mr. Speaker: I realize it is an important question, but I believe that under house procedure a more satisfactory discussion could take place and a more complete answer could be given when the house is in committee of supply or when these estimates are being referred to a committee.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS AND ESTIMATES OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED TRANSPORTATION LINES

The house resumed, from Wednesday, April 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chevrier for the appointment of a special committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I shall not be a member of this committee; therefore I wish to refer to a matter which on several occasions over the years I have brought to the attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), and to which reference was made yesterday by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I refer to Canadian National Railways pensions, and in particular to the basic pension payable under regulations, not only those existing since 1935 but also those now in effect following the recent changes in connection with pensions in general.

As a result of the recent announcements, considerable improvement has been effected in respect of those in the service who are on pension and who made contributions thereto. But there is no improvement whatsoever in respect of pensioners who did not or will not make contributions.

I wish to refer briefly to the summary sent out by the chairman and president of Canadian National Railways on March 8 last, directed to retired officers and employees receiving pensions under the rules of the Canadian National Railways pension plan, and in particular to that part of the summary which deals with existing pensioners and makes reference to the revisions described therein. I might say that in general the revisions are very satisfactory, and the president and officers of the railways and the chairmen of the various brotherhoods who co-operated in arriving at the pension plan, one very much in keeping with that in effect in the United States, deserve commendation.

At the moment I am raising no objection to the general plan. I believe it is a step forward, one that was necessary and one which, for the last four or five years I have been recommending,—a pension plan in keeping with the responsibilities of those engaged in transport, and one that is actuarially sound.

[Mr. Speaker.]

One of the great difficulties in connection with the plan is that it does nothing for pensioners who are at present on pension. The part of the letter to which I have made reference states:

> The foregoing revisions are applicable to those in the service at January 1, 1952, and who had not attained age 65 prior thereto.

And then it says:

> A pensioner who did not contribute during his service towards a supplementary annuity will continue to receive the basic or service pension to which he is entitled under the existing rules.

That, I submit, is quite unjustified. The amount payable as basic pension is $25 a month. It is an amount that is not reasonable, satisfactory or justifiable. A great many of the employees of the railway company did not make contributions. The contributory feature did not come into effect until 1935. The numbers were set forth in Hansard on March 12, 1951, in answer to certain questions asked. The first question was:

> How many retired employees of the Canadian National Railways are in receipt of pensions of less than $25 per month?

The answer was that there were 24, under the C.N.R. prior plan. Then the next question:

> How many are in receipt of only the basic pension of $25 per month?

The reply was that there were 3,256. Then the next question was, in part:

> How many are in receipt of non-contributory service pensions (a) $25.01 to $29.99 per month; (b) $30 to $39.99 per month; (c) $40 to $49.99 per month?

The answer was:

> (a) $25.01 to $29.99 per month, 745; (b) $30.00 to $39.99 per month, 670; (c) $40.00 to $49.99 per month, 330.

In other words a great many of these retired employees are today in receipt of basic pensions that are not in keeping with a national organization such as the Canadian National Railways. After all, if the government goes into business it should at least pay pensions that would be in keeping with those paid by private industry.

In addition to the questions asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, there was a further series of questions as to how many were in receipt of pensions from $25 to $30 a month who had made contributions. The answer was that there were 459. Of those receiving between $30 and $40 a month who had made contributions, there were 2,115. In other words, out of some 105,000 employees, of whom some 40,000 are contributors, there is a goodly number who receive a pension which has not been improved in recent years and whose claims have been ignored as a result of the findings and conclusions of the committee set up for the purpose of deciding the matter.

Therefore, the responsibility for those who are pensioned rests directly upon the Department of Transport. I am sure that the minister is most sympathetic toward the request made by these people, but sympathy alone is of little use. Recently representations were made to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport by the Canadian Railway Pensioners Association, the grand president of which is Mr. J. T. Cormier, of Moncton. I am going to read the pertinent part of a submission that was made and ask the minister whether representations have been made to Mr. Gordon and the directors of the railway company to give consideration to increasing the amount of the basic pension to the end that a fair and a reasonable basic pension will be provided for those who are at present pensioned.

The pertinent part of the submission reads:

Whereas the Canadian National Railways are owned by the people of Canada and operated by a board of directors appointed by the hon. Minister of Transport on behalf of the government of this country, and whereas the government has from time to time assisted various groups of citizens through subsidies and other assistance, etc., we feel we are justified in requesting assistance for this group of railway pensioners, also due to present high cost of living and devaluation of our purchasing dollar, and knowing that a large number of railway pensioners are in distress, having to depend on charity and municipal assistance, we feel therefore that the present government should direct the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways to provide to all Canadian National Railways pensioners an increase of basic pensions, in order to afford a large number of pensioners a reasonable standard of living, seventy per cent of which do not benefit by old age assistance, under the age of seventy years, particularly retired railway pensioners who through physical disability brought on by hardships suffered in the course of their employment or through service in the defence of their country.

I realize that the minister may take the stand that it is not for him to direct the directors of the Canadian National Railways. Subject to his views in that regard, which I am sure are far removed from directing the directors of the Canadian National Railways, and deleting that portion of the representations, I suggest to him that a strong case has been made out by these people. Their number is considerable; the claims they make are definite, and the grounds for consideration reasonable.

It is not a case of asking for the expenditure of a large amount of money. It is simply a question of asking for assurance that former government employees shall be maintained on an equality with those who have served private industry. Certainly the present basic pension of $25 a month is not in keeping with the dignity of the individuals pensioned; nor is it, may I say with the greatest deference, in keeping with the dignity of this country.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I should like to support what has been said by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and also the continuing plea that has been made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on behalf of these Canadian National pensioners receiving $25 per month. I do not propose to go into the details, because this has been done by the hon. member who has just spoken, and who read to the house the submission made by these people.

I am interested in this matter because my home city is on the main line of the Canadian National Railways. Many people there are affected seriously by this limitation in pension, and many of them have approached me on the matter. I consider it my duty and a privilege to bring it to your attention.

It is true that changes have been made in the Canadian National pension scheme which have resulted in improvement for those now working, but I emphasize the word "now". It also improves the position of those who have been retired on pensions toward which they have contributed in part, that is, those who are receiving pensions of over $25 per month. But there is no improvement at all for those who are retired on pensions of $25 a month.

Of late consideration has been given in most pension schemes to the increased cost of living. Bonuses have been attached to many pensions and wage scales, and I do not see why the same thing should not be done for these people.

It is not clear to me whether this is the responsibility of the government or of the Canadian National Railways, but in view of the connection between the two bodies I am sure that if the government were to give the green light, Canadian National Railways could be persuaded to do something about it. I hope when the minister closes the debate he will answer the questions put to him yesterday by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as to what progress has been made in considering this matter. Consideration of this matter was asked for some time ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, in fact on March 20. At that time the minister said that he had assured the delegation which had approached him that the matter would receive consideration.

That was a month or so ago and I repeat the question my colleague asked yesterday:

What progress has been made in giving consideration to this group whose pensions are limited to $25 per month, an amount upon which it is impossible even to hope to live?

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I feel that something more should be said with regard to these Canadian National pensioners. It is important to bear two things in mind. First, we are not discussing those who are now employed or those who have contributed over five per cent of their gross earnings during their period of employment. I understand that both these groups will benefit under the new pension scheme, for which a good deal of credit should be given to the officers and directors of the railroad and the government. I am pleased to join with those who have expressed that view, but this new scheme does not benefit those already retired who in the past have not contributed more than five per cent of their earnings.

The other point which should be made clear is that although a committee is to be appointed to review the operations of the Canadian National Railways for the past year, there would be no point in discussing this matter in that committee. This is about the only place where we can usefully discuss the matter at this time.

My information is that at one time the officers of the railroad did recommend a scheme which would have benefited these retired employees about whom we are now talking. However, the tentative agreement, which would have been very beneficial and which was approved by the president and, I am given to understand, by the board of directors, was not approved by the government, in spite of the president's efforts to have it approved. If that be the case—and the minister can confirm whether or not it is—the situation is that there is not much point in our getting after the president of Canadian National Railways in the committee to do something which would benefit these pensioners because, depending upon how far he is able to go, his answer must be: Well, I have done all I can, and it is now up to the government. That will be the situation, because it appears that Mr. Gordon and the directors recommended a scheme which would benefit the men but Mr. Gordon was not able to have it approved by the government.

I do not think anything further need be said to emphasize the fact that $25 a month is not enough on which to live. I think nothing need be said as to the humanitarian aspects of the matter. Like the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), I am sure the minister is as sympathetic to the plight of these men as anyone on this side of the house who has spoken about the matter or has taken an interest in it otherwise. But, as has been said, sympathy is not going to help people to live.

It seems to me that the only obstacle to acceding to the request can be the ground that it would involve an expense to the treasury. I should like the minister to confirm my understanding or point out that it is not correct. I understand that the request of these pensioners could be met without a direct grant by the government out of the general tax revenues of the country. The point that has been impressed upon me by the pensioners' association, who have discussed the matter with me in the past, is that their position is that they have contributed in the past to the Canadian National Railways pension fund. They are not asking the government to make a grant so as to increase their pensions, but are asking that the increase be taken out of the C.N.R. pension fund. They say there would be a sufficient amount built up in the fund in future years to enable the request to be met without direct cost to the government.

They point out that they are the people who in past years did contribute to the fund, and although they did not contribute the maximum equal to five per cent of their earnings, they are amongst those who have built up the fund. They say that any increases in pension payments, even the increases now authorized under the new plan, will of necessity have to be taken from the present fund, and that even though increased contributions will be required in future from present employees, the fact is that increased payments to those who have contributed the maximum of five per cent will not come from anything further that they contribute. They say that in the case of an employee who is retired now and goes on pension immediately his increase will not come out of anything he has contributed over and above his former contribution, because there will not be time for the increased contribution to become effective.

They point out that the increased contributions mentioned by Mr. Gordon as justifying increased pensions to the limited class to which it would apply will not show any tangible return for the first five years, that there will be no tangible effect on the pension fund and that employees retired during that period will not have had an opportunity to contribute an amount sufficient to pay for the increased pension payments they will now receive for life. In their representations they also have this to say:

> To us it is inconceivable that an increase in pension payments will be made available in the future to seventy per cent of the employees who have to date contributed nothing to the fund while thirty per cent of the former employees who were regular contributors to the fund will not receive the increase as stated by Mr. Gordon.

As I understand it, the injustice there is that, although these men have not contributed as much as five per cent, they have helped to build up the pension fund. Simply by virtue of the fact they did not contribute up to five per cent maximum they get no increased pension. On the other hand, an employee who retires the day after the new plan comes into effect, and whose contributions at the increased rate will not have had any effect on the amount of the pension fund, will get a pension at the increased rate. Their point is that they helped to build up the fund over the years and that they are now getting nothing extra from it, while the man who helped no more proportionately than they have is now going to get an extra payment from the fund. On the face of it I must say it seems difficult to me to describe that situation as anything but an injustice.

As I say, they make the additional point that they are not asking for a grant from the government or for anything that will increase taxes. They are asking that they be taken care of out of the pension fund which they helped to build up. They have made a submission which to me at least appears reasonable. They say that with the new scale of contributions they could be taken care of as requested out of the pension fund as it now stands and as it will be in the future without the necessity of a government grant.

I hope the minister will review the whole matter. There is no point in our taking it up again with Mr. Gordon before the committee, because I understand he has done his best, made his recommendation, and the present scheme is all he has been able to secure. It seems to me the matter rests entirely with the minister and the government. I hope the minister will have it reviewed and see if he can accede to the request of these $25 a month pensioners.

Mr. P. C. Black (Cumberland): I have a matter of special interest to the province of Nova Scotia. Like the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), I am not a member of the committee. I wish to refer to the introduction of diesel-operated locomotives into the Atlantic division of Canadian National Railways. A few years ago in the committee there was an understanding that oil-operated locomotives would not be used in that division, but they are being introduced more and more and I understand that a large number are now on order. If this plan is proceeded with, the most assured market for Nova Scotia coal will be destroyed. The companies and the workmen are most uneasy about the introduction of oil-burning engines in the Atlantic division and the threat of the further use of such locomotives.

It is a very important matter to the province of Nova Scotia, and I think there should be some assurance given by the minister or some action taken by the committee to make sure that the market Nova Scotia has had for so long for its coal will not be destroyed. It is not only a question of a market for the producers of Nova Scotia; in past years the production of this coal has been most necessary to enable the Canadian National Railways and the Intercolonial Railway to operate at all. It is a most important matter and is causing considerable uneasiness in my province.

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Before the minister replies, may I say that over a year ago representations were made to me, and I placed them before the house, concerning the desire of employees of Canadian National Railways to participate in reserve training. I pointed out that they were being discouraged. In other words, they were more or less told not to do it. Assurance was given me at that time that the matter would be looked into and corrected. Last week I had the opportunity to talk to certain employees, and they told me that although the assurance had been given, the spirit of the assurance is not being carried out. They say they are being discouraged with respect to serving in the reserves and going to camp.

They mentioned Petawawa. I do not know why they wanted to go to Petawawa, but that was the place they mentioned. I served some time at Petawawa myself, and I do not see why they would want to go there. I hope the men who are prepared to serve in the reserve forces will be given an opportunity to do so, and will not be discriminated against when they make application.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): I want to say one word in reference to these pensions to railroad men, especially those in the lower income group. Many of those men have paid into this fund for forty or fifty years. During that time each dollar they paid in was worth a dollar. Now they are about to receive a pension when the dollar is worth only fifty cents. I would like the minister to take that into consideration.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The minister will close the debate.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the house for this short and interesting debate on the subject of the pensions of employees of the Canadian National Railways. I am particularly pleased that the view of the house is that the position is far better than it was when the earlier debate took place, and of course with that I am in full agreement. That is one point the house perhaps should take into consideration, namely the improved pension position of C.N.R. employees, both those retired and those still on duty.

There are several points I would like to make, as briefly as possible; but two in particular lead me to make the statement that the position of these men is far better than it was when the debate took place last year. The first of these points has been mentioned by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and I believe by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who referred to the revised pension rules of the Canadian National Railways. There is no doubt that the pension plan has been greatly improved. I would remind the house that the revised rules were arrived at following discussion between officers and employees of the Canadian National Railways. After they had studied the matter for many months, if not more than a year, they recommended to the government the adoption of the new pension plan, which I believe is far better than the old one. It received the full approval of the men, and I believe there is correspondence on record to indicate that while the pension plan does not go nearly as far as many of us would like, it is nevertheless a great improvement over the previous plan.

That is the first point I wish to make, namely the substantial change in the position of these men. The next point is that this house approved a universal old age pension of $40 a month without a means test for those over 70 years of age, the total cost being met by this government. It also passed legislation providing for a pension of $40 a month, half the cost to be paid by this government, to those between 65 and 70, with a means test. As a result the man who is in receipt of a basic pension and who is 70 years of age gets an additional $40 a month, as does the man between 65 and 70 who can prove his position to be such that he is in need of the additional amount. So the position in reference to these men is far better than when the matter was discussed earlier.

Another feature seems to have been forgotten entirely. It is that no official representations were made to me by the president or the directors of the Canadian National Railways along the lines suggested by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton).

Mr. Diefenbaker: Were there any unofficial representations?

Mr. Chevrier: I will come to that in a moment. What happened was that both the president of the Canadian National Railways and his predecessor held talks with the view of increasing the basic pension. Those talks were suspended because the Canadian National Railways and their employees were discussing a revision of their pension plan. I believe the intention at the time was that some sort of actuarially sound plan might be submitted to the government which would have the effect of increasing the basic pension. But when it became known that the government was bringing down legislation providing for universal old age pensions, as well as the legislation I referred to a moment ago, it became clear that the plan would have to be changed. In the light of the legislation brought down in the house the whole position concerning the pension discussions, to which I referred a moment ago, with Mr. Gordon and his predecessor Mr. Vaughan, was reviewed not by us but by the pension committee of the Canadian National Railways in co-operation with their men. Their recommendation was that the basic pension of $25 per month in part 1 of the plan should remain in force. That was the recommendation we received, and that was the recommendation to which we saw no objection.

When it is said that it is the responsibility of the Department of Transport or of the government to see to it that these basic pensions are increased, I have always stated in this house that I think that is the responsibility of management with its employees. That certainly was the position they took in reference to the revised pension rules. If notwithstanding the new rules that have been adopted they feel there should be an amendment and make a recommendation to us to that effect, I assure the house and those responsible that such representations will receive very careful consideration.

Mr. Fulton: If the minister will permit a question, does he feel that the principle he has just stated, namely, that it is entirely the responsibility of management, applies equally to past employees and present employees?

Mr. Chevrier: I was just coming to that. I wanted to say a word on that subject, and that will deal with the question raised the other day by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

The delegation that waited upon me was not a delegation of retired C.N.R. employees. It was a delegation of Intercolonial and P.E.I. former employees. They were here to speak for themselves, but said they thought they also spoke for the employees of the Canadian National Railways. When I asked if their position was not infinitely better because of the legislation that had been passed, they admitted that it had been improved. They did state there were some cases in which there was hardship. I asked them to indicate how many such cases there were, but they were not in a position to say. They did state, and I believe, that in some cases there is hardship, but I am sure such cases are in the minority. To deal with my friend's question, when the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton)—

Mr. Knowles: Before the minister leaves his comment on the representations from that delegation, can he say what has resulted from his undertaking to them that their representations would be given consideration?

Mr. Chevrier: I told them that that is what would happen, namely that their representations would receive consideration. The hon. member for Kamloops raises a point which is so, namely that there would be, because of the new pension rules, two classes of pensioners who still receive less than $40 a month: those who would be pensioned after January 1, 1952 and who have not contributed to their pension fund, and those who are now on pension and did not avail themselves of the opportunity of increasing their pension. But I presume that those two classes were given consideration by the committee that discussed the matter over a period of months and recommended this plan.

As I stated earlier, if there are recommendations along the lines of those submitted by members of this house, they will be considered; but I must say that for the government to direct the Canadian National Railways to review the cases mentioned—which are not nearly as numerous as they were last year—would be placing itself in the position of having to do the same thing for other groups, as I indicated before, such as superannuated civil servants, pilots who are on retirement and a number of like groups. I think that the practice that we have followed is the right one. We have allowed the railway, in co-operation with its employees, to study these plans and to make recommendations to us. I think that has proven to be a satisfactory method of operation and I submit to the house with deference that we should continue to follow that plan of action.

There were other matters that were raised here by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) and one other member. I think they are matters that should receive the attention of the officers of the railway when they are here in committee and who can deal with these particular problems, as it is somewhat difficult to debate them on a motion of this kind.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister permit one more question before he sits down? He said that the plan that is now in effect has had the endorsation of the C.N.R. pension fund committee which consists of representatives of management and representatives of the employees. Is it not a fact that the representatives of the employees on that committee, even after it was common knowledge that there would be changes in our old age pension legislation, pressed for something to be done for those who are already retired on only $25 a month?

Mr. Chevrier: I am not in a position to say whether they pressed individually. They may well have sent letters to me, because I received a considerable number of letters. I am not, however, aware that any representations came from them to me or to the government directly along the lines suggested by my hon. friend.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORT, AUDITORS' REPORT AND BUDGETS TO RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, if we can revert to motions by leave of the house I wish to move:

That the annual report of Trans-Canada Air Lines for the year ended December 31, 1951, tabled on March 24, 1952, the auditors' report to parliament for the year ended December 31, 1951, and also the operating budget and the capital budget for the calendar year 1952 in respect of Trans-Canada Air Lines, tabled earlier this day, be referred to the sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.

Mr. Knowles: Now that this motion is before us, perhaps the minister will answer the question I put to him on the orders of the day.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, so far as I know, every airplane and every ship that travels outside of the territorial waters of Canada serves liquor to its passengers; that is, it makes liquor available for purchase. In that regard Trans-Canada Air Lines does exactly the same as every other air line and as every passenger ship. A practice has grown up which, as I understand it, is going to be terminated for the transatlantic service on the first day of May, namely, that of serving one free cocktail with a meal. That has been standard practice with every air line. Some air lines are more generous than Trans-Canada.

Mr. Fulton: Free, you mean?

Mr. Howe: Yes, free. That is part of the food service of Trans-Canada Air Lines. My hon. friend asks who pays for the free drink. I suppose it is the same person who pays for the free meal. It is paid for in the fare of the passenger. After the first of May of this year the transatlantic fare will not include an allotment for either food or the free cocktail. If you want food, you will pay for it; and if you want a cocktail, you will pay for it. I hope that covers my hon. friend's question.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORTS, BUDGETS AND CERTAIN ESTIMATES TO RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, by leave of the house I wish to move:

That the annual reports for 1951 of the Canadian National Railways, Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, the Canadian National Railways securities trust, and the auditors' report to parliament in respect to the Canadian National railway system and the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, tabled on April 3, 1952, and the budget of the Canadian National Railways and Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, for 1952, tabled on April 21, 1952, be referred to the sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, together with the following items of estimates for 1952-53:

Vote 485—Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals—deficit;

Vote 486—Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited—deficit;

Vote 493—Maritime Freight Rates Act—payment of twenty per cent reduction in tariff of tolls to Canadian National Railway and other railways operating in territory fixed by the act.

And that the resolution passed by the house on March 19, 1952, referring certain estimates to the committee of supply, be rescinded in so far as the said resolution relates to votes Nos. 485, 486 and 493.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, April 23, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, in proceeding with this debate I should like to draw attention to a statement made the other evening in this house by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) when, as reported at page 1474 of Hansard, he said:

. . . there is not much satisfaction to many of our taxpayers to hear these millions and billions bandied about—they do not live in a world of millions and billions; they live in a world of fives and tens, and less than that. It is the ordinary taxpayer that I am interested in, and it is the ordinary taxpayer that this house exists to protect.

I believe that this is a profound truth that is too often overlooked in this chamber. After all, we are here to provide for and to protect the interests of all the millions of little taxpayers in the whole of this dominion of Canada. As taxes rise and the basis for taxation becomes increasingly important, the deductions from income which are allowed before the incidence of tax become a matter of grave concern to every employed person and to every recipient of income from any source whatsoever. As the high levels of tax are maintained, and the prices at the consumer level increase or fluctuate in a tantalizing manner, as they do, around the peak, it becomes necessary to pay more and more attention to the alleviation of distress, particularly in the lower income brackets.

When I was preparing the notes from which I propose to speak today I was surprised to find that about 75 per cent of them dealt with income tax, and it may well be that in the time at my disposal, Mr. Speaker, I may not be able to speak about anything but income tax. There are several matters that I should like to bring to the attention of this house, matters that have come to my attention possibly because of the peculiar nature of my own business. One is the matter of taxation of pensions; that is, privately purchased pensions, which should claim the attention of this house.

We assume that a man purchases a pension payable to himself on retirement or to his estate upon his demise. The pension was provided, let us say, by tax-free contributions, and therefore it is fully taxable as income when it is received. Well, that is all quite regular; it is an accepted fact, and the purchaser knows it before he makes his contract. The purchaser dies, and the widow is the sole beneficiary. The pension is then valued for succession duty purposes and is part of the estate that he has left. So the duty is paid out of cash resources, with the result that the balance in the estate yields a reduced income. The widow is taxed duty on the estate, and income tax is payable on the revenue from what is left of the estate after the payment of that succession duty. It is, I submit, an anomaly that the value of the pension is fixed for succession duty without any abatement of income tax; because if the state removes say 25 per cent of the value as succession duty, then theoretically there is only 75 per cent left to provide income, and that 75 per cent of the income should be taxed; either that, or no income tax should be payable until the widow has received as much in pension as she had paid out in succession duty on the value of the pension. Certainly there is an element of double taxation in the present system, and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the situation should be corrected.

The subject of double taxation brings up another point. Two years ago double taxation received the attention of the government, and a manner of relief was granted to the taxpayer, whereby he was permitted to deduct from his tax the amount of 10 per cent of the net dividends which had been received from taxable Canadian corporations. On the 1951 return it works out something like this. In order to illustrate the point I have calculated on a hypothetical income of $7,000, the whole of which was secured from dividends from taxable Canadian corporations. I have selected $7,000 and the status of a married person because, with the $2,000 exemption, it gives us a nice round figure of $5,000 on which to calculate. That may be a lazy woman's way of doing it, but nevertheless that is what I have done. I found out that that person will owe $1,104 in tax, composed of the regular income tax and the surtax on investment income. Added to this $1,104 in 1951 there was first of all the defence surtax of 10 per cent, which came to $110.40, and brought the total tax payable up to $1,214.40. Then, and only then did the 10 per cent of net dividends apply against the tax payable. Now the net result of that is this: Had the 10 per cent of net dividends been deducted from the tax payable, the total tax payable, before the imposition of the surcharge, the taxpayer would have benefited to the extent of the 10 per cent originally intended. However, now that the defence surtax has been added first, the taxpayer finds that instead of 10 per cent allowance for income from taxable Canadian corporations, he has a 9 per cent allowance.

As we go into another taxation year we find that the situation is worsened to this extent: Instead of the 10 per cent defence surcharge we have the 20 per cent surtax, and following the same procedure right down the line we find that we have the same tax at the level before the application of the defence surtax of $1,104; with the addition of the 20 per cent, it brings it up to $1,324.80, and on the $1,324.80 the $700 tax refund applies. Had the tax refund been taken off the total tax before the imposition of the 20 per cent defence tax, the taxpayer would have his full 10 per cent. As it is, if the government proceeds in this manner in 1952 as it has for 1951, the taxpayer will lose an additional 2 per cent, and instead of the 10 per cent allowance he will find that he has an 8 per cent allowance. This is in spite of the fact, Mr. Speaker, that the corporations did pay the defence tax; so the double taxation is indeed doubled and redoubled, let us say.

This relief was intended in the first instance as a straight deduction from total tax. I would just like to say this, and maybe I can pass it on as a word of advice to the minister. I hope he has already thought of it. Before he has the income tax returns printed for 1952 I hope they will be carefully reviewed. If this juggling was not deliberate, then the forms should be printed in such a way as to permit the deduction of 10 per cent of dividends from taxable Canadian corporations before the imposition of the defence surtax. If it was deliberate then I can only say one thing, namely, Indian giver.

It might also be noted that anyone who has investment income of over $2,400 is also liable for the 4 per cent surtax, which added on about 25 per cent or more to the net allowance of 10 per cent of dividends, so that the person who has followed the advice of the government from time to time and has been thrifty, has saved his money, and then, possibly being a bit of a gambler has invested in Canadian corporations, purchasing stocks which pay him dividends, and on which, as income of each company, the tax has already been collected—he has not invested his money in bonds—he has not invested it in real estate; he has invested it in industrial Canada. And because the government took cognizance of the fact that there was this element of double taxation, the relief was granted.

It would seem that, having granted that relief, the government has repented, and these people are in the position of being penalized for their thrift. Possibly it is a case of robbing Peter to pay Paul, but it seems to me it is a matter that should be considered carefully and rectified before the end of the present taxation year. I find it hard to believe that this was done deliberately. I think the effect of such action must surely have been an oversight in the department.

There is also a recommendation with respect to this 10 per cent of dividend income which was passed on to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) by the taxation section of the Canadian Bar Association and the legislation committee of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants in March of 1952.

Among many other recommendations, all of which in my opinion are remarkably commendable, there is one that has reference to a situation obtaining where the spouse of a taxpayer has investment income which is not sufficient to warrant the payment of a tax. In other words, if I may quote from the recommendation:

> The result is that in many cases the supporting spouse pays a greater tax than would be exigible if his spouse's income in excess of $250 were in fact added to his own income. This will be true in every case in which the supported spouse's separate income over $250 is less than the aggregate of the tax exemptions to which he or she is entitled.

Then these organizations make this recommendation:

> It is accordingly recommended that the act be appropriately amended so that in cases to which section 25 (2) would otherwise apply to supporting spouse may at his option and for all purposes of the act elect to have any specific items of the income of the supported spouse treated as his income and excluded in computing the income of the supported spouse.

This is a situation with which all accountants are familiar, and I trust the government will accept the recommendation of these two responsible bodies, and implement the recommendation.

I could not speak in this debate without touching upon a matter that has received considerable attention in the last few days, and one upon which I spoke when the resolution with reference to the elimination of the four per cent hold-back on medical expenses was being considered. At that time I cited a hypothetical case of a taxpayer who was supporting another individual who was ill and who eventually died. The taxpayer was not only burdened with this expense but, in addition, was reduced in status from the married to the single state. Peculiarly enough, on the very week end, when I went back to my office I had the exact duplicate of that case placed before me, upon which I was asked to prepare income tax returns.

I should like to place before the house the facts of that case. This woman had not been enjoying good health, and because of that her income had suffered. She had not been able to devote to her business the attention it had formerly received. Her sister, who was dependent upon the taxpayer in question for support, and who had lived with the taxpayer for many years—indeed, I believe, all her life—became very ill.

When the taxpayer brought her income return to me and asked me to figure it out she placed before me medical bills which, upon totalled, showed the sum of $2,990.20. In addition to that there were $500 funeral expenses. Meantime the income of the taxpayer had shrunk to the point where she could claim only $107.60 of the medical expenses in computing her tax for 1951. She said to me, "What shall I do with the rest of these bills?" I said to her that I was sorry, but that so far as I could see she might as well forget she had ever paid them, because she could not claim a cent of them. This taxpayer could not understand why in 1952 she could not claim some of these bills. I believe her point was well taken, and that she should have been able to claim them. The fact is however that one can claim expenses only on behalf of a dependent, and the position then was that the taxpayer in question was no longer supporting the dependent. Therefore she could not claim, despite the fact that some of the bills were incurred in the latter part of the year and that, in normal circumstances, if her sister had lived she could have made the claim under the twelve months provision.

Had the sister lived, the taxpayer would have had not only the opportunity to claim for these bills but an additional exemption by reason of her having supported the sister. It is clear therefore that this taxpayer was placed in a peculiar position. As a woman past middle age, and one who had worked for many years, she had accumulated some small savings, the greater part of which have now been dissipated through the payment of these extraordinarily high medical expenses.

If the department has not already considered the matter, then I suggest to it that provision should be made for cases such as the one I have described, and that in the year following that in which the taxpayer has incurred the expense an opportunity should be afforded to deduct from taxable income those medical expenses paid out on behalf of a person deceased. I agree that this provision could not be extended over a period of years, but I believe an allowance might be made in the year immediately following. I commend this to the department for its consideration.

In connection with the elimination of the four per cent, I have worked out a few specimens which I believe the house will find interesting. The first of these deals with a single person receiving a salary of $50 a week and who, as in the case of the woman whose circumstances I have just described, was responsible for a dependent for whom heavy expenses were incurred. This person maintained the dependent in a self-contained domestic establishment, and would be entitled to married status affording a tax exemption of $2,000. Then the taxpayer loses the dependent and is left with some heavy bills which, as obtained in respect of my client, could not be paid in one year. We will say that in the first year the taxpayer pays $300 or $400 of the bills which have accrued. He will then deduct from the amount he claims for medical expenses four per cent of his income of $2,600, or the sum of $104. If we suppose that he took off $400 he would have to deduct therefrom $104, leaving $296. As I mentioned before in the other case, the rest of the expenses that would have been paid in subsequent years could not be charged at all. This is slightly different from the other case I gave as an example. In this case the person could not pay all the expenses at once and they had to be spread over the years.

Many institutions and medical people in this country would probably just address their bills to the taxpayer and say "for professional services" and forget that the person on whose behalf the expenses had been incurred had died. In that way the taxpayer would be able to claim those expenditures as medical expenses. I do not like that way of doing things. I think we should make provision for these cases so that we do not force people to evade the law in order to obtain their just deserts. Even in such a case the taxpayer again loses out on the 4 per cent income in each year. If it takes three years to pay this he loses, as I said the other night, not 4 per cent but 12 per cent of his income in exemptions.

The next specimen which I worked out had to do with a married man with two children making $60 per week. With his exemptions his taxable income would be $820, which would put him in the lowest bracket of 15 per cent. He would pay 15 per cent on the $820 with the surtax of 20 per cent on top of that. That would cost him $147.60. Suppose he has $120 in medical expenses. The extra tax on the $120 at 18 per cent would be $21.60 which he would lose because the $120 would be short of the 4 per cent of his income and therefore he could not claim anything. Supposing that he has more than $120, he still loses the 18 per cent tax payable on the 4 per cent of his income, which is a difference of $22.46.

Likewise the man who makes $75 a week, is married with three children. He would have a tax payable—I will skip all the preliminaries—of $271.80, counting the defence surtax. Supposing he had $450 in medical expenses, which is not even out of the way in many cases if you have but one serious illness in a family of five people; if the total were allowed, his saving would be $91.80. However, if the 4 per cent is disallowed then he saves only $59.98. In other words, by reason of this 4 per cent floor he loses $31.82 in taxes.

I maintain that this situation should be corrected. There are a great many families who, expenses being as they are, find it difficult to bring up children in the manner in which they would like to bring them up, or even to provide for them certain things which we in our modern age consider necessary. From the taxpayer's standpoint each year he is robbed of 4 per cent of income in the matter of this tax exemption. It is quite feasible that even with a small income that would mean $150 tax exemption in each year. If he is bringing up three children—take the case I mentioned of a $3,900 income —he loses a tax exemption of $156 each year because we must recognize that while every family would not have medical expenses, the average family with three children is apt to have medical expenses. It takes one form or another, either dental care, the youngsters getting measles or chickenpox, someone breaking a leg or having to go to the hospital for appendicitis or tonsillitis. All these things cost money. When you have even a minor operation you find that the bills run up.

I do not think it unreasonable to assume that a man in that tax bracket or that income bracket would have $150 medical expenses every year, but he cannot claim one cent because he has not yet reached 4 per cent of his income. Over a period of ten years while his family was growing up he would in fact lose $1,500 in tax exemptions. A saving in tax exemption of that size might mean all the difference between university or no university for one of the children.

When the parliamentary assistant was speaking yesterday he made a statement to which I must take objection.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Only one?

Mrs. Fairclough: The hon. member for Greenwood says "only one?" I must admit that he made a great many, but I do take great exception to one statement. On page 1524 of Hansard he is reported as having made this statement:

> In this instance, if the four per cent, which is less than the national average of hospital, medical, dental and drug care, was removed, that would remove four per cent of the present taxable income of this nation. It would result in a reduction in our personal income tax receipts of four per cent or approximately $48 million.

I do not understand how the parliamentary assistant could make a statement like that. Such a figure must be predicated on two assumptions. First, that the personal taxable income is $1,200 million, and second that every taxpayer would have medical expenses up to or exceeding 4 per cent of his taxable income. That is just sheer nonsense. The white paper tabled when the minister made his budget speech gave a preliminary estimate of personal income taxes for 1951 as $890 million, and I find this figure in table 4 on page 13. I assume that that is the calendar year. Then on page 78 where they deal with the last five fiscal years the tax revenue from individual income tax is estimated at $980 million.

Upon asking a question of the department I secured a figure for the actual individual income tax receipts of $975,776,000. Even that amount does not come anywhere near the supposed $1,200 million upon which the parliamentary assistant's statement would have to be figured. As I said before, it would have to be predicated on the assumption that every taxpayer in the country would have medical expenses beyond 4 per cent of his income.

Mr. Sinclair: May I make just one statement. That of course is less than the average in these things across the country which affects both income and income tax. I will admit that I did make one mistake. I should have deducted from that average the $30 million which would be claimed by people who were above the average last year. That is $30 million on the income, not on the tax.

Mrs. Fairclough: On the taxable income.

Mr. Sinclair: Which is some $6,000 million.

Mrs. Fairclough: With all due deference to the parliamentary assistant, I submit that his figures are far wide of the mark. I do not think they can be substantiated at all. I really must take exception to this type of thing being done. In my estimation this is an example of expansive, irresponsible misstatements which make it most difficult to come to grips with a real problem in this house. I find it occurring more and more frequently. I do not approve of it at all, and I do not think any of us should condone that type of thing.

The question is not what amount would be lost to the treasury through such tax relief. The question is: Is it right? In my opinion the principle transcends dollars and cents considerations. In all the legislation that has gone through this house for the relief of taxpayers in general or for the relief of specific groups who have suffered misfortune, I cannot recall that these problems were ever settled on the basis of whether it was going to cost $1 million, $2 million or $65 million. They were settled on the basis of whether or not it was right. I maintain this particular problem should be settled on the same basis.

The minister brought in one amendment respecting medical expenses which I was very glad to see. I refer to the elimination of the word "incurred". Peculiarly enough, three or four days before the budget was brought down I had spoken to the deputy minister of national revenue about this subject because I had found that in the local district offices where I had had dealings they paid little or no attention to this word. It was the generally accepted practice to permit deductions if receipts were filed. Therefore I felt the word should be eliminated. I was amused and gratified that someone else had had exactly the same thought and that the department had removed this particular phrase which in the past had put the practice out of line with the regulations.

We have to admit that the incidence of income tax weighs most heavily on people in the smaller income groups and upon those people who have children. This brings me to another matter that I should like to discuss, the rate of exemption permitted for children. Before family allowances the rate varied, being at times $400 and at other times $500, but with the advent of family allowances there were two rates. At the present time the rate is $150 per child eligible for family allowance and $400 for a child who is not eligible. There are people with children who move into this country and people who bring children into the country. I have one case that has been referred to me of a man who brought a stepson to Canada from England. The man had lived here all his life, had married and the woman he married had a son in England. He brought the child to Canada intending to adopt it as his own. The child entered the country in November of 1950. A year must elapse before they can claim family allowance on behalf of the child. The situation developed in this way. The year elapsed. The parent then claimed family allowance and received it but by reason of receiving family allowance for one month he lost $250 exemption for that child. In other words, he got $8 and he lost $250 exemption.

When looking into the matter I referred to the papers he had sent me and which I received only recently. Among them was an income tax form which was given to him by the district office. At the foot of it there is a note reading as follows:

"Child qualified for family allowance" means a child that, in the last month of the taxation year in respect of which the expression is being applied, was qualified or might have been qualified by registration under the Family Allowances Act, 1944, so that an allowance under that act was or might have been payable in respect of that month or the immediately following month.

The way this reads it would appear that if the child's allowance had come through one month later, and the taxation year had been 1951, the taxpayer would have had the reduction taken in exemption despite the fact that he received no family allowance at all in the year 1951 but received the first cheque in January 1952. The fact that the child was eligible in the last month of the year, whether or not payment had been received, removed the exemption of $400 and brought it down to the $150 level.

Mr. Sinclair: May I make one observation. You appreciate of course that in the year the child of November birth comes off family allowance the parent gets the family allowance for eleven months of the year and then because the child is off family allowance in the twelfth month he can claim the $400.

Mrs. Fairclough: I realize that. I do not want to interrupt the parliamentary assistant but I have only a few minutes left. Peculiarly enough, in the case to which I have referred the child was 16 in January. Therefore the parent had his exemption cut from $400 to $150 because of one payment in December, received one payment in January and then got no more. I admit it is an odd case, but that is what happened. I maintain that in those circumstances he should not even have had to apply for family allowance. He did not want to apply and he should not have had to do so. Whether or not he received the cheque he would still have been in the same position.

The small income groups are in a very sad plight today because of the taxation in this country. They are gradually losing their savings. I know of many who have cashed insurance policies in order to keep going, to pay for illnesses and the many other things which beset a family. That is largely as the result of the heavy taxes levied upon them. Taxes for what? To reduce the national debt? They were not consulted whether or not they wanted to reduce the national debt, and the house was not consulted as to whether or not it wished to reduce the national debt. Yet these people are paying taxes for that purpose. In the last five years the national debt has been reduced by $2,344 million, an average of $33½ per person per annum. For a family of five it is $167½ per annum or $837½ for the five years.

That would go a long way toward the ownership of a small house. With housing loans reduced and credit restrictions in force the little fellow has not much of a chance. The thing that builds a nation is the faith of its people and their pride. On Tuesday last the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) said, as found at page 1513 of Hansard:

When a man owns his home he has his roots in the soil; he is a citizen; he belongs to the country and to a certain part of it.

I submit that if an agent or trustee were given money by an individual with which to purchase a house for him and when he requested possession of the house he was told, "Sorry, but you owed some money elsewhere and I applied your payments on your debt; you do not own a house", the law would take a very dim view of the agent's activities. In fact he would find himself in a very precarious legal position. If the minister believes the national debt should be reduced let him say so. Let him put into the budget an amount for that specific purpose and not call it public buildings which cannot be built, clothing for the forces which cannot be used, equipment which is not required, and then turn round and say to the little fellow: Sorry, we could not use your money for that so we paid your debts.

Mr. G. D. Weaver (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, two years ago this month I took part in another budget debate in this chamber, and congratulated the government on their handling of the affairs of this country. At that time I asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) to lend a sympathetic ear to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in his plans for the development of the west under P.F.R.A. At the same time I asked him to lend a sympathetic ear to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) in any plans he might bring forward respecting railway development in our great northland. I also asked the Minister of Finance to take as his yardstick in financing and government spending the words of an eastern farmer: "Break the back forty acres before you build a new front porch". I said I would ask the minister to move in that direction as far and as fast as our resources would permit.

Unfortunately war broke out in Korea shortly after that, which brought heavy demands upon the economy of Canada, and I could not expect very much headway to be made in the direction I had pointed out. However, as I look back I find that considerable progress has been made. I find that the Lynn Lake railway to which I referred at that time is daily pushing further and further into that northland. Since that time P.F.R.A. surveys have been carried out in an area which I described in that address. Two years ago I spoke of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) looking northward; these were the words I used, at page 1839 of Hansard for 1950:

—looking northward at a treasure house beside which fabulous wealth, to which the genie of Aladdin's lamp had access, was peanuts.

I went on to illustrate, and spoke of the Flin Flon mine. This is what I said at that time, at page 1840 of Hansard:

The Flin Flon mine went into production in 1930 with ore reserves at that time of 19 million tons. Today Flin Flon is a town of 10,000 persons. In 1949 it produced $37 million worth of metals. It paid directly into the treasury of the people of Canada in income taxes and ore royalties, more than $5,500,000, and indirectly another $1,500,000. Considering the 10,000 people who derive their livelihood from that mine, they have contributed from five to seven and one-half times the national average towards the revenues of $2,500 million collected last year by the Minister of Finance.

I have before me the annual report of that same company for 1951, and I want to point out the further progress that has been made. The revenue from that mine in 1951 instead of $37 million was $54,250,000. Instead of paying $5,500,000 into the treasury of the people of Canada the figure was $12,100,000. Instead of $1,500,000 paid indirectly, the figure is now $3 million. The total revenue of the government last year was not doubled, however; instead of the $2,500 million I mentioned in 1950 it was $4,000 million, an increase of only 60 per cent. So the figure I mentioned of from five to seven and one-half times the national average, as representing the wealth created by these people, now has become from seven to ten times the national average. As I said at that time, it was surely something to gladden the heart of the Minister of Finance to find such revenues coming from these mines in northern Canada.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I am going to lift the lid of the treasure box and give you a further glimpse into what you may expect to come out of the northland in the near future. I will deal for a moment with the railway picture, starting with the very poorest. The Lynn Lake railway is opening up a new mining development which has turned the eyes of the people to northern Manitoba. With the movement of the town of Sherridon to Lynn Lake, that railway reaches far into the north. It is only about 100 miles from a place called Brochet on Reindeer lake, which itself is only a short jump from Uranium City in northern Saskatchewan, which in the not far distant future will be a town of 5,000 people, and which requires railway facilities. Once you reach that point it is only another short jump to Pine Point on Great Slave lake, where is one of the greatest undeveloped ore bodies in the world. At that point you are down to an elevation of 600 feet, and can follow along the Mackenzie river to a point where it is just a short jump to Alaska. If you take a globe—there is no point in looking at an ordinary map—and draw a line from central Alaska through this area to eastern Canada you will find that the shortest route from Alaska to the industrial areas of the east is via Lynn Lake and on down through Manitoba.

Up in northern Manitoba we have the Hudson Bay railway, which has been mentioned many times in this house. I do not think many people realize just what that railway means at the present time. Last year 7,250,000 bushels of wheat were shipped over that route. That in itself puts the Hudson Bay railway in the black. There are certain savings because of the short route to Europe. Those savings do not necessarily come back to Canada, but somebody gets them, and they are just like sugar scattered out to attract ants, the ants in this case being the ships that can make money coming to Churchill to pick up wheat. The more ships that come, the more wheat will be shipped from there, so today that is a paying proposition for the people of Canada in spite of any minor deficits that may show in the balance sheets. I can assure this house that those deficits will be wiped out in the very near future. Interests in Zurich, Switzerland, are interested in taking out 200,000 tons of pulpwood a year through the port of Churchill. This year they are taking out a trial shipment of 5,000 cords. I will try to put this in figures which will be easy to understand. Those 200,000 tons of pulpwood will mean revenue to the Hudson Bay railway equal to that from 8 million bushels of wheat. So no one in the east and no one in this house need feel that if they do see a small deficit in the accounts, they are paying for the upkeep of something that is not of value to this country.

I would like to mention another point in regard to this northern area. Last year 22 million pounds of fish were shipped out of northern Manitoba. This year 30 million pounds of fish were shipped out of northern Manitoba, and there are going to be many large increases as the Lynn Lake railway keeps working north.

I turn now to the mining picture. Few people know that northern Manitoba is the coming nickel capital of the world. I think I am conservative in this estimate; some people may dispute it but I am being careful to be conservative. Approximately 75 per cent of the ore reserves of nickel on this globe are in northern Manitoba. There are four potential Sudburys in northern Manitoba. To indicate further that I have some knowledge of that of which I speak, may I say that I know personally that in one of these potential Sudburys there are five tremendous ore bodies. One of those ore bodies is sheared diagonally from one side at the top to the bottom so that the ore body gets smaller as it goes down but the piece that is sheared off gets larger as it goes down. Above 1,000 feet of this one ore body the ore that has been blocked out equals one-quarter of a billion tons. There are 250 million tons of ore above 1,000 feet; and that is not all the ore above 1,000 feet in this one block out of five. In terms of the present value of nickel, that ore is worth $6.50 a ton.

Again, to give you a comparison of what that means in value, may I say that down in Utah where they have a large copper mining development they mine, by open pit method, ore that is worth $3 a ton. It is a large type of operation. I have not looked up the figures in recent years but they started to develop, in 1940, an operation that would mine 25,000 tons a day of that copper ore; and before they had completed the plant they doubled the size of it to 50,000 tons a day. That is the type of operation that we shall see in northern Manitoba in the not far distant future.

Lest some people misunderstand what I am saying, I would point out that this has no connection with Lynn Lake. Lynn Lake is a relatively small, high-grade nickel operation that completely justifies the railway that is going in there now. But these other properties are away beyond that. Lynn Lake cannot be compared with them. In fact, this one little piece I have outlined to you has eight times the ore reserves blocked out at Lynn Lake up to the end of 1949. There are huge nickel ore bodies there. These nickel ore bodies compare in size with the iron ore of Labrador. As you know, nickel is worth something between 60 cents and 70 cents a pound, as compared with the relatively low price of iron. That will give you some conception of the development that is now under way in Manitoba.

The first time that I heard of this nickel ore body was when flying with a prospector only three years ago. Drilling had been just started on this block at that time. He did not know the values and I had no idea at that time what the values of this ore would be. But he described to me the ore body, because it came right to the surface. He did not know what it was but he described the size of it to me. I estimated at that time that that ore body would be of the order of 400 million tons. From then on I was curious as to what the content of it would be. When I found the content of it I placed it on the records of this house. The future is terrific for that part of the country.

I might say that this reef, as you would call it, runs for approximately 300 miles. To give you a little bit of an idea of what happened, may I say this. In the days when the world was young by some upheaval the crust was broken, and these fluid, metal-bearing ores were squeezed up as the crust shifted and came back. That is how our mines of certain types were laid down many years ago.

Copper is one of the metals in short supply in the world today. The copper picture is exceedingly favourable in northern Manitoba. Not far from this new reef that runs so far, there is a similar reef that is copper bearing. It would not surprise me if the same thing that applies to nickel is later found to apply to copper.

I know of another mine; it is a tungsten mine. Tungsten is something that is in exceedingly short supply at the present time. This mine has rich ore, and it will be brought into production in the not far distant future. There are many small mines that cannot go into production because they have no power. It is only the big operations that can bring power to them. The power picture in northern Manitoba is something out of this world. To give you an idea of it, let me say this. You have all heard of the Saskatchewan river and the power development along the Saskatchewan river. You have heard of the power development along the Red river and the Winnipeg river. The Red river watershed which runs down into the United States pours all its waters into lake Winnipeg. The Saskatchewan river, from both north and south watersheds, pours its waters into lake Winnipeg. Out of the north end of lake Winnipeg runs the Nelson river to Hudson bay, a drop of about 850 feet. Along that river, from source to mouth, is approximately 2½ million horsepower that can be generated by water power; it is there to be developed but is still undeveloped.

One of the large developments is at White Mud falls. It is the first. It lies not far from the north end of lake Winnipeg. I have been told by responsible authorities that survey parties were out there last year and that they will be out there in larger numbers this year, and that the power from that development will be required in southern Manitoba inside of seven years. When I say it will be required, I do not mean that the development will have to start then; the development will have to be completed and will have to be turning out power inside of seven years. The moment it starts turning out power, numerous mines will open up in this area. You can talk about the resources in northern Alberta, and in northern Ontario and in northern Quebec. Canada is aware of those resources but is not aware of the fact that in northern Manitoba, having regard to its size and to its population, there are greater resources there than in any other place in Canada.

An hon. Member: Or in the world.

Mr. Weaver: Yes; possibly in the world. Certainly those resources in older parts of the world have sustained populations of 50 million and 100 million people, not just 50,000 or 48,000 as there are in my constituency at the present time.

This area is in the Pre-Cambrian formation. These people require food. To give you an example of what that means, may I point out that in Flin Flon, Manitoba, we have to import our milk, and over half our milk comes from away out in Saskatchewan, from a place called Melfort, and it takes twenty-four hours by railroad to reach us. When you start bringing milk to 10,000 people, and you have to ship it on the train for twenty-four hours, you will see the problem in front of you, when you get larger populations in that area, to supply them with milk. I am going to make a forecast. I have made many forecasts in the past, and my batting average is fairly high. We have been talking about redistribution and the movement of population and the losing of population. Some people have worried about Manitoba losing a couple of seats this year. I am going to make this forecast. By the time of the next redistribution, that is within ten years, there will be 100,000 people in that area that I describe. According to the present quota of Canada that will be two constituencies. You never need to worry about Manitoba, as long as Canada exists, in respect of losing seats, because that province will more than keep up with the growth of Canada. But I am talking about this large population. They need food. They do not want to bring it long distances by rail, particularly milk.

Two years ago I described an area that has lain there dormant for many many years, which is known as the Saskatchewan river delta. All this water coming down from the western prairies over the years has dropped this silt from the prairies into this area until it is now 40 feet deep in places. It is marvellous agricultural land. To give you an idea of the size of this area, it has been estimated by competent engineers that the area consists of 4 million acres. Hon. members know that Manitoba is a wheat-growing province, but only 2 million acres of wheat were grown in Manitoba last year. That will give hon. members some conception of the size of this area to which I refer.

When you go to bring in a new process in industry and you are not certain as to how it will work out, you first test it in the laboratory and then you take it to the pilot plant stage. We have the pilot plant stage in this huge development at The Pas, Manitoba. There is an area there known as the Pasquia river area. It is a small triangle that lies between the Pasquia and the Carrot rivers and the Manitoba and Saskatchewan boundaries, with the apex of this triangle at The Pas, Manitoba. To show you how much attention has been given to this area by engineers, but not by the public, I would point out that between 1914 and 1916 an expedition known as the Dunn inquiry examined this area and considered draining a very large lake there known as Cedar lake. During the period from 1921 to 1924 this was followed by an investigation under Mr. Horsey, an official of the then department of the interior. In 1946 a detailed survey of agriculture in this district was undertaken by Mr. F. W. Broderick, horticulturist, and Mr. S. E. Churniak, economist. I have before me all these reports. They are quite voluminous, and they are my authority for saying that people who are competent to study these things have gone into them. I have before me a soil survey report on the Carrot river reclamation project by Professor Ellis, of the university of Manitoba. Mr. E. B. Paterson in 1947 prepared the engineering survey which I hold in my hand. We have a progress report on this Pasquia river development area, dated November 1, 1951—that is the triangle I am speaking of—which is worthy of consideration by anyone who is interested. I am going to tell you briefly what it contains, to give you an idea how much of that 4 million acres may be arable land. There are 135,000 acres that have been all surveyed. I am giving you the facts. Of those 135,000 acres, 96,000 acres are arable land, and a further 10,000 acres suitable for growing hay and grazing.

The cost to protect this area from floods, which is the great danger, because the Saskatchewan river overflows its banks from Cumberland House to The Pas periodically, and that is what built this delta, is estimated by the engineers at $1,350,000. Now, estimates are always turning out low, but assume it will cost $1,500,000 to protect these 100,000 acres, roughly, of arable land. That would work out at a cost of $15 an acre. There is no place in the Dominion of Canada, there is no place anywhere, that you can get land as cheap as $15 an acre, and this is the very best land. It was put there in the first place by the Almighty to provide food for this great area, or the people in it, when the time arrived to develop it, which is now.

Objections have been raised regarding the climate. From my personal observation I can say that we do not need to worry about the climate. About three hundred years ago, when the first settlers came into Quebec, they had a very difficult time to survive because of the climate. If you read the early history of the St. Lawrence valley and the privations of the early settlers, you will realize that at that time the climate of the valley was considered a hard one. Our climate there is no worse than that. We have longer hours of sunshine in the summertime; we have a little longer winters, but so far as severity goes, I have been colder in Ottawa than I have ever been up there.

I am very interested in gardening. For many years I have raised a garden a hundred miles north of this area, and I picked ripe tomatoes in my garden on August 10. I have ripened egg plant in my garden. As a matter of fact there is nothing I cannot grow in my garden except corn, and grow it very successfully. However, I am not asking you to take my word for it. I asked an official of The Pas, Mr. F. B. Chalmers, superintendent of northern resources, who should know, to write me a letter on this, and I want to read some parts of it. He says:

> Further to our discussion of this area with reference to frost damage, I have had a good many years of experience as a lands inspector for the Manitoba farms loans and am intimately familiar with many areas in Manitoba, as well as the Carrot river. It cannot, of course, be said that there is no danger from frost in the Carrot river; however, I feel confident that it may be definitely stated that there are several other sections of the province which are farmed successfully and are equally, if not more subject to frost than this particular area. This is rather an indefinite statement, but I feel justified in making it from the experience I have had.
> I have spoken with several farmers who have farmed in this area over periods of from fifteen to twenty years and they tell me, of course, that at times they have had some frost, but that they have never experienced a total loss through frost.

I am interested in the subject of frost. I am going to tell you that frost can be a serious obstacle. This is an area that should be a mixed farming area. It is an area that should supply milk, grazing, hay, and coarse grains. This is something that the farmers will recognize, that you will make more money out of frosted grain feeding it to stock than you ever will make out of bread grain, raising it and selling it through the elevators. That, gentlemen, is the picture of that area. The principles of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act should be extended from one end of Canada to the other to take care of propositions such as this because they are large propositions.

In 1947 it was estimated that it would cost $20 million to bring those 4 million acres into production. Let us assume that that was a low estimate, and that it would cost $40 million; that is still only $10 an acre for a tremendous area, which will support a population—or supports a similar population in other parts of Canada—of upwards of 60,000 persons, without the attendant services which go with those persons. That is something that is a little difficult for the financial structure of provincial governments.

Large sums of money have been spent in many provinces, based upon these principles, and they should be extended. I understand there is a bill that might have been introduced a number of times in the last few years, but that because of a lack of interest that bill has not come forward. It would extend these principles to other parts of Canada. I feel the cabinet should reconsider its position, and that the bill should be introduced and passed at this session.

This project will go ahead. If it failed to go ahead here, then any bright individual could go down to New York and get United States funds, without any question, sufficient to develop the area. But that is not what we want. We want these things developed as they have been developed in recent years.

We have heard criticisms in the house from the city of Winnipeg, because they feel they have lost their preferred position in connection with freight rates. Winnipeg has had a preferred position for many years in respect of freight rates, because of its location not far from the head of the lakes. But we must keep in mind that Canada is not made up of any one city or any one area. If Winnipeg has had something that should naturally fall to Edmonton, then it is time it did fall to Edmonton.

I will say this to the city of Winnipeg, that I do not think many people in that city are aware of what is taking place in the province of Manitoba. If they will forget the preferred position they had with respect to the area west of them on the prairies, and will look north, they will find an empire at their doorstep which will keep their resources going just as long as any of the people of that city would want.

One further quotation regarding this area I should like to give, and then I shall close my remarks. I read this once before, but repetition will do no harm and I shall read it again. This is from the address of Mr. S. W.

Fairweather, vice-president of research and development for the Canadian National Railways, of Montreal, before the Engineering Institute of Canada and the Association of Professional Engineers of the province of Manitoba in Winnipeg, on Thursday, January 12, 1950. He said:

The subject which I intend to discuss is of particular interest to those who are developing what I have elsewhere termed the "frontier fringe of Canada." In many countries the word "frontier" has a grim significance but the frontier of which I speak is not a dividing line between nations, it is a dividing line between the developed and the undeveloped. Beyond it lies opportunity, a challenge to the venturesome and a sure hope of reward to industry, intelligence and perseverance. By the definition of my term, the frontier of which I speak is not static. It is being pushed back year by year. It has receded far beyond the position it occupied along the coast and the St. Lawrence river 200 years ago. Only one life-span ago this city of Winnipeg with all its present amenities of civilization was on the frontier fringe. Development pressed westward from the east and eastward from the west until from ocean to ocean the natural resources of Canada were made available in a belt of varying width. Now the path of development lies northward and much of what we regarded not many decades ago as a hostile, barren waste is proving to be a storehouse of wealth—the reward of the hardy, modern pioneer. The rock drill and the mine shaft may have replaced the plow and the grain elevator as symbols of development; but whether the development is of the forest, the fisheries, agriculture or mining, the end objective must be profit to the individual and an increase in national wealth.

Hon. members, we are building a nation today, a nation such as has never been known before on the face of the globe, a nation such as this globe will never see again.

Mr. G. S. White (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like most sincerely to congratulate the hon. member who has just completed his remarks upon having made a most interesting and instructive address, and having given us a glimpse into the future, and of the great natural resources existing in his province. Through his kindness I was one of the privileged few who, when the party visited Churchill, were taken to his home town of Flin Flon, and were there able to see something of the great development at the Hudson bay mine.

I liked in particular one remark of the hon. member when he referred to the national outlook. It seems to me that many times Canadians are too provincial in their outlook, and we overlook the fact that anything that benefits one part of Canada benefits all Canadians, in the long run.

In taking part in this debate I wish to direct my remarks to the national emergency existing today in Canada in regard to dairy products, and in particular to the tragic plight of the cheese producers. No one can deny the seriousness of the situation facing these producers today.

Three cold facts have to be faced: First, there is the effect of substantial imports of dairy products from other countries; secondly, the loss of the United Kingdom and United States markets for dairy products; and, thirdly the problem of the huge surplus of milk in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, due to the United States embargo on importations of dairy cattle from Canada brought about by the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease. There is no getting away from these three facts. They have created an emergency so far as the cheese producers are concerned.

It is a well recognized and widely accepted fact that the dairy industry plays an important part in the health of any nation and that, consequently, its importance to the Canadian economy must be weighed in a balance that takes this factor into account, even though the value of such a factor is difficult to set forth in plain dollars and cents.

Leaving that aside, let us consider the known factors. First, there are 450,000 farm families, representing over three millions of people in Canada, who are directly dependent upon the dairy industry for the major part of their livelihood. Secondly, there are thousands of people engaged in dairy manufacture and distribution who, in addition, are indirectly dependent upon the dairy industry for their living. Then, thirdly, there are plants and equipment in Canada represented by over 11,000 creameries, over 500 Cheddar cheese factories, and some 150 combined butter and cheese factories, hundreds of fluid milk distributing plants, as well as many factories engaged in evaporating and condensing milk, and in the production of powdered milk, ice cream, processed cheese, and the like. All these are operated wholly by the dairy industry.

The dairy industry contributes well over half a billion dollars per annum to the farmers of Canada. The value of dairy products at the factories and milk plants is approximately $454 million, while the value of dairy products used on the farm is well over $105 million. Today some wonder if the industry is sufficiently important to worry about. I think it is, for many reasons.

Over the years it has been proved that the dairy industry is the most stable branch of agriculture, being less prone to weather and other economic ills which appear from time to time. Dairy products have assumed an indispensable place in the diet of this country which we associate with a high standard of living. The dairy industry is the cornerstone of our economic stability. It is essential for the maintenance of soil fertility. There are millions of people in the world today who require and need better food, without which there is less likelihood of a peaceful understanding of each other.

In so far as this country is concerned it is imperative that dairying be made sufficiently attractive to ensure its remaining one of our major industries. During the war years we were never faced with any question of overproduction or surplus of dairy products. In fact during those years the government encouraged the farmer to increase his production in every way. The farmer was encouraged to increase his stock and to put new acreage under production. Thus the farmer was able to greatly increase the production of food.

During those years farm labour was scarce because no one wanted to work on the farm. Labour wanted to work in industry in the cities at higher wages. The dairy producer, despite the shortage of labour and the scarcity and expense of farm machinery and all the other difficulties that faced him, was able to play his part. He increased his stock and he cultivated more acres. Thus there was additional food available, not only for ourselves but for our allies.

During those years the farmer did not have a price tag on his products because the government strictly controlled the price of farm products. As far as cheese was concerned, during those years it was all requisitioned by the government. This did not apply to industry. Not only during war years but later on, until today industry has operated on a cost-plus basis. Every article manufactured by industry sells at a figure that will return to the manufacturer, not only his cost of production but a fair profit in addition. It is quite clear now that wartime controls and the policies of the government in force since the war cost the dairy producer hundreds of millions of dollars.

It seems to me that the government should take some action to reimburse the dairy producers of Ontario and Quebec for the losses they have sustained. Apparently the government recognized that it had some responsibility in the matter, although I will not say it was a legal responsibility, because only a short time ago it approved the payment of $65 million to reimburse the western farmers who during the war years and since had sold their farm products under practically the same conditions as the farm products of Ontario and Quebec were sold. That action indicated the advantage to any group of producers in Canada of being well organized, in being able to exert pressure on the government and in having members in the house making insistent demands on their behalf.

As everyone knows, farmers do not work on a 40, 44 or 48 hour week as does industry. If they did, the cost of dairy products would be much higher than it is today. The farmer continually hears over the radio or reads in the press of new wage demands, of demands for better working conditions for labour. Every time there is an increase in wages to labour the price of the manufactured article which the farmer has to pay increases while the prices he receives for his dairy products remain the same or in many cases decrease. The dairy producer is simply asking that in this emergency, and it must be classed as an emergency, the government take immediate and proper steps to save this vital industry.

I have mentioned the part played by the dairy farmer during the war. If war comes again he will be expected to produce more food under practically the same conditions which existed from 1940 to 1946. It is the opinion of many thinking Canadian citizens that it is in the interests of Canada to maintain and support a dairy industry as a defence measure.

There is a further obligation on the government to the hundreds of veterans who used their gratuities and re-establishment credits to set themselves up in farming. These veterans have heavy commitments to meet over the years stretching into the future. If they are to be successful in re-establishing themselves in the peacetime economy of our country, then the veteran farmers must receive a fair price for their dairy products.

Farming, including dairy farming, has become a much more expensive business than it was years ago. The capital outlay and operating expenses are much higher. The type of labour required calls for more skill, and all in all the business demands that it be operated at full capacity. When you have a high producing cost the need for efficiency is greater than ever before. The dairy farmer today is finding that year by year the cost of farm labour is increasing and that other expenses such as municipal taxes, hydro, telephone, repairs, freight rates and the articles used by him in the operation of his farm have increased over what they were in 1951.

In addition, the cost of operating the cheese factory has increased to the same degree. The wages of a man who draws the milk, the wages of the cheese maker and the wages of other help are all up over 1951, as are the costs of fuel, supplies, repairs and everything else. The speech from the throne delivered in February, 1950, contained this paragraph:

> Circumstances outside Canada have been responsible for some downward adjustment in the price of farm products. Measures have already been taken to reduce the impact of these adjustments. In order to provide authority for continuing price support to that end for the primary products of our farms and fisheries, you will be asked to amend the Agricultural Products Act, the Agricultural Prices Support Act and the Fisheries Prices Support Act.

Apparently in February 1950 the government felt that it had some responsibility for continuing price support for the primary products of the farm. If the government felt that price support was necessary for dairy products in February, 1950, surely the need is much greater today with the loss of the United Kingdom and United States markets and United States embargo on Canadian cattle. The words "outside of Canada" used in 1950 did not relieve the government of all its responsibility because some of the circumstances which have put the dairy industry on the rocks today happened inside this country.

The outlook is grim indeed for the dairy producers of Canada if the government does not recognize that and has no plan for correcting its errors. The importing of millions of pounds of cheese from other countries did not benefit the Canadian cheese producer. The importation of vegetable oils and the use of substitutes for cream and milk did not help the dairy producer. Today we find many bakeries, which formerly used thick cream and milk, now using a filled product, the chief ingredient of which is imported into Canada. The uses to which this filling can be put are practically endless.

Nor can the government escape some measure of responsibility for the manner in which the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease was handled by the officials of the Department of Agriculture. The dairy producer has to compete with imported vegetable oils and fats, and fats extracted from imported seeds and grains. Where these fats are of domestic origin the dairy farmer has to meet that competition. However, in the case of fats derived from imports it seems to me that the dairy producer has a perfect right to demand from the federal authorities, who have control of tariffs and excise taxes, the same protection readily afforded other industries which affect far fewer people than the hundreds of thousands of Canadians engaged in agriculture.

It is admitted, and it is true, that by reason of our climatic conditions the Canadian dairy producer cannot at all seasons produce dairy products as cheaply as countries more favourably situated or where competitive wages and standards of living are lower. I am sure no one will argue that producers of dairy products in Canada should accept lower returns to meet competition from these countries. As long as the Canadian farmer is doing his job efficiently, he is entitled to equality in hours of labour and living conditions with the rest of the Canadian people.

The two main items of costs, wages and prices of concentrated feeds, are beyond the control of the average dairy farmer, and as long as they remain at the present prices we will never have cheap milk. The only factors the farmer can control are the volume and quality of his crops and the care he gives his herd. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) made two statements in the house this week which I think demand some further explanation. I should like to quote the following from page 1427 of Hansard:

> Mr. W. G. Blair (Lanark): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Will he make a statement on the assistance to be given to the cheese producing industry? Will the assistance given to them bring the price in line with that of the concentrated milk producers who are at present receiving $3.30 on local sales?
> Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I think it has been decided in the courts that questions having to do with the price of milk are under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments. The question of cheese and milk in general has, I think, been fairly well taken care of by the government of Ontario. As to cheese production and other related problems, they are dealt with accordingly.
> Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. Did I understand him to say that there will be no floor price with regard to cheese?
> Mr. Gardiner: I am not in a position to say whether there will or will not be. I understand that in Ontario there is an established price under provincial law. I do not know that anything we would do about it would override that law.

Again, at page 1471 of Hansard, in answer to another question the Minister of Agriculture replied as follows:

> There is a floor price under butter, of course, and, as I said yesterday, there is a legalized position in Ontario in relation to cheese. Since most of the cheese is made in Ontario, the cheese position is quite well governed by that.

I would point out that if the Minister of Agriculture was referring to the Milk Control Act of Ontario, which is R.S.O. 1950, chapter 179, there are these two definitions in the interpretation section:

> Milk includes cream and such products of milk or cream as are manufactured or processed in any form, other than butter and cheese.
> Processor means a person engaged in the business of processing milk or manufacturing milk products, other than butter and cheese.

If that was the act to which the minister was referring, he will note that cheese and butter are not included. The minister says:

I understand that in Ontario there is an established price under provincial law. I do not know that anything we would do about it would override that law.

I would point out that the minister uses the word "law" several times. As far as I know there is no law in the province of Ontario that sets an established price. I for one would be much interested in obtaining from the Minister of Agriculture the necessary particulars as to where one will find an Ontario law which sets an established price as far as cheese is concerned.

Mr. Hodgson: There is none. He is passing the buck.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): I admit the minister left the door open when he answered my question as to whether or not there would be a floor price for cheese. I quite appreciate this announcement may and can be made before the end of the dairy year which closes on the 30th of April. It is interesting to note that at the recent cheese board held at the city of Belleville no cheese was purchased. As the result of that all other boards have been cancelled. I noticed yesterday in the Ottawa Journal a report of a meeting at Vankleek Hill on April 22 of eastern Ontario cheese men who asked for a 33 cent floor price for cheese. I should like to quote two paragraphs from the remarks made by the chairman of the meeting, Mr. John A. Fraser. He said:

In order to survive in eastern Ontario producers of milk for cheese factories had to get from $2.75 to $3 per hundredweight for 3·5 milk. If cheese reverted to the last year's floor of 28 to 29 cents factories would be padlocked in eastern Ontario. From 20 to 30 small factories definitely would have to close their doors.

In the same paper there is an editorial on the statements made by the Minister of Agriculture in the house with respect to the questions asked by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) and myself. The editorial is headed, "Mr. Gardiner Backs Away From the Cheese Crisis". After reviewing the situation, the editorial sums up the present situation as follows:

The net result is the threat of a chaotic tangle in the entire Ontario dairy industry, possibly in Quebec as well. Cheese exchanges, where the trade buys from the factories, are closed and the trade is not buying. Many factories have not opened. Cows will soon all be on pasture and a huge flow of milk threatens to back up right to the top grade. This could well threaten the livelihood of several hundred thousand persons in Ontario alone, could result in widespread unemployment. It is certainly a situation which requires something better than the evasive answer Mr. Gardiner gave in the house last week.

I should also like to refer to the chamber of commerce resolutions for 1951-52 in their chapter on agriculture. They make this statement:

It believes that acreage controls, delivery quotas and governmental marketing monopolies should be limited to times of extreme national emergency . . .

I would submit, Mr. Speaker, that the present condition in the dairy industry is a national emergency brought about by conditions over which the dairy producer had no control. As the editorial points out, this emergency condition affects hundreds of thousands of Canadians and may be the cause of widespread unemployment, for if the dairy producer cannot sell his product certainly he cannot buy the product of industry. Almost any implement dealer in eastern Ontario can tell of the many contracts he had on file for the delivery of tractors and other implements this spring which have been cancelled.

Any attempt by the minister to evade the issue or to place the responsibility upon any provincial government will not be accepted by the dairy producer, and will not meet this emergency which cannot be handled either by the producers or within any province. The loss of our two markets, the United Kingdom market and the United States market because of the embargo following the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease, created a condition the cheese producers could not handle. I am sure the minister is aware of the many meetings that have been held in eastern Ontario during the past six weeks. I am sure he must have received many petitions and resolutions asking that a floor price be established for cheese. As I mentioned a moment ago, the meeting at Vankleek Hill asked for a floor price of 33 cents. The meeting in Belleville on April 19 asked for a floor price of 36 cents.

I appeal to the minister to recognize the emergency that exists today in the dairy industry, an industry which affects the whole economy of Canada so greatly. I cannot believe he meant by his remarks last Monday that no floor price will be set for cheese. Surely he will agree that this large number of Canadians are entitled to assistance during this emergency period by means of a floor price that will at the very least permit the dairy farmer to produce his product with a small margin of profit.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): I am one of those Canadians, Mr. Speaker, who paid their income taxes in the last few weeks. I do not suppose that makes me an expert on this budget. However I can tell you it permits me to speak with greater feeling than might otherwise have been possible. I believe that taxes in Canada are too high, and I think some way must be found to bring about reductions.

When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) introduced his budget shortly before Easter, he certainly presented Canadians with a sobering document. In a nutshell, he is proposing to take from the pockets of the people this year a sum of $4·5 billion or better. What is the significance of that figure to the average taxpayer? In the first place, it means that this year the federal government is going to take 21 cents in taxes, out of every dollar which is earned in the country. In the second place, it means that the federal government in 1952 is going to take from every man, woman and child in this nation average taxes of $320. This compares with a per capita tax in 1939 of only $40. Strangely enough, Mr. Speaker, when I was home at Easter I did not find too many of my constituents worried about that fact. I think the main reason for the apparent public apathy is the number of anaesthetic devices that the government has developed in recent years, to ease the pain in extracting the taxpayers' dollar. About 99 out of every 100 taxpayers in Canada pay the 10 per cent sales tax, the 15 per cent luxury tax, cigarette taxes, excise taxes, customs duties, tariffs, in blissful ignorance of the amount which is going to the federal treasury. As a matter of fact, even where personal income taxes are concerned much of it is collected by the employer. Even if you go to the employee and ask him how much he is paying the federal government in personal income taxes he has not the vaguest idea.

For that reason, I think Canadians have not as yet realized the significance of the astronomical figures which the Minister of Finance presented here a few weeks ago, nor have they realized the seriousness of those figures. I think it is a tragedy that, for one year at least, we cannot have Canadians pay all their federal taxes in one lump sum. If they had to do that, there would not be a revolution, but I venture to say the government would not last one week unless they brought taxes down. I say that the level of taxation in Canada has reached the danger point. I believe it has reached a level where it is lowering our standard of living. It has reached a point where it is discouraging initiative on the farm, in the factory, and throughout business generally. It has reached a level where it is harming trade, and is promoting inflation.

More than a year ago the Minister of Finance made a proposition to this house with which I wholeheartedly agreed. He said this, in effect. There is no magic in government finance. A dollar which is given to one person must, first of all, be taken away from another. $4·5 billion is a lot of money. I think no one should feel that this money can be raised simply by "soaking the rich". Let no citizen make any mistake. These expenditures are going to be paid for by the average Canadian, the workingman, the farmer and the small businessman. I realize that our national production is high, but I do not think it has reached a point where we can take $4·5 billion in federal taxes without having serious repercussions. I shall, therefore, propose this evening, that our federal expenditures should be cut by at least $315 million. It is fair for the minister to ask me "how" and "where". I shall try to tell him.

The government would have us believe that this budget is the price which we have to pay for security. But is it? I remind hon. members that the greater part of this budget is for items that have no relation whatever to defence. In his budget speech last year, the Minister of Finance stated that the necessities of defence now require that our expenditures for all other purposes should be reduced. Yet despite that statement the minister has come before parliament with a proposal that non-defence expenditures be increased by at least $227 million. Personally, I cannot agree that, in view of our defence emergency, non-defence expenditures should continue to grow and grow. Many of the items in this budget are desirable, in fact most of them are desirable, and most of them are for items that Canadians would like. But I think if it means getting the tax level down, Canadians would just as soon do without some of them.

Since coming to Ottawa I have been one of those who have always believed there was a good deal of merit in the suggestion that a commission be set up somewhat along the lines of the Hoover commission in the United States, to study waste and duplication in the government. I think a good deal could be accomplished by such a commission, because certainly members of parliament have not the time nor the facilities to go through the estimates and the public accounts, and give them the scrutiny that they deserve. This evening I desire to make a number of concrete proposals of instances where I think the minister could save money. I realize that some of the suggestions may not be popular; nevertheless, I think they are sensible. I shall classify these savings in three categories: First, petty savings; second, major savings which are dependent more or less upon government policy; third, savings in the defence effort.

In the first category, I maintain that the estimates are cluttered up with dozens of petty expenditures which no sound business concern would maintain in a time of financial emergency. I should like to give a few examples. I refer the house to the estimates, first to items 54 and 55. In these items the government proposes to spend $2,039,000 for international shortwave broadcast services. If I understand these services correctly, they beam broadcasts to countries in Europe, and particularly behind the iron curtain. In the first place, I doubt if there are many people in those countries who have radios powerful enough to receive the broadcasts. But even admitting that the broadcasts have a certain propaganda value, even admitting that they may create certain good will for Canadians, I believe that their value is far outweighed by the cost.

I suggest to this house tonight that this item might be classified as a luxury expenditure under present circumstances. I believe it should be deleted from the estimates, in order to save the taxpayer $2,000,000.

The second saving I would suggest has to do with the House of Commons itself. After all, if hon. members are really interested in making savings I think they should set an example. For three straight years, ever since the inception of the 21st parliament, we have had double sessions. As nearly as I can gather, the last double session of parliament cost the taxpayers of Canada directly $2 million, and indirectly I suppose a good deal more money. Surely, if our rules were modernized, if they were brought up to date, it should be possible for this parliament to get through its work in four or five months at most. There are other disadvantages to these double sessions. After all, it is difficult for a member to get around to see his constituents if he has to be down here eight or nine months of the year. I think too if they are persisted in, they will discourage many members from offering themselves for parliament, because of the time involved at Ottawa. There is a good deal of talk of another fall session this year. I sincerely hope that this may not be necessary. Let us sit and get our work done by July. I do not think it is fair to ask the taxpayers to pay the cost of another double session.

The third saving which I would suggest is of a minor nature; it has been made in this parliament before. For the first time, this year, it is proposed to pay lieutenant governors a special allowance, "hospitality" and "entertainment." Personally, I have always felt that the work done by these gentlemen could be just as effectively performed by our chief justices. However, whether or not that is so, I do not think that at a time when the taxpayers are facing expenditures of $4·5 billion, they should be called upon to pay bills for entertainment and hospitality for these gentlemen. If item 170 were deleted from the estimates, the amount of $86,000 could be saved.

The fourth saving I would suggest has to do with the printing of departmental reports and other publications. This year the government is going to spend $7 million on this item; and in addition it proposes to spend $10,500,000 on films, displays, advertising and so forth. Of course, some of these pamphlets are valuable; I do not deny that. But there are a great number—and I think the number is growing—which have very dubious value. I have several in my hand which came to my office this week. Two of them are from the Department of National Health and Welfare. One of them contains a series of cartoons. One of the cartoons shows a workingman having his hand held by a nurse. It says: "The nurse and the pulse of industry." For the life of me I cannot see of what value such pamphlets are to the taxpayers of Canada. I will venture to say that there is not one member in this house who does not consign regularly each week forty or fifty of these pamphlets to the wastepaper basket. I wish that the Minister of Finance or his parliamentary assistant would order the queen's printer to assemble all these publications and pamphlets in the railway committee room, and then I wish he would invite members of parliament to see the exhibition. I will wager that not only would the members get an eye-opener, but so also would the Minister of Finance and his parliamentary assistant.

Mr. Graydon: You would need the exhibition grounds.

Mr. Cardiff: You could not open their eyes.

Mr. Thatcher: I contend that there is no real need for a good many of these pamphlets that are being put out, and I suggest three steps to cut them down. First of all, I think we should set up a small central publicity bureau to handle all work of this kind. Then

I think we should tell the bureau to eliminate all but the most essential publications. In the third place, I think we should start charging for technical publications to the mining industry, to agriculture, and to groups of that kind. It is my belief that if we did that we could save a minimum of $4 million this year.

What I have said, Mr. Speaker, also applies to the dominion bureau of statistics. In 1939 the dominion bureau of statistics cost the taxpayers $1,042,000. Today it is costing us $6 million. I think we have an efficient bureau, but I also think that they are compiling a good deal of information for which the average Canadian has no need, and which in an emergency most Canadians would just as soon get along without. I am in the hardware business. I receive numerous publications from the bureau. I must be frank and say that they do not seem valuable to me. I suggest to the Minister of Finance that he curtail the estimates of the bureau of statistics by $1 million. I think he could do it without in any way curtailing the more important features of its services.

My sixth suggestion, Mr. Speaker, is that item 42 of the estimates be deleted. Last March 12, the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) made a very interesting speech in this house, and I quote from Hansard at page 377:

> The federal government has voted $500,000 annually to buy aluminum pails for the maple syrup industry of this country.

Well, my sentiments are somewhat similar to those he expressed on that occasion. Why on earth should the taxpayers of Canada buy aluminum pails for the maple sugar producers? Why should they not buy their own?

Mr. Maltais: Seventy-five million dollars for wheat.

Mr. Thatcher: Unless there is some reason, Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Gingras: Syrup is much better than wheat.

An hon. Member: A drop in the bucket.

Mr. Thatcher: Unless there is some reason which does not meet the eye, Mr. Speaker, I believe that item 42 could very well be deleted.

Mr. Maltais: What is the amount there?

Mr. Thatcher: The amount is $500,000.

Mr. Maltais: Seventy-five million dollars for wheat.

Mr. Thatcher: I propose that items 291 and 292 of the national health estimates be deleted. These expenditures have to do with the administration of the National Physical Fitness Act. This year they total $211,000. I remind the house that the original purpose of that act was to promote and co-ordinate a physical fitness program among the provinces. I would admit that the division has done some useful work—not too much. It has prepared a variety of literature on recreational topics; it has studied different recreational programs in other countries; it has studied layouts for playgrounds and so on; but by and large I believe the program has been a failure. Two provinces have not even bothered to enter the scheme, and the division, which was originally set up to work on physical education, has gradually been drifting into adult education, the drama, and so on. It seems to me that in the eight years this act has been in force there has been no great need for the service demonstrated. I say that the taxpayers are not getting value for their money, and that this item should be taken from the estimates.

Item 419 of the estimates calls for an expenditure of $1,500,000 for promoting the tourist business in Canada. I realize I am probably skating on pretty thin ice when I suggest that that is an expenditure that should be cut this year; but nevertheless, in view of the tax load, I think $500,000 could be taken from this item without any harm being done.

There is just one more of these petty expenditures that I should like to mention, namely, item 96. Item 96 is to provide for the construction and execution in Canada of seven doors to be donated by Canada to the United Nations permanent headquarters. Seven doors, at $7,143 per door. What kind of doors are they? I could build a whole house in my city for that price. If these doors have not been ordered I think this might be a good item to delete while there is yet time.

I have listed these seven or eight items, petty expenditures, simply to give the house examples of savings which I think could be made. In themselves they may seem petty; I think they add up to about $10,300,000. However the point I wish to make is that these estimates are cluttered up with dozens of expenditures which, at a time like this, ordinary companies would eliminate.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is far from $315 million.

Mr. Thatcher: Oh, I shall come to your department in a minute. I have only commenced.

I come now to the second category: Major savings which are more or less dependent upon government policy; and in that connection I shall refer first of all to the Department of Public Works. This department plans to spend in 1952, $107 million, which is an increase over last year of $8.2 million. I would agree with the minister that probably most of those expenditures are desirable, and probably most Canadians would like to see these various expenditures proceeded with. But, despite that fact, I think that the height of the tax level in Canada today makes it imperative that the less urgent of those projects be temporarily deferred.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Name them.

Mr. Thatcher: I will come to that; give me time. It seems to me that in order to lighten the tax load, such expenditures as most of the post offices, most of the wharves, most of the dry docks, the customs buildings—

An hon. Member: Oh, no, no.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): And that was from one of your own members.

Mr. Thatcher: —and most of the public buildings could be dispensed with. I think the Minister of Public Works could cut his expenditures by $20 million this year.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Where?

Mr. Thatcher: I just told you where.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Give me one instance. Be specific, so I will know it—and if it is in your riding, I will remember it.

Mr. Thatcher: Go through your estimates and you will find them.

Mr. Sinclair: The Moose Jaw post office should be the first one.

Mr. Thatcher: Since when were they going to build a post office in Moose Jaw?

Every five years the Minister of Finance has been telling the opposition members to show him how to save money. Now, if he will be patient long enough, I will tell him how to save it.

I come now to the civil service.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, you have left public works, have you?

Mr. Thatcher: I have suggested what could be done to ease the tax burden in your department.

To what extent is the government economizing on its own payroll? Certainly in the past few years I have heard the Minister of Finance tell us repeatedly that every effort was being made to keep civil service numbers within reason. What are the facts? The fact is that the federal government has thousands more of employees today than it had at the peak of the war years.

Mr. Sinnott: So has Saskatchewan.

Mr. Thatcher: It has three and a half times the number that it had in 1939. And I should like to be a little more specific. Last year, important evidence was placed before the Senate committee on finance. I would make reference to a table at page 64 which purports to indicate the numbers of employees of the government of Canada, exclusive of members of the armed forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. This chart shows that in 1939 civil servants in Canada numbered 46,106, in 1950 they numbered 155,960, and in 1951 there were 156,220.

The cost to the taxpayers of salaries might be of interest to the house. The figures show that in 1939 the cost of civil service salaries was $74 million, while in the year 1950-51 it was $282 million, in 1951-52 it was $302 million, and this year it is to be $333 million. I think it is obvious from these figures that both the numbers and the cost of Canada's civil servants continue to grow rapidly. Hardly a day goes by that members do not receive some notification in their mail that some new appointment has been made, or is about to be made.

Most Canadians can understand why an expansion in our civil service is needed during years of war, but I think there are many Canadians who cannot understand why the numbers continue to increase so rapidly after the war, instead of showing any tendency to diminish.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): How much would you cut there?

Mr. Thatcher: I will come to all that. Please do not be so impatient. On the surface at least it would appear that many departments have increased very rapidly. I would mention, for instance, the Department of Transport. In 1939 it had 5,760 employees, while in 1951 it had 11,970.

Now, no one in the house need agree with me, if he does not wish to; but I contend that the civil service could be cut by 5 per cent at least, without in any way impairing efficiency.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is $16 million.

Mr. Thatcher: All right. We will save $16 million, or perhaps a little more. I think we could save almost $20 million—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): All right, then, $20 million.

Mr. Thatcher: —and without impairing the service one bit.

An hon. Member: Make it $25 million.

Mr. Thatcher: With federal taxes today running about $4·5 billion, I think the time has come when this government must find some way of measuring the size and efficiency of our civil service. As I said a moment ago, I think we should give consideration to setting up a commission similar to the Hoover commission, to come in and see whether efficiency is there or not.

The next saving I would suggest is also connected with the civil service, and concerns specifically the age of retirement. I think I am not exaggerating when I say that many Canadians were profoundly shocked when the Minister of Finance brought in—I think it was last March 29—supplementary estimates which contained on page 3 an item of $102 million which was allocated to the civil service superannuation fund.

I would remind the house that this amount was in addition to regular payments. I would also remind the house, and remind the parliamentary assistant, that this amount of money was in addition to the $75 million that was allocated the fund last year.

Mr. Graydon: Get up, Stanley.

Mr. Sinclair: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Thatcher: No.

Mr. Knowles: I will answer it.

Mr. Sinclair: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Unless the hon. member gives way, he cannot be interrupted.

Mr. Thatcher: I would be pleased to permit a question.

Mr. Sinclair: I was wondering whether the hon. member was in the house this afternoon when his colleague from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was urging that a much greater contribution be put into certain government pensions.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: Get together.

Mr. Thatcher: I am expressing my opinions, whether anyone in the house agrees with them or not. Perhaps my hon. friend and colleague was not advocating the same thing as I am.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Thatcher: Now, to be serious—

An hon. Member: Try to be.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, do you have to be serious?

Mr. Thatcher: —I believe in pension funds. I certainly believe that a civil servant who has served his country faithfully and well should be able to retire with a decent pension. But I also believe that we, as members of parliament and as the representatives of the taxpayers of Canada, have a responsibility to see that the cost of these pensions is kept within reasonable limits. Now, I may be wrong, but it seems to me that $102 million in one year for the pension fund is not keeping it within reasonable limits.

Mr. Dewar: Would you increase railroad pensions?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, would you?

Mr. Thatcher: Would the hon. member for Qu'Appelle like me to suggest savings that his minister has been asking for, for some years? I admit I have not studied the Civil Service Superannuation Act in great detail.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lapointe: There seem to be some other things you have not studied.

Mr. Thatcher: I said that I have not studied this act with profound care, but I have read it several times.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Why speak about it, then?

Mr. Thatcher: And if my understanding is correct, the act says that a civil servant today may retire at the age of 60, if he wishes, and that he is forced to retire at the age of 65.

Mr. Sinnott: No, he is not.

Mr. Thatcher: I contend that under present circumstances, when we are in the midst of a rearmament program, the retirement of citizens at the age of 60 or 65 is financially dangerous. The cost to the taxpayer is simply too great. I presume to suggest several amendments, therefore, to this legislation.

I refer to the retirement age for civil servants. I think the voluntary age of retirement should be changed from 60 to 63 years, while the compulsory age should be raised from 65 to 68 years. I think the civil servants themselves would welcome this latter amendment because many of them do not like to be forced into idleness in these days of high prices. That should save the taxpayers at least $1 million, and perhaps a much greater sum over the years.

Mr. Robinson: Will the hon. member permit another question? He has been suggesting a number of savings and I was wondering if he intends to support the resolution standing in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in connection with social security? If he is, it seems to me that all his savings will disappear in the one item.

Mr. Thatcher: I thank my hon. friend for asking his question. I shall give that resolution my careful consideration.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member sounds like a minister.

Mr. Thatcher: The estimates of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) are going to be increased this year by $255 million, mainly because of pension changes which were introduced at the last session. Today we are paying old age pensions to every Canadian at the age of 70 years without a means test. That measure passed this parliament unanimously and I was one of the members who supported it. But I must admit I am beginning to wonder if certain modifications to that act might not be desired. We have had this scheme now for four months and I cannot help doubting the wisdom of paying old age pensions to Canadians who are wealthy and have no need of them.

Mr. Sinclair: You want a means test, in other words.

Mr. Thatcher: Just let me continue.

Mr. Sinclair: You want a means test.

Mr. Thatcher: I must say that I find it a little ludicrous that the taxpayers of Canada, overburdened as they are, should be paying an old age pension—I take this gentleman only as an example—to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). I cannot believe that a man in his financial circumstances needs it. I understand too that we are paying the pension to quite a few senators. I suppose even my old employer, multimillionaire J. S. McLean, now qualifies for the $40 monthly cheque, although I do not know whether he is collecting it or not.

The point I am trying to make is that there are thousands and thousands of Canadians receiving this old age pension who obviously do not need it. The same might be said of the baby bonuses. The taxpayers are going to spend $332 million this year on family allowances. I say at once that most of this money will be well spent, but I cannot help wondering how badly my good friend, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson), needs three family allowance cheques to make ends meet. There must be many other people in Canada in the same category.

Mr. Garson: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question. Would he apply a means test to family allowances, too?

Mr. Knowles: Over my dead body.

Mr. Thatcher: I thank the minister for his question and I should like to answer it. I wonder whether it is sensible to pay old age pensions or family allowances to those with an income say of $5,000 a year or more. I take that figure out of the air, as perhaps it should be $6,000. I am referring to those people who have no need of them. If the minister adopted this suggestion my closest estimate is that he would save the taxpayers about $30 million.

Today there are about twenty different branches or agencies buying supplies or materials for the federal government. They are buying food, coal, paint, munitions, office equipment and things of that kind. It seems to me that so many purchasing departments cannot help but promote inefficiency and duplication. I remember Mr. Bryce, one of the officials of the Department of Finance, appearing last year before the public accounts committee. He told us that the Department of National Defence bought its cars direct from the manufacturers while the other departments did not, and as a result paid considerably higher price. Such a policy cost the taxpayer a good deal of money. I doubt if there is a single corporation in Canada with more than one purchasing department. Some years ago the province of Saskatchewan set up a central purchasing department and they have been most gratified with the results obtained. Such a central purchasing department for the federal government would mean a saving of about $10 million in the extra discounts that could be obtained through volume buying.

The savings in this category which I have mentioned would amount to roughly $81 million. If we add those to the first category, the savings would total about $91 million in non-defence expenditures.

Finally I come to the touchy defence figures. I would be the first to admit that I am not an expert on international affairs or national defence, but I do not think that that means that I as a federal representative should regard these expenditures as sacrosanct or beyond the pale of criticism.

It is proposed in the coming fiscal year to spend between $2,000 million and $2,500 million on rearmament and defence generally. It is incredible that a peace-loving nation like Canada only a few years after world war II should face commitments of this size. I think everyone realizes that we are living in dangerous times and it is sensible and necessary to have adequate defences. However after having been home for a few weeks I can say to the minister that there are many Canadians who are viewing with great uneasiness the size of our rearmament program. They realize that every dollar spent on arms means $1 less spent on constructive national development.

Is this money being spent wisely by national defence? I think every hon. member realizes that parliament, or even the efficient treasury board, has very little direct control over the detailed expenditures which are made for national defence. Today the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) is spending more than $2,000 million,—more money than the whole government was spending shortly before Korea, and almost as much as is being spent this year by all his colleagues together. He is spending four times what the whole government was spending in 1939. While the minister may be the ablest minister in the world I do not think it is physically possible for him, or any one person, to go over these detailed defence expenditures, and say that they are being handled without waste or inefficiency.

The fact is that the military authorities have the responsibility for most of these military expenditures. I am not sure that the Canadian taxpayer is convinced that these gentlemen are not spending his money with too much abandon. I do not think the Canadian taxpayer is a bit impressed with the efforts at economy which the government has made in this connection. I feel the Department of National Defence is the department where the greatest economies in the budget can be made. I remember when Mr. Bryce, Mr. Drury and certain other officials appeared before the public accounts committee a year or so ago. Why, for instance, are we operating today in some cities a recruiting office for each of the three services?

I remember the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) pointing out to the public accounts committee that in that city there was a recruiting office for the navy, one for the air force and one for the army, all within a few blocks of each other. There are other savings of that kind which could be made. I remind the house that a few months ago Winston Churchill pared the defence budget of Great Britain substantially. I also remind the house that a week or so ago the United States congress was impressed with the need for economy. I have a press dispatch carrying the story. The heading of the article is, "Slash Advised in U.S. Budget". The article reads in part:

> A $4,240,638,500 cut in the United States defence department's $50,921,022,770 budget for the fiscal year starting July 1 was recommended today by the House of Representatives appropriations committee.

If Great Britain and the United States can set such an example I do not see why it would not be sensible for Canada to follow the same course. If we could cut our budget by 10 per cent, leaving it to the military to decide where they want it cut, we could save the taxpayers of Canada $225 million. I remind the house once again of the words of the Minister of Finance last year. He said that there was no magic in government financing, and that a dollar paid out to one person must first of all be taken from another. High taxes are not inevitable but if they are not inevitable, then expenses must be cut. I think I have suggested savings approximating $315 million, and if there is something wrong with my suggestions let the minister point it out. I say that peacetime taxes in Canada have become too high. The government is taking 21 cents out of every dollar earned, on top of provincial and municipal taxation and have reached a point where most Canadians can no longer stand them. My main criticism of the budget must be that the federal government has not persevered in its efforts to curtail federal expenditures.

Mr. Crestohl: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Thatcher: Certainly.

Mr. Crestohl: How does the hon. member reconcile his plea for economy with the proposals of some of the leaders of his own party that the people of Canada should help finance a Pacific pact, should send to Great Britain gifts approximating $200 million and should construct a peace park, something that the hon. member himself has suggested?

Mr. Thatcher: I simply told the house tonight that I accepted the challenge which the Minister of Finance has made on many occasions that we should be specific and try to suggest tangible savings that could be made. I ask no hon. member to agree with me. If hon. members wish to be facetious that is their privilege.

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I must congratulate the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) on his courage in attempting to cut certain expenditures that some of his colleagues are advocating. At long last the top has come off the kettle—

Mr. Thatcher: Which the government has put into effect.

Mr. Sinnott: —and we really understand the position of the hon. member for Moose Jaw. He is going to curtail the civil service. He is going to curtail the building of public wharves, public buildings and public houses.

Mr. Thatcher: Temporarily, and I did not say "houses".

Mr. Sinnott: Houses for the soldiers. If we are going to follow his program I am afraid it will not be in keeping at all with the program of his party for full employment.

Mr. Thatcher: Why not?

Mr. Sinnott: If you are going to lay off all these men naturally you are going to have unemployment.

Mr. Thatcher: What men did I suggest should be laid off other than non-essential workers?

Mr. Sinnott: You are not going to build public wharves or public buildings and you are going to curtail the civil service. That takes in pretty nearly everybody.

In my opening remarks, Mr. Speaker, I intend to deal largely with finance, and I want to refer to an article appearing in a pamphlet of the Canadian Construction Association. I think what the president of the Canadian Construction Association has to say is of importance to this country at the present time, and I will deal with it more fully later. At page 14 there is a chapter headed, "Economic development best anti-depression insurance". The article reads:

Any lack of confidence in the future appears to result from a fear of a recurrence of the thirties. Examples of this are the restrictive practices, featherbedding, wildcat strikes and security aims encountered in some trade union activities. Let us look forward, not back. Canada is like an ambitious youth with unlimited horizons in front of him. And just as a young man should concentrate primarily on grasping opportunities rather than seeking security, the people of a young nation like Canada should do likewise. People are too depression conscious and I repeat that I personally feel that we need have no fear of a depression if our expansion program is carried out in forthright co-operative fashion. Canada possesses sufficient natural wealth to support a far larger population and to provide employment to all who are able to work. Emphasis on the word "work," however—

An hon. Member: And wages.

Mr. Sinnott: It continues:

—is important. Labour has throughout the years benefited from capital investment which has led to increased production. Employees can best improve their status through helping in every possible way the economic development of their country. This does not include decreased productivity, unnecessary work stoppages and the raising of costs to levels that discourage investors or purchasers. There have been gratifying indications of late of a greater understanding—

An hon. Member: What book are you reading from?

Mr. Sinnott: It continues:

—of the relation between wages and prices, between subsidized social services and taxes, and between production and living standards. But there are still a number of irresponsible labour leaders throughout our various industries who evidently choose to disregard these relationships and appear to be more interested in their own personal score than in playing the game for the benefit of the whole team.

Mr. Cardiff: Are you reading your speech?

Mr. Sinnott: He goes on to say:

Galloping inflation would have communist approval.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sinnott: Our Tory friends on the other side are always fighting the communists, and I think they would do well to listen to what this man has to say. I continue:

It has been stated that virulent inflation and communism constitute the two chief dangers to our way of life at the present time. Union demands for higher wages not accompanied by increased production and lower unit costs are highly inflationary and can but lead to the well-known spiral of wages and prices.

An hon. Member: Who wrote that?

Mr. Sinnott: I continue:

This has led to the confusing situation where there is an uncomfortable amount of truth reflected in a recent cartoon in which a labour representative during wage negotiations says "We also think there should be an escalator clause to meet any cost of living increase that may result from the granting of our wage demands."

An hon. Member: What are you reading?

Mr. Sinnott: I continue.

It is well to remember that communist leaders on many occasions have advocated industrial unrest so that eventually prices will be so inflated that the economic systems of the western world will break down, leaving the door—

An hon. Member: Wide open.

Mr. Sinnott: I continue:

—open for widespread communism and, incidentally, the suppression of free unions.

I would remind my hecklers across the way that this is a statement by the president of the Canadian Construction Association.

Mr. Hodgson: What is his name?

Mr. Sinnott: Mr. Robert Drummond.

An hon. Member: You have read all that.

Mr. Sinnott: Well, at least I can read; you can't. I have read this statement because it has something to do with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). We in this house know the hon. member is always advocating shorter hours and higher pay. He also advocates more social services, and he does not agree with our friend from Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher). A year or so ago I named the hon. member public enemy No. 1. I did that in a kindly way, because he seems to have in mind only one cry, shorter hours and higher wages. The other day he told us his constituency was one mile wide and three miles long. My constituency is 110 miles wide and 320 miles long; and in order that the people he represents may work forty hours a week or less he is asking my constituents to work sixteen or twenty hours a day. I have asked the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre before, and I am going to ask him again, to come to my constituency any time he chooses this summer and work with me for one full day. Then he will know what a day's work is like. This country simply cannot produce more and more, and provide more social services, with shorter hours and higher wages. Nevertheless the hon. member keeps harping on that subject because he knows it will get him votes, and that is what he is working for.

Mr. Knowles: It makes your hair stand on end, doesn't it?

Mr. Sinnott: Well, if the hon. member gets any comfort from that he is welcome to it. Yesterday he accused the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sinclair) and the minister of trying to trick the people in connection with his resolution regarding the four per cent floor under medical expenses. I was in the house at the time that resolution was adopted, and just when the discussion finished the hon. member hollered "unanimously". Well, there is no question about it; the house adopted the resolution unanimously. But the resolution only requested the government to consider the suggestion. The house did not unanimously adopt the resolution in the form the hon. member tried to twist it in order to bring the minister and the government to their knees. The government will consider it, and if in course of time they think it feasible, it will be brought in. But let us make no mistake about it; we voted that the government should consider the matter and nothing more.

Yesterday the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) had a good deal to say. At times he worked himself almost into a fury, attacking the government, attacking the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), attacking the parliamentary assistant, and in general attacking the budget. He went on to say that the per capita taxation this year amounted to $300. The hon. member for Moose Jaw upped that tonight and made it $320. Then the hon. member for Eglinton said that the average family of five paid $1,750. If you multiply 300 by 5 it makes 1,500, not 1,750, so the hon. member was wrong there. Now let us see the per capita position as far as income is concerned. In 1951 the national income was $17 billion, 230 million; the population was 14 million, and the per capita income was $1,231, or $6,155 for a family of five. Let us turn to the Tory regime and listen to them howl. In 1935 the national income was $3 billion, 188 million; the population was 10,800,000 and the per capita income was $295 or $1,475 for a family of five. However, most people look at what they have left for themselves after paying taxes. The average income per family of five in 1951 was $6,155; taxes were $1,500, leaving that family $4,655. Under the Tory regime in 1935 a family of five with an income of $1,475 and taxes of $155 had only $1,320 for themselves. In 1951, after sixteen years of Liberal government the family of five—the Eglinton family, as I call it—have for themselves an income of $4,655, so in spite of what the hon. member says they are better off now than ever before. I would not call this a Hallowe'en budget, as the hon. member called it. Nor would I call it a budget with a false face. I would call it a sunshine budget. I would say the people of Canada have seen the light, that they have seen what a good government can do in reducing the national debt so there will be more sunshine for future Canadians.

Now we will leave the hon. member for Eglinton and talk about the financial critic of the opposition. I sent a note over to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) a while ago saying I was going to mention those two members. I am sorry they are not here tonight, but that is their responsibility. At page 1473 of Hansard the financial critic quoted Mr. Muir, president of the Royal Bank, as questioning whether the government was justified in raising such huge revenues. As you know, bankers make it their business to lend money. When they see prosperity in Canada getting to the point where people do not have to borrow so much, or can borrow from the government, so the banks make less and less money, naturally any banker in the country will not think that is good business. I would suggest that at this time there be less borrowing by governments, and that we carry our public works program and our social service program through the Bank of Canada, instead of borrowing from the private banks.

Then at page 1478 the financial critic accused the government of debasing or debauching the currency of Canada. Unlike Nelson, who had at least one good eye, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) held his hands over both eyes so he could not see what was going on. I realize the difficulty of the financial critic of the Tory party. He had a terribly hard time finding any justification for criticizing the budget, but he did the best he could under the circumstances.

An hon. Member: Did he write that speech you are reading?

Mr. Sinnott: I have notes in my hand just to refresh my memory. If you would like to come over here and hand them to me it will be all right. On the whole, Mr. Speaker, I think Canadians will regard this government as one that has steadily decreased our national debt.

An hon. Member: Decreased?

Mr. Sinnott: Don't mistake me; I said it had decreased Canada's national debt.

An hon. Member: Since when?

Mr. Sinnott: In the year 1946 when our present Minister of Finance took over, you will recall what I said to him. I told the minister at that time that he should roll up his sleeves and get down to work to see what made the clock tick rather than listen to his financial advisers. Well, Mr. Abbott did that, and I shall show you the record. In 1947, he reduced Canada's national debt by $373,648,000. In 1948 he reduced Canada's debt by $676,119,000. Would the financial critic of the Conservative party say that was wrong? No. In 1949, he reduced it by $595,502,000. Would he say that was wrong? In 1950, he reduced it again by $131,525,000. Would he say that was wrong? Then again in 1951, he reduced it by $211,294,000. If the country had been going behind as it was under the Tory regime from 1930 to 1935, we would have been paying an extra $62 million per year in interest.

I realize that the position of the opposition is a difficult one. They hate to sit back and see the progress and expansion the country is experiencing with the Liberals in the driver's seat. No country in the world has such a record and such a continuous excellent—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Try it again.

Mr. Hodgson: Take a third go at it.

Mr. Sinnott: People all over the world envy Canadians. Today 31 out of every hundred people in Britain are striving to get to Canada, but they cannot do it for financial reasons.

Mr. Hodgson: You have not got the proper immigration system set up.

Mr. Sinnott: Compare our country with the United States. Here is a country with 14 million people, while to the south of us there is a country of 156 million people. But when you compare our currency with that of the United States and Britain you find that in 1945 the United States dollar was worth $1.10 in Canada. Today the same United States dollar is worth only 98 cents in Canada. In 1945 the United Kingdom pound was worth $4.02½; today it is only worth $2.75. These are not the values under any artificial standard but out on the free market, not debased, not debauched, and they prove that Canada's is the strongest currency in the world.

I have been amazed, Mr. Speaker, to see press headlines such as "Budget under heavy fire". You will see other headlines in large black type, so that you would think that Canada's future was so dismal Canadians could not exist. What I am going to say now may not be welcomed in some parts of this house, but nevertheless it is true and I think Canadians would like to be told the truth for once. Press correspondents across this country have a duty to inform the people of Canada of the progressive, debt-reducing policy of this government which has relieved from the shoulders of the Canadian people a debt of almost $3 billion in the last five years. This is a record unsurpassed by any government in the world today.

Mr. Hodgson: Whose writing are you reading?

Mr. Sinnott: I am not reading, Mr. Speaker. In conclusion, I would say that I should like to get out on the hustings today and tell Canadians the truth; tell them the way that Canada's national debt has been reduced; tell them how Canada has expanded; tell them of the progress that is being made and how the people in foreign countries are just clamouring to get to this country. They envy the government of this country, and if the truth is told from coast to coast, when the Liberals go to the country and put this program in its true light they do not need to worry about coming back.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): In this budget presented to parliament on April 8, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) estimated that he would have a surplus of $9 million at the end of the present fiscal year. To anyone who has studied this budget; who has studied conditions in the country today; and who is familiar with this government's method of producing tax reductions in an election year, there is not the slightest doubt that we will end up this year with a surplus at least as great as the one we had at the end of the year just past.

My reasons for saying that are twofold.

First of all, the basic tax rates this year are substantially the same as they were a year ago. Income tax rates are up, and some commodity taxes are down.

Secondly, our gross national production, our gross national income, and our consumer spending, upon which all taxes are levied, are expected to be substantially greater this year than they were last year. I therefore feel that we may expect tax revenues this year to be considerably above 1951; enough to more than take care of our increased defence expenditure.

In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, when the minister presented his budget on April 8 he said, as recorded on page 1250 of Hansard:

> In line with past experience, I expect there will be a shortfall of expenditures below the amount provided by parliament in the appropriation votes.

Therefore, I believe that we can expect approximately the same budget surplus at the end of this year as we had at the end of the year just past. I believe that this fact makes it necessary for us to ask ourselves several questions.

First of all, why does this government find it necessary to overtax the people this year so that it can have a surplus at the end of the fiscal year?

The second question is, is it because next year, 1953, will be an election year, and the government will then be able to make substantial tax reductions, and so attempt to win votes for the Liberal party? What the government is actually doing is taking money out of the people's pockets this year so that they can pay it back to them next year.

In short, under the present government, we have in this country a budgetary system which estimates a surplus of $9 million, but which, in its very structure, provides for revenues in excess of expenditures, which admittedly will fall far short of the requested appropriation votes.

I believe that no reasonably minded Canadian objects to paying taxes necessary to pay for the cost of defence, both at home and in co-operation with our allies abroad. Nor do I believe that reasonably minded Canadians object to bearing the cost of necessary social security measures. However, to implement in this country a budgetary system which overestimates expenditures, and underestimates revenues, resulting in unjust and unwarranted taxation, would constitute in my mind a political fraud which should not be condoned in any democratic country.

In the pre-election budget of 1949, the government announced sweeping tax reductions amounting to $369 million in that year. While the obvious reason for this change of heart by the government in its 1949 budget was the impending general election, the reasons given parliament were as follows:

First, that the increasing flow of goods available for sale to consumers, without higher prices, made these reductions economically feasible;

Second, the expected surplus of revenue over expenditure;

Third, the reduction of $1,600 million made in the public debt since the war;

And fourth, the government felt that most Canadians would support, and even welcome, enlarged measures of tax reduction.

If these reasons for sweeping tax reductions in the pre-election budget of 1949 were valid, then surely they warrant consideration now, when:

First of all, consumer goods are not only available but are stockpiled in clogged inventories;

Second, when revenues will most surely exceed expenditures for the reasons I have given;

Third, when the amount paid off the national debt stands at $2,344 million as against $1,600 million in 1949;

And fourth, because there can be no doubt that the Canadian people would welcome relief from the present excessive and unwarranted high levels of taxation.

I believe that in the light of present conditions, and the relationship which these conditions bear to the government's action in its pre-election budget of 1949, a cyclical budgetary system, governed by elections and political expediency, is unwarranted, is fraudulent, is an affront to parliament, and should be discarded immediately.

Several weeks before this budget was presented to parliament, the house voted unanimously to do away with the four per cent limit on medical expenses as a deductible expense for income tax puposes. There was not one single dissenting voice in this house. However, despite this unanimous voice of parliament, the minister, in his budget address, said that he did not believe that the four per cent limit should be done away with, and so he completely nullified the unanimous voice of parliament.

Mr. Sinclair: Nonsense; you know it is nonsense too.

Mr. Hees: The cabinet is supposed to be the executive of parliament and subject to the wishes of the majority of parliament. But by his action, the Minister of Finance has shown, once again, the contempt in which this cabinet holds parliament, from which it derives its authority.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I say that the minister has presented a budget which insults the intelligence of the average Canadian; a budget which once again overtaxes the people of Canada, so that the government may reduce taxes next year for the purpose of trying to win another election; and is yet another example of the contempt in which this cabinet holds parliament. I believe it is a budget designed to serve political expediency, and brings government in this country to a new all-time low.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I probably should say at the outset that my speech tonight will not create as much interest among the Liberals particularly as did the speech of my colleague from Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) a few moments ago. I think I should also say that in many respects the hon. member for Moose Jaw was speaking his own opinion, which I think he made clear, and was not expressing the wish or the policy of this group. I do not want to imply—

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. member permit a question? Is he expressing the views of his group?

Mr. Noseworthy: I shall try. This much at least can be said. In this group there is some latitude for the expression of a personal opinion. We are not all forced to say the same thing at all times.

Mr. Lapointe: You have no choice in the matter.

Mr. Noseworthy: I do not want to give the impression that this group does not agree with the hon. member for Moose Jaw to the extent that there is need for careful scrutinizing of government expenditures and the expenditure of many departments of the government. I think the hon. member for Moose Jaw was correct when he said that no private business that approximated to any extent the size of the business that is carried on by the government today would be carried on by the methods followed by the government.

His suggestion that there should be a central purchasing agency, and that there should be a committee of this house set up for the express purpose of scrutinizing government expenditures, as is done in the United States and elsewhere, are suggestions that most members in this house will agree with. At a time when federal, provincial and municipal taxes are taking 33 per cent of our national income, I suggest it does behoove us to scrutinize carefully where there is waste, or where the public is not getting value for the dollars that are collected and spent.

Why I rose was to support the subamendment which was moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) on April 22, and which is found on page 1489 of Hansard as follows:

> This house further regrets that the government has ignored the wish of this house, as expressed by a unanimous vote on March 26, that the four per cent floor under medical expenses deductible for income tax purposes should be abolished.

I rise to support that subamendment with a full knowledge of the utter futility of opposition criticism in this house. My experience in this house has been that, constituted as the house is, opposition criticism is absolutely futile. The government just does not condescend to accept, or pay the slightest attention to any criticism that may come from this side of the house, no matter how well founded that criticism may be. I shall give examples of that at a later time.

I think the wish of the house in the unanimous acceptance it gave to the resolution moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on March 26, and to which reference is made in the subamendment, was made quite clear. I do not think there is any doubt on the part of any member that Liberals and opposition members alike wanted not merely consideration of that question, but to have the four per cent floor removed. I do not think there is any doubt about it. I do not think Liberal members who gave their consent to that resolution wanted a mere consideration, without themselves feeling strongly one way or another as to whether the government should accept the resolution, after giving it consideration.

The country feels today that that four per cent floor should be removed. And when the house voted on the resolution, which was worded in the only way in which it could possibly be presented to the house, it expressed its desire to the minister, and indicated that it wanted the four per cent floor removed.

But after giving consideration, the minister chose to ignore the wishes of parliament. That is the point at issue here. The house has no authority to go farther than to recommend for the consideration of the minister any matter affecting the spending of public money. The house gave the minister its opinion in the only way that opinion could be given, and that applied not only to opposition members but also to Liberals.

I am confident that hon. members sitting on the government benches were just as serious in their desire to have the four per cent floor removed as were our members in the opposition. But what happened? We got not the slightest attention to our request; and this would seem to indicate that in this country we have reached a situation where we no longer have government by parliament, but rather government by a cabinet, or by individual members of that cabinet.

After all, I presume members are elected for some purpose. We are sent here to express as well as we can to the government our wishes in respect of legislation coming before the house. We are here to interpret to the government, so far as we can, the wishes of the people we represent. But in this parliament we have reached the stage where such representations are simply ignored.

No matter how we try, even when Liberal members join with the opposition in trying to impress upon a cabinet minister what they believe the country wants, that cabinet minister can afford to ignore those wishes. I suppose it is too much to expect a Liberal member to oppose a cabinet minister's policy on the floor of the house. There was a time when that was done. I sat in an earlier parliament in which there were any number of Liberal members who were quite ready to stand in their places in the house and criticize policies set forth by the cabinet. But we do not get much of that today. Surely it must be possible for those Liberal members who do not feel free to express opposition to cabinet policy when it is set forth in the house to express such opposition in their own caucuses. I just cannot understand a situation in which every Liberal member in the house on the occasion of the passage of a resolution gives his support to that resolution, and yet will sit in caucus with a minister and permit him to ignore completely the wishes set forth by Liberal and opposition members alike. I should think that, regardless of what Liberal members may do in the house, surely they must be able to influence government policy in their own caucuses.

I certainly hope that, while the minister has indicated in his budget that the four per cent floor is to remain, those Liberal members who supported the resolution in the house will make it quite clear to the minister that they want to have adopted the opinion expressed in the vote on the resolution.

The minister set forth certain objections to eliminating the four per cent floor. He pointed out that originally the legislation was intended to give relief only in exceptional or extraordinary cases of illness. Whatever may have been the original intention of the legislation, the intention of members in the house was quite implicit in the resolution that, regardless of the original intention, we now wanted to have the four per cent floor removed. And, after all, who is to determine what would be considered extraordinary expenses in a case of this kind?

Surely there are tens of thousands of people to whom a hospital bill of $100 is just as great a hardship as a bill of $1,000 or $2,000 to some other citizens. I do not think the minister or anyone else can say that a hospital bill of $100 is just an ordinary affair, and that that is not the kind of burden to which the legislation was intended to apply. The fact remains that this house and the taxpayers of this country, the people who are directly affected by this, expected that when the resolution passed this house it would be implemented in the budget.

The minister's assistant raises the objection that there would be administrative difficulty in checking hospital and medical bills, but I would draw his attention to what is done in the case of donations for charitable purposes. There must be tens of thousands of citizens whose charitable donations are comparatively small, who give $1, $2, or $5 to the Red Cross during its annual drive and who deduct that amount from their taxable income. If it can be done in the one instance, I fail to see why it cannot be done in the other.

There is another instance in which the minister's action is in direct opposition to the wishes of parliament as expressed in the resolution to which I have referred. The minister retained the four per cent floor but he raised the ceiling. My contention is that that raising of the ceiling will not benefit the class of people about whom we were concerned when we asked for consideration of the abolition of the four per cent floor. The raising of the ceiling to $2,000 will benefit the wealthier citizens who can afford to go to the more expensive hospitals and hire the more expensive specialists, but a $2,000 hospital or sickness bill is something that the ordinary workingman just could not contemplate because it would ruin him. The working people of this country are not the ones who are going to benefit by the raising of that ceiling, but it was those people with whom the house was concerned when we asked for consideration of the removal of the floor of four per cent.

I want to turn for a moment to the question of the personal income tax and the budget and discuss the minister's alleged reduction of six per cent in the personal income tax. In my opinion the minister sought to take credit for an actual reduction in income tax. It is true that his statement on page 1254 of Hansard is quite explicit, and in order to be fair to the minister I shall read it. He said:

> In other words, the average taxpayer will pay six per cent less than he would otherwise have done under the income tax law as it now stands.

The interpretation which the country took from that statement was that there would be an actual lowering of the income tax this year. I think the minister contributed to that impression when he said, as reported on page 1255:

> I think I should make clear that the reductions in income tax which I have announced will not be sufficient, for most taxpayers, to offset the effect of the old age security tax.

In other words he sought to show the Canadian taxpayer that if by chance he found his 1952 taxes actually higher than his 1951 taxes, the fault lay with the social security tax. The minister succeeded to some extent in spreading that impression throughout the country. For instance, the U. S. News and World Report of April 18, page 82, had this to say:

> Canada's personal income tax is being reduced by 6 per cent. For low-income taxpayers, most of the benefit of that cut will be wiped out by a new social security tax that takes effect July 1.

Our own wide-awake Canadian journalists were not slow in seeing through the so-called tax reduction. In the issue of April 26 the editor of Saturday Night stated the case quite clearly when he said:

> No one can say that this year's budget was straightforward. The general public must have realized by now that what Mr. Abbott called reductions in income tax are increases over what we paid last year even before you add the social security tax.

That is the actual situation. One would naturally expect that when the minister announced that there was going to be a six per cent reduction in personal income tax this year the man with $2,000 taxable income would pay less in 1952 than he paid in 1951. That is the meaning which ordinary people took out of the statement that taxes were to be reduced six per cent. The actual fact is that even before the two per cent—this year one per cent—social security tax is added the taxpayer actually will pay more in 1952 on the same taxable income than he paid in 1951. A single person whose income was $1,800 in 1951 paid $132 taxes; in 1952, before adding the social security tax, he will pay $140, an increase of $8. A single person with an income of $2,000 paid $165 in 1951. In 1952, before the social security tax is added, he will pay $175, an increase of $10. A man with an income of $5,000 paid $770 in 1951. The same man with the same income will pay $820 in 1952 before the social security tax is added, an increase in 1952 over 1951 of $50. It is not surprising that one of our humorous writers—I think it was Bruce West in the Toronto Globe and Mail—wrote an article on the minister's tax reduction and suggested that since the minister by reducing taxes this year is making us pay more taxes then possibly next year he should increase taxes so that we may be paying less. It is quite possible that the skilled magician who is the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) could by a sleight-of-hand trick convince us next year that by increasing taxes he is actually going to reduce them just as this year while supposedly reducing taxes he actually increased them.

I want to deal for a moment with the sales tax. In his budget speech the minister said that in his opinion the sales tax is a fair levy. We believe, and have so stated in the house on many occasions, that even with the exemptions from the sales tax it still bears most heavily on those who are least able to pay. The sales tax ignores one of the basic principles of good taxation. It ignores entirely the principle of taxation according to the ability of the person taxed to pay that tax. I should like to remind the house and the minister that all-told the sales and excise taxes now produce about 30 per cent of Canada's federal income. In the United States, where they have sales taxes and to some extent excise taxes, they raise only 11 per cent of their federal budget by these two means. We have maintained and still maintain that the sales tax is not a good tax, that it is a hidden tax, and that the people in the lower income groups, the people with large families to raise, suffer most from that tax.

On the question of corporation taxes the minister expressed regret that they could not be substantially reduced this year but he held out some hope to the corporations that that result might be achieved in future years. The opinion expressed by the minister was shared by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), the financial critic of the official opposition. Unfortunately, and here I think I can speak for this group, we do not share that concern. I do not feel that the corporations have suffered to any great extent by being overburdened with taxation during the past year. In his budget speech the minister indicated that his own estimate of corporation profits made a year ago was 12 per cent too low, that corporation profits for the year 1950 were 12 per cent higher than the minister estimated in April of 1951.

The minister also indicated that much of his surplus resulted from the fact that he underestimated corporation profits. That would suggest to me at least that these corporations have not suffered by being overtaxed. I notice that the minister estimates an increase of $13 million in corporation taxes for the coming year. If his estimate is as conservative as it was last year, then it is quite evident that the minister expects corporation profits to continue to increase this year as they have been doing every year since the war. Here again I should like to make a comparison between Canada and the United States by reference to the publication to which I have already referred. At page 84 there is the following:

> Corporations, like individuals, are to get a slight reduction in tax rates under the new Canadian budget.

Here I might interject that I sincerely hope the proposed reduction in corporation taxes will not work out the same as the reduction in personal income tax. The writer goes on to say:

> The result will be that, so far as the central government in Canada is concerned, the top effective tax rate on corporations will be 45 per cent. In addition, there are provincial taxes of 5 to 7 per cent. Canada has no excess profits tax, and the new budget proposes none. In the United States corporations pay a regular federal tax of 52 per cent, plus an excess profits tax of 30 per cent. The average federal tax is about 60 per cent. On top of that, 32 states impose relatively small taxes. So the Canadian corporation, by comparison, comes off fairly easily.

The concern expressed by the minister for corporations is not too well founded, and certainly is not shared by this group.

Turning now to the excise tax reductions, I want to say that we welcome such reductions as the minister saw fit to make, particularly in the taxes that were imposed a year ago. Certainly there was a crying need for those reductions. If the reductions did nothing else they showed that the minister is now willing to acknowledge that he made a mistake a year ago in imposing those taxes. Speaker after speaker from all opposition groups tried to point out to the minister when these taxes were being imposed that he was going to injure our economy. Speaker after speaker tried to persuade the minister not to impose those taxes. The budget speech bears witness to the fact that the opposition members were right and the minister was wrong. During the past year those taxes caused pockets of unemployment and brought unnecessary hardship to thousands of Canadian citizens. The minister gives those taxes some credit for halting inflation. Our position, and I think that of all three opposition groups in the house last year, was that these were not the best measures to curb inflation, that other things could be done which would be much less harmful to the Canadian public.

I wanted to say a word or two on the surplus, about which we have heard so much. I suppose the great conundrum arising out of the budget is when a surplus is not a surplus. The big question is just what was the surplus last year. Was it $1,009 million? Was it $722 million? Or was it a mere $356 million? In the government's monthly report at the end of December an interim surplus of $722 million was shown. Then in the budget the minister tells us that he made certain non-budgetary cash outlays from the surplus which totalled $653 million, and that after making those outlays he still had a surplus of $356 million. Well, $356 million plus $653 million paid out in non-budgetary cash outlays totals $1,009 million. So the country is left with the big question: just how large was the actual surplus? Apparently the minister had to do as much juggling with his surplus as he did with the personal income tax.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I think we can agree with hon. members who have already indicated that this budget favours the rich to the disadvantage of the poor. While the hon. member for Greenwood did not express that opinion in those words, he came very close to it; and when the official critic of the Progressive Conservative party feels that a budget is benefiting the well to do at the expense of those in the lower income brackets, I am convinced there must be something in his statement. As a matter of fact the effect of the income tax was very well shown by the hon. member when he pointed out the disparity in the increase this year between those in the lower income groups and those in the higher income groups. That can be found at page 1478 of Hansard. In the distribution of the social security tax, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) at page 1485 of Hansard, we have another example. The sales tax, which bears most heavily upon those in the lower income groups, is to contribute $135 million toward the cost of social security; personal income tax is to contribute $52 million; and the corporation tax $48 million. The fact that some slight relief was given corporations while there was no reduction whatever in the sales tax is one more indication that this government has been getting closer and closer to St. James street and farther and farther away from the common people of this country. The high percentage of the federal revenue raised by sales and personal income taxes indicates that disregard for the interests of the common people and illustrates the lack of sympathy on the part of this government for those in the ordinary walks of life.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, having listened to experts in different lines of business make their contributions to this debate, I almost hesitate to take part in it. Just an hour or so ago we heard quite an address on high finance. I am afraid many of us were not able to take in everything the speaker said, and will have to be enlightened further as the days go by.

This evening I do not intend to give the budget any new name. It has been called so many uncomplimentary things that I do not think it needs another name. It has been very well described by the speakers who have preceded me. Many people were keeping their fingers crossed until April 8 when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) delivered his budget. Many people hesitated to buy things such as automobiles and other necessary equipment, feeling that some reduction in taxes would be made. In particular, many people all across the country were hoping against hope for a reduction in the income tax levies. Taxation, of course, is just one of the headaches that the people have been suffering from for eleven or twelve years.

We have been paying exceedingly heavy income taxes. When the war ceased people thought that they would be granted some relief from the high levies of 1945, but we found we had to prepare for another defensive war. Some people call it policing, but after all it is actual war. The people did not even have a short breathing spell until heavier taxes were again levied. As a result of the preparations for this defensive war which have been going on for some time we have drifted into a false state of prosperity about which the supporters of the present government are boasting, perhaps for political reasons and because of the expected election in 1953. But when people have to point to war, whether all-out or defensive, as a means of bringing about prosperity, then I think they should get off their high-horse and get back to sound thinking about peacetime prosperity and peacetime living. They should not be boosting the policies of their government.

As a result of this false prosperity we have a shortage of building material. Many of our men and women across the country, and the city of Ottawa is no exception, are suffering from a shortage of houses. They are suffering from a shortage of cash and credit by means of which they could provide themselves with these houses. We find that within the last day or two even in this city some of the officials have been asking the service clubs to take the lead in providing houses. I believe that conditions are becoming very poor when such events occur. On the 6th of this month I listened to a sermon by the minister of St. John's church in which he described very well what is happening today. Had he gone all the way and said what he should have said on that occasion perhaps he would have offended some of his parishioners who are supporters of this government, but he did say that because of the shortage of houses families of five or six people were compelled to live in one room. In many cases six, seven or eight families are compelled to use one bathroom. In my opinion such conditions should not exist. Had the government looked after its business as well as it has looked after some other things, such conditions would not occur.

Even after all these events, on the 17th of last month we found that we still had 337,000 unemployed. This is something of which the country should not be very proud. As I stated a moment ago, there are people who still want homes and many other things, yet we have this number of unemployed and some unused materials. In addition to these hardships, in the budget brought down by the minister on April 8, we have some added crippling taxation. The minister thought he would give us some good news and led the people to believe that there would be a decrease of six per cent in personal income taxes. Of course, that is not true. Without going to the trouble of preparing a set of figures of my own, I shall read once again the figures put on the record by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) on Tuesday last. I think it is a good thing for the members to realize what is happening. These figures can be found on page 1490 of Hansard for April 22, 1952. The hon. member said:

> Let us take into consideration married persons without children, those in that category. If the taxable income—that is, after the deduction of their $2,000 exemption—is $250, the 1951 tax is shown as $42; the 1952 tax is $44 plus the old age security levy of $2.50. This is an increase of $4.50 and a percentage increase of 10-7/10 per cent. If the taxable income is $1,000, the 1951 tax was $165; the 1952 tax, $175; the old age security levy, $10. The increase in 1952 over 1951 is $20, and that is a percentage increase of 12-1/10 per cent. If the taxable income is $3,000, then the 1951 tax was $561; the 1952 tax, $596, the old age security levy, $30; the increase in 1952 over 1951 is $65 or 11·6 per cent increase. If the taxable income is $8,000, the tax for 1951 was $1,826; the 1952 tax, $1,946; the old age security levy is $30, which is the ceiling for the old age security levy this year. That is an increase of $150 for 1952 over 1951, which would be a percentage increase of 8·2 per cent. Then if you jump up to the $98,000 taxable income category, $58,370 was the 1951 tax; the 1952 tax will be $61,220; the old age security levy, $30. The total increase for 1952 over 1951 would be $2,820 or a 4-9/10 per cent increase.

I do not need to go further, Mr. Speaker, because the figures I have given will show that instead of a policy of soaking the rich, which is advocated by some people, the policy of the Minister of Finance is to soak the poor, the people who can least afford to pay.

Turning to some of the other taxes, we have the excise tax which was increased last year from 15 to 25 per cent on certain commodities. In this year's budget it was put back to the original 15 per cent. In my opinion that tax should never have been levied. This opinion was expressed on many occasions during the discussion of the 1951 budget, but the minister would not make the required changes. Figures which I placed on the record on March 7 last when I spoke on the address in reply to the speech from the throne show that production of certain commodities has decreased, and the minister collected much less revenue than he would have collected if the tax had not been levied. In addition to that, unemployment increased and as a result of the unemployment many families had to go without things that their unemployed breadwinner should have been able to supply. We are wondering whether these tax reductions will be passed on to the consumer. Many people say they are not and from the prices quoted for different commodities I believe they have not been passed on. I wonder what the government is doing in this connection. If the benefits of the tax cut are not being passed on, then I believe that the suggestion made by the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) some weeks ago should be adopted; that is, that the government should cut the tariff on many of the goods that are bearing a high tariff today, and let our manufacturers bring their profits down to some extent as well as passing on the benefits to the consumer.

Some mention was made of the drop in the cost-of-living index. Here again let me point out that according to an article in the Ottawa Journal of April 4 under the heading: "Mostly due to meat price cuts." the decrease in the cost-of-living index was due to decrease in the price of farm products. This is what the editorial said:

Index shows decline for second consecutive month.

The cost-of-living index during February declined by 1·7 points to 189·1 from 190·8, the bureau of statistics reported today.

The second consecutive monthly decline in the prices barometer, based on 1935-39 prices equalling 100, was sparked mostly by a drop in meat prices, the bureau said.

It was the biggest drop since December, 1942, when the index also declined by 1·7 points. The February decline followed a drop of seven-tenths of a point during January.

Meats declined along with eggs, oranges, cabbages, topcoats and men's suits. These overbalanced increases for rent, furniture, dishes, hardware, floor coverings, telephone rates in eastern Canada, domestic coal and health and personal care, along with newspapers and theatre admissions.

I am bringing this in for the purpose of showing that we are getting a cut in the cost of living at the expense of our people on the farms. You will find that practically all of the items that have been reduced are products of the farm; while those that have been increased are products of secondary industry. I feel that government policy at the present time is stacked against the farmer. Farm prices come down, while the cost of the goods the farmer has to buy in order to produce continually climb. We have, for instance, the international wheat agreement. In connection with that, when the first speaker after eight o'clock was on his feet, somebody across the way butted in with the remark of $65 million paid to the wheat growers of the west. I want to tell those who are interested in that question that in addition to the $65 million paid to the farmers they had a net loss of no less than $504 million on the British wheat agreement and on the cheap wheat supplied so that Canadians could eat cheap bread during the 1946-49 crop years. As a result of the international wheat agreement and cheap bread still being provided to our Canadian consumers, further losses are continuing. One of these days I intend to put these on the record.

While the prices of everything that the farmer has to buy are increasing, we find that provision is made in the international wheat agreement, which will conclude at the end of July, 1953, for the floor price to drop 10 cents per bushel per year, and there is a constant top price of $1.80. At the present time, as all hon. members are aware, or should be aware, the Canadian consumers are eating bread baked from wheat sold to the Canadian millers at the same price as that sold under the international wheat agreement. Why that should be I cannot understand. Government policy, however, is to continue that program, and they have not given any justification for that.

In connection with the new international wheat agreement that is being negotiated in London at the present time, I am not sure whether it will be in the interests of our farmers unless a proposal somewhat similar to that which was put forward by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) when the original international wheat agreement was being discussed is made use of. It will be noted that at that time there was the ceiling price and a decreasing floor price placed on our wheat without for one moment taking into consideration the price of the things that the farmer has to buy in order to produce that wheat. The suggestion was made by the hon. member for Acadia and when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said that it was impossible to find any method by which it could be done, the hon. member for Acadia pointed out to him that the international monetary fund had all of the figures required upon which to base a reasonable agreement.

The policy of supplying cheap wheat to our Canadian people all across the country is one other method of picking the pockets of the Canadian wheat growers, and only the prairie wheat growers, some 232,000 of them, during recent years. Then we have the price of beef. Some people are complaining about that. While the price of good cattle is fixed today at 25 cents at Toronto, that is 3½ cents below the proposal made by the farm organizations of western Canada. It must be remembered that during recent months many people who are today feeding these cattle paid from 30 cents to 33 cents a pound for them. In addition to the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease we have this other disaster of a drastic cut in prices, which will discourage the feeding of these cattle in the future. People perhaps realize that they never miss the water until the well runs dry. You will never realize the injustice you are doing to the producers of livestock until you run short of meat, and then you will suddenly wake up and find out.

The floor price for pork is fixed at $26 at Toronto and Montreal and $24.50 at Winnipeg, but that is nothing to brag about in comparison with the cost of raising hogs at the present time. In my opinion it should have been $28 per hundred, and provision made, which is not made today, for compelling the packers to pay on the basis of the price set by the government.

Then, again, in the case of butter we have a floor price which is guaranteed only to the parties who pack that butter, and the producer is left out in the cold and at the mercy of the purchasers of his commodity. In the case of eggs there is a floor of 38 cents a dozen. Again that is not being paid to the producer, but is a guarantee only to the parties who pack them and have them at the end of the egg season.

For many weeks we have had the cheese producers coming to the government with their plea, with their briefs, to have something done about a floor price for cheese; but up to the present time nothing whatever has been done. Only on Monday we had a question asked of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and his reply was that they were watching the situation, or words to that effect. I feel sure that some ways could be devised to provide prices which would benefit the producer rather than the other parties, namely the packers and others in that line of business.

Many of our daily papers are helping to continue to deceive the people of Canada with regard to our agricultural industry. I am glad that we have some weekly newspapers published in farming districts that have a much better grasp of the situation and that are willing to learn things from firsthand experience. Of course those fellows behind the desks in the city editorial rooms would not even think of studying agriculture. That is much too easy at the present time. Perhaps it is like what the banking industry used to be some time ago. Many people felt that if there was a dumb member of the family they had to put him on the farm in order that he could make a living, but today we find in editorial chairs, in the banks, and in other places, many of those dumb members of families. They are placed there so that they can make a living. That will explain the reasons for some of the stupid editorials we see in our newspapers.

I have here, however, an editorial from the Wainwright Star-Chronicle, which is a weekly newspaper, and a very useful one, printed in my constituency. It has been circulated for a number of years. Some time ago when people were discussing the butter question, and the high prices paid for butter, this editorial appeared:

> Some of our daily publications seem to be rather badly troubled about the farmer getting too much money for his butter, and failing to co-operate with his market, the consumer, in providing an adequate supply of this product. Sometimes we think it might be a good idea if those who protest that the farmer or the dairyman is making money too easily were required to do a stint of duty on the farm. While we must admit that the price of livestock has been very satisfactory of late—

And I might add that this was written before the outbreak of the foot-and-mouth disease was made known.

> —and dairy products prices have been at a more satisfactory level, we feel that until prices for farm products are such that the farmer can work a forty-hour week and can pay something approaching union scale wages to his help for a union week, we have not been called upon to give the farmer a much greater reward for his effort than is his due.
> It appears to us that there are a lot of other trades which have upped their prices quite a lot more than the farmers, and who, if and when they wish, practise "scarcity" marketing.
> We're all behind the farmer.

I might say that the purpose of many people being behind the farmer is so that they can boot him good and hard.

> He works so hard, he works so long and he gets so little, may be somewhat of an exaggeration, but there is no doubt that when one considers the amount of work he does, the extreme uncertainty of his cash rewards, and the ever growing cost of operation, he is not the most overpaid citizen in Alberta.

Only this morning I noticed in the Ottawa Citizen that authority has been given to the steel producers in the United States to increase their price to the extent of $3 per ton. We import large quantities of steel from that country, and I would expect that in the very near future we will have another increase in the price of farm machinery.

When I spoke in the debate on the address in reply, on March 7, I advocated that something be done about setting up a royal commission to investigate farm machinery prices. Away back in 1937 or 1938 a similar investigation was held in the House of Commons, and the figures brought out at that time showed that almost 70 per cent of the machinery manufactured in Canada went to the farmers of the west. So that when the statement was made some time ago by a member of the house that the west was opened up for the benefit of central Canada, I suggest it was a correct statement, and that its truth is proved by those figures.

In my opinion farm machinery prices today are much too high, and in a moment or two I hope to place upon the record figures showing those prices. Apparently farm machinery manufacturers feel that the goose is laying the golden egg, and at least some of them are not allowing their agents to cash in on the increased prices. Some time ago a percentage was paid, but I understand that at the moment the agent collects a stipulated amount for each unit sale he makes. Those commissions have not kept pace with recent price increases. Many of them are protesting, and I should not be surprised if in the near future some action were taken by those agents.

In the Alberta wheat pool budget, under the heading, "The Cost of Farming", we find some interesting information. This is the issue of April 11, 1952, only a short time ago. It states:

> The cost of goods and services used by farmers in western Canada is considerably more than double that of the prewar years. In January the index figure stood at 223·5. By way of comparison, the cost of living index for all of Canada that month was 191·5. In both cases the base period of 1935-39 equals 100.
>
> The index of commodities and services used by farmers in western Canada, and farm living costs, during the month of January was reported by the dominion bureau of statistics as follows:

	Index number
Composite index, excluding living costs	227·3
Equipment and materials	217·3
Farm machinery	196·4
Building materials	332·5
Gasoline, oil and grease	137·8
Feed	252·6
Fertilizer	161·8
Binder twine	448·3

I might say that one of the dealers told me recently that the price of binder twine would be up another $4 per hundredweight for the 1952 crop year. Then it continues:

	Index number
Seed	248·7
Hardware	208·8
Taxes and interest rates	159·7
Farm wages	382·4

Let me say that that is one of the items of farm expense that should have been increased, because farm workers were working at wages far below what they should have been receiving, when compared with the wages paid in other industries. Then it continues:

	Index number
Farm family living costs	217·8
Composite index, including living costs	223·5

Those figures should suffice to show that farming costs have increased drastically, while the prices of products the farmer sells have been static or, in many cases, reduced during recent months. I am not going to say more about agriculture at the present time, because I have only a limited time at my disposal.

There is one other matter however about which I should like to speak. I am referring to the physically incapacitated persons in Canada. I felt that at this session we would have an opportunity to discuss this matter, because at the opening of the session I believe the second item on the list of notices of motions was one in the name of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) in these words:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of co-operating with the provincial governments for the purpose of providing pensions, equal to old age pensions, for all those who are incapacitated and unable to earn their living, regardless of age.

I was surprised to note that, for some mysterious reason, the resolution was dropped. Then during the last day or so, we find a resolution worded in exactly the same way appearing almost at the bottom of the list of notices of motion. I would expect therefore that we would not be able to have an opportunity to discuss the motion or to have a vote upon it at the present session.

On many occasions during the last few years inquiries have been made as to what the government intended to do for those who are incapacitated. Up to the present time we have not had much satisfaction. The hon. member for Fort William did make his speech in the budget debate a couple of days ago, upon which occasion he made reference to physically incapacitated persons, and brought out many good points with which I could heartily agree. The only trouble however is that in spite of all the praise he has given each and every cabinet minister who comes before the house, we have not yet received from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) any legislation to provide those pensions so sincerely sought by so many members in the house. I am surprised that these pensions have not been provided for. I understand that last year we had a national production of $21,200 million and we also had a surplus of several hundred million dollars. On April 15 the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) spoke to the Western Ontario Liberal Association, and I quote from a report in the Ottawa Citizen of April 16, as follows:

> Although taxes are unusually high for a peacetime budget, people of Canada never were better off and prosperity is at its highest peak, Hon. Paul Martin, Minister of Health and Welfare, said Monday.

Speaking before the annual meeting of the Western Ontario Liberal Association, he said the government was faced with the "grave situation of preparing a defence system for Canada and had no alternative but to keep taxes high.

Freedom must be bought and this country is spending two billion dollars this year to see Canadians remain free."

Despite the heavy levy, Mr. Martin said Canadians and the nation never were so prosperous.

If we are so prosperous, why in the world does not the government put into effect a pension policy for those who are unable to help themselves? Is there a deliberate holding up of this legislation until perhaps next year when many of us expect an election and when it can be used as another bribe to get votes so that the government can be returned to power? The minister continued:

Labour income and investment is at a record high and on a per capita basis Canada leads the world in international trade.

Perhaps if the people of Canada had the means with which to purchase their requirements we would not have so much for export. Much of the exports about which the Minister of National Health and Welfare was boasting are being made to our potential enemies in the form of bullets and other things that go with a war, defensive or otherwise. The minister went on:

Canada has been referred to in world circles as being the land of great promise and excellent government.

Perhaps that should have been changed a little bit so as to read: "Canada has been referred to in world circles as being an excellent country with a government of great promises".

As one example of this, the Minister of Finance promised Canadians a decrease of six per cent in their income tax whereas we find in fact these taxes will be increased from eight to twelve per cent in the low income brackets. That is not good enough. I think the people of Canada are wakening up to what is happening.

The world at large is in need of greater food production and we have the potential means of producing food in great abundance. But when you speak to farmers about this many say, "What is the use? If we produce more crops there are no markets for them and even if we do get a chance to sell our products the government comes along with its income tax legislation and takes our money. So why bother?"

If we had a financial policy that would work in the interests of the common people, that would make it possible for every family to have a decent home and enjoy a decent standard of living, then I think we would have much greater production than we have at the present time. There would be less need for worry and war. Social credit can provide that policy if the government will only make use of it.

Mr. J. J. Smith (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I want first to compliment the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) upon the address he made this evening and the courage he displayed. I do not agree with everything he had to say, but I think it was an honest speech. If there were more members in this house with the courage of the hon. member for Moose Jaw I think it would be of benefit to parliament. I have often wondered where we would be heading if a socialist government was elected in Canada, but if we had the hon. member for Moose Jaw as the Minister of Finance possibly they would not put us altogether on the rocks.

I have a few matters to deal with, but first I should like to refer to the budget. Many things have been said about the budget and while I think there is in it really nothing to cheer about, at the same time there is nothing to cry about. I think the people of Canada got pretty well what they expected from the budget. Speaking for the people of my constituency, I think it is just about what they expected. I think Canadians generally realize that you cannot play both ends against the middle. If you are going to have additional services, public works and so on, you must have high taxes. The hon. member for Moose Jaw pointed that out very clearly.

Many illustrations have been given since this debate began of just what this budget means to the Canadian taxpayer. I am going to repeat an illustration which has been used on two occasions by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair). The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance is reported on page 1526 of Hansard of April 23 as having said:

I shall use the example the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar used yesterday, the simple case of the married man with an income of $3,000. He has an exemption of $2,000. His first $1,000 of taxable income in 1950 was taxed at the rate of 15 per cent, and in 1950 he paid $150.

And again:

Therefore while in 1950 he paid $150, he paid $165 in 1951.

That individual had an increase of $15 per year in his income tax. Let us assume that that man is going to buy a small automobile. As a result of the budget, he will save $150 because of the reduced taxes on that automobile. If he were to buy an electric stove he would save $50 on the cheaper type. If he were to pay this additional $15 income tax for the next ten years he would save it on the purchase of one automobile.

I want at this time to thank the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) for the decreases in the taxes on automobiles. When I spoke before the Easter recess I suggested that the taxes on automobiles should be eliminated entirely. This is a start, however, and as budgets go on in the future I hope that the taxes on automobiles will be eliminated entirely. I said at that time that I thought the automobile industry of Canada had grown up. I still think so, and if it were given a chance to stand on its own feet I think it could compete with that industry in other countries.

I want to refer to the price of farm machinery. The other day the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) spoke about the prices of machinery in Canada and compared those prices with what the farmer gets for his products. He suggested that a committee or commission should be appointed to investigate the price of machinery. I agree with the hon. member, although I do not agree that we should start in where the Saskatchewan government left off. In Saskatchewan a committee was set up in February by the provincial government to investigate the price of farm machinery. I said publicly at the time in Saskatchewan that it was nothing but a smokescreen, a snowman that would melt in the March sun, and it has already done so. The reason it has done so is that even if there was a combine or cartel existing in the machinery industry there is not a province in the Dominion of Canada that could do anything about it.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar referred to the fact that some of the companies would not give the Saskatchewan committee all the information they wanted. I am sure he was not surprised. Why should they? What could the provincial government do if they did find the price of machinery was too high? If the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was sincere—and I am sure he was— I think he could have joined with me when less than six months ago I brought up the same subject in the house. He did not see fit to do so but I will join with him now. However, let us leave the Saskatchewan committee out of it. Personally I think it was only set up for political reasons and, as I stated before, it was only a snowman and has already melted. On October 19, 1951, in speaking in the house I referred to an address made the day before by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) and I quoted a part of his speech. I am going to quote it again. I said, as found at page 228 of Hansard for that date:

> Let us see what the hon. member for Coast-Capilano had to say yesterday. As reported at page 162 of Hansard he said:
> "I learned a good deal this summer about combines, cartels and monopolies—indeed this has been a very beneficial summer for me—at the United Nations. If there is one country in the world which has tried to wipe out cartels, combines and business monopolies, it has been the United States of America—and this goes away back to Teddy Roosevelt's time. The Americans have found that no matter how they attacked the problem of monopolies, combines and trusts in their own country, international cartels have to be attacked internationally. With that in mind they put forward a resolution before the United Nations to have an international commission which would deal internationally with cartels beyond the reach of any individual government. I, as the Canadian representative, was glad to second that resolution."

At that time I went on to say:

> I have read that to the house to show that so far as machinery is concerned, if these things do exist within the machinery industry, there is nothing that this government can do alone, but it certainly can do something in co-operation with the United States.

Therefore I suggest that when the government of Saskatchewan set up their committee last February they must have known perfectly well that if there was anything wrong with the price of machinery there was nothing they could do about it. Nevertheless I will join with any member from any part of the house who urges the government—and I already have once—to investigate the machinery industry in Canada. However, I want to be fair. As farmers we have been complaining about the price of machinery rising since 1946. I have an article in my hand from the Winnipeg Free Press. I have also seen the same statement in Maclean's magazine and I have not heard or seen it refuted. The heading is, "Farm tools up only 66 per cent in ten years". The article reads:

> The increase in retail prices of other commodities since 1941 has far exceeded that of farm machinery, G. A. McMillan of Toronto, Canadian sales manager for Massey-Harris Company Limited, told the Free Press, Friday. In Winnipeg to confer with sales representatives for Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan, Mr. McMillan said farm machinery prices have risen only 66 per cent in the ten-year period. But the cost of raw materials is up about 98 per cent and hourly wage rates had risen by 158 per cent. Mr. McMillan said the Massey-Harris Company had spent about $34 million—most of it in Canada—enlarging its operation since 1941. A $225,000 depot had been erected in Winnipeg.

I hold no brief for the machine companies but I want to be fair, and if that is the case —and I have not heard anyone refute it—then if they are making excess profits they certainly have not been making as much since 1946 up to the present time as they were prior to that. That is all I am going to say about farm machinery at the moment.

I want to speak for a few moments about the South Saskatchewan dam. At the outset I want to say that as far as I personally and the people of my constituency are concerned we will not benefit any more from the Saskatchewan dam than will the constituencies of Manitoba. I could use the constituency of Souris as an example. I think the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) will agree with me. I think he knows my constituency about as well as I know his, and I think his constituency will not benefit any more than mine. I hope that before too long we can get on with the job. I do not often quote editorials but I have one here to which I should like to refer. It is taken from a farm paper, the Western Producer of April 10, 1952. It deals with the debate that went on in the Saskatchewan legislature this winter with respect to the dam. It reads in part:

> When the subject was debated in the Saskatchewan legislative assembly it seemed at times that anybody who dared to cast doubts on its soundness was regarded as no better than a traitor. The main thing appeared to be to get on with the job—start spending the money. Surely those who are convinced of the feasibility and soundness of the scheme should welcome full investigation. This is far too big a thing to monkey around with or with which to play petty politics.

I wholeheartedly agree with that statement. It continues:

> Surely no one wants western agriculture to be saddled with a white elephant for which it will take generations to pay. On the other hand, if the practical value of the proposition is determined beyond reasonable doubt, no one need fear that it will be proceeded with against any opposition. It may be doubted whether the performances put on by those legislators in Regina who seemed more interested in playing politics than in building dams will be helpful.

Well, I hope we in this house will not play politics with that dam. Last fall the government decided to appoint a commission to take one more look at the project, but I do not believe it has been able to make a report as yet. I hope that may be done in the very near future. Within the last day or so, however, I have learned from very reliable sources that this commission is holding meetings in western Canada, one in Lethbridge and one in Winnipeg. I should like to know why a commission needs to go to Winnipeg or Lethbridge to decide whether it is feasible to build a dam in Saskatchewan. I am sure that when the St. Mary's dam was being considered there were no meetings held in Saskatchewan to decide whether or not a dam should be built in Alberta. It may have been necessary for the commission to go to Saskatchewan to decide upon the feasibility of this undertaking. I would not object to that, but I do criticize it for this delay. To me that is a lot of nonsense, and I hope those in the government who are looking after this matter will see that they get down to work and give us a report yes or no.

One other matter I want to mention briefly is the damp grain in western Canada. It is not too often that I give bouquets to the government on the floor of this house. I do that in my constituency, and very successfully, I may say. However, I want to tell the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that we appreciate the way this grain has been handled, and I think that goes for those hon. members who do not support the government. I understand the grain is being moved with very little danger of spoiling, and we do appreciate that very much.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The sun helped too, did it not?

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): The sun did not help very much. In conclusion I want to refer again to redistribution, and what is going to happen in western Canada. When the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) presented his bill I asked, for the information of those who were opposed to it, what could be done so that Saskatchewan would not lose five seats, 25 per cent of its representation. The Prime Minister looked at me with a smile and said it would be necessary to amend the constitution; that that was a big order, but it would be given consideration. Well, it has been given consideration, and it seems that we will lose three seats instead of five.

I want to tell the Prime Minister and members of the government that we greatly appreciate this consideration. The job may have been big but it looks as though it will be done. I think all hon. members from Saskatchewan, including the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and those of the C.C.F. party, will join me in thanking the Prime Minister. Perhaps I should go further and thank all hon. members, from the maritime provinces, the central provinces, Manitoba and British Columbia for their kind consideration in this regard.

That is all I have to say at this time, Mr. Speaker. No doubt there will be other opportunities to speak in this debate, though I do not believe I will do so unless I am provoked into it.

On motion of Mr. Tustin the debate was adjourned.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN TORONTO "STAR" OF APRIL 23

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to a press clipping from the Toronto Daily Star of April 23, 1952, which was brought to my attention late this afternoon. The heading is "Canada to push seaway, ignore U.S.—Chevrier." The body of the article goes on to say:

> Ottawa, April 23—Canada is going to push ahead with her plans for the all-Canadian St. Lawrence seaway and joint Canadian-U.S. power project just as if the U.S. Senate wasn't considering U.S. participation in the seaway, Hon. Lionel Chevrier, Minister of Transport, said today.
>
> He was commenting on developments in the U.S. capital, where a senate committee reported the project to the Senate but without giving it a priority rating for consideration.
> "We are going to continue to press for a joint application to the international joint committee and if something does happen to make it possible for the U.S. to participate on the basis of the 1941 agreement we will be all set to proceed with that," Mr. Chevrier said.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I made no such statement as that attributed to me in the title, and the statements carried in the body of the article are not fully accurate. When I was asked by the correspondent of the Star over the telephone for my comments on the decision of the foreign relations committee of the Senate of the United States to refer the long-debated 1941 agreement to the floor of that body, I stated that Canada was going to press forward as strongly as it could for the all-Canadian seaway and the joint Canadian-United States power project by co-operation with the United States in filing an application to the international joint commission. I added that if meanwhile the United States congress approved of the 1941 agreement, Canada would be ready to proceed with the seaway on the basis of that agreement.

A headline such as this does me an injustice and the St. Lawrence waterway project a disservice. I have repeatedly taken the position both in and out of this house that the Canadian government favours the 1941 agreement but that it could not wait indefinitely. As an alternative it was developing the all-Canadian seaway. I hasten to add that I am led to believe that the correspondent reporting this statement is not himself responsible for the heading of it, but that does not detract from the harm and injury a statement such as this could do, particularly if it got any circulation in the United States. For that reason I felt that a correction should be made without delay.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will continue the budget debate.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, April 25, 1952

The house met at three o'clock.

HIGHWAYS

NIPAWIN-FLIN FLON, MAN.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): On April 7, 1952, as indicated in Hansard at page 1163, the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie) requested me to table the correspondence between the government of the province of Saskatchewan and the federal government with regard to No. 35 highway from Nipawin to Flin Flon in the years 1951 and 1952.

There has been no correspondence during this period on the highway from Nipawin to Flin Flon as such, but there has been an exchange of correspondence on that portion of the road between Flin Flon and Denare Beach.

I beg leave to table this correspondence.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE

AMOUNTS AUTHORIZED TO BE PURCHASED OR ACQUIRED AS AT DECEMBER 31, 1951

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): I beg leave, on behalf of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), to table a return showing the amounts authorized as at December 31, 1951, by the governor in council of foreign currencies other than United States currency, to be purchased or acquired, with moneys in the exchange fund account: (a) £15 million sterling, and (b) the equivalent of $500,000 in Canadian currency each in the case of all foreign currencies; also the amount of advances to the exchange fund account out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund outstanding at December 31, 1951: $1,880 million.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN DOMINION GOVERNMENT AND BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): I beg leave to table parliamentary return No. 18, moved by Mr. Fulton, correspondence exchanged between the dominion government and the government of the province of British Columbia concerning the trans-Canada highway agreement and regarding the removal of tolls.

I might say here, Mr. Speaker, that there have been some exchanges with respect to various details which are not included in this correspondence because of the relatively large amount of work involved in reproducing the documents. I have, however, spoken to the hon. member on this point and I believe he will find in the correspondence I am now tabling all the information he requires.

AGREEMENT WITH PROVINCE OF NOVA SCOTIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. Black (Cumberland): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Resources and Development. Is any headway being made in the matter of entering into an agreement with the province of Nova Scotia for the construction of the trans-Canada highway through Nova Scotia and Cape Breton island?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): I have had discussions recently with the minister of highways and public works for Nova Scotia. I can report only that I believe the government of Nova Scotia is giving favourable consideration to signing an agreement.

DOMINION DRAMA FESTIVAL

INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the government give immediate consideration to giving financial support to the dominion drama festival in accordance with the suggestion made by the Massey commission? I am asking this because of reported offers of sponsorship which many people consider to be undesirable.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The government has been giving, and is giving, consideration to all the recommendations in the Massey report, and as policy is formulated with respect to them it has been, and will continue to be, announced. But the hon. member knows that it has not been the custom to announce policy of that kind in reply to questions in the house.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Thursday, April 24, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. W. G. Blair (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, the debate on the budget affords me an opportunity to bring to the attention of this house the serious situation which is now threatening the stability and welfare of the entire dairy industry. Matters of grave concern have now reached a crucial point, and for that reason it is urgent that a review be made of the position of this industry which is so important in our Canadian economy.

In this same debate a year ago I pointed out dangers threatening the prosperity of this industry, which since that time have contributed to a situation which demands prompt action on the part of the government.

Dairying is one of the most important industries in Canada, and provides two million Canadians with either all or part of their livelihood. This number includes those who are engaged in production, processing and distribution, as well as supplying equipment and various services. Of the farm population in Canada, 450,000 farmers are dependent on receipts from the dairy industry as a source of income. It contributes more than $600 million to our national commerce. A large area of Canada is peculiarly suited to this form of farming. On many of these farms dairying is the only type of farming that will provide sufficient cash income to maintain families. If the dairy industry is not prosperous, then these farms will be abandoned. Many of these farmers are in districts some distance from other milk markets, which limits their production to either cheese or butter.

Not only is it an important branch of agriculture, but it is an industry which is important to mixed farming. Conservation of soil is dependent to a large degree on a healthy dairy and livestock industry. The upkeep of dairy herds is one of the most important factors in soil conservation and fertility maintenance.

There is a great lack of understanding between the consumer public and those engaged in the industry. It is a year-round business providing considerable employment for hired labour and a cash return throughout the year. It is not generally realized that it requires years of labour to build up a good dairy herd, and long hours of work to secure high production. It is an expensive proposition, as the purchase price of a good dairy stock and upkeep of barns and silos requires considerable outlay of cash. It is an industry of long hours, as cows must be tended and milked twice daily through seven days in the week, and there is added to this work the care of milk in order that it may reach the market in a satisfactory condition. When prices are high, consumers are more conscious of food prices, and there is an inclination on their part to blame rising costs on the farmers.

Some seem to forget that the dairy farmer begins his work early in the morning and finishes late at night for six days, with another four hours on Sunday. On the basis of a 12-hour day—and many farmers work over this time—with four hours additional on Sunday, the total amount of time adds up approximately to a 75-hour week. There is no arrangement made for overtime in this industry. These actual facts as to food costs and the price received by farmers for their products should be considered. Dairy farmers to the number of 450,000, together with their families, and all the people from whom they buy, consume large amounts of manufactured products. If the income of this large group is so reduced that their buying power is impaired, it will have a marked effect on the manufacturing industry.

A comparison of prices between the years 1939 and 1951 is interesting. In 1939 it took the average man 15·6 minutes of labour to buy one quart of milk. In 1951 it took only 10·1 minutes of labour. On the basis of 100 in August 1939, the index of consumer prices of milk products was 125·4 in October 1941; of meat and eggs, 130·6, and of all foods, 124·1. In the latter part of 1951 milk products stood at 213·4, meat and eggs, 354·9, and all foods, 251·5. It is to be noted that dairy foods have not increased in price proportionately. At the same time the cost of labour to the dairy farmer increased 181 per cent from 1941 to 1951, and in that period his own food costs were 82 per cent higher. Dairy farmers are now in a position where they have to compete with industry for labour.

In the same period the average farm price for 100 pounds of milk increased 78 per cent. The cow population has declined 2·4 per cent, and the Canadian population has increased 21·6 per cent in ten years. During the same ten years the per capita consumption of milk has fallen 18 per cent in Canada, notwithstanding the fact that the protein value of two quarts of milk equals that of a pound of choice beef at a much lower price.

Prices of other commodities have climbed in the spiral of inflation. It is admitted that the dairy farmer is receiving more for his products than he did ten years ago, yet the increase received has not kept pace with increased costs. Farm labour wages, higher food costs, maintenance of herd and buildings, competition from cheap vegetable oils, and the general increase in the cost of living, have added to his difficulties. Better public relations between consumer and producer would do much to create a better understanding.

Importation of vegetable oils into Canada has threatened the dairy industry on an increasing scale in the past three years. This is borne out by the following table of importation of vegetable oils into Canada:

Imports of Vegetable Oils into Canada

All vegetable oils	Quantity (pounds)	Value $	Average Value per pound (cents)
March 1-Dec. 31, 1949	124,289,500	17,576,955	14·1
Calendar year 1950 ...	190,697,200	30,663,719	16·1
Calendar year 1951 ...	158,391,500	35,057,238	22·1

The production of margarine in Canada is shown in the following table:

Calendar year	Thousands of pounds
1949	73,958
1950	94,032
1951	105,151

Not only has there been an increase in the importation of edible oils, but the prices of oils as of April 1952 show a considerable decrease. I give you the following table in pointing out the low prices for these products at the present time as compared with the existing prices last year:

Prices as of April 19	1951	1952
Coconut oil	18·25	7·54
Soya bean	20·5	8·5
Cotton seed	23·5	10

Soya beans were imported duty free. All copra used in making coconut oil was imported duty free.

I am not entering into a controversy on the merits of these products, but I present these figures for the purpose of showing the competition which faces the dairy industry through the manufacture and sale of edible oil produced in Canada. These imported oils produced by cheap labour have replaced about one-quarter of what was once the dairy farmer's butter market. It is reported that "filled fluid milk" with the cream replaced by imported oils could be expected to find a place on the Ontario market soon.

There are other factors which have brought the present situation in the dairy industry to the point where it constitutes a national emergency. There is grave uncertainty among dairy producers. This applies particularly to the cheese branch of the industry. The industry itself has had no control over the forces which have caused the present situation, which certainly was not of its own making. The factors which enter into the present situation are: First, the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in Saskatchewan early in this year; second, the loss of the United Kingdom markets, which has been our traditional market for cheese ever since confederation; third, the quota imposed by the United States which has shut off further Canadian cheese exports there and has led New Zealand exporters to enter the Canadian market; fourth, the importation of large quantities of cheese from New Zealand.

The outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease will result in more dairy cows being kept on the farms, and hence larger quantities of milk will be placed on the market. For years there has been a market for Canadian milk cows, especially young heifers, in the United States. During the periods when prices for milk products were low many farmers added to their income in an excellent market by producing a certain number of milch cows for export. Owing to the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease there can be no further export of dairy cows to the United States until we are clear of the disease and the embargo which resulted therefrom is lifted. The unfortunate further outbreak of this disease clearly indicates that the embargo will certainly not be lifted during this dairy season. These animals retained on Canadian farms will add to the amount of milk on the market. Not only will this apply to the cheese producers, but the price structure of other milk groups will be in danger if surplus milk is backed up into their market.

Last year Canada produced about 16,400 million pounds of milk. It is estimated that this year there will be an increase of 250 to 300 million pounds. This increase would amount to the equivalent of 29 million pounds of cheese or 14 million pounds of butter. The national dairy council estimates that the problem of marketing may cause 500 million pounds of milk to back up on the Canadian market. When this surplus milk comes on the market, much of it will be manufactured into butter and cheese. The government has taken butter, but so far has not stated where the surplus cheese will be sold. More milk production will mean more dairy products produced in all branches of the industry with no outside markets to take care of the surplus.

It will be difficult to handle all this milk which would normally go to cheese plants in the flush production season. Cheese factories have been closing all over the country in the past few years and there are indications now that many more factories will not open this season. There is a shortage of trained cheese factory and creamery operators, and farm labour has become a serious problem. There must be some outlet for the sale of the surplus milk which will be produced during the coming season.

The loss of the United Kingdom markets has been a serious blow. This has been our traditional market for Cheddar cheese for sixty years. At one time we exported over 200 million pounds of cheese to Britain, but in the last year our exports have been cut down to 29 million. During both wars the industry was encouraged to produce to capacity. It had no knowledge that this long-time market would collapse. Without export markets for our cheese products it seems absurd that New Zealand cheese was imported into this country after it had become apparent that the cheese was not needed here and would cause distress on the Canadian markets.

The loss of the United States market by the quota imposed has prevented further Canadian cheese exports to that country. If the Canadian producer cannot avail himself of outside markets, the amount of New Zealand cheese which enters Canada will not only interfere with our marketing program, but will seriously demoralize the whole industry. Much of the cheese imported from New Zealand had originally been intended for the United States market to earn dollars for New Zealand. When the United States placed a quota on further cheese imports, it became available on the open market, and a considerable quantity was purchased by Canadian firms.

On April 21 of this year, as reported on page 1427 of Hansard, I asked the following question on the orders of the day and received the following answer:

Mr. W. G. Blair (Lanark): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Will he make a statement on the assistance to be given to the cheese producing industry? Will the assistance given to them bring the price in line with that of the concentrated milk producers who are at present receiving $3.30 on local sales?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I think it has been decided in the courts that questions having to do with the price of milk are under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments. The question of cheese and milk in general has, I think, been fairly well taken care of by the government of Ontario. As to cheese production and other related problems, they are dealt with accordingly.

On April 22, in answer to a similar question, the Minister of Agriculture stated:

There is a floor under butter of course, and as I said yesterday, there is a legalized position in Ontario in relation to cheese. Since most of the cheese is made in Ontario, the cheese position is well governed by that.

[Mr. Blair.]

It would appear from the minister's answer that the onus for support prices or otherwise has been thrown on the government of the province of Ontario. Even there the marketing scheme could not be expected to handle the present confused situation. I might point out that other provinces than Ontario are interested in the dairy industry.

The Minister of Agriculture has announced that the government is prepared to stand a loss of $6 million to support hog prices. In view of this statement there can be no reason for not supporting cheese. I have looked up the Milk Control Act, Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1950, chapter 233, and I find that the interpretation section contains the following:

(k) "milk" includes cream and such products of milk or cream as are manufactured or processed in any form, other than butter and cheese.

(m) "Processor" means a person engaged in the business of processing milk or manufacturing milk products, other than butter and cheese.

The Milk Control Act was amended in 1951 by Bill No. 129, an act to amend the Milk Control Act. Section 3 of the amending legislation reads as follows:

Subsection 1 of section 5 of the Milk Control Act is amended by adding thereto the following clause:

(hh) after a public hearing, prescribe maximum prices at which milk may be sold by retail in any market.

The words "other than butter and cheese" are to be noted. The question of a support program for agricultural products in this country is and has been recognized as a federal responsibility. For the Minister of Agriculture to endeavour to shift the responsibility to any province at this time is not consistent with his position on the question in the past nor with the policy of the government of which he is a member. I well recall, as does every other member of the house, the ringing phrases of the Minister of Agriculture when he assured Canadian farmers that a floor had been established below which prices would not be allowed to fall.

The situation today constitutes an emergency, the root causes of which are not confined to the dairy industry. If the cheese production branch is unable to market their product at a satisfactory price, then the whole industry will be affected. Something must be done to secure a market for surplus cheese at a fair price. Any loss in price will not only affect our dairy farmers but will have an effect on the whole Canadian economy. A satisfactory floor price below which prices will not be allowed to fall, thereby virtually destroying this essential industry, must be assured to producers now.

Even this is only a partial answer. There must as well be an all-out sales effort by the dairy trade and the government. Not only is a satisfactory floor price necessary, but some means must be found to dispose of surplus production. Failure to do so will give rise to a feeling of uncertainty which cannot help but spread to other related industries and in turn will reflect itself in unemployment in this country resulting from a lack of orders for farm machinery and other manufactured products.

I suggest further that the government again make representations to the United States government about the quota placed against imports of Canadian cheese, and the relationship this virtual embargo bears to our mutual agreement under the Geneva trade agreements. I for one have supported legislation to expand international trade, but if the application of escape clauses by other countries, who are also signatories to the Geneva agreement on tariffs and trade, is to continue to discriminate against Canadian producers, then I believe an obligation rests upon parliament to reappraise our position under this mutual agreement to expand trade.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the speech which has just been delivered by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair). I certainly agree with him that the dairy industry in Canada is facing an emergency. Very little cheese is produced in the prairie provinces, but being a person interested in agriculture and the national good I cannot help but feel that the cheese industry has a just case and that the government should consider the steps that the hon. member has suggested.

The hon. member suggested that further representations might be made by Canada to the United States, and that if action was not obtained from the United States, parliament should perhaps reappraise its attitude toward the Geneva trade agreements. I do not know whether the hon. member is suggesting that Canada might take retaliatory action, but I hope the government will not take such action, because the erection of one embargo followed by a counter-embargo would probably lead to a series of embargoes between Canada and the United States, with serious consequences to our economy.

I think the government might explore the possibility of obtaining a market for cheese in the United Kingdom. We all know that the United Kingdom is short of Canadian dollars and that that is why they are unable to purchase our cheese at the present time. At various times in the past we in this group have suggested barter arrangements. The government has always turned a deaf ear to such suggestions. I am thinking now of the farm machinery inquiry by a legislative committee that took place in Regina. The committee found that farm machinery prices of companies producing in Canada and companies from whom we get supplies but producing in the United States were very high indeed. It seems to me that Canada might well sell cheese to Great Britain on the understanding that the funds obtained from cheese would be used for the purchase of British agricultural machinery. A considerable quantity of British agricultural machinery is being used in the prairie provinces at the present time. I can say that it has worked quite satisfactorily on most farms and under most conditions.

The hon. member for Lanark suggested a floor price under cheese. If the government is prepared to place a floor price under such commodities as eggs, pork and beef, then I for one certainly feel that the cheese industry has an equal claim to a floor price. In establishing any such floor price I would hope that the government would set a price that would in fact pay the producer a reasonable price for his cheese and ensure that the cheese producer does in fact receive the floor price. We have floor prices now, but they are floor prices in name only. The packers by paying less than the floor price have made a sham of the government's floor prices. For example, the floor price under eggs is 38 cents a dozen, grade A large, going into storage in any part of Canada. In addition to the 38 cents, the government stands prepared to pay up to 5 cents to cover the cost of storage.

So the packers buying eggs obtain from the government a net price of 38 cents per dozen because the government will pay the storage costs.

The floor price of grade A large eggs to the packers in the city of Regina, for example, is 38 cents a dozen. When I was home at Easter our farmers were not getting 38 cents a dozen. Of course we could not expect all the eggs to be grade A large, nor would we expect the floor price to be that high. But farmers were not even getting 30 cents a dozen. On the average the price the farm wife is receiving for eggs in my part of Canada is 14 cents a dozen.

I would not have believed that such low prices could exist when the government was supposed to have established floor prices if I had not seen the actual receipts. In fairness I should point out that the 14 cents is for the average eggs produced, but those eggs were fresh and probably three-quarters would be grade A large. That price of 14 cents a dozen to the farmers is nothing less than an insult, and will certainly force those egg producers right out of business.

The so-called floor price under pork is not too much better. The price has been established at $26 a hundredweight for grade A carcasses basis Toronto. That is supposed to provide a floor in Saskatchewan of $24.50 for grade A hogs. The packers in Saskatchewan are not paying that floor price but something close to it for grade A and B-1 hogs; but all the farmers of my constituency are living in either the buffer zone or the quarantine zone established because of the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease, and their market is severely curtailed. The market at Regina takes only the cattle and hogs that can be slaughtered and consumed within the quarantine area. People in the buffer zone have to take their hogs to the Moose Jaw market. That market is jammed; there is a long waiting list, and the farmers cannot market their hogs when they are at a weight to qualify as grade A or B-1.

The prices paid to a particular farmer in my constituency by Canada Packers at Moose Jaw for grade A were $25 in one instance and $24 in another. Prices for B-1 hogs in one instance were $24 and in the other $23.60. On one of these slips there is a heavy hog. It was graded as a sow. Technically speaking it was not a sow at all; it was a female hog that was overweight. It had never raised a litter of pigs, so technically speaking it was not a sow but a gilt, and should have been graded in the heavy class. Here was a perfectly good hog from which will be obtained perfectly good pork, but the farmer received a price of $13.75 a hundredweight, rail grade. The government is prepared to accept canned pork at 63 cents a pound in cans. I will bet my bottom dollar that most of the hogs graded as heavies and sows, for which the farmer receives 14 cents a pound, will wind up in cans and the packers will receive 63 cents a pound for that pork, making a handsome profit.

So I say the government should establish an adequate floor price for cheese, but the government should also take steps to enforce existing floor prices. I would say the government should provide under the law that packers must pay the established floor price, and if a packing company refuses to do so it should be haled before the courts and fined accordingly. Without such a provision the packing companies are making a complete sham of the government's floor prices.

The government has announced a floor price under beef of $25 a hundredweight for good steers at Toronto. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has told us that after freight is deducted that will give a floor price of $22.80 for choice steers at Saskatoon.

Mr. Howe: Not choice steers—good steers.

Mr. Argue: I accept the correction—good steers at Saskatoon. The floor price is not being extended to other grades of cattle, and the minister has advised farmers to keep their cattle on the farm, with the exception of those in good condition. Well, the cattle produced in my part of the country do not usually grade as choice or good steers. They usually grade as feeder steers, as cows or calves or something else. So the floor price under beef cannot possibly apply to more than a small percentage of the cattle normally marketed in my part of the country.

Mr. Ferrie: The floor price is not under beef; it is under cattle.

Mr. Argue: It is live cattle, and if I was giving the impression it was dressed weight I accept the correction. I am quite certain that the price of $22.80 per hundredweight at Saskatoon will result in a price a good deal lower than 20 cents a pound for animals shipped to market in Saskatchewan. That is my opinion, and we will soon find out whether or not I am right. In the light of the experience we have had with floor prices under eggs and under pork, I just do not believe the farmer is going to receive $22.80 a hundredweight at Saskatoon for good steers, even though such a floor price has been announced. I hope I am mistaken; but if the farmer gets that price it will be the first time any floor price under livestock or dairy products has been provided directly to the farmer.

Together with other members of the house, particularly those from Saskatchewan, I was sorry indeed to learn of the fresh outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in Saskatchewan. It occurred at a farm only five or six miles from my own farm. I do not know the names of the people concerned; I have not seen their names in the press, but I know the area very well; it is a beef-producing area where there are lots of cattle. It has been said that the outbreaks around Regina were in areas where few cattle are produced. In the area where the new outbreak has occurred large numbers of cattle are produced, not by large ranchers but because almost every farmer has from ten to twenty head of beef cattle on his own farm, while some have upwards of a hundred head. Right alongside the place where the recent outbreak occurred lies the Key West Excel P.F.R.A. pasture that normally takes some 2,500 head of cattle. I would say that perhaps 150 to 200 farmers make use of that pasture each year by placing in it 10, 15 or 20 head of cattle. The farmers in that area are producing beef cattle and they are depending upon the P.F.R.A. pasture on which to turn their livestock out in the summertime. They just do not have the pasture at home to take care of their cattle during the summer. A neighbour of mine has 60 head of cattle; he has 60 acres of pasture. It takes from 15 to 20 acres of pasture per head during the summer months. He therefore has at home one acre of pasture for each head of cattle. The community pasture cannot be opened until this disease is finally cleaned up; but that 60 acres of pasture that this farmer has is under water because we had a substantial run-off this spring. When I left the west last week his cattle were out in the stubble fields, as were the livestock of most of the other farmers in that area.

This matter of pasture is a real problem. I do not know how it is going to be met. If the P.F.R.A. pasture is not opened, I shall be surprised if feed does not have to be shipped into that area. Because of the fact that the P.F.R.A. pasture has been closed, those farmers are going to suffer increased expenditures because of having to provide feed for their cattle throughout the summer months. On the orders of the day a couple of days ago I asked the Minister of Agriculture whether the government would consider giving any compensation to farmers in that area who were thus affected. But when we in this group, during the present session, have asked for such compensation, we have received a negative reply, and along with it we have usually had a few smiles from a number of cabinet ministers. They seem to think that if compensation is extended to farmers other than those who have their animals slaughtered, the door is going to be opened and there will be no end to the amount of compensation that will have to be paid.

I feel, however, that an exception to that stand should be taken with regard to those farmers who live in the quarantine and the buffer zones. Certainly those farmers in my locality who are depending upon the P.F.R.A. pasture should have from the federal government assistance to provide necessary feed supplies through the summer months. I therefore appeal once again to the government to consider that aspect of the matter, to survey the situation, and, if the problem is as I have stated it, to come to the assistance of those farmers until such time as the P.F.R.A. pasture is reopened.

I had risen this afternoon to make a few remarks on the budget, but after listening to the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) I thought I should mention something about floor prices, and in particular I thought I should say that I agree with his suggestion that a floor price be placed under cheese.

A great deal has already been said about the budget, and I am sure that anything I say will not be new. It seems to me that there are two main criticisms that can be levelled at the present budget. One is with regard to the statement of the Minister of Finance, (Mr. Abbott) when he introduced the budget, that taxes were being lowered. Along with the tables he placed on Hansard at page 1254, he forgot to place a table showing the income tax actually paid in 1951. If he had placed such a column on the record one would have then seen that instead of there being a decrease in the income taxes the effect of the budget is to increase by 6 per cent income tax for those in the lower brackets; that is, the amount of income tax paid, apart from the social security tax, in the year 1952 will be approximately 6 per cent higher than that paid in the year 1951. Without that explanation or without that table being placed in the budget, I say that the Minister of Finance was attempting to hoodwink the taxpayers of Canada. When taxpayers have paid all of their 1952 taxes they are going to learn that income taxes for 1952, as compared with those for 1951, have not been decreased by 6 per cent, as the minister stated, but rather have in fact been increased by approximately 6 per cent.

We in this group were particularly disappointed that the government did not follow the wish of the house and remove the 4 per cent provision with respect to medical expenses allowed for income tax deduction purposes. It was clearly the unanimous wish of parliament that the Minister of Finance allow all medical expenses as a deduction from income for taxation purposes. When the minister did not follow the unanimous wish expressed by this house he was thereby, in my opinion, making a mockery of parliament. According to their vote on the resolution presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), members of all parties in the house believe that all medical expenses should be deducted from income for taxation purposes. I believe the government should have followed the wish of parliament instead of having made a mockery of the members' wishes as expressed in that vote.

Last night the member for Moose Jaw stated that the government should endeavour in a number of ways to make substantial savings with respect to expenditures. He has a right, as any other member of our group has, to his own opinions, and has a right to express them. As to some of the savings that he advocated, I agree with him. As to some of the other savings he advocated, I disagree with him. In fairness I think it should be pointed out that of the $315 million total that he arrived at as the total which the government might save with respect to expenditures, seventy per cent of it, or $225 million, was a suggested saving in the Department of National Defence. Judging by the speeches I have heard from a number of members in this house and the comments I have heard outside the house, it may well be that the government could reduce the expenditures of the Department of National Defence 10 per cent and, by squeezing out inefficiency, get the same defence effort that is now being obtained.

The suggestion of the hon. member that a means test should in any way be applied to the old age pension or the family allowance is something with which I cannot agree. I do not believe the means test should be reapplied to the old age pension, no matter how generous that new means test may be. Hon. members know that the Prime Minister of Canada has reached the age of seventy, and is eligible for and is receiving the no-means-test old age pension. The Prime Minister of Canada is on an equal footing with every other Canadian resident aged seventy when it comes to receiving the old age pension. Because the Prime Minister and every other person who has been in Canada for twenty years and is seventy years of age are receiving that pension, the stigma of taking it has been removed. I would not like to see a means test reapplied to the old age pension, because then you give some people the opportunity to say: "Oh, I am wealthy; I am making a lot of money; I can look after myself; I do not need the old age pension." And other people, because of circumstances, must apply for an old age pension, and when they receive the pension there is a stigma attached to it.

Likewise I do not want to see the means test applied to the family allowance. When I was first elected to the House of Commons a taxpayer with children who did not receive the family allowance was given a greater exemption in filing his income tax return than a parent who received the family allowance. The government then proposed to allow a smaller exemption for all taxpayers who had children of family allowance age. That meant that everyone in Canada with dependent children received family allowances, and was not allowed to claim a greater exemption for dependents because family allowance was not accepted. The very wealthy took the family allowance cheques, and then the government took back through income tax a large part or all of or perhaps more than they received in family allowance. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that is the way old age pensions and family allowances should be paid. They should be paid to Canadian citizens as of right. And then for the wealthy the government should tax back a large part of those payments in income tax.

At various times I have suggested certain increases in expenditures, such as suggested in the resolution dealing with family allowance standing on the order paper in my name. I suppose if members advocate increases in government expenditures they might suggest to the government some ways in which the government might increase its own income to cover those expenditures. I was interested to read in the U.S. News and World Report of April 18, 1952, that corporation taxes in the United States are very much higher than corporation taxes in Canada. This article points out that corporation taxes of Canada amount to 50 per cent, or slightly more, of corporate profits, whereas corporation taxes in the United States are on the average about 60 per cent. In other words, corporate taxes in the United States are 20 per cent higher than they are in Canada. There, in my opinion, is where the government can get more than $200 million annually in additional revenue.

I believe there is a sound argument in Canada for a capital gains tax. Many people buy speculative stocks and shares, and over the last few years have made enormous profits that are not subject to income tax. I feel that a capital gains tax could well be applied to such gains, and the government could make good use of the additional revenue in providing for increased social security expenditures.

There is only one other subject that I wish to mention at this time. I see my time is running out; therefore I shall be able to make only a brief reference to it.

Mr. Casselman: You have twelve minutes left.

Mr. Argue: Thank you. I want to reply to the speech made by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) in the house on Wednesday, April 12. In replying to a former speech of mine on the collection of income tax from farmers, the Minister of National Revenue had this to say, as reported on page 362 of Hansard:

> However, it is not my purpose to quarrel with the various figures which have been presented, but rather to disagree emphatically with the conclusions which have been drawn from those figures.

In other words, the Minister of National Revenue accepted the accuracy of all of the statistics that I had placed on Hansard. I worked out a lot of these statistics in longhand, and I was afraid I might have made an error in one place or another. The minister says that these statistics are accurate enough. He goes on to say:

> Criticism based on averages can be very misleading.

That was the point he was trying to make throughout his speech—that while the statistics I used were correct, my conclusions from those averages were wrong. In attempting to prove that my conclusions were wrong, the minister had this to say—I might say, the minister was attempting at that point to build up an argument as to why the amount of income tax paid by farmers in Quebec and Ontario is not as large as the amount of income tax paid by the farmers in western Canada. The minister said this:

> In the first place the occupied farm land and the average area per farm is substantially greater in the prairie provinces than in eastern Canada.

The minister said that no one should use averages, because if he does he will come to wrong conclusions, and then he starts using averages himself. He goes on to say:

> Furthermore, the average size of farms in the prairie provinces is from two and one-half to three and one-half times as large as those in Ontario and points east.

Once again the minister himself was using averages. But of course the minister should realize that the amount of income tax paid by a farmer has nothing whatever to do with the size of the farm itself. What counts is the net income resulting from the farmer's operations, and 50 acres of good productive agricultural land in the Niagara peninsula of Ontario will probably provide a farmer with a larger net income than 1,000 acres of grazing land in the constituency that I represent. Therefore, if one farmer's holdings are twenty times as large as some other farmer's holdings, that in itself has nothing to do with the relative amount of income tax the farmer pays.

I have some further statistics to give the minister that I think prove that there is discrimination between the collections of farm income tax made in western Canada and in eastern Canada. I should like to quote again from the minister's speech at page 362. The minister says:

> It may or may not be a fact that the taxation division is getting proportionately more of the tax actually payable from western farmers than from eastern farmers.

The minister says he does not know; it may be the case; it may not be the case. Then he makes this statement at page 363, referring to eastern Canada:

> The proportionately larger staffs are considered to be justified because the task of finding the comparatively few farmers who are actually taxable in an area such as Quebec is more difficult than in the west, and it is also more difficult to determine the actual income on which the tax should be based.

He says he does not know whether there is a larger proportion of the tax being paid in Ontario and Quebec than in western Canada, but admits it is more difficult to collect in Ontario and Quebec. Then he adds this:

> In the more prosperous farming areas in the west the number of products dealt in is generally smaller, the majority of sales are made in large amounts mainly at one season of the year, and records of many of these sales are readily available.

The minister says, on the one hand, that he does not know whether the farmers of western Canada are paying a larger proportion of the tax than in Ontario and Quebec, but then goes on to say that it is easy to get at the farmers of the west, and that therefore it is no wonder that the tax collectors are doing a much more efficient job out west.

Well, if it is harder to get the tax in Ontario, one would expect that there would be relatively more assessors, based on the number of farmers, in this province. In other words, an assessor, one would expect, would have to look after less farmers in Ontario than an assessor would in say Manitoba, where it is easy to collect the tax from the farmer. Yet, while in Manitoba there is one inspector for every 1,520 farmers, in Ontario there is one for every 1,756 farmers. The minister stated that it is harder to assess the farmers in Ontario, that more work is involved, and that in many instances the records are not available. Yet the average income tax assessor in Ontario must deal with 236 more farmers than the average assessor in Manitoba.

While the income tax assessors did not find many farmers in Quebec from whom they obtained income tax, nevertheless the ones they did find paid reasonable taxes. The average income tax paid by taxable farmers in Quebec was $255 while the average in Saskatchewan was $331, and that in Manitoba was $242, or somewhat less than the Quebec average. There is a good deal more efficiency in over-all collections in Manitoba than there is in Quebec, because the average income tax collected in Manitoba was $242, while that in Quebec was $255.

Let us see how successful income tax inspectors were in Saskatchewan, on the average. In that province there were 74 income tax inspectors in 1949 and 20,000 taxable returns were made. In other words each inspector was able to find 271 farmers who paid income tax. In Manitoba each income tax assessor obtained 183 farmers who paid income tax. In Quebec there are 23 assessors, each one of whom, in a whole year's work, found only nine farmers who were charged income tax. It took the income tax assessor in Quebec 52 weeks to find nine farmers, or one for every six weeks' work. I wonder what he was doing? Certainly he must have been asleep on the job. Yet, there are lucrative taxes to be collected in Quebec because the ones they did find paid $255, on an average. Each tax assessor in Quebec obtained taxes from farmers to the amount of $2,216 during the whole year. The salaries paid by the Department of National Revenue are, I venture to say, well over $3,000 a year. In addition to salary, travelling expenses incurred by income tax assessors are paid by the government. I am sure therefore that for the 23 income tax assessors the department has in Quebec the government spent $2 in 1949 for each $1 obtained from farmers by way of income tax.

The department asked 30,000 farmers to send in income tax returns, and the minister reported that only 14,000 complied with the request. But what about the other 16,000? Anyone in Saskatchewan who receives a letter from the income tax branch had better file his return right away, or someone will be out to see him. Why did not at least 95 per cent of those who were asked to file returns comply with that request? Perhaps the 14,000 said, "Well, we can afford to send in returns because we know we do not have any income tax to pay", while the other 16,000, who might have had tax to pay, said, "We will not bother, because probably they will not ask us again."

On the average, each income tax assessor in Manitoba collected $44,000 by way of farm income tax in 1949: The average for each assessor in Quebec was $2,216. I suggest that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) should do some transferring in his department. Our income tax inspectors in the west are good inspectors. They are efficient, they are doing their job and they are collecting a lot of income tax. On the other hand the ones in Quebec are an absolute failure, and those in Ontario are a near failure. I suggest therefore that the minister should send some of the Ontario inspectors out west, where most farmers now pay income tax whether they are asked to do so or not. He should send some of the Quebec inspectors out west, so that the income tax people out there could give them some training. They could then be sent back to the east and, in those circumstances, I am sure the government would find that its income tax returns from farmers in the central provinces would improve considerably.

I am a farmer, and while I believe that farmers should be given certain further exemptions than are now provided, I do say that, as applies to other groups, once a law is established farmers should be required by government officials to comply with that law. I believe farmers in Quebec and Ontario are just as honest and as upright as those in any other part of Canada; but if income tax inspectors are falling down on their job, then I do not think we can blame the farmers if they do not shell out voluntarily. So I suggest to the Minister of National Revenue—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he has exhausted the time at his disposal.

Mr. G. M. Ferrie (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, rising to take part in the debate, before entering upon the subject matter I intend to discuss I should like to make some few comments on what was said by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair).

Hon. members who come from western Canada have been told many times that, by accepting the wheat agreement, we have acted like socialists, that we have gone too far, and that we should go back and put grain on the open market. Today we have been given a good example of exactly what has happened in Ontario. At one time cheese, from the standpoint of marketing, was in the same position as wheat. However the cheese producers preferred to be independent of the government, to withhold cheese from the operations of any government department, and run the industry themselves. What did they do? Well, to make a long story short, they priced themselves out of the market.

It is time the farmers in the dairying industry in Ontario got together, and indicated their willingness to come, with hat in hand, and say, "We made a mistake, and we are willing to go back where we were before". I am sure that if they do that they will get some reward. It may not be just what they think they should get, but certainly they will be recognized. I know that there is no one in this country who has more feeling for the farmer in any part of Canada than the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner).

I want to say a few words about the budget. I have never spoken on the budget before, but as far as I can see this is a good, sound budget. It does three things.

First, it has given us a sound dollar. The whole world is looking to Canada today, but that was not so two years ago. At that time our dollar was down to 90 cents, but now it is up. The great United States with its millions of people—150 million to 180 million, we do not know just how many exactly—is doing its utmost to produce and make its dollar worth as much as possible. In Canada we have 14 million people only but we have a sound dollar that today is even better than the United States dollar.

I want to say something about my constituency and a little about the constituency next to mine. We heard a wonderful speech the other day by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Weaver) who painted a great picture of his constituency and tried to give the people of eastern Canada some idea of what it actually is. He tried to indicate the great wealth there is up there, and I am sure that everyone realizes just what that means to Canada.

For a few minutes I am going to try to draw a similar picture in connection with my own constituency which runs alongside his. My constituency is 560 miles long and about 84 miles wide. We split the town of Flin Flon. There are 1,200 of my constituents who live in Flin Flon. I am going to try to give hon. members some idea of the country from Wollaston lake down to where agriculture starts. Some of the ministers have flown over this lake.

This great lake, which is close to the Northwest Territories, contains great fishing grounds. The fish must be flown out to Flin Flon. Then next we have Reindeer lake, another great fishing ground. Here the fish are flown out in the summertime and brought out by caterpillars in the winter. These lakes are miles and miles north of what we call civilization, Reindeer lake being some 200 miles north of Flin Flon.

Then you come down to the great mining areas. I should like to indicate something of what has happened just south of Flin Flon where a large area is being opened up. The Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Development Company have claims totalling 8,350 acres. No one knows the value of the minerals in those acres. No doubt a big development is going to occur in that country and no one can begin to imagine the wealth that will be taken out of there.

We are asking that some attention be given to the construction of a railroad from Lynn Lake, north to Reindeer and Wollaston lakes, then to Athabaska and down to Prince George. That is asking quite a lot but if it were done it would open up one of the greatest mining territories in the world.

East and north of Reindeer lake is found what is called green stone, and then south of Athabaska you find red stone. The green stone area is where most of the minerals are found and that is where they do most of their surveying and exploration work. Last year I mentioned that the area around Athabaska was one of the greatest mining areas to be found. They are developing uranium and other minerals. On the Saskatchewan side of Flin Flon they have taken out minerals to the value of many millions of dollars. Then they started investigating and found that the slag heap contained $90 million worth of a new kind of ore, so now they are going down into the Saskatchewan mine again. They are going to empty all the shafts, reprocess the material, extract this valuable ore—they do not tell us what it is—and then put the slag back into the mine again. In the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company mine 3,500 feet down at the bottom of a shaft they have cut a drift inwards and have built a room there half as large as this chamber. It is 3,500 feet under the ground. They say that there is enough ore down there to last, at the rate they are taking it out now, for the next twenty years.

The reason I raise this matter is that we have 12,000 people in that area and they have no road leading westward. They have to travel east sixty miles to The Pas and then 150 miles south before they can go west. The Saskatchewan government have been asked to build a road from Nipawin to Flin Flon, and have said in the provincial legislature many times that it is up to the dominion government to build this road. But they have not asked the dominion government to build the road. They have not done anything about it. All they have done is to talk about it in the legislature in Regina. By no stretch of the imagination have they come to the point where they have said how much it would cost, how much they would be willing to pay themselves, and how much they wanted the dominion government to contribute.

I think this attitude is very unfair to the people who live in that northern area. They are entitled to a road running westward, and it is up to the provincial government of Saskatchewan to help those people to be able to travel westward. It is only fair and reasonable that the provincial government should do this. I would not mention this matter if it were not for the fact that it affects the people of my constituency. I have been trying to help them to get a road but the Saskatchewan minister of highways does not seem to want to help these people who pay taxes and produce wealth for the province of Saskatchewan and also for the dominion.

I have told the house now about the fishing in the northern part of my constituency and the mining a few hundred miles farther south. Now I come to the region around Hudson Bay Junction where there is lumbering. The lumberman is having quite a hard time. As hon. members know, we have had a lot of trouble so far as lumbering in that district is concerned. The lumbermen and trappers around Hudson bay have had a pretty hard time during the past winter. I have not heard much kicking on their part, but they want things done in the proper way. They want a chance to go into the bush and produce a living for themselves, something that they cannot do at this time.

Farther south in my constituency we have an agricultural area which is one of the greatest agricultural regions in Canada. The development of the Carrot river delta is just beginning. I should like to say here that the hard work of the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Weaver) has certainly been helpful. He has been able to get the Manitoba government to make representations to the federal government, and the federal government has utilized the P.F.R.A. to help to start the development of that part of the country. The hon. member for Churchill told the house yesterday that in this delta there are about 2,500,000 acres within his riding. The delta region runs right across the Manitoba boundary into Saskatchewan between the Saskatchewan river and the Carrot river. In that area there is some of the finest agricultural land that there is any place in the world.

Last winter we drove in a motorcade from Carrot river to The Pas. We travelled by an old bush trail down to the river and drove fifteen miles up the river to the boundary between Saskatchewan and Manitoba. There were about fifty or sixty cars, and at the boundary all the people got out and had lunch at that spot. This part of the prairie is a wonderful piece of land. All it needs is draining. All it needs is a few million dollars to be spent on it, about $10 an acre, to make it a really productive area. I understand that Manitoba has made an agreement with the federal government with respect to the development of that part of the delta within Manitoba. Why does the Saskatchewan minister of agriculture not do the same thing for the part of the area within his province? Saskatchewan will never be able to develop it. They will never be able to spend the money. There is one point to which they stick. They would rather let the area go undeveloped than do away with the system of lease agreements. They want to lease the land instead of letting people homestead it or buy it. If they would turn the matter over to the federal Department of Agriculture, in a few years the P.F.R.A. administration would have at least 1,500,000 acres in the province of Saskatchewan producing. There would be a lot of good people in that part of the country and a lot of good business being carried on.

It is a shame to leave it the way it is now. It is a mess and some day they will have to pay for it. I hope that something will be done in the near future because we need development of that region. As the hon. member for Churchill told the house, there is about 20 to 40 feet of solid silt that has come down from the mountains and elsewhere on the prairies over a period of thousands of years and has settled there. It is a detriment to Canada that this land is not producing today. Where you see willows 3, 4, 5 and 6 inches through you know very well that there is something in that land and that it should be producing for the benefit of the people of Canada.

Before I leave that area, many times I have heard it said in this house and by people from eastern Canada that the Hudson Bay railway is always in the red. That is not a fair statement. I am sure the people here do not really understand the situation. The Hudson Bay railway starts about five miles north of The Pas, and from there up to Churchill it carries its own load. It does not belong to the C.N.R., as we always thought; it belongs to the government. The strangest thing about it is that the government has no rolling stock, so when they take something up to Churchill they have to rent the rolling stock. If they were to take that division and add Sherridon and Flin Flon, making it one division north of The Pas, I do not think it would ever be in the red again; it would always be in the black. They took the Temiscouata railway and added it to the C.N.R. The Canadian National was willing to take that line, and I do not see why the Canadian National should not take over the road from The Pas to Churchill. Then if there is any deficit the whole country meets it. I do not see why we should have to stand by and watch this part of the railway going into the red all the time. That is not right. All the development that has taken place in that north country could not have been undertaken but for the fact that this railroad was built north to Churchill. Many of us thought more lines should have been built, which would have led to even greater development, but no doubt that will come later. However, I think it is time the C.N.R. realized that that is a part of the Canadian railway system which should be taken over and put in the black instead of the red.

Now I want to say a word in regard to a defence highway from Winnipeg to Edmonton. I spoke about this two years ago, and I am still of the opinion that something ought to be done about it. We are spending millions of dollars on radar equipment for the north; yet if we had to take a big gun from Winnipeg to Edmonton it could not be done under any circumstances. We have had one of the driest springs in many years, but even so, our best roads running through that country are very bad. The defence department should realize that the people on the prairies are entitled to some protection. They say there is no chance of an enemy coming from the north, that we will not be hurt that way. Well, if I were a minister I do not think I would agree with that. Look at Edmonton; then look at New York, Montreal and Toronto. You will see what a short distance it is by plane between those points. Edmonton has everything that might be needed for an army—oil, food for the troops, and lots of room to be able to watch all around. Once more I am asking that some consideration be given a highway from Winnipeg to Edmonton to help in the defence of western Canada.

Mr. Fair: Why not go right through to the coast over the Yellowhead route, following the pipeline?

Mr. Ferrie: That is up to you fellows. That would not protect us at all, though I would be satisfied with the Yellowhead route.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words in regard to the speech made last night by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher). It matters little what was in his mind, but what he said was serious to those of us from western Canada who have fought for so many years to help the man who was not able to get a pension because he had the odd quarter section of land that perhaps was not producing anything and was not an awful lot of good to him, but which he did not want to turn over to the government. Some men were independent. They said, "All right; I will get along," and they got along on $4, $5 or $8 a month. I know one man over 70 who had a cow. You can hardly believe it, but he used to live the whole year on the milk he got from that cow, because he would not let them file a lien against his homestead. He had lost everything in one way or another. He was old and sick, and was not able to farm properly on his quarter section of land. We fought to have pensions given to people like that; and I want to say to the hon. member for Moose Jaw that for what he said last evening he is absolutely a disgrace to Saskatchewan.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member will realize that he should modify the expression he has just used in reference to the hon. member for Moose Jaw. I do not think he would want to say of any colleague that he was a disgrace to any part of Canada.

Mr. Ferrie: All right, Mr. Speaker; I will withdraw the statement. Perhaps I can put it in more flowery words and at the same time bring the facts home to him. He is young. He may be politically unwise, as one of his colleagues said. After all these years of hard fighting that we have done to get this matter into the position in which it now is, he may be able to think that we should say we should go back to a means test.

Mr. Thatcher: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will permit me to make an explanation—

Mr. Ferrie: Yes.

Mr. Thatcher: —I should like to say that I certainly did not suggest that we should go back to the kind of means test we had previously. I should like to correct the hon. member. What I said was that I did not think it was sensible that the taxpayers of Canada should be paying a pension to people with incomes of $5,000, $6,000 or more a year. I am sure that the farmers that my hon. friend has spoken about would not come in that category.

Mr. Sinclair: It is still a means test.

Mr. Ferrie: I take the hon. member's explanation; but as far as he is concerned, it is absolutely impossible to segregate those to whom it would apply and those to whom it would not.

Mr. Thatcher: Why?

Mr. Ferrie: If you are going to have a means test, you are going to have a means test; and that is all there is to it.

Mr. Thatcher: But there is a great deal of difference between the means test which we had previously and the one I suggested last night.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Ferrie: You cannot have what my hon. friend suggests, and he knows it. I am not sure whether he was on that committee or not. In any event, he has heard many times that the application of the means test was to anybody and everybody; and that is all you can have. You cannot segregate those to whom it will and will not apply; you cannot say you are going to have the means test apply to this man and not to that one. You have got to have the means test apply to all, to see whether they have that specified amount of money or whether they are receiving that specified salary. It is an absolute impossibility to have a means test unless you go back to where we were before; and we are certainly not going to do that.

Mr. Thatcher: I hope not.

Mr. Ferrie: Then there is another thing. The hon. member talked about savings. What do the savings mean? The hon. member made a statement about various savings. As far as he is concerned, the savings just meant that we were not going to get the services. That is all they meant. The hon. member for Moose Jaw said: All right, save; stop the services; stop Canada. Yet our great Saskatchewan is going ahead and is going to produce and produce. We are going to bring the wealth into the country. As the hon. member for Churchill told the house yesterday, there is great wealth in the north. In the great prairies wheat is being produced. We had 500 million bushels last year, as it was thought, and now we come to the point where there is 700 million bushels. We hear talk about the millions and billions that we are going to spend. We are not spending them foolishly. Do you want protection? As I told the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), he wanted to have his porridge and eat it. That is what the hon. member for Moose Jaw wants. He wants to have his porridge and eat it. He wants to make a fuss over what? He tries to make it over a few million dollars. What does the expenditure of a few million dollars mean? A few million dollars expenditure means the services to the people of Canada.

Coming down here from Saskatchewan, I was talking to a conductor and he said that one of the finest things that had ever happened to Canada was the surplus that we have; and that is a fact. We have that surplus. We are paying off the debt. I want to say this to the hon. member for Moose Jaw. If he had an 8 per cent surplus in his business, would he for one minute think that he was doing a good job? That is all you have got here with a great government that handles millions and billions of dollars. Surely we are today in a position to cut down our public debt and to render the services that are necessary to the people of Canada; and then, in the final analysis, we can say that we are ready, if the time comes that we should have to do so—and we pray God that we shall never have to—to put out money to help to keep the country going. If we come to a depression, we are in a better position because we had surpluses; and a good businessman knows that.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, at this stage in the budget debate I can readily come to the conclusion, after listening to the many speeches, that the members of the opposition groups are against the budget. As we have sized up the reaction from across the country, it seems also that there is a good deal of criticism in the regions beyond the confines of this chamber.

I have been vitally interested in the debate because it is my first budget debate, and budgets concern themselves with one of the basic functions of parliament, the collection and the spending of public money. I found the evening of April 8 a most interesting and entertaining one. We had a sense of the dramatic present in the chamber on that evening, a situation which does not prevail too frequently in the House of Commons. We had the galleries filled with tense and expectant taxpayers. I found the performance of the Minister of Finance to be quite an interesting one, almost up to the calibre of a Shakespearian actor. Since that time we have had such comments as a sleight-of-hand performance, Hallowe'en pranks, and the accusation of the use of a false face, the typical mask of the stage.

I have been intrigued with government spending for some years now, even before I came to this chamber. I have found myself somewhat bewildered by the astronomical proportions this spending was reaching, particularly in the post-war era. I assumed that on coming to the House of Commons I might gain a better knowledge of why all this money was necessary, where it all comes from, and where it all goes. From the comments I have heard thus far in the house, however, I am coming to the conclusion that after the debate is finished I shall still be asking those questions as to why it is all necessary and where it has all gone. For example, there is the fluctuating surplus that we have before us this year. It began as an estimated amount of, I think, $30 million; it grew, in certain newspaper reports, to something like $900 million; and finally, in the statement of the minister, it emerged as just a little over $300 million.

The other big item in the budget, the matter of defence spending, is of course going to be exceedingly difficult to pursue. It was my privilege to join the committee on defence spending just yesterday, and I can see that there is a real Sherlock Holmes problem involved in keeping track of, or gathering information on, the devious ways of this huge amount of $2 billion for the purpose of defence preparations.

To get down to the main themes that have emerged in the discussion, they seem to be those of extravagant spending, and excessive taxation. Those are the two points emphasized in the amendment brought forward by the members of this party. I am sure that, in regard to the first—that of extravagant government spending—there has been considerable disappointment. For a time, with election rumours in the air, it was hoped that we might be favoured with a "sunshine budget" this year. There was hopeful optimism that we would see substantial cuts and economies; but as I listened to the presentation of the Minister of Finance I found that any suggestion of economy was strangely lacking in his speech. The conclusions seemed to be that any relief from the high level of taxation, and any reduction in government spending, must come from a reduction in the burden of defence expenditure, or else a steady increase in the wealth and incomes of the people, which would tend to make government spending and taxation seem relatively less heavy.

Hopeful optimism of this kind of course is to be expected from the taxpayer. Being realistic about the matter, if we had exercised sufficient foresight, I think we could have come to the conclusion that there actually could be, under the present government policy, no reduction in spending or in taxation. Increasing government expenditures are inevitable under a policy of expanding government control, power and influence. We all know that governments on all levels have tended to increase the degree of control in the affairs of the nation. From long experience, too, from the evidence of history, for example, we know that governments from time immemorial have been notoriously spendthrifts. Wherever they enlarge their activities it is to be expected that the cost of administration must go up. It is a sort of "easy come, easy go" proposition. As a matter of fact, it was this difficulty that first led to the establishment of the principle of no taxation without representation, one of the basic fundamental ideas behind responsible government.

We know, too, that political machines are costly and expensive; the larger they grow the greater the expense; the longer in office a party remains, again the greater the expense tends to be. Fortunately Canada has been free from major financial scandals such as those that emerge from time to time out of the complexities of the United States government, but perhaps that is due more to accidental circumstances than to higher moral standards. We are a smaller country and we can keep closer control of things; and the people, at least up until recent times through their parliamentary representatives, have been able to keep a fairly close watch on the treasury.

Under these circumstances we cannot expect that government spending and taxation will decrease. We find that, in the minister's presentation, the blame for increasing costs and spending, taxation and so forth, was placed upon the rise in social welfare expenditures and the increasing cost of our defence program. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) made reference to this last night in his remarks. He has already received honourable and dishonourable mention on several occasions since, so that I am going to be comparatively kind in the observations I am going to make on his speech. I was most interested in his presentation last night. He did point out where other economies might be effected to the extent, as we already well know, of $315 million in departments other than defence and social welfare, as well as an additional amount of $225 million in defence spending. A presentation of that kind will require detailed analysis, but no doubt amongst the suggestions that were put forward—and those suggestions were put forward in response to a direct challenge as to where economies might be effected—will be found some that are worth while. He has been criticized for attacking the present basis of our universal old age pension. He is quite capable of defending himself, and I do not have to continue on that point. But we are all of the opinion—as was indicated by the vote last fall—that the social welfare programs of the kind represented by the universal old age pension are necessary in the kind of world in which we live today.

Social welfare programs of necessity increased rapidly during the depression, and ever since the depression have expanded rapidly. In fact, it was the impact of the depression that gave the impetus to the idea of the social welfare state. The social welfare state is not entirely all good, nor is it entirely all bad. It is not a panacea. I think there are some very excellent points in its favour, and there are some very dangerous features in the notion of the welfare state. For example, it is possible that the huge expenditures that are involved in maintaining an expensive social welfare program can be used for political expediency. Under these circumstances it makes it very difficult to carry on successfully our form of democratic government, because the group responsible for the administration of these huge expenditures, by subtle insinuation, can suggest that these benefits are due to government largess. That has been a feature in the United States, and to a certain extent in Canada.

It is obvious that government functions are increasing. Services are increasing. The central government is assuming tasks, functions and responsibilities that were formerly performed by the family, by the church, by local governments and neighbourhood communities. This is all a part of the trend that is under way to more and more influence, power and control exercised by the central government.

As I have already indicated, it means considerable expense to the taxpayer. I would remind the house that this is but one solution to the social problems that emerged out of the depression, and it is not necessarily the only solution. I do not think that increasing government control is necessarily the final and absolute solution of all the problems that are facing our way of life and our civilization. Actually, you know, real social security cannot be bought. You cannot measure social security in terms of dollars and cents, as we tend to do. Actually, there is a tendency to confuse social security and financial security. If we look at the problem of the older citizens in our society—and his numbers have been increasing as the result of the increasing longevity due to medical science, better health services and so forth—we realize that the basic pension of $40 a month is not going to solve the real problems of our older citizens. I happen to be interested in such movements as Twilight clubs and other organizations that are trying to deal with the real problem of social security, that of giving our older citizens a meaningful place in society. The $40 a month is going to be of very little use to them, of very little value, if, as at present, they are forced to a large extent to live alone in a garret unwept, unhonoured and unsung, waiting for the grim reaper to come along with the proverbial scythe.

They want more than that. They want a meaningful place in society. Unfortunately, with the speed of modern industry and the demands of industrial life, they tend to become misplaced as a worker at a relatively early period in life, and this just at a time when they are beginning to enjoy a longer life span.

That problem is not going to be solved by minimum incomes of $40 a month. Those incomes are very important; but our responsibility to our older citizens will have to go much farther than this if we are really going to give them their proper place in society today. I do not believe that central governments, governments at the federal level, are in a position to provide that type of social security. This is a problem that must be worked out by local communities. It is a problem the neighbourhood must work out. It is a problem that must be handled in the close face-to-face contacts of human relationships. This might be the time to start to consider the possibility of handling social problems by educational programs which encourage a solution at the individual and local level, rather than by an increased dependence on the super-state. So long as we move in the direction of state control we are going to find that government will become more expensive and, as a result, taxation will have to be imposed to meet ever growing demands.

I might have mentioned the work going on in the field of industrial relations. An entirely new experiment in human relations is taking place in modern industry, where there has been a great deal of bitterness and a great deal of dissatisfaction because the worker, like our older citizen, had lost his meaningful place. With the industrial revolution he became a part of the mechanized assembly line. The job he was doing did not make much sense, and did not have much meaning or purpose for him. The result has been that industry has been plagued by strikes and disturbances of various kinds.

We now discover that when the human factor is taken into consideration in industry, the problems between management and workers are considerably alleviated and softened. I have in mind the famous experiments conducted in the Hawthorne factory of the Western Electric Company, just outside Chicago, by Elton Mago one of the pioneers in the field of industrial relations. A very simple fact was demonstrated in a rather dramatic way. A special experimental group was gathered together and subjected to varied conditions of work—changed working hours, changed rates of pay, a five-day week—and so on. They were given all those other things peculiar to industry today; and it was found that, regardless of what was done, production continued to increase. Finally the experimenters reverted to the original conditions. They sorted out the X-quantity, which was the simple fact that, because of the special attention received, this experimental group had found a new meaning and purpose in the job they were doing, and as a result produced at the higher levels.

These are some of the major difficulties being faced by our industrial society. At the present time the only thing we have done, acting automatically and unconsciously, and following the line of least resistance, has been to endeavour to solve these problems by state control, government control, and by increasing government participation at all levels of life—family, industrial, business and what have you, with the inevitable results that are being criticized here today.

It is more expensive. It means excessive taxation even to the extent that taxation begins to interfere with individual initiative, and the productivity of business corporations as well as that of individual workers. All this has been glossed over, and an attempt has been made to justify the situation by the fact that Canada is enjoying an unprecedented period of prosperity. We have constant references to the fact that Canada is passing through prosperity such as she has never enjoyed before. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sinclair) made reference to this the other day, upon which occasion he quoted certain United States authorities that were somewhat impressed by the economic state of affairs in Canada at the present time.

Of course there have been other references to Canada that have come out of the United States. We will recall that one American senator suggested that the United States might well annex Canada. For all we know, the laudatory references referred to by the parliamentary assistant might have been only a subtle continuation of this policy to win Canada into the American fold by flattery. I do not know.

The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) also made reference to the level of prosperity Canada is enjoying, and justified the trend toward increasing government control in that fashion. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) visited my constituency last week and, in a speech reported in the Brandon Sun for last Friday—I believe the date is April 18—made certain statements which were given this heading: "Present Prosperity of Canada Due To Government Policies." The news item goes on to say:

Hon. Stuart Garson, Minister of Justice, said in an address here—

That is, Brandon.

—Thursday that Canada's present prosperity results not from a favourable world atmosphere but from policies instituted by the Canadian government in conjunction with the governments of the United States, Great Britain and some European countries.

Well, now, what is the real explanation of Canada's prosperity? Actually we were quite unprepared for it following the war. Most economists—there were one or two who were right—basing their forecasts on what followed after world war I, were prepared for a recession, if not a depression, following world war II. The monetary policies adopted at that time reflected the gloomy forebodings of the economists. They were prepared to meet the impact of the anticipated depression or recession. But it never emerged. The monetary policies then established tended to contribute to and to aggravate the difficulty we have been having with inflation during the last two years.

Actually, very few of us had realized the tremendous changes that had occurred in connection with the world's economy as a result of the upheaval of world war II. We were still thinking in terms of the depression because Canada was still in its throes. We were only slowly emerging out of the depression in 1939. I should like to pose some questions. Where would Canada's prosperity be if we had lost the war? I am sure that the responsibility for the successful conclusion of world war II was more that of the armed forces than the result of any machinations of any government body. I hope we remember that when we come to discuss amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act.

If the war had never occurred, what level of prosperity would Canada have been enjoying today? I have indicated that the war actually awakened Canada from her depression lethargy. The balance of economic power as well as political influence changed to a large extent from the old world to the new and Canada automatically fell heir to the results of this transition without any great effort on her part. It was a process that took place as a result of the devastating effects of a global war.

Where would our prosperity be if we were not favoured geographically as we are? Where would it be if we had not the natural resources that we are only now beginning to exploit? And a final question: Where would it be without the continued high level of United States capital investment in the exploitation of these resources? I have a statement here—unfortunately I have not the reference—which I should like to place on the record. It reads:

Foreign capital pouring into Canada has saved us from some most unpleasant consequences. Without this inflow we would have been getting dangerously short of credit in the United States and elsewhere. We would have been in a worse predicament even than four years ago when we had to curb buying and travelling in the United States and generally pull in our belts.

That crisis was brought on by buying far more from Uncle Sam than we were selling him. The same has been true in our trading of the last 12 months. Though our exports took rather an unexpected splurge in December, nevertheless we finished the year almost $125 millions behind. This deficit covered trade with all countries but the difference with the United States was most important. And in other international items, too, we were in the red, items such as net tourist travel, freight shipments, etc. All the figures are not in yet, but when they are our total deficit on current international account may be the largest ever.

Luckily for us, while we have been doing this extra shopping and travelling in the United States, shrewd Americans have been investing their dollars in our oil, iron ore, power, chemical and other resources. That's what has kept our credit sound. That's the reason our dollar is on top of the heap."

On April 23 the United States ambassador made a speech in Montreal, which was reported as follows:

Stanley Woodward, U.S. ambassador to Canada, today defended investment of U.S. capital in Quebec and said "denunciation of foreign capital trusts and unions have become a commonplace tactic" in this province only in recent years.

And again:

"Natural resources must be exploited if they are to be resources instead of buried treasure," he said.

"To do so requires large amounts of capital, technical knowledge, and a willingness to gamble on the outcome of often unprofitable explorations.

I think you will agree that my fellow countrymen have helped Quebec in these respects, and have contributed to the notable rise in the French-Canadian standard of living."

We are aware that there is considerable United States investment in Canada, particularly in connection with the development of our natural resources. This investment has played a large part in bringing about the present level of Canadian prosperity.

I have mentioned before that the prairie provinces do not believe in this myth of prosperity. We cannot believe in the myth of prosperity because of our population losses. We are a relatively depressed area. We have been losing population to the more favoured central provinces. Why should we be impressed with the prosperity that exists in Ontario and Quebec, when actually it is a relative thing so far as Canada as a whole is concerned?

We must consider the national viewpoint in this regard. As is well known by hon. members, Manitoba is faced with the loss of two representatives in the House of Commons because of the harsh necessities of redistribution. Our voice is going to be weaker rather than stronger as we endeavour to grapple with the complex problems of government. There has been no move on the part of the "have" provinces to assist the "have-not" provinces. In this regard the old doctrine of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth unfortunately has been followed. You can understand then why we are not necessarily enthusiastic about this picture of overwhelming prosperity that is referred to from time to time.

There was one project in Manitoba that was assuming worth-while proportions as a tourist attraction. I refer to the international peace garden on the boundary between Manitoba and North Dakota. This project has been stymied this year by the withdrawal of the federal grant of $15,000 just when it was becoming a profitable source of tourist dollars. Here we seem to have economy in reverse. I was surprised, as were other hon. members who are interested in this worthy project, and as were citizens right across the country, when this grant was withdrawn, especially when $50,000 is being provided for the United Nations doors or, to carry it to extreme, when $10,000 is being granted to an organization to promote a thrift campaign. I am sure that the spontaneous representations that have been made on behalf of this worthy project are sufficient indication to the members of the government of the feelings of the people right across Canada about this shortsightedness.

My time is running out. I was going to deal with one specific problem faced by the prairie provinces, but this matter was dealt with adequately by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) this afternoon. I refer to farm income taxation. As I move around my constituency my attention is continually drawn to this problem. Ever since the matter was brought before the house last fall, as well as during the spring session of 1951, the farmer has become aware of the discrimination that exists. The explanations given have not been quite adequate so far as he is concerned. Saturday Night of January 26, 1952, contained an article which has brought forth some inquiries. I should like to quote one or two paragraphs as I think they will help to present an objective viewpoint of this matter. They read:

In 1949—the latest year for which you can get figures—23 employees of the income tax department collected an average of $255 from 200 farmers in the province of Quebec. There were in Quebec, according to the 1941 census, 134,000 "farmers and stockraisers." In the same year in Saskatchewan 74 income tax officials collected an average of $331 from 20,000 farmers. There were in Saskatchewan, according to the 1946 prairie census, 115,000 farmers. In Ontario, 92 officials collected an average of $242 from 8,010 farmers. There were in Ontario, according to the 1941 census, 161,600 "farmers and stockraisers" . . .

On the face of it, the collection of taxes from the farm population is highly inequitable in Canada; and those who are so minded attribute the inequality to the basest possible motives.

We have had an explanation of the situation in terms of the comparative difficulty of determining farm incomes in Ontario, and particularly in Quebec, with their smaller units; but these explanations have not entirely satisfied farmers on the prairies. One solution that has been put forward this afternoon is to increase the intensity of activity or interchange the personnel so that more effective administration of income tax affairs can be carried out in those areas which at the moment seemingly are not being adequately covered.

I have been dealing largely with government extravagance, and the other side of the picture of course follows axiomatically. If you are spending lots of money you have got to collect lots of money notwithstanding the fact that the suggestion is often put forward that all these benefits are due to government largess. You have got to tax and tax heavily to realize the income necessary to meet the increased services of government. Today we are taxing to the extent of almost one-third of our national income. The distribution of the tax dollar between Ottawa, the provinces and the municipalities is something like 49 cents for Ottawa and 51 cents to meet the combined obligations of the provincial governments and the municipalities. With one-third of the national income drained off in federal taxation there has been a great deal of discussion concerning the prevailing state of affairs. We have heard protests from corporations which have put forward presentations that the level of taxation is resulting in a loss of productivity and producing a situation which can prove actually harmful to business development and activity in Canada.

But even the ordinary taxpayer is beginning to feel the pinch. As he moves toward greater dependence upon the state, he is beginning to feel that there is a price to pay, and protests are rising right across the country. We are becoming aware too that government spending is not sacrosanct. It contributes to inflationary effects as does excessive private spending. The problem seems to be that the government is not aware of the outcry. We get no clue that it is at least from the presentation of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). The major difficulty is that the sinner cannot see his sin. There is no repentance possible when there is no awareness of sin. It reminds me of the situation of the chap who had been a bit of a reprobate during his lifetime. His clergyman was trying to get him to repent as he neared the end. He said to the chap, "Do you renounce the devil and all his works?" The fellow replied very feebly and weakly that he did not think this was a time to be making bad friends of anybody. Maybe that is the explanation of government policy. If we were closer to an election than we think we are perhaps we would come to that conclusion. There is the situation as I see it. I have no difficulty at all in supporting the amendment submitted by the members of this group.

Mr. E. B. Huffman (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time that I have taken part in a budget debate since becoming a member of the house. I have listened with a great deal of interest to those who have taken part in the current debate and those that have preceded it. I am amazed at the different views expressed from time to time by various members. However, I am always of the opinion that there are barometers by which a person can judge the financial position of a country, a corporation or a person. I should like to refer to some clippings I have from yesterday's issue of the London Free Press. This publication comes to my desk gratis by courtesy of the publisher. In yesterday's issue there were three articles which I think are a reasonable barometer by which we can judge the financial position of our country.

The first is a dispatch from New York dated April 23 containing a report from Dun and Bradstreet Inc. The heading of the article is, "U. S. failures rise, Canadian decrease". Surely that is a barometer by which we can judge the financial position of our country. In the same issue there is an article headed, "Canada's trade credit $30 million in March." It indicates that there has been a gain of $78 million over March of the previous year. From the point of view of our trade relations with other countries surely that is a barometer by which people can judge the financial position of Canada. Then there is an article headed, "Fuel oil down... Wholesale gasoline reduced; improved dollar position reason for price drops." Here are three articles in one issue of this paper indicating the position of Canada with respect to the fiscal policy pursued by the government in the interests of our people.

When I first rose I said I was amazed at some of the remarks made in the house from time to time. At page 1533 of Hansard there is a reference to the sales tax by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) when speaking in the budget debate. He referred to the fact that it had been increased from 6 per cent to 10 per cent which, as he correctly indicated, was an increase of 66⅔ per cent. He did not say it was a rise of 4 per cent; he put it on a percentage basis.

I am convinced that the hon. member for Eglinton did not want to mislead anyone, but at page 1532 of Hansard he created the mythical surplus of $902 million, made up of $247 million of expenditure in the closing days of the fiscal year, non-budgetary expenditures of $300 million and an admitted budget surplus of $356 million. Incidentally his addition is out by $1 million. Then he relates this surplus to the $30 million budgeted for by the Minister of Finance at the beginning of the past fiscal year. At page 1533 he relates that to the present fiscal policy, and says that budgeting for a $9 million surplus this year will only mean a difference of $21 million, so that this year we will have a surplus of $881 million. In one place he subtracts; in another he adds; in another he takes percentages when it is to the advantage of the speech he is making. If he wanted to be fair I should think he would use percentages in relation to the surplus. If you relate the $9 million surplus that has been budgeted for this year to the $30 million which was budgeted for last year, you will find that is three and one third times greater than the other. If you divide $902 million by that figure it will give you the sizeable surplus of around $300 million.

Then at page 1577 the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) had this to say:

—there is not the slightest doubt that we will end up this year with a surplus at least as great as the one we had at the end of the year just past.

For a long time this government has been trying to convince the opposition that the policies it has adopted have been in the best interests of our people. How has that been done? Some have called the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) the super-optimist, the crystal gazer or the seer; but if you look back over the reports he has given this house from time to time you will find that they were honest reports of what he considered would take place within this country. It was not a case of being a crystal gazer; it was a case of taking the best available information. In this country we have an excellent bureau of statistics, which gathers facts from all over the world. They are able to give us the anticipated national production and the anticipated gross national income. In addition to the bureau of statistics, Canada has trade commissions in practically all the countries with which we are doing business, and I was very pleased to note that only last week three new trade commissions were opened in countries with which we had been doing some business but with which we hope to do a much greater volume of business. So it was not a case of crystal gazing; it was a case of placing facts before the house, and those facts have been among the best barometers this country has had. As far as I can ascertain, the reports the minister has presented in the house from time to time are the only thing conservative about him. Always at the conclusion of the fiscal year the gross national production and the gross national income have been higher than he indicated they would be.

Now I would like to say a word about production in this country. Unfortunately at the present time we have an outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in Saskatchewan, which has closed the natural outlet for our livestock products. As a result we cannot dispose of those products in the natural market, and the producers are suffering some hardship. I sincerely hope this difficulty will soon be overcome. I would like to suggest to the government one thing I believe is in our own interests, and which would help overcome such a situation as we face at present. There is no question but that our basic metals find a ready market today. The products of our forests also find a ready sale in foreign markets. I believe we should have more industry which would use our basic metals and forest products, thus providing for a greater population which would consume our agricultural products. In that way we would avoid the surpluses of food we have at the present time. I realize that we cannot reach perfection immediately, but we are attempting to do what is in the best interests of all the people of Canada.

Speaking of opportunity within Canada, I note that the hon. member for Eglinton gave this quotation:

My father made your yoke heavy and I will add to your yoke—

On the same page he also quoted:

Cease to do evil, learn to do well.

The government of Canada is attempting to provide opportunities for the people of this country. Then it is up to the people of our country to accept the yoke of responsibility. I am certain that our people and those that have come from other countries, with the background that they have had, will certainly accept that yoke of responsibility and will go on and continue to make a greater and better Canada than we have at this time. The hon. member has stated that we should cease to do evil and seek to do well. I think we should continue on in the pattern we are going.

Mr. Stick: The hon. member should have quoted, "To him that hath shall be given."

Mr. Brown (Essex West): And "The devil can cite Scripture for his purpose".

Mr. Stick: Yes.

Mr. Huffman: I think it is always interesting that an absolutely honest report be placed before the people of Canada. I should like to congratulate the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) on the report he gave on March 14, which appears at page 440 of Hansard. I should like to quote his remarks in part:

This is a convenient point at which to mention that the Department of Trade and Commerce has just completed its annual survey of investment intentions for the year 1952. Total private and public investment is likely to be of the order of $5 billion, involving an increase of just under 10 per cent over the total of $4·6 billion for 1951 which was itself a record year.

And this is the part which I think was absolutely fair to the people:

Perhaps half of the increase over 1951 will represent physical volume and half higher prices.

This again just points to the fact that the bureau of statistics possibly realizes, as has been indicated in our papers just recently, that there is an increase in the price of steel of $3 a ton, and that fact cannot help affecting the economy within this country. We are developing steel within this country to a greater extent from day to day; but while we have to look to other countries to supply us with that commodity, we shall have to pay the price they ask. I therefore say that this is an honest report to the people of Canada when it says that one half represents physical volume and the other half represents higher prices.

As to this surplus that has been indicated here from time to time, there is always a question that has occurred to me, namely, when is a surplus not a surplus. In the province of Ontario from which I come I have noted that the premier and provincial treasurer was extremely happy to relate that he had a substantial surplus at the end of his fiscal year. I can truthfully say that when the government of Ontario went to the people of that province for a mandate, that certainly was one feature that was spoken of as being a characteristic of good government. If it is an indication of good government in a province for it to have a surplus it should be an indication of good government in the federal field. In Ontario the error in estimating revenue was 16 per cent, while the federal Minister of Finance was in error only 8 per cent in estimating his revenue. In other words, Canada had an additional 8 per cent more revenue than was budgeted for while the province of Ontario has 16 per cent more. What I should like to know is where is a surplus not regarded as a surplus. Within the province of Ontario it is taken as an indication of good government. I am certain that in this house the leaders of the same party could well commend the government of Canada for that surplus that has been provided rather than try to discredit it at all times.

The two members that I have mentioned—the hon. member for Broadview and the hon. member for Eglinton—are now indicating that possibly at the end of this coming fiscal year this government will have a surplus; the size that has been indicated by the figures given by the hon. member for Eglinton is $881 million. To me this is indicating to the people of Canada and to the world at large that we have a sound financial position in Canada to which the outside world is looking with envy, and which our own people as well are most happy to go along with.

For a few minutes I should like to refer to the "Report of the Postmaster General for the year ended March 31, 1951". Here is one place that I think a bit of the surplus might well be used. In looking over this report—and this is the 100th anniversary of accepting from the British government the mail responsibility in Canada—I note that on page 19, under the heading of transportation, it is stated:

During the year $13,672,978 was spent on land mail services other than railway, an increase of $770,000 over the previous year; $13,985,713 on railway operations, an increase of $5,118,692 . . .

I realize that the government had to make with the railway companies a contract to carry the mail, but that proportion of increase is not comparable to the service that is provided by the land mail services of the Post Office Department. The amount that has been indicated of $770,000 is a small and insignificant increase, when we consider that there is a group of 14,000 rural mail couriers who, six days out of the week, are bringing the mails to approximately two million people and who provide an excellent service. I would recommend to the government that something be done for these people.

We find that many of these rural mail couriers have a handicap but they provide an excellent service. Under the present system, when their contract comes up for renewal, they are afraid to tender at a price that is comparable to the services they give, for fear that someone else may tender below them and they would lose that livelihood which they have obtained through the contract for some period of years. I think it is most unfortunate, with the type of contract that we have at the present time, that those people who have oftentimes provided 15 or 20 years of services are just not able to get the contract they should have. I would recommend to the government that a committee be set up to study all phases of this act as it affects these people, who under all hazards of weather and road conditions provide one of our most excellent services, to one-seventh of our population. They are couriers of goodwill. I recommend most strongly that the members of this government do their utmost to see that these people are taken care of in the manner in which they should be. They have only the members of this house to recommend to the government what should be done. On the basis of this very report the railways were increased by $5 million, or practically 30 per cent, and the couriers have not been taken care of. As I have indicated before, it is up to the people within this chamber to do what they can to support those who supply one of the most excellent services in a most excellent manner.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

On the order:

House in committee on Bill No. 61, intituled: "An act respecting the British Northwestern Fire Insurance Company" (without amendment).—Mr. Henry.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I note on the order paper that there is another bill that has been referred to us from the banking and commerce committee, namely, Bill No. 92, to incorporate the Perth Mutual Fire Insurance Company. Is it the pleasure of the house to have both bills before the committee of the whole at the same time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BRITISH NORTHWESTERN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 61, respecting the British Northwestern Fire Insurance Company—Mr. Henry—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. Herridge: Can the sponsor of the bill tell the house the reason for the change of name?

Mr. Henry: Mr. Chairman, this bill has been thoroughly investigated before the appropriate committee of the house. The reason for the change of name is to delete the word "fire" from the existing name of the company, to the end that the name of the company may be more consistent with the various lines of insurance sold by the company. In the beginning the company was engaged only in the fire insurance business; but at the present time it is engaged in the fire insurance business as well as the automobile insurance business, the casualty insurance business and the inland marine insurance business.

Title agreed to.

[Mr. Huffman.]

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

PERTH MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 92, to incorporate the Perth Mutual Fire Insurance Company—Mr. Corry—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Sections 1 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. E. T. Applewhaite (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I have not been following the proceedings too carefully, but I understand that we have just reported Bill No. 92. I mention this matter only in case there may be some difficulty later. I think I followed the chairman in committee, and my understanding is that we passed the first four sections of the bill. According to the copy that I have before me of Bill No. 92, the bill has twenty clauses. If I am correct in my understanding I think perhaps we might avoid some little difficulty later, if we recommitted the bill at this time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is quite right. Perhaps he will allow to stand the third reading of the bill which had only one clause, namely, Bill No. 61, respecting the British Northwestern Fire Insurance Company. As to the other bill, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite) has reminded the Chair quite rightly that when the chairman in committee of the whole called this bill in committee, he inadvertently stopped at the fourth clause. Therefore, if the house permits me to do so, I will now leave the chair so that the house can resolve itself into committee of the whole on the said bill, in order to consider the other clauses.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The house again in committee on Bill No. 92, to incorporate the Perth Mutual Fire Insurance Company—Mr. Corry—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Sections 5 to 20 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

STATUTORY HOLIDAYS

PROPOSED OBSERVANCE OF DOMINION DAY AND VICTORIA DAY ON MONDAYS FOLLOWING JUNE 30 AND MAY 23

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard) moved the third reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Dominion Day Act and the Victoria Day Act.

Mr. H. P. Cavers (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Trinity-Conception (Mr. Stick):

That this bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole, with instructions that they have power to amend clause 1 of the said bill as adopted in the committee of the whole by deleting the words "preceding the twenty-third day of May" in the sixth line of the said clause relating to and dealing with the Victoria Day Act, and substituting therefor the following words: "immediately preceding the twenty-fifth day of May."

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I think the purpose of this amendment will be acceptable, having regard to some slight misunderstanding as to the effect of the earlier amendment adopted in some haste on Tuesday evening in committee of the whole.

There is one other matter that occurs to me that the sponsors of the bill and of the amendment might consider when proposing that the bill be referred back to the committee of the whole, and that has to do with the title of the bill. The bill has now no bearing whatever upon the date upon which Dominion day is to be observed. Yet, if the item on the order paper is accurate, the title still includes a reference to Dominion day.

Mr. Stick: No, the 24th of May.

Mr. Fleming: No. The title of the bill, as it appears on the order paper, includes a reference to the Dominion Day Act as well as to the Victoria Day Act. It still appears on the order paper as "Bill No. 2, an act to amend the Dominion Day Act and the Victoria Day Act".

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I might clear up the situation by explaining to the hon. member why the bill still bears the original title as it appears on the order paper. If he will read Beauchesne's third edition, citation 692, he will see that it states:

The title may also be amended in committee. When the committee have found it advisable to alter the title of the bill they will report the fact to the house, and the title will be amended on the motion for the final passage.

Therefore, the final passage of the bill is when the third reading takes place and it is moved that the bill do now pass and that the title be so and so. In other words, it has been amended, and the amendment has been reported to the house; but it will become official, so far as the amendment is concerned, and the struck off words will disappear from the order paper, when the motion is made for final passage. That is in accordance with this citation.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

The Chairman: The house again in committee of the whole on an act to amend the Dominion Day Act and the Victoria Day Act.

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Chairman, I move:

That clause 1 as adopted in committee of the whole be amended by deleting the words "preceding the twenty-third day of May" in the sixth line of the said clause, and substituting therefor the words "immediately preceding the twenty-fifth day of May."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported and read the third time.

Mr. MacDougall moved that the bill do now pass and that the title be as follows: An Act to amend the Victoria Day Act.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

AMENDMENT PROVIDING FOR PAYMENT FOR FARM STORAGE

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 5, an act to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935 (Payment for farm storage).—Mr. Argue.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, there is an understanding that this bill will stand.

Mr. Speaker: Stands.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. E. B. Huffman (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, when the house recessed at six o'clock there was one item I was about to mention, having to do with the land mail service of the Post Office Department.

I hold in my hand a Department of Labour wage schedule under date of October 30, 1951, setting out for the province of Ontario the wage scale for drivers of motor trucks. I have related this figure to the amount of money that is paid to the land mail service, and I find that it amounts to approximately 21 cents a mile. Allowing for the time used by mail carriers in sorting mail, making deliveries and returning to the post office, the average according to this minimum wage scale would be approximately 29 cents a mile. Under these conditions I find that our mail carriers as a whole are not receiving the minimum indicated in this Department of Labour schedule. That is why I suggest that a committee be established to consider the whole problem of our mail carrier system, and I recommend that suggestion to the consideration of the government.

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) presented the case of the dairy farmer most effectively to the house this afternoon. To those hon. members who did not hear him speak I commend a reading and digesting of his remarks in Hansard. They threw considerable light on the situation of our dairy farmers. Tonight I should like to take up a few minutes of the time of the house to deal with marketing and our trading situation, particularly as applied to agriculture.

I have just returned from the Easter recess, as have many other hon. members, and I attended a number of meetings and auction sales in my riding. I talked with a great number of farmers about the agricultural situation, particularly about markets. I regret to say that the situation is not too favourable today from the point of view of the farmers.

I find that dairy cattle which formerly sold for from $300 to $350 are now selling at from $100 to $150 less than formerly. I find that the beef cattle situation is also in a turmoil. We trust that the recent floor price placed on cattle will eventually clarify the situation, but at the present that situation is not too good. I found also that small pigs which formerly sold for from $11 to $12 are now going begging at about half that price. I found also that poultry producers are facing a rather unusual situation as to the future.

We are approaching the productive season in agriculture with uncertainty, misgivings and doubt as to just what the future holds in store. I realize that it is always nice to be optimistic like the hon. member for Kent, Ont., (Mr. Huffman) who just preceded me and who was most optimistic as to the future. He referred to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and regardless of what we may think of the minister at times, I think we all agree that he is always most optimistic as well. But we have to face the facts. While I rather hesitate painting a dark picture and being accused of being an apostle of gloom, nevertheless I feel sure that the facts I intend to place before the government will be accepted in the spirit in which they are presented.

I listened with great interest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) when he presented his budget early this month. I was especially interested in his remarks about our export trade, particularly as it affected our primary products. I had thought that the distress signals which are flying would have brought some remarks from him as regards this phase of our national economy, but I was disappointed. I felt that they warranted some specific reference in the budget speech.

I studied the minister's speech in Hansard most carefully and I find that he made only a brief reference to export trade. He said that all was not well but that the Minister of Trade and Commerce along with himself had every hope that exports in 1952 would equal or better those in 1951. The minister's reference to our continued loss of export markets might have been more correct if he had said that it is true that some of these markets have been lost but the Minister of Trade and Commerce and himself believed that we will export more because we are exporting materials for which there is a great demand in many parts of the world. But these conclusions hold little hope for our agricultural producer. Today we have lost many of our important outlets for agricultural products and unless something is done immediately to rehabilitate our export markets situation things will be serious indeed.

I should like to give a few figures in connection with certain agricultural products which were formerly shipped to England. In 1938 we supplied 27·5 per cent of the total British imports of barley; this market was completely lost in 1951 to Russia, which is now the largest supplier. In 1938 we supplied 93·9 per cent of the total British imports of oats; in 1945 we supplied 96 per cent; but in 1948 we lost this market to the iron curtain countries and other sterling areas.

In 1938 we supplied 254,000 hundredweight or 24 per cent of the British imports of beans, but by 1951 we were not shipping a single bean to Great Britain. In 1945 we supplied 43 per cent of the total British imports of beef. We lost this market to the Argentine republic but found an alternative market in the United States. As we all know, that market has been shut off owing to the foot-and-mouth disease. This is a recent example of what can happen to such an alternative market.

In 1938 we supplied 18·1 per cent of the British imports of bacon. As every hon. member knows, Great Britain provided one of our largest markets for bacon. This market was built up continuously from 1940 until by 1945 we were supplying 83 per cent of the total British imports. In 1946 we supplied 73 per cent; in 1947 we supplied 74·4 per cent; in 1948 we supplied 70 per cent. In 1949 we started to lose this market to Denmark, Poland and The Netherlands. In 1951 Canada supplied only 16,000 hundredweight of total British imports of over 4,426,000 hundredweight. Of that amount, Poland supplied 730,000 hundredweight, The Netherlands supplied 695,000 hundredweight and Denmark 2,953,000 hundredweight as compared to the 16,000 hundredweight obtained from Canada. Our percentage of this market is now considerably below the pre-war level of 1938. With respect to ham, in 1938 we supplied 34 per cent of total British imports. This market was steadily built up until 1947 when we supplied 78 per cent of their total imports. Now that market is lost. The hon. member for Lanark pointed out very clearly to us this afternoon the situation so far as cheese is concerned. In 1938 we supplied 23 per cent of total British imports of cheese. This market was built up until in 1945, for example, we sold 1 million hundredweight or 31 per cent of the total British imports. There has been a steady decline in sales of cheese in this market until in 1951 our exports were reduced to 234,000 hundredweight out of total British imports of 3,384,000 hundredweight.

Turning to poultry, during the 1940's Canada built up an export market for poultry in the United Kingdom. In 1947 we supplied 107,000 hundredweight or 18 per cent of their total imports. We have now lost this market and iron curtain countries such as Poland and Hungary have become the principal suppliers. With respect to eggs, in 1945 Canada supplied 56 per cent of total British imports of shell eggs and 26 per cent of their dried egg imports. In 1948 we supplied 79 per cent. Now that market is completely lost to Poland, China and other sterling countries. As to condensed milk, in 1938 Canada supplied 56 per cent of Great Britain's total market. Now that market is lost to The Netherlands and other sterling countries. Finally I come to apples. In 1938 Canada supplied 42 per cent of the total British market. That market too has now disappeared.

The above examples of these important segments of our Canadian trade have been checked with the trade and navigation accounts of the United Kingdom tabled in the British House of Commons so there is no doubt as to the authenticity of these statements. It can be reasonably argued that it was inevitable that sooner or later our exports of agricultural products would revert to the pre-war levels. However, these figures indicate that not only have the 1938 levels been lowered but we are facing the most serious financial and trade crisis in our history. With Canada being the only dollar member of the commonwealth, her markets have been practically erased altogether. Exports of the products I have named together with a number of others are below the 1938 levels, and of late we have noted that England is now reducing tobacco imports by 75 per cent. This will mean a very serious blow to Canadian tobacco producers.

The United States as an alternative market has certainly not been very promising. Canada, together with other nations, has endeavoured to have the United States rescind its ban on dairy imports which was applied under an amendment to their defence production act. As all hon. members know, this action was contrary to the international obligations assumed by the United States as well as Canada and other countries under the Geneva agreement on tariffs and trade. We must admit that our wartime level of trade or even a moderately reduced level is dependent upon whether Canada's post-war position is as favourable as it was in pre-war days. The serious problem confronting Canadian producers is not to maintain wartime levels of trade or even moderately reduced levels. The fact is our trade has fallen away below the level of 1933, and even this low level will be again seriously reduced in 1952.

When this serious threat has been brought to the attention of the government they have always pointed to the alternative markets in the United States. It is true the United States has been an excellent market for our Canadian farm products. History of trade has shown, however, that whenever the United States has a surplus and Canada has a surplus, and both countries are anxious to market the same product, the United States raises its tariffs or uses some other device to prevent our exports from entering that country. In that way they exclude our products from the United States. The stability of the United States market as an alternative export market for our primary products is very questionable for the following reasons: First, the congress amendment to their defence production act, which restricted the importation of cheese and other dairy products, seriously affected Canada. This action was protested not only by Canada but by New Zealand, Norway, Australia, Denmark, France, The Netherlands and Italy. It was an open violation of the Geneva general agreement on tariffs and trade.

Notwithstanding President Truman's message to the nation of January, 1952, recommending the repeal of this amendment, no action has been taken. The matter comes up for discussion again in June but it is very doubtful that the amendment will be rescinded prior to the election which is to take place in that country in the fall of this year. A second reason is that there is a bill now before the United States Senate, which was introduced in February of this year, asking congress to protect United States farmers against imports of Canadian feed grain. This comes at a time when Canada has a large crop of coarse grain to market and there are many millions of bushels of damaged wheat for which we require substantial export markets.

A third reason is the escape clause provisions in the United States trade agreement extension act of 1951. This presents an ever ready threat to the stability of our exports to that country. Therefore with these unstable alternative outlets in the United States in constant danger of being cut off we realize how important that matter of Canadian export trade is to us when we stop to think that one out of every four Canadians earn their livelihood in industries connected with the export trade. It is definitely a matter of great national importance.

The Progressive Conservative party has suggested in and out of the house on many occasions that the government should initiate action requesting that a trade and economic conference be held to be attended by the economists and other experts of the commonwealth countries to study this matter. We have suggested the following reasons which I think are most important: (a) to review normal channels of trade between member countries now lost or seriously threatened; (b) extension of trade channels now existing; (c) consideration of action towards convertibility of currency; (d) a review of the effects of present blocked sterling practices and the possibility of their removal; (e) the possibility of Canada purchasing within the sterling bloc raw materials now secured elsewhere, at least to the degree that Canada might regain its traditional markets for primary products in commonwealth countries; (f) to explore the possibilities for Canadian enterprise in the amazing commonwealth investment and resources as a source of supply for raw materials required by Canadian industry.

Unfortunately the government did not see fit to take the action that has been recommended by my leader and other members of the Conservative party. I repeat that today the situation facing our farmers is made more difficult because of the loss of the alternative market in the United States as a result of the unfortunate outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease. In this regard I should like to ask the government if they have seriously considered every possibility and every angle of negotiations and arrangements with the United Kingdom government and the government of the United States whereby exports of meats now being shipped from New Zealand and Australia to Great Britain might be diverted to the United States and comparable quantities might be shipped from Canada to England. As all hon. members know, under United States laws, meat from a country where there is a disease-infected area is not allowed into that country. But their regulations do not preclude imports from Australia and New Zealand, so it seems to me that these difficulties could be overcome by some arrangement similar to that which was worked out among the United States, Great Britain and Canada in connection with aluminum.

Our loss of markets has brought about a situation that strikes at the very roots of the agricultural economy of Canada. Constructive action is required immediately. No one believes for a moment that the government can do everything; that would be impossible; but the farmers of Canada feel that the government should do something. I suggest that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who is also Minister of Defence Production, dispatch his departmental officials or better still go himself immediately to the United Kingdom with the proposal that Canada divert some millions of dollars in defence orders to the United Kingdom, which in turn would permit them to purchase our bacon, our wheat, our cheese, our apples and other primary products of which we have been the traditional suppliers.

In passing, Mr. Speaker, I do not think we should wait any longer for the Department of National Defence to make its decision on the question of arms standardization.

I trust the government will give these few suggestions very careful consideration. These are matters which concern all of us. They concern every member of parliament. We as representatives of the people express our views in good faith and trust the government will consider our representations in the same spirit. If this is done and we approach these problems from the standpoint of the common good, then the prestige of parliament will be greatly enhanced in so doing.

Mr. Hector Dupuis (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I am going to endeavour to express myself in the English language, and I immediately beseech the indulgence of my English-speaking colleagues if I do not have exactly the words to please their ears. I will do my best to say what I think ought to be said on the questions presently occupying the attention of this house. It is the duty of every hon. member to express the opinions of his constituents, and I think I would fail in my duty if I did not make a few remarks on the budget. I have heard a lot of things said and I am sure I will not say anything new on this subject. On the other hand I consider it is right for me to bring to the attention of different departments matters which to my mind should be looked into, especially on behalf of the small people whom I represent, since 95 per cent of my constituents are what I would call middle-class citizens.

As I said a moment ago, I have heard a lot of things said about this budget. First of all, emphasis was placed upon the fact that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) comes along and declares a surplus for this fiscal year of $350 million, in round figures. Some people on the opposite side of this chamber claim that if the predictions of the minister had been right the burden of taxes on the shoulders of our citizens would have been lessened. Well, I am of the opinion of the minister when he declares that it is not a big error on his part to make a mistake which works out at about 1½ per cent of the gross revenue of over $3,500 million. Of course if these things could be foreseen there would be no particular reason for any Minister of Finance to declare a surplus just for the pleasure of taxing. On the other hand it is really providential that this surplus has been declared. I am not a big financier, but I think it is a good policy to pay our debts in times of prosperity and not wait for times of depression. After all, with the heavy expenditures this government has to face at the present time, particularly in connection with defence, one is amazed that our debt not only does not increase but actually decreases, which is far better for the economy of this country.

Of course I would have liked nothing better than to hear the minister declare that all taxes would be reduced. But while he is a very capable minister, I do not think he is such a miracle man as to be able to go ahead and spend more and more all the time, yet be able to take off part of the taxes already paid by the citizens. My policy is to pay as we go. I think that is better for any government. From my point of view it is not a good policy to have future generations taxed for expenditures we are making today. And no one has ever contested the necessity of those expenditures, especially for defence, because we know very well that by preparing ourselves and preventing a war we are assuring peace. Even if we have to spend money and send troops overseas, that is a protection because, as I have heard here before, it is better to settle these affairs far away than have an enemy come to this country. It is better to invest our money in preparation than to be forced by lack of preparation to face a war which would be disastrous not only to other countries but to our own country as well.

We hear that taxes are too high. Well, of course everybody knows they are high, but that does not prevent our good citizens from the western part of this country coming along and asking for more expenditures; asking millions for their wheat, for instance, and for other expenses we are supposed to meet. That does not prevent them asking for millions and more millions for the western part of this country. I have no objection to helping settle some of the problems that may be of a national nature, but on the other hand I do not like to see those same people coming along and reproaching us for putting on taxes when a big part of those taxes are to pay what they are asking for their part of the country.

Mr. Blackmore: Can you produce figures to prove what you are saying?

Mr. Dupuis: I am very sorry but I cannot produce figures now for two reasons. First of all one cannot always have figures at one's finger tips, and secondly, I would not have time for the other remarks I desire to make. Any time the hon. member wants figures on that I shall let him have them. He will be astonished, I am sure, to see how far he went in asking for so much money, and he will be astonished to see how much the western part of this country has cost the eastern part. We never reproached hon. members for that. The hon. member does not know how far he went in requesting grants which were given to his part of the country.

Mr. Quelch: What about assistance on feed grain, $130 million?

Mr. Dupuis: Do you think for one moment that I can answer questions from three members at the same time? There will be occasions when I shall be able to tell you exactly what I think about your requests. I shall endorse the actions of this government in giving grants, as long as the request is based on sound reasons. Tonight I am not ready to do that. In addition to that, I have asked hon. members for their indulgence because this is my first speech in English. It is a little difficult for me to leave this subject, then gather my thoughts and return to it.

Mr. Thatcher: You are doing well; go ahead.

Mr. Dupuis: I thank you, but it is not compliments that I am looking for; but I do not want to get lost or else I shall have to return to French and the hon. member will not understand me.

Then, we have heard the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) crying about the thefts which occurred at the Petawawa camp. Of course, there was about $50,000 worth of materials stolen. No one approves of that, but criminal charges will be laid. If hon. members opposite are going to emphasize this little theft, I am going to tell the leader of the opposition as well as the other members in this chamber that this government went through the war from 1939 to 1945 without a scandal. I recall the war of 1914-18, however, when under a Conservative regime there were plenty of scandals. I recall our poor soldiers, who were fighting in Europe for the same principles for which our soldiers are fighting today, being given cardboard shoes. I remember that in the Valcartier camp goods worth thousands of dollars were charged but not delivered, and that was under a Conservative regime.

I do not believe the people should be left with the impression that everything is wrong and no steps have been taken to prevent such thefts. I have been in commercial life myself. Some hon. members are businessmen and realize that thefts cannot be prevented. You know darn well—that is plain English, but I guess it will be allowed here—that some commercial firms even set aside a percentage of their revenue to pay for things that will be stolen. There is no scandal, therefore, in the disappearance of $50,000 worth of goods from that camp. If there is a scandal, it is only a shadowy thing compared with the scandals of the first war under a Conservative regime. I wanted to say that.

I have not heard a word from the opposition about the good things that this government has done.

Mr. Johnston: It has not done anything.

Mr. Dupuis: Tonight I have only about ten items to illustrate the good things that this government has done. If I had more time I could go through all the good things that this government has done.

Mr. Pouliot: Pay no attention to the hecklers.

Mr. Dupuis: I may tell the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) that I really do not mind them. They get me used to the atmosphere. I was told when I came here that this house was very, very cool, but I find it is getting hot, so I like it.

Nothing was said, Mr. Speaker, about the good things this government has done. I understand that the opposition is not here to praise this government, but according to the point of view expressed by members on the other side they are not even here to make suggestions. I recall a member of this house going to a convention and saying, "Well, gentlemen, we certainly have good ideas for good government, but we are not going to say much now; we will explain them when the election comes around or else the government will adopt them as they have in the past." I hope hon. members opposite will not reproach this government for the good measures it has introduced because they came from the opposite side. I suppose we shall not hear any more suggestions, because they will wait until the next election.

I consider that one of the duties of the opposition is to make whatever suggestions they believe are for the benefit of this country. If they do not do that, then according to my belief the opposition is not fulfilling its duty.

Mr. Blackmore: You are exactly right.

Mr. Dupuis: I like to get a few suggestions from the Social Credit party, too. I have not heard anything but criticism from them.

Mr. Blackmore: We have everything that counts.

Mr. Dupuis: Perhaps you have a monopoly on good administration, but it has not proven to be so in your province.

Mr. Blackmore: You are just foolish now.

Mr. Dupuis: If you think it is foolish, you can simply laugh at it. Any time the hon. member wants to meet me on any ground I shall be willing to answer him, but not tonight. I repeat that I am not a financier. I am far from being a capitalist, as I know some on the other side of this chamber are. I have always thought, however, that whenever your dollar was the best dollar on the monetary market, that meant good administration. Well, we did not hear any of the hon. members on the other side admitting the high position of our dollar. They would not do it. There is a particular reason for that, and that is that they find it difficult to admit this government has done any good. I am not going to say that everything this government has done has been good. I do not believe the government thinks that is so. But as I said when I first came into this house, when we judge a government or a party we put the good actions on one side of the balance and the bad actions on the other side. We weigh them, and when the good actions are heavier than the bad we vote for that government. That is what the people have done in past elections and that is what they are going to do in the coming election.

Is it not a sign of prosperity when money from foreign countries comes to Canada for investment? If that is not a sign of prosperity, then I know not a thing about finance. Let us take into account the high budgets of the provinces and the municipalities. Where does that money come from? Does it come simply from those provinces or from those municipalities? No, it is a reflection of the prosperity that is spreading right through this country. In 1939, Mr. Speaker, the province of Quebec had a budget of about $50 million —perhaps a little more or a little less, but let us call it $50 million. Now they have a budget of $200 million. Where does that come from? Simply by taxation? No; it comes simply by reason of the prosperity of the country, by reason of the increase in business. We hear all this criticism from the other side of the house. What is the use of all the time running down our country, and of always saying that this country is badly governed? Do you think that it will bring new industries here or will bring new investment capital by going ahead and making that kind of comment on the good actions that have been done by this government? I think it is absolutely against the interests of our country not to place before the public and before other countries knowledge of the prosperity which has been the result of the direct action and the good policy of this Liberal government of which I am proud to be a part.

As to these provincial budgets and municipal budgets which amounted to $50 million in 1939 and which have risen to $200 million, some will say that that is inflation. All right. I do not know enough about inflation or deflation to speak on the subject, but I have lived in a situation which is much worse than inflation, from my point of view, and that was in a depression. I lived in a depression from 1930 to 1940. I was a member of the city council of Montreal and a member of the city executive. The relief costs in the city of Montreal alone were $1,500,000 per month. I would rather have a little bit of inflation than have that kind of depression. Was that under a Liberal government? No; it was under a Conservative government, under a leader who, when he was no longer prime minister, could think of nothing better to do than go to England and invest his capital on the other side.

Mr. Pouliot: With his top hat.

Mr. Dupuis: We have lived in depression times. With all the investment of new capital, with all the prosperity that we have seen in this country, with all our natural resources, we are sure of not living again in such depression times if the people of this country continue to place their confidence in the heads of the Liberal party.

Let us now study the budget, properly speaking. I am not going to deal with all the items; but I have heard so many bad things said about it that I feel I must mention some of the good things. First of all, in my speech last year I mentioned certain things. I am sure that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) did not allow those tax reductions simply because the member for St. Mary spoke. But on the other hand I realize that he gave what I and some other members asked for, namely, a reduction in taxes on frigidaires, washing machines, radio sets, automobiles, tires, soft drinks and other items. Those reductions will certainly help the family budget. Then in addition, when we passed legislation to abolish resale price maintenance, that was something that also helped the family budget. We can see the effect of it today, because today you can buy a frigidaire for from $150 to $175 less than the former price, taking into account the 15 per cent tax reduction recently announced. There is a reduction of some $75 on a washing machine. That is what I consider to be good administration. That is what I call taking into account the wishes of the people as expressed through their representatives. That is what I call a democratic government, ready to listen to whatever good requests are made to it.

My hon. friends on the other side of the house did not mention all the good things in this budget. There are, of course, some little things that I myself would have liked to see abolished. But on the other hand, I do not think you can expect perfection from a government. I am darn sure—that is the way I talk to my people when I meet them on the street—or very sure, perhaps I should say, that the representatives of the people here would have liked the government to listen to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) with respect to medical expenses. I myself would have liked to have that four per cent provision removed. But let us hope that this will be done in the near future. I am of the opinion that medical costs should be deductible from the amount taxable. Consider the situation of a man earning $4,000 a year. He pays some taxes. He pays for four years, five years or ten years—and it is only in order that he should do so—and he has no chance of getting any reimbursement. Whatever is left after payment of taxes, he just balances at the end of the year. Then one year he has bad luck, as I recall it, and he has $400 or $500 medical expenses to pay. There you are. He is up against it. He is in a bad situation. I hope this situation will be changed.

I am here to fulfil my duty, but that does not mean that I condemn the government with respect to everything. I am here to say what I think ought to be said. In my opinion this is one of the suggestions that ought to be listened to, and I hope it will be listened to in the near future. It is not only the member for St. Mary who speaks in this way. The other day in Le Canada, I read a comment of the correspondent for that paper. For those who do not know it, I may say that Le Canada is a Liberal paper in Montreal. I do not think that anybody who knows Le Canada will doubt that it is a Liberal paper. They said that some will be embarrassed by the amendment coming from the C.C.F. or the Social Credit group—I do not remember which it was—on the four per cent provision with respect to medical expenses. May I say that I am not at all embarrassed. After all, I am not going to vote against the government, in a vote of non-confidence, just simply because a couple of my points of view have not been accepted and when 98 per cent of the whole budget, under the present circumstances, is satisfactory and ought to be satisfactory to the whole of the people.

I really regret that the Minister of Finance has not seen his way clear to make a greater reduction in the tax on cigarettes. Hon. members of this house ought to know that if there is smuggling—and I am quite sure there is—a three-cent cut in the price of a package of cigarettes will not prevent it. I was under the impression that, in order to avoid all that smuggling, a package of cigarettes in this country should cost no more than 30 to 35 cents. Yet in our province anyway we are still paying 43 cents.

I have here an article published by the flue-cured tobacco marketing association of Ontario, in which it describes the smuggling of cigarettes as having reached unprecedented levels. It states, in part:

> "Few Canadians have any conception of the wide-open nature of this border," says the committee. "It is not only undefended, but as far as cigarette smuggling is concerned, it is also indefensible. Not only are there part-time customs stations which close at designated hours (usually after nightfall), but there are places where several trans-border roads lead through a town on either side of the main road manned by the customs."

The article closes in this way:

> "Even now," the committee quotes a customs officer—

And a customs officer is a government employee who must know what he is talking about. He must know what he is up against when he is trying to do his duty.

> "Even now," the committee quotes a customs officer, "we're too busy checking tourists to chase smugglers."
> Citing the "Sherbrooke section" of the R.C.M.P. command as an example of a border hot spot the committee says that there are four or five smug routes into the section for every constable on the local establishment. "Even a cursory glance at a good map will show," says the committee, "that the unguarded roads and trails in the stretches between the ports are a much more obvious feature of the local landscape than the official customs points of entry."

The extent of smuggling is indicated by the number of people one sees every day smoking American cigarettes. I hope the Minister of Finance will be able to see his way clear to make a generous reduction in the cigarette tax. As I said earlier, I make these remarks, not by way of any real criticism of the government, but because it is my view that they should have looked after these two matters more properly. Let us hope that our wishes will come true in the near future.

I will vote against the amendment and the subamendment, because I am not going to support a vote of non-confidence in the government, and place myself alongside those whose ideas I do not share. And I would give some advice to my hon. friends in other parties: I am a Quebecer, a Montrealer. I know, of course, that those parties would like to have the support of the province of Quebec—and I do not hear anyone saying no.

If I were to vote for the amendment and the subamendment I would be saying, in effect, that these people ought to be supported in their vote of non-confidence against the government. Well, they cannot depend upon my vote, if they insist upon going ahead with the sort of suggestions they have been making in the past.

For instance, it was only recently that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) went ahead with his bill in which he insists upon imposing a divorce court upon the province of Quebec. Yet he knows perfectly well that Quebec has constitutional rights that they are ready to defend anywhere and at any time. So I repeat that the hon. member and his colleagues are not going to engage the confidence of the province of Quebec by acting in that way, and by trying to set aside those constitutional rights to which Quebec is entitled.

Then, other members of the C.C.F. have been making claims for federal grants for education in the provinces. This is another ground upon which federal members should not place their feet, because it touches one hundred per cent upon the autonomy of the provinces. Members of this house know very well that we are very ticklish about the question of autonomy.

After all, we have received some lessons that have taught us to be cautious, and not to do anything that would look like taking away or menacing the autonomy of any province. So I say to these gentlemen that if they wish to have the confidence of Quebec they will have to change their policy; they will have to mind their own business, in a way, and not try to take away from the province of Quebec those constitutional rights to which she is entitled.

We are often told that the federal government is trying to centralize. Well, I do not see suggestions for centralization coming as frequently from any quarter as it comes from hon. members on the opposite side of the house. I believe therefore that it would not be wise for me to give them my confidence, because I am not a centralizer. And because I am not a centralizer I am not going to vote with the champions of centralization in this country. Nor will I support those people who apparently do not know the first thing about all the measures they bring here affecting constitutional rights of citizens in this country.

I have a few suggestions to make. When I rose in my place this evening I had no intention of trying to settle all the problems with which the government is faced. However, I did have a few observations to make and, as it is said in English, I shall proceed to get it off my chest. I hope in doing so I shall not hurt too deeply the feelings of hon. members in other parties. I speak only to explain my conduct, and to give my reasons for voting against the amendment and the subamendment, while at the same time offering some suggestions.

I have received many letters, some of which have come from unskilled workers asking for higher wages. These workers are earning at the present time 82 cents an hour. When one considers the high cost of living, he could not consider that a sufficient wage. The government ought to set an example by paying higher wages to those on low salaries, so that they may make both ends meet.

I know conditions are no worse than they have been under former governments, but it is my duty to ask for an increase, because I represent that class of workers, and I would not be doing my duty if, in my representations, I did not single them out.

As I have said before, there ought to be an upward revision of the salaries of civil servants in the lower grades. It may be that those in higher ranks earn enough so that they do not have serious financial problems. But this is not true of those in the lower grades, and it may be that some adjustment would be proper. I know, for instance, of some people doing a job in one department who find that they are paid less than those doing similar work in another department. Why should this condition remain?

These suggestions are made in all good faith, and in the hope that at some time there may be a revision of the wages of the workers in these lower grades. I would hope that at some time we may have an end to all these war expenditures. There is no doubt, after all that it has done for the aged people, that this government will certainly take into consideration increasing the old age pension, other pensions and family allowances when war expenditures are not so heavy.

I would direct the attention of hon. members to the fact that $40 a month is not enough for the aged. I am sure every member on this side of the house will admit that they cannot go very far on $40. But, after all, it must be kept in mind that there have been some acts of amelioration by this government. There was a time when the aged were receiving only $20 a month. Then it was increased to $30, and has finally reached $40. The age limit, which formerly stood at 65, is now placed at 70, and without a means test.

These things can be done step by step and I am quite sure in the near future the government will consider the advisability of amending the old age pensions, the family allowances, the veterans pensions and those paid to the C.N.R. employees and government employees. This government has shown its good will and its good intentions, and has actually carried out some of these changes. I do compliment them for what they have done up to now, but I advise the ministers concerned not to stop where they are. They should give attention to the requests being made by these particular classes of people.

There is another matter about which I should like to speak. I do not want to exactly reproach the government about this, but I do want to say that I am not satisfied with the way cheques are sent out in the one language only. It would not cost much more to send out bilingual cheques. There are in my riding people named Smith, Warren and so on who cannot speak one word of English. They find it very difficult when they receive cheques or other documents in English.

I do not want to talk of my own personal affairs, but my wife was named Annie Rafferty and she cannot speak one word of English. Her grandfather who was born in Ireland was brought up by a French family, in fact the family of Judge Cousineau in the city of Hull, and herself always lived in French-speaking circles and spoke French all the time and she just could not understand a document printed in English. I cannot see what good it does to send English documents to those with English names when it may be that they cannot speak English at all.

Just the other day I was speaking to a man in Ottawa named Lefebvre and he could not speak one word of French. I am not in favour of sending English documents to those with English names and French documents to those with French names when we could send out bilingual cheques which would be understood by everyone. In that way no mistakes would be made.

The next matter I want to take up is local in character, but it does have a bearing on the general situation throughout Canada. I refer to the tolls which are charged on the Jacques Cartier and Victoria bridges at Montreal. I understand that these are the only two bridges in Canada on which tolls are charged. The Victoria bridge has been paid for long ago. It is still quite narrow, although it was widened a few years ago. It is used considerably.

[Mr. Dupuis.]

The Jacques Cartier bridge was built in 1930 and it showed deficits up to 1948 or 1949. But, these deficits were not paid for by the dominion government alone; they were split among the federal government, the provincial government and the city of Montreal. As a result the city of Montreal has paid $2,850,000 up to date on the accumulated deficits on this bridge. As I say, the tolls on all other bridges in Quebec and throughout Canada have been abolished. This is an anomaly which should be eliminated.

It is not fair to ask the people of Montreal and the suburbs to pay tolls when people using bridges in other parts of the country do not pay tolls. I will present a motion asking for the abolition of these tolls. If for some reason they cannot be abolished, I would suggest that at least no charge be made for the passengers in the car. I know the Jacques Cartier bridge cost $21 million and there are still a few millions to be paid. If that charge was eliminated it would cost all the country only $233,000, which is not large as compared with $65 million for grain. That would give at least part justice to the residents of Montreal and the surrounding country.

If that cannot be done then I repeat the suggestion I made a few months ago that the province should be allowed to handle this bridge. Perhaps this could not be done in the case of the Victoria bridge because that is used by the Canadian National Railways, but the other bridge is only a highway bridge and it should be under the supervision of the roads department of the province of Quebec. If they were permitted to maintain the bridge it would settle all arguments. Part of the debt would have to be absorbed by Canada, but when you are thinking of justice you should not think only of figures. The chamber of commerce and other organizations in Montreal will be presenting petitions to the government to ask that this situation be corrected.

I do not know whether I should say this, but I am not invited to the caucuses of the Liberal party. That indicates that I am not considered to be a full member of the Liberal party. But I am old enough to have studied the history of my country and while there are many who may belong to political parties without knowing why—I am not referring only to Liberals—I know why I endorse this government. I have found that every time there has been prosperity in this country it was under a Liberal regime. It was under a Liberal administration. I do not know whether it is due to fate or bad administration on the part of the Conservative party but every time we have had a depression it has been when that party was in power. Therefore why should I choose a party that always brings a depression with it when it is in power and cast aside a party that brings prosperity to the country?

I would not want to terminate my remarks without complimenting the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) on the honour recently bestowed upon them in having their names placed on a list of twenty-seven persons from among whom will be chosen the Nobel peace prize winner for 1951. The participation of the Prime Minister in the creation of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the part taken by these two Canadian statesmen certainly has been the reason for this distinction. I am sure I echo the views of every member of the house when I extend to them our sincere congratulations on this honour.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak for a short while on the amendment to the amendment introduced by the C.C.F. group. I think the subamendment is most appropriate. It is well worded and expresses the sentiment of most members of the house as revealed during the discussion on the resolution referred to in the subamendment that took place some time ago. I should like to place the subamendment on the record again because I think it is rather important inasmuch as it fills the bill with respect to the sentiments expressed by members of all parties and not only of this particular group. The amendment to the amendment reads as follows:

> This house further regrets that the government has ignored the wish of this house, as expressed by a unanimous vote on March 26, that the four per cent floor under medical expenses deductible for income tax purposes should be abolished.

I am one of the vast majority in the house who were amazed and disappointed to find that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) had failed to implement the expressed desire of members of the house to have the four per cent limitation removed so far as hospital and medical expenses are concerned. While, technically speaking, the resolution adopted by the house only asked for consideration, we felt that during the discussions we had made it quite clear that we sought the complete removal of the four per cent limitation. We felt happy about the situation when the house adopted the resolution and the government, as we thought, accepted the proposal in full.

The parliamentary assistant to the minister has explained that consideration was given but that removal of the limitation had been rejected because it meant a loss of $48 million to the government. In a budget of $4½ billion that means about one per cent. The granting of this relief would not affect the budget in any way. It would merely reduce the anticipated surplus or, on the other hand, the budget could be readjusted in such a way that the money could be found elsewhere. The granting of this request would not in any way interfere with our defence effort as I am of the firm opinion that with careful scrutiny of expenditures a way could be found to save at least the $48 million involved. The fact that $48 million is collected from the sickrooms of Canada, from those who through sickness are no longer able to work, including women and children, fills me with shame and disgust. It was for the purpose of eliminating this feeling of shame that we gave the green light to the government by passing the resolution to which I have referred.

Now that government policy has been decided, the least they can do is to soften the blow for those sick and ailing people who must, because of the nature of their disabilities, procure medical and surgical supplies from outside Canada. I wish to say a few words on their behalf. I suggest that medical and surgical supplies needed for specific treatment and only obtainable outside Canada should be allowed to enter the country tax and duty free. I would accept a provision that there should be a condition that such supplies cannot be procured in Canada. I have here a customs notice that illustrates clearly the heavy penalties that this government imposes on sick people. In this case the victim has had a long and painful illness which has drained his financial resources. During his illness he has had twenty to thirty of these little notices from the customs branch. They come every three or four weeks and are all the same. He gets equipment from the United States that he has tried to procure in Canada but cannot do so. The fact that it cannot be procured in Canada can be verified by his doctor and druggist. It costs him $11.50 but the government imposes a sales tax of $2.30 and a 10 per cent duty of $1.38 making a total of $3.68 which this man has to pay every month.

I should like to place his point of view on the record. I would ask the indulgence of the house in not mentioning his name. I would be very pleased to give it privately to anybody who wishes to have it, but I do not wish to mention it in the house because of the serious illness this man is suffering at the present time. He has sent me these cards and in his letter he says:

> The enclosed card gives details of my last purchase. It does not represent much cash, but it comes up almost once a month. It is when I must buy a new cup that the fun begins. I almost cried when the customs official asked me to pay $7 odd duty when I bought my last cup. Because this equipment is all patented, the cost to commence with is ridiculous, and then to have sales tax, postage and duty added, it is just not fair. I could have an eye, leg, arm, or most other artificial equipment sent me from the States and no duty payable. My situation is worse, I believe, than those who would be requiring any of the above named. Please continue to press for a favourable decision in this all-important matter . . . The loss of any revenue to Canada on this deal means nothing to them, but it does to me, particularly when I have just reached the stage when I am not able to pay all my monthly accounts when they become due. That is not a very bright picture.

I appeal to the minister to reconsider his decision to retain the four per cent limitation. I ask him to consider the plight of thousands of people in Canada, such as the person whose letter I have just read, who are compelled through no fault of their own to incur medical and hospital bills. I ask him to consider whether it is sound financing to collect $48 million from the sick and ailing people of this dominion thus causing them financial embarrassment on top of their disabilities and ailments. Many cases are made distinctly worse, mental stress is caused, and there is prolongation of the recuperative period because the people involved face these financial difficulties. I ask the minister to stop raiding the sickrooms and hospitals of Canada for revenue that could easily be found among the healthy and productive members of our society. Speaking as a taxpayer, I would gladly absorb my proportion of increased taxes, if necessary, to take care of this particular item. The majority of our three million taxpayers would agree with me and would gladly do likewise. Therefore I urge members of all parties to support the subamendment as an expression of our thoughts on this point.

I should like now to deal with another matter very briefly. I wish to place myself on record as taking exception to some of the statements made last night by my colleague, the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher), wherein he urged that certain reductions should be made in social security payments. As a businessman myself I believe I can truthfully say that his statements in this connection do not represent the views of many businessmen in this country. They certainly do not reflect my own views, or as far as I know those of any other businessman belonging to this party. I feel that the hon. member was expressing his own point of view, as he has every right to do; he is not tied down at all.

The hon. member spoke on the assumption that we must reduce certain allowances in order to reduce taxes. I agree that taxes levied on the lower and middle income groups are unnecessarily high, as I will indicate in a moment, and that they should be reduced. But I do not believe for a moment that it is necessary to touch our social services in order to alleviate the present burden of taxes on the majority of Canadians. Indeed, it is a matter of knowing how to apportion in a fair way the expense of government, now that we have an expenditure of over $2 billion for defence. If, for example, the government had imposed heavier increases in personal income taxes at the higher levels, and had imposed an excess profits tax on corporations, the burdens now oppressing the lower income groups certainly could have been reduced. I am sure if the hon. member for Moose Jaw had paused long enough to consider these points he would have adopted an entirely different approach to the subject of reductions in government expenditure.

I wish to go on record as disagreeing with my colleague's contention that a means test should be applied under the Old Age Security Act and in regard to family allowances. In fairness to my colleague I should point out that he did not advocate a return to the old type of means test, but did suggest a ceiling of $5,000. Again I believe if the hon. member had stopped to think he would have seen only too clearly what would be the consequences of such a policy. We have opposed a means test under these and other social security measures in order to get away from the social stigma that is always attached to a person in receipt of a pension given on a charitable basis. The removal of the means test did away with that stigma, and I am rather proud of the fact that it has been removed. I was very happy to learn that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) had applied for his old age security pension, by that action indicating to everyone that he was not putting himself above his fellow Canadians. I think the Prime Minister is to be commended on this, and I only hope that everyone, whatever their status in life, will follow his example.

As the house knows, we of the C.C.F. have always favoured an old age pension without a means test. Indeed we were the first to come out and advocate such a plan for our senior citizens. If we have any criticism of the old age pensions now in effect it is that they are inadequate. The present $40 is unrealistic, as it bears little or no relation to the high cost of living. For this reason we have urged that an old age pension of $60 a month should be given everyone 65 years and over. The government will say we are not able to increase those pensions at this time. Others may point out that those in the lower and middle income brackets are already harassed by taxes they cannot now afford to bear. With this last statement I am in entire agreement. The lower and middle income groups are not only bearing the burden of heavy personal income taxes; it is also they who are most adversely affected by the sales and excise taxes. While we commend the minister for altering the excise tax we cannot help but regret that he did not see fit to reduce the sales tax, for it is this indirect tax above all which oppresses so many Canadians who earn relatively small incomes.

The financing of old age security, for example, should not be made to bear heavily upon those in the lower levels of income, whom the pension was intended to help in the first place. There is no reason why those individuals who make above $3,000 taxable income should have that portion of their income exempt from the social security tax. Why should a person making $10,000 per year, or $20,000 or $50,000, as the case may be, pay a maximum of only $30 for the current year, the same as an individual with a taxable income of only $3,000? Certainly this is an unfair way to allocate the burden of this social security tax. It is on these points that we differ with the government. It is not a question of whether we are able to afford these things; rather it is a matter of apportioning them fairly so they do not hurt those least able to bear further tax increases. I believe in the principle of ability to pay.

With regard to family allowances I am happy to note that my colleague the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) has a resolution on the order paper calling for an increase in these allowances so they will have the same value they had when the act was introduced some years ago. This is another example of our endeavour to increase all social security payments so they will be brought into line with the present high cost of living.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw suggested reductions in civil service pensions. This does not coincide with the policy of our party or with my own views. On the contrary we have urged from time to time that these pensions be increased in view of the high cost of living. As it is now these pension rates, like other social security rates, are meaningless in this inflationary period. Certainly a majority of the members of this party support the efforts of the civil servants to get adequate pensions.

While I have expressed disagreement with some of the statements made by the hon. member for Moose Jaw, I must say he outlined several methods by which the government could save money, and with those suggestions I heartily agree. I have in mind particularly his reference to the costly luxury of maintaining a lieutenant governor in each province, and his request for a survey of all personnel both military and civilian, with a view to eliminating waste and overlapping. No one objects to paying for security, but we strongly object to waste whether in material or in personnel. Savings can and must be made if we are to build up our defences and at the same time maintain our social security and other essential services.

In conclusion may I point out that sheer necessity has forced us into a position that calls for a budget of $4,500 million, the highest peacetime budget in our history. Last year it was slightly less, but the people paid up willingly and handsomely, and we wound up with a surplus of close to $700 million. They will do the same thing again. There may be some grumbling, but very little; and this has been the case because we recognize the emergency. Should we ever again be faced with domestic problems such as we faced in the thirties, never let it be said that we cannot find the money to ease the situation. That fallacy has gone forever, as we have proved in the last two years. We have done it now and we can do it again.

Finally I commend the government on its pay-as-you-go policy. I think that is a sound way to carry on. When the emergency is over the government will find that the people have higher incomes, and possibly they will have a billion or two not needed for defence which can then be used to build homes for the lower income groups, so capitalized that they can be owned outright in a period of ten or twenty years. Keep up the high rates of taxation for a year or two until the housing needs of all the people of Canada have been financed with the money now going into defence production at the rate of $2 billion a year.

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): First, Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) on the honest and able address he presented to this house last evening. I say that very sincerely because, as you know, my remarks are not always in praise of the government. For that reason, I realize it is not always easy to express one's honest opinion. Last evening we heard the member for Moose Jaw deliver a speech which rang with sincerity, and I believe he is to be congratulated by all those who were privileged to hear him.

For a few moments this evening I wish to deal with a problem that is perhaps outside my province, but one which has been misrepresented in this House of Commons. I refer to the cheese producers of Ontario. From information I have been able to obtain, I am convinced that it would be most difficult to arrive at a conclusion as to what this federal government could do about this situation which has been brought to the attention of the house on several occasions. The greater part of the cheese which is produced in Canada comes from an area between London, Ontario, and Three Rivers, Quebec, and the greater part of that would be manufactured in Ontario. May I remind the house that cheese is also produced in the maritime provinces, and the quality of that cheese is second to none. For that reason, I am making my few remarks at this time.

When I came to Ottawa in 1945 cheese was being marketed by the federal Department of Agriculture under a floor price which had been established under a wartime regulation in order that Britain's requirements would be met. From 1945 until 1950 this federal control was bitterly criticized by members sitting in the Progressive Conservative group. Their arguments were, and they are still on the record, that if cheese were taken from under federal control the price would automatically increase by 10, 20, 30 or 40—there were suggestions that it would even increase in value by 50 per cent. Month after month and year after year we listened to that criticism. In other words, the cheese producers did not appreciate this assistance from the federal Department of Agriculture. Consequently, two years ago, the Ontario cheese producers took the matter entirely out of the hands of the federal government. At this point I wish to add that the Ontario government had every right under our constitution to take this action. I believe no one would question their authority. I might add also that this is not the first time action of that type has been taken by the government of Ontario.

I remember some few years ago—I believe the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Drew) at the present time was the premier of Ontario then—it was decided the federal authorities had no judgment whatever so far as marketing Canadian products in Britain was concerned. There was a lot of comment in the press at that time, and it was very interesting reading. For that reason Ontario House was set up in the city of London. The staff was recommended and placed there by the government of Ontario. According to press reports at that time it appeared as though that organization would be able to sell ice to Eskimos. I could give another illustration. Shortly after the last war when we were bringing immigrants to this country from Europe, Ontario decided that the federal plan was outdated. The only thing that province could do was to set up its own system, and that was done. I do not believe we have any reason to criticize that action. I think the province had complete authority to do it. It would appear that on many occasions the government of Ontario has decided it was much more capable of handling problems than the federal government was. Again I say that I do not believe the federal government had any authority whatever to interfere in any of those activities I have mentioned.

Since the question of cheese production and marketing in Ontario has been discussed in this chamber on several occasions, I have endeavoured to find the answer to this problem. I am always interested in the welfare of the primary producers of this country. From information I have been able to obtain, it would appear that after the government of Ontario took the matter entirely out of the hands of the federal government—and this at the request of the cheese producers of Ontario—they established a floor price of 36 cents a pound for cheese. This action was taken just previous to the last provincial election. The results of that election would certainly indicate that the cheese producers of Ontario approved of the action taken by the provincial government. It would appear that the producers were happy over the 36 cents per pound floor price.

After the election, however, it was apparently found that the 36 cents per pound floor price was impossible to maintain. After having supplied the best markets in Canada these same producers, who were so dissatisfied with the treatment the federal department accorded them, again came to the federal government requesting it to take over their surplus production. This government is regularly criticized, and is now being criticized, for sunshine budgets just previous to elections and for lemon budgets just after elections. We have heard those expressions used in this chamber. After the ballots are counted, however, and the results of a federal election are known, I would suggest that not a single case can be found where the federal government has ever gone to a provincial legislature requesting it to pull federal chestnuts out of the fire—in other words, passing the buck to the provincial legislature. It seems, however, that that does not apply when the shoe is on the other foot.

It would be most difficult and most unfair for the federal government to take over the surplus cheese in Ontario after, as I have said, the best markets have been supplied by this Ontario co-operative, and then have the federal department attempt to sell that surplus in competition with other cheese-producing provinces. The Ontario cheese producers asked the Ontario government for special legislation to set up that co-operative to deal with cheese. The co-operative had the authority to compel delivery, and also to establish prices. If previous to the provincial election the floor price was set too high, why do the federal Progressive Conservative members now endeavour to hold the federal Department of Agriculture responsible? In my opinion this is an unfair advantage to try to take in this House of Commons. Under our constitution—and, I might say also, at the request of the cheese producers of Ontario —this is purely a problem for the legislature of that province. It in no way relates to this government.

Last year the Minister of Finance increased the tax on cigarettes. At the same time he placed a special tax on stoves, refrigerators and other household appliances. After a fair trial, which was a year, he decided—in this budget which was just brought down a few days ago—to remove the amount of the increase of 1951. Why does the provincial government of the province of Ontario refuse to acknowledge their mistake with regard to cheese? The federal Conservative members endeavoured to place the full responsibility for this mistake at the door of the Department of Agriculture here in Ottawa.

In conclusion, might I say that the Ontario government has established a floor price. This same organization compels the producers of cheese to deliver their product to the provincial co-operatives. Why should the federal government try to establish another floor price which would undoubtedly be below the one set by the provincial government of Ontario? Then the federal Progressive Conservative members could stand up and say: Your federal Department of Agriculture is responsible for the reduction in the price of cheese. To my mind, that is exactly the thing they are working for at the present time. I feel that the Department of Agriculture has every right in the world to deny them that privilege. To begin with, the federal government have no legal authority to do this, and I would not approve the federal government's going into the cheese business, not only in competition with the Ontario board but also with all other Canadian producers.

This information that I have taken a few minutes to put on the record this evening is a true picture of the action taken by the cheese producers of Ontario since 1945. Those who have criticized the federal Department of Agriculture for present-day conditions in the industry are well aware of the fact that they are dealing with a matter which is purely a problem for the provincial government of the province of Ontario and not for the federal Department of Agriculture.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that this round of applause is for anyone who has the temerity to speak after ten o'clock. I trust by next week this house will have recovered the sanity which it showed during last session and will arrange to adjourn at this time so that no one else will be subjected to that ordeal.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Hear, hear.

Mr. Nowlan: I speak particularly to the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) who now so sympathetically and loudly says "hear, hear".

Mr. Weir: Will you reduce your speeches to thirty minutes?

Mr. Nowlan: I will on this occasion, at any rate. However, Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this matter of the budget, I first should like to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on the, as some others have said, admirable footwork which he displayed in delivering his address. Certainly it was a physical task of considerable dimension, as we all realize. I think he spoke for almost two hours in a way which held the interest of the house and reflected credit on himself at least in so far as the manner of his delivery was concerned. While I am speaking on manner of delivery, may I say that I think perhaps an encomium of praise should be passed out to the parliamentary assistant who spoke later on in the debate and who formerly on some occasions, like Don Quixote tilting at windmills, aimed his lance at every person who stuck his head up beyond the desk in this house and struck at him at least loudly and violently, if not always wisely. On this occasion he showed discretion, discrimination and a statesmanlike approach which suggested to me that he felt that possibly the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) had developed such talents as a financial critic that his position as financial assistant was in jeopardy and that in the case of the retirement of the present minister, possibly the hon. member for Springfield would be made minister of finance, rather than the parliamentary assistant. I think that consideration is undoubtedly responsible for that temperate display which we witnessed here the day before yesterday.

I am, of course, not going to refer to all of the happy allusions and appellations which have been used, from "Abbott's rabbit" to a score of others, or to what some have called a Hallowe'en budget. But certainly when the minister referred to this illusory reduction of income tax, I remembered that ditty which some of us heard many years ago:

> Last night I met upon the stair
> A little man who wasn't there.
> He wasn't there again today.
> My, how I wish he'd go away!

I am sure the reduction of 6 per cent which was presaged in the early part of the speech was something like this illusory man of which we have heard.

There is certainly no question that this country is suffering from a tremendous load of taxation. I am not going into the merits of that matter tonight, except to reiterate what was pointed out by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) the other day, namely, that the reductions which were made and for which the minister took credit, were reductions of taxes which had been protested a year ago by the financial critic of the opposition, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), the hon. member for Eglinton and all others on this side of the house. It is true that certain reductions have been made, but those were reductions in taxes which never should have been imposed in the first place.

When one today sees someone attempting to take credit for having reduced these taxes, shall we say, on electrical appliances, one must also think of those unfortunate young people who perhaps during this year have married, established homes for themselves, have bought those appliances with those additional taxes imposed on them, and who now find that through a vagary or a whim of the Minister of Finance, someone else who has established a home this year fortunately will be able to replace them or buy them without paying the same taxes. Certainly there has been placed on some of those people a burden which I do not think they will forget too soon.

Not only is this tax burden a heavy one which, as the hon. member for Greenwood pointed out the other day, amounts to $1,715 or more than that on the head of every family in Canada, in federal taxes alone. That is a substantial burden. People talk about this country being prosperous today. They talk about the bank deposits. I am sure that some of these bank deposits will increase on the 30th of this month when some of us have to go to the bank and borrow money with which to pay our income taxes. In the return for that month you will perhaps find a substantial increase in the bank deposits, but I think that most of us will find that it is an exceedingly illusory one indeed.

I want to speak for a moment about the way in which this tax is applied, with regard to the primary producers, the farmers and the fishermen who, as all those conversant with the act realize, have the so-called right to average their taxation over a period of years. I am not going into the technical provisions of that act, Mr. Speaker; but as most hon. members perhaps know, there were two prerequisites. First, you have to file your return on time every year; and that is certainly a proper one. Second, you must afterwards make application. You must apply for the right to average. I am suggesting this. If the farmer or fisherman is entitled to average if he files his return properly, why should he be debarred from taking advantage of that right merely because of his technical default in making application before the 30th day of April in any particular year? What it means is this. The primary producer—the farmer or the fisherman—who has a large income or who possibly has had in other years, and has to hire an accountant or someone with business experience to make out his return for him, is advised of that provision. He makes his application, and thereby can save a substantial amount of money over the years in payment of his income tax. But someone else who does not know of that provision, a smaller farmer or fisherman, who is not in the financial position to employ auditors, perhaps does not know about that. In this way he is debarred. And even those who do know about it sometimes suffer inadvertently.

I can think of one primary producer who employed an auditor to make out his income tax return. This auditor had done so for years. He had an application for averaging. But apparently, on the night of April 30, he forgot to mail it, and did not mail it until the first of May. As a result of that, this farmer suffered an increased tax of over $1,800. That was the result because of this default on the part of a person, one who possibly is responsible in damages in a civil action, if it were instituted. Nevertheless it was not the fault of the producer.

I am suggesting that the act should be amended so that those primary producers should have, as of right, the opportunity to average without having to go through the technical process of making application therefor.

And in that connection I wish to make one reference to the practice in connection with these income tax returns of primary producers on a net worth statement. The farmer will file an income tax return honestly and properly, but the department may raise some objection, or may feel that the returns have not been properly prepared. They investigate that man's affairs, they prepare a statement of net worth, and the farmer is assessed on the amount they state. He faces a situation—and this could apply to a fisherman—where he must either pay on the statement of net worth, or lodge an appeal. Usually the amounts involved are such, and the distances from courts are such, that the persons affected just cannot appeal.

I must say that although I believe most of the officials in the department are fair and reasonable, I doubt if they all are. And in some cases I think they have been most unreasonable. Let us consider for a moment the situation of a farmer in my own constituency, where their apple trees were removed and where, because of the loss of the British market, the returns from the orchards have tremendously depreciated. Yet, in a net worth statement those orchards are carried at exactly the same value as they were in 1944 or 1945, the original year when they started the net worth provision.

They refuse to reduce those values. And if a farmer has received money in respect of trees pulled out, those capital sums are included in income, so that the poor farmer loses in both ways. His farm is maintained at the same artificial value, although he has no trees, because the trees were removed. And then the money he got for the trees is included in income. There is a situation such as that in connection with this net worth statement. I suggest the department should make careful investigation, and that certainly some change should be made.

Now, departing from that phase of the matter, and returning to the budget, as such: The parliamentary assistant the other day, closing his remarks, referred with not unbecoming modesty to the wonderful position in which this country finds itself, and he asked if there was anyone anywhere who could boast of living under happier circumstances than the people of this country.

Well, I wonder if that applies to the farmers of Canada today. I wonder if those who, shall I say, are growing beef in this country, with their market in the United States lost to them, are facing the situation with that high degree of equanimity and satisfaction to which the parliamentary assistant refers. I wonder if those who are in the poultry business are in that happy frame of mind.

Only the other day I talked to a farmer who, to a rather considerable extent, has been engaged in poultry raising. In other words, he was operating a one-man poultry farm. He told me he formerly employed help to the extent of two or three people, and informed me further that, by discharging his help and doing all the work himself, at the present price of eggs he could pay himself about $2 a day wages. But he told me that if the price of eggs dropped another cent he would not be able to pay himself even that much. I do not think he would join in this paean of praise in which the parliamentary assistant indulged the other day.

And would those who are engaged in the dairy industry? Do they feel about it that way? Certainly the apple producers in the east and in the west who are facing loss of market, and a chaotic situation generally, are not too happy about it. They are not too pleased with the situation in Canada today.

I am sure there are many others employed in various lines of industry who would not share his views. For instance, let us consider the textile industry. I do not think they would say Amen to all that was said the other day by the parliamentary assistant. The same would be true in eastern Canada in respect of almost every category of employment.

It is all right to talk about figures. There is no doubt that the figures supplied by the dominion bureau of statistics show increases in bank deposits, in savings and in wages. That is all very fine. The figures are there, and no one questions that on an average they represent a satisfactory situation in many places. But neither could there be any question that, in respect of the citizen in the white-collar class, or the man on a pension, or the teacher, or the clerk—indeed, the great army of people who have no unions representing them, and who perhaps have no spokesmen speaking on their behalf—it would be true to say that they are being crushed today by the burden of taxation, a burden which for them has become almost unbearable.

They do not find the situation as happy as one might think. And speaking of the dairy farmer, may I refer again to a matter which may be only of local interest, although I think it has wider implications. All hon. members know what happened last year in the United States when the American congress added a rider to an appropriation bill placing an embargo on the importation of cheese.

We do know that our government has moved very softly in the matter—and I think properly so—in the hope that an adjustment will be made. And possibly it will be made. Certainly in so far as the executive branch of government in that country is concerned, there can be no question but that there is a wish to rectify the situation. But sooner or later, Mr. Speaker, our government may have to take positive action. And if that time comes, the only thing that will be understood will be action by way of severe reprisal. We have to show that we, too, can take certain definite action. And if that time comes, then I suggest to the parliamentary assistant one field, although perhaps a limited one, where action could be taken to rectify the injustice from which we are suffering today, and which would highlight the fact that we will not always rest patiently until the American congress rectifies situations that may develop.

And, in passing, I need not emphasize the fact that this simply highlights the danger which has always confronted us, that with our unbalanced trade position today, and our dependence upon the American market, what was done in respect of cheese last year may be done in connection with other products next year. I shall develop that to somewhat greater length in a moment. There is an absolute and direct responsibility upon this government to do something to rectify that situation, so that we will improve the balance of trade between the two countries.

I was about to make reference to one little industry involving only a few hundred people —and I know the minister from Nova Scotia will be conversant with the situation. It is one of tremendous importance to the people affected. We had developed during the war years in Nova Scotia—and I know there are other branches of the industry in other parts of Canada—a cranberry industry which was of great importance to a substantial segment of the population of my constituency. Overnight this government—whether it was wise or not is not for me to say—removed the restrictions in connection with the importation of American cranberries. I have suggested to the departmental officials, and I believe what I have said could be substantiated, that the product has been dumped in this country. But even if the anti-dumping provisions on our statute books were brought into effect, they would not give us the protection we need. I am suggesting to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance and to others who will be responsible for administration that if this injustice, this violation of every treaty and every agreement respecting the importation of cheese which occurred last year is continued and if reprisals have to be brought in there is a small but direct way in which this injustice to our own people can be rectified. The lesson can be hammered home to the producers of that product in the United States who are very sensitive to the necessity of maintaining markets and I think a real injustice could be rectified and something done which would be of benefit to our own producers. I hope some action will be taken along that line in the near future.
