Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to bring to the minister's attention a matter which I think affects a great number of taxpayers in Canada, the exact number of which can perhaps only be estimated because a question which I placed on the order paper was answered last week by the Minister of National Revenue who said that the government was not in position to give the exact number. I refer to Canadian citizens who operate self-contained domestic establishments but who under the present rule are not able to claim married status. I refer to those who are widows, widowers or who may be unmarried and who operate self-contained domestic establishments and are faced in many instances with expenses as great as or greater than those incurred by taxpayers having a married status. Many cases of inequality and hardship have come to my own attention.

I have in mind a neighbour, and perhaps I may be pardoned for bringing forward this personal example although I think the examples you know best are the ones you should bring forward. This man lost his wife some four or five years ago. He has a family and he tells me that he has not been able to claim married status. I am not sure how old the children are.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. ABBOTT: If they are under eighteen he can.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have watched them grow up and they still seem quite young to me, although I am sure they are over that age. In any event since his wife died his household expenses have been materially higher. I think his case could be multiplied all across Canada. I submit the minister ought to give some consideration to making a distinction in the administration of the act with respect to this class of taxpayer. There ought to be some distinction in the taxing field to take care of people who maintain self-contained domestic establishments. If there is some close relative who is being supported by the taxpayer he can claim married status and be allowed accordingly, but that leaves out I fancy scores of thousands of deserving taxpayers who have had to carry an undue burden of the load of the country's taxes when their expenses are higher than those of persons who, when they file income tax returns, are entitled to claim married status.

I have been asked about this by many people and I should like to have some clarification from the minister as to just why this regulation stands as it does and what reasons there are for not making a change to relieve this deserving and worthy section of our people from the unjust burden which they are now carrying. I should like the minister to indicate whether or not government policy will be changed to meet the wishes of these people on the grounds of equity and justice.

Mr. ABBOTT: As my hon. friend will recall, this question has come up before on a number of occasions. I remember discussing it pretty extensively two years ago when the budget resolutions of that year were before the committee. If members of the committee would care to look at Hansard of that time they will see that I gave elaborate reasons for the present provisions of the law which have not been changed for some time. Briefly, the reasons are these: an allowance is given to married persons, and that relief is extended to certain other persons, widows or widowers or those who support dependents in a self-contained establishment. It was felt that under the circumstances there is an analogy between such persons and a married man who is maintaining a home and bringing up his children. The special consideration given to married persons is given to persons who support minor children related to them or other dependent persons in a self-contained domestic establishment. It was never the intention of this act or of any income tax act that I know of to extend to bachelors or to widows or widowers as such a special tax concession in order to enable them to live in a self-contained domestic establishment. Once they cease to have what I would describe as married status, that is, either actual married status where a husband and wife are living together, or constructive married status where he is maintaining persons who are directly dependent upon him for support, once they adopt a mode of life in which in my opinion is the same as that of any other unmarried man or woman they cease to have that special status. I do not think it could be justified under our taxing system to grant the special concession to a widow or widower which is granted to the person possessing married status. A line must be drawn somewhere, and I think as a result of long consideration and discussion the line which is drawn in the present act is a pretty fair one.

Mr. DIONNE (Beauce): I do not want to repeat the speeches which have been made, but I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier):

That the ways and means resolutions of June 27, 1946, respecting the Income War Tax Act be amended as follows:

1. That wherever in the resolutions the figures "1947" appear and relate to a reduction in taxation the figures "1946" be substituted therefor;

2. That in paragraph (a) of section 2 of the said resolutions respecting the Income War Tax Act the figures "$3,000" and "$1,500" be substituted for the present figures of "$1,500" and "$750";

3. That in compensation for the loss of revenue following the adoption of the preceding amendments a sales tax of ten per cent be imposed on retail sales of all merchandise at present taxed eight per cent on the wholesale price.

Mr. JACKMAN: Did the hon. member vote for the budget?

Mr. ABBOTT: The amendment which has been moved is clearly out of order, because it is an amendment to a resolution which precedes the introduction of a money bill. I understand it was pointed out quite clearly the other day by the Minister of Justice that such a bill can be amended only by a resolution which has been submitted to His Excellency and has received his approval. I therefore ask you, Mr. Chairman, so to rule.

Mr. JACKMAN: May I ask the hon. gentleman who moved the amendment if he and his seconder voted for the budget resolution?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The list of those who voted is printed in Hansard.

Mr. JACKMAN: Will it be taken for granted that he and his seconder voted for the resolutions?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Nothing will be taken for granted which does not appear in Hansard.

Mr. ABBOTT: The motion on the vote was that we go into committee to consider certain resolutions. That was all the vote involved.

The CHAIRMAN: The motion made by the hon. member for Beauce is beyond the jurisdiction of this committee, since it will increase the taxation of certain persons, and therefore I cannot put it to the committee. If it is to be considered by the committee, it must be moved by a minister of the crown.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. McMASTER: The hon. member for Eglinton, spoke of those who did not wish to take the family allowance but preferred to leave things the way they were and claim exemption. My objection has to do with another point. I pointed out last year that one department of government sends out the family allowance cheques while another does the collecting, the Minister of Finance being somewhere in between and bearing the burden of all departments. This is the condition of things as I see it. I do not see how the minister can say that a greater amount of work will be placed on the employer by his not being allowed to deduct for each married person. The employer must have a list of all his employees, and among them will be single men who are not affected by family allowances, married men who are not so affected, and other married men with children. It is necessary for the employer to ascertain before he makes deductions, which of his employees desire deductions to be made. I do not see any force in the minister's argument in that regard, but I do see this difficulty. Where an employee's wife receives a cheque for family allowance in the first part of the month, the employer deducts from the man's wages shortly thereafter, and the point which the member for Eglinton made as to those not in employment is an important one. Take the man on commission. His wife gets a cheque every month, and at the end of the year he not only has to make up the balance of the cheques but also to repay, if he makes more than $3,500, as a great many of them do, the full amount of family allowances his wife has received. It may be a heavy burden on him at that time. I do not suppose anyone likes to pay income tax, and I suggest that the government will lose a considerable sum by the method it is adopting in respect to those who do not have deductions made from their salaries but have to pay back the money at the end of the year.

Mr. QUELCH: I have no doubt the minister realizes that members on all sides of the house are disappointed that the government has not seen fit to increase the exemptions granted people in the low income brackets for 1946, and are dissatisfied with the amount of increase for 1947.

The Minister of Finance, when he spoke on the question, realized I think that the government's proposals would not meet with the approval of the people of Canada, because he went to some length to try to justify the government's actions in this regard. I should like to quote what he had to say as reported at page 2914 of Hansard:

> I am aware of suggestions, made by persons who may not be familiar with all the facts, that the exemption limits be raised to $1,000 for single persons and $2,000 for married, or even to $1,200 and $2,400. We have carefully examined these and other suggestions and have come to the conclusion that exemptions of $750 and $1,500 are as high as can be reasonably proposed under present circumstances.
> In the first place, we must still raise very large amounts of revenue. Even if no tax reductions were made, our revenues will fall considerably short of our expenditures and far short of our total financial requirements for the current year. Moreover, as I have outlined, there is already a great excess of purchasing power and we must not add unnecessarily to it.
> Secondly, we are all, I believe, agreed that the income tax is the fairest and best tax on which to rely for the bulk of our revenue. More than any other, it takes ability to pay properly into account. We must, I consider, rely upon it as heavily as we can, subject to the limits imposed by its effects on incentive and efficiency. This applies as well in the lower brackets as in the higher. We cannot secure proper equity and fair treatment if the exemptions from income tax are so high as to exclude most of those receiving incomes.

There are three points which I wish to deal with in this regard. The minister says, first, that we would not be justified in exempting this class from taxation; second, that we could not expand demand at this time owing to the shortage of goods; and third, that to increase exemptions, as proposed by various organizations, would bring about a serious loss of revenue.

Dealing with the first of these points, I would remind the government that during the war when they were continually asking the people to make great sacrifices and to accept the burdens of total war, they held before the people the hope that after the war the government would introduce a new social order. As a matter of fact they went beyond that, because the Prime Minister said that unless this new social order was well on the way before the end of the war we might look for it in vain. Several times during the war we in this group reminded the government that similar statements had been made repeatedly during the war of 1914-19. The government spokesman assured us, however, that the situation to-day was entirely different, that we could not compare conditions in this war with conditions in the last one, because we had now expanded production to the point where we could give everyone a decent standard of living.

I think the people are beginning to realize that the new social order is drifting further and further away instead of coming nearer. We must realize that we cannot hope to attain that order by following in the ruts of the past. If we are to attain it we shall have to blaze a new trail or we shall become bogged down as we were between the two wars.

The Minister of Finance, when he spoke, compared our exemptions with those given by other countries, and I admit that the comparison was quite favourable. But I think he overlooks one important point. The people of this country are not interested in what exemptions are allowed in other countries; they are interested only in what exemptions can be given here. Therefore the first important point for us to consider is whether or not these exemptions can at this time be raised higher than they are; and the second point is, would such a policy benefit not merely the people who are exempted from taxation but the people of Canada as a whole.

I do not think there is any doubt that the answer to both questions must be in the affirmative. First of all, in considering the question it is well to remember that we in Canada are blest with more resources per capita than the people of the great majority of other countries. We have an income of around $11 billion, which means an average of $3,000 for a family of four. The first step to be taken in any new social order should be, therefore, to raise the standard of living of people in the low income group. We should attempt to establish a minimum standard of $1,200 for single persons and $2,000 for married people.

To come back to the question, would exempting these low income groups benefit Canada as a whole, the minister will agree that the most important problem before us at the present time is to expand production as rapidly as possible, especially the production of consumer goods so that we may have at all times a brimming pool of consumer goods from which the people may draw. I would say that one of the logical ways to help maintain production would be to maintain a contented people. The minister will agree that the high rates of taxation to-day are causing wide discontent among the workers of the country. One of the best ways to prove to them that we are really sincere in this matter is to bring about a substantial reduction of taxation to the people in the low income groups, thereby ensuring that they will be able to have a better standard of living in the future.

The next point of the minister was that we must not expand demand at this time because we already have a large volume of purchasing power in circulation. While it is true there is no actual lack of demand on balance to-day, largely owing to the fact that we have an accumulation of war savings and that large benefits are being paid out to the men of the armed services, nevertheless we must not forget that there are in Canada to-day many people in the low income groups who have no savings. I am well aware of the fact that some people will say that they should have. They charge that had these people saved during the war they would now have savings. But let us not forget that before the war many in this group were unemployed and probably on the relief rolls, thereby enduring a standard of living far below that which anybody should be asked to exist on; they were persons who had to do without things which most of us would consider to be absolutely essential. Within a year or two after the war started these people were able to jet a job, but even after they obtained jobs there were so many things they required that they were not in a position to save much; and just about the time that they might have been able to save something the government brought about the heavy increase in taxation in 1942. Therefore they were not in a position to accumulate savings.

However, if the minister is going to argue that to increase exemptions at this time to $1,200 for single persons and $2,000 for married people will be inflationary, then I would remind him of what the leader of this group the hon. member for Peace River, suggested when he spoke. He suggested that we should give to such persons tax bonds in return for the money obtained from them; in other words, that we should adopt a policy of deferred tax remissions for those in the low income groups. On several occasions during the war I emphasized the need for compulsory savings. I pointed out that we were accumulating a large amount of debt claims. I know that during the war people sought to soft pedal the idea that the national debt would do the country any harm. As a matter of fact many said that in reality a national debt was a national asset, because everybody who had a share in it would be receiving interest, and therefore so long as the debt was owned internally there was nothing to be concerned about. That would have been true if the national debt had been distributed equitably amongst the people so that all the people would have had a claim against the debt or asset if you like to call it that. But unfortunately during the war the method of financing did not help to bring about an equitable distribution of the debt. I should like to remind the minister that during the war loan campaigns we generally found that approximately one-third of one per cent of the subscribers purchased sixty per cent of the total subscriptions, thereby bringing about an inequitable distribution. However, if at that time our proposals had been accepted whereby persons in the low income groups would have not paid any taxes but merely accumulated compulsory savings, then they too would have had a claim against those accumulated debt claims. Then at the end of the war, just as soon as production had increased to the point where it could take care of the demands of the people, the compulsory savings could have been paid back to them, and in that way those in the low income groups would have been able to share in the benefits of expanded production at the end of the war.

Such a policy of deferred tax remissions or tax bonds instead of taxation would have been a partial insurance against a depression in the future. In that regard I should like to quote from a speech made on October 7, 1942, at Montebello, by the deputy minister of finance, Doctor Clark, which reads as follows:

> The same philosophy which has led to these very high taxes in war time is likely to dictate a reversal of that policy in the post-war years. To-day, demand is far in excess of supply. Consumer purchasing power is far in excess of the available supply of consumer goods and services. The taxing authorities therefore must, through high taxes, syphon off as much as possible of that surplus purchasing power if we are to avoid all the evils of inflation. On the other hand the post-war period is likely to pose an entirely different set of conditions. If we may judge by the record of the past, we are likely to see, after a temporary period of dislocation and hesitation followed possibly by a consumer goods purchasing boom, a period during which unless the state acts aggressively and intelligently to prevent it, supply or potential supply may tend to be far in excess of effective demand.

What will then be needed is to safeguard against deflation, not to prevent inflation. If we are to avoid a long depression and mass unemployment, the policy required will be one of stimulation of the economy, one that will create expansionist tendencies, one that will provide incentives to expansion of production, one that will encourage the consumer to spend and expand his purchasing power. In short, one which will keep the national income from falling to abnormally low levels.

In his report of 1946, the governor of the Bank of Canada emphasized exactly the same point and said that in a few years our major problem will be to maintain an effective demand against the production of the country. Therefore, as I say, one method of helping to insure against lack of effective demand in the future will be to build up a reserve of purchasing power in the hands of those who are in the low income groups. Building up large reserves of purchasing power in the hands of those who are already well-off will not be any guarantee against lack of effective demand, because these people are already spending the money to buy the goods they require. On the other hand, those in the low income groups will not be in a position to spend unless they have a reserve of purchasing power. Such a reserve of purchasing power can be built up by the remission of taxes to the people.

The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply has suggested that a shelf of national projects should be built up to take care of the situation. I will agree that in part it may help to meet the situation. Building up a reserve of purchasing power by remission of taxes would also help to take care of a depression.

At this time I should like to emphasize the fact that, in the final analysis, in order to guarantee that this country may run on an even course without depression we shall finally have to come to the proposals which this group has made from time to time; that we shall guarantee to the people a minimum standard of living up to the full capacity of the country to supply by the payment of consumer credits directly to the consumer.

Once or twice the minister has twitted us on the point that during the war he has not heard much about social credit. Of course the reason is obvious. The purpose of social credit is to distribute surpluses. In war time, owing to the demands of war there are no surpluses to distribute, but from now on I can assure the committee that it will be hearing more and more on this point, because as our problems increase social credit is the only solution.

The last objection of the minister to raising exemptions was that it would cause a loss of revenue to the government. In that regard I should like to quote the minister's own words, to be found at page 3589 of Hansard:

So we are brought back to this, whether we like it or not and whether or not it is popular; we are brought back to the necessity of equating revenue and expenditures when we have high employment and a high national income.

Earlier he had said:

This question was raised by the financial critic of the opposition in the opening speech, when he asked: "Do we or do we not believe in deficit budgeting?" Well, Mr. Speaker, I must say I cannot see how a responsible government or a responsible minister of finance could possibly advocate a system of continued deficits in the Dominion of Canada, that is, deficits year after year, year after year.

First, I might refer to a speech made by the chairman of the advisory committee on reconstruction, in 1943, which appears at page 29 of the proceedings of the senate committee on economic reestablishment and social security. He was speaking of the need for national projects after the war, and it is interesting to note what he has to say on this question raised by the minister, in regard to lack of revenue:

I wanted to add one further point there, namely, that the recognition of that policy of public investment as a marginal factor to take up the slack of private investment at any period implies the necessity of a complete change in our budget philosophy. We should still have an annual budget for probable revenues and expenditures; but so far as public investment expenditures are concerned for the construction of all kinds of projects, it would obviously be necessary to have a budget which extends over a period of years. Mr. Churchill two Sundays ago suggested four years as the period for a plan. That may be perfectly right, politically thinking, but economically I prefer a period of seven or ten years. It may also be true—I mention this because somebody may think of it—that the adoption of that policy will mean a slight but continuous increase in the total public debt of Canada over the next hundred years.

In other words he suggested we would require to have unbalanced budgets for the next hundred years. My only observation in that connection is, why stop there; why not admit that you are bound to go into debt year after year, as long as you continue under the present system? You have only to look to the past to see that since confederation we have had only fifteen balanced budgets, in a period of seventy-eight years, and to realize that we shall probably be doing the same thing in future. If we could not have balanced budgets when the national debt was only two or three billion dollars, is it likely that we shall have balanced budgets when the debt has increased to around sixteen billion dollars? No. My point is that even in the years when we had a balanced federal budget the public debt increased. For instance, from 1924 to 1929 we had balanced budgets, and the national debt decreased by $250,000,000. But the debt of the provinces increased by over $500,000,000, so that even in that period the public debt increased by over $250,000,000. Really what we did was this. By this government forcing the provinces to accept responsibility for certain payments it balanced its own budget but forced the provinces into debt. If it is a question as between the provinces or the dominion going into debt, I should say it would be far better for the dominion to do so because it has access to certain types of funds which are not available to the provinces; or, as we say, it can use national money and avoid going into debt in any shape or form.

The interesting point in the minister's speech was his statement that we must attempt to have a balanced budget. Just to show how much faith we can have in that proposal, I would suggest to the committee that we read what he said in September, 1939, in regard to the financing of the war, and see how far short he fell in carrying out that policy. Then have we any reason to believe he will be able to fulfil his promise in that regard in future? This is what he said in the budget speech of September 12, 1939, at page 140 of Hansard:

> All this is not to say that a small and carefully regulated amount of credit expansion may not be desirable in the early stages of the war in order to assist the increase of production and employment . . . However, as soon as the expansion of employment and production gets well under way and certainly before it approaches its limits, further expansion of the supply of money and credit must be stopped if the danger of progressive inflation is to be avoided.

When did the minister follow that policy? Just as soon as we had reached the position of full employment and high production, the minister said there should be no further credit expansion. In 1943, 1944 and 1945 we had a high level of employment and a high income; yet in each of those years we had an expansion of credit to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars. The reason is, of course, obvious, and I shall deal with that later on. In spite of the heavy taxation and large borrowings from the people, the government still lacked funds to meet its expenditures. In the last year of the war, 1945, the deficit was around one and three-quarter billion. How did we make up those deficits? Partly, as I say, by borrowing the savings of the people, and partly by the creation of new money. We borrowed from the chartered banks something in the neighbourhood of $3,000 million in new money. Why was that done? The minister knows the reason. We borrowed that money from the banks in order to maintain a maximum war effort. The Prime Minister promised the people time and again that no financial restrictions would be allowed to impede the war effort. If the people had been familiar with the social credit proposals they would have seen that even in war time it would be necessary to have the creation of money. I say the reason is obvious. We have emphasized the fact that owing to certain practices which are inherent within the system, industry can not maintain an effective demand against its own production; that is to say, it does not distribute sufficient purchasing power to maintain a demand against the goods it produces. That is in peace time. Then in war time the government became the greatest purchaser of goods and material in the country; and in spite of the fact that they taxed the people just as far as they dared tax them, in spite of the fact that they borrowed all the savings of the people that they dared borrow, still they were not able to get enough money to buy the goods and services they required. Therefore, in order to make up that deficiency in their purchasing power, they had to create in the neighbourhood of $3,000 million during the war.

One of the main purposes of taxation during the war was to curtail spending, because fifty per cent of our production was going for war purposes. To-day the war is over and the total production of the country is once more available to the people. Therefore, as Doctor Clark suggests, in the very near future we shall have to bring about a considerable reduction in taxation in order to maintain an effective demand against our production. In his book entitled "The World Crisis," Mr. Churchill warned of the aftermath of the war. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario began to quote it the other day but did not read the full paragraph, and I should like to put the whole statement on record. Referring to armistice day, November 11, 1918, which concluded the first war, Mr. Churchill said:

> A requisition for half a million houses would not have seemed more difficult to comply with than those we were already in process of executing for 100,000 aeroplanes, or 20,000 guns, or two million tons of projectiles. But a new set of conditions began to rule from 11 o'clock onward. The money cost, which had never been considered by us to be a factor capable of limiting the supply of the armies, asserted a claim to priority from the moment the fighting stopped.

It is sometimes surprising the way history seems to repeat itself. During the discussion on the health estimates the Minister of National Health and Welfare began the same old story all over again. When we were discussing old age pensions, advocating a pension of $50 a month at the age of sixty, the Minister of National Health and Welfare told us it would be impossible to do this because it would cost too much money and that the government did not have the money. When an hon. member from this group suggested that national money could be used, the minister once again returned to the old story about turning the printing presses loose. I am surprised that the minister should insult the intelligence of hon. members by such an asinine remark, because, as I have said, during the war when we wanted to expand the war effort of the country we did not hesitate to create $3 billion in new money for that purpose. When we created that $3 billion of new money, did we turn the printing presses loose? The government knows very well we did not. It is true that there was an increase in the amount of dominion notes. We increased them to the extent necessary to satisfy the requirements of the people in that regard. That was only a small percentage of the total amount of money issued. During the war did we ever hear the Minister of Finance say that we could not have tanks, ships or aeroplanes because no money was available? One thing and one thing only was taken into consideration in connection with the war effort, and that was: What are our material resources? So long as we had the men and materials available there was no suggestion that we could not have ships, tanks and aeroplanes because we had not the money to pay for them.

To the extent that a fair and equitable system of taxation fails to meet government expenditures, national money must be created. Otherwise we are bound to have an expanding debt, as was suggested by Doctor James, chairman of the reconstruction committee advising the government. In the past we have urged that national money should be used by the government to make up the deficiency in revenue. In the past it was argued by the Minister of Finance that national money would be more inflationary than money issued by the chartered banks. I do not think the Minister of Finance would argue that to-day, because I know the officials of the Bank of Canada will not argue it. They take the stand that they are thoroughly capable of controlling the actions of the chartered banks, even though national money is issued.

Mr. ABBOTT: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, because I always listen with keen interest to his remarks. I must point out however that he has strayed a long way from resolution No. 2. He began in perfect order, but he has now launched forth into a subject which is foreign to the resolution.

Mr. QUELCH: Speaking to the point of order, may I say that the Minister of Finance attacked the proposal to raise exemptions on low incomes to $1,200 and $2,000 on the ground that it would result in a lack of revenue to the government, and that the government would not have money to finance its operations. I am showing a way in which it can be financed.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is doing it most ingeniously, then, because I think he is still out of order.

Mr. QUELCH: I shall conclude my remarks by summarizing what I have already said. The greatest need to-day is an expansion of production to meet demands. One of the greatest obstacles to such expansion is the high taxation of low incomes, because it causes discontent among the workers. As pointed out by Doctor Clark and the governor of the Bank of Canada, one of the greatest dangers in a few years will be the lack of demand for goods produced. Therefore we urge that in order to restrict demand now and to provide for a reserve of purchasing power later, tax bonds should be issued to people in low income brackets, instead of imposing taxation upon them. Then, to offset loss of revenue, national money should be used. There would be no danger of inflation, because money would be issued only to balance demand with supply. Therefore we in this group urge that the exemptions for single persons be raised to $1,200 and for married persons to $2,000.

Mr. GOURD (Chapleau) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I intend to speak on taxation and on the gold mines of my constituency, in order to inform the government, in a spirit of co-operation, of the views of my constituents.

As everyone knows, the mines of Northwestern Quebec, more than anywhere else in the country, have been adversely affected by the decision to establish the parity of the Canadian dollar with the American dollar. Our mines have thereby lost a 10 per cent. premium and the price of gold fell from $38.50 to $35 per ounce. I have heard the opposition voice destructive criticism, inasmuch as they were attacking the masterpiece of the present government, its fight against inflation which has been successful up to now. In view of the tremendous increase in prices of goods in other countries, and even in the United States, it is not necessary to expound lengthy theories to show the efficient administration and the foresight of our ministers, and especially the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley).

Mr. Chairman, the people benefit by the maintenance of prices at a low level and, as usual, our government has taken steps in order to protect the people, over the protests of certain financial interests.

I wish therefore, on behalf of my electors, to congratulate the ministers for the fight waged against inflation during the war and during the difficult post-war period. The decision arrived at in regard to the parity of the Canadian dollar seems excellent, inasmuch as it is part of a series of measures necessary to control inflation. However, I deem it my duty to acquaint the government with certain disastrous results of this decision, in order to suggest new remedial measures not with a view to eliminate what has already been done but to supplement it.

The decision in regard to the parity of the dollar has affected the gold mines of northwestern Quebec especially in two different ways:

First, if gold sells for only $35 per ounce, those mines operating on a small margin of profit, and especially those having low grade ore, will show a deficit, and will have to close down, particularly now that the prices of materials have increased and that they are facing demands for higher wages on the part of their employees. Other mines that may continue their operations will be forced to leave underground a large quantity of gold which they cannot mine profitably with gold selling for $35 per ounce but which they could extract when the price was $38.50 per ounce. Mr. Chairman, I wish to draw the attention of the government to the enormous loss of gold which will result.

Second, it has taken away the confidence of the public in our gold mines. The stock market went down to a point which we had not known for several years. Unless some countermeasure is taken immediately to remedy the situation, mines in the stage of promotion will be abandoned. I must draw the government's attention to the fact that all gold or base metal mines now in operation had to be promoted and without the help of the public who, in the early stages, had the courage and far sightedness to take risks inherent in all mining venture, Canada would now be a small country deprived of its mining industry, which is essential to its economy. If we force companies in promotion out of business, we shall deprive Canada of its future mining industry.

We must therefore ensure a reasonable profit to producers whose working expenses are out of proportion with the value of their production, and to mines being promoted so that they may one day operate. In addition, in ensuring the development of this industry, we must help prospectors in finding purchasers for those mine fields because, according to Mr. Dumulon, Chairman of the North Western Quebec Prospectors Association, they have been badly hit by the decision regarding the parity of the dollar.

I wish to insist on the fact that no commercial enterprise has any chance of success unless the profits are proportioned to the risks taken by the investors. There are exceptionally great risks in the mining industry and they must therefore be balanced by exceptionally large profits for those few who have the chance of succeeding. I wish to mention the report of the Senate's Natural Resources Committee where it is stated that, in the Province of Ontario, only one half of one per cent of all mining enterprises are successful. I also wish to refer to the statistics submitted to the said committee by the Western Quebec Mining Association, showing that the income on the average investments in mines, when the mining enterprise is successful, is not more profitable than investments in government securities at 3 per cent.

I shall give a brief summary of the importance of the mining industry—I shall however quote only statistics for the year 1941, as they are more complete.

Production in Canada	$866,293,000
Production in the province of Quebec	255,269,000
Salaries paid by mines in Canada	176,700,000
Salaries paid by mines in Quebec	29,600,000
Total amount of main taxes paid by metallic mines in Quebec....	8,601,809
Population of the mining counties of Témiscamingue and Abitibi..	108,101

Farms occupied in the county of Abitibi, 7,357; which shows an increase over 1931 of 204·9 per cent.

Moreover, Mr. A. O. Dufresne, deputy minister of mines for the province of Quebec, has issued some statistics on the gold, copper, silver and lead mines of Quebec, practically all of which are in my northwestern Quebec area:

Value of products.....	$59,581,000
Cost of fuel used	8,767,000
Cost of electric power used.....	2,097,000
Cost of goods supplied to mines....	6,158,000
Cost of lumber used in mines, and for building purposes by mines..	528,000

If nothing is done, here is briefly stated what will happen: the development of the mining industry will come to an almost complete standstill; the future of northwestern

Quebec and its important contribution to this country's economy will be annihilated, and within six months many localities in that district, which are now so busy, active and hopeful, will become ghost towns; Canada will lose right now and especially for the years to come an important gold and base metals production; the greater part of the employment resulting from the development of the mining industry will disappear; farmers, manufacturers and merchants will lose the important market afforded by a prosperous mining industry; the government will lose enormous sums in taxes; the stability of Canada from the standpoint of its trade and its monetary relations will be affected, and instead of being a help in inflation control, that decrease in the production of the mining industry itself and of the industries that depend on it, and the resulting halt in the economic development will have the opposite effect.

Moreover, if ever the world price of gold decreases, Canada will have lost forever the opportunity to transform into salaries and other national wealth the gold ore that is now useless and unproductive.

May I quote again from the report of the Senate committee:

(Text):

Lack of understanding of the position and economic value of the gold mining industry in Canada would appear to be a major cause of the present situation of this industry.

(Translation):

I have had numerous interviews with my constituents; I have attended a large number of meetings of public bodies of all kinds and, moreover, I have received many letters, reports and telegrams. I wish to make the following suggestions in keeping with this first-hand information and on behalf of the mining profession:

First, the paying of a bonus for the promotion of prospecting, exploration and development work, especially in connection with low-grade ore mines.

Second, the raising from 33⅓ to 50 per cent, of the depletion or capital reimbursement allowances for all mines, as recommended by the Senate committee on natural resources.

Third, the raising of the depletion allowance over the 50 per cent level in the case of low-profit mines dealing with low-grade ores; the increase in this allowance being inversely proportional to the profit margin.

Before resuming my seat, I would like to read a telegram which I received from the cooperative head office of my district, the Abitibienne cooperative society, because it reflects the feelings of the cooperators of my constituency:

[Mr. Gourd.]

David Gourd, M.P., Ottawa

Still protest against taxing of cooperatives. Refer to difference between members and non-members. Protest against compulsion in paying patronage dividends within six months. Retroactive effect of legislation may result in serious trouble.

(Signed) L'Abitibienne.

The signature "Abitibienne" is that of the cooperative head office of my district.

I am happy to see that, as far as possible, the government has taken these feelings into consideration, in spite of the tremendous pressure brought to bear by adverse financial interests. After examining the proposals, I find that most of the cooperative associations of my constituency will not be called upon to pay such heavy taxes as I feared, because they are real cooperative associations rather than groups of tradesmen who, under the guise of cooperative associations, are attempting to avoid paying taxes to the government.

Mr. CHURCH (Text): I am surprised to see this section 21(b) in the budget resolutions in this form. The government is legislating, as to income tax, not for this year but for 1947 and subsequent years. I come from a city which is now paying nearly one-third of all the cash income taxes paid in the dominion, and I object to this way of doing things. During the war we were promised two things. At that time the people were taxed to death and controlled to death, and now, fifteen months after the war, they are more taxed and more controlled than ever—so much so that we are on the verge of becoming a straight socialist state. Taxation is driving many of the small business men of this country out of business Just look at the paltry deductions allowed—only $300, $100, $300.

Two years ago family allowances running into hundreds of millions of dollars were introduced. We should consider the case of those who became ill. Take the working classes in your constituency, Mr. Chairman, or in the constituencies of Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton or Vancouver; how often the working people in those districts take ill and find that their doctors cannot get them into the hospitals or cannot get them any nurses or domestic help during the period of illness. They closed down two of the largest floors at Toronto general hospital—no nurses. The splendid Victorian Order of Nurses go around to the homes of the working classes for $2.50 a week but the sick get no help from the government in the way of deduction allowances. In many cases they have to borrow money from anybody they know. Any member of parliament knows that. There are hardly any nurses, but they have what they call practical nurses. I have five or six letters on this matter from my constituents. I wrote the wartime prices and trade board, and the secretary in reply informed me that there are no regulations with respect to nurses. I may say that the Quebec legislature has done something; it has decided that if nurses are to charge $6 a day they should have other capacities and qualifications than being able to help in the house, they must have a certificate from some hospital.

People are taxed and controlled to death, and they cannot get the services they need. If they need to get into a hospital there are no vacancies. Since the war was over, a year ago, a considerable body of workers in the industrial centres have remained in the cities and want to stay there, but they cannot find a place to live, and there is an extraordinary number of cases of evictions before the county court judges. I was talking to one of the judges last Sunday, and he told me about some people who were to be evicted, with no place to go.

The present high tax levels disastrously affect, with practically no deductions, all classes of our people. It was reported that the Minister of National Revenue made some promises in this direction, and though he denied that he said it, if he did not say it, others did. I have heard it in the Toronto district; I have read of it in the newspapers. I accept the word of the minister, but the fact remains that the statement attributed to him was publicized all over our city by the Globe and the Star. They made big headlines about it.

Our people were promised a year ago, after the war, "death to controls". Now they are controlled and taxed to death. Consider the position of the working man who has to pay $6 a day to a so-called practical nurse who may not know enough to give an injection. The law in Quebec is better than that, and I believe there should be a dominion-wide law requiring that a nurse must be qualified when required in the home. Enough qualified nurses are not available.

We are now legislating for 1947. The government did the same thing before, and then, when the year arrived that they were going to reduce taxes they changed the schedules around. The book of statistics with the green cover in the possession of my hon. friend contains a lot of statistics and we now have the new schedules for 1947, which is a matter for next year's ways and means committee. What we are doing now is just wasting our time; we have talked all day and have passed only one section; the second section, paragraph (b) is still before us.

I suggest that some protection be provided by deductions for the ordinary working man who has to get a nurse once in a while, and that some further allowance should be made. A reduction equivalent to only $300 is not enough; it would not last a week where a patient's condition is serious and getting worse. I know the case of a man in my constituency, where the doctor insisted that he get another practical nurse; one will not do to-day; he has to get two, at $6 a day, plus room, and meals must be provided as well. I sent his letter to the wartime prices and trade board. I hear now that another temporary nurse is wanted; and the man simply has to borrow money.

I do not know where all this is going to end. The other day in the reading room I was looking at one of our papers in which a plea was made for cash: everybody wants cash; especially the government wants cash to carry on the business of the country. To my mind there should be a halt. If we are to legislate for 1946 let us legislate for 1946 and pass the ways and means resolutions. Do not be tinkering with the supposed requirements of 1947 and the following year. The government may not be here then. The way they are carrying on now they probably will not be; since at times we are having some close votes.

I venture to say that the right hon. and learned member who is the leader of the house—an estimable gentleman—could himself give some information as to the extent that people in the city he so honourably represents are complaining about the same matters. I appreciate what the government has done in the sphere of family allowances, but when you pass all this you will have to go over the same story when 1947 comes. I urge that some additional allowance be made in these deductions for especially urgent, important and extraordinary cases such as I have suggested.

The hon. member for Temiscouata made a forty-minute speech this morning on the resolution. The other day one of the newspapers, noting that he and I sit at opposite ends of the chamber, called us "those two inimitable end-men" as if we were in a minstrel show. I am not going to imitate the other end-man to-day by making a forty-minute speech to hold the line, so that I have confined my remarks to four or five minutes; but I would conclude by pointing out that there is general complaint that it is impossible to get nurses or any kind of help, and that the deduction amounts to practically nothing; it might just as well be wiped out. What is the use of talking about $300? That does not pay nurses and medicine for one month. I feel that reasonable deductions and some allowances should be made for these urgent and most unfortunate cases.

Mr. HODGSON: Further to the question of the hon. member for St. John-Albert, I understand that he mentioned domestic help, and income tax returns in respect only of domestic help. Does that take into consideration farm help and labour in camps, mines, et cetera, where labour is boarded on the job? There seems to be a difference when you make out the income tax return. For instance, in his return you add on $26 and you charge income tax on that; in Quebec it is $15 and you charge income tax on that. I should like to know what the rate is for Ontario and the rest of the provinces.

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot at the moment give my hon. friend the information. I am advised by the deputy minister that uniform rates are or should be in effect across Canada with respect to the amount which must be included in income as an amount in lieu of board and lodging. What the rates are in Ontario I do not know, but I can get that information and give it to my hon. friend a little later on in the course of the debate on the resolutions. But the general principle is that employed persons who receive as part of their remuneration board and lodging are obliged to account in their income tax return for the value or an ascribed value of that board and lodging.

Mr. HODGSON: I wanted to know if there was any set rate.

Mr. ABBOTT: The same principle applies to men working in lumber camps, on farms or anywhere else as in domestic service, but whether the rate is the same I am not in a position to say. Section 3, paragraph (e) of the Income War Tax Act states:

> (e) personal and living expenses when such form part of the profit, gain or remuneration of the taxpayer or the payment of such constitutes part of the gain, benefit or advantage accruing to the taxpayer under any estate, trust, contract, arrangement or power of appointment, irrespective of when created.

Mr. HANSELL: I desire to waste a little of the time of this committee in talking to this particular resolution, No. 2, involving exemptions of income tax. I desire to do so because I have received many letters and telegrams of one kind and another from individuals and organizations requesting that I support them in their demand for exemptions from income tax to the extent of $1,200 for single persons and $2,000 for married persons. I desire to do so now. I do not know that I am going to discuss or to recommend to the minister how he should readjust the tax structure to make this possible, because I realize that the present administration is working within the confines of certain financial rules and, I do not care what party it is, working within the confines of those rules they will never be able to alleviate the tremendous burdens of taxation that now rest upon the people. With our huge debt and expenditures the rules will not permit them to do it, and until they change the rules, the people must know that for generations to come, for ever and a day, they will be burdened with heavy loads of taxation.

I should like to ask the minister just what starting point the government uses to determine the exemptions the people of Canada should get from taxation. If my guess is right, and I think it is, they start somewhat in this fashion. They outline their year's programme. They say: We are going to do this, and we are going to do that, and it is going to cost us so much money; therefore we shall have to get that amount of money from some source; if we are to get that money from somewhere we must devise ways and means of getting it, and we have only one way of getting it, namely, to tax it out of the people. That seems to be the government's starting point. But what should be the proper starting point? It should be something like this. They should calculate what is a reasonably good standard of living for every individual, whether he be a single or a married man, and then say; We will refuse to tax anyone who does not come up to that reasonably good standard of living.

Mr. KNOWLES: And take steps to bring the people up to those levels.

Mr. HANSELL: Yes. That involves a method of getting incomes for them, but at the moment I am talking about exemptions from taxation. Let them decide what a reasonably good standard of living is, and then say: We will not tax anyone below that. Is that not the common-sense way of looking at it? Let the minister answer yes or no, now.

Mr. ABBOTT: What is the question?

Mr. HANSELL: Must I go all over my speech again?

Mr. ABBOTT: I was doing my best to follow it, but was just a little bit confused.

Mr. HANSELL: I say, when the administration decides on how high an income should be before it is taxed—

Mr. ABBOTT: That is decided in this resolution. That limit is suggested in the terms of the resolution.

Mr. HANSELL: I know, and that is what I am getting at. The limit is too low. I want to know how the government arrive at the figure. Is it not reasonable to suggest that the starting point should be the determination of what is a reasonably good standard of living? Let me ask this in the first instance: Do the government want every individual in Canada to have a reasonably good standard of living? Do they or do they not?

Mr. ABBOTT: The answer to that, of course, is yes.

Mr. HANSELL: Of course it is yes. Well now, what is a good standard of living?

Mr. LESAGE: What is it? Have you calculations for that? What is the average cost of living?

Mr. HANSELL: I think I have an extremely good calculation, and that is my common sense when I go to buy things and have to spend money in order to live. We have evidently a confession from the minister, because he must consider that $62.50 a month is a reasonably good standard of living.

Mr. ABBOTT: No. I do not necessarily concede that.

Mr. HANSELL: Well, the resolution calls for exemptions of $750 in the case of single persons and $1,500 in the case of married persons, and for the single man that works out at $62.50 a month. So that is the starting point. But that is not when their tax begins. That does not mean that they have $62.50, taking the low figure, because they are taxed at every turn. Suppose they begin to spend that $62.50 for food—because they cannot live if they do not eat. Well, the moment they begin to spend their money on food, they find that they are taxed on their food. There is a sales tax on all that a man eats.

Mr. ABBOTT: Most food, I think, is exempt from sales tax.

Mr. HANSELL: Perhaps the minister can put something on the record to indicate that. To my mind, of all criminal offences that can be committed none is so great as what I would call the confiscation of food from the people's mouths. One of the most vital foods for human existence is sugar, and that is taxed. The member for Edmonton East says that all foods are taxed.

Mr. ABBOTT: Let him look at schedule 3 of the Special War Revenue Act, and he will see that he is mistaken.

Mr. HANSELL: Very well; we will look that up. However, $62.50 is not what a man has to live on after we have deducted all his taxes. I do not smoke myself, but I do not begrudge a man a smoke, and if he smokes, he is taxed. If he buys a chocolate bar, he is taxed. If his youngster goes to buy something—well, I do not see how he can have a youngster on $62.50 a month.

An hon. MEMBER: In that case he would be single.

Mr. HANSELL: My friend is wrong. He has $62.50 a month for himself and $62.50 for his wife. Therefore they have $1,500 for both, which still leaves them $62.50 each.

Mr. ABBOTT: Two can live as cheaply as one.

Mr. HANSELL: If their youngster buys a chocolate bar he is taxed; if he buys a bottle of pop, he is taxed.

Mr. RINFRET: He has family allowances.

Mr. HANSELL: If he uses electricity he is taxed; if he uses a telephone he is taxed. If he has a car—and goodness knows how he can get a car out of $62.50 a month—he is taxed. If he wants to drive somebody else's car he is taxed.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Taxed in the pulpit?

Mr. HANSELL: If the Minister of Veterans Affairs will come to my church—

Mr. MACKENZIE: I shall be glad to.

Mr. HANSELL: I shall tell him that in spite of the fact that he comes from the highlands he is going to put something in the collection plate. If these friends in the lower income brackets desire to get married they have to pay a tax. If the gentleman wants to buy his bride a ring he has to pay a tax, and at twenty-five per cent. If he wants to keep a dog, he has to pay a tax. Therefore, it does not make any difference what the man does, he has to pay a tax.

Mr. ASHBY: Even when he is dead he has to pay a tax.

Mr. HANSELL: Yes. If he has any children my hon. friend across the way says that he would get family allowances; then we are all taxed. Therefore it does not make any difference to those poor people in the lower income brackets. Because they are exempted from income tax it does not mean that they do not have to pay any taxes. It must take all the wisdom that the Liberal party has to discover all the sources of taxation.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is not a very broad base for taxation.

An hon. MEMBER: They have not taxed the air.

Mr. HANSELL: My hon. friend says they have not taxed the air. Yes, they have; you cannot listen to radio broadcasts without paying a tax of $2.50 a year. I can tell the minister how he can get a nice little pile of money, and he will be doing a great service to the country. Whenever I go to a restaurant to eat a meal somebody is bound to drop a nickel into the juke box and blare into my ears some of our western and American culture. Let the minister put a little gadget on these machines so that the rest of us who do not like it can drop in a nickel that will turn the thing off. That is one tax I should be glad to pay.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am glad to hear that, because we have taxed both the machine and the fellow who wants to turn it on.

Mr. HANSELL: Then you will get us coming both ways. You are now getting the tax from the one who wants the crooner's culture, and you will get a tax from the cultured gentleman who does not want it.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Would the hon. member try to relate his remarks a little more closely to the resolution under discussion?

Mr. HANSELL: Yes; thank you for reminding me, Mr. Chairman. The questions which were asked me took me off the resolution. I was discussing exemptions to the extent of $750 for single and $1,500 for married people. I should like the minister to be able to tell us when on earth he expects to do away with such tremendous burdens of taxation as we have. We are paying $481 million a year to service the debt of Canada alone. Even though we did not go into debt another dollar, the people of Canada would have to turn out their pockets and pay $481 million a year. I should like the minister to tell us when we can expect higher exemptions and less taxation and at the same time meet the interest on that debt alone, without incurring another dollar of debt. I should like any other party to tell me the same thing. I declare to you, Mr. Chairman, that it cannot be done within the confines of the rules of the present debt-taxing game of finance. If it can be done, I want him to tell me how. It is time the people of Canada became aware of the fact that it cannot be done just so long as governments insist on financing by debt-taxation finance.

Mr. ASHBY: I can answer that last question asked by the hon. member for Macleod. As hon. members know, I have been worried considerably especially since I left my parliament in session; I have not even prorogued it. In fact this whole debt problem has been of great concern to me, so much so that I actually went off my feed, as it were—lost my appetite. However, I made up my mind that I would go down to the hotel and get a lobster supper. Whether it was the result of this lobster supper or not, I am not sure, but during the night I had a vision, and I was able quite easily to solve the problem of all these debts. Whether it was the Angel Gabriel I saw standing in the dark doorway of my bedchamber, or whether it was the landlady in her nightie coming to see if I was ill, or whether it was natural for me to gurgle and rumble my tonsils in peaceful slumber, I shall never know. But it did occur to me, how can we solve this terrific problem of debt? Hon. members know that I am interested in the lowly pig; they also know that I am interested in that great and strenuous art of sheep shearing, but they did not know that I was interested in horses. One horse that I was always interested in was one owned by a fellow named Trojan. Since I was a little boy I always wondered what breed the Trojan horse was. I determined to find out, and indirectly I learned how to solve this debt problem. I was disappointed in the horse. When I went to find out what it was, I learned that it was nothing but a hammer-headed, broken-winded, raw-boned, switch-tailed, old Temiscouata pacing mare. On the other hand, Trojan was the very man for our next prime minister. My hopes rose immediately and then fell when I learned that the poor fellow was dead; in fact, he had been dead for approximately two thousand years.

Two delegations waited upon Trojan. The first consisted of the minister of finance, the deputy minister of finance, the assistant to the deputy minister of finance and the assistant to the assistant to the deputy minister of finance, the deputy minister of taxation, the assistant deputy minister of taxation and the assistant to the assistant deputy minister of taxation, and two stenographers. They were not the kind of stenographers some hon. members are thinking of, but they did have this in common; they wore no stockings. These two stenographers were just a couple of elderly gentlemen, knock-kneed, bare-legged and bald-headed, with a saddle blanket thrown over one shoulder and loosely tied about the middle and a string of poplar leaves tied around their heads, carrying a great bundle of papyrus which they called the budget. They presented to Trojan the records of all the debts that had accumulated during the wars, which amounted to what were tremendous sums in those days. They also complained about the old soldiers of the Trojan wars, the old soldier settlers, and asked, "How in the world can we get them to pay up what they owe?" "Well," Trojan said, "What have you done?" "Well, we have taxed the people. We have foreclosed on homes, farms and factories. We have brought them to their knees and some of them we have under lock and key." "In prison?" asked Trojan. "Oh, no; we have them in insane asylums. We have driven some of them crazy." Well, Trojan just got up and went into the kitchen to get a great meat cleaver, whereupon the suspicious delegation went out through the window.

The next delegation to wait on him consisted of three old soldier settlers of the Trojan wars, worn, weary and haggard, who presented their case. Trojan placed his hand on their shoulders and gave them three pieces of silver, telling them to go to Jones' meat market and buy up all the wieners on sale. Next he sent for the records of all the debts, had them piled in the market place, set fire to them and had a wiener roast. That was two thousand years ago.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I have been waiting for the hon. member to relate his remarks to the resolution. I would remind him that we are considering paragraph 2, which concerns the exemptions allowed to married and single persons, and the exemptions for children; and I would ask the hon. gentleman to confine his remarks to this paragraph.

Mr. ASHBY: I thought I was on paragraph 2; I thought this had to do with taxation and methods of getting rid of it. What I have said is perfectly true; hon. members can go to the library and find out for themselves that this actually took place. When these debts accumulated in those days they were just burned. Nobody cried about it except the deputy ministers concerned, and everyone knew they were just crocodile tears which soon dried up. Nothing more was said about it from that day to this. There is the solution to this debt problem.

Resolution agreed to.

3. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years the deduction of $1,500 from the income of a married person be reduced,

(a) where the spouse has an income of more than $250 and less than $750 by the amount by which the spouse's income is more than $250, or whether or not the wife's income is earned income.

(b) where the spouse has an income of more than $750, to $750,

Mr. ABBOTT: Following the practice when we began perhaps I might give a brief explanation of the legislation which is to be founded upon this resolution. The effect of the legislation to follow this resolution is to return to the basis of taxation for husband and wife each having an income in excess of $750 to the pre-1942 position, and also to provide for a reduction in the exemption granted to the husband when the wife has an income in excess of $250 but below the exemption limit.

Prior to 1942 the law provided that when husband and wife each had taxable incomes the husband lost the exemption granted a married person, and he and his wife were taxed individually as single persons. As a temporary measure to encourage married women to enter war work during the acute period of labour shortage the law was amended in 1942 to allow the husband to retain the married exemption when his wife had a taxable income derived from employment. The proposal under the resolution we are now considering is that from 1947 onward this special exemption will be withdrawn in order to place their position on a more equitable basis in relation to other taxpayers.

A further change proposed for married couples where the wife has an income below the taxable limits also removes in a large degree a privileged position previously enjoyed by married taxpayers. Under the present law a married man would be allowed to claim the full $1,500 exemption granted because of his wife's dependence on him, and at the same time the wife could have an income up to $750 completely exempt from tax, so that together they would have a combined exemption of $2,250 compared with a total exemption of only $1,500 granted to two single persons having the same income, or to married persons, the wife having no separate income. To remove a substantial part of this advantage we are proposing that when the wife has an income of more than $250 but less than $750 the husband's exemption will be reduced by the amount by which his wife's income exceeds $250. In effect a husband will be given full married exemption when his wife's income does not exceed $250 a year. When the wife's income exceeds this amount the $1,500 allowance given the husband is reduced in proportion to the excess of her income over $250.

In connection with this proposal I might perhaps point out to the committee that under the federal income tax in the United States a husband may claim full married exemption only if he includes all his wife's income with his own, which of course is more restrictive than the proposal contained in this resolution; and also that in the United Kingdom a husband and wife living together are compelled to file a joint return, though I am advised the husband is allowed a small deduction in respect of his wife's earned income.

Mr. FRASER: The minister said a married man would have an exemption. I know of married couples where the man is a cripple and unable to work, and the wife earns the money. In that case she would have the exemption, would she?

Mr. ABBOTT: This applies to the same extent to whichever consort has the income. I am sorry; I should have made that clear.

Mr. JACKMAN: I had some remarks to make on this section in the budget debate. To my mind it is one of the most foolish provisions of the present budget. I do not often use such strong words in this house, but certainly this resolution will have the effect of withdrawing from the labour supply of the country a great many married women who are in a position to render valuable service. Without doubt it will cut down the service they will give. If I were interested in the theory of taxation and were to do everything according to the book of rules, with little regard to the effect on humanity or on the economic welfare of the nation or on inflation or on production, probably I would do what the minister is suggesting under this resolution. Undoubtedly it is fair and equitable; if a man's wife is working and earning more than $750, then the husband should not be entitled to the marital exemption because both parties are bringing in income. But let us stop right there. What would be the effect of this new provision concerning earnings over $250, which is not a very large amount for a married woman? It will mean that married women without family responsibilities, whose children are grown up or who have not been blessed with children and who work during part of the year, for instance women who might have been domestics or who might do some nursing for thirty or forty or fifty per cent of the ordinary working year, soon find that their annual income exceeds $250. If it does, this provision immediately comes into effect, reducing the husband's income.

Mr. ABBOTT: Reducing the husband's exemption.

Mr. JACKMAN: Thank you; reducing the husband's exemption, which means that he pays more taxes. This discourages the wife from doing further work, and I am sure it will have a direct and immediate effect. There are also many women who work along with their husbands, as in the needle trades. The work is taken from the shop to the home, and the wife receives part of the income. But she very quickly gets an amount larger than $250. I have had a number of letters in this regard from my own riding, and I know that it will apply not only to the needle trades and to domestic services, but also to the nursing profession and many other activities which hon. members may call to mind for themselves.

When he presented his budget the Minister of Finance stated that the most important thing, from the point of view of running the economic affairs of the country to-day, was production; and if there was one thing the budget should make possible it was greater production—not only because production in itself is essential if we are to have a higher standard of living, realizing as we do that we can improve it only if we produce more goods and services, but because we are faced with the grave danger of inflation. Inflation is simply a condition caused by more money than goods available at prevailing price levels. If we want to help defeat this disaster of inflation which we are facing in a very real way, then the more goods and services we produce the greater is the tendency to defeat it. I do not say it will be completely defeated, but the minister has certainly gone on record as saying it would be a help. I think most economists will agree that the more we can produce, the less likely we are to have a serious increase in prices. So while I agree with the minister that there is a certain fairness in this resolution, I believe this is the wrong time to change this part of the act from the way it stood during the war, the way it stands on the books to-day.

The budget is directed to increased production, but now we are asked to come back to a consideration of fairness as the predominant motive. I offer the suggestion to the committee—I hope it will be considered seriously—that this provision is one which should be on the statute book at one stage in a business cycle, and not at another stage. If there are more jobs than people to take them, then we should encourage married women to work, even though there might be a slight element of unfairness. It is not very great. It is almost a dog-in-the-manger attitude to take with regard to married persons both of whom are working. It is not a serious inequality. When there are more workers than jobs available I would put in this restrictive measure. It is restrictive to production, perhaps, but it does help provide work, and it means that instead of two in a family working there will be a greater tendency for only one to work. Therefore I suggest to the acting minister and the committee that the resolution be changed so that at the present time we put the emphasis on production, and at some later time we might put the emphasis on fairness.

Resolution agreed to.

4. That in respect of income earned after December 31, 1946, the ordinary income tax rate for corporation income be increased from 18 per cent to 30 per cent and from 20 per cent to 32 per cent in a case where a company and its subsidiaries file a consolidated return.

Mr. FLEMING: I am bound to say I find it difficult to relate this resolution to those coming under the Excess Profits Tax Act, in the light of the statements made by the Minister of Finance on June 27. Will the acting minister clarify it?

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall make a brief statement, as I have done with the others. The increase in the rate of corporation tax which is provided in this resolution is a counterpart of the reduction in the flat rate of excess profits tax which, together, have the effect of reducing the flat rate tax on corporations from 40 per cent to 30 per cent. The reduction follows from repealing the flat 22 per cent rate in the Excess Profits Tax Act and increasing the corporation income tax rate by 12 per cent—that is, from the present 18 per cent to 30 per cent. The consolidated rate which is now 20 per cent under the corporation income tax will be increased to 32 per cent. Does that cover the point?

Mr. FLEMING: Not completely. I may be anticipating something the minister may intend to say later on the resolution dealing with amendments to the Excess Profits Tax Act, but I am still not clear as to what is proposed in the amendments to that act.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I might anticipate that by saying, as I said a minute ago, that the flat rate of tax of 22 per cent under the Excess Profits Tax Act is to be repealed. The provisions of the Excess Profits Tax Act with respect to excess profits, so-called,—that is, profits over 116⅔ per cent of standard—is to be 15 per cent of that excess. I believe the Minister of Finance touched upon this in his speech when he replied to the various points made in the budget debate. So that there will be no flat rate of tax under the Excess Profits Tax Act. The only tax which will remain will be a 15 per cent flat rate on that portion of a corporation's profits in excess of 116⅔ per cent of its standard profit. It may sound complicated, but I hope I have made it clear. When we reach the resolutions under the Excess Profits Tax Act I shall go into it in greater detail.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister spoke about a flat rate of 22 per cent. Was that not made up of two bits of twelve per cent and ten per cent? I do not know whether there is any significance in it.

Mr. ABBOTT: That was changed last year and made a flat 22 per cent. Originally it was in the form indicated by the hon. member.

Mr. PROBE: Can the minister enlighten the committee with respect to exemptions on corporation incomes subject to taxation? I refer to the heading for advertising, contributions of various kinds, travelling expenses of officials and employees, and entertainment. Perhaps the acting minister would give a general statement on what is meant by depreciation allowances, capital gains and reserve fund taxes.

Mr. ABBOTT: The general rule is found in section 6(1) of the Income War Tax Act, which states:

In computing the amount of the profits or gains to be assessed, a deduction shall not be allowed in respect of

(a) disbursements or expenses not wholly, exclusively and necessarily laid out or expended for the purpose of earning the income.

Then follow a number of other paragraphs relating to depreciation and the like. A corporation or any taxpayer is entitled to deduct from his gross income expenses which are wholly, exclusively and necessarily laid out or expended for the purpose of earning the income. That is the general criterion. Therefore the test must be whether the expenditure for advertising comes within that description; whether the travelling expenses of a commercial traveller, or a company officer or executive, or the employee of a company, come within that general description. This of course is administered by the Department of National Revenue. The taxpayer's accounts are examined to see whether the expenses claimed as deductions are properly claimed having regard to the provisions of the section I have just quoted.

Mr. PROBE: I would presume, then, that the minister provides some limits within which these expenses are chargeable. For example, surely he lays down a maximum which any corporation may charge for advertising, or a maximum percentage of income which will be allowable for travelling expenses or for the entertainment of convention delegates. Is it within the prerogative of an official in the income tax branch to set, according to his own judgment, what the limits would be? It would seem to me that a corporation could argue reasonably successfully that political contributions, for example, were a legitimate business expense if they had reason to believe that the corporation would be benefited by such contributions.

Mr. ABBOTT: No such claim would be allowed. It would not be a legitimate advertising expense and would not come within the provisions of the section I quoted.

Mr. PROBE: I have reason to believe that such contributions have been claimed successfully as deductions.

Mr. ABBOTT: They should be brought to the attention of the tax department. I am sure they will see that the situation is corrected.

Mr. PROBE: The minister states that contributions of that type for political purposes are definitely not proper deductions?

Mr. ABBOTT: I state that without hesitation; there is no question about it at all. Section 6, subsection 2 reads:

> The minister may disallow any expense which he in his discretion may determine to be in excess of what is reasonable or normal for the business carried on by the taxpayer, or which was incurred in respect of any transaction or operation which in his opinion has unduly or artificially reduced the income.

Mr. FRASER: As I understand it, the tax collector goes into a firm and checks the advertising account. If more has been spent than was spent in the year before he will ask the reason and perhaps will allow only part.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think that is correct. Hon. members of the committee will appreciate that it is difficult to lay down a definite criterion for all companies. Some types of business require to spend a great deal more for advertising than others. During the war period, when the excess profits tax was in operation—and it still applies—there was a quota set for advertising purposes. Firms were not allowed to exceed an amount based on what they had expended during the base period. I do not want to be held to the exact details as to how the quota was arrived at, but one was set. That has now been discontinued, and the normal procedure is that the taxpayer must show that the advertising expense was incurred and was wholly necessary for the purpose of earning the income. However, that is subject to the control which the minister has under the subsection I have just quoted.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is the minister aware that communications have gone out to some firms soliciting contributions—I refer in particular to letters over the signature of one Mr. Trestrail, in which he stated that he had reason to believe that contributions to the kind of thing he was doing would be allowed as a deduction for income tax purposes—which have made this claim?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have no knowledge of the letters sent out by Mr. Trestrail, but I do not know that I would care to accept his interpretation of the income tax law as to what would be or what would not be allowed.

Mr. PROBE: The minister has yet to make a statement on depreciation deductions in connection with plant and equipment.

Mr. ABBOTT: Section 6 provides:

> 6. (1) In computing the amount of the profits or gains to be assessed, a deduction shall not be allowed in respect of
> (n) depreciation, except such amount as the minister in his discretion may allow, including
> (i) such extra depreciation as the minister in his discretion may allow in the case of plant or equipment built or acquired to fulfil orders for war purposes; and
> (ii) depreciation at not more than double the rates normally allowed in respect of plant or equipment built or acquired in a period to be fixed by the governor in council for the purposes of this paragraph, if the taxpayer is, in the opinion of the minister, making a new investment by building or acquiring the plant or equipment.
> Provided, however, that the minister shall not allow a deduction in respect of depreciation of assets owned by an incorporated taxpayer from the income of the said taxpayer if he is satisfied that the said taxpayer directly or indirectly had or has a controlling interest in a company or companies previously the owner or owners of the said assets or that the said previous owner (which term shall include a series of owners) directly or indirectly had or has a controlling interest in the said taxpayer or that the said taxpayer and the previous owner were or are directly or indirectly subject to the same controlling interest and that the aggregate amount of deductions which have been allowed to the said taxpayer and/or the said previous owner in respect of the depreciation of such assets is equal to or greater than the cost of the said assets to the said previous owner or to the first of the previous owners where more than one.

There are other provisos but I shall not read them all. They were put in a year or two ago to prevent the possibility of undue depreciation being granted. As the committee will appreciate, the minister is given the discretion as to the rates of depreciation. The department has established recognized rates for various types of assets, movable and immovable, which I believe are applied in a uniform fashion to all taxpayers.

Mr. PROBE: I shall have to digest that statement when I read it on Hansard. It is conceivable that over a number of years an entire plant and its equipment might be written off in the normal income tax practice, but the equipment might still have some value.

Suppose that a corporation decided to dispose of an obsolete plant which had been written off and which conceivably could be written off according to the regulations. Would the purchase price received be considered as income for that year, or would it be treated as a capital gain which would not concern the income tax department?

Mr. ABBOTT: If the corporation has had normal write-offs based on the standard rates—none of this accelerated depreciation to which I have referred—and the plant is sold after it has been completely written off to a stranger, someone who is at arms length, that stranger is entitled to take depreciation on the cost of the property to him.

Mr. PROBE: That is fine for the stranger who buys, but how about the seller?

Mr. ABBOTT: It applies to both individuals and corporations.

Mr. PROBE: This obsolete plant has been sold, say for $100,000. What happens to that $100,000 as far as the income tax department is concerned? The plant does not exist but the corporation has had $100,000 of income. Is that considered as current income or as capital gain?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is considered as capital.

Mr. JACKMAN: It might be a capital loss.

Mr. ABBOTT: A capital loss might exist in other circumstances. My hon. friend will appreciate that these depreciation rates must be based on the law of averages. For example, if experience proves that machinery is worn out in ten years and a straight line system of depreciation is used, at the end of ten years the machinery would be written off. If some value still remains the owner is fortunate, but it may well happen that the machinery would be worn out and discarded in five years.

Mr. PROBE: The fact is that if your officials are generous it is by accident only?

Mr. ABBOTT: There are standard rates which are applied to everyone and which, I understand, are based on long experience. I think they are just as close as one can get to what is a really fair rate of depreciation.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): With regard to the provisos on page 23 of the Income War Tax Act, as I understand it if a subsequent sale is made and the department is led to assume that its depreciation was too great, it may revise it. Does that work the other way, and would the department assume that it had not been generous enough if a loss occurred?

Mr. ABBOTT: As probably my hon. friend knows that provision was inserted several years ago to meet the case of the special accelerated depreciation which was given on the recommendation of the board set up for the purpose of making recommendations in connection with the fulfilling of war contracts. Varying periods of write-off were given, some two years, some three years, some four years. This provision was inserted to provide that if that had proved unduly optimistic the matter could be looked into again. It is on the same basis, if you will, on which war contracts were renegotiated; it is on the principle that it was desired that no one should make undue profits out of war contracts.

Resolution agreed to.

5. That the exemption of investment income for purposes of the 4 per cent tax on investment income be increased for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years from $1,500 to $1,800.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the minister make a statement about this, and perhaps at the same time indicate what will be the loss to the revenue department as a result of the application of this change?

Mr. JACKMAN: Hear, hear; that is what I wanted to know.

Mr. ABBOTT: The resolution is, of course, self-explanatory, and provides for an increase in the exemption from $1,500 to $1,800 under the four per cent tax on investment income. The surtax on investment income is and has been, I think, a feature of all income tax systems for some time. In the 1947 budget we are providing for some—fairly substantial—relief to all classes of taxpayers, and in accordance with that principle the exemption for investment income has been raised from $1,500 to $1,800. Some hon. members may suggest that that is insufficient. It is intended, broadly speaking, to give some relief to that large group of small investment income recipients, of widows who are living on inherited income, those to whom their husbands leave insurance, and that sort of thing, and for that class of person the exemption is raised from $1,500 to $1,800. It does not give any substantial measure of relief to the richer man; I suppose it saves him $12. I am advised that no estimate has been made of what the net cost of this increased exemption will be to the treasury, but perhaps I can ask the officials to make such an estimate and give it later on.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is a step in the right direction, anyway.

Mr. KNOWLES: While they are getting these figures—

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not guarantee that we can give an exact figure, but we will do the best we can.

Mr. KNOWLES: —will they also consider obtaining some estimate as to the number of these people who are the widows that my hon. friend refers to, and how many are the big fellows?

Mr. ABBOTT: I can tell my hon. friend at once that that would be extraordinarily difficult information to get. It would mean examining all the returns and even getting information about some who may have filed no return at all.

Mr. KNOWLES: Then I think it was unfair of the minister to use that argument.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not consider it at all unfair. I think it is perfectly legitimate to say you will exempt investment income up to $1,800 from this four per cent surtax. I say that the average retired person who is living on income from savings, or who is a widow —I did not intend to imply more than that there would be widows in the group—living on a return from savings, are exempt up to $1,800. I think it is perfectly legitimate to use that point, because that is the class it is intended to relieve, and I assure my hon. friend and other members of the committee that it is not intended or designed to relieve the man who has an income of $100,000; it does not make any appreciable difference to him.

Mr. JACKMAN: I might say that I do not think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre understands this resolution, because the total amount of saving to the taxpayer through increasing the exemption on investment income from $1,500 to $1,800 is four per cent on a difference of $300, namely $12.

Mr. ABBOTT: I said that.

Mr. JACKMAN: I think he will realize that if the administration were endeavouring to help anybody they were not trying to help any of his wealthy backers. Certainly as far as it goes it must be a measure for the alleviation of the very poor people who are endeavouring to live on $1,800 or $2,000, only it happens to be in the form of investment income. They may be annuitants, or something of that kind. It is of no help, I am sure, to the class at which my hon. friends endeavour to aim their arrows. I may say this, that in view of all that has happened to the person who is in very moderate circumstances and whose income does happen to come from investments this is a meagre form of relief, and I should think the Minister of Finance might well have been ashamed to offer as little as he has. What has he done to the small person who has an income from bonds or other securities? First of all, government bonds, instead of yielding $4\frac{3}{4}$ or 5 per cent, are down to $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent on the investment of their money, a substantial cut. Taxation has gone up substantially also. So that between the two millstones of very much smaller income and very much higher taxation, some of these relatively poor people, receiving $1,500, $2,000 or perhaps $2,500 a year, have been ground so that they have extraordinarily difficult times, and many of them are widows and elderly retired men. It is a class which is deserving of the support of every party of this house without exception; and the administration grants them only $12. True, the wealthy man will also get the $12, and I do not think anyone is going to worry very much about that. There are not many wealthy men anyway. I think the government might well have given some further relief to the particular class at which this resolution is aimed. It is my personal opinion that any minister of finance should be thoroughly embarrassed to offer a measure of relief amounting to only $12. It is no wonder that the department have not estimated the total amount of taxes which will be lost by this measure, because it is probably so small that one could not see it, in relation to the total budget.

Mr. ABBOTT: Just on that point, perhaps I should point out that the proportionate relief of this tax is just about the same as the others. The exemption for married persons was raised from $1,200 to $1,500, and that is a 25 per cent increase; this represents a 20 per cent increase. It is in line with the increases in other exemptions.

Mr. JACKMAN: Twelve dollars!

Mr. ABBOTT: And the same class benefit from the general reductions. I think it is fair to say that it would not have been proper to have given relief to the other classes and not have given proportionate relief to this group.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is any distinction made between those to whom this is their only income and those to whom this is an addition to other income?

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. KNOWLES: I really think that the minister and the hon. member for Rosedale hardly expected their implication to go unchallenged that we are dealing here with a great mass of poor people.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not say "a great mass of poor people".

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member for Rosedale talks about the great class of poor people who are living on only $1,500 to $1,800 a year of investment income. People who have sufficient investment to have that much income on it a year do not stop there. They do not come from the ranks of those in the lower income brackets.

Mr. JACKMAN: It may be an annuity which will represent all their capital. Are you against a man leaving his widow $1,500 or $1,800 a year? Certainly your party has not been in the past.

Mr. KNOWLES: Not at all; I am simply asking that a distinction be made between those to whom that is their only income and those to whom it is an addition.

Mr. JACKMAN: Twelve dollars distinction.

Resolution agreed to.

6. That a deduction from tax be allowed in the 1946 and subsequent taxation years to a taxpayer who resides or is ordinarily resident in Canada during only a part of the taxation year of a portion of the tax that would otherwise be payable upon his income during the taxation year that bears the same relation to the whole tax as the period in the taxation year during which he is not resident or ordinarily resident in Canada bears to the whole taxation year.

Mr. MacNICOL: I desire to say a word or two on this.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have been making a little explanatory statement in respect to each of these clauses, so that perhaps my hon. friend will allow me to do it here. The situation at the moment is that under the charging provisions of the Income Tax Act as it now stands the tax is imposed on the whole income, no matter where derived, of a person resident in Canada at any time in the tax year. Credit is given against the Canadian tax for income tax paid to another country or income derived from sources outside Canada, and in the normal circumstance the credit is sufficient to offset the Canadian tax imposed on the same income. Representations have been made, however, that in some instances there is no credit for foreign taxes because in some countries no income tax is imposed, or else the credit is quite inadequate because of the very low tax in the foreign country. To overcome this objection to the present law, it is proposed that a person resident in Canada for only a part of the year will continue to be taxable on the whole income, but a credit against the Canadian income tax will be allowed based on the proportion which the number of days in which the taxpayer was not a resident of Canada bears to the total number of days in the year. In other words, in effect, under the proposal which is indicated in this resolution a person resident in Canada for a part of the year will pay a Canadian income tax proportionate to the period of residence in Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have not in mind the particulars of the case with respect to which I now wish to say a word, but a year ago—perhaps the deputy will recall the circumstances—I brought to the attention of the department the case of a gentleman who had been in the United States, working there, who then came back to Canada, and who was bitterly angry over the assessment in this country. Apparently, although he had earned much less in Canada than in the United States, the income tax he paid was very much higher. I have forgotten the exact circumstances of the case, and all I wish to inquire now is as to what the situation is if a man earns $3,000 in the United States and returns to Canada and earns $1,500 or $2,000 in this country. What will be the relation of the tax payable in Canada to the amount earned in Canada?

Mr. ABBOTT: The answer is this. The tax payable in Canada would be a proportion of the tax on his total income which, in the case which my hon. friend mentions is $4,500. The tax would be calculated on the $4,500 as though that amount had all been earned in Canada, after taking into account the appropriate exemptions. After that result had been arrived at there would be a determination as to how many days he had resided in the United States and how many in Canada. Assuming for the sake of argument that he had spent two-thirds of the time in the United States and one-third in Canada as a resident, the tax payable to Canada would be one-third of the income tax on the $4,500, and presumably he would be taxed on the two-thirds in the United States. The tax would first be computed on his total income for the year, but he would be taxed only in respect of the portion which represented the period during which he resided in this country in that year. I think it would cover the case to which my hon. friend has referred. I remember his bringing it up.

Mr. LESAGE: Suppose the tax on the total income of the taxpayer for 1947 is $365 and this taxpayer spent 200 days in the United States. He can deduct $200, which will leave $165 which he will pay in Canada.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. McMASTER: This resolution, I suggest, has implications that none of us thought of in the first instance. First of all, it ignores the law of domicile. Is it applied to wages as well as to investment income? Let me give an example. A man ordinarily resident in Canada may draw a salary. Can he evade some of his ordinary income tax by going and living in some other country for three months of the year, assuming that he had a job which did not require his continued personal attention here? I could understand it if it were investment income, but even there I would seriously consider whether this was a wise resolution to put into force if the man who takes advantage of it were a domiciled Canadian.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think the answer is this. Under our income tax act, as under the British act, the test for income tax liability has always been residence, not domicile. That has been the principle in our act from its commencement. The United States system is slightly different. Some taxes are imposed on the basis of citizenship and, perhaps, in respect of domicile. I do not know. In any event, under the Canadian and the British law, the main test of liability for income tax has always been residence. Taking the specific case which my hon. friend has cited, if I understood him correctly, an American resident or a domiciled American comes to Canada—

Mr. McMASTER: It is the other way around. I am speaking of the domiciled Canadian who has a job here that does not require his personal attention all the year round, and who, for the purpose of evading our somewhat heavy taxation, decides to spend four months of the year in the British West Indies.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend, as a prominent legal light, knows that residence is a question of fact. It would be a question of fact whether the individual to whom he refers had retained his residence in Canada, though he might spend eight or nine months of the year, in Florida, for his health, or for some other purpose. If his bona fide residence were in Canada he would continue to be taxed here. But this proposed amendment is to meet the hardship involved in the case of a man who bona fide changes his residence during a taxation year, the man who is an executive of a Canadian concern for the first four or five months of the year and then transfers to the American parent company.

I cite that as an example. He changes his residence from Ottawa or Montreal, as the case may be, to some place in the United States. Under the law as it stood, he would have been obliged to file an income tax return in Canada and be taxed on the total income for that calendar year, and would be entitled to claim a credit against that tax for any tax he might pay in the United States with respect to taxes paid to that government. But in some cases that was found to create injustice. One such case was cited by the hon. member for Davenport. This section is, therefore, a relieving measure and is intended to provide an equitable basis for taxation of individuals who bona fide change residence during the course of the taxing year.

Mr. McMASTER: The resolution is wider than the minister has stated.

Mr. ABBOTT: Possibly when we come to the section my hon. friend will see how we provide for it in the legislation itself.

Mr. FLEMING: The outline which the minister has given suggests that the resolution has a good deal of merit, but I think the committee would welcome some further clarification, particularly in reference to the extent of the proposed change. Are we to understand that the section has no application at all to the present provision in the act about sojourning in Canada?

Mr. ABBOTT: It has no application to that. In other words, it is only in the case of bona fide residence that it applies.

Mr. FLEMING: It has no application to the sojourn clause, 9?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. FLEMING: Will it have relation to the case where the taxpayer, while normally resident in Canada, draws income from sources outside Canada as well as from sources within the country, and who may take a trip abroad for a short time? Is this proposed amendment confined simply to the case where there is a complete change of residence during the year, without affecting the case of taxpayers who maintain residence and draw income from sources both within and outside Canada?

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend's interpretation is correct. It affects simply cases of bona fide change of residence. The other individuals to whom my hon. friend refers will continue to benefit from the provisions in the act which allow them to take credit for taxes paid abroad with respect to income received from sources abroad.

Mr. FLEMING: There is no change in the law?

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no change in the law there.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Has the minister considered whether this conflicts to any extent with article IX of the agreement with the United Kingdom which is attached to bill No. 300? I have it here if the minister would like to look at it. It seems to provide that anyone who is resident in Canada for more than 183 days must pay the full year's taxation. That is the way I read it. Section 3 of the bill says:

> In the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of this act or of the said agreement and the operation of any other law, the provisions of this act and the agreement shall, to the extent of such inconsistency, prevail.

It may be that that is the answer, if there is a conflict.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that this is supplementing the provisions of the agreement to which my hon. friend refers rather than opposing it. I am also informed that the United States have a similar provision in their law.

Resolution agreed to.

> 7. That there be established, with provision for the expenses thereof, an income tax appeal board consisting of a chairman and two assistant chairmen having specified legal qualifications and not less than three nor more than nine other members appointed by the governor in council, as a court of record, to hear, in any part of Canada, appeals from assessments made by the Minister of National Revenue in respect of the 1946 and subsequent taxation years and that an appeal may be taken from a decision of the appeal board to the exchequer court of Canada.

Mr. FLEMING: I made some remarks on this proposed legislation when I spoke in the budget debate, and I shall not go over them again, but I suggest to the minister, as earnestly as I can, that if this resolution is to have any real value it must be amended. As hon. members know, at the present time assessments are coming out three years and sometimes longer after the return on which they are based has been filed. If this proposed income tax appeal board is to begin its work on assessments for the taxation year 1946 and subsequently, it is not going to go to work until about 1950. The need for an income tax appeal board is implicit in the submission of the resolution. In the first place, if that need exists—and surely no one will question that—then I suggest the board ought to go to work at once. I fail to see what objection there can be to giving this board jurisdiction as to assessments which are in the course of being made so long as the returns on which the assessments are made have been filed. Otherwise this board is either not going to come into existence until about 1949 or 1950, or it is going to be set up now under this resolution and have nothing to do until 1950.

In the spring of 1947 we shall be making our returns on 1946 income, which is the first year in respect of which this board is to have any jurisdiction. In another three years or thereabouts the assessments will be made. This means that it will be 1950 before there is a tap of work for the income tax appeal board to do. I take it that the committee is not going to contemplate seriously putting the board into a position like that, which I suggest is almost farcical. I would urge on the minister that the assessment with respect to which this income tax appeal board is to be given jurisdiction ought to relate back for a period so that they can go to work now.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have taken a note of my hon. friend's suggestion, and I shall make some comment on it when we come to the section of the bill which provides for this board. As he will appreciate, as well as anyone else, there is a question as to whether a new board of this kind which is being set up should start off with a large accumulation of back appeals. However, I shall give the whole question some consideration, and will make a statement when we come to the section of the bill.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I add one word to what the hon. member for Eglinton has said, merely to emphasize as strongly as I can what he has said and to remind the minister that the Minister of Finance made a very strong statement last October as to what would be done? May I underline as heavily as I can what the hon. member for Eglinton has said as to what seems to me to be the great unwisdom of not doing anything for three or four years? This is something that the people of Canada are exercised about.

Mr. McMASTER: That reminds me of something that I intended to say. I do not want to urge the government to hire any more employees; rather I would urge them to get rid of some in every department. When they have to fire three in any other department I suggest that they take on a good one in the income tax department to catch up on these arrears. If the arrears are caught up the very objection which we have made will be overcome.

Mr. ABBOTT: I agree.

Mr. McMASTER: I suggest to the minister that if he waits too long he will not recover a lot of this money. I read in the newspaper that a concern not so very far from the parliament buildings has got into difficulties and that it owes the government a large sum of money. Probably if these returns were checked up a little sooner recovery would be made while these concerns are solvent. It may be that some of them go insolvent purposely to avoid liabilities. I do not suppose they would feel badly if the government were one of the large creditors.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to say a word upon a matter which has been brought to the attention of the committee by the hon. member for Eglinton and the two subsequent speakers. What I have to say is not a reflection on the income tax department but simply to get information with respect to the arrears of assessments for the various years. I appreciate the tremendous volume of additional work which came to the department during the strenuous and critical days of the war. I take it that there must be serious arrears because, I suppose, accountants, auditors and those who are qualified to do this sort of work are in short supply. I have no doubt that the income tax department has had a great deal of difficulty in recruiting the necessary type of men and women to handle the greatly expanded work which the department was called upon to perform under the new income tax provisions.

I should like the minister to put on record the exact position with respect to the arrears of assessments for the various years. That is important to the committee's work, and perhaps it might give us a truer picture of what the income tax department is really up against.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall make every effort to do that, but if it so happens that it should not be available before we finish the resolutions I am sure the Minister of National Revenue will give that information when his estimates are before the committee. The deputy minister assures me that every effort will be made to get that information as quickly as possible. My hon. friend has pointed out, as it has been pointed out before, that the number of income taxpayers has increased from somewhere between a quarter to half a million before the war to well over two million to-day. Therefore the committee will realize that a tremendously heavy administrative job was thrown on the Department of National Revenue at a time when it was extremely difficult to recruit competent personnel even for other activities. Therefore it is perhaps understandable that returns have not been assessed as promptly as it is desirable, but I can assure the committee that every effort is being made to correct that situation as quickly as possible. I agree with the remarks made by the hon. member for High Park that we should endeavour to get as high a class of personnel as possible in that department.

Mr. BOUCHER: Resolution 7 makes provision for the appointment of one chairman, and two assistant chairmen having specific legal qualifications. Further on, it makes provision for not more than nine other members appointed by the governor in council. The need for having an income tax appeal board is important, but I believe the minister should make a statement as to what specified legal qualifications he intends to impose upon the chairman and the vice-chairman, and also whether or not the same qualifications will be imposed on the other nine. I say that particularly because it would be advantageous to see that the people who sit upon a court of appeal on income tax are not the people who make the assessments or from whose rulings the appeals are made.

Mr. ABBOTT: I agree with that.

Mr. BOUCHER: Will the minister give an explanation.

Mr. ABBOTT: I agree completely with the last part of my hon. friend's remarks. As the resolution indicates, this appeal board is intended to be in effect a tax appeal court. It was felt that the chairmen should be men with legal training because important questions of law will be involved in the interpretation of the Income War Tax Act.

As to the legal qualifications required, I should prefer to deal with those when we bring in the bill, which of course will be very shortly. As the committee knows, the legal qualifications for judges of a high court are that they should have been practising for not less than ten years at the bar of the province in which they are appointed, and I think some similar limitation will be required for these three gentlemen. I do not know whether the hon. gentlemen raised any other points—

Mr. BOUCHER: What about the other six?

Mr. ABBOTT: I might just give my personal view for the moment, that the others would be accountants or perhaps outstanding businessmen. In any event they would not be officials of the Department of National Revenue. The point is that they would be laymen; they would not of necessity have to be members of the legal profession. They might be accountants or men with business experience, or something of that kind.

Mr. FAIR: Perhaps it would be a good thing if on that advisory board we had men who did not belong to the legal profession. Probably the common man, the working man would have a better show if he had some of his own people on that board.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am all for the working man, too, and we shall do the best we can with this board.

Mr. FAIR: I was going to suggest that each occupational group be represented on the board.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that I could agree that every group in the country should necessarily be represented on this income tax appeal board. It is in the nature of a court, and I think the committee may rest assured that we shall endeavour to set up as competent appeal boards as we possibly can. The chairmen will be men with legal qualifications, but aside from that we shall try to get the best men we can for the job that has to be done.

Mr. FLEMING: I should just like to say that if the minister can get men for this appeal board of the type who functioned on the board of referees under the Excess Profits Tax Act he will have gone a long way to set up a satisfactory and competent board.

Mr. ABBOTT: I agree with my hon. friend on that.

Mr. JACKMAN: May I ask why the court which is to be set up under resolution 7, or the board, will not have power to review assessments where the minister's discretion is concerned? As we all know, the minister has discretion in perhaps 150 or 250 cases under the present Income War Tax Act and Excess Profits Tax Act, and that is one of the reasons why there is so much confusion in determining just what is the law of the land. The resolution does not say so, but the minister's remarks in the house clearly implied and the following resolution clearly indicates that this board which is to be set up is not to have power to review matters of discretion. What we have always complained about in this case, as I recall the words of Hon. Mr. Hanson, is that when you appeal from the ruling of the income tax departmen you appeal from Caesar unto Caesar; it goes back along the same channel and the minister simply acts on the advice he receives. As I understand it, the decision of a trial judge may always be appealed on questions of discretion, as to whether or not he has exercised a reasonable amount of discretion or whether he has exceeded his jurisdiction, and I see no reason why we should place a deputy minister in a category higher than that of trial judges throughout the country.

Mr. ABBOTT: We do not, but I shall deal with that in a moment.

Mr. JACKMAN: That will be splendid, because we are interested in ascertaining why matters of discretion cannot be reviewed by the board which is to be set up under resolution 7.

While I am on my feet I should like to say that if the provision still exists and is to be continued under which an appellant must put up a bond of $400 in order to have his case reviewed, I believe the amount should be substantially reduced or done away with entirely.

Mr. ABBOTT: On the matter of discretions, of course that is something on which a good deal has been said in this committee. I must confess that if hon. members look far enough back in Hansard they will see that I had something to say about it myself four or five years ago. The general rule of law, as members of the bar know, is that where a discretion is given to a person under a statute and that discretion is exercised bona fide by the official or deputy minister or whoever it may be who is called upon to exercise it, the courts will not interfere with such exercise. The very words themselves, "the exercise of a discretion" imply that the individual to whom the discretion is given exercises that discretion; and the courts do not review it. The same thing applies in municipal law, for instance, where a city council is granted discretion to issue or refuse a permit for certain purposes. The courts will not issue a writ of mandamus to compel them to do so and will not review the exercise of that discretion unless it is shown that it has been influenced by improper motives. There has been a good deal of criticism of the discretionary powers given under the income war tax act to the minister.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is riddled with them.

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. gentleman says it is riddled with them. The fact remains that in any income tax act I have ever seen it has been necessary in the interests of reasonable and proper administration to give certain discretions to the responsible minister.

I prefaced what I had to say by stating that there had been criticism of the wide discretionary powers which were given. It was felt that you could not give to an appeal court the right to substitute its discretion for the discretion of the minister on whom that power is conferred under the act; but it was desired to avoid as far as possible the feeling that those discretionary powers were exercised arbitrarily and that the taxpayer had no recourse against what he might believe to be an arbitrary exercise of that discretion. Perhaps I might repeat to the committee what the Minister of Finance said in his budget speech, at page 2923 of Hansard on the question of this proposed advisory board:

There is some complaint about the existing provisions of the law in so far as these discretions are concerned. After careful consideration, the government has concluded that an advisory board, separate altogether from the appeal board to which I have referred, should be set up to advise the Minister of National Revenue upon the exercise of certain of his discretionary powers. The house will recall that under the Excess Profits Tax Act a board of referees was set up to advise the minister with regard to standard profits.

The minister was given a discretion with respect to that.

The government's proposal is to establish an income tax advisory board, consisting of a chairman and not less than two and not more than six other members, to which a taxpayer may require the Minister of National Revenue to refer for hearing, consideration and advice, decisions made by the minister in the exercise of specified discretionary powers. I may add that instructions are being given to the interdepartmental drafting committee to explore carefully the possibility of reducing the number of discretions now vested in the minister or at least of providing for their exercise under regulations approved by the governor in council.

If I may say so, I think the setting up of this advisory board is a forward step. Let us see how it operates and how it functions before we condemn it; that is the suggestion I make. My main point is that you cannot and should not set up an appeal court which would exercise powers of discretion vested in a minister of the crown.

Mr. FLEMING: I understood that matter was to be discussed under resolution 8. What is your ruling on that, Mr. Chairman? I have some observations I should like to make in connection with the advisory board.

Mr. ABBOTT: I apologize if I have jumped the gun. Perhaps it might be convenient if hon. members were to take these two sections together; they are closely related and hon. members may want to comment on both at the same time.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like to offer this observation, that while I think the income tax appeal board suggested in resolution 7 is a great step forward, its success will be to a large extent vitiated if the powers assigned to it over assessments are too much confined. The effect of resolution 8 is to narrow greatly the scope of the jurisdiction assigned to the appeal board under resolution 7.

[Mr. Abbott.]

May I remind the committee that the committee which sat in another place and investigated at great length the working and the provisions of the Income War Tax Act made one recommendation with respect to appeals, namely that the appeal board to be set up should have the power of review of the exercise of discretionary powers, as well.

That is not the line taken by the government in these resolutions. The income tax appeal board proposed in resolution 7 will have no power whatsoever to review the exercise by the minister of any of his numerous discretionary powers under the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act.

Mr. ABBOTT: It will have, as my hon. friend realizes, the same power that the exchequer court has to-day.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Resolution 8 has not yet been called.

Mr. ABBOTT: We are dealing with them together.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): It has not yet been called; but if it is satisfactory to the committee to deal with both resolutions at the one time, I shall call it now.

8. That there be established, with provision for the expenses thereof, an income tax advisory board consisting of a chairman and not less than two nor more than six other members appointed by the governor in council to which a taxpayer may require the Minister of National Revenue to refer for hearing, consideration and advice a decision to which the taxpayer objects made by the minister in the exercise of specified discretionary powers in respect of an assessment for the 1946 and subsequent taxation years.

Mr. FLEMING: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. The committee to which I have referred which sat in another place was a competent committee, and pointed out that under the Income War Tax Act there are eighty-eight discretionary powers conferred on the minister, and under the Excess Profits Tax Act no less than twenty-four.

It is obvious that when the Minister of National Revenue on the one hand and the taxpayer on the other are pitted against each other in a dispute under which any of these discretionary powers can be exercised, the taxpayer just has not a chance. He does not enter the contest on an equal footing. For him it is a hopeless contest.

The government in drafting its budget resolutions ought to have given effect to the recommendation put forward by the committee in the other place. The same objections now taken on behalf of the government to that recommendation were before the committee in the other place. They called the officials, heard their objections and reported that, notwithstanding those objections, they still felt there should be power of review of the exercise of discretionary powers, and that the appeal board should not be deprived of the power to review such exercise of power.

At page 382 of the report the committee says:

> Your committee has given consideration to these submissions of the deputy minister and has concluded that they represent a direct conflict of opinion with the suggestion advanced by other witnesses in briefs and examinations, with which suggestions your committee agrees in principle as will be hereafter shown.

It must be clear to this committee that there are some serious defects in the scope of resolution 8 in relation to the law as it will continue to exist if the resolution is confined to its present scope.

In the first place, there is no real power given to the income tax advisory board. As its name implies, and as the resolution clearly demonstrates, it is advisory only. There is no obligation whatsoever upon the minister to accept the advice of this advisory board. The minister refers, as did the Minister of Finance on June 27, to the fact that boards of review which operated under sections 4 and 5 of the Excess Profits Tax Act did not have final power, but had power only to advise the minister. We have not had any statistics from the minister as to those cases, if any, in which the minister chose to reject the advice given him by those boards of review.

My experience with those boards of review was that they were most competent. They had on them some distinguished members. In one instance there was a chief justice acting as chairman, and there were economists and accountants making up the remainder of the board. They gave a good hearing. It was not one confined to too technical procedure. Business people appeared before it, as well as persons represented by counsel. I believe there was no fault whatsoever to find with the procedure.

But unless the minister is prepared to say that the minister took advantage of his power to reject the advice tendered to him by those boards of review, then I say the minister might as well tell us now that such boards ought to be given power, not simply to advise, but to overrule or to vary assessments.

There is the position. Unless these boards are going to make mistakes; unless they are going to go astray, if they are boards which will be composed of competent men, then I suggest that there is no reason why their functions should be confined to the tendering of advice to the minister.

The second qualification as to the scope of resolution 8 is, as I said earlier, that there is still no appeal from the exercise of discretionary powers. But those two qualifications are not the only ones which are objectionable. The third is this, that there is still no attempt being made this year to whittle down or to reduce the number of discretionary powers. That is a serious situation.

I do not need to repeat what I said earlier about the unfairness of a situation in which a taxpayer entering a contest against the Minister of National Revenue is beaten before he starts, so long as the minister can invoke one of these discretionary powers. He is just licked before he starts, if the minister is permitted to invoke one of these eighty-eight discretionary powers given him under the Income War Tax Act. I do not think any government can justify placing itself in a position of such vast superiority over those individual citizens who are called upon to pay taxes and who think they have been unjustly assessed.

That is a situation which, I submit, is so acute that it should not have to wait for another year for remedial action on the part of the government or parliament. It is just as important as those matters with respect to which the government, under resolutions 7 and 8, is proposing to take action—in resolution 7 a good step, and in resolution 8 a most inadequate one.

I urge upon the minister that it is not too late for the government to reconsider resolution 8 and, combining it with resolution 7, to give to the income tax advisory board power to review the exercise of discretionary powers by the Minister of National Revenue; to make it more in that respect than simply an advisory power; to give it real powers.

In the third place, the government should get down to business with respect to this problem of discretionary powers, because it is a problem which is so urgent that it cannot be left deferred. That is my appeal to the acting minister.

Mr. ABBOTT: On the first point raised by the hon. member, I have already answered by saying that to create this appeal court with powers to review the discretion of the minister would be a negation of the doctrine of ministerial responsibility. It was for that same reason that the special board on war contracts depreciation and that on excess profits were made advisory boards.

In the same way this question was given most careful consideration by the government, and it was decided that it could not depart from the principle of ministerial responsibility, where discretionary power is given under the act. This board, therefore, as were other boards, must be an advisory board. As I said earlier, the exchequer court of Canada or any other court cannot and would not to-day review the exercise of discretion conferred upon a minister of the crown under a federal statute.

Mr. FLEMING: That is why I said something must be done to confine these discretionary powers.

Mr. ABBOTT: On the other point, I pointed out what the Minister of Finance said in his budget speech, that every effort would be made by the committee which, I understand, is proceeding with the revision of the Income War Tax Act, to reduce the number of discretionary powers. The committee must realize that with a complex income tax structure such as we have, efficient administration requires that a considerable measure of discretion be given to the executive branch of government.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am not going to continue to argue the legal point about the minister's discretion, in connection with which I have no doubt he is correct, but I want to ask him one practical question. It seems to me that resolution 8 does not produce very much. As I understand it, the minister exercises discretion and then, if objection is made, the board comes in.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): They are going to advise whether he was wrong?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I do not think that is going to produce anything. After all, no minister is likely to admit that he was wrong.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh, yes, we do.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Not in this lower world. It seems to me that this is locking the door after the horse is stolen. I really do not think anything is going to happen under resolution 8. I have never been a minister, and I have no doubt that when one does become a minister he puts aside many of his lower qualities. I take it that when the minister has exercised his discretion it will take some drastic action to make him change. I am putting this forward seriously and not in an effort to make difficulty. I think we all want to bring about something practicable. I maintain that this board will be coming in too late, after the minister has exercised discretion. It would seem to me to be much more sensible if the board were to come in at an earlier stage. I do not take such a favourable view of this board as does the hon. member for Eglinton. The minister said in his speech, as reported on page 2923 of Hansard:

> The proposed board will decide questions of fact and law in the same manner as any other court.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is the appeal board.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am talking about the appeal board.

> It will not, however, have the power to exercise or review the discretions vested in the Minister of National Revenue by the Income War Tax Act.

There again, if the minister has exercised discretion, unless he has been palpably wrong, will the findings of the board have any effect upon discretion that he has already exercised? Is he going to go back and say that he was all wrong?

Mr. ABBOTT: The powers of this board with respect to the discretionary powers exercised by the minister will be exactly the same as those exercised to-day by the exchequer court of Canada, or any other court for that matter. If it happened to be a federal matter it would come to the exchequer court, but in the province of Quebec, where discretion is given to local authorities by a number of statutes, the power would be exercised by the superior court with appeal to the court of appeal. The point which I made earlier, and which I think my hon. friend appreciated, was that the court does not review the discretion exercised by the person to whom it is entrusted. It deals with the question of whether the discretion was properly exercised. This board will have that power and there will be further appeal to the exchequer court.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): As I said a moment ago, it seems to me that this is all too late; it is locking the door after the horse is stolen; it is acting after the discretion has been exercised.

Mr. BOUCHER: If a taxpayer asks the minister to submit his problem to this income tax advisory board, will the decision of the board, whether it be in approval or disapproval of the minister's discretion, be a matter of record so that it may be taken as a precedent for other cases? Will it be a matter of public information, or will it be considered as merely departmental advice and not for public use?

Mr. ABBOTT: I must confess that I have not given my hon. friend's question any consideration, but offhand I would think the report should be available as a precedent. I should like to give the matter some consideration and perhaps deal a little more fully with it when we come to the section of the bill providing for the creation of this board.

Mr. BOUCHER: The tax appeal board is to be a court of record and all the decisions given will be available and useful for the future, but here is a board dealing with the discretion of the minister. A taxpayer may complain and ask the minister to place his case before the advisory board. He may then not be able to find out the reaction of that advisory board unless its decisions are made a matter of public record.

Mr. ABBOTT: One of the questions that would have to be considered is the matter of secrecy. At the present time, when a case is taken to the exchequer court a taxpayer may ask that the general proceedings be not made public. Of course the judgment has to be.

Mr. McMASTER: I had in mind the very thing the hon. member for Carleton has spoken about. I am afraid we are making too much of this matter of secrecy. It is quite all right not to publish to the world a person's private business, but where a matter is of such importance that it has to go before the minister or before a court it becomes a matter of public concern. The law is quite clear. The minister is really the judge in the first instance. He exercises discretion and that discretion becomes law. That law can be changed only by this parliament. As the hon. member for Carleton says, it is important that everyone knows what that discretion is so that he may be governed accordingly. Take the discretion in connection with double depreciation as an example. You will have to consider whether or not that should be made public so that people will know how to act. It is important to everyone to know how the government of Canada, through the minister, is exercising this discretion.

Mr. ABBOTT: That can be done so long as it is not revealing the private business of the taxpayer.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is the provision of section 81 of the Income War Tax Act, which is already part of the legislation and provides for secrecy with regard to income tax matters. The government seems to consider that provision as being sacrosanct, instead of realizing that here is a case where the validity of the section is being challenged.

Mr. ABBOTT: It does not challenge it at all.

Mr. KNOWLES: I have never accepted the validity of the section. As a matter of fact, several times I have moved an amendment to have it changed. It seems to me that the suggestion of the hon. member for High Park is a valid one. When a matter is contested the public show know the facts of the case.

Mr. ABBOTT: The public is entitled to know the principle which is decided by this appeal board the same as it is entitled to know the principle which is decided by the exchequer court, but all the facts which may concern the private business of the taxpayer have no general interest. I think it is perfectly proper that the secrecy rule should be observed. The public is entitled to know the finding on the question of principle, the disposition of the appeal, whether the taxpayer is held liable or not and the reason why, but I do not think the public should be entitled to pry into private affairs.

Mr. KNOWLES: Two or three years ago the Steel Company of Canada was involved in a labour dispute. I am not referring to the one now being considered by the standing committee on industrial relations. During the course of the dispute large advertisements appeared in newspapers across Canada over the name of the company, attacking the position of the union. Members of the union were anxious to know whether or not the cost of that advertising, which I submit was anti-union, was allowed as a deduction. I made an effort to secure the information, but was told that because of section 81 of this act it could not be given. I submit there are cases like that where merely to be told the principle is not good enough; the public is entitled to know what interpretation is being made of that principle. I suggest that this whole question of secrecy should now be reviewed.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wonder whether the minister could tell us the attitude on this point. What steps are contemplated to enable the ordinary taxpayer to know of the existence of this advisory board? Is any provision made whereby the ordinary taxpayer can obtain skilful assistance in presenting his case to the board? I think every hon. member has had a number of these matters brought to his attention, and he himself has become more or less the advocate of his constituents before the Department of Finance. I am wondering if there is any provision, other than by a member of parliament, whereby a taxpayer can have his case presented and know just what to do?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think the measure when adopted, as I anticipate it will be, will be given wide publicity through the press. As to what steps can be taken to assist taxpayers in preparing appeals, I am afraid I am not in a position to make any statement at the moment. Possibly that can be considered a little later on.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The trouble is that the ordinary taxpayer, like the ordinary farmer, is utterly bewildered by the complexity of this whole income tax situation, and he does not know where to go to get scientific advice or assistance to present his case. The result is that he is just haunted and driven. I wonder if it is not time that we had some means of giving a little assistance to the ordinary taxpayer.

Mr. ABBOTT: I suppose it would be indelicate for me to suggest that he should go and see a good lawyer.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The trouble with respect to going and seeing a lawyer is that there is expense involved, and the ordinary taxpayer has enough expense without going to see a lawyer.

An hon. MEMBER: The lawyers have to live too.

Mr. FLEMING: Would the minister give the committee, not necessarily to-day but perhaps to-morrow when the bill comes up, a report on the number of cases that were heard by the board of referees under section 5 of the Excess Profits Tax Act, the disposition by the minister, and the advice given to him by that board in these cases? I think it would be interesting to the committee to know in how many cases the advice was accepted, in how many it was rejected, and in how many it was varied.

Mr. JACKMAN: And how many cases are yet pending.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think these figures could be obtained, and, as I said in reply to a similar question before, if they are not available when we are considering the resolutions they may be available when the Minister of National Revenue presents his estimates.

Mr. JACKMAN: When an appeal is taken to the exchequer court, are not all the facts published in the reports of the court?

Mr. ABBOTT: No. It is open to the taxpayer to ask that the proceedings be held in camera.

Mr. JACKMAN: I may say it is not very often that I find myself in agreement with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre; but it seems to me that secrecy is a bit overstretched in these cases, and in the public interest I think we must, to some extent at least, if not entirely, waive the delights of secrecy in order that we may build up a body of case law, of precedents, so that taxpayers throughout the country will know where they stand, and what the decision was in any case, so that they may judge their own case accordingly.

Mr. ABBOTT: That information can be revealed in the judgment and findings of the court without indicating names or particulars which would identify the particular parties involved. As my hon. friend probably knows, that practice is followed in the United Kingdom, I think in the United States, and probably by our own courts here.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am not a "good lawyer"; I do not know.

Mr. ABBOTT: In other words, the necessary facts can be indicated in the finding of the courts to enable a proper appreciation of the judgment, without indicating the identity of the persons involved. My own feeling is that that is a proper and necessary protection. Quite a number of people might be reluctant to take an income tax appeal on a perfectly proper matter if the whole of their private affairs had to be laid before the general public; and I can see no useful purpose which would be served in doing that. I think all that is necessary is that the court should render its judgment in such form as to make clearly evident the principles on which it has proceeded in arriving at that decision; and, granted that that is done, I think that is all the public interest requires.

Mr. JACKMAN: After listening to the explanation of the minister, which seems very satisfactory, I shall never again be tempted to agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is a bad habit.

Mr. KNOWLES: That proves I was right.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It proves you were both wrong.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is not the principle of secrecy one of the main planks of the income tax law? It is required that your return shall be kept secret. The minister made a facetious remark which I think had a certain amount of merit in it; he said, why not get a good lawyer to make out your income tax? Well, I, like many members of this house, have had the pleasure of meeting civil servants employed in the income tax department, and there I had a real complaint brought to my attention, as no doubt it has been to several other members of the house, as to the amount of extra and difficult work they have to do with regard to making out the extremely complicated present income tax reforms, despite all the efforts at simplification. These people are greatly overworked, and I suggest that some consideration be given to a deduction from the income tax to enable taxpayers to employ, I will not say a "good lawyer", but counsel to make out their income tax return. It would greatly simplify the work of the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. ABBOTT: Speaking as a lawyer I find my hon. friend's suggestion interesting. I do not know that it would be practicable.

Mr. BOUCHER: I think I must be drawn into this fray. Many people come to me and ask me to help them make out their income tax returns because, I believe, lawyers as a rule do not want to take the time and trouble of making these out.

Mr. McCANN: The form is so simple now that anybody can make it out.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried.

Mr. ABBOTT: Do I understand that resolutions 7 and 8 are carried?

The CHAIRMAN: They are carried.

Resolutions 7 and 8 agreed to.

Progress reported.

PRIVILEGE

VETERANS AFFAIRS COMMITTEE—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN OTTAWA "JOURNAL".

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Just before we adjourn, I have been instructed by the special committee on veterans affairs to raise a question of privilege. The Ottawa Journal in its leading editorial of July 24 has this to say:

Job Preference for Veterans

Against the considered advice of Mr. Charles H. Bland, chairman of the civil service commission, and Mr. Walter S. Woods, Deputy Minister of Veterans Affairs, a majority of members of the veterans affairs committee of the commons favour extension of the veterans preference for government jobs to men whose service has been confined to Canada during the war years. Since before the end of world war I this preference has applied only to men and women with overseas service.

I suppose that is based on a report in the same paper of Monday July 22, which has a subheading:

Would include Crown Companies, Government Agencies.
C.S. Chairman and Deputy Minister Oppose Move.

The move to extend the preference to crown companies and government agencies was not opposed by the chairman of the civil service commission and the deputy minister, and it was actually embodied in a resolution reported to this house in Votes and Proceedings of Tuesday, July 23. Our committee recommended as follows:

that the present civil service preference for disabled veterans and veterans who served overseas be extended to cover all employment both temporary and permanent, by dominion government agencies, inclusive of crown companies.

That was not opposed by the deputy minister or by the committee. The report says, however:

The committee while delaying its decision to the final report, favoured such action.

That is, widening the preference to include all home service personnel who joined the armed forces on a voluntary basis. The report states that our committee favoured that action.

The point I wish to make is that the only decision which we arrived at was reported to the house. We made no decision to extend the preference to those whose service had been confined to Canada during the war. No decision in that regard was made by the committee. That matter is still under consideration, and it is felt that this correction should be made for fear it might be thought that the committee has already come to a decision on the question. The committee felt that the newspaper reports have so far been accurate and satisfactory, and it is quite distasteful to us to draw attention to this apparent misunderstanding.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, July 25, 1946

The house met at 11 o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

QUESTIONS DROPPED FROM THE ORDER PAPER—DECISION OF MR. SPEAKER

Mr. SPEAKER: In view of the discussion that has taken place, I thought it would be helpful to the members of the house to give a decision, subject to appeal, with regard to the placing of questions on the order paper.

As hon. members of the house know, it is the Clerk's duty to scrutinize the questions submitted by members for the order paper of the house in order that, if these offend the rules, proper action may be taken in order to conform therewith. Bourinot, fourth edition, page 313, states:

> It is the duty of the Clerk to point out any irregularities to the Speaker, as in the case of notices of motion, and if the latter is of the same opinion he will order the Clerk to communicate with the member so that he may have an opportunity of amending his notice.

I am informed that for the past few years a practice has developed whereby the Clerk communicates with the member before seeing the Speaker. It is only where the Clerk has serious doubts as to the proper course to follow that he consults the Speaker.

Mr. Fraser, member of parliament for Peterborough West, sent to the Clerk a number of questions inquiring as to the number of motorcycles declared surplus—I emphasize those words, "declared surplus"—by the army and air departments, and asking how many of those vehicles had been disposed of through War Assets Corporation.

Doctor Beauchesne, the Clerk of the House, pointed out to the hon. member that the information sought dealt with matters referred to the special committee on war expenditures and economies, which was appointed on March 22 to examine the expenditures defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament for national defence and demobilization and for other services directly connected with the war, including—and again I emphasize those words —the disposal of surplus war assets. He returned them to Mr. Fraser, and on the next day I made a statement in the house to the effect that the committee was the proper authority from which the information ought to be obtained. Immediately after I had made that statement Mr. Fraser sent the questions again to the Clerk, who understood this as meaning that they should be sent to the war expenditures and economies committee, and he forwarded them to the chairman of that committee.

The said questions were not submitted to me and I did not give any direction as to their admissibility on the order paper, but in looking into the matter I find that the action taken by the Clerk was justified by the following citation from May's fourteenth edition, recently published, and edited by Sir Gilbert Campion, the present Clerk of the United Kingdom House of Commons. At page 337 Campion gives the following as a type of question which may be enumerated as being out of order:

> Dealing with matters referred to a royal commission or with matters before a parliamentary committee.

[Mr. Speaker.]

There can be no doubt that Mr. Fraser's questions dealing with war assets referred to matters which had been specifically and distinctly referred to the select committee on war expenditures and economies. The recognized authorities all agree that where a specific matter has been referred to a committee of the house, questions relating thereto were inadmissible, and we properly look to the authorities in Canada and in Great Britain to guide us in the practices and usages that have grown up in the parliamentary system in Canada.

The Speaker has a clear duty to interpret, as best he can, the rules in force and to apply them sensibly to different matters that call for a decision on his part. I can assure hon. members that I have no desire but to carry out this duty fairly and impartially. In case of doubt I shall always decide in favour of free speech and a broad interpretation of the rules which are recognized as a great protection to the members of the house in their assertion of their parliamentary rights and privileges, and particularly to His Majesty's loyal opposition and other parties in minority in the house. I know that members will desire me to uphold that spirit of harmony between the Speaker and all members so much needed in the conduct of the business of the house.

The admissibility of questions on the order paper is complicated during this session by the fact that matters dealing with the affairs of several departments have been referred to select and standing committees by an order of the house, and if the rule is applied too rigidly members might be deprived of their right to inquire into every phase of the public service. There was no doubt as to Mr. Fraser's questions not being admissible, but I would not shut the door to inquiries about the Department of Reconstruction on the ground that the war expenditures and economies committee is functioning, or about any other department because another select committee is functioning. As long as the matter has not been specifically referred I am of the opinion that it may be made the subject of a question to be placed on the order paper. There are certain questions that may be described as borderline cases, that is to say, which concern matters referred in general to a committee of the house, but which do not include themselves in the actual work of the committees. In such cases I have no hesitation in allowing these questions to be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Castleden's question appeared on the order paper on Wednesday, the 10th, was taken off on Friday the 19th, and restored on Tuesday, the 23rd, without my knowledge. This action was taken by the Clerk of the House because the question was of the same nature as Mr. Fraser's. On second thought, however, the Clerk realized that there was a serious doubt as to whether or not anything can be taken off the order paper without the consent of the house, and he immediately instructed Mr. Sherwood to restore the question in its proper place. He based his action for this on the ground that all orders appearing on the order paper have been placed there by a standing order, which means by command of the house. Standing order 44 authorizes the placing of questions on the order paper seeking information from ministers relating to public affairs, and standing order 45 lays down that forty-eight hours' notice must be given for placing an order on the order paper. The effect of these two standing orders is that a question is the possession of the house from the moment it appears on the order paper, and even the sponsor should not have the right to withdraw it without the consent of the house. When Mr. Castleden's question was called from the chair in the house on Thursday the 11th, and allowed to stand, no decision was given by a vote but the question was disposed of in a manner which cannot be overlooked and is binding on the officers of the house. With this, I am in perfect agreement.

In conclusion, I think it is, generally speaking, a wise rule that provides that while a committee is inquiring into a matter the house will not encroach on its jurisdiction by allowing the same matter to be discussed in the house, but members must not be debarred from seeking information by placing on the order paper questions which are not debatable and do not give rise to discussion. As long as these questions do not deal with the very specific matter referred to, they should be permitted to appear on the order paper.

Hon. members will remember that I started this memorandum by saying:

> In view of the discussion that has taken place, I thought it would be helpful to members of the house to give a decision, subject to appeal, with regard to the placing of questions on the order paper.

What I read to hon. members is based on standing order 12, which reads as follows:

> Mr. Speaker shall preserve order and decorum, and shall decide questions of order, subject to an appeal to the house without debate.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that you have been good enough to suggest that this matter should be subject to appeal and decision by the house, may I be permitted to say a word in connection with your ruling?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry, but the hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that I cannot permit a debate on the ruling, according to standing order 12 which I just read to the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: If that is so, and we are to be prevented under this ruling, as I understand it, from putting questions on the order paper relating to the War Assets Corporation, then I respectfully suggest that we should appeal your ruling now.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those in favour of the Speaker's decision—

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, if I may say a word—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was just going to say that—

Mr. GRAYDON: I want a word—

Mr. COLDWELL: Would Your Honour make the decision clear? I did not understand your decision as the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) seems to interpret it. My understanding is that questions will be permitted on the order paper when the subject matter of these questions is not referred specifically to a committee, which makes all the difference in the world.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is right.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think that is a ruling which the house should substantiate, because I think it is a correct one.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is perfectly right, and for the information of the house I shall read the conclusion of my remarks:

> In conclusion, I think it is, generally speaking, a wise rule that provides that while a committee is inquiring into a matter the house will not encroach on its jurisdiction by allowing the same matter to be discussed in the house, but members must not be debarred from seeking information by placing on the order paper questions which are not debatable and do not give rise to discussions. As long as these questions do not deal with the very specific matter referred to, they should be permitted to appear on the order paper.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, may I just ask for clarification of that point?—because I think it is important when there is an appeal to be made. Questions which refer to the War Assets Corporation apparently cannot be asked in the house?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think that what I have read to hon. members is quite clear. I do not think it is proper to have questions put to the Speaker from the floor of the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then I desire to ask for an appeal.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand that the hon. gentleman is now appealing the decision?

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I suggest to the house that this matter stand in abeyance until to-morrow and until hon. members have had the opportunity of reading the carefully prepared statement of Mr. Speaker? —and then they may possibly record their judgment accordingly. Would that be satisfactory?

Mr. GRAYDON: On one condition—that we have an opportunity of at least saying a word in connection with this ruling. It is not fair that we should be barred entirely from any discussion in connection with it.

Mr. FRASER: As I am the one affected, may I ask a question?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I will not permit a debate, and I will not permit to happen again what happened these last days. I put the question, does the hon. member wish to appeal the decision?

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member desires to appeal from the decision.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

WHEAT

AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED KINGDOM

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that agreement has been reached between the government of the United Kingdom and the government of Canada for the purchase by the former of Canadian wheat over the four years beginning 1st August, 1946.

The agreement provides that the United Kingdom will purchase and the Canadian government will supply the following quantities each year: 1946-47—160 million bushels; 1947-48—160 million bushels; 1948-49—140 million bushels; 1949-50—140 million bushels. The contract provides that in the event of the United Kingdom requiring from Canada any additional quantities of wheat that the Canadian government is prepared to make available, such additional quantities as the Canadian government offers and the United Kingdom government accepts shall in all respects be subject to the provisions of the agreement. Part of the quantity of wheat specified in the contract will be supplied in the form of flour to the following amounts: 1946-47—500,000 tons firm with an additional quantity up to 140,000 tons dependent upon the out-turn of the crop; 1947-48—400,000 tons firm with an additional quantity up to 140,000 tons dependent upon the out-turn of the crop; 1948-49—a minimum of 300,000 tons, the actual tonnage to be negotiated by 1st July, 1947; 1949-50—a minimum of 300,000 tons, the actual tonnage to be negotiated by 1st July, 1948.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are those long or short tons?

Mr. MacKINNON: Long tons.

The price which the United Kingdom government undertake to pay for the wheat supplied is as follows, basis No. 1 Manitoba northern, in store Fort William-Port Arthur, Vancouver or Churchill: 1946-47—a fixed price of 1·55 dollars per bushel; 1947-48—a fixed price of 1·55 dollars per bushel; 1948-49—a minimum price of 1·25 dollars per bushel, the actual price to be negotiated by 31st December, 1947; 1949-50—a minimum price of one dollar per bushel, the actual price to be negotiated by 31st December, 1948.

The contract provides that its terms and conditions shall be subject to any modification or amendment which may be necessary to bring it into conformity with any international agreements or arrangements later concluded to which both governments are parties. Nothing in the agreement will affect decisions which may be taken on the basis of recommendations of the International Emergency Food Council.

The contract is based upon commercial considerations of mutual interest. It ensures to the United Kingdom substantial quantities of wheat during the expected period of shortage at prices below those which would be payable were there to be a free market at the present time. This is the commercial advantage which the United Kingdom secures. In the later period of the contract Canada receives the advantages of a guaranteed market, though for a diminished quantity, and of the assurance of at least the stated minimum prices. In determining the actual price in the last two years regard will be had to the extent to which the agreed price for the first two years falls below the world price for that period. Our farmers are therefore protected from crippling losses should there be a world slump in wheat prices. This is the commercial advantage which Canada secures.

I wish to table three copies in English and three copies in French of the agreement signed between the government of the United Kingdom and the government of Canada.

Mr. BRACKEN: I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of the announcement he has just made. The house is aware that the practice has grown up of permitting members of the government to make statements at the opening of the house, which statements are not debatable. I do not wish to infringe that rule, but I should like to ask the minister or the Acting Prime Minister if they have in mind providing an opportunity for discussion of the policy just announced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

[Mr. MacKinnon.]

Mr. MacKINNON: Mr. Speaker, I anticipate that the estimates of my department will be before the house very soon, and at that time there will be an opportunity for full discussion.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask the minister a question? Were any of the agricultural organizations, the federation of agriculture or the western pools, consulted before the agreement with Britain was signed?

Mr. MacKINNON: Not as to details of the contract—not as to prices or details—but conversations took place in general terms with representatives of the pools and, I believe, the Canadian federation of agriculture, and almost anybody interested in the problem.

Mr. COLDWELL: But not as regards quantities or prices?

Mr. MacKINNON: I do not think that actual quantities or actual prices were specifically revealed to anybody.

IMMIGRATION

ADMISSION TO CANADA OF MEMBERS OF POLISH ARMY FOR AGRICULTURAL PURSUITS

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): I have a statement I should like to make to the house with respect to the admission to Canada of a certain number of members of the Polish armed services to engage in agricultural pursuits. Hon. members are no doubt aware that the government of the United Kingdom, honouring undertakings given somewhat earlier, has obligated itself to find domicile for members of the Polish army which served with the allied forces, who may not choose to return to Poland immediately.

It is estimated that in all there were 159,000 men in this army: what portion have not been disbanded are now located partly in Italy and partly in the United Kingdom. It is well known that this Polish army served faithfully and well the common cause of the united nations, that the individual served with courage and distinction, and that most of these men have chosen not to return to Poland at this time. It is perhaps not unnatural that the government of Canada should give some thought to assisting in the establishment in civilian life of these Polish nationals who so staunchly aided the allied cause in securing the victorious outcome of hostilities and who now face peculiar difficulties in regard to demobilization.

In the circumstances the government has reviewed the situation to see whether we could render any assistance. And we have also considered as related to the first problem of the establishment of these Polish nationals the fact that at the present time there still exists in Canada an acute shortage of suitable labour for agricultural employment, not only on a seasonal basis but as a more or less permanent situation.

In surveying the problems involved the government had the benefit of advice from an interdepartmental committee which was set up under the chairmanship of A. MacNamara, deputy minister of labour, and upon which there were representatives also of the Department of External Affairs, of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and of the immigration branch of mines and resources.

After due consideration by the government of all the factors involved, the Ministers of Labour and Mines and Resources have recommended to cabinet council that a limited number of single ex-members of these Polish armed forces should be admitted to Canada conditionally for farm work.

The recommendation of the two ministers has now been approved by the governor in council P.C. 3112 of July 23, 1946. It authorizes a programme for assisting our farm labour problem, while at the same time sharing to some extent in the solution of an allied problem. I might summarize the main points of the order in council as follows:

1. Four thousand single ex-members of the Polish armed forces who served with the allied forces will be admitted to Canada shortly, on a conditional basis.

2. The men admitted must be qualified for and willing to undertake agricultural employment in Canada.

3. The Minister of Labour is authorized to arrange for representatives of the immigration branch of Mines and Resources, of the Department of Labour and of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to proceed to the United Kingdom and Italy to select the 4,000 suitable men to come to Canada for agricultural employment.

4. The facilities of the national employment service will be utilized for the work of placing these men on farms, but provision is also made for dominion-provincial agreements if it be found desirable to arrange for the assistance of the provinces in connection with the task of placement.

5. Every Polish soldier admitted to Canada will be required to sign an undertaking that for a period of two years following arrival he will accept direction to farm employment and will remain at agricultural work.

6. Steps will be taken to ensure that the men admitted are engaged at current wages and in accordance with living and working conditions prevailing in the locality of employment.

7. The United Kingdom will bear the cost and responsibility of transporting the men to Canada and the Canadian government will bear the cost of distribution within Canada.

8. The order in council sets forth a declaration that each man admitted to Canada under this arrangement who fulfils for two years after arrival the terms and conditions under which he is admitted will then be granted permanent admission to Canada.

It is understood, of course, that any man who fails to carry out his obligation in relation to farm employment, or whose deportation becomes necessary otherwise, shall be returned to the United Kingdom.

I wish to lay on the table a copy of order in council P.C. 3112 of July 23, 1946, as referred to in this statement.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the minister any information with respect to whether it will be married or single men who will be brought in?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The order in council provides for the admission of 4,000 single men to be chosen because of their qualifications and willingness to engage in agricultural pursuits.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it they will be experienced farm help.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is the intention. Representatives of the three departments affected are proceeding overseas to interview the men and to make sure that they will be in position to carry out the undertaking they will be requested to sign.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Will these immigrants take precedence over refugees?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not sure that I understand the hon. member's question. I will consider it and see what form of answer should be made. These persons will be chosen and their transportation to Canada will be arranged as a joint undertaking of the government of the United Kingdom and the government of Canada. I am not in position at the moment to say if it will interfere in any way with the movement of other persons.

Mr. HOMUTH: At least they were allied soldiers.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do I understand that all these Polish citizens are to be compelled to work on farms? In my experience there have been many Poles working in industry, particularly in the iron and steel foundry business, and they were excellent moulders. There have been no better men in the foundry business than the Poles, and I should not like to think that they were to be barred from taking positions in foundries, in which they have demonstrated that they are as good as the best moulders in the country.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The order in council which I tabled this morning makes provision only for four thousand persons qualified and willing to engage for a period of at least two years in agricultural pursuits.

Mr. CHURCH: Could not agricultural workers also be brought into Canada from Holland or Great Britain? Men from these countries have done wonderful work in North York.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I shall have to take the hon. member's question as a notice of a matter to be given consideration by the government. The announcement I made had to do with the members of the Polish army who found it would be difficult to return to Poland at the present time and for whom the government of the United Kingdom has undertaken to find domicile. The question my hon. friend raises is one which will have to be considered on other grounds than those which motivated the action which I announced this morning.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

AIRCRAFT MISSING OUT OF KAPUSKASING—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SAFETY OF PILOT

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Minister of National Defence for Air): Hon. members of the house will remember that on June 29 a Meteor jet-propelled aircraft flying from Kapuskasing was reported as missing. In spite of an intense search covering several weeks no trace of the missing plane or pilot was found. I am glad to inform the members of the house that a report has been received to-day that the pilot of the plane, Flight-Lieutenant W. H. McKenzie, has walked into Blind River, nearly four weeks after he was reported missing.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

RESIGNATION OF CHAIRMAN OF COMMISSION EFFECTIVE SEPTEMBER 30

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I wish to announce to the house that the government has received the resignation of Mr. Louis J. Trottier, of Montreal, as chairman of the unemployment insurance commission, effective September 30 next. The resignation of Mr. Trottier has been accepted as of that date with regret. Announcement of the appointment of a new chairman will be made as soon as possible. For the information of the house I table herewith copy of Mr. Trottier's letter of resignation and copy of my reply.

WAR CRIMES

REENACTMENT OF REGULATIONS MADE BY ORDER IN COUNCIL

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 309, respecting war crimes.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would the minister explain?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The explanation may be very short. This is a bill to reenact in statutory form the regulations that were made by order in council with respect to the trial of war criminals. The bill will provide that it shall remain in force until such date as is fixed by a proclamation to be published in the official Gazette. It is not thought that it is necessary to have the regulations in force as permanent legislation, but it is felt that it is necessary that they be in force for a longer period than would prevail under the order in council.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PASSPORTS

Mr. FRASER:

1. How many passports have been issued by the passport branch of the External Affairs Department since June 1, 1945?

2. How many of these were issued for travel to the United Kingdom?

3. How many were issued for travel to the United States of America?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. From 1st June, 1945 to 23rd July 1946, Passport Office, Ottawa, issued 56,193 new passports and 21,518 renewals. Numbers of passports and renewals issued by missions abroad are not immediately available.

2. From 1st June 1945 to 17th April 1946, 18,564 new passports and 5,204 renewals of passports were endorsed valid for the United Kingdom. Figures for endorsements since April 17, 1946, are not immediately available due to a change of procedure in registration.

3. All Canadian passports are valid for travel to the United States of America.

MUD LAKE INDIANS—FRANCHISE

Mr. FRASER:

How many Indians of the Mud Lake Indian reserve, Peterborough county, have been enfranchised during the past ten years?

Mr. GLEN: One.

VETERANS REHABILITATION

LOANS TO UNIVERSITIES, TRAINING OUTSIDE OF CANADA, ETC.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Veterans Rehabilitation Act, whereby provision is made, inter alia, that the Minister of Veterans Affairs may,

(a) provide Canadian universities with moneys to enable them to make, as an emergency measure, small loans to veterans attending universities and also to pay expenses of repatriation of certain veterans discharged in the United Kingdom in order to take training outside of Canada and to pay transportation expenses of the wife and child of such veterans from the United Kingdom to Canada or other designated place outside of Canada;

(b) provide training and re-training and pay allowances to a pensioner requiring such training by reason of an increase in his disabilities.

Provision is also made for entitlement of a member or former member of the Canadian forces to the statutory allowances and benefits in respect of all of his full-time service, if he is not accepted as a member of the permanent or regular force, or is not accepted for service for a special prescribed period; also for bringing a veteran suffering personal injury by accident when in training under the Government Employees Compensation Act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Mr. BENTLEY: Mr. Speaker, if it is in order for me to ask a question at this stage, I would point out that the veterans affairs committee also recommended that provision be made for out-of-work benefits for those who are waiting to take vocational training where the facilities are not yet available, and that is not included in the resolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I will take my hon. friend's question into consideration.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHURCH—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN TORONTO "GLOBE AND MAIL"

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege I call attention to a report in this Morning's Globe and Mail in which I am quoted as using words I never used. The report in the Globe and Mail says that I said that——the housing shortage was caused by taxation because those in building industry did not consider it worth while to work overtime.

I never used those words. The report goes on:

He also expressed criticism of the proposal to defer tax relief until next year. The government should legislate for 1946 not 1947.

I said that. Then adds that I said:

Everyone was complaining about the budget.

I never said that.

FIELD MARSHAL MONTGOMERY

ARRANGEMENTS FOR VISIT TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the acting Minister of External Affairs, perhaps in his capacity as leader of the government. I would ask him to acquaint the house with the progress being made in the plans of the government for the forthcoming visit of Field Marshal Viscount Montgomery. I understand that he is arriving in Canada during the coming month, and I am sure that the house and the country would be glad to know what plans the government has in mind for his welcome and for his itinerary.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for letting me know yesterday that he was going to ask this question so that I could get the information and be in a position to make some reply to-day. The information that has been supplied to me is this.

Speaking here shortly before his departure for London last May, the Prime Minister announced that Field Marshal Viscount Montgomery would be visiting Canada some time during the latter part of August or early in September. Owing to the present irregularity of trans-Atlantic sailings, the actual date of the field marshal's arrival had not become definite until within the last day or two. It is now fairly certain, however, that he will arrive in Halifax by boat on August 24.

Field Marshal Montgomery is coming as a guest of the Canadian government, and arrangements for his tour have been made by an inter-departmental committee working in conjunction with provincial and civic authorities through the military authorities in the various military districts. As Field Marshal Montgomery has undertaken to arrive in Washington on September 10, his tour in Canada will be comparatively brief. In order to permit him to visit all the provinces during the short time he will be here, the field marshal will travel almost entirely by air.

A schedule covering the dates of Field Marshal Montgomery's visits to the various provinces will be issued as soon as arrangements are complete.

SUNNYBROOK HOSPITAL

INQUIRY AS TO COMPLETION OF BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): This is the eighty-eighth day of the session and so far we have had no information regarding the completion of Sunnybrook hospital. Would the minister be good enough to make a short statement as to when the men will be moved in. It is reported that 150 will be moved in on September 15.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): I will take the hon. gentleman's question as notice. I may remind him, however, that I have been sending him progress reports regularly on the work that is being done at Sunnybrook.

Mr. CHURCH: May I ask whether the reports in the newspapers are correct—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

GRAIN

FROST DAMAGE TO WESTERN CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct to the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question with reference to the report, a couple of days ago, of damage to the western grain crop through frost. I have given him no intimation of the question and he may not have a full answer at hand. The question is whether his department has made any estimate of the damage to the western crop as a result of that frost and whether that damage is likely to have any serious effect on the output of grain in the western provinces this year. If the minister does not feel in a position to answer the question to-day perhaps he will take it into consideration and give a reply at an early opportunity.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The information that has come to me has come through the Canadian wheat board at Winnipeg, gathered by them from representatives throughout western Canada. The information I have is that there were serious low temperatures covering a very considerable area of Alberta and running into Saskatchewan. I am told by those who know that it is difficult to make any accurate estimate of what the damage may be, because, as we know, in such frosts in western Canada certain parts here and there are hit where other parts escape. In a great many cases it will be impossible to know what damage has been done until threshing. I shall make inquiries, and if I can give a more informative answer I shall be glad to do so.

FREE PORTS

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. K. HAZEN (St. John-Albert): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Transport. I have not given him notice of it, although I tried to do so. Has a report been received from the free-port interdepartmental committee? If so, will it be tabled this session.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): The report has not yet been received from the free-port committee, and that for several reasons. A number of cities in the dominion have asked for leave to present briefs. The briefs are not all in, and from my present knowledge of the situation I do not expect that the report will be made before the end of the session.

SUPPLY

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Mr. ABBOTT moved:

That a sum not exceeding $136,598,972.86, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted, as set forth in the estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1947, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty on account for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1947.

Resolution read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. ABBOTT moved:

That towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1947, the sum of $136,598,972.86, being one-twelfth of the main estimates, be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 310, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1947.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the first time.

Mr. ABBOTT moved the second reading of the bill.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is the bill printed?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is printed and is in identical form with the bill passed on June 25. It asks for one-twelfth of the estimates as submitted to the house.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I think the Acting Minister of Finance ought to give a little more information. Will he tell us what interim supply has already been granted by the house?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: Give us a little detail.

Mr. ABBOTT: Four-twelfths have already been granted. It might be expected that that amount should cover requirements for the four months period to July 31; but in practice this does not follow, owing to the seasonal nature of many of the activities that must be undertaken in the early part of the year and others where the demands are normally heavy during the first few months of the year, such as the sessional expenses of the Senate and the House of Commons.

A further complication this year is the large number of services which are closing out or materially curtailing their activities progressively during the year, and for which provision is included in the estimates on that basis. The additional proportions previously granted were to provide for a selected number of special items covering services which would have been seriously hampered without such additional provision. Many other services are affected to a lesser degree, but to a point where present supply is inadequate to pay accounts now on hand and to provide for salaries payable by the end of this month. In view of these circumstances it is necessary to ask for further interim supply at this time.

As I said a moment ago, the bill submitted asks for one-twelfth of all items to be voted in the estimates now before the house and is in exactly the same terms as the bill which was passed on June 25 last. When passed it will have provided for five-twelfths of the main estimates.

Mr. BRACKEN: Mr. Speaker, the measure proposed by the Acting Minister of Finance asks for interim supply for another month, and after four months' interim supply have already been voted without question by parliament. The official opposition will offer no opposition to this proposal. But while we are agreeing to it, I think we should point out that it is not good parliamentary practice. Without debate, without consideration, we are voting one-twelfth of the total supply asked for by the government. That cramps the style of the house in dealing with the whole question of supply. The remedy, I suggest, is that this house ought to meet earlier, and I respectfully urge upon the government the importance of meeting earlier so that we shall not only have more time for these things, but shall not be called upon to vote interim supply month after month after month without any consideration at all. We are now agreeing to vote one-twelfth, after voting four-twelfths, of every item of expenditure asked for by the government, some of which the house may not approve in full. Even though the house may want to disapprove some part of it, its hands are tied.

Mr. ABBOTT: It still has seven-twelfths to work on.

Mr. BRACKEN: Our hands are still tied on the five-twelfths that we might not wish to grant.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is almost inconceivable that the country will not require five-twelfths of these estimates for the full year.

Mr. BRACKEN: That is not the point. Interim supply is not voted in bulk.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, it is—$136 million.

Mr. BRACKEN: Is the Acting Minister of Finance asking for $136 million that he may distribute anywhere in the whole estimates, or is the amount not tied to each one of the resolutions that we adopt in supply?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think there is a proportionate amount to each department, yes, but it is not tied to a particular item.

Mr. BRACKEN: Is the minister quite sure that that is so? Is he sure he is correct?

Mr. KNOWLES: Read lines 24 and 25 of the bill.

Mr. BRACKEN: The minister cannot take this money and apply it anywhere he likes. We are voting one-twelfth of every item in the estimates, and even though the house wanted to disapprove any one of the items later, five-twelfths will have been voted without consideration by the house. That is the only point I am making. We are agreeing to this interim supply, but as I say, it is bad parliamentary practice. The answer to it is that the government should give consideration to the matter and should call this house together in January rather than in March.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The answer to that was given to the house a few weeks ago when the Prime Minister discussed the introduction of a bill to extend from fifteen to sixty days the duration of emergency powers act. On that occasion he said that it was the firm intention to have the house meet at the end of January, 1947.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I wish to object to another five-twelfths being granted at this time, for the same reasons that I gave before. Some years ago I said that parliament should be the sounding-board for the public. Only three or four departments have so far been considered, and we vote five-twelfths in all. You cannot blame the newspapers for not reporting here; they are short of newsprint. To-day we are voting money, five-twelfths of all the estimates, and all we know about it is a post mortem. The people who pay taxes find that on the schedules now before us they have to pay income taxes up to 22 per cent, 32 per cent, 42 per cent. and all that kind of thing. We might just as well admit that parliament is meeting in private, because judging from the reports in the newspapers the public generally do not know what is going on; the only ones who know are those who read the daily Hansard.

I referred to a matter this morning which appeared in a newspaper, and which was not mentioned by me yesterday. What information has the house received about the five-twelfths we are voting to-day? The amount runs into millions and millions of dollars. For the first two months of the session secondary matters were dealt with. It has come down to this, that those who pay no taxes, or very little, are imposing them on others. Business cannot be conducted much longer in that way. Here we are voting one-twelfth; we have voted four-twelfths already, which will make five-twelfths of the whole budget passed by us over the heads of the representatives of the people, who have so far dealt with only three departments. I protest against this sort of thing, as I have done on other occasions. I believe it is bad finance, that it is not in the public interest, and is against the principles of responsible government on which the Liberal party prides itself so much. Shades of the men we had in this parliament in former years! On the 88th day of the session we have passed five-twelfths of the total budget, and some departments have not even been considered. This morning we have completely wasted one hour on the dead text books of the past, and all that sort of thing. I can tell you that a hundred years ago they did not vote money this way. That was what led to the tea being thrown into Boston harbour, the principle of taxation without representation. Fifteen months after the close of the war we have the Minister of Finance standing up in this parliament and adopting the same principles which led the people of Boston to take that action. Evidently we have not made a bit of progress. Every day we hear read opinions given a hundred years ago. It is time to restore responsible government.

The time has come to reject motions like this, and I shall vote against this motion even if I am the only member to do so. I shall assert the right of the people to be heard. They talk about conditions in the country, and all that sort of thing. I find that the main debates in this parliament are hardly reported at all in the press. The debate on the Judges Act was not even mentioned by some of them. I read several newspapers looking for it; that was an important debate, but there was hardly any report of it. I want to object to the way legislation is being put through. The opposition is not doing its duty, nor are the leaders in the house when they tell the Minister if Finance they will consent to another one-twelfth of the estimates. I am not going to consent to it; I am objecting. I am sorry this motion has been brought forward. Surely a matter of this kind should have come up at the opening of this morning's sitting, when all hon. members were in their places. Many are not in the chamber now, and of course the press gallery is gone. Hon. members no doubt are attending meetings of committees, but as far as the people back in the constituencies are concerned, from the reports appearing in the press we might just as well be meeting here behind closed doors. I do not blame the press for that because I know that through peace and war alike they have done their duty at great cost to themselves, and you cannot blame them for not reporting what goes on here when we spend tens of thousands of dollars on publicity and in other useless ways. Several departments of the public service, the main departments that are spending money like water, have not been even touched as yet.

As I say, this procedure is against the principles of Liberalism, and it is against the principles of the old Conservative party and of responsible government. I have sat here for many years, and I never knew of this being done, having five-twelfths of the estimates passed on the 88th day of the session. Here we are financing not only for this year but for 1947. Wait till you see the estimates next year! The people are taxed to death and controlled to death. We have an abundance of coal and other mineral resources, but we cannot get them out of the ground. It is different in the mother country, where they have real responsible government. What is the use of spending another one-twelfth? It would be far better to take the money and send bread daily to the old country by the famous T.C.A. lines. I object to this bill, Mr. Speaker, and if you declare it carried I suggest that it be on division.

Motion agreed to, on division, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed on division.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

9. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years, a taxpayer, other than a corporation or joint stock company, may deduct from the tax otherwise payable by him the amount of tax on income paid by him to the government of any province in which he resides not exceeding five per cent of the tax otherwise payable by him.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I might make the usual brief statement on this resolution, which implements that part of the dominion's offer to the provinces relating to the treatment of personal income taxes imposed by a provincial government which chooses not to enter into an agreement with the dominion. It is proposed that a person subject to provincial income tax in 1947 will be allowed to deduct such provincial tax, if any, from his dominion tax up to the amount of five per cent of his tax payable to the dominion.

Mr. FLEMING: In the remarks made by the Minister of Finance on June 27, and subsequently when he spoke last week on the budget, as I recall, he indicated that the offers made to the provinces might not be the subject of legislation at the present time. Therefore, this resolution and the one following it may offer the committee and the house the only opportunity which will be given this session to deal in detail with any aspect of the so-called offers submitted by the dominion to the provinces.

I suggest that the only way resolution 9 can be interpreted is that as to those provinces which are not prepared to accept the so-called offer of the dominion, the dominion is seeking to elbow them out of the field of personal income tax. If you examine this resolution you will see that the dominion is asserting its seniority in that field and is saying to any taxpayer, no matter how hard pressed he may be by the heavy burden of existing dominion income tax: You may not deduct any tax levied on your income by the province in which you reside except to the extent of one-twentieth of the tax on your income payable to the dominion. I think the full gravity of the position asserted by the dominion in this resolution has not been appreciated. In effect the provinces are to be confined to raising from income tax one-twentieth of the amount to be raised by this means, nineteen parts going to the dominion and one part to the provinces. And if the dominion reduces, as we hope it will soon, the levy made by way of income tax on the individual, the provinces will be compelled to reduce this tax accordingly. Otherwise the taxpayer pays so much more.

Similarly, if the dominion increases the levy on the income of the individual, to that extent the provinces will be permitted to take one-twentieth of the increase. I suggest the principle involved in the resolution is fundamentally wrong, and means the elbowing of the provinces out of a field which they claim the right to occupy until such time as an adequate agreement between the provinces and the dominion has been reached with respect to personal income tax.

I recall that certain of the provinces—and in particular I recall the offer of the premiers of Ontario and Quebec—were prepared to lease this field to the dominion on terms for a three-year period. I suggest the principle of this resolution is so wrong that it emphasizes all the more what was said by my leader a few days ago as to the vital necessity, in the interests of this country, of calling the provinces together to resume the dominion-provincial conference. It is particularly dangerous in this respect, too, as opening the way for different treatment of different provinces. It is a proposal that has within it the seed of disintegration of confederation. While my words may fall upon deaf ears, I must nevertheless record my protest.

Having said that, I would ask the acting Minister of Finance to clarify certain aspects of this matter. As to those provinces which do not accept the so-called offer of the dominion, and assuming that the dominion does not call the dominion-provincial conference together, is it the intention of the dominion to assist provinces which resume the levy of the personal income tax, as was done in the years immediately preceding the present tax agreement of 1942? Is it the dominion's intention to assist the provinces by way of making returns through one common form, and by putting collection machinery of the dominion at the disposal of the provinces? Would the minister indicate also the way in which the dominion, as a matter of administration, is going to work out the division of the tax in relation to the provinces which enter into the agreement on the suggested basis, as compared with those which do not?

Mr. ABBOTT: I will deal first with the hon. member's objection that this provision limits the province to one-twentieth, nineteen-twentieths going to the dominion. I trust the hon. member has not overlooked the fact that prior to entering into the wartime tax agreements the dominion income tax law permitted no credit to any taxpayer for income tax paid by an individual in a province. This is therefore a substantial concession over what existed prior to the war when various provinces were imposing personal income tax.

Mr. FLEMING: But I am sure the minister will admit that in those days we were dealing with an entirely different scale of taxation.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is true that the scale was lower; nevertheless the fact remains that this is a concession beyond that which was given prior to the war. And if as my hon. friend indicates there are further reductions in taxation, the field becomes still wider for provincial governments to enter the field and to tax as was done before 1941. It is a concession in principle; I do not think there is any doubt about it.

As the Minister of Finance pointed out at page 2910 of his budget speech:

> The provincial government would, of course, have to remain the sole judge as to the amount and nature of the tax it imposed on its own people, but obviously the inconvenience to the individual taxpayer involved in filling out two sets of income tax returns and calculating tax on two different bases would be decreased if the provincial tax were imposed as a fixed percentage of whatever tax might be payable to the dominion by the individual taxpayer.

I remember that that was the case with the city of Montreal income tax, when we had one there. The quotation continues:

> In order to be of assistance to that end, the dominion would be willing to make extra copies of its forms available so that when filling out his dominion tax return the taxpayer could merely make an additional copy and mail it with his cheque to the treasurer of the province.

That is what the Minister of Finance had in mind in connection with the question put by the hon. member whether the dominion would be prepared to assist a province in the collection of personal income tax where such province decided to impose it. The present view, as indicated in the minister's statement, is that the dominion would be prepared to supply additional forms, but the province would be expected to undertake its own task of collection.

Mr. FLEMING: I understood from the statement by the Minister of Finance that that applied to provinces coming in on this basis, but not to those which might seek to levy a tax in excess of the five per cent.

Mr. ABBOTT: If a province comes in, it relinquishes the right to impose personal income tax.

Mr. FLEMING: No; that is not my point. What application can it have to a province which does not come in on the basis of this resolution, by way of confining its tax to that fixed proportion of the federal tax, namely the amount of one-twentieth? What application has it to a province, for instance, which decides to set its own basis of income tax, without reference to this proportion of one-twentieth of the federal tax?

Mr. ABBOTT: All that the legislation to be based upon the resolution is intended to do is to establish a dollar limit up to which the taxpayer in a province which imposes a personal provincial income tax is entitled to take credit. The province must exercise its discretion as to what rate it imposes—whether it imposes it by way of a percentage of the dominion tax, a graduated percentage of the taxpayer's income, or whatever system it feels would be most appropriate in the circumstances.

Mr. FLEMING: What about the forms in that case?

Mr. ABBOTT: If the province did not adopt a percentage of the dominion tax, obviously it would be of no value to file an extra copy of the dominion income tax form.

Mr. FLEMING: Will the collection of the tax be entirely on their own?

Mr. ABBOTT: In those circumstances provision would have to be made for the filing of a separate return and, of course, separate collection.

Mr. KNOWLES: I have taken strenuous objection to certain of these resolutions, particularly Nos. 1 and 2, but I was surprised to hear the opposition voiced by the hon. member for Eglinton to resolution No. 9, and I believe the minister has made a correct reply when he describes this five per cent provision as a concession. As a matter of fact the only justification I can see for the concession is that it represents an attempt to lean over backwards in dealing fairly with provinces which do not wish to come in on the proposed agreements. It seems to me the best way to see the falsity of the position taken by the hon. member for Eglinton is to ask what would happen if the figure of five per cent were increased. I take it that that is what he wants. But suppose it were increased to ten, twenty or fifty per cent; if that were done it would simply put us back into the position we were in years before and which it was the whole purpose of the Rowell-Sirois commission to try to correct. It would simply put us back in the position where a province such as the one my hon. friend comes from, or the other of the two central provinces, could take into its provincial treasury the taxes collectible within the province.

Our whole basic contention is, and I believe this was basic in the surveys made by the Rowell-Sirois commission, that wealth created in Canada is created right across the country; where it happens to end up for taxation purposes does not bear any direct relation to where it was created. If your taxation is primarily on a provincial basis you will enable some provinces to tax wealth which has been created in other parts of the country. To the extent that you make this concession, and particularly to the extent that it is increased, you will aggravate that situation. We feel it should not be any higher. I am prepared to agree to that as a concession in the name of good will and as an attempt to lean over backwards in an effort to be fair, but that is all.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I just want to say one word which will not be in discussion of the merits of dominion-provincial relations. I simply want to point out that what the hon. member for Eglinton was arguing was that it was the want of agreement that was making this thing necessary, and perhaps even worse things. That is the point he was making.

Mr. BRACKEN: I should like to ask a question with regard to the collection of income taxes. If the provinces agree with the dominion in this matter the dominion will collect all the taxes, but what is the attitude of the government with respect to the collection of these taxes when a province does not agree? Perhaps this has been stated before, but I am not quite clear as to the government's position. I understand its position is that if the tax is a percentage of the dominion tax, the dominion is prepared to collect it for the province, but that if the tax imposed by the province is in some form different from that imposed by the dominion, then the dominion does not feel that it could collect. Perhaps a frank statement by the acting minister would let us know the government's position with respect to eliminating the collection of income taxes by one or other of the two governments. How far is the dominion prepared to go to eliminate two different governments collecting the income tax even though certain provinces may not come into the agreement that has been proposed?

Mr. ABBOTT: I thought I had made that point quite clear in answering the hon. member for Eglinton. As the Minister of Finance pointed out in the statement which I quoted, in the case of a province which did agree to come in, obviously the inconvenience to the individual taxpayer in filling out two sets of income tax returns and calculating taxes on two different bases would be decreased if the provincial tax were imposed as a fixed percentage of whatever tax might be payable to the dominion by the individual taxpayer. In order to be of assistance to that end the dominion would be willing to make extra copies of its forms available so that when filling out the dominion tax return the taxpayer would merely make an additional copy and mail it with his cheque to the treasurer of his province. That means that in the case of those provinces the dominion would do what it could to facilitate the completion of the form, but the province must undertake the task of collection.

Mr. BRACKEN: That is the government policy, that is as far as you are prepared to go—

Mr. ABBOTT: That is the present policy.

Mr. BRACKEN: —in cooperating with the provinces which do not come into this agreement in order to avoid the collection of taxes by two governments?

Mr. ABBOTT: If their tax is based on a percentage of the dominion tax, there will be very little difficulty involved for the taxpayer. As indicated in the minister's statement, instead of filling out his income tax form in triplicate he would fill it out in quadruplicate and send one copy along with his cheque for two or three per cent, or whatever it is, to the provincial treasurer.

[Mr. Bracken.]

Mr. BRACKEN: Would not the minister agree that it would be much simpler for all concerned if the dominion collected it all and turned a part back in a lump sum?

Mr. ABBOTT: It would certainly be very convenient for the provinces.

Mr. BRACKEN: Without much extra work for the dominion.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would not know. No doubt it would be convenient for the provinces.

Mr. BRACKEN: I think we are clear now. The government has stated that that is as far as it is prepared to go, that is, to make the forms available so that the provinces may use them, it will not collect for them?

Mr. ABBOTT: Up to the moment that is perfectly correct. The present view is that in those circumstances the government of the province should assume the task of collection.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister said a moment ago that he was not prepared to say how much additional work there would be for the dominion, but I should like him to agree that it would be virtually no additional work, or only a trifle. I think we should be clear that the dominion could do this with virtually no extra work at all, and the dominion is refraining from doing it.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is perhaps better able to judge how much additional work would be involved, but it would mean the opening of separate ledgers for the provinces, keeping records, making remittances, and so on. Unquestionably there would be additional work, but how much I am not able to say. As I said to the leader of the opposition, the present view of the government is as indicated by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech, but nothing is final in this world. It is a matter which no doubt can be discussed with the provinces.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister does not do himself justice. I should be quite ready to take his opinion, because I feel he is perfectly capable of giving one. I should like to have him say whether he agrees that the amount of work involved would be trifling.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I do not agree, if the hon. gentleman is asking me for an answer. I do not know how valuable my opinion is.

Mr. McMASTER: It seems to me that we are just skidding around this whole question. This is the clause which deals with provincial-dominion relations. When I think of a budget

I think of it as having to do with the taking in of money and with the spending of money. In the schedule to this budget certain expenditures for the year are set out, and certain receipts; and incidentally there is shown a deficit of $300 million. I find in that schedule provision made for about $98 million to be paid to the provinces. I understand that the agreements with all the provinces will expire before this budget really comes into effect. Am I wrong in that?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. That $90 million odd covers subsidies payable during the fiscal year which began on April 1 last and will terminate on March 31 next.

Mr. McMASTER: I am dealing with moneys that we expect to collect in the year 1947.

Mr. ABBOTT: Those are estimates of revenue, and we are suggesting ways and means by which the revenue is to be raised.

Mr. McMASTER: Whatever we call it, the fact remains that in some future year, and that year is not going to be the one ending December 31, 1946, certain moneys are expected to be collected in certain ways and we are setting forth the method of those collections. Then there will be certain expenditures, and in the expenditures brought down it is estimated that $98 million will be paid to the provinces. In view of what has been said, that $98 million may be far afield. Is that not so?

Mr. ABBOTT: No; that amount is fixed under agreement with the provinces. It is made up of two items, the statutory subsidies under the provisions of the British North America Act, and the fixed amounts payable under the wartime tax agreements with the nine provinces. There is no dispute as to what that amount will be. We know definitely how much we are going to have to pay to the provinces for the current fiscal year which ends on March 31 next. There is no doubt as to that.

Mr. McMASTER: The estimates for the next year will come in later?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to say a word in support of my hon. friends to my right and of what the leader of the opposition said of a single collection of taxes even in those provinces that do not come into an agreement. I know that it was done in 1940 in Manitoba—the leader of the opposition will correct me if I am wrong, but I believe there was a single collection in that year, and only one form was made out in Manitoba.

Mr. ABBOTT: That was done in five provinces.

Mr. KNOWLES: If that is so, the department must have had enough experience for the minister to say whether or not it is a feasible proposition. Certainly I think it was better for the taxpayer. Although I support the principle in resolution 9, I do not think the individual taxpayer should be penalized any more than is necessary for the mistakes his provincial government may make.

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario asked me whether I considered that the expense involved in collection would be more than trivial. The deputy minister tells me that it would be very much more than that, and relying on his judgment, I expressed my opinion for what it is worth.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I would add this. It has nothing to do, of course, with the very agreeable gentleman who is now answering our questions, but I think it should be made clear that in punishing the province the dominion government is also punishing its own citizens who live in that province.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no thought of punishment. We are simply allowing the provinces to exercise freedom, which is their right, and the responsibility that goes with it.

Mr. MICHAUD: I think, Mr. Chairman, we are discussing hypothetical difficulties which may never arise. I am not aware that any province has yet asked the federal government to collect its taxes. Judging from the action of the provinces at the dominion-provincial conference they are very jealous of their autonomy and some of them insisted on imposing provincial taxes. It would seem, therefore, to be far from their intention to ask the federal government to collect their taxes for them. I would not expect for one moment that they would even think of suggesting that the federal government do their collecting for them, and for that reason I submit that we are discussing difficulties which are not likely to arise.

Resolution agreed to.

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Chairman, I would ask that resolutions 10 to 16 stand for the moment, and that we take up 17.

Mr. MacNICOL: When will resolutions 10 to 16 be considered, may I ask?

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps to-morrow.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): They will not be dealt with to-day?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not think so.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It is only fair to give us some idea when they will be taken up, because many members have committees to attend.

Mr. ABBOTT: It will not be to-day, but I hope to-morrow.

Mr. BRACKEN: Mr. Chairman, it is five minutes to one o'clock and I should like before we rise to make an observation with respect to resolution 9, which has just been passed. The hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska raised a point which I do not think should pass without comment. Prior to the war certain of the provinces asked that the dominion collect their income tax for them because their taxpayers found it very inconvenient to have to make out two forms. I know something about that, because I was on the other end then and I think Manitoba was the first province, or among the first, to ask the federal government to collect its income taxes. The dominion government did so, and we paid the dominion government for its extra cost, which was a considerable sum. But as a result the province itself made money because the dominion government could collect our provincial taxes much cheaper than we could, and our taxpayers in the province benefited to that extent.

Mr. LOW: Was it definitely established that the dominion could collect more cheaply than the province?

Mr. BRACKEN: We paid the dominion for the cost of collecting, and the price we paid was less than what it cost us to collect our own taxes. That was a saving to the taxpayer and to the government, and a convenience all round. I would ask the government now, is it not prepared to continue something like the arrangement which it had before the war with the provinces desiring it? I gathered that the minister is not so inclined, but I do hope that he will not close the door to that kind of cooperation.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not closed the door. I said it was a matter that could be discussed, but that the present intention was that we could not undertake the collection.

Mr. BRACKEN: With all respect, I should not like to see the minister or the government leave the impression that they would not do now what they did before because some province may not come into a new taxation agreement.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not trying to leave that impression.

Mr. BRACKEN: Nevertheless people may get that impression from the attitude of the government so far.

Resolutions 10 to 16 stand.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

17. That a farmer or fisherman be permitted for the 1948 and subsequent taxation years, at his option, to compute his liability to pay tax on the average of his income for the taxation year and the two preceding taxation years.

Mr. ABBOTT: Under this resolution farmers and fishermen will be allowed to average their income for taxation purposes over a three-year period. The first year in which the tax may be paid on the averaged income will be 1948, and the actual operation of the plan will be as follows:

1. The taxpayer will pay his actual tax on this actual income in 1946 and in 1947.

2. In 1948 the taxpayer will average his income for the three years 1946, 1947, and 1948, and will calculate the tax that will be payable in each of those years at the rates of tax applicable to his average income in those years.

3. The amounts of tax actually paid in 1946 and 1947 will be offset against the total tax payable on the average income of the three years. The taxpayer will make claim for a refund if the actual tax he has paid in two years is greater than the tax on his three years of average income or pay any balance owing it it falls short of the tax on the averaged income.

The following example will serve to illustrate the operation of the method in an assumed case. Suppose a farmer, married with two children, has an income of $7,000 in 1946, $5,000 in 1947 and $3,000 in 1948. For 1946 he will pay $1,620 tax, and for 1947, $787 at the proposed tax rates. In 1948, according to the budget proposal, he will be able to average his income for the three years, recalculate his tax for each year as if he had earned that average in each year, and deduct the amount he has already paid in 1946 and 1947. This is how it would work out in the case I gave. Average income, $5,000; tax for 1946 at 1946 rates, $892; tax for 1947 at 1947 rates, $787; tax for 1948 at 1947 rates, $787. For the purposes of illustration I have, of course, assumed that the rates in 1948 are the same as in 1947. The total tax for the three years, according to this calculation, would be $2,466, but the farmer has already paid $2,407 for 1946 and 1947 and will therefore have only $59 to pay for 1948. If he does not average he will pay a tax on $3,000 which, at the 1947 rates, would be $218. I give that illustration for the purpose of demonstrating how the plan would work.

Mr. FAIR: I am sorry the minister has not farmed in western Canada for a little while as some of the rest of us have, because he is compelled in the circumstances to go upon supposition. During my first five years of farming I had one successful crop year and four total losses. Anyone who wishes to check that can go back to 1916, 1917, 1918 and 1919. Very often in my district at that time farmers did not get as much grain out of the ground in those four years as they put in for seed. In 1920 we were fortunate enough to get a crop, but we are now again on the way to a recurrence of that programme. Last year in my territory we had an average of from four to ten bushels an acre. On Monday night last, I understand, we had eight degrees of frost and the grain has got to the stage where the bloom is all over and it is now in what is known as the milk stage. That means that we shall have a total crop failure again. What will happen in the next few years we do not know. For these reasons, which can be duplicated in several areas in the west, we should have the proposed period extended to five rather than three years.

I think the minister and the government are well aware that farmers in the west, and in the east as well, are paying indirectly a very large income tax, which is not recognized either by the administration or by the people of the country, in the low prices they receive for the products they sell. That should be taken into consideration by the government and we should be given some break. For that reason I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston):

That the said resolution be amended by striking out the word "two" where it appears in the last line and by substituting therefor the word "four," so that the resolution will read:

"That a farmer or fisherman be permitted for the 1948 and subsequent taxation years, at his option, to compute his liability to pay tax on the average of his income for the taxation year and the four preceding taxation years."

Mr. ABBOTT: I am compelled to raise the same objection to this resolution as I raised to that put forward by the member for Beauce, namely, that it is a resolution which precedes the introduction of a money bill imposing a charge upon the revenue and therefore is a measure which can be introduced only by a resolution moved by a member of the government and preceded by authorization of His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): On a point of order, may I say that for all the minister knows this may bring the government more money than under present circumstances. Probably the government would raise more revenue in this way than it does now.

Mr. ABBOTT: It could not bring more revenue, because it is exercised at the option of the taxpayer, and human nature being what it is, the taxpayer would exercise the option most favourable to himself rather than to the government.

Mr. FULTON: It is stretching the point of order raised by the minister to try to cover this amendment, and have it ruled out of order, on those grounds.

Mr. ABBOTT: If I may interrupt, I am taking the ground that it is unconstitutional, the same ground that was taken by the Minister of Justice the other day. Under the British North America Act, legislation of this kind cannot be put to the committee unless it is introduced subsequent to an authorization of the governor general.

Mr. FULTON: As I understand it, the basis of the rule is that it might involve the government either in increased expenditure or in reduction of revenue. That is why it is felt desirable that only the government may introduce these bills or amendments. The point that we are trying to make is that it is not certain that the government will lose money. It is not certain that the amendment would involve the government in a loss of revenue. Indeed, the amendment makes available to the farmer an option which may or may not result in a loss of revenue. In any event the loss cannot be ascertained until the end of three years at least, because under the present proposal the government will not know its position until that time. All the amendment seeks to do is to make it a period of five years. I submit it is a change only in principle, not a change in effect.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am sorry; I cannot agree with my hon. friend. The amendment, in its terms, is obviously a relief measure, a measure which if implemented in law is designed to relieve the taxpayer of a burden. Because of that I must insist that it cannot be put to the committee except by a member of the government.

Mr. MacINNIS: The Acting Minister of Finance has used a phrase that I have never heard used in this house before. If the Minister of Justice used the same phrase on some other occasion I was not present; otherwise I should not have let it go. I have never heard the question of unconstitutionality raised on a point of order. Surely it is not a question whether it is constitutional or unconstitutional. As a matter of fact parliament can do all the unconstitutional things it likes, as it has done on other occasions. I have known of our passing in one session a number of bills which later were declared unconstitutional, but they could not be declared unconstitutional so long as we were dealing with them; consequently the question of unconstitutionality cannot be raised here. The point raised by the minister was that it was a money bill. That may be a point of order, but certainly the point of order of unconstitutionality cannot be invoked in proceedings of this kind.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not pretend to be an expert on constitutional law, Mr. Chairman. In my use of the word I was following, I think, my colleague, the Minister of Justice. My point of order, or whatever one chooses to call it, is taken under section 54 of the British North America Act, which reads:

It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address, or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to that house by message of the governor general in the session in which such vote, resolution, address, or bill is proposed.

It is well recognized British constitutional practice that resolutions of this kind can be introduced only by a member of the government of the day on a message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. FAIR: I do not think the minister is on very solid ground; in fact I know he is on sandy ground, because his feet are slipping gradually as he steps from one argument to another. There is no indication whatever in the amendment that it will cost the government more money. The amendment is to give the farmers a chance to find out what their true position will be. I think they will average more in each year, and under the amendment the government would make more money over the period during which this amendment is applied. Hon. members know that farmers have had fairly good years for the past two or three years. I can only say that the minister is a wise man if he says it is going to cost the government more money, because he does not know the first thing about it, and neither do I.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. The point of order raised by the minister is well taken. Speaking to the point of order the hon. member for Kamloops emphasized the fact that it might reduce the expenditures. I should like to read citation 552 at page 164 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition:

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Though it is the function of the committee of ways and means to impose rather than to repeal taxes, examples of the repeal of taxation effected in this committee are to be found upon the journals. Proposals for the variation or modification of taxation can therefore be made in the committee; but these proposals must be grafted upon the financial scheme submitted by the government, and must not affect the balance of ways and means voted for the service of the year.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is the key point.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I continue:

Amendments, therefore, can be proposed to substitute another tax, of equivalent amount, for that proposed by the government, as, for instance, a proposal to substitute probate and legacy duty on real property as an alternative for an inhabited house duty, the necessity of new taxation, to that extent, being already declared on behalf of the crown.

It is a well-established rule that in committee no hon. member may move an amendment which would be apt to reduce taxation or to increase expenditures; therefore I shall have to rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): If you are ruling the motion out of order I should like to say a few words on the objective which the hon. member for Battle River—

Mr. FAIR: Mr. Chairman, with all due deference and before further discussion takes place, I challenge your ruling.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I hope hon. members realize that it is a well-established rule. It is not my ruling; it is a rule which has been applied many times. I hope the committee will respect it.

Mr. KNOWLES: I recognize that the rule and the practice are well-established by attempts which have been made in the past, but I suggest that the amendment is quite different from others, for this reason. The citation which you have just read, No. 552, says:

These proposals—

Referring to any amendment suggested in committee.

—must be grafted upon the financial scheme submitted by the government, and must not affect the balance of ways and means voted for the service of the year.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is just the point.

Mr. KNOWLES: I submit that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Battle River does not affect the balance of ways and means for the service of this year, the year with which we are now concerned. It cannot have any bearing until 1948. On that ground I submit that the amendment is in order.

Mr. ABBOTT: It then becomes retroactive, and it affects the service of this year. In fact it may substantially reduce the amounts which will be raised as a result of the taxes imposed in this year. I do not think there can be any question of that. It is not a question of substituting another tax of equivalent value for the tax which is proposed by the administration. I urge very strongly, Mr. Chairman, that it is the responsibility of the government, on the recommendation of the governor general, to introduce money bills of this kind. That is where our system differs so clearly from the United States system. It is only the executive of the day which can, on the advice of the governor general, introduce resolutions preceding money bills, and this is clearly a resolution which falls within that category.

Mr. FULTON: Speaking once more to the point of order, I should like—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. LOW: Does the minister not think that the suggestion contained in the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Battle River is reasonable? Is it not true that the Canadian federation of agriculture did request such a provision in the income tax resolutions? Before the minister answers let me say this. In view of the fact that this is a very important matter to the farming population of Canada, would it not be possible for the government to withdraw resolution No. 17 for to-day and bring it back in a revised form at another time, perhaps to-morrow or the next day? If that could be done it would obviate the necessity of some hon. members on this side challenging the ruling of the chairman, which I would not like to see happen. If it cannot be done in the way I suggest, however, I shall be forced to support any protest that may be made.

Mr. ABBOTT: If I may answer my hon. friend at once, of course I am quite ready and should be very glad to have the committee discuss the question whether five years should be substituted for three, and to take into consideration any recommendations hon. members may see fit to make on that very important question. But on the specific amendment moved by the hon. member for Battle River I must take the stand that it is not in order for him to move such an amendment. This does not mean the question cannot be discussed, but I do take the stand that it is not an amendment which can be moved by a private member of the house.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): On that point, would the minister be prepared to let us discuss this resolution and then let the matter stand until to-morrow?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think I must take the stand now that the amendment is out of order. I shall be very glad to listen to suggestions and discuss a possible amendment, but I must take the position that the motion which has been moved by the hon. member for Battle River is not in order.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I agree, and therefore I was making this point. If the hon. member for Battle River withdraws his amendment will the minister be prepared to let us discuss the many ramifications of this matter, and then have the resolution stand until to-morrow so that he may consider the suggestions?

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, gladly. I do not insist on the resolution passing to-day.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It is a very important matter which should be discussed on its merits. Then it might be allowed to stand until to-morrow so that the minister could consider amending it from the government's point of view. Would that meet the wishes of the hon. member?

Mr. FAIR: That will be satisfactory.

Mr. ABBOTT: Then I take it, Mr. Chairman, that you have ruled the amendment out of order, and we are now proceeding to discuss resolution 17 as it stands.

Mr. FAIR: I am not accepting that ruling. I am withdrawing the amendment temporarily, in order to see what the minister will do to-morrow.

Mr. ABBOTT: If the hon. member withdraws his motion, of course I do not ask for a ruling.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I think I should also read to the committee paragraph 40 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, at page 169:

The fundamental terms of a money resolution submitted to the house with the governor general's recommendation upon which a committee of the whole is set up cannot be amended. Amendments will only be in order if they fall within the terms of the resolution. The procedure in committee on those resolutions follows in principle the procedure of the committee of supply, and amendments are out of order if they are proposed with a view to substituting an alternative scheme to that proposed with the royal recommendation.

This is a well established rule, and I hope hon. members will respect it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I understand the hon. member for Battle River has agreed not to press his amendment at this time.

Mr. ABBOTT: He has agreed to withdraw his motion. He must do that, or I must ask for a definite ruling.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): But we can discuss this matter now and the minister will let the resolution stand until to-morrow.

Mr. FAIR: The amendment is withdrawn for to-day, with the understanding that the matter will be considered by the minister and the other members of the cabinet, and I or someone else can bring it in again, if necessary.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Has the hon. member leave of the committee to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): This has been a matter of considerable interest to me ever since I came here in 1940, and in various budget debates I have advocated a period of five years. I think that argument is sound, because I understand that in Britain, where they have not the hazards in agriculture that we have in parts of Canada, they do allow a five-year period. If that is so I think the minister and the department might well consider the point.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that there is no averaging in the United Kingdom, that it was withdrawn in 1926.

An hon. MEMBER: Wrong again.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am quite prepared to admit it if I am wrong. I understood that to be the case, and apparently it was at one time.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have just been informed that this is so.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): My own experience in western Canada has been much like that of the hon. member for Battle River. We certainly have our ups and downs; and while this is a step in the right direction I certainly would like to see the period made five years if possible, instead of three. I think it would be much better for a successful agricultural programme and for the nation as a whole if the average could be taken over a five-year period, and I trust the minister will seriously consider whether he can see his way clear to amend the resolution accordingly. As I say, it is something we have asked for since at least 1940.

While I am on my feet I should like to ask a question in regard to another contentious matter, particularly in the ranching areas of western Canada. I refer to the question of allowing some exemption in connection with what is recognized as a breeding herd. I have looked through these resolutions very carefully, and I do not see any other place where that matter might be discussed. Various hon. members on both sides of the house have raised this question in previous years. The suggestion is that at least a percentage of the recognized breeding herd should be allowed as capital when the herd is sold. I do not see any provision in the resolutions which would specifically take care of that. As I understand the situation through force of circumstances, because of lack of feed or something of the kind, a man may have to sell within one year a herd of good cattle which he has spent his lifetime building up; and if he does so, what he receives must be shown as income. It is true that under section 17 he can average that income over three years, but still it is quite a hardship on the man who has made the raising of live stock his life's undertaking. I should like to think the minister and the department might find some way to give a little relief to ranchers of this description.

Mr. ABBOTT: On that particular point, as my hon. friend knows this is a question which has received the fairly continuous and active consideration of the tax department for some time. I do not know that any solution satisfactory to the cattle raisers has been found as yet; the question is under continuous examination, but I do not know that I can give any definite statement now as to what if any change will be made. I recall that the Minister of Finance made some reference to this matter in his budget speech, at page 2918 of Hansard, where he said:

> The general adoption of the three year forward averaging system which I have just announced should be of great assistance in more normal cases where a live stock herd is being maintained but annual live stock sales may vary from year to year. Several suggestions for carrying the basic herd principle further have been made and in this connection I must acknowledge the help received from various members. Most of these, however, involve maintenance by the farmer of accounting records of greater or less complexity and whether they will prove practicable from the standpoint of both the farmer and the tax administration is a matter which will have to be worked out by the administrative officials in consultation with the Department of Agriculture.

I am advised that those discussions are still proceeding. I think it is clear that the proposed three-year average should afford some measure of relief, but I am not an expert in this field and my opinion on that, as on some other matters, is not of very great value.

Mr. IRVINE: Would the minister mind indicating to the committee what particular objection could be offered, from the government's point of view, to extending this to five years instead of three?

Mr. ABBOTT: One obvious objection, of course, is that the farmer would get no benefit for five years, since the averaging must be five years forward. One cannot average back, because the farmer's return may not have been filed. As contemplated under this resolution he would have to go forward. The number of years suggested is the average before the farmer can derive any benefit. In the case suggested by the hon. members for Battle River and Cariboo it would mean that the farmer would have to wait five years before getting the benefit of the averaging. The line has to be drawn somewhere. This, I suggest, is a substantial measure of relief, and it seems to me we should try it out. I should add that it is a moving average, in that it keeps moving forward.

Mr. SENN: I approve the resolution as far as it goes. As the minister has already said, it does afford a measure of relief. I am sure however that the contention of the hon. members for Battle River and Souris can easily be justified. From time to time farmers have what are know as dispersion sales, when they sell off their stock and implements which they have accumulated over a good many years—perhaps ten or twenty. If they are to be allowed to average only over three years, then it is certainly unfair because such a sale would represent an accumulation of twenty years of effort. I do not wish to press the matter further, but I think the mechanics of this matter should be examined into. The minister stated a case where a farmer in one year made $7,000, in the next year $5,000 and in the next year $3,000. In the final year, averaging for the three years, he had only a small amount to pay by way of income tax. What would happen if those figures were reversed? Suppose he had more in two years than the three years would amount to; would he get a refund?

Mr. ABBOTT: He gets a refund.

Mr. SENN: I just wanted to be sure about that.

Mr. ABBOTT: I intended to say that in my preliminary statement.

Mr. SENN: I did not hear it. The next thing I should like to find out from the minister is this. Let us take the year 1948, and average it up with 1947 and 1946. Does that complete the calculation or the averaging, so far as it goes? In the year 1949 could one use 1948 and 1947?

Mr. ABBOTT: He takes 1949, 1948 and 1947. That is what I meant by saying that it is a moving average.

Mr. SENN: He can use those years on two or three occasions.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes; it is a continuing three-year average.

Mr. SENN: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. ABBOTT: It seems to me that that largely takes away the need for the five-year average, once it comes up to the third year. It is a moving average, and, as the hon. member for Haldimand has so aptly said, one may use the same years two or three times in averaging.

Mr. BRYCE: I want to say something about this five-year average, because I have been sent to Ottawa by the constituency of Selkirk, in which are included both fishermen and farmers, and they want the five-year provision.

The last argument used by the minister was his best. But suppose we have to wait five years—if it is to be just and reasonable we do not mind waiting that time. I want to be sure that it is just and reasonable. I think five years is more reasonable than three. The minister has said that the process of spreading it over a number of years has been done away with in the old country. I would point out, however, that over there they have a crop every year. They do not have to wait five or six years, as we sometimes do in the west. I support the hon. members for Battle River and Souris when they urge that it be made five years.

While I am on my feet I should like to ask the minister for a clear definition of "farmer". I should like to be clear on that before I go back to Selkirk.

Mr. ABBOTT: This time I knew what I was going to say before I rose. While I should like to oblige my hon. friend by giving that definition, I do not feel I can do so in sufficiently adequate legal terms. The deputy minister tells me that consideration has been given this matter. It is a difficult problem, and we hope that when the bill is before the house within the next day or two, when we have completed these resolutions, it will contain a satisfactory definition of "farmer".

Mr. BRYCE: Can the minister define "farmer"?

Mr. ABBOTT: I would not attempt to define it to-day.

Mr. BRYCE: That is the kind of answer I expected from a lawyer. It does not answer my question at all.

Mr. ABBOTT: What I intended to say to the hon. member was that the bill which will follow the resolutions may contain a definition of "farmer". I am not capable of defining it.

Mr. BRYCE: "May" and "shall" are much the same. This is a serious matter. I am particularly concerned about my own constituency, because they sent me here. There are many different kinds of farmers in the Red River valley, and I would not like to see any of them left out. For instance, we have mink farmers. Would they be included? A mink farmer might have a good crop this year, but next year a dog with distemper may come around and the farmer might lose his whole crop. Is he to be taken into consideration? Then what about the market gardener when he loses his crop through flooding or a hail storm? Is he classified as a farmer?

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. member is pointing out the defects which are obvious to all of us when we attempt to frame a definition of "farmer". I am inclined to agree that we must attempt to do it in the act, although it will not be an easy task. I agree, too, that all classes of genuine farmers should receive the benefit of this proposal.

Mr. BRYCE: Has the Department of Finance given consideration to incomes on farms earned by the whole family? We know that income tax forms are filled out by separate individuals, whereas five or six individuals may have earned the income. This is most unfair to the farmer who has children ranging from ten to sixteen years of age who are going to school but who also milk cows and help at harvest and threshing time. There is nothing in the income tax act which allows anything for their wages. After they become sixteen years of age an allowance can be made for board and a certain amount of wages. Prior to that, however, although they add to the farmer's income, he must pay on it. Has anything been done about this?

Mr. ABBOTT: I believe the ordinary rules would have to apply. An adult son of a farmer could hire out to the neighbouring farmer as a helper. I can see no legal reason why he could not be paid by his father, and in such event the wages would be deductible as expenses of operation. The income of the farmer would be reduced proportionately while the income received by the son, let us say, would be taxable income if he were getting over the exemption limit.

Mr. BRYCE: I have not been able to get my point across. What the minister has told me is correct as applied to the young fellow who has reached sixteen years of age and is able to go and work for himself, but I am thinking of the farmer's wife and family, his sons and daughters, who are at home and who milk the cows and do the other jobs. There is no allowance made for that work, and the farmer has to pay on the income that is made by five or six different people. We all know that the wife on the farm contributes to the farm income by producing poultry, honey, and so forth. She works from morning to night, and no allowance on income is made.

Mr. ABBOTT: What my hon. friend has said is true, but the same thing is true of other occupations. In the small town where I was brought up the wife and children often helped, possibly around a small store or in the home. It is all part of a way of life, although it may be a bit more pronounced in the case of the farmer's wife.

Mr. BRYCE: In the case referred to by the minister they would work only from eight in the morning until the time came to close the store for the day, but the farmer's family would work from daylight to dark.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): There are quite a number of sections which deal with these matters. Resolution No. 17 reads:

> That a farmer or fisherman be permitted for the 1948 and subsequent taxation years, at his option, to compute his liability to pay tax on the average of his income for the taxation year and the two preceding taxation years.

If we are to make progress I think we shall have to stick to the resolution before the committee and deal with each resolution as we come to it.

Mr. LENNARD: I should like to follow up the remarks of the hon. member for Souris in respect to the unfair treatment of those who have sold herds over the past several years. I should like to cite an example which I have given before. There is one man in my riding who over the years has accumulated a good deal of land. Any profit which he made from his farming activities he put into more land. To-day his holdings are considered as capital gain. I know of several farmers in that same area who have built up large herds but who because of lack of help or difficulty in marketing have had to sell their herds. They have received most unfair treatment; to use a slang expression, they have lost their shirts. The man who had accumulated land over the years is considered to have a capital gain which is non-taxable, while the man who accumulated a herd and had to sell is taxed to the limit.

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course that is true also in other fields. In the one case the man is putting his earnings into capital, while in the other case he is putting his earnings into inventory.

Mr. LENNARD: I consider that any man who builds up a herd over the years is making a capital gain.

Mr. ABBOTT: He charges to his annual income his expenses in building it up.

Mr. GRAYDON: Surely a calf is a capital gain.

Mr. JAENICKE: I should like to support the idea advanced by the hon. member for Battle River. I made the same suggestion when I spoke in the budget debate. The minister gave us a hypothetical case of a farmer who makes $7,000 this year, $5,000 the following year and $3,000 in 1948. That may be possible in the east, but it is not possible in the west. If a farmer in the west had an experience like that for three years I think he would be quite lucky. As the hon. member for Battle River pointed out, because of low temperatures that have prevailed during the last few days many farmers in the west will likely have nothing at all.

One farmer I know of had a loss in 1942—the income tax department acknowledged that loss—of $1,100. In 1943 he had an income of $2,500 upon which he was taxable. In 1944 he had a profit of a little over $1,100. In 1945, because of circumstances beyond his control, he had to sell $1,100 worth of cattle. Surely such a man is entitled to more than three years in which to average his income. The minister says that this is a sort of revolving affair, but I should think that if such a farmer averaged his income in 1948 he would be through and would have to start all over again.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not call it "revolving"; I called it a moving average. We are starting this in 1946; 1946, 1947, and 1948 will be the first three years which can be averaged. When the year 1948 is concluded and the farmer knows his results for that year, he will then be in a position to determine finally his income tax liability for the three years. He is entitled to have his average go on to 1949. In 1949 he takes the years 1947, 1948 and 1949, so that he has the same two years in as he had in the preceding year. Then in 1950 he will have 1948, 1949 and 1950. It is a moving average.

Mr. JAENICKE: Supposing he exercised his option in 1948 and averaged his income for the three years, would he be through?

Mr. ABBOTT: No. In 1949 he has the option of averaging again, unless the law is repealed.

Mr. JAENICKE: That puts a different picture on the whole situation.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If a man elects to average his income, the income of 1948 will affect the tax of 1946, the tax of 1947, the tax of 1948, the tax of 1949 and the tax of 1950. In effect, when the thing gets going, the good year or the poor year will have its effect on the two preceding years and on the two following years. In reality there is an effect over five years.

Mr. JAENICKE: There will be an averaging of even more than five years.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The income of the middle year affects that year itself and affects the two preceding years and the two following years.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I do not think there is going to be any difficulty about whether we average it on three or the five years, because the income tax department is so inefficient that my fishermen, on the coast have had no tax returns since 1942. The result is they will have a five year average before they are through. I have a letter here which I received from a cooperative in Prince Rupert and which I gave to the income tax department. It is dated April 26, and it points out that sixty-eight fishermen have a total of $21,365.75 being held back. As late as July 10, I received another letter to the effect that they are getting from the Vancouver office dozens of requests to file returns when in fact returns have been filed. I object strenuously to this inefficiency which is putting an unfair burden upon these people. I realize the department has helped out to the extent that it has cut down the amount taken from the fishermen when they sell their fish immediately from twenty per cent to ten per cent and from ten per cent to five per cent, depending on the type of fishing that is done. First, I should like to ask the minister why there is discrepancy between the east and west coasts; why is it you have to take off ten per cent and five per cent—it used to be twenty and ten per cent—on the west coast when you do not do it on the east coast? I have been on the fisheries committee and heard the canning companies say that the eastern fishermen are as prosperous as any fishermen in the world. The men on the Pacific coast feel that they are being grossly discriminated against.

I have a suggestion to make to the department in the matter of collecting income taxes. In the halibut fleet on the west coast the men work on a share basis with the skipper, and the boat also receives a share. The skipper owns the boat and he is taxed both as skipper and as owner of the boat. He feels that he should not be condemned, as it were, because he owns the boat, to have to pay two taxes. I would urge that a departmental income tax office be established in northern British Columbia to solve these problems because our people there are getting no satisfaction from the Vancouver office. The only reply I have had to my letter in regard to the reductions from twenty to ten and ten to five is that letters are still coming from the department asking for more returns. Would the minister consider setting up an income tax office in northern British Columbia? The difficulties have been going on since 1942 and time is rolling on.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be very glad to consider whether it would not be possible to open an office in northern British Columbia. On the other point as to discrimination, I will look into that. I do not see why there should be discrimination. Mind you, the deduction at the source must be taken care of, but I will concede that so far as I can see there should be no discrimination between the fishermen on the west coast and those on the east coast.

Mr. FULTON: In connection with the three-year moving average, the point made by the minister that if the five-year period were adopted the farmer would have to wait for five years before getting any benefit is not generally applicable, for this reason. The farmers have in large degree shared the fairly high level of prosperity which has been general across the country and the farmers in my district at all events have been filing returns for the last three or four years. If they were allowed to take into account their returns over the previous years there would be no necessity for their waiting a further five years before they could start to average. The Minister of Justice, in the figures which he just gave, I think lent point to the argument in favour of the five-year moving average as against the three-year. He pointed out that if we take the three-year period, the middle year affects the average for the two preceding and two subsequent years. If you take the five-year period, one year will affect the tax for the four preceding and the four subsequent years, and in that way you are more likely to get the real average. I think it is conceded that farming cycles run in at least ten-year periods, certainly not five, and therefore the greater number of years you take into account the nearer you get to the real average, certainly more so than if you take the three-year period. In addition, the five-year moving average was the recommendation of the Department of Agriculture itself. After receiving briefs from the council of Canadian beef producers, representing councils all across the dominion, the Department of Agriculture submitted a brief to the Department of Finance, in which they had this to say:

> After careful study, the department makes two recommendations:
> 1. Taxes be finally assessed on the basis of a five-year moving average of profits and losses.

From the illustration they give on the second page of the brief it is quite clear that they intended it to be a five-year as against the current three-year proposal. At all events they recommended that it be a five-year period. Has the Department of Finance given consideration to that brief? Since the minister has said that he will give further consideration to this matter before to-morrow, I would ask if the Department of Finance has made specific objections to the point raised, and whether there is any reason why the five-year period should not be adopted.

Mr. ABBOTT: Careful consideration was given to the brief, and it was felt that the three-year average was appropriate. This is a special right which is given to one class of the community. It has been urged for some time. I think myself that it is a step in the right direction. After careful consideration the Minister of Finance, his advisers and the government came to the conclusion that the three-year period was appropriate, and that is the proposal that is put forward in the budget resolutions.

Mr. FULTON: It cannot be denied that it is a move in the right direction, but I hope the minister will between now and to-morrow consider this suggestion, which was first advanced by the member for Battle River, and see if it does not deserve further consideration.

On the point of the capitalization of breeding herds, it seems to me that this whole question comes down to whether a breeding herd or basic herd is capital.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I think that is hardly in order in this resolution.

Mr. FULTON: The resolution deals with the liability of a farmer to taxation, and allows him to average his income over a three-year period. The question of the capitalization of the breeding herds comes in, Mr. Chairman because the farmer may sell all his herd and is liable to income tax on the proceeds. My point is that the three-year period is of no assistance to him.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think it would be appropriate, Mr. Chairman, for hon. members to discuss that point on the resolution now before the committee.

Mr. FULTON: On the point of the capitalization of breeding herds, it seems to me that this whole question comes down to whether a breeding herd or basic herd is capital. The point behind the submissions advanced by those who want the basic herd regarded as capital is that the breeding herd is as much one of the tools of production as land and buildings or the tools used in a factory. I made this point last year when this matter was up for discussion, and I do not think anything is to be gained by repeating what I said then, but I wish to point out in addition that the United States Department of Finance does recognize the breeding herd as capital. The Canadian Department of Agriculture in its brief, in appendix 2, referred to the special treatment allowed in the United States and quoted the following extracts from the U.S. Inland Revenue Bulletin No. 11 of June 12, 1944:

> Live stock used for draft, breeding or dairy purposes, irrespective of whether such stock was raised or otherwise acquired, is property used in the trade or business, of a character which is subject to the allowance for depreciation.

And further this extract is given from the United States Department of Agriculture, publication 554, dealing with farm bookkeeping and the federal income tax:

> Depreciable capital goods—

Capital is the word used:

> Depreciable capital goods includes all buildings and land improvements (except the owner's dwelling), machinery, equipment, work animals, breeding and dairy stock.

In the United States the breeding herd is regarded as capital. When this question was raised last year the Minister of National Revenue advanced certain arguments against such a view, which are to be found at page 3743 of Hansard of December 18 last. The minister made this point:

> Again, it had to be pointed out that the cost of raising or purchasing that stock had been allowed as an expense of previous years . . .

The answer to that is that there are many allowances which are made for capital outlay. Reduction from income is allowed for capital acquisition, and yet when the asset is subsequently sold it is not claimed that the proceeds are income simply because the original allowance was made. All we wish to do is to draw the same parallel between these capital assets and capital assets represented by breeding herds.

Mr. ISNOR: Would the hon. member give an example of capital increase, as far as business is concerned, where the income tax department allows it?

Mr. FULTON: Yes. Where a doctor lays out money to enlarge his library he is acquiring something which he uses in the course of his profession, and he is allowed a reduction in taxable income for the purpose. But if subsequently he sells his library, the proceeds of that sale are not regarded as income but as a realization of capital.

Mr. ISNOR: But that is a professional investment.

Mr. FULTON: I think I know what the hon. gentleman has in mind, and I shall deal with the point in a moment, when I trace the parallel between allowance for depreciation and allowance for acquisition or replacement of breeding stock. That point was dealt with by the Minister of National Revenue at page 3744:

> Questions have been raised as to the taxation of the proceeds of breeding animals. Inasmuch as the cost of purchasing or raising such animals has been allowed as an expense, the proceeds of sale represent taxable income.

As regards depreciation in business, a business is allowed to set aside a certain amount for the purpose before taxation; yet when the asset is sold the proceeds are not regarded as income simply because a deduction has been allowed for depreciation. In the same way, if you have to replace a breeding herd—because animals deteriorate over a passage of years; after a time an animal is no longer useful for breeding purposes—the fact that you have been allowed to make a deduction for replacement or to buy a new animal, which corresponds to depreciation, is no argument that when you sell your stock the proceeds of sale constitute income and not capital. The Department of Agriculture recognized that point in its brief, in which it stated:

> Prices of pure-bred breeding stock are subject to extremes beyond reason, caused by influences outside of Canada and outside the agricultural industry proper and are the result of buying by wealthy men or hobby farmers; yet the bona fide breeder must pay such prices if he is to remain in business, although well aware that he is likely to experience a heavy loss.

That is an incontrovertible fact and, if taken into consideration, is a strong argument in support of the contention that breeding herds are capital. If that position is once recognized—and it is the true position; it is the basis of the argument—there can be no justification for any further delay in giving due recognition to the fact in the tax system. It is true the Minister of Finance pointed out, at page 2918, as referred to by the acting minister, that the general adoption of the three-year forward averaging system should be of great assistance, but he referred to the "more normal cases where a live stock herd is being maintained". That in itself shows that it is not applicable where the herd is being sold, because the moment you sell the herd your operation is completed. You cannot average forward, because you will not have sales in the succeeding year, although if the three-year system is adopted you can average back for two years. But the only effect of that will be that your tax in the two preceding years will be considerably raised, and the net effect is that no relief will be given the taxpayer at all.

Further support of this contention will be found in the second of the recommendations given in the brief of the Department of Agriculture, where it is urged that breeding herds be recognized as capital assets. The hon. member for Battle River, the hon. member for Souris, the hon. member for Wentworth, and nearly all other hon. members who have spoken on this side, have given illustrations of how the failure to recognize this principle works injustice to the farmer. I know of numerous examples myself. The reason this point is important now is that farmers, and particularly cattle ranchers operating their business as a going concern, are paying taxes. Many of them are getting old and wish to retire but are prevented from doing so or, if they do retire, they are taxed on the proceeds of the sale of the whole herd, so that instead of having a fairly substantial amount on which to retire, they have little left and have to look about for some small business or other in which to engage.

The thing is a problem now and I suggest to the minister very earnestly that he lose no time in finding a solution. He should not content himself with saying that the matter is receiving active consideration by the department. If there is any basis of truth in the contention put forward, I submit to the minister that the time to make adjustments is now.

Mr. McLURE: A short time ago an hon. member asked the minister to define "farmer," and I understood the minister to say that he would give a definition later. I want to make this suggestion to him when he is having these definitions drawn up. To-day there is what is known as the aquafarmer, that is to say, the oyster farmer. That class of farmer comes under all the regulations of the fisheries department. Again there are fur farmers throughout Canada, and they all come under the regulations of the Department of Agriculture. I offer this suggestion to the minister in the hope that it will help him in the definition of "farmer."

Mr. ABBOTT: Thank you.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Some time ago the Minister of Justice referred to the proposal that the farmer, at his option, be allowed to compute his income tax over a period of three years, and he said that the three-year period would really be covering a period of five years. That is so, but it does not meet the point that has been made by the member for Battle River. The important thing to the farmer is that he be allowed to compute his income tax over a period of five years, which is the recommendation of the Canadian federation of agriculture. Taking the three years 1947, 1948 and 1949, in 1947 the farmer would make his computation on the basis of 1947, 1948 and 1949. The point to be established in conformity with the amendment which the member for Battle River moved is that the farmer wants to be able to compute his tax over the average of five separate years.

Mr. FAIR: Before we leave this point I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. members for Souris, Selkirk, Wentworth, Kamloops and many others who have spoken with reference to the placing of herds in the capital assets class. We all realize that before a person can make any profits out of a herd he has to invest money in it, the same as in his farm buildings. In connection with the remarks made by the Minister of Justice, the hon. member who has just taken his seat has pointed out something that should be taken into consideration. You deal with 1946, 1947 and 1948. You get the average of these years and immediately you go on to the year 1949. You dispense entirely with the year 1946 and use the years 1947, 1948 and 1949, so that you are still on a three-year average.

One question has been asked of me on numerous occasions, namely, if the farmer is on the three-year average and uses it for a certain number of years, can he go back to the annual?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: On that particular point, can a farmer or fisherman duck around? Can he take three years on his option and then take one year, and then return to the three-year system and pick out the years which suit him best? Let me say a word on the five-year average which has been referred to by a number of speakers. When universities are considering their experimental work they invariably take a five-year average, or longer if possible. They feel that they can get closer to the truth by taking not less than five years, and more than that if at all possible. In five years you do actually come closer to the actual situation.

Mr. ABBOTT: The five-year question is under discussion at the moment, but I think it is evident to hon. members of the committee that once a farmer has elected to average his income, it is bound to be to his interest to continue on that basis. It cannot be otherwise.

Mr. HARKNESS: I should like to say a word about the basic herd principle. We discussed it at some length on the budget resolutions last year, and hon. members gave numerous reasons why it should be adopted. At that time the minister said that it was being given and would be given active consideration. We have discussed it again to-day, and once more the minister has said that it is being given active consideration. Apparently no progress has been made; we are in exactly the same position now as we were last year. Has the government adopted the basic herd principle, and is it prepared to put it into its taxation system?

Mr. ABBOTT: The answer to that question is no.

Mr. HARKNESS: Then my second question does not apply; I was going to ask, when. If the answer to the question is no, then the information given to us by the minister last year and this year is misleading. It was stated that the matter was being given active consideration. I say it is misleading particularly in view of the statement on page 2918 of Hansard, which the minister read this afternoon, and which certainly gave me the impression that the government was prepared to adopt the principle.

Mr. ABBOTT: No; what I intended to convey, and what the minister intended to convey, was that the question was and still is under consideration. It is a difficult question, and if I must answer categorically the question whether the government adopted what my hon. friend refers to as the basic herd principle, I must answer him by saying no.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I wish to support all that has been said about the matter of breeding herds. I appreciate what the minister says about the difficulty of working out the details in that regard. However, I have something here which I think is simple and easy to understand, and which will provide relief for farmers who raise live stock and live stock products. It has been sent to me by the cooperative live stock marketing association of Dauphin, an association which keeps me up to date on live stock matters. If I may I should like to read it for the consideration of the minister. It is as follows:

Whereas there has been a serious decline in the production of live stock and dairy products; and

Whereas Canada is in desperate need of these agricultural products to help feed the starving masses of Europe;

Therefore be it resolved that for the purpose of encouraging production of live stock and live stock products, amounts up to $1,000 gross income from the sale of live stock and live stock products be exempt from income tax.

It is based on a slightly different principle from that suggested in the discussion which has been going on, but there can be no question that it would be a simple and direct way to bring relief to those engaged in the live stock business.

Before I resume my seat I should like to refer to the mathematics which have been drawn up with regard to the five-year period. It is a fascinating subject, but I am afraid that the impression which was left by the Minister of Justice that this will mean a five-year average in the long run is not correct, at least, in my opinion it is not. I have worked it out on paper, and as I understand it this is the way it would work out. At the end of 1948 you would take the three years, 1946, 1947 and 1948, but in 1949, at the end of the taxation year, you would take the years 1947, 1948 and 1949. In 1950 you would take the years 1948, 1949 and 1950; in 1951, you would take the years 1949, 1950 and 1951, and in 1952 the years 1950, 1951 and 1952. That takes in five years, and if you examine the figures you will find that in no year does one year occur more than three times. If it does not occur more than three times then automatically we must understand that the average is the three-year average. You could go on for a thousand years if you wanted to, but each year would occur only three times, and the average would be a three-year average. I think that should be clearly understood.

Mr. QUELCH: I had to be absent from the chamber and I do not know what took place in my absence. I should like to say that the suggestion to extend the period from three to five years for taxation purposes is a sound one. Every major farm organization has made submissions asking that this be done, which I think proves conclusively that the farmer believes it would be to his advantage.

There is another question that I should like to raise at this time; the hon. member for Bow River referred to it the other day. As the government knows, quota deliveries were established for the years 1941, 1942 and 1943. In 1944 the quotas were lifted, with the result that farmers were able to sell wheat which they had not been able to sell because of the quota in the years 1941, 1942 and 1943. A circular was sent around at that time and in addition was printed in the newspapers; I shall refer only to the first paragraph:

> Where grain raised in one year is carried over, due to quota restrictions but for no other reason, and is sold in subsequent years, the proceeds of such sale may be treated as—
> (1) income of the year in which the sale took place, or
> (2) income of the year in which the grain was raised.

Farmers acted on that declaration in good faith. However, it was cancelled in 1945, but in view of the fact that the circular was sent out, the farmers were under the impression that grain raised in 1941, 1942 or 1943 and held back because of the quota and then sold in 1944 could be changed back into the year in which it was grown. Further, I have a letter sent me the other day by a man in the small town of Morrin who had been filling out returns for farmers. This is what the letter said:

> I am herewith enclosing a letter received from the income tax department at Calgary, which is a vital issue regarding all farmers, as they were forced to hold this grain until 1944 from previous years owing to the quota set by the dominion government, also this is absolutely contrary to their promise of allowing the farmer to transfer his grain back to the year it was grown, and not have to include it in the year it was sold.
> They mention cash wheat in this letter. Now all grain sold in 1944 was practically cash grain, as the farmer collected his money as soon as delivered. Also mainly all grain is sold on this basis and not on an instalment plan. So I cannot see that this statement has any bearing in this case.

The letter the farmer had received from the department stated that this could no longer be done. Here is the letter from the inspector of income tax:

> Your letter of June 14 has been received, and in reply it may be stated that the reversion of cash wheat sales to apply in the year in which the wheat was grown is not allowable under provisions of the Income War Tax Act, where cash returns are filed.

I wonder if the minister could explain why, after issuing a statement such as I read, later they should refuse to allow the farmers to pay taxes on that basis. Certainly it does seem to be a breach of faith on the part of the government.

Mr. ABBOTT: I understand the answer to my hon. friend's question is that an incorrect ruling was given to one taxpayer and was circularized by that taxpayer.

Mr. QUELCH: Would the minister repeat that?

Mr. ABBOTT: I say an incorrect ruling was given to one taxpayer, and I understand it was circularized by that taxpayer. I am informed that is what happened.

Mr. QUELCH: This is not sent out by the taxpayer but by the government, and it refers to the Canadian wheat board producer certificates. This is not circularized by the taxpayer but by the department.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am sorry; I thought my hon. friend was referring to a letter. I wonder if I could have a look at the circular he mentions. Now that my hon. friend has given it to me I see it does not indicate who issued it, but perhaps if my hon. friend would let me have this I can look into it at the dinner recess and see if I can give him a more detailed explanation later.

Mr. FULTON: Following up the question asked by the hon. member for Calgary East and the reply thereto of the minister, which as I understand it was that the department does not accept the basic herd principle, let me ask this question. Is the department of the view that if a farmer sells his herd of cattle, which has been operated as a going concern for perhaps ten years, the proceeds of every animal sold should be regarded as income? Is that the view of the department?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that the answer to that question is yes, because the cost of each of the cattle raised has been treated as an expense by the taxpayer in previous years.

Mr. FULTON: Does the minister or the department not admit any similarity or parallel between allowing expenses for purchases and operation in this case and allowing depreciation before taxation and deductions for other capital outlays in other businesses?

Mr. ABBOTT: I thought I answered that question before by saying that the herd is part of the inventory of the taxpayer. If a trader or merchant increases his inventory out of earnings—well, I must confess I cannot see the parallel between depreciation of fixed assets and a herd of cattle, which is something that is growing from year to year.

Mr. FULTON: But the point is that it is not growing. If it is operated as a going concern it remains stationary from year to year. A basic herd might be two hundred; the average increase might be fifty, and it is the average increase which is sold, while the basic herd remains the same. The minister said they were purchased out of income. Suppose a man inherits a ranch from his father. He did not get it out of income; it came to him as a capital asset. The breeding herd was there; the thing was a going concern. Certainly it was not purchased out of income. Or take the case of a man going into the business. He leaves some other form of activity; he cashes in on his capital assets there, sells his business and acquires perhaps $50,000 which he puts into a ranch and a herd. That is not bought out of income; it is capital. Yet if he sells the herd two years later he is taxed on it—that is, according to the principle enunciated by the minister. If he went on the inventory basis he might be safe; but on the principle enunciated by the minister he would be taxed.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I am not competent to discuss details. Of course every taxpayer in that business is free to operate on an inventory basis. In my recollection this question has been discussed on the budget resolutions for the last two or three years. The same points, some of which may be very good, have been brought forward; and, as the minister said in his budget speech, the question is still being considered by the Department of National Revenue in consultation with the Department of Agriculture. Rightly or wrongly, they have not yet been able to find a solution, but they will continue to consult and I can assure my hon. friend that the points which he and others have made to-day will not be overlooked.

Mr. FULTON: May I just emphasize that this is done in the United States.

Mr. ABBOTT: We shall have a look at the United States practice and see.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): When the hon. member for Kamloops was speaking a while ago I believe the hon. member for Halifax asked what other business could be allowed an expense and a write-off, and then sell their equipment or whatever it was as capital. I think that is done in almost every business.

Mr. ISNOR: Which would increase their capital surplus.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): If a man sets up a manufacturing concern he is allowed to write off his equipment over a period of years. During the war it was three years; in other cases it is four or five years. Then if he sells that business and his equipment, he sells it as capital; there is no argument about that.

Mr. ABBOTT: If there is anything left to sell.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Yes; and there generally is. I know where a farmer buys a new power tractor he is allowed to write it off over five years. If he is a good operator and keeps it in good shape, it may last considerably longer than that. One of the reasons given by the Minister of Finance for allowing the 12½ per cent increase in the prices of farm implements was that these used tractors were selling for more, at farm sales to-day, than they cost when new. That was the minister's own argument; yet the operator was permitted to depreciate them over five years, after which they were allowed as capital. I am prepared to admit that this is a difficult problem, to be quite fair about it, but I certainly do think some arrangement should be arrived at under which it would be acknowledged that a breeding herd is capital rather than inventory, as the acting minister says. If you put up a building you are allowed your depreciation; when you sell it it is acknowledged to be capital. About a year ago I understood that following consultation between the Department of Finance and the Department of Justice, based upon the recommendations of the federation of agriculture, some solution was practically arrived at under which certain basic years were to be taken for the basic herd, as is done for this averaging period now. I should think you could have a basic year when a man had actually purchased his breeding stock, and develop it from that time on.

I am really quite serious about this matter. I believe the man who is raising live stock as his chief means of income should have his basic herd recognized by the department as capital. The whole trouble is a question of definition by the Department of Finance alone as to what should be considered inventory and what should be considered capital. Certainly, as the minister says this matter has been debated ever since I came here in 1940, and as I say, I understood some solution had been agreed upon by negotiation between the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Finance. I trust that may be so in fact before too long.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I make one comment on this, merely to reinforce what has been said by the hon. member for Souris? I do feel that this is a high priority question for the department. I believe I realize the difficulty, because I have had some acquaintance with a couple of cases where the matter was under consideration in a somewhat important way. What struck me—and this is not offered by way of criticism, or with any intent to criticize—was that so far as I could make out there was still a great lack of precision and definiteness in the method which was used. That was the impression I got from the two cases which came to my attention. I do suggest that this matter ought to be given high priority.

Mr. ABBOTT: As the hon. member realizes, one cause of difficulty is, to use his words, lack of appreciation in the method of accounting of taxpayers.

Mr. ISNOR: So as to correct an impression created by a statement by the hon. member for Souris with respect to depreciation, may I point out that the average commercial firm doing business sets up its balance sheet, its profit and loss statement. Further, it must show its assets and liabilities. From liabilities deducted from assets it will show its surplus. That must indicate each year, to the satisfaction of the income tax branch, what its earning power is. It is true there is an opportunity for the man in business to write off a certain depreciation. For a brick building it is 2½ per cent; for a wooden building 5 per cent, and for fixtures 10 per cent, covering a period of ten years. So far as I know, except in special cases during the period of the war, there is no such thing as a write-off of the entire amount in three years. I think hon members should understand that clearly. The largest amount in the average commercial business is 10 per cent on fixtures, whereas in respect of property it is 2½ per cent and 5 per cent. If an individual piece of machinery is purchased, that would be capital expenditure. There is no allowance made for expenditures in that connection. During the war, by order in council, those who had fuel oil equipment for heating their buildings were ordered to do away with that and to instal coal equipment. They were not permitted immediately to write off the cost of the coal equipment which they were obliged to put in in order to carry out the regulations.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It could be depreciated over a number of years.

Mr. ISNOR: But not in anything like two or three years. That change did not go the full five years; it was something like two or three years. One had to take out the equipment and lay it aside, and he had less than thirty cents on the dollar on his investment. Thus there was a distinct loss to the average business man.

Mr. GRAYDON: You have no biological increases in your business.

Mr. ISNOR: In regard to merchandise, the market price was often used in connection with the increased price of goods. The minute one began to write down, an income tax inspector would check up very closely. I do say to the income tax branch officials, however, that in the change-over from oil to coal the branch should have been much more generous in the matter of depreciation.

Mr. PEARKES: I would underline the urgency of this matter, because it was only a few weeks ago that the hon. member for Stanstead drew attention to the large number of dairy cattle that were being exported. Depreciation in the herds results in part from the ceiling price on butter. The same condition exists in British Columbia, where dairy cattle are being sent out of the country, and where heifer calves are being killed off because of the ceiling price on butter. If breeding herds cannot be regarded as capital, it means that another handicap is added to the farmer.

Mr. HARKNESS: The matter of introducing depreciation into the question whether a basic herd is capital, or whether it is not just beclouds the issue. The simplest way to look at it is this. Two men, we will say, came to Alberta twenty-five years ago. Each of whom had $2,000. One bought 100 acres of land at $20 an acre; the other bought 100 cows at $20 a head. Each man spent $2,000 of capital. Assuming that neither increased his holdings, twenty-five years later both are reasonably old men and wish to retire. Because of the appreciation in land values the man with 100 acres may sell at $100 an acre, and will have no income tax to pay on it. The man with the 100 cows will sell them at $100 each, along with the rest of his herd, and must pay an income tax on his return. If he sells the rest of his herd at the same time, it means that the total amount he receives in one year is large, and the tax rate is high. What actually happened was that most men of that kind increased their holdings. To return to the example I have mentioned, one would end up with a thousand acres of land and the other with a thousand head of breeding stock. As the amount increases, the injustice increases in ratio to the amount each man receives. I believe this example states the condition about as simply as it can be stated. The matter is most urgent, because large numbers of men want to retire, and if they do so they are at a disadvantage. They find that the herds they have built up over a lifetime are of no great advantage, because if in one year they sell out their herds, a large amount of their life savings is wiped out in income tax. This is an injustice against the cattle producer, who should not be at a disadvantage as compared with the grain farmer or anybody else. As I said earlier, instead of simply considering the matter the government should forthwith make a definite decision.

Mr. CHURCH: This provision dealing with earned income was extended a few years ago to farmers and fishermen. In my opinion there should be equality of the general principles of taxation among all classes of our population. I remember when the principle behind this resolution was introduced, whereby farmers and fishermen could take an average. That principle of taxation had its beginning in what was known as the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, introduced by my former leader for farmers and extended afterwards to fishermen. I pointed out at that time that if the principle of that legislation was extended to fishermen it should also be extended to industrial workers who might have jobs to-day but not to-morrow, especially in depression years such as we had in the thirties. The time has come when the whole system of taxation should be revised, because, as is well known, down to a year ago farmers and fishermen were practically exempt from income tax.

I can tell you this, that the time has come when income tax should be restored to where it was from 1867 down to 1917. At that time it was still the prerogative and function of the municipality. What has been the result? In 1917 Sir Thomas White said that for one year in order to finish the war there would be a federal duplicate income tax, but the government has held on to the whole principle ever since that date. The time is coming when the principle should be changed and income tax restored to the municipalities.

If you are going to permit by this resolution farmers and fishermen to divide up their income and average it over a number of years, 1946, 1947 and 1948, the same privilege should be extended to other classes in the community, to civil servants, industrial workers and white-collar workers who may not be sure of their jobs and who will not be sure of their jobs if the small business men are continually taxed to death. The tax has to be collected by somebody; but there should be equality of treatment, otherwise the principle is all wrong. It amounts now to confiscation of property. These small retailers and wholesalers cannot pay a tax of 22 per cent, 32 per cent, 42 per cent—the rate goes up every year. If we pass resolution 17, what are we going to do next year? You are actually suggesting a principle that will never be applied because you are going to have to change the whole thing as to what the fishermen and farmers will pay in 1947 and 1948.

Mr. IRVINE: I have had many letters from stockmen in the Cariboo objecting to the matter that is being discussed. If a merchant were to sell his stock and go out of business, would he have to pay income tax on the entire amount received?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a question which I have attempted four or five times to answer this afternoon. As the law now stands, he would pay a tax on the entire proceeds of the sale on the ground that it is a sale of inventory. The discussion this afternoon has been instructive and informative. To some extent it is a repetition of the discussion which took place in previous years, but among other things it has served to bring out the great difficulty which is inherent to this question and which some of the hon. members who have spoken have admitted. I am advised that no longer than a week before the resolutions were brought in, a meeting took place between officials of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Finance with the idea of still further working out the problem. I cannot add to what I have said to-day and to what the minister said in his budget speech. The question has not yet been solved, but we have not given up hope.

Mr. IRVINE: In view of the fact that there is some shade of admission on the part of the minister that there is a real difficulty here and also that there is a sort of undercurrent of suggestion that possibly there is some measure of injustice to farmers who desire to sell off their stock, would it not be wise to hold up this particular method of taxation for this year? It would be better for the state to suffer a little loss than to impose what seems to me a serious loss upon the individual farmer or cattle man.

While I am on my feet may I say I recognize the improvement the government is making in respect to spreading the tax on farmers over a three-year period. However, I must confess that it is not as good as it might be. I understand that this afternoon we are discussing resolution 17 in the hope that the government will give it further consideration and possibly bring in, to-morrow or some other day, some modification of the present policy. If that is the understanding I do not think much good can be served by saying anything more on the matter.

I think all points have been pretty well brought out, but I wish to emphasize these two points. The man who wants to give up his cattle business and sells his stock should not be taxed on the entire amount he receives. Next, taxation on farmers generally should be spread over a five-year period. I hope the Acting Minister of Finance will accede to the wishes of the committee and give this matter a little more consideration. If he does that I am hopeful that there will be some modification in connection with these two points.

Mr. HARKNESS: The minister said a few minutes ago that a discussion had been going on between officials of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Finance in connection with this question of basic herds.

Mr. ABBOTT: With the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. HARKNESS: I suggest to the acting minister and to the government that before any more conferences are held the government make up its mind whether it is going to adopt the principle. If the government accepts the principle that a basic herd is capital, then I suggest that there will not be a great deal of difficulty in working out some practical means of putting it into effect.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. ABBOTT: The stock breeder's herd would be built up out of income. It would be very simple if we accepted initially the herds as they exist to-day, but I think that would be unfair to other taxpayers.

Mr. HARKNESS: Certain breeding herds were built up out of income, but largely at times when the income tax was not applied so heavily. That is why the matter has become so important. The income tax is now quite high and something should be done about the matter. When I used the illustration a little while ago of 100 cows and 100 acres of land I had hopes that when I sat down the minister would either agree or disagree that the cows were capital. I should like to have his view on that matter.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a difficult hypothetical question. Of course, from one point of view they could be considered as capital. My hon. friend went back a long way and cited the case of a man who bought 100 cows and the other man who bought 100 acres of land. I presume the man who bought the 100 cows has lived off the fruits of those cows ever since, but my hon. friend did not indicate what the man who bought 100 acres of land has been living on. The question is not very simple. The matter of dispersal sales is not directly involved in this resolution, but I think it was proper to discuss it and I so indicated. In my memory this subject has been discussed for the last four or five years. As I said a moment ago, the discussion has been very full and most informative. It has been carried on by hon. members who have personal knowledge of what they are speaking about, and may I say at once that I do not include myself in that group because I have had very little experience with breeding herds, although some years ago I did learn how to milk a cow. I do not know that much more can be added to what I have already said. The government will continue to give the most careful consideration to the representations which have been put forward and will carry on with their efforts to see if some acceptable solution can be found for this admittedly difficult problem.

Mr. LENNARD: I bought a farm a year ago, and two months afterwards I was offered twenty-five per cent more than I paid for it. I did not sell it because I did not buy it for that purpose. But if I had I would have gained because I would not have been taxed for it. If I had bought cattle and sold them I would have been taxed.

Mr. McCANN: Are you in the farming business or in real estate?

Mr. LENNARD: In the farming business.

Mr. WARREN: I am not sure that this angle has been fully considered. Suppose a farmer has been building up over a number of years a dairy herd and eventually finds himself in a position where he has to change his methods of farming. Perhaps he is not able to go on milking cows because of lack of help or for some other reason, so that he sells his herd and pastures cattle on his land. Surely in a case of that kind his herd ought to be considered as capital. He has to use the money he got for his herd to buy cattle to put on his pasture. To me it does not seem right that the farmer should be taxed on everything he gets from the dispersal of his dairy herd.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): The minister has the Minister of National Revenue beside him and the deputy minister. I would ask him two questions about this blue form which the farmer has to use in making his income tax return. First, would the minister please explain how the income tax department computes the amount to be inserted in the form for produce raised on the farm and consumed on the farm? Second, would the minister explain why sales of wood, stone, lumber, trees, sand and soil off a farm are regarded as income? That comes under the heading of miscellaneous sales.

Mr. McCANN: The farmer himself in making his return usually computes the value of the produce raised and consumed on the farm. With regard to the sale of gravel, sand or any other commodity from the farm, he puts that down as income when making his return. It is a source of revenue to the farm and as such is returnable as income.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Surely the minister does not pretend that once a sand or gravel pit on the farm is exhausted the farmer could grow another one. A contractor will come in and take perhaps 20,000 yards of gravel from the pit and then the pit may be exhausted. I do not think that could be classed as income.

Mr. ABBOTT: In that case we are out of farming and into mining.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): No. The sales have to be entered on this special form for the farmer. I am sure the minister will not contend that soil or sand or gravel sold off a farm should be classed as income.

Mr. HACKETT: He is allowed depletion for it.

Mr. ABBOTT: My remark about out of farming and into mining was semi-facetious. The farmer must account for the gravel sold as part of his gross income; but, as the hon. member for Stanstead has pointed out, he can claim depletion, and if the depletion operates in the ordinary way he will in due course write off the entire value of his gravel or sand pit and pay no more tax with respect to it.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): I do not regard as satisfactory the answer of the Minister of National Revenue as to the value to be inserted in the form of the produce raised and consumed on the farm. My experience has been that the local inspector tells the farmer what he has to put down there, so much for the farmer, his wife and one child, let us say. Is that correct, or is it left to the farmer to compute the amount of produce consumed by him and his family at, say $100? My experience is that that is not accepted by the inspector, who says: We will put down $300 for that. And that is what the farmer has to pay. Has the farmer the right to say how much it is and put that down on his return?

Mr. McCANN: The farmer is supposed to make his own return. If we find that his return is not in keeping with the average return made by other farmers in that district, the department can raise the amount put down for that item.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): What is the average amount inserted for that item in an average farming community where they are carrying on mixed farming?

Mr. McCANN: One cannot say that a certain figure would be constant for all communities. The figure used in the particular instance my hon. friend mentions would be the figure which is generally given and accepted in a return from that district.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): What figure does the minister refer to, $100 or $150?

Mr. McCANN: Did not the hon. member mention $300 for three people?

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): No; I said $150. If the minister contends that his department charges $150 for the produce raised and consumed on the farm he does not know very much about how the farmer lives to-day. Why charge up eggs, milk, butter or anything like that when there are hundreds of people who keep the odd cow or a few chickens, and they do not have to account for what they raise in that way? To-day practically all that a farmer buys in the way of food is meat, and if you charge him $100 for that, that is far too much. I say that the arbitrary attitude adopted by the local inspectors is hardly consistent with the remarks of the minister.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am sure there is no place on that form for the farmer to make a claim for depletion. I have a splendid wood lot on my farm and a gravel pit at the other end. Anything I receive from the wood or gravel sold has to be shown as income, and there is no place on the form for claiming depletion. If I sold the whole farm, including the wood lot and the gravel pit, the whole would show as capital, but the wood or gravel I sell has to be shown as income.

Mr. ABBOTT: Technically the question of wood is a little difficult. Strictly speaking, I think a man would be allowed to deduct depletion for wood sold from off his farm, and I am positive that he would be able to claim depletion on gravel sold from his gravel pit. As the hon. member for Stanstead has said, the farmer can claim depletion. I am not familiar with the particular form the farmer uses and do not know whether it contains a space for that, nevertheless the farmer is entitled to claim depletion.

Mr. HACKETT: In the study that has been made of this problem, has what is being done in other agricultural countries been considered? For instance, I understand that in Norway and Sweden the timber cut is considered as a crop. It is not an annual crop but is cut periodically and constitutes revenue. In those countries, is it charged up as income to the farmer? In great farming countries like the United States, have they found a solution for this particularly involved and annoying problem?

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot answer my hon. friend from personal knowledge. The officials of the Department of Finance especially charged with the investigation of these tax questions have the taxing systems of all other countries under constant review. As the committee knows, the farming community as a class are not large income tax payers and have not been in the past. Until very recent years, only a limited number was taxable or at any rate filed returns. The problem has perhaps become more acute in recent years because of the greater number of farmers who are in the income tax category. However, I will see that the point my hon. friend has raised is taken into consideration. This section, as he appreciates, does not directly involve the basis on which farmers are taxed. It has to do merely with the question of averaging, but under this head, we have been having a general discussion of taxation of farmers, which is probably in order.

[Mr. G. S. White.]

Mr. HACKETT: It has raised a great deal of unrest—possibly that is too sweeping a term—or at any rate considerable anxiety among farmers. I do not wish to intimate that great numbers have asked me about it, but several have done so. Last week I received a letter from a gentleman stating that the only crop he raised on his farm that did not seem so far to be subject to taxation—and he thanked God that it was a bountiful one—was children. He asked me what provision had been made about the taxation of the proceeds of the sale of herds. I submit to the minister that a definite statement on the subject should be made as early as possible because at the present time, there are a great many uncertainties in the life of a farming community, and this new one is a problem which is creating considerable anxiety and curiosity. A definite statement of policy should be made at as early a date as possible.

Mr. McMASTER: As a city resident, I think city people would be quite content if a great deal of leniency were exercised in charging to the farmer what he uses from the farm. If you carried the principle to the extreme limit, I would say that as a professional man, if I did certain work in my own home I would be saving money and should be charged for it, or if I raised some chickens and used the products of those chickens I should be charged. I suggest that the unrest and bad feeling caused by these little charges against the farmers, who work long hours and need a certain amount of protection, far outweighs any benefit that is derived. You have only to look at the returns from the farmers to realize that you do not get anything valuable, while these charges cause unrest.

Mr. FAIR: I had a letter from my wife this afternoon—

An hon. MEMBER: Good.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. KNOWLES: Put it on the record.

Mr. FAIR: I am glad that my hon. friends appreciate my getting a letter as well as I do myself. I would put part of it on the record, but it would not make them any happier than it makes me. My wife tells me that on Monday morning there was quite a sheet of ice on the water tank, which is quite close to the garden. That means that the garden is gone and we shall have to go and buy what we need. I am wondering what income tax we shall have to pay this year in respect of the value of that.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not much, I should think.

Mr. FAIR: We have had several discussions in the house about the returns that farmers receive. The farmer's wife and his family look after the garden and receive no wages. His family get no consideration whatever for their labour, and what the farmer uses out of the garden should not be taken into consideration in making up income tax returns. Is there any justification in the world for taking account of the potatoes and other vegetables used out of the garden? If there is, then I suggest that the minister and his colleagues should grow stub beards and have the hammer and sickle flag over their desks, because there is no reason why these things should be confiscated from the farmers. Part of the farmer's income is confiscated in the form of the prices he receives—or does not receive—for what he sells and it is time we got down to common sense in dealing with these matters.

Mr. CARDIFF: How long does the department feel justified in holding taxes that have been overpaid?

Mr. McCANN: The refunds are made as quickly as possible.

Mr. CARDIFF: The case to which I have reference goes back to 1943 and the money has not yet been paid back. I do not know how many hundreds of thousands of cases there are—

Mr. McCANN: It does not run into hundreds of thousands. The complaints with reference to refunds are very few, and if the hon. gentleman will bring that particular case to my attention I will have it looked into immediately.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Brandon): There is one observation which I should like to make in a spirit of fairness, and it might as well be made under this heading as any other. Several months ago I received, as other members probably received, a great many complaints as to the demeanour of local inspectors checking up on farm returns. I received a few letters that incensed me a good deal, so much so that I prepared a questionnaire and sent out fifty-five copies to various persons, not all in my constituency, inquiring as to what grounds there were for these complaints. Most of them replied, and I wish to report in a word or two the gist of the replies. About half of them praised the attitude of the assessors; about a quarter of them said they had no complaints at all to make; only one man complained, and he complained bitterly. I knew that man; in fact I had known him for years. I knew also the inspector who made the inspection. They are both very fine men and I regretted that there was any feeling between two men of that type. I believe they came together at a time when they were both considerably irritated about other matters and there was a bit of explosion. Apart from that individual case, I had not one complaint of the attitude of these assessors. Had there been many, I would have expressed myself fairly critically on the floor of the house, and I would have had a right to. But since there is only one, I thought, as I said in the beginning, that as a matter of fairness I should report to the Minister of National Revenue and to the committee the calibre of the men so far as I have been able to learn who were in my constituency and near it, and I have much pleasure in doing so at this time.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: A little while ago the minister said he was sure that a depletion allowance was available, but I do not think he replied to the question as to what space there is on the form for applying for such allowance. Probably the Minister of National Revenue can answer that question, which is an important one. It has to do with woodlots and gravel pits.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know about woodlots. There may be no place on the form—I have not the form before me—but the deputy minister tells me the rate is small, about a cent on a ton of gravel. The point I am making is that the taxpayer is entitled to claim depletion. As I say, the amount received is very small but the depletion can be claimed.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: That does not answer the question I asked.

Mr. ABBOTT: Let me answer it this way. There may be no place on the form—I shall have to have the form looked up to see—but even if there is not a place, the taxpayer is still entitled to claim depletion. It may not be worth his while to do so, but he is entitled under law to claim it.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Is there such a form? Can the Minister of National Revenue tell us what the form is? I imagine it would be in his department.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know what kind of form my hon. friend means. There does not have to be any special form for claiming depletion. There may be a place on the regular income tax form in which it is indicated to the taxpayer that he may claim depletion. Nevertheless it does not have to be on the form as a matter of law, and it is perfectly open to the taxpayer to claim that depletion and to claim it at any place on the form. He can put it under the heading of "other deductions." The deputy minister informs me that there is a place on the form for other deductions; it could be put under that.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: That is the answer I was seeking.

Resolution stands.

18. That for the 1946 and subsequent taxation years, the service pay and allowances, other than travelling allowances or separation allowances in place of travelling allowances, of a member of the permanent Canadian naval, military or air forces paid at the new rates of pay and allowances established for the said permanent forces be taxable income of a member irrespective of

(a) whether he is serving within or outside of Canada; or

(b) whether he receives the pay and allowances during the first six months after his return to Canada.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I ask the minister a question on resolution 18?

Mr. ABBOTT: I was going to give my usual preliminary statement.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I was going to ask the question because it is inconsistent with that. Will the minister be good enough to let resolutions 18, 19 and 20 stand until this evening, because the hon. member for Vancouver South, who would like to speak on them, has to attend the committee on veterans affairs?

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be glad to do that.

Resolutions 18, 19 and 20 stand.

21. That, where an elected member of a provincial legislature is, under an act of the provincial legislature, paid an allowance for expenses incidental to the discharge of his duties as a member, the allowance received in the 1946 or a subsequent taxation year be deemed, to the extent of not more than one-third of the aggregate of his normal sessional indemnity as a member and the said allowance, not to be salary or taxable as income.

Resolution 21 agreed to.

22. That where the author or joint author of a literary, dramatic, musical or artistic work on which he was engaged for a period of more than twelve months assigns the copyright therein wholly or partially and has in the 1946 or a subsequent taxation year received within one year of the assignment in consideration therefor an amount, the whole of which would otherwise be included in computing his income during the taxation year a specified part or parts of the consideration may, at his option, be attributed to his income during certain previous taxation years.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I had better make a brief explanation of this resolution. The legislation to be founded on this resolution is intended to afford relief to authors of literary, dramatic, musical or artistic works who receive in one year a sum of money for the sale of a work on which they have been engaged for more than twelve months. The amendment to the act will allow the taxpayer to elect to have the payment from such a sale taxed in the following manner: one, if the period in which he was engaged on the work exceeds twelve months but is less than twenty-four months, one-half the payment to be taxed in the year of receipt and one-half in the previous year. Second, if the period in which he was engaged on the work exceeds twenty-four months, one-third of the payment taxed in the year of receipt and one-third in each of the two previous years.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That seems more specific than the delightfully vague language of the resolution, but I take it that it is not inconsistent with what is in the resolution. The resolution says:

. . . a specified part or parts of the consideration may, at his option, be attributed to his income during certain previous taxation years.

What the minister has read is making it more specific than this.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct. My hon. friend appreciates that these resolutions are invariably drawn in fairly general terms, and that the specific part is set out in the legislation. As a rule, the government indicates what it is intended the legislation should be, and that is what I have done.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The only reason I commented is that I found the resolution drawn in such delightful vagueness.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall pass on the hon. member's remarks to the draftsman.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the former member for Kootenay West were here I imagine that he would ask the question I will ask in his absence. Will the authors who receive returns for such writings as are protected by the performing right society, songs and so forth, pay on the dividends received from the performing right society?

Mr. ABBOTT: The answer is yes.

Mr. McMASTER: Is three years a fair period of time? I am almost afraid to bring in a similar case, but in England in the case of the sale of patents they are spread over a period of six years. I suppose it would all depend on what they receive.

Mr. ABBOTT: After consideration this was felt to be fair. As the committee will appreciate, it extends a substantial measure of relief to artists and authors.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Has there been any representation from the association representing the authors, and does this meet their views?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that representations have been made by the Canadian authors' association and that this does meet their views.

Resolution agreed to.

23. That the special rates provided for non-resident-owned investment corporations be reduced for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years from 22½ per cent to 15 per cent but that such corporations be taxable on all income received in Canada subject to deductions from the said income in respect of interest and dividends received from such other corporations and foreign taxes paid by the corporation.

Mr. JACKMAN: May I ask the minister a simple question? I do not think he needs to read his statement. Some of these companies do have fiscal years ending not with the fiscal year, and with the change in the legislation made applicable to the calendar year it would apply to only part of their fiscal year. It was changed some years ago to accord this equity. I think it would be acceptable if the minister would agree.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that the present intention is that it should apply to fiscal years ending in the calendar year 1947.

Mr. JACKMAN: The minister says that it will apply to fiscal years ending in 1947. The relief granted here commences on January 1 of next year.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. JACKMAN: Therefore a company which had a year ending in September would go for nine months on the present schedule of rates; is that not right?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, it would get twelve months. I am not quite clear whether this will answer my hon. friend's question; but taking the case which he has cited, a company whose year ends on September 30 would file returns on September 30, 1946, and would pay on the present rate of twenty-two per cent. It would file its next return in September or October, 1947, for the full year ending September 30, 1947, and would pay for that twelve months' period, but it would be taxed at the rate indicated, fifteen per cent.

Mr. JACKMAN: I think this plea for equity—I may call it that—was granted some years ago, when another change was made in connection with these companies. I may say that I am not very familiar with them.

Therefore I am always willing to stand corrected. What is requested is that the new rate of taxation be made to apply to a company during the calendar year. The rate changes on December 31 of this year. I take it that if a company has its fiscal year ending at some other time in the calendar year it would pay the present rate until December 31, 1946. For that part of its fiscal year which is in the calendar year 1947, however, it would have the new rate applicable to that portion of its income. I think it should work both ways.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is a complicated situation, and perhaps it might assist if I were to read the brief explanation I have here, which covers, at any rate in part, the point my hon. friend has in mind.

The purpose of the proposed legislation is to simplify and place on a more equitable basis the tax applying to non-resident owned investment corporations. Incidental to the proposed changes, there may be very minor tax abatement, depending on the type of securities held in the portfolio of the investment company. That is because, under the law as it stands at present, in the case of Canadian dividends from Canadian companies the effective tax is 15 per cent. In the case of certain interest on interest-bearing securities, it is 22½ per cent. The possible change in the incidence of this tax is incidental to the overhauling of the section and has no important revenue significance. The provisions of the law are complicated, and unless members of the committee wish to go completely into the intricacies of this item I suggest it might stand until the bill is before the committee, when I shall be prepared to give a fuller explanation. As I say, those who are particularly interested in this type of company will be able to follow the proposed changes when the amendments to the Income War Tax Act are before the committee.

Mr. JACKMAN: I only asked the minister to see if he would agree that a company of this kind would not be discriminated against if it happened to have its fiscal year end at other than the end of the calendar year.

Mr. ABBOTT: I can agree that it will not be discriminated against.

Resolution agreed to.

24. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years investment corporations whose profits are now exempt from tax under paragraph (f) of section seven of the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, be exempt from tax upon income and that such corporations that would be so exempt except that they have outstanding bonds, debentures or other securities evidencing bonded indebtedness pay tax upon income at one-half the rate for corporations.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I had better make a brief explanatory statement. This resolution deals with the tax position of investment corporations. For the purpose of tax treatment, investment corporations are divided into two groups; that is, those with funded indebtedness and those without funded indebtedness. The latter group, those without funded indebtedness, are at present exempt completely from the excess profits tax, and the present proposal is that they shall be exempt in future from corporation income tax. It is believed that investment trusts of the sort being considered represent in effect merely collective investment by individuals, and it is considered that the mere funnelling of income through the company to individuals should not bring on an extra tax. Provision is made, of course, that substantially all the income received by the investment trust must be distributed to the shareholders.

With regard to investment trusts which have funded indebtedness the situation is slightly different. In this case the corporation has issued fixed interest bearing securities to the public. The funds secured from the bondholders are then invested along with the funds received from the shareholders. It will be clear, I think, that any return obtained by the company in investing the funds received from the bondholders, in excess of the fixed rate of interest paid to the bondholders, goes to the equity holders. In this sense, then, the corporation can be said to have made a profit for the equity holders in addition to having invested their funds advantageously. It seems therefore, that a half rate rather than full exemption would be fair and reasonable in the case of this kind of investment trust.

Mr. KNOWLES: The only comment I have to offer is that when resolutions 12 to 16 are called the minister must not be surprised if we give back to him some of the things he is now saying. It seems to me the argument is used that here you have a collective effort which should not be penalized by taxation, and the same argument will be used with respect to cooperatives.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not believe that principle applies here. However, if my hon. friend wishes to draw an analogy when we are on the other sections I would have no objection to his doing so.

Resolution agreed to.

[Mr. Abbott.]

25. That for taxation years ending after June 30, 1947, a corporation be permitted to deduct from income amounts paid to charitable organizations not exceeding 5 per cent of the income of the corporation subject to taxation without the limitation presently thereon.

Mr. ABBOTT: Under the present law the tax savings of a corporation making charitable donations is limited to 40 per cent in the case of any excess of its donations over a standard which is defined in the law and which I have always thought is complicated. That restriction was imposed when the 100 per cent excess profits tax was enforced; and with the lower rates proposed for 1947 it is deemed unnecessary to continue this limitation. It will be withdrawn in respect of companies with fiscal years ending after June 30, 1947, and the original provision under which charitable donations were allowed as a deduction up to five per cent of a corporation's income will be the only limitation imposed.

Mr. CHURCH: I am sure the department has received large numbers of letters from charities, hospitals and universities to which under this section corporations used to pay, re donations and aid to these charitable objects, so much a year over a period of three years, five years or in some cases ten years. Last session, when this matter was under discussion, I pointed out that, as a result of the change made, many universities, many hospitals and many charities looking after poor people, are suffering, and as a result some have refused to continue this work. Last year I read a letter to the Minister of Finance from Archbishop Seager, the head of a college in London, as well as letters from other universities, and I had hoped that some protection, or more than five per cent, might be given them by making payments under these contracts, because that is what they are, charitable grants free from taxation. During the war, these institutions were starved for new buildings, and in some of them the situation is difficult at the present time. The university of Toronto has some five thousand students out at Ajax. Because of the limited operation of the five per cent limitation some people have ceased to make these contributions. In my opinion, the government should consider the whole problem during the recess, if they cannot do anything now, because certainly some relief should be given. Perhaps the minister will be able to make a further statement later.

Mr. ABBOTT: As I indicated, the proposal here is to restore the provisions of the law as they were before the amendment of 1945, which, as I say, was made to meet special conditions arising out of the imposition of the 100 per cent excess profits tax.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is, the rates are no longer such that a corporation can save taxes by making these donations?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right. We feel that the proportion of the corporation income which comes into its own coffers, if I might put it in that way, is sufficient to provide a real deterrent to unnecessary and extravagant donations.

Mr. McKAY: Is a corporation required to file receipts for charitable donations, as private individuals are?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. CHURCH: I wonder if I could ask a question with regard to resolution 21?

Mr. ABBOTT: If the committee has no objection I have none.

Mr. CHURCH: I thank the minister and the committee for the courtesy; I happened to be out when the resolution was called. In many provinces the capital city has an income from taxes larger than the province and in two or three cases a turnover greater than the province in capital and maintenance from civic taxes. I noticed at a meeting of municipalities that there was a request that in respect of large municipalities some allowance should be made to bodies like boards of control in large cities. This was discussed by the municipal convention I have in mind, and I think it is a matter which the minister might consider in his next budget, namely, of an allowance, as in resolution 21 to provincial legislatures, to the larger municipalities.

Resolution agreed to.

26. That persons entitled to a payment out of an employee's superannuation or pension fund or plan, the investment income of which has been exempt from taxation by reason of an election for such exemption by the trustees or corporation administering the fund or plan, be allowed in the 1946 and subsequent taxation years as an alternative to the present deduction from the pension or superannuation payment, an amount computed on the basis of the amounts paid by the employee together with simple interest on such amounts at 3 per cent per annum.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is complicated, and I believe I should make an explanation. The effect of the legislation to be founded on this resolution is to offer an alternative method of determining the taxable portion of pensions received from funds, the income of which has been exempt from tax by reason of an election of the trustees of the fund. The section of the law which authorized this election was introduced in 1928 and was repealed in 1945.

During the period that a fund has been kept under this section, contributions made by the employee to the fund were not allowed as deductions from income, but the pension derived by the employee is subject to tax only in the proportion that contributions for which he was given deduction—that is, contributions made prior to 1928 or following 1945—bore to his total contribution to the fund. If all the contributions, for instance, were made between 1928 and 1945, then the pension is totally exempt. Or, to take another example, if one-fifth of the contributions were made before 1928 and one-fifth after 1945, and the other three-fifths between 1928 and 1945, then two-fifths of the pension would be taxable and three-fifths of the pension would be tax exempt.

Representations have been made that this formula took no account of the portion of the final pension which arose from interest accumulations on the employee's contribution to the fund. If, for example, interest accumulations were added to the contributions made during the 1928 to 1945 period, the portion of the final pension actually attributable to these contributions would be larger, and the tax exempt proportion would be correspondingly increased. The effect of adding interest accumulation is mixed, however, depending upon the period in which the greater proportionate amount of the contributions were made.

If the greater part of the contributions were made before 1928, since these contributions determine the taxable proportion of the pension the accumulation of interest on these contributions would give less favourable treatment than that now provided in the law.

On the other hand, if no contributions were made prior to 1928, a substantial proportion made in the period 1928 to 1945, and a lesser proportion made after 1945, the accumulation of interest would be more favourable than the present formula. Since the accumulation of interest is only of benefit under certain circumstances, it will be offered as an alternative which the taxpayer may take at his option.

The method now provided in law will be preserved, however, for pensioners who find it of greater benefit than the proposed alternative. In other words, this is another case where an option is being given to the taxpayer to take one of two alternatives, whichever may be the more favourable.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): This is some little alleviation of what it was felt last autumn would be a hardship. This, as I understand it, is in no sense taking away any existing right, but purely an additional option.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is absolutely correct.

Mr. PEARKES: Would that apply to pensioners of the permanent force?

Mr. ABBOTT: They were contributory pensions, and I should think that contributions made would apply. However, I would not want to be held to that statement.

Mr. PEARKES: Can we have a definite answer?

Mr. ABBOTT: On second thought, I would question whether this would apply.

Mr. PEARKES: I will not press for an answer at this time.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be glad to look into the matter; but I do not think it would apply, because I do not think there is any possibility of election of the trustees.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to ask a question which may not be very intelligent, because I am not a good enough mathematician to figure it out. But I want to know this: Is it possible that a person might wish to opt for one of these, and later on circumstances might change so that he might wish to opt for the other. If so, does the election bind him permanently? I am speaking of resolution 26.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told that it would not change, that he is able to decide at the time which option will continue to be more favourable.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask if the whole question of taxation of both payments into and payments out of pension funds, or deductions for amounts paid in and taxation on payments out, is still under consideration? Does this end the matter? It seems to me that there are other factors in addition to the varying interest rates which would have a bearing, and which would cause a taxpayer to elect one way or the other. There is also the question of rates of income tax in force at the time a person is paying into a pension fund as compared with what might be the rate when the person is receiving the pension.

It seems to me that this makes a strong case for still greater simplification of this whole question as to whether or not payments into superannuation funds should be exempt from taxation, and as to whether or not in the final analysis pension payments should be taxed at all, in either instance.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. ABBOTT: As my hon. friend will recall, that whole question was considered by the Ives commission, and legislation was introduced last year following the recommendations of that commission. I had thought we were pretty well at the end of that road. However, that does not mean that there cannot be further improvement, if such is possible.

Resolution agreed to.

27. That the special provisions with regard to,
(a) payments out of a superannuation or pension fund plan upon the death, withdrawal or retirement from employment of an employee or former employee in full satisfaction of all his rights in the fund or plan,
(b) payments by an employer to an employee upon retirement in recognition of long service, and
(c) payments by a person to a former employee in respect of loss of office or employment be replaced by a provision for the taxation of amounts so received after June 27, 1946, at the option of the taxpayer either as income for the year in which he received the amounts or at a rate equal to the percentage which the tax upon the taxpayer's income during his last full year in the employment is that of income.

Mr. ABBOTT: The effect of the legislation to be based upon this resolution is to revise and make uniform the various provisions of the present law regarding the taxation of lump sum payments received from a superannuation or pension fund and from an employer on the occasion of retirement or loss of office. Under the existing law a lump sum payment from a superannuation or pension plan is taxable only to the extent of one-third, while lump sum payments on retirement or in respect of loss of office are taxable to the extent of one-fifth in the year of receipt and one-fifth in each of the following four years.

These provisions were introduced during the war to moderate the effect of very high tax rates when applied to a lump sum of money the whole of which is taxable income. In the case of payments out of a superannuation fund contributions to the fund would have been deductible when tax rates were much lower and the one-third rule had regard to this fact. In the meantime contributions have been deductible under high wartime tax rates, while lump sum payments out of the fund will be taxed at substantially reduced rates. It is proposed, therefore, to alter the provisions. All lump sum payments of the kind I have mentioned will be taxable at the option of the taxpayer either as income in the year of receipt or at a rate equal to the percentage which his total tax in the last full year of employment bears to his income in that year.

One alternative will be more favourable under certain circumstances than the other, depending upon the amount received in the lump sum payment and the amount of the taxpayer's other income. The taxpayer will be allowed to elect which of the alternatives is to his greatest advantage. This amount will apply to lump sum payments received after June 27, 1946.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Could we be given an illustration of a case where it might be more favourable to tax on a lump sum? It would have to be a very small lump sum, would it not?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think that is right. It would have to be a small lump sum and the taxpayer would have to have no other income.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am wondering if I understand what you mean by a lump sum. Am I correct in thinking that it means a single payment?

Mr. ABBOTT: A single payment.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Is this a real option and are there cases where the lump sum option is taken?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that there are cases and that there is a real option here.

Mr. McMASTER: What is the other case where it is added on?

Mr. JACKMAN: The ship must come in in the meantime.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will see if I can explain it a little bit. A man may receive a comparatively small lump sum out of a superannuation fund on retirement and not have any other income in that year because he does not get a job immediately. It would be better for him to elect to have that lump sum taken into income and taxed as such. On the other hand, if the lump sum payment were fairly substantial and he had other income in addition under those circumstances he has an option of not taking the lump sum payment into his income for that year but of having it taxed on this special basis as special income. That is, it would be taxed for income tax purposes in the year of receipt at a rate equal to the percentage which his total tax in the last full year of employment bears to his income in that same year. In other words, he can exercise an option and in effect divide his income into two parts, income which he receives from ordinary sources and this lump sum payment. He can have the lump sum payment taxed on this special basis which under those circumstances, would be more advantageous than to include it as part of his income for that year.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If I understand correctly, the only case in which the first option could apply would be where the lump sum payment was less than the income received in the last year of employment.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think that is probably correct.

Mr. HACKETT: I have an idea that some discretion is exercised by the department when an amount is received as compensation for loss of employment. I think the minister has enough imagination to know what I am asking about.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is provided for in section 3, subsection 8 of the Income War Tax Act which reads:

> Where the minister is satisfied that a payment or payments made on or after the thirteenth day of October, nineteen hundred and forty-five by a person to a former employee is in respect of loss of office or employment, one-fifth only of the payment or the aggregate of the payments made in any year shall be deemed, for the purposes of this act, to be income of the taxpayer in the year it is received and one-fifth thereof shall be so deemed to be income of the taxpayer in each of the four succeeding years in which he is living.

That section is being amended by the legislation which will follow this resolution. As I indicated in my statement that was inserted in the law at a time when the war-time rate of taxation were so high that it was felt that that was equitable under the circumstances.

Mr. HACKETT: I wonder why an arbitrary rule of that kind was resorted to. I think it would be more equitable to take the life expectancy of the individual and divide the payment into the number of years of expectancy. A man ceases to be employed and is paid a certain sum in lieu of salary for all time. If his expectancy were found to be ten years, why would it not be better to give him an income of one-tenth the total payment for each of the remaining ten years of his life? It seems to me that the present amendment will discourage payments to people who have rendered useful service. These payments will be considered to be futile because such a substantial portion will be going to the tax collector. Frequently it will make the income for the year greater than the taxpayer has ever earned during his earning years.

Mr. ABBOTT: The proposed amendment will correct that. It was considered not only impracticable but most undesirable to take the life expectancy basis. Payments for loss of office cover men of a variety of ages, from the very young to the quite elderly, and they vary greatly in amount. A man who has a contract with an employer may have his contract terminated and be paid a certain sum of money as compensation. I do not think it would be proper to treat that as an annual payment to him for the rest of his life, based on his life expectancy. I think by and large the rule which was adopted under the section which I read of averaging it over five annual periods was about as close as one could come to a correct solution. Taking into account the fact that wartime rates of taxation were then high and that we are now coming into a period of reduced taxation, it is considered that the proposed rule provided for in this resolution is more equitable.

Mr. HACKETT: Would it not be better to wait until we get into the period of reduced taxation? I appreciate that there will be a reduction of sixteen per cent in income tax in 1946, but the tax is still a very burdensome one. It might easily mean that twenty-five or thirty per cent of the contribution which the employer wishes to make for the comfort and well-being of a faithful employee would go to the tax gatherer. It seems to me that that is unduly harsh, because in most cases the earning power of the individual has been terminated when these benefits accrue to him.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka Ontario): I take it that these payments in resolution 27 are in cases where a man on leaving gets one lump sum?

Mr. ABBOTT: Right.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Of course, as the hon. member for Stanstead has pointed out, it is very unfortunate that the benefit should come in that way; it is not as good as a pension arrangement. Nothing is done, I take it, by way of anticipation to take care of the taxing situation such as is done in a pension plan. Is that true?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that in a superannuation fund exemptions have been allowed to the taxpayer for the contributions he had made.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I come now to a matter of wording. The resolution says that the special provisions with regard to these payments shall:

> . . . be replaced by a provision for the taxation of amounts so received after June 27, 1946, at the option of the taxpayer either as income for the year in which he received the amounts—

What amounts are those? We have been talking about one amount.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. ABBOTT: It probably should be in the singular. The resolution, as my hon. friend will notice, is drawn to cover three types of payments, payments out of a superannuation or pension fund, and payments by an employer to an employee upon retirement or loss of office, being payments of a lump sum but of a different nature. That may account for the use of the plural in the last paragraph. We shall be careful in the wording of the legislation.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister does not think we can successfully suggest that it is intended to refer to a series of amounts?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not think so.

Mr. McMASTER: We spent some time last year in fixing this at five years to overcome the effect of the option, and now we are going back to the same old provision as before. Could it be that the present provision has been taken advantage of, or what is the reason?

Mr. ABBOTT: This will not affect pending cases.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not know whether there are any. I am wondering why, after changing to the five-year period, we are now going back to the earlier provision. We are reversing what we did last year.

Mr. ABBOTT: We are entering on a period of reducing rather than increasing taxation.

Mr. McMASTER: That is an optimistic statement but hardly justifies this reduction from five years to one year. I am wondering if the existing clause has been taken advantage of to evade taxation?

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. JACKMAN: Why is the administration not willing to accept what seems the most logical principle, namely, life expectancy? Or, if that it too complicated, why do they not give ten years or a stated number of years during which to write-off the gratuity or superannuation payment? We have had this matter up in previous years. It creates a great hardship when the whole amount is taxed in the year in which it is received. So that last year we made it five years, and I was hoping that now we would make it ten years. While there is an option in the proposed change, it seems to me that it will work a greater tax on the individual than the existing provision, which provides for a five-year spread of the capital payment. It is quite possible, indeed almost inevitable, that the tax on the capital sum at the rate of the man's last year of annual earnings will be at a great deal higher rate than the yearly spread over the next five years, and certainly over the next ten years. In other words, the man is retired and he has not much income in the great majority of cases that we are considering, and you are taxing him at higher rates than the ordinary individual who gets the same amount of money. When employers are trying to do the right thing by their employees by giving them a capital sum on leaving their service, the state should not step in and take away a little more than it takes from another individual who is getting the same amount of money. That is why I believe that life expectancy is the proper principle. If that is too complicated to work out, perhaps a ten-year period should be granted.

Mr. HACKETT: Why would it be too complicated?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not take the stand that it would be too complicated. I think it would be unfair to the general mass of taxpayers. Let me give an example. The employer gives his employee a lump sum on leaving his employ. The employer has no pension fund and so he gives his employee the equivalent, we will say, of six months' salary when he retires, $2,000 or $2,500 or something of that sort. That is a gratuity. It is income within the meaning of the act. But under the provisions of the existing law that could be spread over five years because the tax rates were then high. Under the proposed amendment an option is given to the taxpayer. He can either take it as income for the year in which it is received and pay the tax on it at whatever the rates may be, or he may exclude it from his income if he has other income and have it taxed at a rate equal to the percentage which the tax upon the taxpayer's total income during his last full year of employment bore to his income in that year.

Mr. HACKETT: I understand quite well what the minister has said, but I am baffled a little by the basis he gives for his decision, that of fairness. I am sure it will be conceded that in the great majority of cases the man's usefulness as an earning and competitive entity is at an end. So why should we take any other basis for computing the gratuity than the number of years which he is going to live? He is getting that total amount in lieu of annual earnings for the rest of his life.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not necessarily. These payments may have no particular relation to future earning power. His employer may retire him at sixty. He is still active, and he retires with a lump sum because his employer does not have a pension fund. Then, being still active, he gets another position or earns money in other ways. His earning power is far from over. This provides that the payment does not have to be included in income for the year in which it is paid. I think that is fair. It may apply to any man from twenty-five to seventy-five years of age.

Mr. HACKETT: I admit that there may be exceptions, but cannot we agree that in most cases these lump sum payments are made to men who, in the appreciation of their employers, have reached the termination of their earning power? I am sure that if the minister goes over a very short category of his own acquaintances he will recall the names of many men who, while still active and in good health, cannot go out and get jobs. They were able to during the war because there was a great shortage of men. But the fact remains that in normal times the ordinary man whose services are dispensed with, whether it be by an insurance company, a brokerage house or an industrial concern, has reached the end of his competitive usefulness.

Mr. ABBOTT: A payment of this kind is not supposed to keep a man all his life. It is the equivalent of a few months' salary, a gratuity on retirement. It is not intended to keep him for the rest of his life; otherwise the equity as between different recipients would provide no connection at all. It would depend on age. A young man would have a big edge on the older man.

Mr. McMASTER: If he got $10,000 in one year and paid $3,500 income tax, and got $10,000 gratuities, he would pay $3,500 on the same basis. Perhaps when we get an example we can understand it.

Resolution agreed to.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ABBOTT: I believe, Mr. Chairman, that section 27 was carried at six o'clock. We might now revert to sections 18, 19 and 20, which were held in suspense.

18. That for the 1946 and subsequent taxation years, the service pay and allowances, other than travelling allowances or separation allowances in place of travelling allowances, of a member of the permanent Canadian naval, military or air forces paid at the new rates of pay and allowances established for the said permanent forces be taxable income of a member irrespective of

(a) whether he is serving within or outside of Canada; or

(b) whether he receives the pay and allowances during the first six months after his return to Canada.

19. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years the pay and allowances of a member of the non-permanent Canadian naval, military or air forces other than the pay and allowances received by a member serving outside of the western hemisphere or within six months of his return thereto be taxable income of the said member and that the provisions for

(a) a tax credit in respect of pay and allowances exceeding $1,600 as provided by rule 2 of section 3 of paragraph A of the first schedule; and for

be repealed.

20. That the exemption of amounts received by members of the merchant marine as war risk bonuses in respect of service in a war risk zone and of the value of board and lodging received on shipboard, while performing service in respect of which such bonuses are payable be repealed for 1947 and subsequent taxation years.

Mr. ABBOTT: I might make the usual preliminary statement with reference to section 18 and the two following sections. These resolutions withdraw for the most part, from January 1, 1947, the special tax exemptions now granted members of the armed forces and the merchant marine. The present position regarding taxation of the armed forces may be summarized briefly as follows: 1. All personnel overseas are now entirely tax exempt. 2. Personnel in Canada are tax exempt on pay and allowance up to $1,600 a year if single and to higher amounts if married. As pay and allowances exceed these exempt amounts, they are made subject only gradually to the civilian tax rates through the operation of a diminishing tax credit. 3. Personnel in the western hemisphere but outside Canada pay only one-half the tax payable by forces stationed in Canada. 4. Pay and allowances of a member of the armed forces who returns from overseas and remains in the services are exempt for a period of six months. 5. Subsistence allowances up to $1.70 a day and travelling allowances are also exempt from tax under the present law.

The effect of the proposed change will be to make all permanent force personnel subject to ordinary income tax on their pay and allowances at the new permanent force rates, whether in Canada or overseas, commencing from the inauguration of the new rates of pay in 1946, which will probably be somewhere about September or October. All other service personnel in Canada and in the western hemisphere outside Canada will be subject to full civilian tax from the beginning of 1947, while the overseas exemption will be continued only for the non-permanent force, a group rapidly diminishing in numbers. Exemption for six months after return to Canada will not be applicable to personnel receiving the new permanent force pay prior to their return to Canada, and the exemption now given for subsistence allowance up to $1.70 a day will be repealed from the beginning of 1947. All other allowances paid under the new permanent force rates will be taxable income with the exception of separation allowances paid in place of travelling allowances. The latter are now exempt under the law and will continue to be exempt. In keeping with this revision of the income tax as it applies to the armed services, resolution 20 provides for repeal, effective in 1947, of the special exemption granted the merchant marine in respect of war risk bonus and the value of board and lodging.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask two questions in connection with that statement? Am I to understand that from the time the permanent rates of pay come into effect there will be no such thing as income tax exemption for any of the men in the permanent force?

Mr. ABBOTT: In respect of these rates of pay; that is correct.

Mr. GREEN: What about the men who will not be in the permanent force but will still be on service? Are they to lose the exemptions they have at the present time?

Mr. ABBOTT: The position there will be this. All the overseas personnel other than the permanent force will continue to enjoy the exemption which is now granted them under the law. In other words, we shall observe our contract in that respect. Interim force personnel who are over there were given an assurance when they joined the interim force that there would be no change in their tax status during the two-year period, which will expire September 30, 1947. That will be respected. In the case of men who apply for entry into the permanent force and are accepted for that force, and who receive the new rates of pay provided for that force, they are looked upon as having entered a permanent post-war career and should be subject to the ordinary rules with respect to the payment of tax. Broadly speaking, it was felt that from January 1, 1947, the special wartime exemptions from income tax for overseas service, or qualified exemption for service in Canada, should be discontinued, and it should be considered that from that day on, those serving in the armed forces would be serving like those in other occupations and there should be no special income tax exemptions.

Mr. GREEN: Apparently there will be some serving in Canada and elsewhere, in the western hemisphere, after the first of January. In other words, for them war service has not yet ended. Why deprive them of their present exemption? I presume they will be all out of the forces by the end of 1947. Why should that exemption not carry on while they are in the forces? They are required, apparently, to perform certain duties in connection with the cleaning up of the aftermath of war. Why not continue to them the exemption they now enjoy?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not contemplate that after January 1, 1947 there will be anyone in the forces, either in Canada or overseas, who is not a member of either the permanent force or the interim force. If there are such persons overseas they will continue to enjoy the income tax exemption which is now provided, whether they are interim force or hostilities-only personnel. Should there be cases of hostilities-only personnel who are still retained in the service after January 1, 1947—

Mr. GREEN: In Canada or in the western hemisphere?

Mr. ABBOTT: There are none except in Canada now; we have them away from all other parts of the western hemisphere. Under the legislation as it is proposed, they would lose the qualified income tax exemption which now exists. But I frankly do not anticipate that there will be any of that class. If there are, and there is any hardship, we shall be prepared to consider it on a special basis, but I do not anticipate that there will be any in the armed forces after January 1, 1947, who will be deprived of any benefit they now enjoy. The position will be preserved for those who enlisted in the interim force on the understanding that their tax position would not be changed during the period of enlistment and who had the option of serving for that period, or of applying to go into the permanent force.

Mr. GREEN: Perhaps when the minister is going over the bill he will insert something to protect the men who enlisted, who are on what is called hostilities service; is that it?

Mr. ABBOTT: Hostilities-only. I use that phrase because it is convenient.

Mr. GREEN: Hostilities-only service. The minister says now that he does not think there will be any of them, and therefore there will not be any tax. But just in case there are some I suggest that the section be drawn accordingly.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be glad to give consideration to that when the bill comes before the house. I can point out that rare cases of that kind can be dealt with by remissions under the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, but I shall give consideration to my hon. friend's point.

Mr. GREEN: Has any consideration been given to the policy in the future in the event that Canadian forces should be serving outside Canada. For example, if Canada is required to supply some units of the air force or of the army under agreement with the united nations and they have to go abroad either across the Atlantic or across the Pacific, is it the policy of the government that they will receive no consideration by way of tax exemptions?

Mr. ABBOTT: I can give my hon. friend only my personal opinion. No consideration has been given to the matter by the government, but my personal opinion is this, and it has always been this, that there should be no special income tax exemption for those serving in the armed forces. There is none in the British force. This is only my own personal opinion, but I believe that there should be no income tax exemptions for those serving in the armed forces.

Mr. GREEN: Is the minister against granting income tax exemptions such as those that were granted in the last war?

Mr. ABBOTT: I had no opportunity of exercising any views in regard to the exemptions, but since my hon. friend has asked me the question directly I would say, yes. I believe that the system which is followed in the British army is correct, and that there should be no special income tax exemption. I grant that every consideration should be given to those in the armed forces, but it should be by means of the pay scale and not by income tax exemption. That is my personal belief. Since my hon. friend has asked me the question as to what the policy will be in the future, I must say that I cannot say what it will be, but in so far as my own views would have any weight I would urge that the British system be followed and that we not have an income tax exemption.

Mr. GREEN: There is one other question that I should like to raise on this resolution, namely, the taxation of men in the auxiliary services and the corps of fire-fighters who served during the war. Probably some of them are still serving. On the 23rd of July a recommendation was made to the house by the special committee on veterans affairs which reads as follows:

That the supervisors of the auxiliary services and fire-fighters of the corps of Canadian Fire Fighters dispatched overseas, and members of the Canadian Red Cross Society and the St. John ambulance brigade who served in an actual theatre of war, be accorded all benefits, pensions, rehabilitation rights and income tax exemption as members of the armed forces.

Unfortunately the men of the auxiliary services and perhaps the men of the fire-fighters—I am not sure what percentage they were exempt, but in any event the men of the auxiliary services were allowed only a one-fifth exemption.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. GREEN: In previous years we pointed out to the government the inequity of the arrangement, and I suggest that this is the time to remedy the situation. The income tax payments which have been taken from these men should be refunded to them. As an example, take the men in the auxiliary services. They included the men in the legion war services—

Mr. ABBOTT: The Y.M.C.A.

Mr. GREEN: The Knights of Columbus, the Y.M.C.A., and the Salvation Army. The men from these forces served with the troops. In Hong Kong the only two men in the whole force who had to pay income tax were the Y.M.C.A. man and the Knights of Columbus man. They came back to Canada and found that they owed the government several hundred dollars. I think it ran over $1,000 or perhaps into the thousands for income tax—

Mr. ABBOTT: They must have had a big income.

Mr. GREEN: —and these amounts were taken from them. That situation is unfair. Other men serving under fire with the troops in Italy had to pay income tax. They were allowed only one-fifth exemption. This matter was thoroughly discussed in the veterans affairs committee. Evidence was given there which, I think, clinches the matter. I would refer hon. members to page 206 of the committee proceedings.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. GREEN: These proceedings have been reported back to the house. General Burns, who is in charge of rehabilitation, was a corps commander in Italy. In the committee he said:

We have Colonel Philpott here to-day. He was deputy director of auxiliary services for the Canadian army overseas, and he could possibly answer the question for you.

The question asked was as to the status of those men of the auxiliary service. Colonel Philpott was then called on, and said:

Mr. Chairman, I think the answer you are trying to get is this: first of all the supervisor, in my opinion, was definitely a member of the forces. His services, and the conditions under which he served, were exactly the same as those of other members of the forces.

Then at page 207 the chairman said:

With regard to one point you mentioned, I agree with what you say in a large measure that to most intents and purposes these supervisors were members of the armed services, but they could not be ordered into combat or anything like that?

Colonel Philpott: They were non-combatants, but they were right up with the troops in the fighting. They were looking after our troops' welfare right in the front line. I can vouch for them because it was my job to direct them. I was with them on the continent and I was with them with the troops, and they suffered the same hardships and privations and had the same discipline.

I could go on at considerable length, but there is the whole story. I am not going to try to pile any further arguments on top of the statement that was made by Colonel Philpott who was actually in the government service.

With regard to the corps of fire-fighters, hon. members will bear in mind that, at the time these men were recruited, fire-fighting in Great Britain was considered even more dangerous than being in the forces. That was at the time when the Germans were bombing English cities. These men were enlisted to undergo these hardships and they actually did so. Further than that, we had an affidavit produced before us in the committee, sworn to by thirty-eight members of this corps of fire-fighters, which reads as follows:

We, the undersigned, hereby jointly and severally swear that we were present at Parliament hill, Ottawa, on the occasions when Major-General LaFleche, deputy minister of national war services, made statements to contingents of the corps of Canadian fire-fighters, on their leaving for overseas, as follows:

He stated that we would be looked after in the same manner as the armed forces, that our families would receive the same protection and benefits that were accorded the army, and that we were to be known as the fourth arm of the services. (A term that the governor general used while addressing us.)

This affidavit will be found at page 317 of the proceedings of the committee. Evidence was given by Mr. Magill, one of the executives of their association, who was asked this question by the hon. member for Lanark:

Yes, what were your services?

The answer was:

When we volunteered for this job, we did not ask any questions as to what we were going to get or what we were not going to get. We volunteered to go over, and when we joined the corps we knew that we were going over; in two months, every man from the time he enlisted, was overseas. When we got there we were attached to the national fire service. The membership of the national fire service was obtained on a compulsory basis.

That was in Great Britain.

The men in England could either go into the army, navy, the air force, or the fire service. They had no option. It was considered a branch of the services there. When we got there we were attached to the national fire service. They in turn gave us vital points to protect from fire. We went to Southampton, Portsmouth, Plymouth and Bristol. Those cities were receiving at that time the greatest brunt of the bombing. We worked in conjunction with them all through. We maintained our own station, with our own officers and our own men, equipment supplied by the national fire service. We were trained over there by them and attended their colleges and also took courses over there with them.

Then he was asked:

Go ahead. Tell us what you actually did; for instance when there was an air raid, what did you do?

One of the other members asked:

Was not a detachment ready to go to France on D-day?

The answer was yes; then the witness went on:

In the event of a raid we immediately went outside in the street and took up our positions at our stations. We could not take cover. Our job was outside, not inside, when the raid was on. We had to stand outside. A station would perhaps have five or six pumps in it. Immediately on the warning being given they would be dispersed to certain points in the city and the men would have to stand there until they received instructions where the raid was and what they were to do. There was no chance for us to take cover.

Then the hon. member for Lanark asked:

Q. In the event of a fire during the raid, what did you do?

A. During the raid we immediately went to the fire.

Q. In spite of the fact that bombs might be falling?

A. It did not make any difference. We answered the call.

Q. You would work practically all through a raid?

A. Yes, outside. That was our job. We did have 100 men trained and attached to the 21st army group ready to leave for France on D-day, and they got on the boat. They actually took their training and got on the landing barges, and then were taken off. We trained for that and had army personnel attached to us in a liaison capacity, so that when we went over there we knew where we were going and what we were going to do. But fortunately, the raids in France did not develop to anything like what was expected. Therefore we were not needed. But we were prepared to leave and ready to leave at a moment's notice.

Several of these men were killed; others were seriously wounded and others were injured, and I do suggest to the acting finance minister that before the bill based upon this resolution is brought down consideration should be given to providing exemption from income tax for these groups for whom the committee has put in a recommendation. All these questions have been carefully considered by the veterans affairs committee, and its recommendations should be given great weight. I do not think anyone can question the justice of the claims of these particular groups.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I might deal at once with some of the points raised by my hon. friend. I am thoroughly familiar with the questions he has brought forward; I lived with them for four or five months when I was parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance. Under the law as it stands, complete income tax exemption has been granted only to those who were members of the armed forces; and the policy has consistently been that it was not considered appropriate to grant complete income tax exemption to civilian groups, no matter what the risk involved in the particular work they were doing.

To give the committee an idea of the civilian groups involved, there are the auxiliary services, to which my hon. friend has referred, such as the Knights of Columbus, the Y.M.C.A. and the like; the fire-fighters, to which he has also referred; those who served in the merchant marine; the pilots who served in the ferry command; the test pilots and the civilian instructors in the flying schools. All these groups have claimed income tax exemption. The policy has been consistently that complete income tax exemption should be granted only to those serving in the armed forces. May I interject here that this illustrates, if I may say so, the desirability of not granting complete income tax exemption to any group in the community, because it leads to more or less well founded claims by other groups who feel that they have an equal right to exemption?

Take the case of the auxiliary services. For reasons which no doubt were well founded, the members of these services preferred to serve under the auspices of their various organizations rather than as members of the armed services.

Mr. GREEN: That story was gone into by the committee, and the facts are just the opposite.

Mr. ABBOTT: If my hon. friend will permit me to finish what I have to say—

Mr. GREEN: But the minister must not make an incorrect statement.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend had his turn, and I did not interrupt him. I met a committee of the auxiliary services two years ago and discussed this question of tax exemption for the auxiliary services. In that committee I raised this point, and discussed it at length with them. It was agreed by the members of that committee that this was the case; that, not necessarily for reasons of their own, I do not suggest, but for good and sufficient reasons they preferred to serve under their own auspices. In the United States army by contrast, the auxiliary services were provided by the armed forces themselves. The men who served in them were army personnel, subject to army discipline, receiving army rates of pay and so on.

The auxiliary services are in law civilians, and they were such because their organizations so desired. The same thing applies, of course, to the merchant marine, ferry command pilots, test pilots and civilian instructors. It was felt that in the case of these groups some income tax consideration should be given; and in the case of the auxiliary services, after the discussion with this committee to which I have referred, legislation was introduced by order in council granting an exemption of one-fifth of the supervisor's pay, which was treated as exempt from income tax. That was roughly comparable to the treatment accorded merchant seamen, where their war risk bonus was considered as exempt from income tax. In the case of the ferry command, if I remember correctly, it was one-third. There, of course, the scale of remuneration was fairly high, and that was looked upon as the war risk element of their pay. Offhand I cannot remember what was done, if anything, in the case of test pilots or civilian instructors; but I am advised that it is now under consideration, if it is not already passed, that the fire-fighters will receive treatment similar to that accorded the auxiliary services and the merchant seamen.

Mr. McNICOL: What rate is that?

Mr. ABBOTT: In the case of the merchant seamen it was the war risk bonus, and in the case of the auxiliary services it was one-fifth of the pay, which would be roughly comparable for those categories. In addition, these groups have been given the further benefits, pension benefits and the like, accorded to members of the armed forces.

Mr. GREEN: No, not yet.

Mr. ABBOTT: That has been recommended, and I believe it is to be done. However, the point I want to emphasize here is that the principle has never been recognized that any civilian group in Canada will be granted complete income tax exemption. That has been considered a fundamental principle of government policy, and it is one, I may say, to which I thoroughly subscribe, in the light of the views I have expressed in respect to income tax exemptions to any groups generally.

Broadly speaking, that is the position with respect to these various civilian groups. I want the committee to understand that I do not wish in any way to be considered as casting any reflection on the value of the services performed by these groups or the risks which may have been involved in performing those services. On the contrary, I have only the greatest admiration for the work they performed; but I say we cannot recognize the principle that any civilian group is to be completely exempt from income tax.

Mr. GREEN: There is just one thing I want to say in that connection in regard to the point on which the minister's whole argument is based. He says that these men had this status at their own request. The evidence before the committee was just the opposite, namely that the status they had was at the insistence of the army.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am in a position—

Mr. GREEN: The minister did not want me to interrupt him. Let him just sit down until I have finished. The army insisted that while they were in—

Mr. ABBOTT: Who gave that evidence?

Mr. GREEN: Different people gave it, and it was not questioned by the army authorities. It was the army that made them serve in the way that they did. In the first war they carried rank badges; in this last war they did the same work but there was a ruling by the army that they must be treated in the way that they were treated—not, strictly speaking, considered as members of the army. They are now deprived of income tax exemption, although many of them were actually under fire, and yet others who were never under fire are getting it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I was not at the meeting of the veterans committee to which the hon. member referred, but I was present at a meeting at national defence headquarters two years ago which was presided over by Brigadier Mess, and at which were present senior representatives of the auxiliary services. Representatives of all these services were there, including my friend Jack Beaton of the Y.M.C.A.

The question was raised at that time as to what the status of the auxiliary services was, and we had a considerable discussion on that matter. The point was clearly brought out, and it was brought out by Brigadier Mess and brought out by myself, that the condition under which they were serving was not because the army wished it that way but because the auxiliary services wished it that way.

I was not present at the veterans affairs committee; but I know what was said at the meeting two years ago; I know who the representatives were, and I know who presided at the meeting.

Mr. GREEN: Does Jack Beaton know?

Mr. ABBOTT: He will, because he was in on that meeting and he will recall what took place. There was one other meeting.

Mr. GREEN: You ask him.

Mr. LENNARD: Further to what the hon. member for Vancouver South had to say about Canadian overseas fire-fighters, I wish to reiterate what he said about promises that were made to the corps before proceeding overseas. They were promised definitely by Major-General LaFleche, as representative of the government at that time, that they would receive all privileges which would be granted to the armed services.

Mr. McCANN: Would you permit a question?

Mr. LENNARD: When I am through you can make your speech.

Mr. ABBOTT: May he put a question—

Mr. McCANN: Yes, may I put a question?

Mr. LENNARD: Yes.

Mr. McCANN: What is your foundation for your statement that General LaFleche made a promise to the auxiliary services?

Mr. GREEN: I read the affidavit a minute ago.

Mr. LENNARD: There is the sworn statement as to the overseas fire-fighters.

Mr. McCANN: I challenge that.

Mr. LENNARD: Well, that will be your responsibility. But the affidavit was made to say definitely that the Canadian overseas fire-fighters would be given the privilege of having income tax exemptions. It was only after they came back that they received notice of this back income tax which they were forced to pay. But I should like to ask the minister, who is responsible for not taxing these overseas fire-fighters at the source? It was done in every other case where there was a payment of income tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot say why they were not, but I will look into that situation.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the Minister of National Revenue answer that?

Mr. MacNICOL: I wish to support as strongly as I can the remarks made by my deskmate, the hon. member for Vancouver South, particularly those remarks in regard to the fire-fighters, because I am more familiar with their case than with other cases of the other services mentioned. I knew quite a number of fire-fighters who left Toronto. Several of the leading members of the overseas brigade came from my riding, and I have learned from them and have had communications from their association in Toronto outlining what they went through.

If, as my colleague has pointed out, they were made promises—and that I do not know, but I listened to the affidavit read by my colleague—I am sure the minister and certainly all hon. members in the house would want that agreement carried out. A number were killed and a number badly injured. They went into action when the buzz bombs were at their worst. They were in the thick of what took place which, at times, was as bad as anything that took place on the continent itself. So I just wish to add my support to what has been said as to relieving them from what has been imposed upon them.

Mr. MUTCH: While we are on this question, I would point out that the minister said it was a matter of policy not to grant complete tax exemption to any other than those who served in the armed forces. Then he went on to say that certain groups did receive consideration and that claims of other groups were put forward at a meeting at which he was present.

Mr. ABBOTT: The meeting to which I referred was the auxiliary services only.

Mr. MUTCH: The question I would ask him is whether or not consideration has been given, or whether representatives have been made on behalf of a small group of Canadians, only twelve or fourteen in number, who served with the Canadian forces from Sicily through to Germany, on whose behalf, so far as I know, no benefits have been extended. I refer to the Canadian war correspondents. Has any application been made or any consideration given to income tax relief for them during that period?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that certain representations were made to the Minister of Finance on behalf of certain war correspondents, but I am not in a position to give any more particulars than that at the present time.

Mr. MUTCH: I am informed that they are some twelve or fourteen in number, and I believe the total amount involved would be less than $10,000.

Mr. ABBOTT: May I point out that this, again, just bears out my point. I am not so much interested in the amount of money involved, but I am arguing strongly the question of principle, that if you extend this exemption to one civilian group, then I can think of a lot more to whom I think it might with equal justice be extended.

Mr. MUTCH: I am not going to add to the minister's list extensively. But I say that whether or not you accept the minister's idea, that in principle it is wrong, the practice was accepted. Perhaps the time to change a principle is between wars, not during one or at the end of one. Perhaps when the minister is considering these applications he would look into this small group.

Mr. SKEY: Before we leave the question of fire-fighters, I should like to say that I shall be glad to supply the Minister of National Revenue with proof that this promise was made to them by a minister of the government.

Mr. ABBOTT: He was deputy minister, was he not?

Mr. SKEY: I shall be glad to supply it to you; I have it in my file.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think he was deputy minister at the time.

Mr. SKEY: Deputy minister. While the Acting Minister of Finance refers to the principle, I feel that here is one place where the opposition is truly trying to help out the government with its principles. A promise was made to these men and there are signed statements in witness of that promise being made. I know it is with great regret that many of them have brought the matter into public affairs to-day. I feel that if any group should receive consideration it is this particular group because a promise was made to them.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know whether a promise was made or not; but, assuming for the sake of argument that it was, I would point out that no civil servant, no matter what position he occupied, would have any authority to make such a promise. That would be contrary to the income tax law as it stands.

Mr. KNIGHT: I do not want to enter into a general discussion of this matter at this time. On several occasions I have taken up in this house the case of the fire-fighters. When the minister was hunting for an answer, and one which I consider to be a feeble one, as to why income tax had not been deducted at the source I remembered that I had received a return to an order of the house dated May 8, 1946, in reply to a question which I had asked in regard to the matter. For the information of the committee, I shall read the questions and answers:

1. Are members of the civilian corps of Canadian fire-fighters liable for income tax on pay received while serving overseas? A. Yes.

2. Was any part of such tax deducted at the source at the time such pay was issued? A. No.

3. If not, why was it not deducted at the source?

Then comes an answer which compares with the one just given by the minister in that it is feeble. It reads:

Payments were made overseas and the table of tax deductions was not dispatched beyond Canada.

It would seem that the postal service was not working, or there were no embassy bags or whatever are used to send dispatches overseas. I did not consider that answer satisfactory, nor do I think the minister's answer to-night is satisfactory. The fourth question was:

4. Has income tax on such wages or pay been now paid by any members of the fire-fighters corps?

This was dated July 10, 1946, and the answer to that question was:

The file of each such person has not been examined but with possible few exceptions it is generally believed that income tax on such wages has not been paid.

The whole thing seems to be in a state of confusion and flux. Apparently there is now to be an easing in the imposition of tax upon the fire-fighters after a period of indecision on the part of the department concerned lasting over a couple of years. I am glad that we can take the assurance from the minister that they are to be exempted to the extent of one-fifth of their income during the period they served overseas.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think I said that was under consideration. I do not know that I am in position to make a statement.

Mr. KNIGHT: The minister is not prepared to go even that far. If I were to enter into a debate as to whether or not these fire-fighters should receive the same privileges as the men who served in uniform I would need to mention only one statement made by the minister, shall I say in his proper capacity as Minister of National Defence, and I am not saying that he cannot handle the position he is now in quite efficiently. But he did make this statement, and very heatedly as I remember, one day in reply to a member of the official opposition. He said that so far as he was concerned, wherever the bombs were falling, whether it be in England or any place else, that was the front line.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not remember making such a statement, although I may have. It does not sound like my type of oratory, but it may be correct.

Mr. MERRITT: I shall not cite any of the promises or anything of that kind, but I think I can meet the minister on his own terms of high principle. I like the minister for advancing the idea that we should deal with these matters on terms of high principle.

Mr. ABBOTT: Principle, anyway.

Mr. MERRITT: I like his idea that there should be general taxation and relief by means of higher pay to the armed forces. We must deal with this matter on practical terms and not in terms of the future. The high principle the minister speaks of is that advanced by this government that no civilian group which served overseas shall have the same exemption from taxation as was granted to the members of the armed forces.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not necessarily overseas; no civilian group anywhere.

Mr. MERRITT: I agree with that high principle; but let me say that in the case of the auxiliary services and the fire-fighters the acting minister, unwittingly I am sure, is descending from that high principle to a verbal technicality in the way he is applying it to these two classes. Evidence has been given by the member for Vancouver South that a statement was made by the officer responsible for administering the auxiliary services to the effect that they were undistinguishable from soldiers in their service, in the discipline that was imposed on them, in the places they had to go and in the various duties they carried out. Technically and because of mere verbiage, these men are treated as civilians when in actual fact they were just as much soldiers as any one in the forces. The auxiliary services are in a class by themselves.

The fire-fighters were serving in England and they were considered as being on all fours with the armed forces. I remember speaking to one man who was called up, and he told me that he had been permitted to elect between the army and the fire-fighters when he received his call-up. They were just as glad to get fire-fighters as they were to get soldiers. The military need for that class of men was just as great as it was for soldiers, and they were glad to have these men go over at a time when, goodness knows, soldiers were needed. That is absolute proof to my mind that in high principle they were soldiers, and it is only begging the point to say that they were not.

Mr. LENNARD: Following what the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has said in connection with the fire-fighters, I would point out that they received the same rates of pay as those in the armed forces. In answer to the Minister of National Revenue I would say that these fire-fighters proceeded overseas in detachments of fifty or so. The promise was made by Major-General LaFleche to each detachment in the same terms; it was not made on only one occasion; it was made on several occasions. They were told that they would receive the same consideration as those in the armed forces.

Mr. McCANN: The only reason I asked the hon. gentleman a question was to find out whether that assurance had been made verbally or in writing. This matter came before me as Minister of National War Services. I had the officers of the department make a complete search, and I made one personally, of all the records and correspondence, and nowhere could we find that a commitment had been made to the fire-fighters with reference to exemption from income tax.

The hon. member for Vancouver South brought up a point with reference to pay, that it should be such that the paying of income tax would not be a hardship. The chief of the fire-fighting services was receiving in his occupation in this country before he left for overseas $2,400 a year, and as chief of the fire-fighting services he received a salary of $5,000 a year, so that in that instance at least the rate of pay was such that he could, I think, have met the requirements which my hon. friend says should be met with reference to pay.

Mr. GREEN: What about the firemen?

Mr. McCANN: I think the hon. member for Wentworth is correct when he says that their rates of pay were the same as in the armed services. I am not detracting one iota from the service this force rendered. I am merely asking anyone to indicate to me if he can that there was any assurance to the fire-fighters they would be exempt from income tax?

Mr. LENNARD: Certainly it was a verbal promise, and given on more than one occasion. But it was never denied by any member of the government, and the fire-fighters were most certainly led to believe that they would receive all the privileges of the armed services. I said in this house in 1937, I think it was, when the estimates of the Department of Pensions and National Health were up for discussion, that every government since the last great war had chiseled on the returned men, and I meant every government, both Liberal and Conservative.

Mr. ABBOTT: This one has not. It is giving the returned men the most generous deal of any country in the world.

Mr. LENNARD: I am speaking of 1937. But most certainly this government is not living up to its obligations in regard to the fire-fighters.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not prepared to concede that this government entered into any obligation to the fire-fighters with respect to income tax. I have made that clear already, but I must reiterate it in view of my hon. friend's statement.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It would be interesting to know if the Minister of National Revenue ever went to General LaFleche and asked him if he ever made that promise.

Mr. McCANN: When the matter came before me personally, General LaFleche had left the country to serve as ambassador to Greece. What my hon. friend asks was done, and General LaFleche could not recall having made any commitment.

Mr. GREEN: Did he deny that he made it?

Mr. McCANN: He did not recall having made any commitment.

Mr. GREEN: But he did not deny it?

Mr. PEARKES: Regarding the supervisors of the auxilary services, in world war I, they wore the rank and were recognized as being in the army. I also have attended conferences. The Minister of National Defence, who is conducting this legislation through the committee, mentioned having attended a conference in 1942, where he said—

Mr. ABBOTT: About 1943 or 1944.

Mr. PEARKES: It is immaterial. He attended a conference where he said that the heads of the organization at that time expressed a desire that their personnel should remain as civilians and not be incorporated in the army.

[Mr. McCann.]

Mr. ABBOTT: I know that my hon. friend wants to be correct. They acknowledged at that meeting that the status which the auxiliary services occupied as civilians under their own control and direction was at their own desire and request and not at the request of the armed forces.

Mr. PEARKES: At their own desire and request. I should like to say that I have also attended conferences. I attended conferences in 1939 on board a ship going over to England, and I know the commander of the first Canadian division at that time was firm in his opinion that he did not want the auxiliary services as part of the army. I think that should be on the record in order that hon. members may see that the army as well as the organizations were not anxious that the personnel should be considered part of the army.

Mr. ABBOTT: It may have been mutual. I do not deny that.

Mr. PEARKES: I should like to point this out, that there was an interchange between the army and these services. Sometimes an individual was in the auxiliary services and later was transferred into the army, and vice versa, some of the personnel who were in the army were at times transferred into the auxiliary services. During 1939, 1940 and 1941 there were staff officers on the headquarters of formations whose special duty it was to supervise the supervisors of the auxiliary services. They were with the headquarters of formations, while the supervisors themselves were with the units. Those officers would be exempt from income tax, whereas the supervisors who were in the more advanced units were not exempt. It does not seem to me to add up and be fair that you should give one class of men exemption when another class of men doing exactly similar work were not exempt.

Mr. MacNICOL: Just one further word, and I am compelled to say it because of the remark made by the Minister of National Revenue that the fire-fighters were paid merely the same rate of pay as a private in the army. Of course, the majority of the fire-fighters overseas would be in the lower ranks. I am personally acquainted with many of them who were in the Toronto fire department, where they received the Toronto fire department remuneration. Quite a number of them were lieutenants or of higher rank when serving with the Toronto fire department, but they took a lower rank in the fire-fighting service overseas because of their patriotic desire to serve their country "over there". I know that in a number of cases while they were overseas their wives and families had a struggle to get along. I did not know before that their pay while overseas was so low. In view of that low pay, I should like to see the government give them any consideration which can be given. It does seem to me that five per cent is a pretty small allowance. I hope the Acting Minister of Finance will reconsider their case. He shakes his head. He is pretty determined, and I have no fault to find with that because I like to see a man stick up for his opinions. But I would urge him to give consideration to the strong recommendation which has been made by the hon. member for Vancouver South, who is always on the job when anything pertaining to the armed forces or the auxiliary services comes up. I hope the minister will reconsider the case of the fire-fighters.

Mr. ADAMSON: This question has been covered fairly extensively, but I want to bring one point to the attention of the minister. These men who had been given this promise by General LaFleche could not have just imagined that they had been given this promise. Groups of these men have come to see me from various parts of Canada, and each of them have told me individually and collectively that they had received a definite and specific promise, verbally I grant you, that they would be exempted from income tax. It seems to me that if we are talking about high principles, the verbal assurance of a minister of the crown—

Mr. ABBOTT: I must correct that. He was not a minister of the crown at the time.

Mr. ADAMSON: Well, a deputy minister of the crown and subsequently a minister.

Mr. ABBOTT: Right.

Mr. ADAMSON: I say that his verbal assurance, his word, should be as good as his bond. Many of these men have come to me and said, "We joined the fire-fighters because, had we joined the army and declared our occupation, we would immediately have been sent to some fire-fighting unit and put on fire-fighting duty at some permanent camp in Canada." I know that is what happened, because trained firemen, like other trained persons were at a high premium during the war, and many of these men definitely joined the fire-fighters because that was their only opportunity to get overseas. They feel, and is it a justifiable feeling on their part, that they are being badly treated, scandalously treated, because certainly in their own minds, there is the belief that a promise was given them by General LaFleche.

They also feel another grievance. It has nothing directly to do with this question, but the minister is also Minister of National Defence and he should know about it. I understand that they did not get the service decorations that the armed personnel were given, the reason being that they were civilians. Here we have the case of a man who joined the armed forces, who perhaps was a member of a fire brigade, who went to Camp Borden and did duty there as a fire-fighter. He is in his unit as a fire-fighter and gets three decorations or two perhaps, whereas the fellow that went overseas and actually put out incendiary fires has no decorations—has he? An hon. member says he has. I understand that was one of their grievances, but perhaps that has been corrected.

At any rate, in the matter of income tax, these men were unquestionably given an assurance, even though perhaps it cannot be found on the minister's files. There were only a few of these men. Surely, from the principle that we have heard enunciated, the high principle that the government should make its deputy minister's word as good as its own, the minister should take the representations of these men into consideration. It is not a matter involving a great amount of money; it is not a matter of extravagance; it is a matter of simple justice. I ask, therefore, that this case be reconsidered, in the hope that these men will receive the benefit that was at least verbally promised them. There is in another room in this building a committee which has twice recommended that.

Mr. BENTLEY: I support the views expressed by the hon. member who has just spoken. I suppose that the minister and also the Minister of National Revenue mean what they say when they assert that no commitment was given, or that General LaFleche cannot recall having made a promise. I have talked to some of these men who were fire-fighters. They do not lie in other matters and they honestly believe that the promise was made. Many of them have signed their names to a document to the effect that it is their conviction that the promise in question was given, and others are prepared to sign their names to the same thing. In other words, they went into this particular service on the strength of their belief that the promise was made. What earthly principle can now be invoked for denying to these men the fulfilment of that promise, to which they are willing to swear in an affidavit, because the assurance was given by a government official? This must have been known to the cabinet ministers at the time.

Mr. ABBOTT: It was not.

Mr. BENTLEY: The minister says it was not and I shall have to take his word for that.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am only saying that on hearsay.

Mr. BENTLEY: But when so many people in the country fully believe that the promise was made and when so many of these men have themselves told me that they believed the promise was given, the cabinet must have known about it. Nearly everyone who follows the papers in the country knows it. It is not something that has just recently come up. If I have heard the discussion rightly to-night, both ministers who spoke said that there were no deductions from the payments to the fire-fighters overseas. Well, how does the Department of National Revenue propose to collect now from those from whom collections were not made at the source? Is the department going to go into the courts and sue these people and take their knives and forks and their frying-pans from them? How will they get the money if they have not collected it? In view of the belief that these men entertain, that the promise was made, what high principle can be invoked to afford the government any excuse to take the attitude which the minister is taking?

Mr. ABBOTT: Fairness as between classes of taxpayers. It is perfectly clear, I am assured by the officials, that there was never any agreement on the part of the responsible minister, the Minister of Finance, that such an exemption would be given. I am not denying that these men may have believed that they were to receive income tax exemption; but if they are to receive it, then there are a number of other groups who have an equal if not a greater claim. These men performed a most useful service under great risks. The casualties were two out of four hundred odd—I am only told that. But let us assume—

Mr. LENNARD: I believe three were killed and others were wounded.

Mr. ABBOTT: That may be so. In any event, there were about one-third of the ferry pilots lost. If this treatment were extended to the fire-fighters, a civilian group, in my opinion it would have to be extended to the ferry pilots and other equally deserving groups. I can only reiterate what I have previously said, that no civilian as such has been recognized as being entitled to complete income tax exemption, and no responsible minister of the crown ever gave an undertaking that they would be. I do not think that principle can now be recognized.

Mr. BENTLEY: I still do not believe the minister is taking the right attitude.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. BENTLEY: I believe there are other civilians who have as good a claim or perhaps better, but no other civilian group who engaged in any type of war service comparable with that of the fire-fighters believe that they were given such a promise. They were not brought into the service in which they were engaged under any promise of the kind. But these people believe that they were given that promise, because it was given by a high government official who enjoyed considerable popularity in the country. If any other group came forward with similar evidence and the same conviction on their part of a promise that had been made to them to join a certain service, I would say that they had as much right to consideration. But this was distinctly the understanding that these men had.

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot believe that these men joined the service because they thought they would get income tax exemption.

Mr. LENNARD: Certainly not, but that does not say that they were not given the promise.

Mr. KNOWLES: I suggest that, whether or not the undertaking was given on that point, which seems to be debated across the floor, the matter should be settled on the basis of the principle which the minister himself has stated, namely, fairness as between taxpayers. The argument that if these people are entitled to this exemption others would have to be considered as well is not an argument against these people being given it. That might only mean the others should receive it as well. In that connection, I felt that the Minister of National Revenue got away from the point when he referred to one of the members of the corps of fire-fighters receiving greater pay for his services in the corps than his remuneration in civil life. The hon. member for Vancouver South suggests that was only one case out of hundreds so far as fire-fighters are concerned; but the point I wish to make is that is not a proper comparison to make. If one is to make that comparison it will certainly upset a good many calculations so far as the armed services are concerned. The comparison should be with similar war service. On that basis, I suggest that these men should be treated in a manner similar to that of those in the armed services.

The very fact that there are items Nos. 7 and 8 on the order paper under government orders, to which I believe the minister has already referred, represents to me an admission that these men have been discriminated against unfairly and that certain wrongs must be righted. The fact that these other wrongs have to be righted lends strength to our argument that this wrong should be righted as well.

I should like to bring to the attention of the minister one other point which relates to the effort in which some of us were engaged for a considerable period with reference to the Canadian soldiers who went to Kiska. When they went the income tax regulations did not recognize the fact that Kiska was outside the western hemisphere, and they were taxed at once and paid the tax through deductions at the source as though they were serving within the western hemisphere. After considerable effort on the part of some of us in the house, the government, by order in council, changed the regulations. That was some months after the deductions had been made, but once the justice of the claim had been recognized it was found possible to make the change retroactive. I am sorry to say it took the department a long time to take care of the matter, but at any rate, the justice of the principle being recognized later with respect to these men and retroactive action being taken, I submit that it should also be done in this case.

Mr. ABBOTT: That was due, I take it, to a mistaken understanding of facts. These men were in the army; they were soldiers, and at that time it was merely a question of where they were serving.

There is one other thing I should like to say with respect to these fire-fighters. It has been brought to my attention that this alleged promise was given as the men were leaving for overseas. None of them alleged that it was given at the time they joined.

Mr. CHURCH: Speaking as a civilian from a soldier city, I wish the government under resolution 18 would give these men who were combatant soldiers, who served overseas in different theatres of the war, at least three years to reestablish themselves before starting in to tax them. The government should start in on some of the higher-ups before taxing soldiers so soon. Judging by the way the security councils are blowing up in Europe, I can tell the committee that we shall not have security for very long, and we may need these men a little later on. I believe that the money could be provided in some other way and that we should wait for at least three years before we start taxing soldiers who were at the front.

Mr. BROOKS: I do not wish to repeat the arguments which have been used. This matter was discussed in the veterans committee for a good many hours and almost all points were brought out. While these men were not recruited as soldiers, they were recruited to do practically soldier's work. They were assigned difficult and dangerous tasks. At the time they enlisted and after enlistment they were treated practically as soldiers; they were under the same as military discipline all the time that they were away. Their pay was practically the same as the soldier's pay, if not the same. As far as their duties were concerned, in England we all know that for the first two years of the war the soldiers who were overseas had very little to do except training. These men were looking after fires in all the devastated areas in England. Anyone who has been to London and the different cities and has seen the destruction in those cities realizes the dangers which these men have gone through and will realize that their work was practically the same as the work that was carried on by soldiers in France.

I should also like to point out to the minister that many thousands of men who were recruited and acted as soldiers got this exemption. These men were on the staffs in England. They spent all their time in England doing necessary work so far as the army was concerned, but so far as the dangers they encountered are concerned as compared with the dangers encountered by these men, there was no comparison at all.

I understood that these men were asked to go to England after the Prime Minister had been to that country and had seen the devastation there. He came back and realized that it was necessary that we send some of the men over. There was also a request from the British government. From personal interview with some of these men, I know it was their intention to join the armed forces and go overseas; but they were told that they could do better work if they went over as fire-fighters and assisted in the putting out of fires, and helped in the devastated area of the different cities. It is not necessary to press this point any farther.

So far as the justice of the claim is concerned, it was recognized in our veterans committee that these men should receive consideration. There were less than three hundred of them—

Mr. ABBOTT: Four hundred.

Mr. BROOKS: I think 378 or something like that. In any event, the number is not large. It would be only a matter of justice if the minister and the government would reconsider the attitude they have taken and exempt these men from income tax. They were away from their families just as the soldiers were.

Mr. ABBOTT: There were a number of civilians in London who rendered devoted service on the same basis.

Mr. BROOKS: Who were they? The minister has already mentioned the pilots. Our committee recommended that these pilots should receive consideration. They are receiving some consideration but they are not getting exemption in taxes. One of the arguments used in our committee was that these men received much larger pay than the firemen and other benefits which these gentlemen did not receive at all. So far as the pay of the pilot is concerned, there is no comparison with the pay of the fire-fighters. I do not wish to labour the point any farther, but I think it would be just a matter of justice for the government to reconsider their attitude and exempt these men from income tax.

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): I would not want the committee to think that all the sympathy for the fire-fighters and the justice of their claim is on the other side of the house. I have had a great number of representations made to me by members of the fire-fighters. I also believe in the justice of their claim, but I believe sincerely that the Acting Minister of Finance has made a true statement when he says that the government had no agreement with the fire-fighters. It is true that they are under the impression or they were under the impression that they would receive treatment similar to that to be received by members of the armed services. As I see it, we are only carrying on a long discussion, each repeating what the other said, and all stating that we believe in the justice of their claim. I believe the Acting Minister of Finance should consider allowing this item to stand. I think the fire-fighters are perhaps the most important organized civilian group with a claim to be considered for exemption in regard to income tax. If other groups are organized and have similar claims, they should also be considered on their merits. In these circumstances I would ask the minister whether he should not let the item stand.

Mr. MUTCH: There is, I believe, a resolution on the order paper giving notice of legislation respecting benefits to both supervisors and fire-fighters, and I had not anticipated that a debate of the general nature we have heard to-night would come up on the budget resolutions. Since it has developed, however, I want to say a word or two with respect to both the auxiliary services and the fire-fighters, only, however, in relation to the matter of income tax, which is germane to this resolution.

I was one of those who urged in the committee, and I am one of those who urge now in this committee of the whole, that as far as the auxiliary services are concerned they should receive the benefits which members of the armed forces received in the matter of income tax exemption. I am quite well aware that, at the time the order in council conferred upon the auxiliary services all the other benefits enjoyed by the armed forces, it specifically excluded income tax considerations. But a great deal has happened since that time. The committee believed, as I believe, and now urge again upon the minister, that in regard to income tax they should be granted, in the terms of the recommendation of the committee, all the benefits which accrued to the armed forces. because to all intents and purposes they were members of the armed forces. It is perhaps fortunate that the Acting Minister of Finance is also Minister of National Defence and is himself a soldier, because, if he hears it, I think he will accept the validity of what I am about to say. The test of whether or not a man is serving as a member of the armed forces is the question of discipline; and we were informed on the authority of the officer commanding the corps at the time, and the officer who commanded the auxiliary services overseas, that they were amenable to all discipline and subject to court martial.

That being the case, it is difficult to distinguish between those in the armed forces and a group who follow the armed forces in all their operations, who are subject to exactly the same discipline and who receive the same rates of pay. They were in fact, whether or not they were in theory, in the uniform of His Majesty's forces, though they did not wear the insignia of rank. I am well aware of the fact that technically it can be said they were not, but we recognized their position when in the beginning we granted them by order in council all other benefits except that in connection with the income tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: We did not do it in the beginning.

Mr. MUTCH: Well, it was very near the beginning.

Mr. ABBOTT: It was after this conference I mentioned, with the heads of the organizations.

Mr. MUTCH: I do not have the exact dates. I have been through this so often I could almost recite it from memory, with the exception of the dates. In any event, the principle has been established, and there does not seem to be any great division of opinion. I am perfectly well aware of the argument the minister has advanced to-night, that if you concede this treatment to one group which is, technically at least, civilian, you are opening the door to other groups.

Mr. BROOKS: The veterans committee did not recommend any other civilian groups except the supervisors and the fire-fighters.

Mr. MUTCH: I know that, but I have not yet reached the fire-fighters.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): I think there was a recommendation that merchant seamen who became prisoners of war should receive income tax remission.

Mr. GREEN: That is a different matter.

Mr. MUTCH: I do not propose to go through all twenty-four reports that were tabled—

Mr. ABBOTT: Thank goodness for that.

Mr. MUTCH: I would do so if I thought it necessary to bring the facts to the attention of hon. members.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think my hon. friend was right, and this discussion would be more appropriate under the resolution to which he referred.

Mr. MUTCH: Quite, and I propose, therefore, to confine my remarks to those aspects which touch on the income tax matter. I say again that I was and am one of those who urge that, having gone as far as we have by agreement with these auxiliary services, based particularly on the fact that they were completely amenable to military discipline including court martial, and based on the experience of the men at Hong Kong, we should concede this point.

Then we come to the second group which has been under discussion to-night, the fire-fighters. Again the veterans committee, both the main committee and the subcommittee of which I was a member, recommended with respect to income tax that the fire-fighters be granted not less favourable terms than those granted to any group that was specified. When the report of the subcommittee came in, the main committee amended it to make it read "identical". It is the same thing, because, having recommended everything to one, if you give no less to another you give everything to both.

I rose primarily not to make my own position clear, because by now I think that is abundantly clear, but to point out to the committee and to those who may be following this debate that those who have been urging the claims of these two groups with respect to income tax are not speaking as a bloc or as a group but are, I think, representative of the majority of veteran opinion in this house.

Mr. ABBOTT: After listening to the hon. members who have spoken, I can say only ont thing. If I may paraphrase the words of Gilbert and Sullivan, it is evident that the lot of a minister of finance is not a happy one. He would like to be a good fellow, but he cannot be.

Mr. BRACKEN: Would the Acting Minister of Finance tell us how many of these fire-fighters have paid this tax and how many have not paid it, out of the four hundred?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I would have to obtain that information. Those are figures, of course, coming within the department of my colleague the Minister of National Revenue, but perhaps they could be obtained.

Mr. LENNARD: I do not think any have paid.

Mr. ADAMSON: I understand that last year they received back assessments for three years, and it was a shock to them. I do not believe any of them have paid. If you insist on this going through I believe that a great many of them will find themselves in definite financial difficulties.

There is just one more thing I should like to ask the minister. What other civilian groups who served overseas might become eligible if we recognized the claim of the fire-fighters?

Mr. ABBOTT: I gave that information earlier; perhaps my hon. friend was out. He will find it in Hansard; there are five or six groups.

Mr. ADAMSON: Could the minister give the aggregate number?

Mr. ABBOTT: I can run over them again; I think I remember. There are the fire-fighters, the auxiliary services, the merchant marine, the ferry command, the test pilots, the civilian instructors in the flying schools; and other groups have put forward claims, including the deep sea fishermen. I think there were also some war correspondents who claimed they should have this status as well.

Mr. ADAMSON: Who actually served in a theatre of war?

Mr. ABBOTT: Or who claimed they were in danger areas, such as the deep sea fishermen who were in submarine infested waters off the eastern coast of Canada.

Mr. McKAY: It seems to me that this is a matter which should be seriously investigated. I have been listening carefully—

Mr. ABBOTT: We have taken an hour and a half on it, as we have every year to my knowledge.

Mr. McKAY: I am not satisfied that what we are doing here is sufficient investigation. It has been said from the other side of the house that this item should be allowed to stand, and I am convinced that it should stand until we look into the matter further.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend realizes it does not come under this resolution we are considering. Strictly speaking, it is hardly in order.

Mr. GREEN: Yes it does.

Mr. McKAY: The allegation has been made that Major-General LaFleche made a certain statement—not once, but several times. He was a military man with some prestige. The statement is made that he does not recall having made those remarks. I have more faith in affidavits than has the Minister of National Revenue. There was submitted to the committee on veterans affairs an affidavit signed by thirty-eight persons to the effect that he did say it. An important principle is involved here. One cannot lightly pass it to one side. I am not satisfied, after a perusal of the affidavit, that it was a concoction. As a matter of fact it looks to me as if it was a bona fide attempt to tell the truth.

Mr. ABBOTT: That has not been disputed.

Mr. McKAY: Yes, it was disputed to-night. I believe the Minister of National Revenue said that he repudiated it, or words to that effect.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, he never said that.

Mr. McKAY: He said he challenged it, and Hansard will reveal that remark. There was a promise made. Either these men are not telling the truth, or Major-General LaFleche is guilty of false pretences. I cannot see it in any other way. It is a matter for serious reflection, and should be investigated. A man of his prominence and prestige should not make a statement like that unless he had some authority to make it. These men went overseas, and some of them did not come back. A few were wounded, and the families of some are to-day getting pensions. It seems to me that we pass too lightly over these things, and I suggest that we should investigate this matter and settle it for all time.

Mr. BRACKEN: When did these fire-fighters leave for service overseas? Were they assessed for these taxes when they were overseas? If not, when were they assessed? I understand that the minister is not now in a position to say how many of them have paid.

Mr. ABBOTT: A comparatively small number.

Mr. BRACKEN: How long were they in the service of the government without this assessment having been made? Perhaps the minister could give us some idea as to what the payments would be, after their having been in the service of the government for years, and the assessment having come only in recent months.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall have to get that information. It is not available here. I know, however, it would be only a comparatively small number who would be liable to tax, because those who were married with dependents would probably have bigger exemptions. It involves a very small group of men who would be liable to tax. But I will get the information the leader of the opposition has asked for, and try to give it to him to-morrow, or, at any rate, not later than when we bring in the bill.

Mr. GREEN: I endorse the suggestion made by the hon. member for Ottawa East, that this resolution be allowed to stand, and that the Acting Minister of Finance give it further consideration. It is not a question of asking him to make a good fellow of himself; nobody is asking that. It is a question of having an injustice remedied. The minister has said that if he lets one group in he is obliged to let them all in, and that it would not be possible to pick and choose. May I point out to him, as I did in opening the discussion on the resolution, that the committee on veterans affairs have made that choice for him. Here we have a committee of sixty members of the house, everyone of whom served in one or other of the two great wars, and some in both.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did, myself.

Mr. GREEN: They have gone into this question thoroughly and at great length, with the result that the day before yesterday they brought in this recommendation which I shall read to the minister again.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am familiar with it.

Mr. GREEN: They recommend:

That the supervisors of the auxiliary service and fire-fighters of the Corps of Canadian Firefighters dispatched overseas, and members of the Canadian Red Cross Society and the St. John ambulance brigade who served in an actual theatre of war, be accorded all benefits, pensions, rehabilitation rights and income tax exemption as members of the armed forces.

I would ask that the minister allow the resolution to stand.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall gladly allow it to stand, and give it consideration. But I do not want to hold out any false hopes to the committee that it is likely the decision will be changed. Certainly, so far as I personally am concerned, I think it is more than doubtful. But we gladly allow the section to stand, because I do not want anyone to think I have a completely closed mind on the subject. I will consider it. May I say, however, that I have given this question the most earnest consideration for a matter of two or three years. It is not a new question to me, because I have previously given it most earnest and careful consideration.

Mr. GREEN: Probably you made your mind up two years ago; that is the trouble.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is possible. But I have made my mind up on other matters, and while I have sometimes changed it, I have not always done so.

Mr. McKAY: Would the minister like to put it to a free vote of the committee?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid the responsibility of deciding what tax exemptions will and what will not be granted, under the British system must remain the responsibility of the government of the day. My hon. friend knows that as well as I do. That is one way in which our system differs from other systems, including that of the United States. In Canada the government must take the responsibility in matters of this kind. It is not an easy responsibility. A government could popularize itself with these various groups; but I have endeavoured to state the principle upon which this question of total exemption has been viewed. We have occupied an hour and forty minutes in discussing this question of fire-fighters, and I think the suggestion that we allow the resolution to stand is a good one.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before the minister allows it to stand—

Mr. ABBOTT: I am in the hands of the committee.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We are still in a British country, and in such a country a minister of the crown is responsible to parliament. If a majority of members of parliament desire that a matter be changed, even though it be income tax it should be changed.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If it once becomes thoroughly embedded in the minds of hon. members in the opposition that the government is determined to pay no attention to their desires, then members of the opposition will have to consider ways and means.

I wish to say a word or two respecting these fire-fighters, and would associate myself with hon. members who have already spoken concerning them. I have been in contact with members of the fire-fighters, and I know positively that they were assured by General LaFleche, before they left this side, that they would be accorded all the rights and privileges of members of the armed services. I know that for certain. Then we proceed to collect arrears in taxes which the men did not know they owed! When a government calls upon a man to pay two or three years' arrears in taxes, or even one year's when he did not know he owed it, I believe that is worse than fining a man. It is as bad as the old capital levy for which they beheaded at least one king of England.

That matter is worthy of consideration. No government has any right to call upon a man for payment of arrears in taxes, when he did not know he was taxable.

Resolution stands.

The CHAIRMAN: Resolution 19.

Mr. ABBOTT: Might I point out that resolutions 18, 19 and 20 are together, and perhaps we had better consider them in that way. I had them stand before the dinner recess, and perhaps we should let them stand again, unless we are going to pass all three.

The CHAIRMAN: Resolutions 19 and 20 stand.

28. That for 1946 and subsequent taxation years the provision under which the minister may allow double depreciation in respect of plant or equipment built or acquired as a new investment in a period to be fixed by the governor in council be amended to provide that the allowance be made only in respect of such classes of plant or equipment as may be determined by the governor in council.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would the minister explain this resolution, and also state where in the act is to be found the provision that is being changed? Will he also give the committee some idea as to what classes of plant are no longer to get double depreciation and what classes of plant are to continue to get double depreciation?

Mr. ABBOTT: The legislation which will be based on resolution 28 will bring into the law authority to define by order in council the classes of assets in respect of which double depreciation is granted under section 6 (1) (n) (ii) of the act, which reads:

(1) in computing the amount of the profits or gains to be assessed, a deduction shall not be allowed in respect of

(n) depreciation, except such amount as the minister in his discretion may allow, including

(ii) depreciation at not more than double the rates normally allowed in respect of plant or equipment built or acquired in a period to be fixed by the governor in council for the purposes of this paragraph, if the taxpayer is, in the opinion of the minister, making a new investment by building or acquiring the plant or equipment.

Hitherto the classes of assets have been defined by order in council under the authority of the War Measures Act, or, on its expiration, of the transitional powers act, and it is necessary to have continuing authority under the act itself. There will be no change in policy as a result of this amendment, since it merely provides authority for the continuation of the present practice. I am sorry that I have not a copy of the order in council, but the general classes excluded are commercial and business establishments as distinct from manufacturing and industrial establishments.

My hon. friend will recall that the purpose of the section was to encourage the building of new productive facilities during the reconstruction period. On the advice of the minister of reconstruction, it was narrowed down to the classes of assets of manufacturing plants to which I referred. My hon. friend will recall that the minister of reconstruction had to give a certificate to the Department of National Revenue. It might be more satisfactory if I were to have available a copy of the order in council as it now stands so that I could answer questions in detail.

If the committee would care to pass the resolution I would have the order in council available when the bill is brought in. In essence there is no change in the law. We are simply taking the law as it is, which was administered in part by statute and in part by order in council under the War Measures Act which will lapse shortly after the commencement of the next session of parliament.

Mr. HACKETT: I think the matter is one of considerable importance. My recollection is that the measure has been both extended and restricted. I believe that it has been extended to shipbuilding.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. HACKETT: That it applies to ships, the approval for the construction of which has been given before December 1, 1947, and which will have been launched by March 31, 1948.

Mr. ABBOTT: The approval must be given before March 31, 1947, and the work completed by March 31, 1948.

Mr. HACKETT: I understand there is some provision that if the work be not completed, priority is allowed on the work accomplished, provided that it has been authorized in the first place.

Mr. ABBOTT: I believe that is right.

Mr. HACKETT: That has to do with extension but I think there have been some restrictions. In so far as I am acquainted with the matter, I am not critical of them, but I believe there is a lack of definition. There is still a vast field of discretion which I imagine will have to be restricted and defined by the statute. One of the questions which arises is whether new investment means new construction. In these days people are buying from War Assets Corporation plants which are costing huge sums of money and which undoubtedly are to be devoted to new purposes. They were used for the purpose of making munitions of war and in the future they will undoubtedly be devoted to the manufacture of peacetime commodities. Is such an investment one which would fall within the resolution, and would such a building, being a new investment, be subject to this double depreciation should the owner so optate?

Mr. ABBOTT: If the asset is within the order. I understand that the restrictions imposed by the order in council on the type of assets which are eligible for double depreciation represent a number of exclusions of assets used in service, distribution, communications and other non-manufacturing industries and also the exclusion of certain assets universally used, such as automobiles and trucks. In general, the double depreciation is granted on fixed assets employed in manufacturing industries. When I have before me a copy of the order in council I shall probably be able to deal more satisfactorily with the inquiries of the hon. member for Stanstead and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. HACKETT: If I had not encountered a slight mishap I would have been able to let the minister have a copy of the order in council. My filing system has failed because I changed my coat before coming into the chamber. Would it not be well to let the resolution stand because it is one of considerable importance?

Mr. ABBOTT: Would my hon. friend allow the resolution to pass, and then he could bring up any changes which he might consider desirable to be incorporated when the bill is before us? All we are doing with this resolution is substituting statutory authority for the authority which now exists by virtue of an order in council under the War Measures Act. I do not want to press the point, but I do not believe the position of the house would be prejudiced by allowing the resolution to pass and discussing the matter in detail on the bill itself.

Mr. HACKETT: Would machinery and equipment which had been used for war purposes but which is being converted to peacetime uses be subject to this type of depreciation?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised by the deputy minister that, subject to verification by looking at the order, the answer is yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The resolution refers to classes of plant or equipment as may be determined by the governor in council. Will that discretion be still reserved by the bill?

Mr. ABBOTT: I understand that will still be reserved. This, as the committee will appreciate, is special incentive legislation, and I think it is the type of legislation in which some discretion is desirable in the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply or the governor in council. Questions of shortages of material and of labour are involved.

Mr. HACKETT: I should like to get some information, because the minister will recall that there have been serious clashes, shall I say, between different members of the ministry and great disappointment has resulted to people who thought they were beneficiaries of this principle. I think it is to the knowledge of some members opposite that the certificate of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply was not always honoured by another minister whose duty it was to see that abundant revenue was collected, and I should like to know if the principle has been refined to such an extent that these clashes of jurisdiction and the disappointment resulting therefrom will be precluded.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know whether it would be correct to say that there has been a clash; but the ultimate authority, as my hon. friend knows, and will see by looking at the clause, rests with the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. HACKETT: There was no doubt where it rested. I think the gentleman who sits before the minister, never had any doubt as to where it rested, but I was thinking of the unfortunate gentlemen who thought when they had the certificate of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply that they had something more than an illusion.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think every effort should be made to make the order in council as explicit as possible so that the possibility of clash will be minimized.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If the minister is still suggesting that this resolution should pass, I must say that I am not quite satisfied. Are we now to shift over from a situation where it was publicly known what classes were included to having a discretion exercised?

Mr. ABBOTT: We are not shifting over. The classes will be determined by order in council, that is true; but that order in council will be published. The only change which is being made here is a change in authority. The authority to pass the order in council to-day is conferred by the War Measures Act, but, if this resolution passes, the authority will be conferred by the Income War Tax Act. That is the only difference. There will be no difference in the way in which the order in council is issued, except in so far as the suggestion of the hon. member for Stanstead were followed. The order in council will be along the lines of the order in council which is issued now under the War Measures Act.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Let me persist with one question further. Will there in due course be made public the details referred to here, the classes of plant or equipment, so that it will be publicly known in respect of what classes this double depreciation operates?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is published now and will be made public under the new order in council.

Mr. HACKETT: I am not sure that the minister would feel that the present order in council makes it absolutely clear that eligibility depends upon the nature of the investment or upon the use to which the machinery or plant shall be put. That is a matter of some importance. If the minister could answer that question, I will not ask any more at this point.

Mr. ABBOTT: I find it a little hard to make the distinction, and so do the officials in front of me.

Mr. HACKETT: That is why I asked the question.

Mr. ABBOTT: The nature of the investment will indicate the use to which it is put. If the investment is in a manufacturing plant I do not know that it would make very much difference whether the plant were making hairpins or some other commodity, nails or anything else.

Mr. MacNICOL: It would make a lot of difference if it were making nails just now.

Mr. HACKETT: I will not pursue the question further this evening, but I hope that when the measure is brought down by the minister it will be such as to shed a broad light upon a most important measure which the investing public up to the moment has not had any opportunity of understanding very well.

Mr. McMASTER: We have heard a lot about discretion in the last few days. I can understand the discretion of the minister in interpreting the act. Once that discretion is exercised, it becomes part of the very act itself. Will the legislation that is to be brought down give discretion to the minister as to who will get the benefit of this double depreciation? Will he have discretion to say that one person will get double depreciation and another person in the same business will not?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, he cannot discriminate in that way.

Mr. McMASTER: Will the minister say that wherever this discretion is exercised and somebody gets double depreciation, which is in the nature of a bonus, the facts will be made public? Is this to be kept secret as well as a man's income?

Mr. ABBOTT: I would not think the names of individual taxpayers would be published, together with the amount of depreciation which they have been granted. The so-called discretion of the minister is restricted to the question whether in his opinion the taxpayer is making a new investment by building or acquiring plant or equipment. He passes on that.

Mr. McMASTER: And having passed on it, does it become a matter of public knowledge?

Mr. ABBOTT: The exercise of discretion which is made in the case of any taxpayer does not necessarily mean that the facts shall be made public. I would think that in most cases they would not be. I would think that parliament might ask, as was asked here to-day, how many cases there were in which special depreciation of this kind had been granted and how much the depreciation amounted to, but I would not think it proper to disclose the exact investment of the individual taxpayer. I am thinking aloud, but that is the view I take.

Mr. HACKETT: I am going to ask the minister this final question. He may recall that yesterday I became a little bit agitated because I was, as I thought, being coerced into something. Will a person making this type of investment be forced to take the double depreciation if he does not want to?

Mr. ABBOTT: The answer is no. It may be to his advantage to spread the depreciation forward.

Mr. HACKETT: He still has the option.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: It seems to me that one of the points the hon. member for Stanstead is making is valid, namely, that the purpose of the plant has some signficance. As I recall, the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply the other day referred to the decision of the government to continue double depreciation for plants engaged in producing materials required in the construction of homes, which is a matter of considerable social importance at the present time. It is along that line that I suggest that the act itself should contain some of the principles at present in the order in council, which has been in existence for some time. The government has had experience and knows all the facts, and I would hope that it might be more specific in the legislation than appears to be the case at the present time.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will take into consideration the suggestion which the hon. member and others have made along the same line.

Resolution agreed to.

29. That the deduction in respect of income for a taxation year ending between the last day of December, 1942, and the first day of the year of expenditure in respect of one-half of expenditures made,

(a) in connection with maintenance or repairs by a taxpayer carrying on a business, or

(b) on underground development by a taxpayer operating a mine, in a period to be fixed by the governor in council, be restricted to an amount,

(c) if the year for deduction is the 1946 taxation year not greater than the taxpayer's excess profit in that year as defined for the purposes of the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, or

(d) if the year for deduction is a taxation year prior to 1946, not greater than the taxpayer's profits in the said year above the point at which the tax calculated for the said year under the first part of the second schedule to the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, was equal to the tax calculated for the said year under the second part of the second schedule to the said act, and that no such deduction be allowed in respect of the income for a taxation year commencing after 1946.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is perhaps a complicated provision. The legislation to be based on this resolution relates to the provisions which were announced in the 1944 budget dealing with deferred maintenance and repairs. It will be recalled that at that time an amendment was enacted to allow one-half the expenditures incurred in a period to be designated by the governor in council to be charged against the income of a previous fiscal period ending in a year not earlier than 1943. As yet the period in which expenditures incurred would be eligible under this provision has not been named, and the purpose of the legislation to be based on the resolution is to restrict the application of this carry-back when it becomes effective to income that was subject to tax at the rate applying to excess profits in the years 1943 to 1946. As the committee will understand, the flat rate of corporation income tax will be reduced by the budget proposals from 40 to 30 per cent and the excess profits tax rate from 20 to 15 per cent, effective January 1, 1947.

It will be immediately apparent, therefore, that any corporation paying only the 30 per cent rate of corporation tax in the future would automatically gain by carrying back an expenditure to a previous year when it paid only the minimum 40 per cent rate of combined tax. I would point out also that this gain would arise solely because the naming of the period in which the expenditures are eligible may be incurred, concerning which I wish to make a statement later on, has been delayed to a time later than was contemplated when this legislation was introduced in 1944.

I would also point out that the case for this measure was argued at a time when the 100 per cent rate of excess profits tax was in effect and that profits subject to this tax were asserted to be artificially high in many businesses because the normal costs for maintenance and repairs, impossible to undertake during war time, were missing.

I believe I am correct in saying that it was never in the government's mind that companies not subject to the excess profits tax rate would in general benefit from this special carry-back provision; and I may add that when I used the term "excess profits tax rate" I refer to the 100 per cent rate and the 60 per cent rate of last year.

We are, however, now faced with a situation in which many companies which have never paid the excess profits tax rate would receive a benefit owing to the necessity placed on the government, in fulfilling this obligation under the wartime tax agreements with the provinces, of reducing its corporation tax by ten per cent. Such companies would receive benefits which were never intended at the time the legislation was introduced and which would not arise except for the unforeseen necessity of postponing the period for an indefinite time. In the light of the above circumstances, it is proposed that the benefit of this provision, when it comes into operation, shall be limited to those business concerns which have paid tax under the rate applicable to excess profits.

I should like the committee and the business community at large to appreciate the difficult position in which the government has found itself in regard to the question of naming the period required to give effect to this measure. On the one hand, we have been pressed by businesses which have found it impossible to postpone their rehabilitation programmes any longer, asking us to name the period immediately in order that their expenditures may qualify; and, on the other hand, because of the serious shortage of materials and equipment, we have been pressed to delay the period until more ample supplies will allow business generally to receive the maximum advantage from its operation.

The government itself has also been faced with the responsibility of avoiding as far as possible any action that would place an additional strain on the acute situation with respect to building materials and accentuate shortages which have already seriously interfered with the housing programme in particular.

While the government has realized that in circumstances where it has been impossible further to postpone maintenance and repair expenditures deferred during war years, the fact that the period has not yet been named will mean a loss of benefit which would have been available were the period now in effect, it has not regarded it as in the general public interest to take any step which would place any added strain on the supply situation.

This matter, I may say, has been under review from time to time and will continue to be given constant consideration, but I regret that it is not yet deemed expedient to bring this measure into effect, nor is it possible in the present outlook to give any assurance as to when it will be proclaimed, apart from the assurance that it will be delayed no longer than is necessitated by the exigencies of the supply situation.

Mr. ADAMSON: I understand that this measure, which is splendidly complicated in its language, is not actually in effect and the period has not been named in which it is likely to come into effect. I have a suggestion to make to the minister with regard to mining in particular. Owing to the condition of the structures of the mines in Canada, particularly the workings underground, many mines have during the war done practically no exploration and have been in many ways seriously depleted when there was a tremendous demand for metal for production. The normal processes of mining were not carried on; probably the normal processes of a great many other businesses were in the same condition, and the structures and physical assets of the companies were not kept up in the way in which they should have been under normal business practice. I realize the difficulty the minister has in proclaiming a set period. What would be wrong with having the period optional to each individual concerned? Would that produce a chaotic situation. Some of the companies need the relief probably sooner than others. Some are now facing a critical situation in consequence of their depleted and deteriorated physical structures. Would it not be possible to allow some of the companies to take a period which was optional to them?

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall look into the question raised by my hon. friend. As he will appreciate, the legislation recognizes the fact that concerns which were earning high profits were unable to make their normal maintenance and repairs. By reason of that fact their profits were greater than they would otherwise be. The thought behind the legislation was that in a period shortly after the war it would be desired to stimulate production, encourage the making of these repairs, and that the government would then fix a period when the supply situation was such as to enable that to be done without interfering with other national activities, and that the benefit could then be taken back into the years referred to in the act. Whether it would be possible to make it optional or not with the individual company, I will not say at the moment, but I think it unlikely. As matters stand at present, I do not need to tell hon. members that materials and labour generally are in short supply and that, therefore, this is not the time when we want to encourage the making of these expenditures.

Mr. ADAMSON: I realize that this is not the time to encourage the making of these expenditures, but a number of industries are being driven to a more and more deteriorated state, and their efficiency is suffering because of the deteriorated state into which their plant has fallen.

I gather that the resolution affects only concerns or corporations which were paying the excess profits tax when it was 100 per cent. Is that not right?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right, or when it was 60 per cent.

Mr. ADAMSON: But it will not affect concerns which pay the excess profits tax under the present—

Mr. ABBOTT: Not concerns which paid what I might loosely describe as the normal rate of 40 per cent.

Mr. ADAMSON: It is difficult to say how many mines will be affected at the present time, some of which definitely went out and practised extremely bad mining practice in which they just took out their high-grade ore, and now find themselves in an extremely bad condition. When production was necessary they mined their high-grade veins and left their low-grade veins behind, and in some cases made really abnormal profits.

If the minister will look at the profits statement of a great many corporations in the last year he will find a considerable decrease in the profits made by many corporations, particularly mining corporations. I am not speaking now of the recent effect of parity; I am speaking of the conditions which accrued even before parity, because some of the mines have been forced to go back and put their properties into shape in order to carry on their business. Profits have fallen considerably, and I point out to the minister that in an operation such as mining these repairs or this rehabilitation of property must go on in order that the mine may continue. I assume that a great number of other concerns must be placed in the same position. Take a concern which has a steam boiler which has been used during the war and is still being used, but perhaps is not as safe as it should be. In a case like that, the concern should be given an opportunity to appeal or make its case optional before the government. There is every possibility that the building situation, the material situation, and the steel situation will get worse rather than better. We have to look at that. Perhaps I realize that better than anybody in the committee because I am trying to build a house at the present time. Therefore I know what the situation with regard to building material really is. There are many concerns in Canada to-day which find themselves definitely in a critical situation with regard to their physical plant, and some consideration should be given to making this resolution and the period when it becomes operative optional, and to give these concerns which find themselves, in common parlance, behind the eight ball, an opportunity of getting relief.

Mr. ABBOTT: As my hon. friend has pointed out, this resolution affects only those concerns which are in the 100 per cent excess profits tax bracket, or which paid excess profits taxes at the rate of 60 per cent. I am told that it would not affect many gold mines, because there were almost none in that category, although I have no doubt that there were some base metal mines.

I shall give consideration to the points raised by the hon. member, but I think it would be most undesirable to attempt to put it on a basis of selectivity or to try to give the minister the discretion to decide which company should get it and at which period. However, I shall give consideration to the points which have been raised by the hon. member for York West.

Mr. HACKETT: I have a question that I want to ask, but before asking it may I say that I believe that a number of base metal mines find themselves in a difficult position because they responded, as the hon. member for York West has said, to the great demand for base metals. They took out the ore of the higher grades and did great damage to the mine as a business. There is something comparable to repairs which have to be made before a mine can be operated effectively and economically. I do not see any provision in the resolutions for that damage which was done for other than business reasons. The chief and only inspiration to do as the mine owners did, was to increase production, which meant nothing to them, because, as the minister has said, many of them were in the categories wherein 100 per cent of their profits were taxable. Has any provision been made for the rehabilitation of these great sources of employment and wealth?

Mr. ABBOTT: I agree with what my hon. friend has said, that a great many of these base metal mines did accelerate production, and by doing so did accelerate the depreciation of the plant and equipment. There were a number of cases in which special agreements were made with mines for the crown to grant them accelerated depreciation, but other than that there is no special provision. As I pointed out in my remarks a little earlier, the government realizes there are cases in which it will be impossible for certain manufacturers or mine operators further to postpone the making of long-deferred maintenance repairs and replacements. As I also said, that will mean a loss of benefit to these firms; but it is still felt that, in the interests of the public generally and the manufacturers generally who would be entitled to avail themselves of this, the time has not yet come when a period can be designated within which expenditures for such deferred maintenance and repairs can be availed of as a charge back to previous years.

Mr. HACKETT: I wanted to ask this question, dealing with a large class of companies whose operations were almost suspended during the war. They did nothing, or practically nothing; they earned no profits or in any event not sufficient profits to maintain their equipment. Now that business has come back, they find themselves confronted with this difficulty. Either they must not accept work or they must buy new equipment, which is not going to be provided for by depreciation or anything of that kind. I am speaking now of equipment which has stood idle for five or six or seven years. I shall give the minister a typical company of the kind I have in mind, a road building company. They have done nothing; their equipment has rusted and rotted. To-day the work comes in and the equipment has to be renewed. How are they to do it? It will not be a proper charge against earnings, and I do not find anything in the act or in the resolutions to meet that situation. It seems to me that this is a practical question and one of which the deputy has had probably a number of instances placed before him.

Mr. ABBOTT: That, of course, is perfectly true, as no one knows better than my hon. friend; but depreciation is only of value to a taxpayer if he has profits against which to write off the depreciation. I have no doubt the road building companies are an excellent example of concerns whose plant and equipment depreciated during the war period, when there were no earnings against which depreciation could be written off. But as far as I know there is nothing in the law which would allow them to take depreciation to-day which they could have taken in previous years, and I do not think there is any intention of introducing such a provision. This measure, as my hon. friend knows, and as I indicated earlier, was intended to help the man whose profits were swollen if anything by reason of the fact that he was not able to make normal maintenance and repairs; to enable him to make them at a later date and charge them back into that period of very high taxation.

Mr. HACKETT: But to promote employment I thought it might be a matter of policy which the government would like to explore. If the replacement of this machinery could be made a first charge upon profits up to an amount which the government might think reasonable, I am sure it would promote business activity and employment and the general well-being of large sections of the community.

Mr. McMASTER: I was very glad to hear that in the past there were some companies who did not manage to spend considerable sums out of their excess profits instead of the money going to the government. I did not know that such companies existed. But I cannot see why a company that had excess profits would not write off depreciation. No doubt they did write it off, and they have that depreciation in their hands right now. It is real money.

Mr. ABBOTT: I had better clear up this point. We did get into a discussion of depreciation, but this section has nothing to do with depreciation. This relates to deferred maintenance, what would have been ordinary operating expenses of the concern and chargeable as such, but which they were not able to make because of the shortage of materials or shortage of labour or otherwise.

Mr. McMASTER: But I was going to get into the question of depreciation anyway; the hon. member for Stanstead was holding me back.

Mr. ABBOTT: Having allowed the hon. member for Stanstead to speak on it, I suppose I must allow my hon. friend to do so, though it is not under this resolution.

Mr. McMASTER: I am not speaking about mines. I do not know anything about them except that they are things you get money out of and things some people put money into which they never get back. I am speaking of this broad section. As I understand it, you are only going to allow any money they will spend in the future out of the excess profits the government got out of them in the good years, when they had swollen profits. If they did not have profits, then depreciation was not allowed. Depreciation is written off because some day you are going to have to replace the capital structure, or some part of it, and for that you use this depreciation, which is actually money in your hands. Then, what other concession should they have than the privilege of using this money which they kept back from the government and have in their hands to-day? If you start giving back 100 per cent excess profits I think you should do so in such a way that everyone would get his share. Under the Excess Profits Tax Act a small business was prevented from making any advance at all because of the low base. Those people from whom you took excess profits equal to perhaps five or six times their whole capital structure should receive some consideration. I should like the minister to explain why the companies the government is going to help are the companies that had excess profits and the companies that have in their hands the depreciation with which to make the necessary repairs.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be glad to do what I can to explain to my hon. friend the point he has raised, though, if he will allow me to say so, it has nothing to do with this resolution, which relates to a provision that has been on the statute books since 1944. As I explained in my opening statement, this regulation made provision for the case of the concern which during the war years was not able to make its normal, ordinary maintenance expenditures. Companies of that kind, who thereby had their profits increased beyond what they would have been under ordinary normal business practice, can do that later. Take the case of a concern—

Mr. JACKMAN: The railways.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall take a smaller example. Take a concern which normally would earn $50,000 a year and which normally would spend $10,000 in regular, proper repairs and maintenance. During the war years, because of shortage of materials and labour shortage, it was not able to spend that $10,000. What was the effect? Its profits were increased from $50,000 to $60,000. Ordinarily, if it could have obtained the materials or the men it would have made those everyday, regular, normal repairs. It could not do that, so that its profits were artificially increased, if I may so describe it, by reason of those circumstances. It was recognized that there was a hardship there, and we said to those companies, "If you make those deferred maintenance and repairs after the period of scarcity is over, in a period which is designated by the government, we will allow you to charge them, to the extent of one half, back into those years, from 1943 to 1946 when you would normally have made them." That is all.

Under the proposed resolution we restrict that privilege, if I may call it that, to taxpayers that were big profit earners during the period of the war, companies which, as I said, were in the 100 per cent bracket, or who paid the 60 per cent rate. The only difficulty we are in at the present time is that, because of the shortage of materials and of labour which still exists, we cannot designate a period yet within which those who are eligible may avail themselves of that right. It has nothing whatever to do with depreciation.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not see how it can be dissociated from depreciation. The income tax branch will disallow everything that is not ordinary repairs. The cost of other than ordinary repairs is taken out of depreciation account. If they do not spend it there, there will be the usual allowance for depreciation. They get the same benefit by depreciation that they would have got by spending the money on what are capital repairs, and the money allowed for depreciation is still in their hands.

Mr. ABBOTT: The answer is no. My hon. friend should appreciate that one cannot take out of depreciation reserve expenditures for maintenance and repairs. Expenditures for maintenance and repairs are current operating charges. Amounts which are set aside in depreciation reserve are a capital charge. They are a charge against profit, it is true, but they are set up in a depreciation reserve in order to provide a return of capital to the taxpayer. On the other hand, expenditures for maintenance and repairs are current day-to-day, week-to-week, month-to-month, year-to-year operating expenses.

Mr. McMASTER: Even machinery is depreciated on a basis allowed by the department. They cannot go and buy new machinery or repair it, except through this depreciation fund; at least the income tax officials never allowed my clients to do so.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What bothers me is that it seems to me—and I am going back to the suggestion made by the hon. member for York West—that it might be done at a time to be chosen by the company; because as the minister has indicated, the relief they propose to give is limited to a certain time, and it is by no means certain that a company will be able to take advantage of it in that time. That will depend, as I see it, upon the circumstances of each particular company. If, as pointed out by the minister, this is advantageous, I am not clear as to why it need necessarily be confined wholly to the 100 per cent or 60 per cent excess profits tax company.

Mr. ABBOTT: Because, as I said in my preliminary statement, it was never intended to benefit any other taxpayer. The justification for it, as my hon. friend will see if he looks at the debates, was that the companies in question were in effect having taken away from them 100 per cent of amounts which otherwise they would have expended on maintenance and repairs.

Mr. McMASTER: Would the minister give us the section of the act where that is indicated?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, it is section 5 (v) which says:

> In respect of income for a taxation year ending between the last day of December, one thousand nine hundred and forty-two and the first day of the year of expenditure, not more than one-half of expenditures made
> (i) in connection with maintenance and repairs by a taxpayer carrying on a business, or
> (ii) on underground development by a taxpayer operating a mine, in a period to be fixed by the governor in council for the purposes of this paragraph but the taxpayer may not deduct from his income for the year of expenditure, in respect of maintenance and repairs or underground development, more than the amount by which the expenditures made with respect thereto in that year exceed the amount deducted in a previous year or years in respect thereof under this paragraph.

That is to be amended in the way indicated in the resolution now before the committee.

Mr. ADAMSON: One thing more. Our hypothetical company makes $50,000 a year and puts $10,000 into normal operating repairs. Now it makes $60,000. The $10,000 is 100 per cent gone; the government has got it. Now their machinery is depleted, and they are in a mess. I am not clear as to how exactly they will take the recoup for the expenditure of the $10,000 for three or four years—and incidentally it will perhaps be more than that, because of present increased prices. How do they get it back? What is the machinery for getting that back?

Mr. ABBOTT: I would say that $5,000 of the $10,000 could be carried back into 1943, and charged there. In other words, the company's return would be reopened for 1943, and it would get an appropriate refund of taxes.

Mr. ADAMSON: But not in 1942.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, not in 1942.

Mr. ADAMSON: But in 1943, 1944 and 1945?

Mr. ABBOTT: And 1946.

Mr. ADAMSON: Only 60 per cent in 1946, though?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, it could be deducted from income in 1946. The rate in 1946 is only 60 per cent.

Mr. ADAMSON: But in their income tax, they can take their income tax and excess profits tax statement for 1943, go to the deputy minister and say, "I want 50 per cent of this back, because I have to repair my machinery"?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct, provided that they make the repairs within the period which will ultimately be designated.

Mr. ADAMSON: And which has not yet been named?

Mr. ABBOTT: Correct.

Mr. McMASTER: In the bill which will eventually come forward will there be some means of designating those who are entitled to this, or will it be another case of the discretion of the minister?

Mr. ABBOTT: Everybody will be entitled to it who was in that tax bracket during those years. There is no question of discretion there.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I understand that provisions in legislation arising out of this will be restricted to a certain select group of companies. That is the impression I got from what the minister said. I want to know upon what criterion that will be measured. What rules will apply as to who shall or who shall not be eligible, or is there a list of companies to which we can refer.

Mr. ABBOTT: They are all listed in the resolution. The class is clearly designated. The expenditure must be in connection with maintenance or repairs by a taxpayer carrying on a business, or on underground development by a taxpayer operating a mine; and they must be companies which—speaking as I did colloquially—were in the 100 per cent excess profits tax bracket in the years 1943, 1944, or 1945, or the 60 per cent excess profits tax in 1946. I have explained once or twice why it is restricted to that class. It is restrictive. If it were extended to other companies, say, which paid only at the 40 per cent rate, it would be a benefit extended to those companies which it was never intended they should have. But there is no discretion in the minister as to who will get the benefit and who will not.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: But it is restricted to companies or businesses as designated in this resolution?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: What I should like to know is why it was restricted to that? For instance, farmers are in the same position as some of these companies.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. ABBOTT: It is not restricted to an industrial enterprise. It extends to agriculture, too. If an agriculturist was in the 100 per cent excess profits tax bracket, and paid excess profits tax and was not able to make the normal maintenance and repairs—or even if he did—he could take benefit of the section. I am glad the hon. member brought that up, because it is not restricted. It is the taxpayers who are subject to the provisions of the Excess Profits Tax Act. I understand there were some farmers who came within that act.

Resolution agreed to.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would ask that the resolutions 30 to 35 inclusive be allowed to stand.

36. That no interest shall be payable on unpaid taxes upon income of the 1945 or a subsequent taxation year in respect of a period commencing twenty months after the day fixed for filing the return for the taxation year and ending one month after the sending of the notice of assessment.

Mr. ABBOTT: The effect of this resolution is to provide that where no assessment has been made in respect of a taxation year at the end of a period of twenty months following the date for filing returns for that year interest on any unpaid taxes will cease to accumulate after the end of the twentieth month and will not commence to accrue until one month after an assessment has been made.

Mr. KNOWLES: I gather that this change is being proposed in view of protests which have accumulated during the last few years. As hon. members will know, the department has had so much work to do that the time taken to assess returns has extended considerably. A taxpayer who inadvertently may not have made out his return correctly has not liked having to pay interest for a long period of time because of the time taken by the department to assess the return. It seems to me that the department has admitted the validity of the protests that have been made by fixing an arbitrary period beyond which such interest would not be paid. In other words, the government is saying that the department should make assessments within at least a year and eight months after the filing date. It seems to me that, that admission having been made, it strengthens our case for suggesting that the period should be shorter.

I know the other argument presented by the Minister of Finance, namely, that people should make out their returns correctly and that it should not be possible to save interest at the expense of the government. Surely a period of something less than twenty months should be sufficient penalty for a taxpayer who is doing this sort of thing deliberately, and in the interest of the average taxpayer who tries to make out his return correctly I suggest that the period should be shorter than twenty months.

Resolution agreed to.

37. That the provision for payment of interest by corporations on the amount of taxes unpaid after payment of instalments of estimated tax commencing six months after the end of the taxation year be amended to require payment of interest on the said unpaid amount from the end of the taxation year.

Resolution agreed to.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, and to provide:

1. That the provision for taxation of excess profits of every person residing or ordinarily resident in Canada be amended to exclude therefrom in respect of excess profits earned after December 31, 1946, persons other than corporations or joint stock companies and to reduce the rate of tax on excess profits earned after December 31, 1946, from 20 per cent to 15 per cent.

2. That with respect to profits earned after December 31, 1946, the provision for taxation of profits of every corporation or joint stock company be repealed.

3. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years investment corporations that have outstanding bonds, debentures or other securities evidencing funded indebtedness be exempt from excess profits tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: The first resolution proposes two things, first, that the rate of tax on excess profits earned after December 31, 1946 be reduced from 20 per cent to 15 per cent and, second, it exempts completely from the excess profits tax the profits of partnerships and sole proprietors as from January 1, 1947.

The second resolution repeals the flat rate tax on total profits as distinct from the rate of tax on excess profits with respect to earnings of 1947. At present the tax on total profits under the Excess Profits Tax Act is 22 per cent which, together with the 18 per cent under the Income War Tax Act, makes the 40 per cent flat rate. Concurrent with the repeal of this 22 per cent rate, the 18 per cent rate is being increased to 30 per cent. These two amendments taken together give effect to the undertaking under the provincial wartime agreements that the dominion would reduce the tax on corporate incomes by ten per cent of such income.

The third resolution provides for a minor amendment dealing with investment trusts and is in line with the amendments in connection with the Income War Tax Act. It grants exemption from excess profits tax to all investment trusts, regardless of whether or not they have bonds outstanding. At present the exemption is limited to those who do not have bonds outstanding, and this is to give comparable treatment to the two classes of trust.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): My understanding is that it remains indefinite; in other words, it continues from the end of 1946, the only difference being that it is 15 per cent instead of 20 per cent?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to draw attention to one or two things.

Mr. ABBOTT: Sole proprietors and partnerships are out.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I want to refer to just one or two things said by the minister last October and again this year. I am referring to this matter purely as an employment measure. The Minister of Finance said that we should not rely too much on employment remaining as it is now, that we should think of everything that would possibly stimulate employment. I think that is generally recognized, and I wish to quote the minister on the point that the great objection to the 100 per cent excess was that it put no premium on efficiency. In fact, it almost put a premium on inefficiency. The Minister of Finance is reported on page 1004 of Hansard of October 12, 1945, as follows:

> The Excess Profits Tax Act is a war measure which has commanded overwhelming support as an important and necesary instrument of war finance. Unmodified, it seriously weakens the stimulus toward the investment of capital and the efficient operation of enterprises. In this period of reconstruction it is becoming a barrier to expanding employment.

As reported later on the same page, the minister said:

> There is widespread evidence that incentive is being stifled and that ordinary prudence in the making of business expenditures has been seriously weakened.

Speaking on June 17 of this year, as reported on page 2919 of Hansard, the minister said this:

> I had hoped to be able to announce in this budget the repeal of the Excess Profits Tax Act in its entirety, effective as of January 1, 1947. As I explained last year, this tax was designed as a war measure and has received overwhelming support as a necessary instrument of war finance, but it has distinct weaknesses and limitations in normal times and is not to be accepted as a permanent part of our tax structure.

Then the minister went on to give as his reason for not dealing with it, which to me is one of the most unconvincing statements I have ever heard from the Minister of Finance:

Experience, however, has shown that we are still living in highly abnormal times, the shadow of the war is still upon us, and as I have shown the financial burdens on the dominion budget arising out of the war are still of huge proportions. After careful consideration the government has reached the conclusion that the act should stay on the statute books for another year unless provision is made at the next session of parliament for its earlier repeal.

I want to emphasize that I am talking about this as an employment measure. I know I am running the risk of some saying, "Oh, you are thinking of the corporations." I am just using the minister's words which, I think, are wise and sound. I contend that the conclusion which the government has arrived at is entirely contrary to all the argument made by the minister, and I think it is a great mistake.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am glad my hon. friend very properly emphasized the word "unmodified" when he quoted the minister's speech.

Mr. KNOWLES: There are two comments I should like to make. First, despite what the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario has just said, I cannot but recall how rapidly the Excess Profits Tax Act has been modified since the end of the war as compared with the deaf ear we get when we try to plead the cause of personal income taxpayers in the lower brackets.

Mr. FLEMING: I think the committee would value the hon. member's opinion on the fact that the United Kingdom abolished their Excess Profits Tax Act entirely with a view to stimulating employment.

Mr. KNOWLES: We have gone over that before, but we can go over it again if it is thought desirable. One has to take the total economy into consideration. One has to consider the entire tax set-up; the situation in Britain, the shortages they have because of what they went through in the war, and the social security measures that have been brought down in that country. I am suggesting that we do what my hon. friends have proposed time and again, namely, make comparisons within our own country and on the basis of what is possible here. And what does seem obvious here is that this government in the space of two years is able to bring about drastic modifications in the excess profits tax as compared with the modifications we have had in the personal income tax.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

The other thing I would suggest is this. The Minister of Finance in his budget speech made reference in his closing paragraph to the general belief that we as Canadians can do just as great things in time of peace as we did in time of war. I suggest that there is a sense in which our objectives are parallel, namely, high production, and part of the way to achieve high production is to make sure that the results of production are put to social use. That comes about, not by facilitating the piling up of huge profits, but by using such instruments as are at our command to distribute properly wealth. On that basis the government has already gone far enough, if not too far, in the reductions it has made in this particular tax.

Mr. JACKMAN: The minister, in making his reply in the budget debate, mentioned that some on this side—and I think he had reference to myself among others—had said that the retention of this excess profits tax, even though it is lowered slightly, was a great discouragement to production. He attacked that contention; and after reviewing the situation in Canada, where we have 30 per cent normal tax, and 5 per cent likely to be added by the provinces, and then 15 per cent excess profits tax, giving 50 per cent altogether—

Mr. ABBOTT: No; 15 per cent on the excess over 116⅔ of standard, not on all profits. That is an important difference. It is not 50 per cent on all profits.

Mr. JACKMAN: The basic rate is—

Mr. ABBOTT: Where the province imposes a tax the tax is 35 per cent on profits up to 116⅔ of standard and 15 per cent on the excess. In most cases that would work out at an average rate of about 38 per cent.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is the mistake which I believe the Minister and his advisers have fallen into. What I am suggesting is that on the excess profits—define them as you like, 100 per cent or 116⅔—the effective tax rate will be 50 per cent. Is that correct?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct, but only on the excess. On 116⅔ of standard the tax will be 30 or 35 per cent.

Mr. JACKMAN: In this country it will be 50 per cent as against 38 per cent in the United States, and a still smaller rate on the smaller corporations, which fact the minister did not mention. The two examples I gave the minister were these. A company in the United States having a branch plant in Canada can arrange to do its export business from the parent plant across the line, or it can do its export business from its branch in Canada. If it does so much business, we will call it X, in the United States, and it also does X business in Canada, there is still its foreign trade business, which is additional to the ordinary business carried on domestically in both countries. If that company finds that the tax rate in the United States is 38 per cent on the foreign end of the business, and that the tax rate in Canada is 50 per cent, it is quite obvious where the business is going to be done.

Mr. ABBOTT: It cannot be 50 per cent in Canada.

Mr. JACKMAN: It can be and you have just admitted it.

Mr. ABBOTT: Only on a relatively small proportion of the profits.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is where the minister and his advisers make their cardinal mistake. I am not suggesting what the general rate of taxation is. All I am interested in is in getting the additional business. I am not thinkabout the average business but about the additional business, and the rate of taxation on that additional business is 50 per cent in Canada, whereas in the United States the rate remains at the flat corporation rate, which we will take as 38 per cent. So that there is no question where the additional business is going to be done. If, not the average business, but the additional business is produced in the United States the rate of taxation is 38 per cent. If the additional business is done here the rate is 50 per cent. It seems to me clear that the minister and his advisers have fallen into a complete lack of business foresight in not grasping that the average rate is of no consequence in regard to the extra foreign business we are trying to get. It is the rate on the last unit of business which counts, the rate here in Canada as against the rate in the United States, and I am saying that there is a twelve per cent differential, that the retained profit is twelve per cent higher in the United States and therefore the additional business is certainly going to be done there.

I mentioned also the example of a Canadian company, a great friend of the government, which was endeavouring to do some export business to Newfoundland and had the trade pretty well lined up. Then an American competitor came in and, because he had a larger retained profit, he was able to quote a closer price and get the business. We are not interested in the average tax rate on all the business of a Canadian company. That is all right for theorists to be interested in, but not practical business men who, if they have an opportunity to do additional business through a United States plant or a Canadian plant and the rate in the case of the United States plant is 38 per cent and in the case of the Canadian plant 50 per cent, will certainly have it done in the United States. The result of this retention of the excess profits tax on our Canadian economy, perhaps not so much now when we have employment and are doing fairly well in production, but in the future will be to deprive our manufacturers of just what is required in the way of incentive and providing employment for our people.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Government House,
Ottawa, July 25, 1946.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Thibaudeau Rinfret, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber on Friday, July 26 at 3 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
F. L. C. Pereira,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, July 26, 1946

The house met at eleven o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. COLDWELL—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN OTTAWA "JOURNAL" OF JULY 25

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of personal privilege. In the five o'clock edition of the Ottawa Journal of yesterday's date the story appears on the front page, headed: "House Sustains Speaker's Ruling to Bar Questions." Referring to myself the article states:

While he asked for and was refused an explanation of the ruling, CC.F. leader Coldwell headed his followers in voting with the Liberals to uphold the Speaker.

Later in the article, on page 14, again in reference to myself, it states:

Mr. Coldwell, who had protested against C.C.F. questions being dropped from the order paper and then restored without explanation, asked for further information.

"Will you please make your ruling clear?" he asked Dr. Fauteux.

"The ruling is quite clear," replied the Speaker.

Denied a fuller explanation, Mr. Graydon appealed.

This obviously is an incorrect and garbled account of what actually took place. I have consulted the official record—and may I interject just here, Mr. Speaker, also perhaps another matter of personal privilege, that it is unfortunate we are not receiving Hansard in time to check it before the house meets. I had to go to the office of Hansard and consult the record there. I think every attempt should be made by the Secretary of State and by the king's printer to improve the service in this house which is required in the circumstances. But I quote from the official record:

Mr. Coldwell: Would Your Honour make the ruling clear? I did not understand your ruling as the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) seems to interpret it. My understanding is that questions will be permitted on the order paper when the subject matter of these questions is not referred specifically to a committee, which makes all the difference in the world.

Mr. Mackenzie: That is right.

Mr. Coldwell: I think that is a ruling which the house should substantiate because I think it is a correct one.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. gentleman is perfectly right, and for the information of the house I shall read the conclusion of my remarks:

"In conclusion, I think it is, generally speaking, a wise rule that provides that while a committee is inquiring into a matter the house will not encroach on its jurisdiction by allowing the same matter to be discussed in the house, but members must not be debarred from seeking information by placing on the order paper questions which are not debatable and do not give rise to discussions As long as these questions do not deal with the very specific matters referred to, they should be permitted to appear on the order paper."

That is the official report. It is to be regretted that the Ottawa Journal which, for many years, had a reputation for accuracy, should on several occasions of late—

Mr. GRAYDON: It still has.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It still has.

Mr. COLDWELL: —have published stories which bear little or no resemblance to what actually took place in this house.

Before I sit down I wish merely to add that, as I stated yesterday, in my opinion the explanation given was a correct interpretation of the rule, and on that ground we voted to sustain your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It is always difficult to sit on both sides of the fence.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I wish to rise to a question of privilege. I have a certain amount, a somewhat humble amount, of responsibility in regard to the activities of this house, and I found it my duty yesterday to vote against His Honour's decision. I am profoundly convinced that my decision was correct. I say that whereas you cannot discuss the proceedings of a committee until the committee has reported back to the house, there is no impairment or impediment to any freely elected member of the parliament of Canada in discussing any matter referred to a committee. The house will recall that earlier this session the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) asked me if any questions referred to the committee on veterans affairs could be discussed in this house, and I immediately consented.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE: This is a question of privilege, and I am entitled to explain my position in this house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE: With all respect to you, sir, I am not going to be compelled to sit down in regard to any matter which as a private member for Vancouver Centre I am entitled to refer to in this house. I insist on my question of privilege, and I am not going to be bound by any archaic rules of the eighteenth or nineteenth century.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the minister to be kind enough to resume his seat. I am not questioning the right of the hon. gentleman to rise on a question of privilege. He may rise at any time; that is the privilege of the hon. minister and of all other hon. members. But I wonder if I should permit the hon. gentleman or any other hon. member to discuss or debate the ruling that was given yesterday.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is quite correct, Mr. Speaker, and with all respect I was not questioning your ruling at all. I was trying to explain the stand I had to take as a matter of conscientious duty as a member of this house.

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State): In the course of his remarks the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) suggested that perhaps the king's printer was not acting with dispatch in the printing of Hansard. As the responsible minister I should say that I think on reflection the hon. member will realize that the king's printer and his staff are working under very difficult conditions.

The house is now meeting in the morning. When the house met at three o'clock in the afternoon Hansard was always available to hon. members before the opening of sittings. I am sure the hon. member had no intention of casting any aspersions on the efficiency of the king's printer, and I believe he will agree that the staff of the king's printer is doing its work as efficiently as is possible under the circumstances.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was casting no reflection upon the king's printer or upon the Secretary of State. I was only asking that an attempt be made to speed up the distribution of Hansard.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Seventh report of standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Cleaver.

WHEAT

AGREEMENT WITH UNITED KINGDOM—DOMESTIC PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce having to do with the announcement he made yesterday with respect to the United Kingdom wheat agreement. He advised that the price of wheat to the United Kingdom would be $1.55 a bushel for the next two years, with a minimum of $1 a bushel at the fourth year. My question to the minister is this. Is the government now in a position to state whether there will be any change in the domestic price in Canada—now $1.25 a bushel—or whether there will be any change in the initial price of $1.25 which is now paid to wheat growers? If the minister is not in a position to make an announcement now perhaps he would do so at an early date.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): A great deal of attention has been and is still being given to the point raised by the leader of the opposition. This crop year ends on Wednesday next, and it naturally follows that some time between now and Wednesday a statement must be made in this connection. I am hoping to be able to make a statement next Tuesday.

TOMAHAWK IRON MINE

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT IN "CANADIAN MINING REPORTER"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Mines and Resources a startling charge made in the issue of the Canadian Mining Reporter which hon. members received this morning, relating to the Tomahawk iron mine at Hastings, Ontario. I do not expect the minister to give an answer now, since this may be a new problem to him, but I think the matter is of sufficient importance that after he has investigated it, perhaps on Monday, he might report to the House of Commons so that we may know the story in full. I shall send the paper over to the minister so that he may be apprised of the allegations which it contains.

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): The hon. member for Peel showed me this article when I came into the house. I shall make inquiries and report later.

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS ACT

LABELLING OF CANS—CANNED FISH OR SHELLFISH

Hon. H. F. G. BRIDGES (Minister of Fisheries) moved that the house go into committee on bill No. 164, to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Regulations dealing with canned fish or shellfish.

Mr. BRIDGES: This section was amended by the marine and fisheries committee.

Section as amended agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

JUDGES ACT

CONSOLIDATION AND AMENDMENT—SALARIES, ETC.

The house resumed from Tuesday, July 23, consideration in committee of bill No. 250, respecting judges of dominion and provincial courts—Mr. St. Laurent—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—short title.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, I have to leave the chamber to attend a committee meeting, and I am taking this early opportunity to say a word on this bill. I oppose it.

I cannot see a more unwise measure at this time than the bill before us. Along with other members I am serving on a standing committee of this house and hearing matters in dispute between wage earners and their employers, with the government in the picture I believe as having set down certain basic increases in wages beyond which boards cannot go. In other words, the wage rates were frozen in 1941, and there is only a slight relaxation in those rates at the present time.

The Minister of Labour indicated in the house some days ago that any increase in wages over ten cents an hour would be fraught with danger to the country because of its inflationary effect. I do not know whether that is true or not; but the point is that wage increases in the very low wage categories are being resisted, with the result that we have now in Canada some 50,000 or 60,000 industrial workers on strike. Those increases are being resisted. And at that very time, with these conditions existing, we have before us a bill which proposes to raise to the extent of as much as one-third the salaries of persons who are already getting extremely high salaries in relation to the wages being paid industrial workers in Canada.

To the salary of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada who, at the present time receives $15,000, we are proposing to add one-third more, to make it $20,000. To me this does not make sense, from the point of view either of economics or of social thinking. It would appear to me that any reasonable society would consider its duty to be that of raising the living standards of those at the bottom before raising the standards of those at the top. As a matter of fact an increase in salary to a man receiving $9,000, $10,000, $12,000 or $15,000 does not raise his standard of living, because the increased amount received will not be spent in that way.

An hon. MEMBER: Liquor.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not know that that is a fair remark, even if it comes from this side of the house. I am not suggesting at all that these people will spend part of their salary on liquor. And even if they did, it is their business, not mine. That does not enter into the picture. But the point is that they do not need to spend any of that increase in salary on the basic essentials of life. The great majority of the people in Canada have never yet received an income sufficient to provide their essential needs. I cannot understand a man of intelligence and culture, and with an understanding of what makes society and keeps it integrated, bringing in a measure to increase salaries where they ought not to be increased, thus creating further class divisions in Canada, and at a time when we should be doing the very opposite.

Mr. FLEMING: You are creating them.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. MacINNIS: It is creating class divisions, because the man who receives $20,000, $15,000, $12,000 or $10,000 in salary has no understanding of or connection or association with the man who must live on a wage from $500 to $1,500 or $2,000, or perhaps even $3,000.

Mr. BROOKS: Will the hon. member tell us what salaries the heads of labour unions are getting in Canada and the United States?

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not concerned with the United States. But I am satisfied that there is no head of a labour union in Canada who is getting a salary of $10,000.

Mr. STEPHENSON: What about the Comintern?

Mr. MacINNIS: The Comintern?—what is the sense of that question? I have no connection with the Comintern. Let me give my hon. friend to understand that I enjoy the distinction of being the only member of the House of Commons who tried to gain entrance to Russia and was refused. Any person who asks a question like that shows his stupidity, if he does not show anything else.

Not only are these judges provided with good salaries, but they are also provided with generous pensions, so they need not worry about the future. They have not to put by something for a rainy day, because the people of this country have put by something for them.

Mr. IRVINE: It never rains.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then we make provision for their widows. In looking over the estimates I find pensions for widows of judges ranging from $1,600 to over $2,000, and perhaps there are some higher than that, because I only glanced through the list. What is the position of the widow of a longshoreman, of a lumber worker, or of a street car conductor, such as I was myself? If they are seventy years of age they will get $30 a month in some parts of Canada, but only if they can prove that they are not in receipt of an income of more than $365. While in receipt of that pension, every six months they must make an affidavit that their economic condition has not changed. I do not think that is democracy; I do not think it is a reasonable and satisfactory social organization for our country. If any hon. gentleman here passed on—there are no judges here—their widows would consider themselves just as worthy as the widows of judges. Why should they not be looked after? Can anyone give a reasonable explanation of that?

I have here a letter which I received from a woman in Vancouver under date of July 15, and this is only one of hundreds that I have received. I have another interesting letter from a woman in Montreal who is sixty-nine years old and who cannot get an old age pension because she has not reached the age of seventy. She is wondering where in the world she is going to turn in order to live until she is seventy. I imagine the reason she wrote to me is that she noticed I had raised the question of old age pensions in the house. This Vancouver woman writes:

My husband receives the $25 from Manitoba—

This couple are living in British Columbia but the husband receives the pension that would be paid in Manitoba.

—and I help a little by sewing or washing sometimes. My health broke down last fall and so it is very little I can do. I shall be seventy if I live till next March, so you see if only the age limit was sixty-five it would help some.

I sometimes wonder how the men responsible for this situation can sleep in their beds when such hardship has to be endured by the pioneers. We lived in Manitoba from 1904 till 1940, then we came here to avoid the cold winters. My husband, who will be seventy-six on August 19, attends to a furnace and garden for a free small cottage, but there is no money goes with it. So you will see we have to do some stretching, and the only way to get clothes is when some friend passes on.

I ask hon. members of this house if they are going to pass a bill to increase the salaries of persons who do not need it when there are hundreds of thousands across Canada in the same position as this woman? Are we called here to look after the poor and the needy who are not in position to look after themselves, or are we here to do something for people who are already well looked after? That is the question hon. members have to decide. Hon. members must justify their position in this house before the old people of this country.

When the Minister of Justice introduced the resolution that preceded this bill he said, as reported on page 3178 of Hansard:

The salaries that are being paid at this time are those that were fixed in 1920. Personally I feel that they are out of line, not only with what are the salaries elsewhere, but also with what prevails for salaries and income in our own country. The suggestion is, now that there is being some relaxation in the controls over wages and salaries,—

I wonder just how much relaxation there is? Evidently there is not very much. If there was some relaxation I doubt if we would have so much industrial unrest in this country. The minister continued:

The suggestion is, now that there is being some relaxation in the controls over wages and salaries, that a provision which will come into effect on January 1, 1947, will not be out of line with what will be happening generally in the readjustment of the post-war period.

I wish that this matter of increases in the salaries of judges was under the Department of Labour and another judge was appointed and instructed to make a recommendation in regard to the salaries of his brother judges just as they make recommendations in connection with the wages paid to trade unionists. He would then bring down a recommendation, not that the salaries be increased by one-third—I have never heard of a judge as generous as that when dealing with a labour dispute—he would say: "Taking into consideration the ability of this country to pay, I recommend that they be given an increase of ten cents an hour." If he were on the national war labour board and hearing a case where no strike threatened, he would give them two cents an hour, as was given the maintenance of way employees some little time ago.

Mr. PROBE: If that applied to judges it would be considered dictatorship.

Mr. MacINNIS: A judge who appeared before the committee yesterday accused union leaders of this country of being dictators.

The CHAIRMAN: The report of that committee is not before us.

Mr. MacINNIS: I did not say it was.

The CHAIRMAN: It should not be discussed until it has been received in the house.

Mr. MacINNIS: As I said, when the minister was introducing the resolution he said that the salaries being paid at this time were fixed in 1920. I imagine that there were more lawyers in the house than there are now, as the salaries were fixed at a generous rate. Hon. members will remember what this country went through from 1920 to 1946. While millions of people were depressed in poverty, while a million and a half were receiving relief, these judges continued to have a standard of living that is considered a good one even to-day.

Mr. FERGUSON: For their services.

Mr. MacINNIS: Of course, for their services. I am not saying anything against their services. But they are not giving any more service than any other citizen of this country. If there were some real criterion by which to judge the ability of these men when they are appointed, we could judge better of the services given, but a great many of them were appointed because they failed to win a seat in an election. In British Columbia, so far as I can see, the road to a judgeship is defeat in an election. The hon. member for Vancouver South defeated a lawyer in the 1935 election—and not only a lawyer; he was also a Liberal. When he was a lawyer—I cannot speak of him as a judge—I do not think he was blessed with an overabundance of grey matter. But he was made a judge. In 1940 my hon. friend defeated another lawyer, and he also was made a judge. That is the general pattern across the country. So that before we begin talking about the services they are giving to the people we should think about their ability to give that service. I have a high regard for the great majority of the judges of this country. But I do say that they are well paid, whichever way you look at it, and exceptionally well paid when you compare them with the generality of people who must come before them in the courts. I have not time to go into that, but I should very much like to do so and to show what is the real basis of crime not only in this country but in every other. The real basis of crime lies in poverty, in misery, in lack of education and lack of the social amenities which people must have before they can live rational lives.

Let me refer for a moment to the incomes on which taxes are paid, which in the last analysis must be taken as the criterion of the income that people receive. I have figures here taken from the Financial Post of May 4 of this year which show the number of persons in the various income tax brackets in 1945 and 1944. The figures show that 70 per cent of the income tax payers in 1945 and 1944 were in the categories from $660 to $2,000. This was before the proposed increased exemption. The figures showed that 90 per cent of all the income tax payers had incomes of $3,000 or less. So that all the judges in this country, even the lowest paid judge are in the upper 10 per cent of income tax payers. Surely persons in such a position are not being dealt with hardly by the people of this country. As a matter of fact they are in a very favourable position. I do not think I need take up the time of the committee by reading all these figures, but I would again ask the committee to consider carefully what we do in this matter.

I do not want to raise again what we did here last session in relation to members' indemnities, but I warned the house on that occasion of what the consequences would be; and let me say that in every application for an increase in wages that has been made since then, the increase in our own indemnities has been brought forward as a justification, and the justification is properly made. So, I would advise hon. members not to do the same sort of thing again and drive still further apart the people in the low income brackets and the people in the high income brackets in this country.

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is any topic which comes before the house that arouses more violence in expression of opinion than that of the judiciary. Perhaps one should make an exception, as to the source of these expressions of opinion, of the province from which I have the privilege of coming, and of the provinces to the east.

I listened the other day to the remarks of the hon. member for Cariboo and of the hon. member for Weyburn, and I listened this morning to the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver East. Some of the time-honoured sneers at the legal profession creep from time to time into a debate of this kind. Possibly this debate, so far as it has been participated in by members who do not believe in the judiciary in the form in which we have it, has been freer from them than most.

Mr. MacINNIS: I hope the hon. gentleman is not referring to anything I said, because I do not think that any member of this group, and I include myself, has any exception to take to the form under which the courts and the judiciary operate in this country. I would not have that impression left, not even by my hon. friend, whom I regard so highly.

Mr. HACKETT: No. I was going to point out—and I am sorry that my hon. friend's duties take him away—that he and those associated with him do not believe in the form of government which has developed this type of institution, and I shall attempt in the remarks that I am about to make, with calm and fairness I hope, to show that the point of view which has found expression by them is part of a philosophy which would entirely do away with the form of government which we have and with many of the institutions which uphold it.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: When the hon. member says "form of government", will he be more explicit and tell us what he means? Does he mean the existing political parties, or does he mean the democratic system? I want to be clear on what I am being accused of.

Mr. HACKETT: I am not accusing anybody and if the hon. gentleman will listen to what I have to say—I am not asking him to agree with me—I think he will have no difficulty in finding an answer to his question. I am attempting to point out that theirs is a type of prejudice, a point of view, which is entirely subversive of our form of government and of the institutions upon which it rests.

I listened with great interest to what the hon. member for Vancouver East had to say a little while ago. He argues that judges are overpaid; he invites the government to withdraw legislation which would increase the salaries of judges, and he gives as his reason that there are many people in this land who are in want. He read the letter of a woman whose husband is seventy-six and who, being sixty-nine herself, is not entitled to an old age pension, as a justification for his own point of view. The fundamental difference is this. The hon. gentleman represents a socialistic group who would invest all activities in one agency and make the state the general administrator of everything, including justice.

Mr. BRYCE: That is not true.

Mr. HACKETT: Now we come to the system which obtains here, and which obtains in other countries of free enterprise. It is based upon private enterprise and upon competition, which brings to the top, whether it be in commerce or whether it be in the professions, the people who possess the greatest skills.

Mr. McKAY: That is not true of the judges always.

Mr. HACKETT: The hon. member for Weyburn says that is not true of the judges.

Mr. McKAY: I said it was not always true of judges.

Mr. HACKETT: I listened very carefully to what the hon. member for Weyburn had to say the other day about the judges, about "political" judges, and the appointment of judges by political parties. I assure him that, respectable as is his opinion, and I do not begrudge him the right to any opinion he may hold, it would be more weighty did it rest upon experience. I tell the hon. gentleman that my whole life has been spent in the courts; it has been spent in the courts of a province in which my party has been unfortunate for many years. I suppose that ninety-nine per cent of the judges before whom I have appeared in the last forty years have been appointees of political opponents, and never once—never once, and I have practised in every court of that province—have I felt that I was the victim of political prejudice.

The hon. gentleman suggested that it might be better if our judges were selected by learned societies. I am not sure whether he mentioned universities; he did mention the law societies.

Mr. McKAY: I said "recommended", not "selected".

Mr. HACKETT: And he even went so far as to say that he would preclude from the high judicial office anybody who had ever been soiled—

Mr. McKAY: I did not use the word "soiled".

Mr. HACKETT: —anybody who had ever held a representative position such as a member of this house; and I will add, as my own interpretation of what he said, anybody who had ever been scarred or soiled by public confidence; he would make that person unworthy of high judicial office.

May I tell the hon. gentleman that most men who come to this house possess something which most men do not have. They have something which begets confidence and trust; and while they are fulfilling that office of representing their people they are brought into close association with the wants, needs and the longings of the people. I make bold to say, Mr. Chairman, that the man who has been the representative of the people in some great deliberative assembly such as this, or in a legislature of a province, has given proof of the qualities which in part fit him for the duties of the judiciary and has had an experience which makes him highly acceptable and highly fitted for that office.

I offer the suggestion—it is my own, no one else is responsible for it—that the judge whom I most fear is the learned gentleman who is absolutely certain he could not err, who has had no experience of public affairs, who does not know the frailties and the foibles of the people, who does not know that truth does not always abide where the uninitiated believe it does. I believe that one of the great qualifications for the bench is a knowledge of the human heart which is acquired from close association with the whole gamut of our population. I do not wish to be disagreeable to the hon. member for Weyburn, but I say to him that, had his experience been mine, I think he would have been less critical of the method of appointment of our judiciary. I should like him to recall that in no land in the world does the judiciary stand higher, in no place in the world and at no time in the world is essential justice, as admitted by all, more perfectly administered than in Britain; and there, be it said, their judges, high and low, are political appointees.

The hon. gentleman desired or suggested that judges be appointed by learned societies. Well, the members of learned societies belong to political parties, and I am not sure that we would escape from this bane or blight, if it be such, by accepting their recommendations.

I should like to refer for a moment to the idea of promotion. It has been thought highly improper that there should be promotion on the bench. It is not desirable that the judge who is entrusted with that which we hold dearest—fame, family and fortune—should be subject to the baneful influence of opportunity to better his own position. The judge is given a status which is his for life, not to be improved or altered. That, I believe, is a principle which has been accepted.

I now wish to turn to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mr. IRVINE: Before the hon. member does that, may I ask a question?

Mr. HACKETT: Yes.

Mr. IRVINE: He made reference to the appointments of judges in Britain, and said that they were political. Would he mind describing how these appointments are made? —because I was under the impression that they were not entirely political.

Mr. HACKETT: They are entirely political; they are made by the representative of the party in power. There they have an enlightened large and able bar which makes able men available for judicial duties at all times, no matter what party is in power. I shall make an exception, which my hon. friend knows. When the Labour party came into power they had to go beyond their own party precincts, as it were, to find a lord chancellor. That was an accident. They got an excellent man who felt that he could accept the office from them, but his also was a political appointment.

The argument of the hon. member for Vancouver East is an expression of his own political philosophy; eloquently and cogently stated, I admit. It is a statement of the doctrine of making everybody equally poor, which is a denial of the system which obtains here, namely, private initiative and competition. His is a socialistic system, a class system. Nobody must emerge ahead of anybody else. Everybody must be on a dead level of competence—or incompetence.

An hon. MEMBER: Be fair.

Mr. HACKETT: I wish to be fair. I would ask the hon. gentleman to name some country in which his system of government obtains in which the judicial system is comparable for fairness to our own.

Let us go into another realm. Under our system, persons who are competent are sought. Persons who are competent get the largest return for their knowledge and skill. If an hon. member were slightly ill he would go to his family doctor, but if he were smitten with some unknown or exceedingly malignant disease he would hie himself to the specialist, to the man whose skill and study and natural endowment have lifted him in earnings and status above the ordinary run of his profession. He would do that because he wants to live; he goes to the one who can give him the best chance of retaining life and regaining strength and health. The same principle applies in another field. We want the best men for judges. I will admit that there would be no dearth of judges were the salaries diminished by one-third instead of being increased by one-third. The minister might diminish the annual salary to $2,000 and there would be no dearth of judges, but they would not be men of eminence in the science of law. They would not be men capable of rendering justice in a way which would command the respect and confidence of litigants.

Until men become more altruistic than they are now there are positions which will be filled by competent incumbents to the extent that the remuneration paid is comparable to what the incumbent could earn elsewhere. Let us go into another realm. I have heard hon. gentlemen sitting to my left—among whom, strange as it may seem, I have a number of very good friends—advocate better pay for school teachers, and I have applauded them. Why? Because the pay that you give to a job determines its social importance. I do not say that remuneration is the only factor, no; but I say in our day and generation it is the principal factor.

Mr. McKAY: School teaching has not been a very good job in the past, then.

Mr. HACKETT: If a school teacher receives $5,000 a year the chances that he is an excellent teacher are better than if he receives $500. The same is true of the judges. Somebody has said that everybody wants to be a judge. Again that was the pronouncement of one whose experience in the matter is not, according to his own admission, vast. The men who are best equipped for judicial office cannot be had unless the office be paid something approaching the equivalent of what the recipient could earn in other fields. We have to accept that. It is a fact. To-day the judicial office has gone begging for good men. Oh, there are multitudes who are willing to serve. I admit that, but the best men are not available at present salaries, and we need the best men.

Institutions are of slow growth. Our whole development depends upon our institutions and upon their integrity. Unless we can attract to these institutions the best men that the nation can find, those of us who believe in them—and I know that some of my friends to the left do not believe in them—are not discharging our full duty.

I commend the minister for having increased the salaries of the judges. I believe it is the proper thing to do. But, the measure as a whole is not entirely free from criticism. I suggest to the minister that the increase should be made immediately, and for more than one reason. In the first place there are a number of judges who are aged, and who at the present time are not as capable of useful work as they were some time ago. Naturally these men will remain in office until the salaries now proposed become effective, as they may have a bearing upon their retiring allowance. That is human. That is something we can all understand. I believe the increase should be made effective immediately. In other fields, in labour unions, people are striking for higher salaries, and frequently the increases are made retroactive. In this case because the judges cannot or do not or will not strike, we are postponing for six months the date on which their salaries shall be raised. I do not think that is a good reason.

There is another reason. This is a part of my self-imposed task which I dislike, but I intend to go on with it. I have spoken several times about the misuse of judges. I spoke of it as the head of the bar association in my own part of the world; I have spoken of it two or three times here, in very moderate language. I feel that with the possible exception of the church, the judiciary is the greatest institution of Canada; that upon it we rely entirely for the reign of law and order which in these days it is so important to maintain. I believe the salaries of the judges should be increased immediately so they might be free to refuse, to their own honour and dignity, the belittling tasks which the government has been allotting to them in the last few years. I am going to be very direct. We are talking about making the Supreme Court of Canada the court of final arbitrament for all Canadians. I am not debating whether that is wise or unwise; there is before the privy council at the present time an appeal which will determine whether or not the dominion has the right to make the supreme court the final court of appeal in this land.

Here I must say in sorrow, not in anger, that the high repute of that great court has been seriously damaged by referring to some of its members, whom individually I do not blame because an invitation from the government is almost tantamount to a command, political problems for solution during the last several years. I say that the two honourable gentlemen whose names appear at the bottom of a report recently laid on the table of the house undertook duties which have exposed them to great criticism; and I may say to you, Mr. Chairman, that although we may not discuss in this chamber what is going on elsewhere, the newspapers tell us of an outburst of a judge yesterday against labour unions. I know nothing of the merits of the issue. I will not say that such a statement was not competent to a person acting as he was, as an arbitrator, but I say it was highly improper that a judge of a court of justice should be put in a position making it necessary or possible for him to make such an utterance. How is any labour man or any labour union going to feel when appearing in a court presided over by that honourable gentleman? I am not criticizing him; I am criticizing the government. I am not criticizing the Minister of Justice, who is only one member of the government; I am criticizing the government for undermining a fundamental institution in an effort to solve its own political difficulties. The government is not solving its difficulties; it is merely concealing them under the mantle of dignity and confidence which the bench has worn until now.

I know that in this bill there are sections which make it possible for the government to allocate problems of this kind to the judiciary. I know that bar societies will object to them. I know that the judiciary and members of the judiciary are being criticized as never before for partisanship. I know the judiciary is suffering, that the institution itself is suffering as a result of these practices; and I pray the government to desist from undermining the bench by referring to members of the judiciary questions highly tinged with politics, questions which are beyond and outside the ambit of judicial function and which are drawing into the dust and dirt of the political arena those whom we have liked to believe were above and beyond such controversies.

I shall read again for the benefit of the house a passage which I read to the commons on June 21, when I was quoting from a statement of Lord Esher, whom all lawyers know was a man of highest repute in judicial circles in England. Referring to the judiciary, and to a single judge who had departed from the high traditions of the bench, he said:

> Their education and training made them impartial and determined to do what was right in any question that came before them. This, indeed, was so well known and recognized, and when the judges of England acted within the scope of their ordinary duty, nobody ever attempted to suggest that they were not impartial. At the present time, however, they knew that one of the judges had been asked to go beyond the scope of his ordinary duty, and he, for one, was surprised and sorry that the judge in question had consented to do so. The result was inevitable. That judge had been fiercely accused already of partiality or of want of desire to do justice.

I say to the Minister of Justice, give to the judges an increase in salary; give it to them immediately, that they may protect their own virtue even if the government is not as solicitous of it as it should be.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I hope what I have to say will not be taken as any criticism or disrespect of the judiciary or the legal profession, because I want to make it clear that I have the most profound respect for both. Some of the innuendos thrown out by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, however, cannot be allowed to go unchallenged. He said, for example, that the underlying philosophy of this group, the group to his left, was to do away with the present form of government. I attempted to find out just what he meant when he spoke of the present form of government in this country, because I think it is a matter of great importance to distinguish between the political parties as they exist at present and the form of government as such. I was not successful in getting an answer, though I listened carefully and with interest to what the hon. member had to say. However, I imagine he must have meant by the present form of government the democratic form of government, and that the institutions to which he referred are the existing democratic institutions.

I think it should be made clear that no one in this group attacks the democratic form of government. I do not think it is fair in a discussion of this kind—which, as I realize, has strayed from the bill—to give talks upon political philosophy and to misinterpret it in order to suit the argument of the moment. If I were so inclined I believe I could make attacks and offer arguments to show that the political philosophy in which my hon. friend believes is opposed to the best interests of this country. But this is not the place to do it.

I believe it should be put on record that even though we in this group might be opposed to the present government, or to that which preceded it, when it comes to a fundamental form of government we are a democratic party. We have not attacked and are not attacking our institutions as such, and any criticism which we may offer of this bill arises out of our belief that its provisions are not in the best interests of the great majority of the people of Canada. While this may be a matter of argument, and I shall not dwell upon it, I think we should be given credit for sincerity and earnestness when we bring our views forward, and should not be accused of entering into a conspiracy to upset the form of government or to be subversive in any way.

Coming more closely to the matter under discussion, may I say I was intrigued by the statement of the hon. member for Stanstead that the free enterprise system brings the best or the most able people to the top; and he used that as an argument to show that under the present system our judiciary should be paid more. It seemed to be the trend of his argument that we have to pay for value received. If that were sound I would say he had scored a point. But it is not always correct to take it that way, because it seems to me it is putting the whole question on a mercenary basis. It takes away from his main argument a good deal of its validity—the argument that the judiciary are persons of sincerity who sacrifice themselves in order to render a service to their country. I do not think people will refuse to sacrifice themselves or their own well-being if it is not in their financial interest to do so. It is a bit of a contradiction to say that, although that is the way the hon. member's argument has developed.

The first part of the hon. gentleman's argument was an attack upon anyone who attempted to criticize the judiciary, but before he concluded he objected to judges getting into what he called the "dust and dirt" of the political arena. Well, if the hon. member has not a greater regard for the political institutions of this country which I contend are part of our democratic system, how can he justify his view that the judges should be political appointees? How can those who spend their time in the "dust and dirt", as the hon. member described it, be competent to appoint persons to the highest and most respected offices in the country?

I do not wish to prolong the discussion, and shall refer to only one more point. The hon. member challenged the house to show where in any other country with a form of government which he described as socialistic there is a judiciary appointed in the same way as it is in this country, namely by political appointment. Then, answering the question himself, he referred to Great Britain and said that it has the most highly respected judiciary in the world, a statement with which I am inclined to agree. It so happens that at the present time there is in power in Great Britain a Labour government which, although this is subject to argument, is being called a socialist government. Accepting that fact, I believe it is proof that it is not the political party in power which is at issue, but rather the form of government. I suggest it proves what I started out to say, that even though in Great Britain to-day there is in office a political party which is opposed to practically everything the capitalistic parties have been doing, and is attempting to make what it believes to be proper changes, the democratic system is being maintained. The judiciary over there is not in question or under fire. The government has shown that it is willing and able to make changes in a peaceful democratic way. I suggest that it is a complete answer to the attack made by the hon. member.

Perhaps I should comment on his reference to school teachers, because I happened to be one of those unfortunate people.

Mr. HACKETT: Underpaid.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I am not weeping about it, from a personal point of view. But if in matters of salary we are to draw an analogy between school teachers and judges we are attempting something fantastic. If I were to present a schedule showing the average salaries paid to teachers across Canada, and indicate the responsibilities given to those teachers to bring up and to mould the coming generation, and probably to keep them from appearing before the judges, I am sure it would be realized that any attempt to draw an analogy between the two is just begging the question.

Mr. BRYCE: The hon. member who has just spoken must have seen my notes, because he has said many of the things I had intended to say. I should not like any hon. member or anyone outside the house to think that I am opposed to the judiciary. Some of them are among my personal friends. In fact I have many good friends among them, although they hold political views different from those I hold. I respect their views, and I hope they do the same for mine.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat referred to the political appointments in Great Britain, to which reference was first made by the hon. member for Stanstead. It will be noted that while they are political appointments, it is not always a process of appointing political friends.

Mr. HACKETT: If the hon. member would cite a few instances to bear out his argument, it would be helpful. I know very well that the gentlemen who are now in office do not appoint their political friends, and for the obvious reason which I gave.

Mr. BRYCE: I am at a disadvantage when I am asked that question.

Mr. HACKETT: Probably so.

Mr. BRYCE: I cannot give an answer off hand. But I have followed the political life of Great Britain since I was a young man. What I had wanted to do at this time was to go on record as being against this increase in salaries to judges at the present time. It seems far too much, and it is out of reason altogether when we have fishermen, farmers and workers who are clamouring for a few more cents an hour. I say to hon. members to my right that if they want to guard their reputations in the future, and if they are to contest another election, they will never come back if they now raise judges' salaries by one-third. The rank and file of Canada will be against them.

We heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce announce what will take place in two years' time—dollar wheat. I am not speaking as a lawyer, but as a farmer—and I would never attempt to speak as anything other than a dirt farmer from the prairies—when I say that when we got 38½ cents a bushel for our wheat the judges were getting the same salaries as they are getting to-day. The Minister of Trade and Commerce tells us that we are to get $1 a bushel for our wheat in three or four years' time. When that happens the judges will still be getting the same salaries. I do not want to take up the time of the committee, but I do appeal to the Minister of Justice to hoist this bill for a year and let us see where we are.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): If I understood the hon. member for Stanstead aright he left the impression that the hon. member for Vancouver East was opposed to the present salaries paid the members of the judiciary, and that he felt they were overpaid. I do not think the hon. member for Vancouver East made any reference to anyone being overpaid. He made a strong and impassioned appeal to the minister not to do this thing now. He gave his reasons, very ably, and I want to associate myself with everything he said.

The hon. member for Stanstead said that certain people were sneering at the profession of law. You do not have to be in this house to hear sneering things said about the law, but that does not mean that every lawyer is a shyster or a crook. Unfortunately there have been men in the profession who have brought down slurs upon that profession. At times sneers were due them, but they were not due to the group as a whole. I have the greatest respect for the profession and the work it has been trying to do, and I have also great respect for the judiciary of this country. I do not think I can be accused by anyone of having made any unseemly remarks about them.

I think the timing of this thing is altogether wrong. I do not think the members of the judiciary are suffering because of their present salaries. Hon. friends to my right have been accusing the government of extravagance. They have been saying that the government is not practising economy at a time when economy is demanded. They should be consistent. How can they justify the things they have said during the budget debate when they are all out to raise the salaries of judges? As the hon. member for Vancouver East has said, there is considerable unrest in this country at the present time. If the matter comes to a vote I shall certainly vote against the proposal to grant these increases.

Mr. FERGUSON: I have the utmost respect for the judiciary. It has been stated this morning that certain political lawyers have been appointed to the bench. I am sure they will make far better judges than if they had had no training as politicians. The mere fact that a man is a defeated candidate and is appointed to the bench does not detract from his ability.

Personally I feel that this bill should have been brought in after the old age pensions question had been settled. Surely this government must view with alarm the position of many old people who are forced to live on the pension they are receiving with prices as they are to-day. Surely this government must feel that it is far more important to provide for those who are too old to provide for themselves than it is to increase the salaries of judges. Therefore I am in favour of hoisting this bill until such time as we can conscientiously feel that people who must live on old age pensions are properly provided for having regard to the present cost of living. I feel confident that the judges of Canada would view the situation in almost the same light.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Persons who may be appointed.

Mr. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce): I take it from this section that there is no barrier to a county court judge being appointed to the supreme court. The eligibility seems to be that the person must have practised as a barrister or advocate for ten years.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is right.

Mr. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce): I had intended to say a few words on this section, but practically everything that I had to say has been said by hon. members who took advantage of section 1 to discuss the bill as a whole. I should like to refer to the remarks made by the hon. member for Weyburn. He suggested that county and district court judges might be appointed to the supreme court bench if they were qualified and showed talent in their position. In connection with the other recommendations made by the hon. member, may I say that I agree entirely with all that was said by the hon. member for Stanstead in answer to him.

I should have thought that the members of the C.C.F. group would have suggested that members of the legislatures and of parliament should go to the bench. If I recall the criticism of the judiciary by members of that group, it is that the law has become too rigid, that judges have become too fixed in their attitude toward mankind, that they tend to perpetuate the past rather than move into the future. I suggest that the answer to that criticism is to have on the bench persons who have the outlook of humanity, if you want to put it broadly. I think you are more likely to get such a man from an elected group than from any other section of the community. Without wishing to refer to our own judges in particular, I ask hon. members of the C.C.F. group to consider the late Mr. Justice Holmes of the United States supreme court. I think they will agree that he was the type of judge they would like to have, and I am sure that type of man is more likely to be found among those who are more closely in touch with public affairs than in any other group of lawyers.

So far as I know, no county court judge in Ontario has ever been appointed to the supreme court bench. Masters of the supreme court have been appointed to the supreme court bench, but it seems to be the practice that county court judges be not appointed. Perhaps what I am about to say comes close to infringing upon the duties of the governor in council, but I hope the minister will accept my comments as in no way doing that. I do not cast any reflection upon any supreme court judge, or upon any county court judge for that matter. I have considered the present situation, and I think it is our desire that we should have the best talent on our supreme court bench. We can draw from practising barristers, or we can draw from the county court bench. I am sure that most hon. members will agree that a county court judge who has shown good judgment and who has had experience in trying cases might conceivably make a better supreme court judge than a barrister who is brought in without any previous experience on the bench. Without arguing that it should be so, I am interested to know why the system has been carried on in the present fashion, because I say without any hesitation that I know county court judges who would make excellent judges of the supreme court bench.

In order to place before the house a few facts I went through the report of the inspector of legal offices in Ontario and, taking the decisions of the court of appeal in Ontario, I find this result. In all the cases which have reached the court of appeal in Ontario in a nine-year period, the decisions of the county court judges have been upheld slightly more frequently than the decisions of the supreme court judges. I do not say that that is an indication that the country court judges are better than the others. I merely place the facts before the committee as a statement of what is happening. In that nine-year period, from 1937 to 1945, there were 1,066 cases in which the court of appeal of Ontario dismissed or allowed an appeal from decision of supreme court judges. I do not want to say anything about the minor number of decisions which were varied or referred back. The result is that the appeal was allowed in thirty-four per cent of the cases. At the same time 902 decisions by county court judges were similarly dealt with by the court of appeal and the appeals were allowed in 33·5 per cent of the cases. So that there was slightly less than one per cent variation. In the nine-year period you would have thought that any real difference between the merits of the two classes would show up.

During four years of the same period in the supreme court of Canada only two cases reached that court from county judges and in both cases the decisions of the county court judges were upheld. At the same time the average of decisions of the supreme court judges of Ontario was running fifty per cent allowed and fifty per cent dismissed. On that basis alone I wonder if we could properly make a distinction between the relative merits of the judges. I know this may sound as if I am reflecting on supreme court judges, but I am not, as I said earlier. I do submit that county court judges as such because of their appointment should not be considered barred from appointment to the supreme court.

There has been a good deal said this morning and the other day about the intervention of politics on the bench, originating no doubt from the fact that the appointments are made by a political body. I only add this to what the hon. member for Stanstead has said. If the answer is made that county court judges should not be appointed to the supreme court bench because they might conceivably be considered in politics if at some future time they were appointed to a higher office: we find this situation in Ontario, that we do appoint supreme court judges to the court of appeal; we do appoint masters of the supreme court to the supreme court bench, and a master, as everyone knows, is or should be an expert in procedure and practice although he may have no trial experience of any kind and on that basis might not be as acceptable or efficient on the bench as a county court judge who has had long years of experience as a trial judge. The county court judge, if he is in politics in any way under our present system, becomes involved only in trying a case of a controverted election or the like, which seldom happens; whereas the supreme court judge, as the hon. member for Stanstead has argued this morning, is often appointed to commissions and the like which at least it can be argued have a political tinge. I do not agree with what the hon. member said on that point, but he did make the point. If the hon. member for Stanstead is correct, the county court judge in his tenure of office is more likely to be divorced from political questions than the supreme court judge.

I put these facts before the committee only by way of eliciting an explanation, not as to the discretion of the minister or of the governor in council, but one which will be satisfactory to me as to why we could not appoint to the supreme court bench a highly qualified county court judge if it were felt his efficiency and his merit were such that he could fill that appointment properly.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is no legal objection to a gentleman who has occupied a post on the county court bench being appointed to another court. As a matter of practice I understand that in certain of the provinces it has been done. My understanding is that so far with respect to Ontario it has not been felt that it would be proper to do it.

I am very glad to have on the record the remarks made by the hon. gentlemen. These are matters about which those who have taken responsibility for recommendations feel very deeply their responsibility to the public, and everything and anything that can help them in making the kind of recommendations that will redound to the high repute which the courts have enjoyed in this and any other country where they are organized on the British system is always very helpful.

I fully agree with much that the hon. member for Stanstead has said. I think that in the system of society that we have here, which is the outgrowth of the development of political liberty in Britain, nothing has been more beneficial in mundane affairs than the repute of the judges and the respect which the public has had for the administration of justice. The hon. member for Stanstead said that next to the church it was the thing that made for the greatest degree of political stability, and I fully agree with him in that regard. I do not think that there has been anything in the development of British institutions that has contributed more to that form of government of free men, by free men, for free men, than the high repute of those who administer justice. The whole system is founded upon the concept of justice, and unless the people can feel that justice is not merely a theory but a living thing that is contributing to their well-being, the system would not endure. It is for that reason it was felt that in our society it was necessary to make provision for an increase in the salaries that are paid.

As I said in introducing the resolution, this scale of salaries is still lower than those which prevail in any of the countries where justice is administered on our system. As pointed out by the hon. member for Stanstead, we have a competitive system of social intercourse which brings to higher levels certain individuals because of certain qualities they possess. Now that is true in the legal profession as it is in other walks of life, and it is felt, and it has always been felt down through the centuries, that it is necessary to get for the bench those who are at the top of the legal profession. In order to do that it is not necessary, and it would not be possible, and I would not recommend, that salaries be fixed to equal the scale of the professional earnings of those who reach the top. But I do feel it is necessary to have that scale such that you can appoint a man who has reached the top and he can continue to live as he lived before his appointment without having to provide out of his capital what is required for his annual expenditure. It is not possible to ask a man whose net earnings have been substantially more than will be provided by these salaries to accept a situation where he will not be able to continue to live in practically the same manner as he did before, and as he has accustomed his family to live. It may be that no one should acquire those expensive tastes, but it is only human nature that they do, and we have to take the situation as it in fact exists.

It is seventeen years since the matter was very carefully gone into by a committee of this house and since that theory was put before the committee and served as the foundation for a recommendation. The position taken then, in 1928, was that no one expected that the government of the country would fix salaries to equal the earnings of the leaders in the profession whom it would be desirable to have take positions on the bench, but that what was desirable and necessary was to provide them with enough to enable them to continue to make the expenditures for themselves and their families that they had been making theretofore. I have had more than one expression of regrets from gentlemen I approached to ask to go on the bench, and they have put it just in that way: "We do not want to be able to get from the salary what we earn, but we do want to be able to get enough to carry on. We are not disposed to change our way of living; we are not disposed to go from the premises we have occupied with our families for a long time, and the upkeep of which is expensive, into more modest surroundings." That is the situation which in fact has to be dealt with.

With respect to the suggestion that the act should be made effective right away, I have been discussing this for a long time with my colleagues, because I had been told early in 1929 that something just about like this was going to be done then. It did not get done then. I had been a member of the committee of the Canadian Bar Association, pressing for this, for a long time, and when I came here immediately gave it attention, but I realized that while there was this freezing order on wages and salaries it would not be the proper time to do it. But there has already been some relaxation, adjustments are being made in a number of places, and it was felt that if this were to take effect on the 1st of January 1947 it would not be at the head of the procession in the readjustments of incomes which are necessary and which are being made and will continue to be made.

For these reasons I cannot acquiesce in the suggestion of two or three hon. members that I withdraw the bill. I feel that I am discharging a responsibility which I have not only to the profession but the country in putting this bill before parliament and asking parliament to adopt it with the provision it will become operative on January 1, 1947.

As to one of the objections raised by the hon. member for Stanstead, it is being provided that the pensions which may be granted by the governor in council to judges who resign their functions can be granted on the new scale immediately after the bill receives royal assent; so that those elderly gentlemen who naturally have been waiting to see if this was to be done will not have to defer their own decisions until the 1st of January if the bill gets royal assent before the end or at the end of this session.

Mr. FULTON: I should like to associate myself with remarks made by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce, at least to the extent of supporting the principle that no judge should be appointed to an appellate court unless he has first served as a trial judge. That of course is not my view exclusively; it is held by many lawyers and judges to whom I have spoken. I do not want to discuss the whole matter at length. The minister has said that he is glad to have such remarks on the record, and I feel that it is something which should be on the record, because in my opinion a system of advancement of judges, if we want to call it that, would be something of the kind which normally is open to citizens in other vocations—that is, that a man should not take a higher office until he has had experience in a lower one.

Mr. HACKETT: The function is entirely different.

Mr. FULTON: The function is entirely different, as the hon. member has just remarked; nevertheless the fact remains that appellate courts hear cases coming from the lower courts, and that is why I suggest that at least some of the judges of the appellate courts should have had experience as trial judges and know the problems and difficulties which are encountered in the same or similar cases in the lower courts.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Might this clause be allowed to carry, so that we might get down to what the bill is really for? The next section begins to deal with increases in salaries.

Mr. FULTON: I might put a question, very briefly, to the minister under section 3. Is it the general practice, when appointments come to be made or vacancies exist, that the minister asks for or receives recommendations as to an appointee from the law societies of the various provinces or the law society of the province concerned?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The minister receives with gratification recommendations from all those who are in a position to make them. Two or three years ago I answered an inquiry from the law society of my hon. friend's province, telling them that of course we could not relieve ourselves from our responsibility with respect to the recommendations, but we would welcome such representations as they might wish to make and we should be glad to have them give the reasons for the representations so that they could receive careful consideration.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. IRVINE: I should like to ask a question of the minister. I take it that we are still on section 3. What does the minister regard as the outstanding qualifications which a judge should have? Do they justify the limitation of the appointments to barristers? I should like to call to the attention of the minister the statement made by the hon. member for Stanstead, that one of the greatest qualifications of a judge was the knowledge of the human heart. Can barristers be said to have a monopoly of the knowledge of the human heart?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Since it is one o'clock I shall have to answer the question on another occasion; I could not do it in three seconds.

Mr. BRYCE: Are we to continue with this measure this afternoon?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. I suggest that progress be reported. After royal assent at three o'clock it is proposed that we go on with the budget resolutions. This measure will have to stand until some progress has been made with them.

Section stands.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

DOMINION SUCCESSION DUTY ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Dominion Succession Duty Act and to provide:

1. That rates of tax upon or in respect of any succession upon the death of a person after December 31, 1946, shall be twice the rates presently in force and that the tax paid to the government of any province in respect of the same succession be allowed as a deduction from the tax payable under the Dominion Succession Duty Act up to but not exceeding one-half of the tax otherwise payable under the said act.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Acting Minister of Finance): This resolution proposes two things: first, that existing dominion succession duty rates be doubled; second, that a credit be allowed against the double dominion rates of the duty paid to the provincial governments of one-half the dominion rate. Generally speaking, provincial duties are higher than dominion duties, and generally speaking, the doubling of rates with the credit of provincial taxes does not add to the weight of the succession duties in Canada. Under the offer to the provincial governments it is expected that some agreeing provinces may give up succession duties. In such province the dominion tax will be the only tax left. If therefore the present dominion rates were enforced with no provincial tax in force, the level of succession duties in such province would only be about half what it would be in the rest of Canada, where the provinces were still in the field. Under the proposed offer the double dominion rates will apply, which will mean a level of succession duty generally equivalent to that in force where the provinces still remain in the field, because in the latter case the provincial tax will be allowed as a credit up to one-half the dominion rates.

Mr. HACKETT: At the present time the dominion makes no allowance to the estate of the deceased for any succession duty which the province may collect, that is correct, is it not?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. HACKETT: The suggested amendment is that succession duties exigible by the dominion be doubled. The remarks of the minister were susceptible of the interpretation that credits would be allowed only to an agreeing province.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not realize it was susceptible of that interpretation.

Mr. HACKETT: I do not wish to debate the question. If the minister can assure me that provinces, whether they become adhering provinces or not, are entitled to the credit, all right.

Mr. ABBOTT: I can give that assurance without any hesitation.

Mr. GREEN: Has consideration been given to the case where succession duty is payable under dominion law and not under provincial law?

Mr. ABBOTT: Consideration has not been given. Of course, as my hon. friend knows, there is succession duty payable under the laws of all provinces at the present time.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. GREEN: It is not just that simple. Take British Columbia. In certain cases there is no succession duty payable on an estate which is taxable under the Dominion Succession Duty Act.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. GREEN: As I read the resolution, it means that the dominion tax is doubled without there being any chance of a set-off.

Mr. ABBOTT: I understand my hon. friend is correct in that statement; but the amounts involved, of course, are very small.

Mr. GREEN: They may not be; they may be quite large. For example, I think our province allows $25,000 exemption for insurance over and above the $20,000 exemption for an ordinary estate, in the case of a wife. That might mean a very big increase in this dominion succession duty, if the estate is one coming within that category. Is it not a fact that unless the provincial succession duty is at least half the new dominion succession duty, the result of this legislation will be to penalize estates?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is correct that if the provincial succession duty were less than the present dominion rate there would be a somewhat higher tax payable in such a province.

Mr. GREEN: That condition will not be changed, even though there should be an agreement with the province?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: In how many of the provinces does this legislation mean an increase in the succession duty payable by people in that province?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that it is not possible for me to give an answer in terms of provinces. There may be individual cases in a province where there might be a slight increase owing to peculiarities in the rate structure, differences in exempted limits, or, for instance, assets which are taxable under the dominion succession duty law and not taxable under the provincial law. Broadly speaking, however, I am informed that in most of the provinces it works out that the average rate of succession duty is equal to or greater than the dominion duties.

Mr. GREEN: Is it not the broad intention of this legislation that where the dominion is going exclusively into the succession duty field in a province, the tax is to be doubled, and where the dominion is not going exclusively into the field in a province, in other words where the province is not giving up its succession duty rights, the dominion is not going to increase the burden on the residents of that province? Yet under this provision you are increasing the burden on the residents of British Columbia.

Mr. ABBOTT: I can agree with the first part of my hon. friend's contention, but not with the latter part. The intention of this proposed legislation is to establish a rate of succession duty which, as the resolution indicates, is double the present dominion rate. As I say, on average the provincial rates are equal to or greater than the dominion rates, so accepting that as true, on average the proposed provision, with the credit allowance, will mean that the vast majority of estates in all provinces will not pay greater duties. It may well be that in British Columbia, because of special tax laws in that province, there will be some cases in which as a result of this proposed legislation the total amount of succession duties payable will be increased. I agree that this may be the case.

Mr. GREEN: I do not ask the minister to give some consideration to that, because I do not think it fair that people in certain provinces should be penalized in that way. For us in British Columbia it means that in many cases the succession duty is to be increased while in the other provinces it is not; and I do not think that is a fair way for the dominion government to legislate. You should have the same rule for the whole of Canada; you should not bring in legislation which affects one part of the country in a different way from that in which it affects people in the other parts.

Mr. ABBOTT: We believe we have the same rule for all parts of Canada, but I shall take note of my hon. friend's statement and perhaps we can discuss the matter further when the legislation is before the house.

Mr. HACKETT: The burden of this tax will depend, as I see it, upon the extent to which any province relies upon succession duties as a principal source of revenue. If a province on the prairies derives a very small amount from succession duties this enactment will affect it in one way; but a province like Quebec, which if I am correctly informed has the highest effective rate of succession duty of all the provinces, will be prejudicially affected by it. It can only get a rebate of a relatively small fraction of its duty. Does that not follow?

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Bonner Larose, Esquire, Acting Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Honour, the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the house went up to the Senate.

And having returned.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the house that the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the royal assent to the following bills:

An act respecting the Marking of Articles containing Gold, Silver or Platinum.

An act to amend the Royal Canadian Air Force Act.

An act to amend the Department of Transport Stores Act.

An act to amend the Soldier Settlement Act.

An act respecting Canadian National Railways and the Acquisition of the Manitoba Railway.

An act respecting benefits for persons who served in the Women's Royal Naval Services and the South African Military Nursing Service.

An act to amend the Railway Act.

An act to incorporate Prescott and Ogdensburg Bridge Company.

An act to amend the Yukon Placer Mining Act.

An Act to amend the Research Council Act.

An Act respecting the operation of Government Companies.

An Act to incorporate Cooperative Life Insurance Company.

An act to consolidate and amend the Acts relating to La Societe des Artisans Canadiens-Francais.

An act to amend the Food and Drugs Act.

An act to amend the House of Commons Act.

An act to amend the Public Printing and Stationery Act.

An act to amend The Quebec Boundaries Extension Act, 1912.

An act to amend the Public Printing and Stationery Act. (Advances to the King's Printer.)

An act to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

An act to amend the Criminal Code.

An act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1947.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DOMINION SUCCESSION DUTY ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Dominion Succession Duty Act and to provide:

1. That rates of tax upon or in respect of any succession upon the death of a person after December 31, 1946, shall be twice the rates presently in force and that the tax paid to the government of any province in respect of the same succession be allowed as a deduction from the tax payable under the Dominion Succession Duty Act up to but not exceeding one-half of the tax otherwise payable under the said act.

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. member for Stanstead had just asked a question, and I am not sure that I remember it exactly; if I am wrong he will correct me. In a province in which the succession duty rate is as high or higher than the present dominion rate, this legislation will not increase the liability of the taxpayer. That is obvious because he is entitled to deduct up to fifty per cent of the dominion rate. In cases where the provincial rate is 50 per cent or greater, then a little exercise in mathematics will show that there is no increased liability. In the province in which there are no succession duties, or where the duties are up to one-half the present dominion rates, then unquestionably the tax liability of estates would be increased when this law comes into effect over the present combined dominion and provincial rate.

Mr. HACKETT: I do not want to review or revive the controversy that we had earlier in the session, but it seems to me that in a province like Quebec, which derives a substantial revenue from succession duties, a heavy burden will be placed upon the people if there is failure to retire from the field of succession duties. That is what prompted my question.

Mr. ABBOTT: The burden is not greater; it will remain exactly the same.

Mr. HACKETT: The burden which was assumed is an incident of the war. Quebec is now asked to retreat from the field which has yielded a very substantial proportion of the income of that province. I will not say there has been a threat, but if a province is wilful and continues in the exercise of its constitutional right to collect succession duty it will suffer as compared with the more submissive province that yields up its right to that tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, I should not think so; I think the result would be just the opposite. I think it would continue to be in exactly the same position. The more submissive province which yields up its right to levy on the taxpayer in that province will continue to be in approximately the same position. The only difference will be that the province referred to by my hon. friend as the submissive province will receive the succession duties through arrangement with the dominion instead of collecting succession duties directly through its own succession duties department. That is the only difference I can see.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): When the minister says a province will receive the succession duties through the dominion does he mean it will receive a sum by reason of its having given up that duty, or does he mean it will in fact receive the succession duties collected for it by the dominion?

Mr. ABBOTT: The province will have rented its right to collect succession duties and will be paid a sum in lieu of that right, as well as of others.

Mr. HACKETT: Could the minister give the figures which would show the present duties exigible, say on an estate of $50,000, where a man leaves a widow and two children, breaking it up into dominion and province of Quebec rates?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not the figures for a man leaving a widow and two children, but where a man leaves a widow with an estate of $50,000 the present dominion tax would be $1,470 and the provincial tax would be $2,000. The combined tax is $3,470, and under the proposed legislation there will be no change in the total reported.

Mr. HACKETT: Could the minister give the same information for Ontario?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not happen to have it on $50,000 for Ontario, but I have it for $60,000.

Mr. HACKETT: Take $60,000, and give it also for Quebec.

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, for some reason or another they have not $60,000 for Quebec.

Mr. HACKETT: Have you some figure common to all the provinces which will help?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have given $50,000, so perhaps I had better stick to that. I have already given it for Quebec. In Ontario the provincial tax is $1,438 compared with $2,000 in Quebec; the dominion tax is $1,470, and the total tax $2,908. No change under the proposed legislation.

Mr. GREEN: There would be, I think, a slight increase there, where the Ontario duty is a little lower than the dominion.

Mr. ABBOTT: In that case, I am informed, there would be perhaps $12 or $14 difference, the Ontario duty being somewhat less than the dominion duty—actually, $32 less. If my hon. friend is interested in comparative figures I will put them all on. All this is contained in the volume entitled "Succession Duties", a reference book to the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction, table 2, page 24.

Mr. HACKETT: I am grateful for the information, but would the minister put on record the position with regard to a person dying and leaving to a widow $50,000 in Saskatchewan, for instance?

Mr. ABBOTT: On $50,000 in Saskatchewan the provincial tax is $1,375, the dominion $1,470, a total tax of $2,845. There would be a small increase in that bracket—a difference of $95, I am informed—in Saskatchewan.

Mr. HACKETT: And Prince Edward Island?

Mr. ABBOTT: Prince Edward Island: provincial tax $3,750, dominion tax $1,470, a combined tax of $5,220. No change.

Mr. BROOKS: What is New Brunswick?

Mr. ABBOTT: New Brunswick: provincial tax $2,200, dominion tax $1,470, total $3,670. No change.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Would the minister give the figures for Manitoba?

Mr. ABBOTT: Manitoba: provincial tax $1,725, dominion tax $1,470. No change. I have given the figures for Ontario. Alberta: provincial tax $1,800, dominion tax $1,470, total $3,270. No change. British Columbia: provincial tax $563, dominion tax $1,470, total tax $2,033. Increased tax, $907.

Mr. GREEN: You see, Mr. Chairman, that shows the unfairness of this provision so far as British Columbia is concerned; it is highway robbery.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend seems to have a sympathetic audience behind him.

Mr. GREEN: I would refer the Acting Minister of Finance to the budget speech, Hansard, page 2910, where the Minister of Finance used these words:

> . . . the general burden of the combined dominion and provincial succession duties in those provinces which continue to levy succession duties will be the same as at present.

In other words, he gave the assurance that if a province did not come into this agreement the citizens of that province would not have to pay increased succession duties by reason of the change in the Dominion Succession Duty Act. Yet you have this change brought in by the government, which, in the case the minister has just mentioned, makes a difference of $900, double the amount of the provincial tax. I suggest that that situation could be met by inserting a proviso to the effect that succession duty levied by the dominion under this doubling of succession duty tax is not to be increased in a non-agreeing province; in other words, that there is to be no increase in succession duty in a non-agreeing province.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will take a note of my hon. friend's representation. He will observe that the minister in the statement said, the "general burden of the combined dominion and provincial succession duties." It varies, depending on the bracket and the rate.

Mr. GREEN: But as I read that statement of the Minister of Finance it meant that the citizen of a province that did not agree was not to be discriminated against by reason of this change in the dominion succession duty law and he would not have to pay any increased tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no distinction between provinces that agree and disagree so far as tax treatments are concerned.

Mr. GREEN: There is, in that very statement. It refers to provinces which do not agree.

Mr. HACKETT: Is that a complete statement?

Mr. ABBOTT: I make that as a positive statement: there is no distinction made between provinces which agree and which disagree so far as tax credit is concerned.

Mr. HACKETT: There is no complete agreement between the different provinces, and you find overlapping and double succession duty as between the provinces. A man who dies in Montreal owns stocks which are on a register in Edmonton, and Alberta collects duty on an asset which is subject to duty in Quebec. Now under the agreement which is held out that would disappear; it is an added enticement, possibly, to kneel down and adore.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not accept the phrase money.

Mr. HACKETT: Yes, kneel down and save money.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not accept the phrase, "kneel down."

Mr. HACKETT: Kneel down at that price. But I think the minister will admit that to that extent his statement was not all-embracing. I think that that does constitute an exception to the broad statement which he has made.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Can the minister indicate what the increased revenue would be to the dominion? As I see it, the only place in which the dominion will get anything additional as the matter stands is in provinces where the tax is less than the dominion tax. That is, where the tax is equal to the dominion tax the dominion doubles the tax and takes half of it off. How much more will the dominion get? I am puzzled to understand why this legislation was introduced at all. Is there specifically a benefit to the dominion treasury, or is there some other point of which I am not aware?

Mr. ABBOTT: The figure of course would have to be based on the past year, because one cannot tell what the rates will be in the future. Assuming the number of deaths and the value of estates to be the same as last year, the total collectible by the dominion would be double, but it would have to give credit up to fifty per cent of its tax for the tax paid in the particular province in which the deceased was resident. I am advised by the deputy minister that the net result would be about the same, assuming that no province entered into the suggested agreement.

Mr. MACDONNELL: (Muskoka-Ontario) When you say "the net result would be the same" you mean the dominion would get about the same as it does now?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That is what I rather guessed. Then why this change in the legislation? Is it not a long way round to get to the same place?

Mr. ABBOTT: If a province agreed and went out of the succession duty field, in that province there would be only half the rate in force as compared with the other provinces, and one purpose of this is to endeavour to achieve reasonable equality of succession duty rates throughout Canada.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am not sure that I follow the minister when he says half the rate. Does that mean that the dominion rate is so much less than the provincial rate that even doubling the dominion rate means that there will be only half as much as before?

Mr. ABBOTT: Let us say that the dominion rate on an estate to-day would produce $1,500 and the provincial rate $1,500, or a total of $3,000. That is the present tax liability of the estate of a deceased, let us say, in the province of Quebec. The province of Quebec decides to come into the agreement and goes out of the succession duty field. If then the rate were not doubled the result would be that in the province of Quebec the succession duty liability would be restricted to $1,500, the dominion rate, whereas in Ontario, which for the purposes of our argument we will assume has the same rate of tax, an estate of the same size would continue to pay $3,000.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That does not answer my question. That is supposing a state of affairs to exist which does not exist at all. As I see it, the dominion is putting into one pocket exactly what it takes out of the other. In other words by doubling the tax you are not going to alter the situation. There must be some other reason for this. If you are not going to get any more money, what are you getting?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I cannot follow my hon. friend's argument.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister said in answer to me a moment ago that the dominion government was going to get virtually the same sum by doubling the tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: I qualified that; I said, "if" none of the provinces came into this agreement. If some come in, the dominion will obviously get more, and to those provinces the dominion will have to make the payments provided for in the agreement. If all the provinces come in, the dominion will get approximately double what it is getting to-day. If only some come in, it will get less than double.

Mr. GREEN: Is there not another way of getting around the difficulty for a province that is in the position of British Columbia? Could you not say that there shall be no doubling of dominion succession duty except in a province which agrees to give up the levying of succession duty taxes?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have promised to give consideration to the representations my hon. friend has made on that point. I should like to think them over.

Mr. HACKETT: A province that is relying upon succession duties for a big proportion of its revenue is more seriously affected by this proposal than a province that is not relying upon succession duties to the same extent. For instance, where the duty on an estate of a given amount under Quebec law is $2,000, under British Columbia law the payment is only $500. So by yielding up succession duty Quebec suffers much more than does British Columbia or does any other province which has a low succession duty. Is that not a fact?

Mr. ABBOTT: Not necessarily, because British Columbia may be relying for its total revenue on other types of taxation.

Mr. HACKETT: Yes, on other types which are not taken over by the federal government.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that that is the case. It may be that British Columbia is getting a larger revenue from personal income tax and certain corporation taxes than was Quebec. As a matter of fact I think it does get a very much greater revenue from those sources. There is a quid pro quo all along the line.

Mr. HACKETT: In so far as the issues are before us, British Columbia would be in a much better position by yielding up succession duties than Quebec or Ontario would be.

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot agree.

Mr. HACKETT: On the estate that I referred to British Columbia would yield up but $500, whereas on an estate of an equal amount the province of Quebec would yield up $2,000.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is only one element in the revenues which the provinces are yielding.

Mr. HACKETT: The others are personal income and corporation tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: Gasoline tax and the rest.

Mr. HACKETT: There you get into a field where there was not complete understanding. The minister based his offer on the three taxes just mentioned, personal income, corporation tax and succession duties.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Let me ask this question. Will the minister agree to these two propositions? First of all, having regard to the provinces that are likely to be adhering provinces, to use the minister's term, and to the amount of income which they have raised from succession duty, the amount which the dominion is likely to get by doubling this tax is comparatively trivial. Second, would not this provision be a very strong deterrent to a province raising a substantial amount of succession duty from increasing its succession duty rate any further?

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course it is obvious that if a province is now levying a rate higher than the present dominion rate, this would be no deterrent because they are up already to the dominion rate. It may be a deterrent to increasing rates still further.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That was my question. Would it not be a strong deterrent to a province increasing its rate? I want to be clear on that.

Mr. ABBOTT: My answer is, no more than there is to-day. If it is 56 per cent to-day, there is a deterrent to raising it to 60 per cent. If they raised it to 60 per cent there would still be a credit up to half of the dominion tax.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If the province should raise its rate the rebate is half of the dominion tax, not half of its own.

Resolution agreed to.

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Chairman, I should like to go back to resolution 12 of the Income War Tax Act.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

12. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years, the provisions exempting the income of certain cooperative companies and associations be repealed and that for the 1946 and subsequent taxation years provision be made that there may be deducted from a taxpayer's income the aggregate of the payments made,

(a) in the taxation year or within six months thereafter to his customers of the taxation year; and

(b) in the taxation year to his customers of a previous taxation year after the 1941 taxation year and not previously deducted under paragraph (a)

in respect of specified allocations in proportion to patronage for the said years the prospect of which was held forth

(c) by the statute or bylaws under which the taxpayer carries on business or by his contracts with his customers, or

(d) by the taxpayer in a specified manner prior to the commencement of the taxation year except that portion of such payments as would if deducted leave the taxpayer with an income less than an amount determined by deducting from three per cent of the capital employed in the business, including therein borrowed moneys, the interest paid by the taxpayer on borrowed moneys and deductible as an expense in computing his income.

Mr. ABBOTT: This resolution and succeeding resolutions up to No. 15 deal, broadly speaking, with the taxation of cooperatives. As hon. members are no doubt aware, numerous representations have been made by cooperative organizations regarding the budget proposals as they affect their operations. The government has considered these representations carefully, for it is anxious that the tax laws should not only be fair and equitable but workable. This, as hon. members are aware, is an extremely difficult and contentious field of taxation, and I doubt whether any legislation can be framed which will please everyone concerned. The best that can be hoped for is a reasonably equitable plan which preserves equity between various forms of enterprise. The government felt that the best way to arrive at this equitable plan was to appoint a representative commission to hear evidence and to bring in a report. This it did in 1944, and may I remind hon. members that this commission included a member nominated by the Cooperative Union of Canada, a member nominated by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, two impartial and highly regarded economists, and a judge. I do not think anyone could accuse this commission either of bias or of lack of competence.

To a very large degree the government has adhered to the commission's report. The report is not necessarily the final word on the subject, but unless the government is to take the view that the commission was incompetent or biased, I think it has every reason for giving the recommendations a fair trial.

Some of the representations received have, in effect, urged the government to reject the commission's main line of approach and enact legislation giving special exemptions to cooperatives generally. These could not be accepted. A number of representations have been made, however, which the government is able to accept without a major change of policy or without departing too far from the commission's recommendations. Two of these suggestions necessitate amendments to the resolution, and in a few moments I shall ask one of my colleagues to make the necessary motion. For example, certain cooperatives have pointed out that it is physically impossible for them to pay out patronage dividends within six months after the end of their fiscal years. Accordingly it is proposed to allow twelve months for such distributions. Certain other cooperatives find that the limitation with respect to payment of patronage dividends for years earlier than 1942 presents difficulties. This limitation was originally inserted because until 1941 very few cooperatives paid any tax whatever and were therefore free of tax on patronage dividends allocated but not paid. To give exemptions when these amounts are paid out would therefore result in a double benefit to the taxpayer. However, in view of alleged discrimination between cooperatives, some of which operate on a five-year revolving fund and some of which finance themselves out of a fund which revolves over a period longer than five years, the limitation is being withdrawn.

These are relatively minor changes. More important is the question whether patronage dividends should be deductible if paid at a different rate to members than to non-members. As my colleague the Minister of Finance pointed out, the government in framing its proposals on this point followed the recommendations of the McDougall commission. The commission was in unanimous agreement that patronage dividends should be paid equally to members and non-members. I am emphasizing this because the impression seems to have been created that by proposing this rule the government was attempting to make it difficult for cooperatives to grow and enlarge their membership. Nothing could be further from the truth. It is clear, however, that many cooperatives fear that the requirement of equal treatment for members and non-members would be prejudicial to their development. Since the government has no desire either to hamper the development of the cooperative movement or to appear to be hampering that development, it is willing to go a long way toward meeting this objection. In fact the government proposes to accept in principle a plan proposed by a great many of the cooperatives themselves. These cooperatives have suggested on many occasions that they should be free to make a distinction between members and non-members but should be required to pay tax on income derived from dealings with non-members. While this does not affect the resolution itself, which is in very general terms, I am taking this occasion to say that in the legislation founded on the resolution provision will be made whereby a cooperative which wishes to pay patronage dividends only to members, or at a lower rate to non-members, will be able to treat such patronage dividends as a deduction, provided that they pay tax on income arising from non-member business.

In order to anticipate any discussion there may be on the point, I should perhaps add that the proposed legislation will meet the case of certain cooperatives, such as the Alberta and Saskatchewan wheat pools, which wish to transfer certain outstanding obligations from inactive members to new and active members. Provision is already made, of course, for the continued operation of ordinary revolving funds.

So far as the resolutions affecting the future operation of the cooperatives are concerned, that is all. There is a question which has been raised by a number of hon. members in the course of the budget debate relating to what in my judgment has been inaccurately referred to as retroactive taxation. I refer, of course, to the assessments made against the western wheat pools for income tax during the years 1942 to 1945 inclusive. The committee will recall that in his budget speech the minister made an offer to the pools of settlement of these claims. Following the delivery of the budget speech the minister met the representatives of the pools and discussed the question with them. The members will recall that later the minister said that he had had this discussion, and that if it were felt by the pools that the proposed offer of settlement was not fair he was prepared to consider some further adjustment. Following the minister's departure I met the representatives of the pools on Monday. They submitted to me a counterproposal for settlement of these claims. That counter-proposal is now under consideration by the government, and I simply want to say I am confident that a settlement will be arrived at which will be satisfactory to all concerned, but which, I must emphasize, must be fair to all those, including the general public, who are affected. Other than that I do not wish to say anything more at the moment.

Mr. BRACKEN: I am not aware that I fully comprehend the changes in the government's programme which the minister has announced. I have in front of me the resolution which is before the committee, and that resolution, as I said in my address the other day, we do not regard as satisfactory.

Mr. ABBOTT: Before my friend proceeds with his remarks, will he allow me to have an amendment moved to resolution 12?

Mr. BRACKEN: I have an amendment of my own.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is the amendment to which I referred in my remarks.

Mr. BRACKEN: Perhaps the minister would permit me to make some observations and then we shall consider his proposal.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but in my statement I said I would ask one of my colleagues to move the amendment. I have indicated what the amendment is.

Mr. BRACKEN: I shall withhold my amendment, but perhaps I may be permitted to make some comments now.

Mr. ABBOTT: The amendment is a short and simple one, and I think in the interests of order it should be moved.

Mr. IRVINE: We ought to have it so that we shall know what changes have been proposed.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move:

That the word "six" appearing in paragraph (a) of resolution 12 be replaced by the word "twelve"; second, that the words "after the 1941 taxation year" appearing in paragraph (b) be deleted.

Mr. BRACKEN: As I read the resolution before us, Mr. Chairman, it has three objectionable features. In my address the other day I objected to the government's programme on four grounds; and on a fifth ground I said we would require further light from the government before determining what attitude to take. This resolution deals with three of the points upon which we took objection. The government's resolution provides for the exemption of patronage dividends only if they are paid in cash. We think there should not be any such limitation, and the amendment I shall propose, when it is in order to do so, is that these dividends may be paid in cash or its equivalent of any kind. The resolution also requires the compulsory payment of patronage dividends to non-members.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not now. It never did, as a matter of fact, but I have stated that the legislation will not include that.

Mr. BRACKEN: Your amendment does not deal with that.

Mr. ABBOTT: The resolution does not deal with it at all, as my hon. friend will see if he will look at it. I think the statement I made a moment ago has cleared that up.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister's speech did.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is quite right. In his budget speech the minister indicated that payment of patronage dividends would be compulsory to both members and non-members alike, which of course was the recommendation of the McDougall commission. The statement I have just made indicates that following representations which have been made, this will not be included in the legislation.

Mr. BRACKEN: I do not mind the minister interjecting these statements, but I am speaking of the resolution which is now before us, and I was coming to the changes he now tells us the government is going to make.

Mr. ABBOTT: No change in the resolution on that point.

Mr. BRACKEN: In my reading of the resolution you have changed it. Look at paragraph (c):

. . . by the statute or by-laws under which the taxpayer carries on business or by his contracts with his customers . . .

His customers are not all members; some are non-members. That term is used in another place as well; look at paragraph (a):

. . . in the taxation year or within six months thereafter to his customers of the taxation year . . .

His customers are not all members.

Mr. ABBOTT: It does not say "all his customers" in the legislation either.

Mr. BRACKEN: It says "to his customers".

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, but not to all his customers. Perhaps I should not interrupt my hon. friend, but I have made it as a statement of government policy. My hon. friend knows these resolutions are drawn up in general terms. It is perfectly true the minister stated in his budget speech that patronage dividends, in accordance with the report, were to be required to be made to all customers, and the legislation would have so provided had there not been the change I have just indicated.

Mr. BRACKEN: If the minister will permit me to say what I have to say, I shall come to what he said. This resolution is government policy. This was all we had before us until the minister rose five minutes ago. Objection had been taken to the government proposals. Now the minister comes along and says the government is going to change its plans, which we want to see him do. I am not trying to say he is not changing his plans. It is perfectly clear that the original intention of the government was to require that non-members be paid patronage dividends. Now the minister says they are not going to require that. I do not see that in the amendment he has proposed, but we will accept his statement on that point.

The third point as far as this main resolution is concerned is that it places a limitation on the exemption in the case of moneys expended by the organization in the purchase of the interest of members, only if that interest had been acquired after 1941. We say that limitation should be removed.

Mr. ABBOTT: I also stated that this has been taken out.

Mr. BRACKEN: I commend the minister for that change of policy too. I gather from what the minister has said that his amendments do not cover the point about the payment of patronage dividends in cash or in kind?

Mr. ABBOTT: In one case it does. I am told that where they want to transfer stock certificates or deductions from an inactive member to an active member, it will be covered by the legislation. I may say to my hon. friend that I am not an expert in the operation of cooperatives. I am sure he knows much more about them than I do, but I am informed that is what will be done.

Mr. BRACKEN: If that is correct the changed policies of the government go part way to meet our objections. But I want to see the legislation before I accept it fully. Since the minister's amendment has been before us only for the last few minutes, it is pretty hard to apprehend its full meaning. I do not see that the first part of the amendment changes the principle it deals with at all. It simply provides that the word "six" appearing in paragraph (a) be replaced by the word "twelve."

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. ABBOTT: That means they will have twelve months in which to pay a dividend, instead of six.

Mr. BRACKEN: It does not alter the principle.

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. BRACKEN: Then the amendment provides that the words "after the 1941 taxation year" appearing in paragraph (b) be deleted.

Mr. ABBOTT: That leaves it wide open as far as the year is concerned.

Mr. BRACKEN: If you will permit me to place my interpretation upon this particular point, you have accepted our suggestion with respect to it.

I should like to have the minister further elaborate the amendments he has now proposed, if he would, because to the extent that the objections I have raised are covered by the changed government policy, we shall accept them. To the extent that they are not fully covered we shall of course have to come along, either now or later, and do our best to see that they are covered.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think all my hon. friend's objections have been met, but perhaps when he has had an opportunity of reading the prepared statement I gave this afternoon he will be able to see whether or not that is so. If not, I appreciate that he will be free to renew his objections or his suggestions when the specific statutory measure is before the house and the committee.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I refrained from taking part in the budget debate chiefly because I wanted to feel justified in taking a little time to place my views before the committee on this very important question. When I gave way to the leader of the opposition a few minutes ago I hoped he would cover the subject so thoroughly that it would not be necessary for me to take very much time. I must confess that I was somehow disappointed in what I heard. The question which has been brought before the committee is one which requires looking into to a greater extent than simply changing the wording of the resolution, or the legislation which may follow. I say that because the whole question whether this government and future governments are going to take an appropriate attitude toward cooperative enterprise is at stake.

The resolution before us starts out by providing for the repeal of what are here described as certain provisions exempting the incomes of certain cooperative companies. It does not name those provisions, although I imagine the reference is to section 4 (p) of the statute.

It is significant that that section was not mentioned either in the resolution or in the remarks of the Acting Minister of Finance. It provides for the repeal of that section. What is proposed in its place? As I understand it, that is the only piece of legislation on the statute books which pertains to cooperatives as a whole. If it is taken off the statute books what is to be put in its place? What shall we be left with? That is my question.

I hope the Acting Minister of Finance will be able to tell us to-day, or in the near future, that he is bringing down, or that the government is contemplating bringing down, a dominion cooperative act, so that in the future cooperatives will have something to lean on, something to guide them and to show them when they are right or when they are wrong. Much of the controversy over this question in the last few years arose from the fact that there was nothing on the statute books definite enough to guide the cooperative movement. In fact had it not been for the indefiniteness of section 4 (p) it is possible we would not be considering these matters to-day. As I have said, if in the near future the government will bring down a dominion cooperatives act setting out clearly the definition of a cooperative, and making definite provisions in the tax law for cooperatives as such, we shall save ourselves a great deal of trouble.

When we examine closely resolution 12 we find it does not provide, nor does it contemplate providing, anything for cooperatives as such. It refers to certain companies and to taxpayers, but after section 4 (p) has been repealed there will be nothing to provide for cooperatives as such. In other words the effect of the whole thing, as I see it, will be to place cooperative enterprise in such a position that it will be drowned or immersed in private enterprise. There will be no cooperative enterprise recognized as such. The very fact that the section is to be repealed, and that the resolution as it stands to-day, even with the amendments, is so vague, shows that the government evidently has not taken into consideration the enacting of a dominion cooperatives act, which would be something upon which cooperatives could depend.

Passing on from there—

Mr. HACKETT: Before the hon. member passes on to another item, perhaps I may ask the minister if the dominion could enact such legislation, or if it is a matter falling within the jurisdiction of the provinces.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would find it difficult to give an answer offhand, but I shall give the matter consideration.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: If the question had been directed to me—and it would be strange if such an eminent lawyer asked a school teacher an opinion on a constitutional question—

Mr. HACKETT: I like to be sure.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: —I would answer in this way, that I think it is within the competence of the dominion government to pass a statute when the provinces are willing to pass concurrent legislation so as to make it legal in each province. The hon. member will be able to figure that out for himself while I pass on to something else.

Mr. SENN: I hesitate to ask the hon. member a question, but would he give us a definition of a "true cooperative"? There seems to be some difficulty in deciding just what a true cooperative is.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I am not prepared extemporaneously to give a definition of a true cooperative, because that is a question which seems to have stumped the experts. The McDougall commission did not in their report define a true cooperative. So that I shall not assume that responsibility to-day. I could direct the hon. member to a source. If he would get in touch with the Cooperative Union of Canada, they could give him a good definition.

Mr. SENN: I am afraid they do not agree either.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: That is a matter for argument. To go on with what I was about to say, may I point out that I have been informed that a cooperatives act of the kind I have indicated was promised by political parties in the past. I believe it was at the time of the 1911 election that the political parties which were national in scope held out such a promise. Evidently they must have felt it was a proper and constitutional thing to do.

Listening to the Minister of Finance in his second speech on the budget one would have gained the impression that it was the C.C.F. group which was kicking up all the row about the taxation of cooperatives. This is what the minister said at page 3591 of Hansard:

> Hon. members, particularly hon. members of the C.C.F. have taken a position that is surprising to me, that what we are proposing constitutes an attack on cooperatives.

Then, at page 3593 he returned to that subject and said:

I must say that we have tried to be so fair to cooperatives in this matter that I have been a little surprised at the fury of the attack of some members of the C.C.F. on our motives and on our acts in this regard.

I can hardly agree that there was fury in our attack. There may have been a little forceful language, but I do not think we exhibited actual fury. The point I would bring out is that what we have said in the house and what we are doing now is not something undertaken because we want to cause controversy. What we are trying to do is to reflect the feelings of cooperatives themselves. In order to establish that, I wish to read from advertising or a directive appearing in an issue of the Manitoba Cooperator of July 19, 1946. The heading in large letters is "Act Now", and it goes on to say:

The whole subject of budget proposals on the taxation of cooperatives is a serious matter. If strong action is not now taken it may be seriously regretted in the near future. Members of cooperative organizations have their opportunity now to stick together to protect themselves in the present crisis.

These are strong words.

It is a struggle to keep discriminatory and arbitrary legislation off the books. Let Ottawa know that you do not want this legislation. It is vicious. Act now.

This is not C.C.F. propaganda; this is the cooperator speaking. I could quote from various publications in the last few weeks in which it is indicated that the cooperatives have reacted violently to the proposals brought down in the budget.

Mr. ABBOTT: In fairness I think it should be said that I do not think they fully understood them.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I am glad the government has gone to the extent of offering the amendments placed before us to-day. They do not satisfy all the demands. They go part of the way. As a matter of fact I had an amendment drawn up which I would have presented had I been given an opportunity. If as time develops we find that the amendments now proposed are not what they appear to be, we may still have to present our amendment.

When the minister said in his speech that he was leaning over backward in order to be fair to the cooperatives there must have been something wrong somewhere. The cooperatives immediately and spontaneously rejected the proposal. In the brief time between the presentation of the budget and the present debate the government found it necessary to change its policy. I know the acting Minister of Finance tried to make it appear that it was not a change in fundamental policy, but—

[Mr. Zaplitny.]

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not try to give that impression at all. I said frankly that following the representations which had been made we had decided to make these changes. I think there is one change which is certainly fundamental in character from the findings of the McDougall commission report, that is the different treatment given to members and non-members. I do not want it said that I tried to make it appear that there was no change in policy.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Perhaps I was wrong, but that is the way it appeared to me. The acting minister apparently was not quite willing to accept the statement of the leader of the opposition that this was back-pedalling in policy.

Mr. ABBOTT: I never like such terms as back-pedalling. I am always willing to change my mind when I hear representations which convince me that they are well founded.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I congratulate the acting minister upon that attitude because I think that is the proper way to look at it. I think we should recall what were the objections of the cooperatives, in order that we may have a background upon which to decide whether the concessions made are sufficient to satisfy those objections. I should like to put on the record something which has been put on already in bits here and there. These are five objections to the proposals, made by the Manitoba federation of agriculture and cooperation, which I believe speaks at least for all the Manitoba cooperatives. From the telegrams and letters I have received from other provinces I think substantially the same objections have been taken there. I quote:

1. Proposals ignore basic differences between cooperative and private business.
2. They force cooperatives to treat members and non-members alike in respect to patronage dividends. This would eventually destroy cooperatives.
3. Proposals prevent cooperatives from providing service at cost by forcing them to pay tax on three per cent of employed capital.
4. They interfere with the right of the individual member to leave his earnings with his own cooperative by forcing payment in cash within six months.
5. The proposals provide that the minister may in his discretion discriminate between cooperatives in the matter of retroactive taxation with the result that cooperatives do not yet know their tax positions.

As I said, some of these objections have been overcome by the amendments, but taking the five objections as a whole I doubt whether if the cooperatives will acquiesce in what has been presented to-day. I do not think we should hold back on the demands that they have made. I should like to refer to one of the proposals which I think is ill-considered, that is the proposal to force—I do not know whether that word will be acceptable to the acting minister—the cooperatives to pay a profit of three per cent on the capital employed. I think I can establish what I have in mind.

Apart from the amount of money which will be involved, which I submit is a secondary consideration, the principle involved is that these cooperatives have organized on a cooperative basis; they have signified quite clearly that they do not believe in the opposite way of doing business, the private enterprise system. They organized their cooperatives to overcome the weaknesses in the other system and yet the government comes along and in effect says: You are going to become a good capitalist organization and like it. We are going to make you pay profits on the capital employed, or else you will be penalized for not doing it. This is a fundamental issue in this matter. Why should any government which prides itself on being a free enterprise government force any organization or any group of organizations to do business in a way in which they have signified they do not believe? The very fact that they have organized themselves into cooperatives shows that they have lost faith in the private enterprise system. Although this three per cent proposal is a small thing in itself, it serves to remind them that they are still living in a capitalist society and are to have capitalism shoved down their throats whether they like it or not. I object to that.

I believe there is room in a democratic society for all forms of enterprise. Whether we believe in one form or another is neither here nor there. At the present time there happens to be in office a government which believes in private enterprise. Well and good; but at the same time we are living in a free economy, and we should permit cooperative associations to do business in the way they wish without interfering with their internal arrangements by saying: You must pay so much on the capital employed. I take strong objection to that, and I hope the proposal will be withdrawn before this discussion is over. The government seems to have overlooked the economic and social values of the cooperative movement as a whole.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not at all.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: This is not altogether a question of dollars and cents; it is primarily a matter of principles and values. There are more values in society than dollars and cents. Earlier to-day we did hear something about how success can be measured, but I do not think it can be measured by the wealth accumulated. The cooperative movement in this country should be the pet of the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance told us the other day that there is still a great danger of inflation. It is in the interests of all who want to ward off inflation to promote the growth of the cooperative movement.

I should like to give some figures to show how the cooperative movement would help in preventing inflation. Inflation is not caused only by surplus money, although that erroneous impression has been left upon the minds of the people. They have been told that when they have too much money there is danger of inflation, but there is another factor that enters into the picture besides the surplus money over the amount of goods available. There is the urge to raise prices. You can have an abundance of money and a shortage of goods, but if there is no urge to raise the price of each unit you will not have inflation. Under the private enterprise system there is the urge to raise prices at every opportunty, because prices reflect income and profit. I am not saying that that is immoral, because at the present time it is probably the natural reaction under the economic system that is now operating; but there is that motive.

If goods are in short supply and money is plentiful, those who have goods to sell and who are in position to set the prices of the goods they sell will raise their prices as high as they can by letting people bid against each other in order to create an inflated price. But with a cooperative movement the situation is different. In a cooperative organization the customer is also the owner, and there is no motive for him to raise the price which he himself has to pay. The motive is service at cost. It does not matter what shortages there are or how plentiful money is; there is no incentive for a cooperative to raise prices against itself. For that reason the cooperative movement has a stabilizing effect on our economy.

Here are the figures I said I would give. In Sweden it is admitted that the cooperatives have risen to great heights. They have been effective in reducing the prices of the following commodities: The price of margarine has been reduced by 59·2 per cent; flour, in spite of the fact that the price of wheat went up, went down 11 per cent; rubber footwear, 58·8 per cent; linoleum, 15 per cent; electric light bulbs, 37 per cent; gasoline 55·4 per cent—it is too bad we did not have cooperation on the prairies last fall in the gasoline business when the price of gasoline was increased by two cents a gallon.

Mr. McCANN: Over what period did these decreases take place?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I have not the precise years. It was over a period of time. Silk fibre went down 50 per cent in price and superphosphates went down 15 per cent. That shows the effect which cooperatives can have on the whole economy if they organize to protect themselves from the high prices they would otherwise have to pay. I do not think the period has any particular bearing on this discussion, may I say in reply to the Minister of National Revenue. The fact that the cooperatives in Sweden have been able to reduce prices shows what a stabilizing effect they can have on the whole economy. For that reason I think the Minister of Finance should be very happy to do everything possible to promote the growth of cooperatives at this particular time.

Cooperatives have another economic value which is important, and that is in the prevention of the growth of monopolies and cartels. I have a clipping here from the Christian Science Monitor of July 17, 1946, in which certain figures which are illuminating are given in an editorial. It points out that fifty years ago there were 15,000 tobacco manufacturers; to-day there are less than 300. It goes on to say:

> At the turn of the century there were nearly 700 iron and steel manufacturers; now there are fewer than 300. Manufacturers of lumber and lumber products numbered 28,000; now there are fewer than 12,000.

That shows the effect which monopolies have had on private business. The editorial goes on to say:

> In another generation, unless the trend is reversed, there will be no opportunity for a businessman to enter any of the 100 or so basic industries in this country, except by the tolerance and patronage of the three or four companies controlling the entire industry.

If the government were to make a tax increase of two cents on the dollar everybody in the country would be up in arms, I am sure the minister will agree, but monopolies, through the very fact of controlling industries, can raise prices of commodities ten and fifteen per cent and, because we do not know just how and when it is done, we do nothing about it except complain. But the cooperatives do something about it. They do not just sit around and grouch. They organize themselves to give service at cost, and they prevent the growth of monopolies by giving the people of the community an opportunity to do business for themselves with themselves. That is an important function which the cooperative movement is performing.

[Mr. Zaplitny.]

I would urge those who express such great love for the free enterprise system, which to my mind began to die when capitalism was born, to do everything possible to preserve the cooperative movement and help it grow, because it is the surest way of giving everybody an opportunity to do business, whether it be called free enterprise or not. But if it gives everybody an equal opportunity and satisfies those who want free enterprise, I say they should support it.

I should like to quote from the Western Farm Leader, published in western Canada. In its issue of Friday, July 19, 1946, it gives some pretty strong advice to the government.

Mr. ABBOTT: We get lots of that.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: It says in an editorial:

> By their failure to take into account the special social significance of the cooperative movement, the proposals respecting the taxation of cooperatives made by Mr. Ilsley in his budget speech reveal the reactionary trend of government policy. These proposals, if enacted into law, would remove, in certain important respects, the differentiation between cooperatives and profit-making enterprises which those who recognize the social value of cooperation have always properly stressed.

That brings me to the next point, the social value of the cooperatives. I have pointed out their economic value. From the social angle everybody will admit that the cooperative movement has done more than any other single agency to bring people together. This country of ours, made up of so many types of people, has been suffering and to a degree is still suffering from national disunity. There have been prejudices and divisions which have tended to divide the people and set them against each other when they should have been working together. The cooperative movement has, in my experience and in the experience of others, tended to bring people together on a common ground on the basis of self-help and for the good of the community. People of various religious beliefs and racial origins have been able to get together and work for the common good in an organization such as their local cooperative. The value of that cannot be overemphasized. It has also the educational value of giving every member an opportunity to know something about his own business. We are often told in this house that we should not discuss certain matters because we know nothing about them. If that were to prevent members from speaking, this would be a silent chamber. I maintain that through the cooperatives people have learned more about their business and what makes the clock tick in our economic system than they could have learned in any other way, because they are the owners of the business, the customers, the management and everything else in their own organization. In that way they see every side of the question.

It has been asked, what is the attitude of labour on the taxation of cooperatives? There are, unfortunately those in Canada who would like to drive a wedge between organized labour and the organized farmer. Most of the cooperatives in this country are in the hands of organized farmers. I have checked the magazines and other publications of organized labour carefully, also the news letters they send out, and I find that almost invariably the labour unions of this country have come out in favour of the cooperative movement and are protesting against the budget proposals to tax cooperatives. That, to my mind, is heartening, because it shows that organized labour has recognized in its own way the value of the cooperative movement in Canada.

I would suggest to the government that if they want to save themselves a good deal of grief they should give an opportunity to the members of this house to study this question a little further and, if necessary, let the item stand over for another day. The committee should perhaps be given an opportunity to study the various amendments which have been prepared by different members. I understand that the leader of the opposition has an amendment and I have one myself, but we cannot move them so long as there is one before the committee. We cannot even discuss them because we would be out of order. I think it would be wise if these items were allowed to stand for further study in the light of all the proposed amendments rather than to try to carry on with just what the government has given us.

The last point I want to refer to is something which I do not particularly care to raise but which, under the circumstances, I am almost forced to mention. Listening the other day, and again to-day, to the leader of the opposition talking about the taxation of the cooperatives, I had to turn over in my mind and figure out just where the party which he leads actually stands on this question. I hope that he spoke for the whole group which he leads in this house, because it is commonly known that in the province of Manitoba the whole question of the taxation of cooperatives was started up and agitated by a gentleman who gives allegiance to the Progressive Conservative party and happens to be a Winnipeg member of the legislature. I refer, of course, to Mr. G. S. Thorvaldson. I am not saying that, just because he happens to be a Progressive Conservative; all Progressive Conservatives are of the same opinion. I say that in order to clarify the matter, in order to make sure where we stand on this question, the leader of the opposition in this house—or someone else, if he wants to delegate to him that unpleasant job—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Nothing unpleasant about it.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: —should rise in his place and make clear the position of the party in relation to the stand taken by Mr. Thorvaldson. We have seen what has been done in the newspapers in the way of advertisements; we know of the issue of thousands of cards, signed in some cases by men who were not at the addresses given, urging us to tax the cooperatives. All that stemmed from the agitation started by the income tax payers' association. I am not objecting to the existence of the income tax payers' association. That is their business. They may have certain legitimate activities. But I say this—and I want to be very clear and plain on it—that I deplore the activities of that organization and of its leader, G. S. Thorvaldson, and the role they have played on this question. I do not think they have been fair. They have published much material which is questionable. In order that we may feel that the opposition, on this side at least, is united on the question, someone in the Progressive Conservative ranks should rise to-day and repudiate the stand made by the gentleman to whom I have referred.

Mr. ABBOTT: May I say something in reply to the remarks made by the hon. member for Dauphin? I thank him for the objective and temperate presentation of his views; if he had not taken up the teaching profession he would have made a good lawyer.

I am not going to deal with the various points he has brought up concerning the desirability of cooperatives. Both the Minister of Finance and myself have tried to make it as clear as we could that the government is in favour of cooperatives and is not trying to discourage them; and on the last point he raised I think it is pretty obvious that we have not adopted the recommendations of the income tax payers' association.

The point I really want to make, however, is that it is difficult in drawing budget resolutions to be completely specific. The purpose of the resolutions is to indicate the broad principle which the legislation to follow is intended to provide for and to permit a general discussion on those matters. Thus, when the specific legislation is brought before the house on second reading there may be criticism, and votes against, if you will, on the principle, and when the bill is in committee there may be discussion of the specific provisions themselves. The leader of the opposition suggested to-day that when he saw the specific text which it is intended to put into the law it would, of course, be easier to discuss the particular points involved; and I think the same point was made by the hon. member for Dauphin. I just make that point because I do not want the committee to feel that, because the resolution is in pretty broad, general terms, it covers all the specific details which will be included in the legislation.

There is just one other point I want to deal with, which was raised by my hon. friend, and that is the question of this three per cent return on capital. I think the minister, in his address, tried to make it perfectly clear that this is not an attempt to force cooperatives to pay interest or dividends when they want to operate on some other basis. But a great many cooperatives do pay interest and pay dividends now; a great many cooperatives, probably all, have certain employed capital, and it was felt that the capital earns some reasonable return and that that, therefore, could not be looked upon as a return from patronage.

I do not know that I could put it any better than the minister did in his speech as reported in Hansard at page 2921.

After careful consideration, the government has, therefore, come to the conclusion that it should accept the commission's recommendation that patronage dividends and similar payments be treated as a deduction from income subject to one relatively minor limitation designed to avoid at least some of the discriminatory effects I have mentioned. The limitation is this: that no company or association shall be able to go so far in its distribution of tax-free patronage dividends as to reduce its taxable income below a reasonable return on capital employed in the business. This reasonable return will be defined as three per cent on the capital employed, including borrowed capital, less the interest paid by the company or association on borrowed capital that is allowed as an expense in the computation of the taxpayer's income. The principle underlying this rule is that amounts set aside out of taxable income to be distributed in proportion to patronage by a cooperative or company which does not pay at least three per cent on the capital employed in its business contain earnings which arise from the employment of capital and ought not to escape tax entirely. For many cooperatives which pay patronage dividends this modification of the commission's recommendation will have little or no effect, for they already recognize an obligation to pay interest or dividends equal to at least three per cent on capital or retain undistributed income on which tax will be payable. Share capital with a limited dividend and with limitation of voting to one share per member rather than one vote per share was a characteristic feature of the plan of organization of the Rochdale Equitable Pioneers Society, the real founders of the cooperative movement. Cooperatives of this character will usually be able to claim the full amount of their cash patronage dividends as a deductible allowance. Any cooperative which does not set aside as taxable reserves or pay as interest or dividends a total amount equal to three per cent of capital employed, will find itself subject to tax on a portion of the amount it had set aside out of its income to distribute on the basis of patronage.

Mr. FAIR: Might I ask the minister at this point, is this a recommendation of the commission?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, it is not a recommendation of the commission. As the minister pointed out in his speech and as I mentioned in my statement, in large measure the government has followed the recommendations of the commission, for obvious reasons, which I gave. The commission made a careful study of the whole question. But I do not think this matter was suggested to the commission. I cannot indicate what their views would have been had it been suggested; but I can hazard my view that, judging from the rest of the report, they would have seen the justice of it. My hon. friend is quite correct when he says that it was not recommended by the commission. On the other hand, the commission recommended that members and non-members would be treated the same, and that was the unanimous conclusion of the commission.

Mr. FAIR: Who suggested this three per cent proposition?

Mr. ABBOTT: That was suggested by the Minister of Finance and his advisers, and it was felt, as the minister said in the opening part of his statement, that it was "a minor limitation designed to avoid at least some of the discriminatory effects I have mentioned". The whole intent and purpose of the government is to arrive at a solution which is fair—fair to cooperatives and fair to those who, for reasons of their own, do not operate under a cooperative system, such as the local storekeeper, and so on.

All we tried to do was to be fair. As I said earlier, this is a complex question. I myself feel that we should proceed for a while by trial and error. In my judgment this is a decided step forward in the settlement of this vexed question. I agree with what the Minister of Finance said, that the findings of the commission and the legislation which is proposed constitute a real victory for the cooperative movement against those who may be opposed to it.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): What revenue does the government think will accrue to the treasury as a result of the taxation of three per cent?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told that it is impossible to estimate what it will be, but it is bound to be small.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): First of all, in view of the remarks of the hon. member for Dauphin about capitalists, may I say that every member of the wheat pools, about whom he chiefly spoke, is a capitalist. There is not a farmer in Canada who can be defined by the dictionary or the encyclopaedia as anything but a capitalist. We should be clear on that before we proceed any farther.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I was asked a while ago if I could define a cooperative. I now ask the hon. member if he can define a capitalist?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I have looked it up in the dictionary and I have the definition typed out. I carried it around with me for a year for such occasions as this, but I have not it with me now. I can assure the hon. member that it is anything but a socialist, and I am not one of these.

As a free enterpriser I may say that I agree in great part with what the hon. member for Dauphin said. He gave five objections which were put forward by the Manitoba pool. That is where he got them. His first objection was that the proposals ignore the basic differences between cooperative and private business. His second objection was that they force cooperatives to treat members and non-members alike with respect to patronage dividends, and he said that this would eventually destroy cooperatives. That was dealt with to-day by the Acting Minister of Finance. If I followed him correctly he said that provision is now being made in his department for differentiation between members and non-members, and that the non-members would be taxable. I think that clears up that objection.

Then there is still argument about the three per cent on the employed capital, and the minister has just made a statement on that. That was also mentioned in the objections of the hon. member for Dauphin. What the minister said about that matter to-day was confusing.

The fourth objection was that the proposals interfere with the right of the individual member to leave his earnings with his own cooperative by forcing payment in cash within six months. There should be an amendment to take care of that objection. An amendment was made to change that to twelve months. In my opinion that does not actually change the principle of the objection. The objection still remains.

The fifth objection is that the proposals provide that the minister may in his discretion discriminate between cooperatives in the matter of retroactive taxation with the result that cooperatives do not yet know their tax position. I raised objection to that when I spoke in the budget debate on July 10. The minister referred to the same objection to-day, and, as I understood him, he said that his department was now negotiating particularly with the three western pools to try to come to a satisfactory settlement on that point. I sincerely trust that that will be done, because that is an important objection so far as the wheat pools are concerned, and I am particularly interested in those organizations.

May I say that if we were not discussing the budget resolutions I should have moved an amendment to No. 5 in the following terms:

That patronage dividends paid or allocated for payment by the wheat pools or the united grain growers in years previous to 1946 be exempt from taxation.

I appreciate that the rules of the house do not permit me to move that amendment; it would not be in order because it deals with government revenues or expenditures.

Then there is another objection to the 1941 limitation. I do not think it should apply because there are many—

Mr. ABBOTT: It has been removed to-day by the amendment.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am glad to hear that. Mr. Chairman, you will understand that it is difficult to follow and discuss this matter intelligently because of the way things have developed in the last few days. The minister's department has certainly been working long hours with the officials of these cooperatives, and the cooperatives have been getting somewhere in the last few days. It is difficult for us in the committee to keep abreast of all that is taking place. In that respect I trust that the resolution will not pass to-day, but that it be allowed to stand.

The hon. member for Dauphin raised some other points in regard to who were the friends of the pools in Canada. If our memory goes back to the early thirties when the wheat pools in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta found themselves in great difficulty we shall remember that if there is one man in Canada more than another deserving of a little credit it is the hon. gentleman who was premier of Manitoba and is now the leader of the official opposition. At that time he led a delegation of the three provincial governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta to Ottawa, along with other delegations, and he was successful in negotiating satisfactory financial arrangements to save these pools.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): And the banks.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It is true that he had to work with the bankers and everybody else, but he had the courage and foresight to take action which saved these pools and cooperatives. I would not have mentioned this had it not been for the fact that the hon. member for Dauphin endeavoured to put some of us on the spot. If there is any one individual more than another in Canada deserving of credit it is the present leader of the opposition. History will accord him that credit.

As to what certain other hon. members may do, may I say that, living in a democracy as we are, we should respect the opinions of others. The president of the tax payers' association is a close friend of mine. We can be friends and be diametrically opposed to each other on certain matters. The fact that we are friends does not mean that we should agree on everything. Every individual should be given a chance to express his opinions and be listened to, but that does not necessarily tie us in with his opinions, politically or in any other way. The president of the tax payers' association should have the right to express his individual opinion. He is probably as conscientious about what he is doing as I am about what I am doing on behalf of the cooperatives and the pools. I hope that answer is satisfactory to the hon. member for Dauphin who raised the matter.

There is much more that I should like to say at this time, but because of what has happened in the last few days and even in the last hour I think we should allow the resolution to stand over, probably after some further discussion, until we find out exactly what has happened. I wish to express my disapproval on these five points as heartily as I can, which were, first of all, the outcome of the budget which was presented on June 27. I hope that everyone of these objections is resolved satisfactorily by the Acting Minister of Finance, since he is working on it to-day and has led us to believe that he is going to accomplish something.

Mr. ABBOTT: On the suggestion that we should allow the resolution to stand, may I say that if that were the decision of the committee I would be bound to accede to it; but I should like to say, as I said a moment ago, that on the points which my hon. friend wishes to see solved I believe that the discussion could be more effective with the bill before us. I really believe that the proposed amendments which are not covered in the resolution, but which I have said will be included in the bill, do meet most of the objections. We have a very heavy programme ahead of us. If we were dealing with second reading of the bill or in committee on a particular section I would, of course, accede at once and allow the section to stand to enable hon. members to study the detailed provision. But since there will be fullest opportunity both on second reading of the bill when the principle will be discussed—we are not settling the principle of the bill to-day—and when the bill is in committee on the particular sections to give effect to this legislation, I suggest that the committee, after full discussion along whatever lines it desires, general principles or otherwise, should allow the resolution to pass and reserve further discussion for the bill and for the committee stage. I am perhaps influenced to some extent by my own personal position. I have such a heavy programme ahead of me—this matter will have a great deal of discussion, because it is an important one—that I urge that the discussion could be carried on to greater advantage and to greater effect if it were done with the specific measure before the committee. I would ask the committee to consider that aspect and see whether, after a full discusson of broad principles to-day, they could allow the resolutions to pass and permit me to have the bill introduced as soon as possible.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): May I ask a question?

Mr. IRVINE: Not if I can help it; I am not going to sit down again unless the chairman orders me to. I would not mind agreeing to the suggestion of the minister if I knew exactly what was going to be in the bill. The fact is, however, that if any attention is paid by a government to what is said in parliament, then this is the time for us to tell the government what we think ought to be in the bill.

Mr. ABBOTT: I agree.

Mr. IRVINE: So that I hope we may be permitted at least to express our point of view. I did not speak on this question during the budget debate because, frankly speaking, I did not believe the government would go through with it. From my knowledge of the government and their ability to understand the temper of the Canadian people I felt perfectly certain that they would never carry this thing through. I hope they will not even carry it through to the extent they now indicate as their intention. As I now understand the situation, the government propose to amend their budget proposals in the following ways. First, instead of only six months being allowed in which to pay out patronage dividends without taxation, that period is extended to twelve months. I understand that is the first modification.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. IRVINE: The next is that non-members and members are not now to be compulsorily treated alike, but that any profits which may accrue to the organization because of the business done with non-members shall be taxed, which I think is a reasonable proposition. Further, if I understood the minister aright, the revolving fund is to be permitted to revolve without limitation.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. IRVINE: Those are really quite important modifications, and I want to congratulate the government upon having adopted them. I should like also to congratulate the leader of the opposition upon the part he has played in bringing the government to this viewpoint, because he did take a decided and courageous stand. I am glad to say this, because I do not want to take any kudos which properly should go to him or anyone else.

I am not speaking on this from the point of view of C.C.F. propaganda. I am speaking on it, first of all, because I am a believer in cooperation and am a member of cooperatives; and also because I have here a sheaf of long messages coming from a large number of organizations within the province of British Columbia asking me to present their viewpoint on these matters to this house. I am not going to weary hon. members by quoting these messages at length . They all oppose the things already abandoned by the government as well as the one particular thing that has not yet been abandoned to which I want to address myself in a few moments. However, I should like to mention where these protests come from. I have one here from the directors of the Dawson Creek cooperative union. I have another message from the British Columbia cooperative wholesale society; another from the associated growers of British Columbia; another from the fishermen's cooperative federation; another from the British Columbia cooperative union of Kelowna; another from the Fort St. John cooperative association; another from the president of the Beaver Lodge cooperative association; another from the British Columbia cooperative union of Vancouver; another from the Pemberton district cooperative association, and another from the secretary of the Cecil Lake cooperative organization. As I say, all these messages protest against the taxation of cooperatives and against some of the phases of the government proposals which the hon. gentleman who is now acting as Minister of Finance has indicated are being abandoned by the government. The proposal to tax cooperatives, however, still stands. I notice the velvety interpretation of the minister in respect to the provisions for a taxable amount equal to three per cent of the working capital of cooperatives; but, after all, it is still proposed to tax cooperatives. Am I right in that? If the minister says I am wrong—

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct, if they have an income.

Mr. IRVINE: The proposal is to tax cooperatives; and that proposal—

Mr. ABBOTT: Only if they have an income.

Mr. IRVINE: Naturally.

Mr. ABBOTT: And by "income" I mean taxable income.

Mr. IRVINE: Yes, if they have a taxable income; but the government proposal makes it certain that they will have a taxable income.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend, as I understood, admitted a moment ago that it was quite proper to tax a cooperative on income received from non-member business.

Mr. IRVINE: Yes.

Mr. ABBOTT: Therefore it is obvious that he admits a cooperative has some income.

Mr. IRVINE: If that were all I still would not want to make my speech, but I am afraid there is something more than that in it. I believe the government does intend to continue with the imposition of a tax on cooperatives. By so doing, they are going to affect vitally at least a million people in this country who are now directly concerned with cooperative enterprise in one or other of its activities. The cooperative movement in Canada has become in recent years a formidable movement indeed. To-day we have great fishermen's cooperatives on both the east and west coasts of this country. There are some splendid cooperatives among the farmers right across Canada; selling agencies dealing in all kinds of farm products, grain, live stock, dairy products and so forth. In Quebec we have some great cooperative organizations, credit unions and other cooperatives that are gradually developing, and then, last but not least, we have a great cooperative movement which engages in buying and selling general merchandise for its members, these cooperative stores which go right across this country and which render splendid service to their members and to the communities in which they are located.

My interest in this is not merely because so far it has been a successful movement, but because I recognize in the cooperative movement an alternative to that jungle type of competition which has been associated in history with industrial and civil strife, and with war. I think it is true to say that the challenge which comes to the world to-day is for us to learn to cooperate, else we must face the fear of perishing. In this connection I wish to quote one paragraph from the Western Farm Leader. The editorial is entitled, "Turn the Clock Back," and states:

> By their failure to take into account the special social significance of the cooperative movement the proposals respecting taxation of cooperatives made by Mr. Ilsley in his budget speech reveal the reactionary trend of government policy. These proposals if enacted into law would remove in certain important respects the differentiation between cooperatives and profit-making enterprises, which those who recognize the social value of cooperation have always properly stressed. The distinction has been clearly drawn in many lands. It is pretty late in the day for any government to deny it. That it should be denied is evidence of the very great influence wielded by the enemies of cooperation in high circles in our commercial life.

Incidentally, I would say that the main task which is facing our modern world to-day is to cultivate both the art and science of mutual help. That is the only alternative to the annihilation of the race. That annihilation is threatened through the continued practice of the art and science of competition.

The Canadian government professes, for example, to be anxious to consummate cooperative understanding between this nation and other nations of the world, with a view to world peace. Do we mean that? If we do, surely then it is unwise, to say the least, to propagate and maintain the art and science of competition in our domestic economy, while professing the very opposite ideology in international affairs.

If we continue to do that, we thus will be whitening the outside walls of the sepulchre, while we gather from the battlefield of competitive struggle in our domestic affairs the dry bones of greed and profit to be cherished as a national ideal.

The cooperative movement, despite the many almost insurmountable difficulties, has reached a point where it is now recognized as a real challenge to the ordinary type of enterprise which is conducted on the basis of competition. Because of that real challenge there has grown up in Canada what I am calling an anti-cooperative propaganda organization. That organization seeks at all times to undermine the foundations of the cooperative movement. That organization is supported by big business, and big business in supporting that organization is naturally out to protect its own particular private interests. That organization is known, as one of the speakers already has announced, as the income taxpayers' association.

Those of us in parliament know that association very well. We have been bombarded with its propaganda throughout this session. I have no hesitation in saying that its activities are behind the fact that the royal commission was called upon to find a way to tax cooperatives. That being so, it is certain that—

Mr. ABBOTT: That is not correct. I should not interrupt my hon. friend, but I cannot allow that statement to pass, that the royal commission was set up to find a way to tax cooperatives.

Mr. IRVINE: I hope I shall not convey to the minister anything that is unfair. It is not my intention to do that.

Mr. ABBOTT: I know that. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but I could not allow that statement to remain unchallenged.

Mr. IRVINE: I am not applying that particularly to the government. I was applying that to the intention of those who sought the royal commission in order that they might find a way to tax cooperatives. I believe that before I have finished I shall show that such is true.

It is pertinent, I believe, for us to discuss and to examine the reference submitted to that commission in this connection. Contrary to the general impression, the commission was not charged to inquire into the question as to whether or not cooperatives were legally taxable; that is to say, whether cooperatives as an entity had taxable income. Rather the commission was appointed and charged with the task of finding a way to tax cooperatives.

Here are the actual words of the reference in that regard. The commission was to—> . . . report all facts which appear to them pertinent for determining what would be in the public interest—

I think that should be in the private interest.

> —constitute a just, fair and equitable basis for the application of the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, to cooperatives.

In other words, they were to find some practical way of applying the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act to co-operatives.

Mr. ABBOTT: It could, of course, have suggested complete exemption. The reference was broad in its terms.

Mr. IRVINE: The complete exemption was already suggested and incorporated in the law.

Mr. ABBOTT: But it was not; that was the difficulty.

Mr. IRVINE: I should like to have discussed with the minister that little tricky word upon which the thing hinges, as to whether it is "like" or "unlike." But I am not going to take up the time of the committee in that discussion, although I think this is one of the most illuminating sections of the commission's report. At any rate, in my opinion the commission was appointed—I will put it in that way—to find the most inoffensive way possible of taxing cooperatives. Naturally the commission would be there to cushion some of the expected criticisms which would follow any such proposal.

I suggest that it would have been more in keeping with the nature of cooperatives, as well as evidence of more competent statesmanship in our time, had the commission been charged to report all facts which appeared to them pertinent for determining why co-operatives as non-profit seeking and non-profit making bodies should not be subject to any sort of profits tax whatsoever.

It is significant that neither the commission nor the minister defined "cooperative." A true cooperative has no profit; therefore it cannot be subject to profits tax. I say a true co-operative has no profits, and that is true, except in respect of non-member business, which is very difficult to avoid in some small degree if those who persist in remaining non-members will also persist in buying through the cooperatives. Of course the cooperatives want that business, and want those people to be members. If they become members they get all the share that the others get of the patronage dividends which accrue from their common cooperative effort.

It is possible, of course, for profit-making corporations to masquerade as cooperatives and thus try to escape the legitimate profits tax which they should bear. But that very fact is one of the main reasons why the commission should have defined definitely what a cooperative is.

Because of its failure really to investigate cooperatives, to see whether or not they had taxable income in the legal sense, the commission proceeded to ignore the very purpose for which cooperatives exist—and it said so. Quoting from page 9 of the report, we find:

> In our view the purpose or the alleged purpose of the association is irrelevant.

In other words, the commission ruled as being irrelevant the subject committed to them, which was at least the alleged reason for the commission's existence. The definition of "income" as set forth in the Income War Tax Act is quoted in such a way as to put private corporations which operate for a profit and cooperatives which operate to give service at cost on exactly the same footing. The commission's finding in this connection was:

> It is our unhesitating opinion that the association and its members as a result of the trading venture which they undertake do make a profit.

There is a vast difference between the opinion of the commission and the facts of the case. I would say at once that any association which makes a profit is not a cooperative to the extent that it does make a profit, and such an association should not be taxed on a profit basis like a private corporation. A true cooperative does not make a profit and therefore should not be taxable. Here is as simple and clear an example as I can give.

The head of a family spends $800 a year in buying groceries and general supplies for his family. He finds that a little too much and decides to join a cooperative in the hope that he will not have to pay out so much. At the end of a year, after joining the cooperative, he finds that he has still paid out $800 for groceries and supplies because the cooperative has sold at the same prices as anybody else. However, he finds that through his cooperative effort there is $100 coming to him as a patronage dividend. He has been buying goods from himself, so that $100 is not profits.

Mr. ABBOTT: The proposed legislation recognizes that.

Mr. IRVINE: As I shall show the minister in a minute it does not recognize it yet, but I hope it will before it is finally passed. To follow my example, the man paid into the cooperative out of his own income. It might be said that the $100 are savings from his cooperative transactions, but they cannot be regarded as being income either of his own or of the association in any intelligent sense of that term.

The members of a cooperative do not make their income from the cooperative; they spend their income in the cooperative, which is a great difference. Members of a co-operative make their incomes from farming, from fishing, or from whatever task they may perform or service they may render to the community. Their income does not come from the cooperative, it comes from the calling in which they spend their efforts. Farmers and fishermen receive their income from the farm products they produce and the fish they catch, and the workers' income is in the form of wages. All these people are subject to income tax on their personal income, and that personal income is the only income the cooperative knows anything about.

Strange as it may seem, this same royal commission found that patronage dividends, which, of course, represent the property of the individual members of the cooperative, which property the cooperative is obliged to return to the members and which is not taxable if paid out to the members within six months, were not taxable. However, the government now proposes legislation which will tax those dividends. It is the patronage dividends which will go to make up the three per cent of working capital, because there is no place else for it to come from. The commission says that those patronage dividends should not be taxable, but the government ignores that recommendation. I want the minister to centre his thought upon that point. The three per cent of working capital which will be the basis of the taxation of cooperatives must be made up of patronage dividends which, according to the commission's report, should not be taxable. I want to emphasize that to impose taxation in that way is to go contrary to the finding of the commission with respect to patronage dividends. This legislation is considering that portion of the individual members property which goes to make up the three per cent of the working capital of the cooperative, as profits, which it is not. It has only been lent for the moment to the cooperative by the individual member.

There are other features of the original budget provisions which are objectionable on several grounds. I think the minister has satisfied us that he is going to alter these things and I shall not comment upon them at the moment. I am assuming that the twelve months' provision in place of the six months will be lengthened ultimately, and that the revolving fund will be permitted to revolve as it should and as is necessary for the operation of the cooperatives. I shall leave all these and proceed to deal with the taxing of the three per cent. The minister has said that the government had no intention of taxing cooperatives.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not think he said that.

[Mr. Irvine.]

Mr. IRVINE: I meant to say that the minister indicated that the government had no intention to obstruct the development of cooperatives.

Mr. ABBOTT: Which is just the contrary.

Mr. IRVINE: The Minister of Finance made similar statements in his budget speech. He was quite emphatic about anyone thinking the government had any intention of harming the cooperatives. I would do as the royal commission did and rule that the minister's intentions were irrelevant because of the action taken by the government. That is the real answer, and their action shows their intention. Here is what the minister said, as reported at page 3592 of Hansard:

> The commission said that this rule should apply throughout, that any body corporate, co-operative or otherwise, which paid out on the basis of patronage to its members should be entitled to deduct that from its income for taxation purposes. In that way it has the appearance of fairness.
> The fact is, of course, that when you make a recommendation of that kind you are making a recommendation which benefits cooperatives but which really does not benefit to any substantial degree their competitors, private business. The great range of private business in Canada cannot practically pay out part of their profits on the basis of patronage.

So what the minister regards as fairness is to try to prevent the cooperatives from entirely swallowing up private enterprise.

Mr. ABBOTT: Why not?

Mr. IRVINE: Why keep the bally thing alive if it is not functioning in the best interests of the common people? If it cannot stand up and carry out its own philosophy in competing with cooperatives, it ought to go out of business.

Mr. ABBOTT: Compete on fair terms, yes.

Mr. IRVINE: What right has it to expect the protection of this house and parliament before it can function?

In order to show that we are not the only people who thought this would affect cooperatives, may I quote fairly extensively from the Financial Post of July 13 last. Here is what it says:

> Mushroom expansion of the big cooperatives at the expense of tax-paying private competitors and the federal treasury should be halted by the new budget proposals.

There is a lie in that and there is truth in it. It is true that the cooperatives have expanded in recent years in almost mushroom fashion. It is not true to say that they have expanded at the expense of tax-paying corporations, for the members of the cooperatives pay taxes just as well as the corporations do.

It goes on:

Through untaxed patronage dividends, co-operatives will still be able to return to members the big bulk of their profits, but from now on these profits will have to be paid back promptly as earned. Previously, as a rule, they were merely allocated to members, but actually held by the cooperative for buying out competitors and for working capital. Now, to qualify for tax exemption, they must be paid to members within a few months of being earned.

It goes on:

One of the main complaints of the sorely pressed private competitors of the cooperatives has been the enormous expansion of the latter through these untaxed and unpaid profits. While the great bulk of the private companies' profits were taken away in taxes, the untaxed co-ops enjoyed a tremendous double advantage. Not only were their profits exempt from taxation, but there was no hurry about returning them to members. Under an ingenious "revolving door" plan these profits were retained in the co-op treasury for varying periods up to seven years and usually at no interest.

That, thank heaven, is being removed. The writer goes on to tell with considerable glee that the cooperatives are going to be caught within another pair of pincers. He says:

Finance Minister Ilsley's new budget proposals, it is believed here, will end this era of free and almost unlimited capital for the co-ops and will permit private competitors, if they wish, to meet the competition of paying untaxed patronage dividends to grain and other shippers.

For the private company shareholders, not to be confused with patrons or shippers who get the patronage dividends, there is also a little comfort in Mr. Ilsley's new proposals. Private companies have complained that payment of unlimited tax-free patronage dividends would allow a cooperative to return every bit of profit to shippers and if they were forced to meet this competition, there would be nothing left for the shareholders who subscribed the original capital. In other words, cooperatives could operate at no profit and private companies would have to do the same or lose all the business.

Mr. Ilsley now stipulates that no company or association shall be able to go so far in its distribution of tax-free patronage dividends as to reduce its taxable income below a reasonable return on capital employed.

That is the point upon which all discussion must hinge from now on. The minister has wiped out all other objections, and this is the only one remaining. I am arguing now that this is the moment to wipe this one out, but if the minister would like to have another day or two to consider it, all right. But this is the one that should be wiped out, not that it would mean a very great deal in taxation at the moment, but I regard it as the thin end of the wedge which will raise the cooperative movement off its foundations and tend toward its collapse. This is the beginning. I suppose that this worthy tax payers' association which has been spending so much of its members' profits in trying to undermine the cooperatives in the last few years will be perfectly satisfied if it can get away with this much in the budget because it will represent the beginning.

Let me point out something to the minister which has perhaps escaped him. I want him to realize that the cooperative movement is not only a unit that operates in a community, but operates provincially and interprovincially. First, you have a local cooperative which serves the immediate community. That cooperative is affiliated with a provincial cooperative, and that provincial cooperative is affiliated with an interprovincial co-operative. Very well. Then as I understand this budget proposal, each one of them will have to set aside three per cent of its working capital and each one of them will be taxable. But it is likely that the capital would come from one source, largely from the local unit. They set aside three per cent of their capital and are taxed thirty per cent on that. Then it may be necessary to send that capital into the provincial organization, and the same demand is made there; again it is taxed another thirty per cent. Then the capital is sent to the interprovincial organization and taxed another thirty per cent. If this is not to be done I should like the minister to make that clear. If only one unit is to be taxed, the law would have to say which unit it is to be, or whether it is all three or none of them. As it stands now, each one of them is a cooperative, and each one of them must set aside a sum equal to three per cent of its capital, according to this proposal. Then it is taxable thirty per cent. It is true that the funds of the local unit have to be sent to its central provincial office to meet the demands there, and again it often has to be sent to the interprovincial office, so that it is important to have that point cleared up.

I have almost exhausted my time, Mr. Chairman. I shall have much more to say on this later, if the government does not consider the complete removal of this tax before it brings down its final legislation. I shall content myself now with pleading with the government to be as wise in consideration of the one remaining fragment of the proposal as it has been with respect to the others, and, if it is, not only will it do a great service to the cooperatives and thereby to this nation, it will indeed do a great service to itself.

Mr. QUELCH: I was absent from the chamber in a committee meeting at the time the minister made his proposals or the concessions which he has made, so that I am not any too sure of them, but I listened to the listing of them by the hon. member for Cariboo. It is perhaps a pity that the minister did not wait to make that statement until the end of the debate to-day, because a number of speeches had been prepared on the old formula. Therefore these members, had they made these speeches, would have been able to pat themselves on the back and feel that the concessions were made as a result of their representations. The minister has taken that joy away from them.

I want to make just a few remarks and ask one or two questions to clarify the budget resolutions in my own mind. I studied at some length the report of the royal commission; and, generally speaking, I thought the recommendations were sound and fair, fair both to the cooperative and to those people who consider themselves to be competitors of the cooperatives. The recommendations, I believe, generally speaking, received fair support from the cooperatives, at least far better support from the cooperatives than they did from the people who opposed them. I understand that the report was unanimous, and I think that is quite an achievement in view of the fact that one of the members of the commission was Mr. Arnason, who is, I understand, the deputy minister of cooperation in the government of Saskatchewan.

Whilst supporting, generally speaking, the recommendations of the royal commission, I did very much deplore the fact that the government had departed in several respects from the recommendations, and in every case where they had done so the departure was in favour of the opponents of the cooperatives rather than of the cooperatives themselves. I have received from my constituency quite a large number of telegrams, sent on behalf of several thousand people. The main points raised in these telegrams are as follows. First of all, they resented the fact that the government was proposing to treat members and non-members alike. I understand that that has been straightened out—

Mr. ABBOTT: Right.

Mr. QUELCH: —and that the amount of patronage dividends which would have been distributed to non-members will now be taxable. I think that is quite just, because it means that the members would profit on the business of non-members, to which I do not think anybody can take exception.

Then, they charge that the proposals are a serious threat to the expansion of cooperatives and will prevent the use of the revolving fund. Am I to understand that this has also been taken care of?

Mr. ABBOTT: Any net additions to the revolving fund are taxable, but the revolving fund continues to revolve.

Mr. QUELCH: Then, they protest the proposal to levy a tax on an amount equal to three per cent of the capital employed less interest thereon. I think that is, generally speaking, the provision, and I understand that that has not been wiped out. That, I think, is the main complaint, and I still cannot follow the minister's argument in trying to justify that being done, because, after all, this capital is the capital of the person who put it in; he paid income tax when he put it in, and he is going to pay income tax on any patronage dividends paid on that capital.

Mr. ABBOTT: No. If dividends are paid on that capital that can be set off against the three per cent, if my hon. friend understands me.

Mr. QUELCH: No. I am not talking about a cooperative having to pay an income tax on a patronage dividend; but the recipient of the patronage dividend will have to pay an income tax on that dividend if it is from a producer cooperative?

Mr. ABBOTT: Right.

Mr. QUELCH: If it is from a consumer cooperative he will not?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. QUELCH: No tax as far as the consumer cooperative is concerned?

Mr. ABBOTT: So I am advised.

Mr. QUELCH: The only justification for the three per cent tax will be where the three per cent on capital represents business done with non-members. I mean to say, if the amount of the patronage dividend due but not paid to non-members is equal to three per cent, I do not think there can be any objection, because they will have to pay a tax on the dividends which have been paid to non-members, and therefore, if the grand total of that equals three per cent on capital, there will be no objection to that three per cent being taken. In many cases however, the non-members will be so few that the amount of their patronage dividends will not be equal to three per cent of the capital employed, but if there are a large number of non-members the amount of the dividends would be, or might be, more than three per cent of the capital employed.

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course, if dividends are paid to non-members—there is no obligation to pay them—they may be deducted from the gross income in just the same way as patronage dividends declared to members. In the case of the three per cent to which my hon. friend is referring, it is based on the assumption that the capital employed in the business earns a reasonable return, and that that return is not derived, in the case of the producer cooperative from the marketing of the primary products; in the case of the consumer cooperative, from the purchases made by the members of the cooperatives; but that the capital employed has actually earned a reasonable return, which it is suggested here should be three per cent, and that that should be considered as taxable income if the organization has not paid the equivalent of that amount to either shareholders who have shares in the form of dividends, or to lenders who have lent them money at a rate sufficient to absorb interest equivalent to three per cent on capital employed. That is all the provision is intended to accomplish. I do not know whether I have made myself clear. I should have added—or if it retains reserves which are subject to tax equivalent to that amount.

At six o'clock the speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

GOLD MINING

STATEMENT OF ACTING MINISTER OF FINANCE WITH REGARD TO GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Acting Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent the minister may make a statement.

Mr. ABBOTT: With the permission of the house, I wish to make a statement on the subject of gold mining. Since the restoration of the Canadian dollar to parity with the United States dollar, various suggestions have been made in this house for government action on behalf of this industry and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and myself have received a number of suggestions and recommendations from persons and organizations outside the house. In this field where the possibilities of speculative profit or loss are so important we have so far, of course, given no indication or hint of what the government might do. However, I am now in a position to state the results of the government's consideration of the various suggestions which have been made and of others which have occurred to us, and I now wish to announce them in this public statement so that all may have an equal opportunity to learn about them at the same time.

It is the case that one effect of the government's action in altering the exchange rate is that Canadian gold producers will receive approximately $35 instead of approximately $38.50 per ounce, Canadian funds. The change in the exchange rate has, of course, other effects bearing on the position of this industry. For example, this action will help to keep the cost of mining gold in Canada from rising, just as our whole stabilization programme has been protecting us from an undue rise in costs and prices during the past five years. Indeed, as the minister pointed out in his statement of July 5, the alternative to changing the exchange rate was to allow economic forces to work out an increase in our price and cost structure, more or less to the United States level plus ten per cent.

Four types of action have been suggested and the government has naturally given the most careful consideration to all of them. To deal first with the simplest and least important suggestion, it has been pointed out that the mint is making a charge for handling and marketing gold that exceeds the mint's out-of-pocket costs of performing the service. After considering this matter, we have come to the conclusion that we can reasonably reduce our handling charge from thirty-five cents an ounce to twenty cents an ounce, and the necessary instructions are being given to the mint to do so without delay.

The second matter is much more important and difficult. We have been requested to grant export licences for gold freely in order to permit our gold producers, and perhaps others in Canada, to sell gold to other countries at prices above $35 an ounce, which is the standard price of gold for monetary purposes. It is claimed that there are persons in various countries—India, Egypt, Greece, Mexico, Cuba and Argentina have been mentioned—willing to pay substantially higher prices for gold. As yet, no one has put forward specific proposals involving sales abroad which would be legal and for which United States dollars or equivalent foreign exchange could be obtained, although it is possible that some few opportunities of this kind might be found. We have made inquiries and we find that these alleged high prices are, generally speaking, expressed in terms of inconvertible paper currencies and that even if sales were effected at these prices it would be impossible to convert the proceeds into Canadian dollars. Our inquiries show there are very few, if any, markets where our gold could be legally sold at more than $35 per ounce for United States dollars or currency that could be converted into United States dollars. There are some private gold transactions taking place at premium prices in certain parts of the east, but most or all of the countries concerned are in the sterling area. We could not justify accepting payment in sterling for our gold production, and these countries would not be prepared to pay us in United States dollars, as they need their dollars for imports very much more essential than gold to be used merely for private hoarding. In regard to Mexico, the fact is that the Mexican government (or its central bank) buys from its own gold producers on the basis of $35 an ounce and itself obtains whatever profit can be made from sales above that price. Mexico is still exporting a good deal of gold at the standard price. Any imports of gold from Canada would require a licence and licences would not be granted unless the central bank itself wanted gold, for which it would pay on the basis of the standard price. In Argentina there is, apparently, a small free market for gold coins which are relatively scarce these days, but not for bullion. On the basis, therefore, of the information we have been able to obtain we have come to the conclusion that the vision of export markets at high prices is largely a will-o'-the-wisp and that no significant amount of Canadian gold could be legally sold abroad at premium prices unless payment were taken in an inconvertible local currency, which would be of no use to the Canadian seller.

Moreover, if we as one of the major producers of gold were to allow Canadian gold production to flow to these private markets, we would have to expect others to follow our example. If the output of American, South African and Australian mines as well as of our mines were allowed to flow to these private markets, how long would the price stay up—and, indeed, what country in which a premium price now prevails could afford the foreign exchange to permit the flow to continue? It is clear that a premium market for gold could not be expected for any sizeable quantity or for any considerable length of time. Competition would quickly bring the price down to the standard price. Indeed, the main reason why there are any prices above $35 an ounce is simply that there are restrictions outside of Canada on the export or import of gold or on securing foreign exchange to pay for it.

In any event, whether or not there are private hoarders willing and able legally to buy our gold for dollars above the standard price, we are convinced that we can best assure a satisfactory long-run market for our gold by avoiding these speculative export markets and continuing to regard gold as an international money, used for settling balances between countries. It is this fundamental, and quite sensible, use of gold which really gives it its value and which assures a steady, unlimited market for it at an established price. We believe that for us to go shipping our gold off to private hoarders and speculators in various hole-and-corner markets of the world might, over the long run, prejudice the position of gold for international monetary purposes and the various national and international arrangements affecting it. I think we would all agree that it would not be in the best interests of the gold mining industry to take any action which might endanger what must in any case be the major market for our gold and the underlying support of its price.

For the reasons I have given, we are not prepared to grant licences for the private export of gold, except in the normal types of circumstances where licences have been granted in recent years, for example, for the export of ores which require smelting before refining.

We have also been asked about the sale of gold within Canada. Under an understanding reached a number of years ago, the gold mines, with the exception of a few mines the ores of which require treatment by smelting before they can be refined by the mint, have been selling all their gold to the mint. This arrangement we believe is desirable and should be continued. We see no reason to encourage the private hoarding of gold. It would serve no useful purpose, but would, on the contrary, reduce the amounts available for the only sensible non-industrial use of gold, namely, the settlement of international balances. Moreover, the industry itself would suffer if the existence of a Canadian gold market were to make it easier for highgraders to carry on their illegal operations.

I come now to the fourth suggestion, which relates to the depletion allowance for gold mining companies and the shareholders of such companies. It has been recommended by various persons and organizations in the mining industry that the present depletion allowances of 33⅓ per cent to the corporation and 20 per cent to the individual shareholder should be increased to 50 per cent in each case. The principal argument advanced by those who advocate creating this large segment of tax-free income is simply that the gold mining industry has not continued to expand as rapidly as they think desirable, that few successful new mines have been found in recent years, that consequently taxation must be to blame and that we should, therefore, reduce tax liability in this way in order to create highly attractive prizes that would tempt new capital and enterprise into this hazardous but important field.

The difficulty with this type of approach is that it would give relief where it is not needed and no effective relief where it is needed. It would increase substantially the non-taxed income of the more profitable mines but it would be of no help at all or very little help to the marginal mines. Already under the present law successful mining companies are able to get a return of, and an adequate return on, their capital invested in resources that are subject to depletion without the return of capital being subject to tax, and the shareholders of these companies receive a portion of their dividends tax-free, as it is deemed to be return of their capital. To increase to 50 per cent the depletion allowance for these highly successful enterprises where the company and shareholders are already receiving, or have already received, their capital back tax-free, would be to single out certain incomes—many of them quite high incomes—for particularly favourable treatment that would seem impossible to justify on any grounds of logic or equity. If a subsidy for gold mining were really needed and desirable in the country's interest, it should be possible to devise a more equitable and effective subsidization plan than one which gives most to those who need it least. The government, therefore, finds itself unable to accept this recommendation.

However, it has canvassed the possibility of modifying the arrangements relating to depletion allowances in such a way as to benefit marginal mines, those which by reason of low grade ore or insufficient ore or high cost of production make small profits or are likely to make profits for only a short period. Under the present arrangements such mines may not get all their depletable capital back through the allowance because their profits are too small or the working life of the mine too short to return as depletion the total capital amount involved. It is these marginal mines which have the best case for some change in the depletion allowance, although I should mention, in passing, that of course they will also benefit most from the holding down of costs which the new exchange rate makes possible.

In view of all the circumstances, the government has decided to modify as a temporary measure its present formula for the determination of depletion allowances in respect of gold mining companies in such a way as to assure a minimum depletion allowance of two dollars per ounce of gold produced. In other words, a company engaged in the mining of gold will in respect of its first two fiscal years ending after June 30, 1946, be allowed the option of accepting as depletion either 33⅓ per cent of net profits or $2 per ounce of gold produced, whichever is the greater. This will be of assistance to the marginal mines which really need assistance, but will not benefit the highly profitable mines which already do well on the present depletion formula.

Before concluding these remarks I wish to announce an additional measure which relates to the budget proposals of this year and which should be of encouragement to the whole mining industry. The house will recall that in the recent budget the Minister of Finance proposed that new mines coming into production after January 1, 1947, would pay only half rate corporation income tax on their profits of the first three years of production. When this resolution is before committee an amendment will be moved to change this provision for a half rate to complete exemption. This should give further encouragement to prospecting for and development of new properties and tend to offset to some extent the effect in this connection of the lowered proceeds or export sales of gold and other metals.

Mr. ADAMSON: Since I believe the statement by the minister is the direct result of a speech I made in this house advocating free gold, or the establishment of a free gold market—

Mr. ABBOTT: Others had thought of it.

Mr. ADAMSON: Yes, but I was the first to advocate it in this house, and I should like an opportunity to say a few words on the proposals of the minister.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but he will appreciate that this is a statement and there is nothing before the house on it; it is not debatable. As soon as we call the item in the budget resolutions dealing with the mining industry, an opportunity will be afforded for discussion. I question whether we should permit a general debate on the gold mining industry now.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The statement by the minister was made with the unanimous consent of the house and is not debatable. I suppose any remarks made now would also have to be by unanimous consent.

Mr. BRACKEN: With all respect to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Acting Minister of Finance has made this statement of which we had no notice, and since there is a budget resolution dealing with the matter, I should think the acting minister would be meeting the wishes of this house if now he would bring in that resolution and permit this discussion to go on. It is very unfair to the house for the minister, at a time like this, to come in with such a pronouncement, and fall back on the rules to deny us an opportunity of discussing it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would have no objection whatever to that. I should think some hon. members might like an opportunity to consider the statement and discuss it later; but if the house wishes, later on when we get into committee on the budget resolutions I shall be glad to have one of those resolutions called. My only point in rising was to suggest that it is common practice for ministers to make statements on important matters of public policy when Mr. Speaker is in the chair. The house will realize that this is a matter which, if announced in advance, would have afforded opportunities for speculative profit. Therefore I felt the statement should be made at eight o'clock in the evening after the markets were closed and so on, as was done in connection with the budget speech. I have no desire to curtail discussion on the matter, and if the house desires when we get into committee I shall have one of the resolutions relating to mining called.

Mr. MacINNIS: Before you decide on this point, Mr. Speaker, I think the Acting Minister of Finance has suggested the proper course. That was a very long statement, and many of us—the lesser minds—in the house could not take it all in. We had better have the debate at the beginning of the week, after we have had time to consider the statement over the week-end, so that we may be able to discuss it intelligently next time it comes up.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Private and public bills!

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

READING OF STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. This matter of ministers reading statements in the house without the consent of the house is growing too much.

[Mr. Bracken.]

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): On a point of order—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: There can be no point of order at this time. The hon. member should have raised the point of order before. I might inform him that shortly before he came into the chamber the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) asked and obtained the permission of the house.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to ask Mr. Speaker a question. Did Mr. Speaker put the question before the house requesting unanimous consent?

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Twenty-fifth and final report of special committee on veterans affairs—Mr. Tucker.

WAYS AND MEANS

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Golding in the chair.

12. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years, the provision exempting the income of certain cooperative companies and associations be repealed and that for the 1946 and subsequent taxation years provision be made that there may be deducted from a taxpayer's income the aggregate of the payments made,

(a) in the taxation year or within six months thereafter to his customers of the taxation year; and

(b) in the taxation year to his customers of a previous taxation year after the 1941 taxation year and not previously deducted under paragraph (a)

in respect of specified allocations in proportion to patronage for the said years the prospect of which was held forth

(c) by the statute or bylaws under which the taxpayer carries on business or by his contracts with his customers, or

(d) by the taxpayer in a specified manner prior to the commencement of the taxation year except that portion of such payments as would if deducted leave the taxpayer with an income less than an amount determined by deducting from three per cent of the capital employed in the business, including therein borrowed moneys, the interest paid by the taxpayer on borrowed moneys and deductible as an expense in computing his income.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will repeat what I said when Mr. Speaker was in the chair. I am in the hands of the committee. If there is a desire to discuss the statement which I made this evening with respect to the gold mining industry, I shall be glad to let resolution 12 stand and call resolution 30. As I said before, perhaps hon. members would like to consider the statement and I can call it early next week.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Before we proceed to make that change, I think the hon. member for Acadia should be permitted to finish his speech. I think I should put the amendment to the committee. I have read the amendment but I think I should now ask all those in favour of the amendment to say "aye."

Mr. STIRLING: What amendment?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The amendment moved by the minister when we came to resolution 12.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not want to insist that the amendment be put, because probably a good many hon. members would like to speak to the amendment. The hon. member for Acadia was speaking when the committee rose at six o'clock. The amendment had been read and, if the committee cares to proceed in the same way, that is quite satisfactory so far as I am concerned.

Mr. QUELCH: When the committee rose at six o'clock I was suggesting that if the volume of non-member business was large and patronage dividends were not paid out and were therefore taxable, the three per cent proviso would have little or no effect upon that particular cooperative. However, I think the minister will agree that that would not be a healthy state of affairs for a cooperative, and we should not encourage any such action which would tend to nullify the education work being done by cooperatives.

Just when does a customer become a member of a cooperative and when would the dividend be taxable or not taxable? The reason I ask that question is that there is a general practice among cooperatives to apply the amount of the dividend which would be paid to a non-member to his membership fee. I should like to quote from a letter sent out by one of the prominent cooperatives in the west to illustrate this practice, and in doing so I will not give the name of the cooperative. The letter reads:

> Our records for the fiscal year ending October 31, 1945, show that you have done $81.65 worth of business. The rate of dividend has been set at four per cent, so that the amount of patronage dividend due you on your business is $3.27.
> As has been the practice in previous years only paid-up members are entitled to receive dividends. All those doing business with us and wishing to receive dividends are being made permanent members. Fee for permanent membership is $5. Our records show there is $4.75 due on your permanent membership fee. This amount will be deducted from dividends.

When does that individual become a member? Would it be at the time the twenty-five cents was credited against his membership fee, or would he have to wait until the full membership was paid?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think that would depend upon the by-laws of the cooperative. As my hon. friend knows, a patronage dividend, whether paid to a member or a non-member, is deductible from gross income. There is no difference as to the tax-exempt feature, if I may use that term, of the patronage dividend, whether it is paid to a member or a non-member. I think the question of when a man would become a member of a cooperative would depend upon the by-laws or other internal regulations of the cooperatives.

Mr. QUELCH: I was thinking that if a dividend is credited against dues of a non-member, then the association would be taxable.

Mr. ABBOTT: It would not be taxable; there is no difference.

Mr. QUELCH: It was suggested this afternoon that the three per cent proviso is really the only objectionable feature left, but personally I am not so sure about that. The three per cent proviso is certainly a bad one. I say that because the government is trying by legislation to define a cooperative as a profit-making institution. I consider it a vicious practice to define it as a profit-making institution. The minister shakes his head, but that is what it amounts to.

The point I disagree with most of all is in relation to the revolving fund. The majority of telegrams that I have received have referred to the revolving fund. I will quote one:

> Budget proposals constitute serious threat to expansion of cooperatives. Taxing of revolving dividends will impede growth.

The minister, in his reply this afternoon, stated, and I got this from Hansard to make sure I have it right:

> Any net additions to the revolving fund are taxable but the revolving fund continues to revolve.

He ended there. He might have added, until it is exhausted. The revolving fund accumulated in the past will not be taxed, but any additions to it will be taxed. Is that correct?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, but it can keep turning over. Suppose there is $15,000 in it now. It can be maintained at that figure and keep turning over and over.

Mr. QUELCH: The practice is to pay out certain sums from the revolving fund from time to time, but if any new money is put into the revolving fund it will be taxable?

Mr. ABBOTT: It would have been clearer if I had said that the net additions to the revolving fund are taxable.

Mr. QUELCH: Are we to understand that if a certain amount is paid out of the revolving fund and a certain amount of new capital is put in, that new capital will be taxable?

Mr. ABBOTT: Not unless it increases the fund.

Mr. QUELCH: Then it will not be possible to expand the business without paying the tax?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right. The expansion of the revolving fund will have to be made either out of patronage dividends received by the member and put back into the business, or out of profits—I call them profits—which are kept in the business and would have to be considered as taxable profits. You cannot further build up working capital out of tax-exempt income.

Mr. QUELCH: If only part of the fund is paid out and a certain part of the patronage dividends is allocated or credited to the customer and made exigible and is put into the revolving fund, and there is an increase in the amount in the revolving fund, will that dividend be taxable?

Mr. ABBOTT: The answer to that is this. If a patronage dividend is declared to member A, and it is $25, and it is desired that $10 of that should stay in the cooperative and form part of what we refer to as the revolving fund, that could be done in two ways. A cheque could be issued to the member of the cooperative for the $25 and he would hand $10 back, or he could direct the co-operative to pay him $15 and keep the $10. It is just a matter of machinery.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister will note in the recommendations of the commission, section VI, that paragraph (3) reads as follows:

That cooperative associations and organizations, joint stock companies, partnerships, and other bodies and persons shall be allowed to deduct, in computing taxable income, such amounts as patronage bonuses, patronage dividends, refunds of excess handling charges, discounts, rebates and other similar amounts which are paid—

Not paid out by cheque at all.

—or credited to their customers, in proportion to the quantity, quality or value of goods acquired, marketed, or sold or services rendered; provided that:

(a) such amounts are paid in cash or its equivalent within six months after the annual meeting of the relevant fiscal period of the association, organization or company and within six months after the end of the relevant fiscal period of other businesses; or—

And this is the point:

—alternatively, that they are credited within the same period to each customer and exigible by him on giving such notice as may be deemed reasonable.

That is the recommendation of the royal commission, that patronage dividends credited, made exigible, should not be taxable. The same applies in Great Britain. I quote from page 226 of the report:

Again, in Britain, societies are financed in great measure by share or loan capital. Much of this capital is accumulated by crediting purchase bonuses to the share or loan account of the individual member. Payment for shares or loans is typically exigible by the individual member on demand or short notice. Accordingly, any patronage payment credited to the share or loan capital account of the member, or prospective member, may be treated as equivalent to a cash payment and is not taxed as income of the society. As old members withdraw and new members enter, the capital of the society may be "revolved" by means of patronage allotments by the society without payment of income tax.

That is the practice in Great Britain, and the commission recommend that it should be the practice in this country. Therefore I cannot see why the minister insists that the money must be actually paid out to the member and the member return the money to the society. Surely, if the patronage dividend is credited to the member, made exigible, there should be no tax on the society. I would agree that the money of the customer would be taxable as the income of the customer if paid by a producer cooperative, but it should not be taxed again as the income of the society. Otherwise you would have double taxation, thirty per cent on the cooperative, and then later the individual would have to pay a tax as well when the dividend is paid out to him. That is a vicious departure from the commission's recommendation and also different from the policy in Great Britain.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that there is no real departure from the commission's recommendation. This is a complicated matter and I do not know that I shall be able to make it entirely clear. It was found under our system there would be serious administrative difficulties if it were credited without any direction on the part of the member who would ordinarily receive it. Therefore it was decided that it could be paid in cash or its equivalent. If a dividend is declared and a portion is paid in cash and the balance retained on the specific direction of the member, the whole can be deducted. My hon. friend will notice that on pages 44 and 45 of the report under the heading, "Summary of Recommendations", there is a further provision that even if the dividend is held by the cooperative without the direction of the member in the way I have indicated it can be claimed as a deduction when paid out. I am advised by the departmental officials who have studied this matter carefully that substantially the recommendation of the commission in that respect has been carried into effect. I accept that statement. Perhaps my hon. friend, like myself, finds this a little difficult to follow. Of course, as I said this afternoon, the resolution is only in very general terms, and even after the legislation is passed there will have to be the usual administrative practices to supplement it.

Mr. QUELCH: I would agree that it is certainly better than it was before the minister made his statement this afternoon. But where the dividends are credited or allocated and made exigible, there should be no question of the tax being paid, even though in later years it may be deducted.

Mr. ABBOTT: In the meantime they will have to pay a tax, apparently.

Mr. BENTLEY: There is one other point I should like the minister to explain to the committee if he is prepared to do so at this time; just what is the situation now regarding the wheat pools?

Mr. ABBOTT: I made a statement on that this afternoon, so that perhaps my hon. friend would look at it.

Mr. BENTLEY: I want a little more clarification. I understood the minister to say that the revolving funds were not taxable unless they increased.

Mr. ABBOTT: Unless there was a net increase.

Mr. BENTLEY: Above what? What is the measuring stick by which you calculate the increase?

Mr. ABBOTT: From the previous year. Suppose the revolving fund at the end of 1946 were $25,000; that revolving fund could continue through 1947 at $25,000; but if it had increased to $35,000 at the end of 1947 I take it that the net increase, $10,000, would be considered as taxable income in that year. Does that answer the hon. member's question?

Mr. BENTLEY: I thank the minister for the explanation, but that does not satisfy me that it is a proper thing to do, for this reason. Supposing a cooperative agrees at the annual meeting by vote of the members that it will deduct each year from the dividends payable, say 12½ per cent—some use 50 per cent—not a net amount but a percentage of the dividends. That amount of business in a certain year will make 12½ per cent of that, a certain amount of money. In the following year, through increased efficiency because of reduced costs, or more business, the amount may possibly be increased. At the end of four or five years, when the first amount has revolved, the actual amount of that revolving fund may have changed several times. Each time the business is increased, through increased efficiency because of reduced costs, or more business, and the same percentage is retained in the revolving fund, the amount of the revolving fund is increased because of that increased efficiency or increase in business, and you plan to tax them for having done that. I do not quite follow how you reason out the excuse for doing that.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not entirely sure that I follow my hon. friend correctly, but I assume from what he has said that the net increase to which he is referring is, in fact, income of the cooperative which has not been disbursed to its members.

Mr. BENTLEY: Naturally, because it has been retained under agreement by them at the annual meeting. So I say that it is not a net increase that should be taxed.

Mr. ABBOTT: That, of course, is a matter of opinion. I appreciate that my hon. friend thinks it should not be taxed, and I think it should.

Mr. BENTLEY: But it is your intention to tax it?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right, yes.

Mr. ISNOR: I am not going to deal with this question of profit-making enterprise from the point of view of either private enterprise or cooperative enterprise, but as I sat and listened to the hon. member who last spoke with regard to the increase of this revolving fund I wondered where that increase was coming from if it were not coming from profits. If it were coming from profits I think it should be taxed, and I believe that is the intention. With that in mind, I am going to ask the minister three simple questions. I have written them out so as to place them before him to make it very easy for him.

The first question is, has an estimate been made as to the annual cost or loss to the income tax division by the permission being granted to cooperative enterprises to deduct patronage dividends from their income tax returns? If so, is the minister prepared to state this cost?

Mr. ABBOTT: The answer is that no such estimate has been made.

Mr. ISNOR: Would it be fair for me to estimate that it will run into many millions of dollars?

Mr. KNOWLES: Or does it prove it if you do?

Mr. ISNOR: I leave it in the air, the same as you often do.

Next, if cooperative enterprises are permitted to deduct so-called patronage dividends from their income tax returns, will the same permission apply to those engaged in private enterprise who wish to pay yearly patronage dividends to those who assist, by loans or otherwise, in promoting taxpayers' business?

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, as my hon. friend knows, under the proposals private concerns may pay patronage dividends on the same basis as cooperatives, provided that they are paid in proportion to patronage. The main difference in the case of the private concern will be that the private concern must pay to all customers on the same basis. The cooperatives may pay to members and not to non-members.

Mr. ISNOR: I should like to enlarge a little on the last reply made by the minister. I am to take it for granted from his reply that as a business man I am permitted every Christmas or at some time in the year to send out a cheque to all known customers doing business with me, and thus to pay out the entire profit which I might make during that year.

Mr. KNOWLES: Good idea.

Mr. ABBOTT: Only if, as provided in the terms of the resolution, you have held out the prospect to them that they will receive that patronage dividend at Christmas or some other appropriate date.

Mr. ISNOR: We could very well do that. We could very well have done it in the last six years to the extent of our excess profit tax.

An hon. MEMBER: Some of them did it.

Mr. ISNOR: I am not one of those who did it. I should like it on record as to whether we are allowed to do it.

The other and last question—and I feel it is a simple one for the minister—is this: could a merchant at present doing business, who reorganized his business into a cooperative mail order enterprise, selling stock or memberships at $10 a share, with a total capital of, say $200,000, and who did an annual business or turnover of $1,500,000 with a net profit of $400,000, deduct this full amount from income return, provided that it was paid out in the form of patronage dividends or business bonuses?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a pretty complicated question. I think I shall have to consider it carefully when I see it in Hansard and give my hon. friend an answer a little bit later, if I may.

Mr. ISNOR: Then I may look forward to an answer.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will give some kind of answer.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I hope the minister will permit merchants to deduct at Christmas or any other appropriate season of the year the excess profits tax on the suit for which I have been charged. Speaking for one of the largest cooperatives in the Dominion of Canada, in the dairy industry, I have one simple question, and I, too, have written it out, so that I shall not waste as much time as some of those representing the poor down-trodden private interests. Where capital stock bears a fixed rate of interest, which rate is written into the rules of a cooperative and is set aside concurrently in a manner similar to any other operating charge, is this to be considered corporate income?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, it is deductible from gross income for tax purposes.

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: To come back to this revolving fund mentioned by the hon. member for Swift Current, the revolving fund is not taxable unless it increases; is that the intention?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: Suppose they increased from $35,000 to $45,000 because patronage dividends were left in. Those dividends would not be taxable up to twelve months. That is also correct?

Mr. ABBOTT: Put it the other way. They may be deducted if they are distributed within twelve months.

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: If this revolving fund increases because of the patronage dividends which were left in for twelve months, on what ground would they be taxable?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think the answer to that is this. Let us take a specific date. Let us take January 1, 1946. The revolving fund amounts to $20,000; in the course of 1946, by reason of the fact that patronage dividends are not paid out, it increases to $30,000. If, before December 31, 1947, patronage dividends to the extent of $10,000 are declared and paid out, they can be deducted from the earnings of the previous year. If they are not declared and paid but are left in, that means that there will be $10,000 of income subject to tax in that year. Of course they can be declared. The recipients can instruct the company to retain them in the company, and in that event they would continue to be deductible, as I pointed out a moment ago to the hon. member for Acadia.

Mr. BENTLEY: In that event would the minister consider that an annual meeting recommendation would be sufficient to show that the member had given the cooperative authority to hold them?

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. BENTLEY: Must it be in writing?

Mr. ABBOTT: No; I think it must be individual authorization on the part of the member himself, not a vote of the majority of the members, which, in fact, would be the annual meeting recommendation. In other words it would have to be individual action rather than corporate or association action.

Mr. BENTLEY: Why does the minister require that provision; is he trying to limit the growth of the cooperatives?

Mr. ABBOTT: Not a bit.

Mr. BENTLEY: It will have that effect.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not agree with my hon. friend that it will. I say that we are doing it only to maintain some semblance of logic, propriety and fairness as between those concerns which operate as cooperatives and those which do not. In my opinion the legislation is such that it cannot handicap in any way a genuine cooperative enterprise.

Mr. BENTLEY: Has the minister ever been a member of a cooperative? Has he ever worked for one or helped to build one?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have never been a member, nor have I worked for one. I have seen a good many of them operate. We have them in Quebec; I have talked to a good many people who are members of and are interested in them, and that is my opinion for what it is worth. I know my hon. friend holds a different opinion. It is obviously a question on which opinions may differ.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The minister said that if the capital were increased the increase would be taxable. I have one illustration here.

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot agree with that statement as it stands. Perhaps my hon. friend will elaborate it.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I will elaborate by reading a telegram.

Mr. ABBOTT: It would depend on the way in which capital was increased.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The telegram reads as follows:

> Our programme of improved facilities is financed by the revolving reserve plan of deferred patronage dividend loans from members and loan from the Saskatchewan cooperative credit society. If budget proposals adopted will involve considerable embarrassment in plans for repayment.

There is no question but that many of the cooperatives depend on the allocation of patronage dividends which are left in to be used as capital. Is this going to affect them? Are these patronage dividends which are left in as capital to be taxed?

Mr. ABBOTT: I can answer that in this way. They are not going to be taxed in the hands of the cooperative if the man who receives them or who is entitled to receive them says: "Keep that amount of money in the cooperative and pay it out when I demand it."

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: He may leave it for a year if he wishes.

Mr. ABBOTT: He makes an investment in the cooperative. In many of our cooperatives in Quebec the members make an investment in the cooperative; they buy a share or they may lend the cooperative money. The capital is obtained in various ways. They may acquire their interest in the way that is mentioned by using a portion of their patronage dividends to supply that capital interest in the cooperative.

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: The statement has been made that these patronage dividends are taxable if they are kept by the association for more than twelve months.

Mr. ABBOTT: But not if they are declared as patronage dividends and actually, or constructively, paid to the member. That is the point I am trying to make, but I am afraid I have not made it too clear.

Mr. QUELCH: Provided that they were actually paid, would the cooperative have to send the cheque out?

Mr. ABBOTT: No. I said that was one way in which they might do it. But I gave an illustration of two ways in which it might be done. One would be for the cooperative to send out a cheque for $25 and the member would send back a cheque for $10. I said that another and equally legal and effective way would be for the cooperative to send out the cheque for $15 and keep $10, provided that they had received the specific written direction from the member to keep that $10.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He could receive a share for that $10?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. QUELCH: If the cooperative announced that they were withholding a certain amount, and it was an equitable amount, would that be satisfactory without having to get authorization?

Mr. ABBOTT: Put it in this way. If the patron has his individual, legal right established to receive $25, which I used as an example, he is perfectly free to say, "Keep $10, $15 or $20, or even the whole $25 and apply it in the purchase of a share or keep it as a loan," or in any way he sees fit to furnish capital to the cooperative of which he is a patron or a member.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That could be done in the case of milk, a deduction of so much per pound of butter fat?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that that could be done if there is a contract which authorizes the cooperative to do it on behalf of the members.

Mr. LOW: Is there not just one limitation to what the minister has just said in connection with the $25 which is kept by the cooperative on behalf of a member—

Mr. ABBOTT: And on his instructions.

Mr. LOW: Yes. If that results in a net increase in the revolving fund, does not that become taxable?

Mr. ABBOTT: No. I realize that it is a little confusing, but the answer is definitely, no.

Mr. McGARRY: Does the tax legislation ignore the basic difference between cooperative and private business?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid there was a little noise and I could not hear my hon. friend's question.

The CHAIRMAN: If there could be more order in the committee it would not be necessary for the hon. member to speak any louder.

Mr. McGARRY: Does this proposed legislation ignore the basic difference between cooperative and private business?

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. ABBOTT: I would say no.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does it do it?

Mr. ABBOTT: The answer is still no.

Mr. McGARRY: Does it mean that cooperatives have to treat members and non-members alike?

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. McGARRY: Are cooperative members allowed to leave their patronage dividends with their societies?

Mr. ABBOTT: If they so instruct the society, yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I think it all adds up to this, that it will be pretty hard for the minister to bring in a bill which will cover all the statements he has made to-night.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is one point on which I am 100 per cent in agreement with my hon. friend.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I think this discussion has indicated the need for a cooperative act which will define what a cooperative is and make plain what the cooperatives are going to be up against. For instance, when the Minister of Finance was speaking on Thursday of last week he had this to say, at page 3593 of Hansard:

> If this resolution that we are proposing as a result of the recommendations of the royal commisison does not work well; if it turns out to be prejudicial to the development of cooperatives, which we do not want it to be, it can be changed.

I think the time to change it and make it right is now, and it would be a good idea if we let this resolution stand and had further conferences with the cooperatives themselves, and tried to make this legislation satisfactory all round.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think, if I may say so to my hon. friend, that we shall make a little more progress along that line if, as I said this afternoon, the house sees the legislation that is to be brought in, and I question whether the matter would be very much further advanced by deferring action with respect to legislation until we have had further conferences with the cooperative organizations or others. There have been extensive conferences, as my hon. friend knows. This debate and the conferences we have had and the discussion that has gone on for a period of some years admirably illustrate the statement that it is impossible to please everybody, and I think we should make a start in this matter. As the Minister of Finance has said, and as I have said, we are following substantially the recommendations of the commission. I believe the proposals are sound, and I am also a believer in the process of trial and error. Let us get the legislation in force and see how it works. There are a great many people in this world who do a lot of crying before they are hurt, and I have a suspicion that that applies here. It may be, and I think is, due to lack of a full understanding of just how the thing will work; and I confess I could almost include myself in that class. Still I believe the proposals are sound. Certainly I do not feel that I would want to substitute my judgment for that of the commission which made this exhaustive investigation into this difficult question. I think the time to act in this matter is now. I believe we should get the bill into the house as soon as we can and let hon. members shoot at it, as I am sure some of them will; but let us try to get the thing settled.

Mr. FAIR: I believe we are making pretty good headway here this evening. We had two big points to discuss and now, after a great deal of education on both sides, I think one of them is pretty well cleared up, at least until the legislation is brought in. I hope we shall not have to spend any more time in getting a clarification of the proposals in regard to the revolving fund. The minister's final explanation of that is quite satisfactory to me, provided that there is not in the legislation something which will change that around again. Of course, if there is, we shall have a whole lot more talking to do about it. The minister has suggested that he believes in trial and error. We do, too, and we have been trying this cooperative legislation without the three per cent which is now the difference between us. I suggest that the minister allow it to be carried on as it is, and that will be quite satisfactory over here. Perhaps the time spent in the house on the matter is costing the government more money than it will get from the three per cent provision.

I think we should realize that the cooperators are not making profits on people other than themselves, without being quite willing to pay income tax on any amount made in that way. That is a point some people fail to recognize. The sooner some of those who are throwing monkey-wrenches into the works realize that the cooperatives are not profiting at the expense of anyone but themselves, that they are merely returning to themselves overcharges, the sooner we shall get along. So I suggest to the minister that he do away with this three per cent. It is not recommended by the commission and I do not think it works in that way in the old country. If he will throw that aside, perhaps we can give him a clearance on this resolution.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I am sorry to come back to this revolving fund, but I do so because I think I can be helpful. The difference I see is a difference in principle; that is why I bring it up on the resolution rather than on the bill itself. Up to now the custom has been that at the annual meeting of the cooperative it is decided by a majority vote of the members present what amount shall be kept as a reserve, or a revolving fund, or whatever you wish to call it, and what amount shall be paid out in patronage dividends. I understand that system was satisfactory and there were no complaints from the members of the cooperatives themselves. If they did not like that system they could change it in their local cooperatives. The government now proposes to change that system by declaring that they cannot by a majority vote withhold any amount they wish, but that they must have an individual authorization from each member of the cooperative who receives a dividend.

Mr. ABBOTT: If my hon. friend will allow me, I take it he appreciates that the commission recommended against the practice he has been describing.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Yes, but that does not alter the argument. Regardless of what the commission may have said, we are legislating here for the cooperatives. The thing I am trying to get at—

Mr. ABBOTT: We are legislating for Canada, not for the cooperators alone. We are legislating for every Canadian; I think that should be made clear.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Well, for the time being we are talking about the cooperatives as a group, and I am trying to point out that in effect we are telling the cooperatives how to run their business. We are interfering with the internal functions of the cooperatives themselves by telling them they must do it in a certain prescribed way. At the moment I am not criticizing the government for what they are doing; I shall do that later. I am only trying to find out what is the motive behind it, why they are doing it. There must be some particular reason why they have found it necessary to interfere with the internal methods of operating the business of the cooperatives.

Mr. ABBOTT: The answer to that is very simple, if I may give it at once. We endeavour to treat every Canadian on the same basis as far as taxes are concerned. No other Canadian is entitled to build up capital out of tax-free income; and if the cooperative as such has income, it cannot be added to the capital without paying a tax on it. The commission recommended against it. We are telling the cooperatives how they should run their business in the same way as we are telling anybody else how they should run their business if they are or are not to be subject to taxation. That is all we are doing.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I am afraid that is only part of the story. I want the minister to understand that unless he is prepared to admit there is a basic difference between the set-up of a cooperative enterprise and that of a private business, then we are at cross-purposes and we could argue all night. However, from the answer the minister gave to an hon. member who asked a question, I understood that he felt there was a basic difference. Maybe I should bring out that basic difference. In the case of the private business, where a dividend is to be declared the whole decision of how much shall be declared and when it will be paid is in the hands of the person who owns the business. The customers of that business have no say in when or how much of the dividends shall be distributed. In that case, therefore, it is necessary for the government to put a limit of six months, or twelve months, or whatever they like, in order to make sure that that dividend is paid, and not only declared.

If we wanted to take a hypothetical case we could say that if I were the owner of the business I could declare a dividend to my customers at the end of this year, but fail to pay it for the next fifty years. There would be nothing to make me pay it, because I am the owner of my business. No one can tell me what to do, because it is my money, even though I have declared it to somebody else.

But in the case of a cooperative that is not true, because the members of a cooperative are the customers. Therefore they themselves can decide when and how much shall be paid. It is, therefore, unnecessary in the case of a cooperative enterprise for us to butt in and tell them how to run their business.

Mr. ABBOTT: But the companies to which my hon. friend refers have to pay taxes on their profits, whether they pay dividends or not. The only difference is that the shareholder would not get dividends and have to pay taxes on them as personal income tax. However, the question which has been raised was considered by the commission, when at page 31 it says this:

On this first head of argument—

And the context explains what is meant by the "first head of argument."

—therefore, considerations of public interest do not lead us to the conclusion that cooperative associations should be given a blanket exemption from income tax while their competitors are subjected to the full burden of the current heavy rates. The considerations referred to do suggest, however, that where there is doubt as to what the income of an organization really is, the relative strength of cooperative associations and their competitors should be carefully considered to make certain that the solution finally adopted will not ruin one or the other, or unduly constrict their relative growth and development.

The granting of fiscal advantages is not usually a good method of giving special encouragement or assistance in the field of economic venture. Exemptions granted to one segment of the commercial community can scarcely benefit the public as a whole. Welcome though they may be to those who receive them, the burden from which some are relieved falls with proportionately increased weight on the rest of the economy.

It is for that reason I say that in drafting tax legislation one must see that it is fair to every Canadian.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yesterday, while we were discussing another resolution, the minister made a statement which I warned I would quote back to him at the appropriate time. That moment has arrived. It was in connection with resolution 24 when, as recorded at page 3870 of Hansard of July 25, the minister said:

It is believed that investment trusts of the sort being considered represent in effect merely collective investment by individuals, and it is considered that the mere funnelling of income through the company to individuals should not bring on an extra tax.

I will admit that there are points of—

Mr. ABBOTT: Substantial points of difference.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, but also substantial points of similarity. The minister will correct me if I am wrong when I say that the granting of the exemption to these trusts, in respect of both corporation income tax and excess profits tax, was based upon the fact that the individuals who joined in this collective effort already pay, personally, a tax on what they earn.

That being so, I suggest that there is a substantial similarity in that the members of cooperatives are simply getting back a portion of their own income, on which they have already paid taxes.

Mr. ABBOTT: And when they do there is no tax payable by the cooperative. The patronage dividends are deductible.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister admits, by that, that there is merit and validity in the point we are making, namely that patronage dividends are savings and should not be taxed. That should apply all the way through, and that is why we contend the three per cent provision should not stand. That is our principal objection.

Mr. ABBOTT: On the so-called investment trust, under the funneling through idea, as my hon. friend knows the provision in our income tax law is that there will not be double taxation on corporation dividends. Dividends received by a Canadian corporation from another corporation are exempt from tax. In the case of the investment trust, the main point is that there is no active business enterprise carried on by the company. It simply holds the tokens, shares, or debentures of some other concern which carries on the active business operation. It is merely an intermediary, as it were; I wonder if I am expressing myself clearly; the so-called investment trust does not perform any active business operation. It is not a commercial corporation, as is a manufacturing company. It does not carry on active business, as does a cooperative, whether it be a consumer or producer cooperative. It is just a creature of the law, which holds the stocks or the evidence of indebtedness of other corporate entities.

Mr. KNOWLES: Very similar to the provincial cooperative set-up, or a provincial cooperative wholesale. I admitted, when the discussion began, that the analogy does not hold all the way through. Analogies are always risky. But the minister has said that the difference in respect of this investment trust is that it is not in the business of making profit for itself as a corporation. It is simply an intermediary, working in the interests of individuals who have put their money in there.

I submit that that is what we have in both producer and consumer cooperatives. We have the collective effort of a group of people, not to make profits but rather to save themselves money. As a matter of fact the case is much stronger for them than for those in the other examples mentioned.

While I am on my feet, I should like to say a word or two about one cooperative in particular. I do so simply because I am a member of it. I have been a member of the board of directors, and for that reason I know something about it. This particular cooperative is situated in Winnipeg.

Mr. MacNICOL: What does it handle?

Mr. KNOWLES: Chiefly fuel. It is known as the Red River Cooperative Supply Limited, and it is located in the area represented by the hon. member for Winnipeg South. One feature I remember particularly about the first annual meeting of the Red River Cooperative Supply Limited was the enthusiasm and unanimity with which the members of that cooperative decided that, although the Manitoba law allowed them to declare interest on invested capital, they were not going to do so. That matter has come up from time to time since the cooperative was organized, and it has been declared the wish and desire of its members that no interest should be paid on their working capital.

This legislation opposes that principle.

The savings effected by the Red River company are paid out in dividends, and there is also a revolving-door fund plan which has been taking the place of extra share capital, which interested people subscribed in the early years of the organization. The people who buy their fuel from that cooperative are not making profits, as anyone can understand. They are simply saving some of the money which they have already earned as wages or salary, and upon which they have paid taxes. And as a matter of fact, because of the savings they effect in that way, these people are able to spend that money on other things.

I suggest to other sections of the business community that do not like the cooperative organizations to get stronger that actually it is better for the community as a whole to have these increased savings in the pockets of the people so that they can purchase other things. Not only is it a perfectly fair position that we are taking; it is a position much more farsighted than that taken by private enterprise in opposing the growth of the cooperative movement. It is the business of the government and certainly it is the business of this parliament to be interested in this movement, not only from the point of view of fairness and equity, but because in the long run it will be good for the community as a whole.

By contrast with this legislation I was interested a few days ago to read a Canadian Press dispatch from Wellington, New Zealand, headed "Consumers' Co-Op in New Zealand", and reading:

> The latest step in the New Zealand Labour government's socialization programme is the introduction of consumers' cooperative societies to control all shops and other business in the huge state housing settlements being built throughout the country.
> The proposal is that there should be communal ownership and control of all groceries, bakeries, butchers, hotels, theatres, restaurants, boarding houses, garages, service stations, coal, wood and milk supplies and any other consumer services required.

Mr. FERGUSON: Is that from Russia?

Mr. KNOWLES: This is from New Zealand, one of the members of the British commonwealth, a sister dominion. The article continues:

Government officers have been canvassing state house tenants in the new suburbs for support for the plan. It is proposed to use state-built buildings which would be rented to the societies. Any profits would be distributed in consumers' dividends and rebates.

One society is already functioning at Naenae, near Wellington. No room for private enterprise remains in this suburb. All buildings are state-owned and are made available only to the society.

That is part of an effort by that government to improve conditions in all ways for the people by putting things more and more into their own hands. That is what the cooperative movement in this country is also seeking to do. The acting minister would like to have this resolution pass so that he could present the bill, but it is evident that the principle involved in this proposal meets with serious objection from those of us who come from parts of the country where the cooperative movement is well established. If there were any validity yesterday to the minister's argument in connection with investment trust funds, there is much more validity to the argument that the savings of people which they save out of income and wages and on which they have already paid income tax should not again be taxed, not even to the extent of this three per cent of their employed capital.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I have had to be out of the chamber most of the time lately, attending the industrial relations committee. In fact these days a person would need to be divided into two, three or four parts to get through his work. I am not familiar with the discussion on cooperatives that has gone on up to now, nor do I understand the amendments which have been proposed by the acting minister.

There are many people in eastern Canada and in my constituency of Cumberland who are interested in the welfare of cooperatives. They feel that they serve the ordinary farmer and ordinary householder in a way that no other organization has been able to do. They feel, whether rightly or wrongly, that the passing of this legislation will put their cooperatives completely out of business.

The cooperatives that are set up in my constituency and throughout eastern Canada are small compared with the many million bushels or millions of dollar operations in western Canada. I have received a number of communications from organizations in my constituency and the maritime provinces. I shall not read them all, but I have one here from the Amherst cooperative which represents 160 members and which was organized fairly recently. The membership of this organization feel that this legislation is most unfair to them and that it violates the principles under which they set up their organization. They give five reasons why this legislation should not be passed in the form in which it was introduced, these being:

1. They ignore the basic difference between cooperative and private business.

2. They force cooperatives to treat non-members, who have assumed no obligations or responsibilities, the same as cooperatives and private profit business members thereby eventually destroying cooperatives.

3. They prevent cooperatives from providing service at cost by forcing them to pay tax on not less than three per cent of the employed capital.

4. They interfere with the right of the individual member to leave his savings with his cooperative, for provision of further service, by forcing payment in cash within six months.

5. They propose that the minister may, in his discretion, discriminate as between cooperatives in the matter of retroactive taxation.

Other representations have been made to me. A community buying and selling club representing 145 members was recently established at Parrsboro in my constituency, and they make representation somewhat similar to those I have just read. I have received a communication from the St. Andrews cooperative in eastern Nova Scotia, as well as further representations from Monsignor M. M. Coady, director of the extension department, St. Francis Xavier university. This university has done a great service for cooperatives, for the farmer and fisherman and the ordinary householder, and its efforts are referred to as a model all over Canada and in the United States.

Doctor Coady has been misquoted in this house and in the press, and I believe that the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Bracken) made reference to this in his budget speech in connection with taxation of cooperatives. I think this correction is important enough for me to read it. If there are misgivings on the part of the small cooperative, such as those in my constituency, then I submit that Doctor Coady should be sent for before this legislation passes, in order that he may be satisfied that it is in the interests of the cooperatives and fair to them, because he has done more for them than any other man in Canada. If these men have misgivings as to how this legislation is going to affect them they will be reassured if Doctor Coady comes here and is satisfied that this legislation will not injure the ordinary cooperative. The statement issued by Doctor Coady reads:

A representative of the Canadian Press quoted me as being thoroughly satisfied with the proposals of the budget resolutions on the taxation of cooperatitves. There is no foundation for this. On the night that the budget was brought down, a Canadian Press representative called me on the telephone and asked me for my views. My answer was that I knew nothing about it. He went on then to outline the highlights on this matter and stated that patronage dividends were deductible before taxation, and that credit unions were to be entirely exempt. My answer was that if this were true it would be a triumph for the cooperatives. Subsequently it was plain that this supposition was not true. But the important "if" of my remark was omitted from the statement that appeared in the press.

I have now to say that legislation should be founded on sound basic principles. If not, it cannot long endure in a free society. The McDougall royal commission that thoroughly investigated this whole matter based their findings on a thorough understanding of cooperative principles, and brought in sane and reasonable recommendations.

Private profit business and cooperatives are specifically different kinds of business. It is logical to suspect, therefore, that no tax legislation that applies to the former would be applicable to the latter. Violence will have to be done to fundamental principles if this is tried. The essence of private profit business is that the businessman takes a toll from his fellow human beings—legitimate in some cases, and positively unjust in other cases. In cooperatives on the other hand no member of the firm or company —to use the terminology of old-line business— can take a toll from his fellows. Any money he receives back in the shape of patronage dividends is his own money. These dividends are overcharges that were made by himself in the course of a year's business. By no stretch of the imagination, therefore, can patronage dividends be called profit or income. If governments want to tax farmers and labourers who engage in cooperative enterprises, they should do it under some other title.

I believe that Doctor Coady was quoted in this house as being favourable to this legislation. I want him and those associated with him to be satisfied with this legislation before it passes this house. I do not believe from my contact with those who are members of cooperatives that they want to evade taxation. All they want is to be treated fairly. They want the principles under which cooperatives are supposed to be set up and under which they became members of the organization safeguarded. I hope that the minister and the house will be able to satisfy the members of the smaller cooperatives in eastern Canada that this legislation is proper legislation and fair to them and that it does not prejudice them in their operations.

Mr. ISNOR: Unfortunately, the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond is not in his seat at the moment. If he were I feel sure that he would immediately correct an impression which the hon. member for Cumberland may have left on the minds of some hon. members. The statement made by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond with respect to Doctor Coady was simply a statement as reported by the Canadian Press. I want to make it clear that he simply read a statement published in certain newspapers and attributed to Doctor Coady. I know the hon. member for Inverness, as I have heard him say on more than one occasion, holds Doctor Coady, as do all the members from Nova Scotia, in the highest possible esteem, and if the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond were here—

Mr. MacNICOL: He is in his seat now. He came in quickly when he was called.

Mr. ISNOR: I know he will speak in the highest possible terms of Doctor Coady.

Mr. McGARRY: Mr. Chairman, if I am in order, I should like to explain my position with regard to what I said in my speech on the budget dealing particularly with cooperatives. I spoke on that occasion while I was a member of and sympathizer with and militant worker on behalf of the credit union of cooperatives as I know them in my constituency. I was not familiar with all the intricacies and the policies and the philosophy of that particular movement, and on that occasion I did not express my own opinion but based my opinion of what was submitted in the budget on an announcement that was made by Doctor Coady as reported in the Canadian Press. As I read his statement, it was that Doctor Coady was very well satisfied with this part of the budget proposals dealing with cooperatives. Afterwards Doctor Coady wrote me a letter, which I should like to read in part:

A representative of the Canadian Press quoted me (Halifax Chronicle, June 28) as being thoroughly satisfied with the proposals of the budget resolutions on the taxation of cooperatives. There is no foundation for this. On the night that the budget was brought down, a Canadian Press representative called me on the telephone and asked me for my views. My answer was that I knew nothing about it. He went on to outline the highlights on this matter and stated that patronage dividends were deductible before taxation, and that credit unions were to be entirely exempt. My answer was that if this were true it would be a triumph for the cooperatives. Subsequently it was plain that this supposition was not true. But the important "if" of my remark was omitted from the statement that appeared in the press.

He goes on to say:

I have now to say that legislation should be founded on sound basic principles. If not, it cannot long endure in a free society. The McDougall royal commission that thoroughly investigated this whole matter based their findings on a thorough understanding of cooperative principles, and brought in sane and reasonable recommendations.

Private profit business and cooperatives are specifically different kinds of business. It is logical to suspect, therefore, that no tax legislation that applies to the former would be applicable to the latter. Violence will have to be done to fundamental principles if this is tried. The essence of private profit business is that the business man takes a toll from his fellow human beings—legitimate in some cases, and positively unjust in other cases. In cooperatives on the other hand no member of the firm or company—to use the terminology of old-line business—can take a toll from his fellows. Any money he receives back in the shape of patronage dividends is his own money. These dividends are overcharges that were made by himself in the course of a year's business. By no stretch of the imagination, therefore, can patronage dividends be called profit or income. If governments want to tax farmers and labourers who engage in cooperative enterprises, they should do it under some other title.

As I said in my budget speech, I did not know anyone better qualified than Doctor Coady to quote in stating my position with regard to this legislation. Let me add that I undertook to ask the minister to-night questions which were put to me by members of the cooperative. I have asked three questions of the minister, and I understand from his answers that even the cooperatives themselves do not really understand this proposed legislation. I am banking on the authenticity of what the minister said. There is another question I will ask when the bill comes down.

Mr. ABBOTT: I should like to add one word with regard to what the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond and the senior member for Halifax have said. Perhaps when Doctor Coady has an opportunity of appreciating the changes which I have proposed this afternoon he will feel that the proposed legislation is satisfactory. May I say that both I and the officials of my department would be very glad to discuss this matter with Doctor Coady if he would care to come to Ottawa. The bill, of course, will not be passed for some little time yet, and I am sure there will be ample opportunity for him to come here, should he care to do so, and discuss it with me and with the officials.

Mr. GILLIS: May I add a little to the confusion? In the last fifteen minutes, from the opposite side of the house and from my right—

Mr. ABBOTT: Nova Scotia forever.

Mr. GILLIS: —I have heard a Liberal member and a Conservative member read a letter with which, apparently, they are in agreement, since both admit that there is some basic principle which divides private business from the cooperative movement. Now the minister does not believe that—

Mr. KNOWLES: He does not want to.

Mr. GILLIS: —according to statements he has made here to-night. If it can be repeated from both sides in this way, pretty soon we shall all begin to believe it.

I want to make a brief observation with respect to the reading of these letters. I think it is unfortunate that the Canadian Press carried the story which precipitated the discussion which we have had for the last fifteen minutes. What the senior member for Halifax said a few moments ago is not correct, though I appreciate his coming to the defence of his colleague the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond. The hon. member for Inverness-Richmond merely stated in the house that he was referring to a press dispatch.

An hon. MEMBER: He quoted from a Canadian Press dispatch.

Mr. GILLIS: He did not do any such thing. I want to keep the record straight.

Mr. McGARRY: Doctor Coady made the announcement the day after the budget was brought down; I think it was on June 28; I did not speak until the 16th of July, and what I said that day I based on a press report.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not disagreeing with the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond. I do not know what he based it on.

Mr. McGARRY: Well, I made it clear.

Mr. GILLIS: The record is not clear on it. The hon. member for Inverness-Richmond spoke on the 17th of July.

Mr. McGARRY: I spoke on the 16th first, but I concluded on the 17th.

Mr. GILLIS: Well, this statement with reference to Doctor Coady is on the 17th, and this is what the hon. member said, as reported in Hansard, at page 3540:

> Doctor Coady has been the organizer, the initiator and the developer of the cooperative movement throughout the maritimes. He is now and has been for many years the director of that movement. What does Doctor Coady say of the legislation dealing with cooperative taxation? He has said it over the radio; he has expressed it in the press.

That is not quoting a press dispatch.

Mr. McGARRY: Oh, well, what—

Mr. GILLIS: Just a minute now:

> He has said it over the radio;

Mr. McGARRY: You are splitting hairs now.

Mr. GILLIS:

. . . he has expressed it in the press. This is what he said: "I am well satisfied with this legislation." After hearing the comments of the director of the maritime cooperative movement, who should know the facts of this legislation better than any other person in the maritimes, at least, what attitude should I take? Common sense should dictate the answer.

Mr. McGARRY: Might I interject that I did not quote all he said in the press, because he actually eulogized this piece of legislation?

Mr. GILLIS: The fact of the matter is that he did not say anything in the press. He denies that to-night from both sides of this house. That press dispatch was the concoction of some reporter who merely gave him misleading information over the telephone; and the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond said that he had stated it over the radio. Well, I do not think he did, according to these two letters. Some news commentator may have expressed something over the air. I just want to keep the record on that straight. I was shocked when I heard that statement in the house, because I know Doctor Coady quite well and I know his opinions on the cooperative movement. I did not think he would "go overboard," as the statement in the press would indicate. I had too much confidence in his judgment.

Mr. McGARRY: May I ask the hon. member a question? Does he doubt that I based my statements the day I made my speech on anything other than what I read in the Halifax Herald?

Mr. GILLIS: I am not quarrelling with that. Perhaps the hon. member based his statement on that. But for the purpose of the record—

Mr. McGARRY: There is no "perhaps" about it.

Mr. GILLIS: There is. It was not clear in the record.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It does not affect the issue at the present time.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): You never quote the press yourself!

Mr. GILLIS: Very carefully.

Mr. LAPOINTE: When it suits you.

Mr. GILLIS: I am very careful with the press. However, Mr. Chairman, what I rose to say—and I agree that this matter has been pretty well sifted and mixed up and I am still rather mixed up about it myself—is, that perhaps the focal point with regard to legislation on cooperatives in this budget is the matter of taxing that reserve fund. I am concerned about it for this reason, that I believe taxing that reserve fund will definitely stop any further development of the cooperative movement.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Not if it is on a sound basis.

Mr. GILLIS: Maybe not. But I have been in this movement for a long time. I have been a member of committees of a consumers' store and a credit movement; I have helped to promote these patronage dividends and explain the purposes for which they were used, and that kind of thing, and, as I see it, the patronage dividend for a start, is an overcharge that is given back to the member.

Mr. ABBOTT: That may be the case with consumer cooperatives.

Mr. GILLIS: I am thinking about consumer cooperatives now. If you are going to tax that overcharge which is given back to the member, and which he allocates back to that store for the purpose of promoting his business, what you are going to force cooperatives to do is to discontinue that overcharge—

Mr. ABBOTT: We do not do that.

Mr. GILLIS:—and cut their prices, cut down their units of business. Some of these stores have three or four thousand members. They can cut down their units, distribute through the community, discontinue their overcharge, and run out of business the private merchant.

Mr. ABBOTT: We are not doing that.

Mr. GILLIS: But that is the effect you are going to have on the consumers' stores.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think you are wrong.

Mr. GILLIS: I hope I am. I caution the minister to examine carefully to see if that is not the effect that will have, because I think that is what will happen.

That is the only point I am concerned with. I think the amendments brought in have improved the situation considerably, and I have not any quarrel with the legislation as it is, except on that point.

Mr. ABBOTT: I honestly think my hon. friend will find he is wrong in the view he holds that that will be the effect.

Mr. GILLIS: The minister stated a moment ago that he was not reluctant to discuss this matter with the leaders of the cooperative movement in Canada before legislation was finally passed and come to a definite understanding as to the effect it is going to have. I am quite satisfied that that is the danger point in the taxation of the cooperatives.

Mr. ABBOTT: As my hon. friend knows, over the last week or ten days I had a considerable number of discussions with those prominent in the cooperative movement, and I shall be glad to continue that discussion. I shall be glad to have further discussion with the delegations who may wish to come and discuss it when the bill is before the house and when it is available for discussion. Other than that, I have nothing to add at the moment.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): When will the bill be printed so that we may have a look at it?

Mr. ABBOTT: It cannot be printed and produced until we pass the resolutions. I suggested this afternoon that we are not finally settling the principle of the bill which will be introduced when we pass these resolutions. I had hoped and suggested that we might get past the resolution stage so that I could introduce the bill. The committee could then see the specific statutory measure which is proposed and, both on second reading and when we are in committee, we can discuss it in concrete form. That is when, if necessary, specific amendments can be made to the suggested sections. That is all I was suggesting.

Mr. COLDWELL: Do I understand that when the bill is before the house the minister will be prepared to accept amendments and not take the position that, since the resolution is to govern the legislation that must follow, amendments in regard to particulars which are under discussion will not be accepted. That is the point which seems to be worrying some of my hon. friends. I have been attending committees and have not been following this discussion, and that is why I have not been participating in it. What seems to be the fear of some of my colleagues is that once these resolutions are passed, the government may take the position, when the bills are down, that we must abide by the substance of the resolutions.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would not take that stand, provided that the amendment being proposed by a private member were one which could properly be proposed by him. Obviously, if it is an amendment which can be proposed at this stage is could be proposed at that stage. Any amendment to the resolution which can be proposed, can be proposed when the bill is before the house and when it is in the committee stage. That is my understanding of proper parliamentary procedure.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister is not closing the door?

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. ABBOTT: No. I said this afternoon, of necessity, the resolutions are drafted in rather general and not too specific terms for the very purpose of allowing a general discussion on the particular principles of the legislation on which the bill is to be founded. I am not too clear as to the history of these budget resolutions. I know that from a constitutional point of view a resolution approved by the governor general must precede a money bill; and in budget matters it is apparently the traditional practice to present a series of resolutions on which there is a general discussion. Then the government introduces legislation and there is further discussion on that. It has this merit, that it enables a good deal of general discussion to be held on the resolution stage, and in a good many cases it affords some guidance to the government as to what can usefully be included in the bill. Hon. members of the committee who have been here for some time know that, as a result of discussion in committee, very often numerous amendments are made to the legislation which is brought in. I think I can safely give the assurance to the committee that when the legislation is before us any amendment which can now be suggested could then be suggested; any amendment which a member, other than a member of the government, could properly place before the house can be made at that time. If there is any doubt on that point a record can be made of the passing of the resolution on division, for instance, which would indicate that there was not unanimous acceptance by some members of the resolution as it stands. I think that is a fair statement of the constitutional position.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is a satisfactory statement up to this point. From the weight of opinion in this committee and from the discussion that has taken place on this resolution from all sides it is quite obvious that there is a desire so to amend the legislation that the cooperatives will not in any way be penalized or prevented from expanding as they should. What I have in mind is that some amendments which might be proposed could not be proposed by a private member.

Mr. ABBOTT: Either here or in committee.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is right. If the minister and the government feel that the weight of logic advanced on both sides of the house is sufficient to show that the amendment should be moved, will the government take the responsibility to amend the legislation in spite of the fact that they have produced the bill following these resolutions?

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall answer that in this way by saying that the fact the government has produced a bill based on these resolutions would not preclude the government from changing its mind and proposing amendments, provided that it were satisfied that such amendments should be made. I must add to that by saying that under our system the government must and should assume the responsibility for making these amendments.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have no quarrel with that.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is the function of government under our system. My hon. friend will recognize that I could not, in advance, give a general undertaking such as he suggested other than to say that the government has not a closed mind in this matter, if I may use that expression. The government will be perfectly ready at the legislation stage to consider amendments which it may be felt are desirable.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): In view of the fact that so many people in the outlying parts of the country are concerned and disturbed with respect to the object of this legislation, could the minister not have these provisions relating to cooperatives printed separately in advance, and copies placed in our hands so that we would be in a position to consult those who have expressed their misgivings with respect to the legislation?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid that that could not be done. I am hopeful that the discussion which has gone on to-day—and which has been helpful and which I have no doubt will be reported in the press—will help to clear up some of the misunderstandings. The cooperative union have an office in Ottawa, and I have no doubt that they will have taken cognizance of what has been said. If there are further points on which they are not clear they will no doubt consult me or the officials of my department. I hope that before the legislation is through its final stages ample opportunity will be given to all those who are actively interested in this matter to get information and to understand fully exactly what is proposed.

Mr. BRYCE: I should like to assure the minister that I do not want to be any more persistent than any other hon. member, but I have been bombarded with telegrams from my constituents in Selkirk who believe that, under the legislation about to be brought down, their rights are being taken away from them. I had a complete speech to give to-night, but I have sat quiet and allowed other hon. members to steal my thunder. The minister will be relieved at not having to listen to that speech. We have been talking about the revolving-door plan. The only thing I am satisfied about now is that I have money in a revolving-door plan in Winnipeg. I have listened to the minister twice and he has made two different statements, so that I shall have to read them to-morrow and decide which one he means.

Mr. ABBOTT: I hope my hon. friend is wrong. I do not think I have made contradictory statements, but if I have I shall clear them up.

Mr. BRYCE: I admit I could make a mistake, just as the minister might, but that is how it appears to me at the moment. I should like to get clear in my own mind this three per cent on the capital employed in the business. I happen to belong to the same cooperative as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I have a little money lying there, say $100, and you will tax the Red River cooperative on that $100 if they do business with it; is that not right? It is mine; I give it to them, and they are working with it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have to make a qualified answer, but that is not necessarily so. If you have $100 which you have left with the Red River cooperative and they pay you interest on it, they deduct that interest as an expense and of course there is no tax. If you allow them to use that $100 without interest and take your share of the income of the corporation in the form of a patronage dividend, then the income of the cooperative for that year will be considered to have been derived to the extent of $3 from the $100 you have let them use as capital.

Mr. BRYCE: And that would be taxable?

Mr. ABBOTT: Provided, of course, that they have earned $3 or its equivalent.

Mr. BRYCE: The Red River cooperative gets that money from me so that they may do business. Then in turn they lend that money to the Manitoba cooperative wholesale, and when they get it you tax it again.

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. BRYCE: Oh, yes. It is their funds then, because it has been lent to somebody else.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is an accounting matter, but I make the positive assertion that the $100 we are using as an example would not have the income taxed twice.

Mr. BRYCE: Would that be contained in the legislation, because it will go farther than that? When the Manitoba cooperative wholesale get it they again reinvest it with the interprovincial cooperative, and it is added to the funds of each different organization.

Mr. ABBOTT: I can only answer that the $100 cannot be in two places at once.

Mr. BRYCE: I know, but it can be taxed in two different places.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, it cannot.

Mr. BRYCE: Yes, it can.

Mr. ABBOTT: No money can be in two or three places, nor can it be taxed in two or three places.

Mr. BRYCE: I will show the minister how it can be taxed in three places in one year.

Mr. ABBOTT: But I would not accept the suggestion, because that would be unfair.

Mr. BRYCE: The legislation itself is unfair.

Mr. ABBOTT: You have not seen the legislation yet.

Mr. BRYCE: You are driving the cooperatives into becoming profit-making businesses.

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. BRYCE: You are defeating the very ideal of cooperative business. It does not seem that I am going to be believed, but if you want to have peace and quiet in the western provinces leave them alone. You have brought in some amendments; now take off the three per cent and let the men who have built up the cooperatives go ahead, because they are prospering to-day as they never did under the old system.

Just before I sit down I should like to say another word. The Minister of Finance had this is to say in concluding his remarks on this subject during his budget address, at page 2923 of Hansard:

> Credit unions which derive their incomes primarily from loans made to members and federations of credit unions will continue to be exempt from tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is the next resolution, if my hon. friend would care to allow his remarks to stand.

Mr. BRYCE: Very well.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Would the minister indicate what he expects to be able to collect in these taxes on cooperatives, now that he has introduced his amendment?

Mr. ABBOTT: That question was asked this afternoon, and the answer was that I could not give any indication. My hon. friend and the committee will realize that a number of cooperatives do quite an appreciable business with non-members. Under the proposed change, in line with the views of most of these cooperatives, they agreed that the profits from that type of business should be taxed. The amount to be realized will depend in large measure on the proportion of business cooperative enterprises do with non-members, and the deputy minister assures me that it is impossible to give any estimate which would mean anything. In view of those circumstances, it would be a piece of sheer guesswork

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): But you expect there will be something?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, there is bound to be something.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am sorry that the need for my presence in other places during the last few days puts me perhaps a little behind in this discussion. I am anxious that at some time, now or on second reading or at some other time, the minister should tell us what a cooperative is.

The second question I want to ask him is, what is profit? Until we know those two answers it seems to me we cannot advance very far.

However, here is my humble and simple thought. I live in the western country, from which comes the hon. member who spoke just a moment ago, who said to leave the cooperatives alone. Well, I wish we could, but if we leave them alone, the country will soon not collect anything in taxes, because everybody will adopt that method of doing business.

I am going to tell you, Mr. Chairman, what I think a cooperative is now. I think of a town forty miles from Calgary, where I lived, called Irricana, a very small village. On one side of the road was a grocery store run by an old friend of mine. He went broke and then died, though I do not suggest that going broke killed him. On the other side of the road another man had a store of about the same size. A dozen or so farmers in that area bought the store across the road. These were both general stores and their windows contained about the same things. Driving along in my motor car, granting that I did not know either one, I could glance at both and would go into the place whose window attracted me most. That is in no sense a cooperative; but persons calling themselves such have received consideration in taxation which the merchant on the other side of the street has not received. There can be no justice in a situation like that, where there is differentiation in taxation as between one store using a certain name and another store on the other side of the street using another name.

I hope this meagre contribution may give the acting minister an idea, and that before we conclude this discussion he will tell us what a cooperative is. Then, being a Solomon in his own right, he may go on and tell us what profit is and what patronage dividends are.

Mr. ABBOTT: May I quote what the members of the McDougall commission had to say on this question of what a cooperative is. In view of their statement, perhaps my hon. friend will relieve me of the obligation of attempting to give him a definition. This is what they said, as it appears at page 40 of their report:

> It may be said that the term "cooperative" is nowhere defined in the statute. That is quite true and, indeed, it would be an almost insuperable task to devise a definition which, having regard to original principles on the one hand, and present-day practices on the other, would do justice to the subject.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I say to the minister that, McDougall commission or no McDougall commission, he is the man who is bringing in the statute. It seems to me that before he shall have finished he will have the inexorable duty—and that is a big word, and a difficult one—of telling us what a cooperative is; because that is what his legislation is about. Thanks to Mr. Justice McDougall, and those other grand persons who also touched upon the problem, as the minister is doing, I think the minister will have to give that definition before he finishes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: While I do not wish to take over any of the duties of the acting minister—

Mr. ABBOTT: Go ahead.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: —I should like to give the hon. member for Calgary West a true definition of a cooperative. A true cooperative association is the Fraser Valley Milk Producers' Association of Vancouver, British Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. BRACKEN: Mr. Chairman, before the resolution either in the original or the amended form is passed I wish to make one observation, and to ask one or two questions of the minister and, in the light of that, to try to summarize the discussion we have had this afternoon, so far as I understand it.

My observation has to do with the discussion we have had in the last few minutes regarding the reported attitude of Doctor Coady, director of extension work at St. Francis Xavier university. I do this because I believe it was I the other day who questioned the statement of the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond. I wish to say that I do not think anyone in the house thought the hon. member intended to misrepresent the attitude of Doctor Coady. Certainly I did not think that, and I do not think any other member did. But the effect of the comment in Hansard was that Doctor Coady's views were misrepresented.

Because of that Doctor Coady wrote to certain members of the house, including the hon. member himself, the hon. member for Cumberland who read his statement, and to other hon. members. They have read his statement, and I think that ought to satisfy the committee with respect to his attitude. He did not approve the proposition as the government has brought it forward.

The questions I wish to ask the Acting Minister of Finance are just two in number. Whatever the details of resolution 12 may or may not be, it is clear that, in spite of the changes the minister proposes in his amendment, and the changes he states he is willing to make, the government still expects to do two things. It expects to collect a tax of three per cent on the capital employed by cooperatives, provided that the earnings, savings or dividends of those cooperatives amount to that much. It is still clear that he means to try to collect taxes on certain cooperatives, namely the western pools, for business done by them during the years 1944 and 1945.

The minister has indicated that he cannot answer one question accurately. Perhaps that may be true, but I am sure he or his advisers could give an approximate answer to an inquiry as to what the revenue would be to the government on the basis of the application of this tax at three per cent on the earnings of the capital employed by the three western pools, provided that they made that much by way of dividends, earnings, profits or whatever one chooses to call them. The name is not important. It is a gain to those who are interested. What would that tax be?

Then, I would ask the minister to give an estimate of what the tax would be on those same three large cooperative organizations, the three western grain pools, in either one or other of the last two years, on the basis which the government propose that they shall pay I do not mind saying why I am asking the question. I ask it because I think the tax on those organizations which the government propose to collect for 1944 and 1945 will be very much greater than on the basis they propose to apply taxation from this time forward.

I am going to suggest to the government that if in their wisdom the policy they are proposing for the future is sound, it will be difficult for them to establish that they can apply compulsion by which they will collect from those western cooperative organizations vastly greater sums for the last two years.

I pause at this point to allow the minister to state whether he can answer the questions now. I would not expect him to be able to do so at this time, but I say the house and country should have an estimate of what those revenues would be, before we are asked to give final consideration to the bill which will be brought down. After the minister answers, I should like to take five minutes to summarize our position.

Mr. ABBOTT: As the leader of the opposition has said, it would not be possible to give such an estimate at the present moment. However, I shall see if it can be prepared, and will give it within the course of a day or two, provided that it can be done. It may have to be given with certain qualifications, depending upon one contingency or another. However, I shall take his questions into consideration, and see what estimate can be given in reply.

Mr. BRACKEN: The most I would expect, and I am sure the most hon. members would expect, would be as close an approximation as the minister or his advisers could give.

The business before the committee is the consideration of resolution 12, the chief resolution advanced by the government with relation to the taxation of cooperatives. What does it propose? I shall not try to show all the things it proposes, but shall indicate only some of them. It proposes the exemption from taxation of patronage dividends, if they are paid in cash. It requires the payment of patronage dividends to non-members of the cooperative organization. I am now dealing with the main resolution.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, it does not.

Mr. BRACKEN: Third, it places a limitation on the exemption on earnings used to purchase the interest of deceased members, unless the purchase is made after 1941.

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. BRACKEN: The minister says, "No." I know he has said that he is going to have it modified in some way, but that is the way I read this resolution and that is the way I think most hon. members read it. If it is not so and if it is not going to be in the bill, so much for that.

In addition, the resolution proposes that there shall be a tax paid on three per cent of the capital employed, provided that that much is made in the way of profits or earnings.

Mr. ABBOTT: And not paid out in dividends or interest otherwise.

Mr. BRACKEN: Whether they are paid out or not, you are going to tax them to that extent.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, not if they are paid out in interest.

Mr. BRACKEN: If the concern makes up to three per cent you are going to tax them on the basis of that three per cent earned. That is in resolution 12, no matter what else there is in it. This afternoon when the acting minister came in he suggested that he was going to make some changes, and certain of those changes were incorporated in an amendment which has been suggested but which, I gather, has not been moved.

Mr. ABBOTT: It has been moved but not yet put.

Mr. BRACKEN: That is not a matter of importance.

Mr. ABBOTT: The record will show that one of my colleagues moved it.

Mr. BRACKEN: That does not matter. I did not hear it moved.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The amendment was moved and I read the amendment to the committee.

Mr. BRACKEN: It is not worth while wasting time on, but who moved it?

Mr. ABBOTT: The Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. BRACKEN: Sometimes things appear on the record which have not happened, but that does not matter. If it was not moved, it can be; the minister tells us that it is going to be, so that there is no question about it. What was in his amendment? There were two things in it. First, he moved that the word "six" appearing in paragraph (a) of resolution 12 be replaced by the word "twelve". Everybody in the house accepts that as far as it goes, but it changes no principle. To the extent that it does change, it is more acceptable to this side of the house and, I think, to all parties on this side. The second part of the amendment was that the words "after the 1941 taxation year" appearing in paragraph (b) be deleted. That covers one of the objections which members on this side of the house and I myself raised the other day. As a matter of fact, the words in that part of the amendment are almost identical with the words in an amendment which I would have proposed myself. The words in my amendment were:

That the resolution be amended by deleting from sub-paragraph (b) the words "after the 1941 taxation year."

In that one respect one of the features of the amendment which I would have moved has been completely covered.

The question was raised a little while ago as to what power a private member would have, either at this or at a later stage, to deal with major aspects of this question. I think I am right in saying that a private member of the house cannot move an amendment, either now or later, which would impair the revenues that the government had decided it wants to get. Therefore we are precluded from moving that the taxation on this three per cent be cut out, and we are precluded from moving that the taxation on the earnings or profits or savings of a cooperative during the last two years be cut out.

For the information of the acting minister when he is drafting his bill, I should like to read the other amendments I would have proposed. The minister has to some degree agreed to put these into effect, although perhaps in one instance not completely. The first clause of the amendment that I would have moved and had planned to move until the acting minister proposed to make certain changes was:

That the said resolution be amended as follows:

(a) by adding after the word "made" in the seventh line thereof the words "in cash or its equivalent of any kind."

That was intended to not limit the exemption on patronage dividends to dividends paid in cash only; it was intended to apply the exemption to dividends paid in cash or some equivalent. The minister has said that he is going part of the way to meet that, and we shall have to wait until we see the bill to know how far he is going. Perhaps that may be too wide; perhaps the minister's plan may be too narrow, but when the bill is brought down the house can deal with it. The other clause of my amendment was:

That the said resolution be amended as follows:

(b) By deleting from the second line of sub-paragraph (a), and from the first line of sub-paragraph (b), the words "his customers," and substituting instead thereof "its members," and from sub-paragraph (c) the words "his contracts with his customers" and substituting instead thereof "its contracts with its members."

The point of that amendment was to see that cooperative organizations shall not be required to pay partonage dividends to non-members. The minister has given some indication that he will accept that, as I interpret his remarks. I think that is one thing that all members on this side want done, and to the extent the acting minister does it he will be meeting the wishes of hon. members.

I should like to ask also that the minister clarify as simply as possible just how he intends to apply the taxation to these three types of cooperative organizations for the last two years. I know he dealt with it this afternoon, but that was in the form of a prepared statement which I have not as yet seen.

Mr. ABBOTT: That was not a prepared statement; that was extemporaneous.

Mr. BRACKEN: Then the minister can do it extemporaneously again, and perhaps in a shorter time.

I rather hesitate to refer to a matter which was raised by one of the speakers this afternoon. Ordinarily, when a private member asks a question and requests an answer of me I do not feel compelled to give it. This afternoon the hon. member for Dauphin raised a question as to my authority to speak for this party, and he referred to someone in Winnipeg who speaks either for himself or for an organization known as the income tax payers' association.

I think every one admits that we are still living in a country where there is free speech. Mr. Thorvaldson is entitled to speak for himself or for the organization he represents. Whatever may be the merits or demerits of his attitude toward this matter, he does not speak for this party. If there is any question about that, let this one simple statement answer it. The question was raised as to the sincerity of myself or of this party with respect to this matter by the hon. member for Dauphin.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but that is not a correct interpretation of what I said. There was no question raised as to the sincerity of the leader of the opposition—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There was of this group.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I do not think there was even that. All I wanted to know was whether he or Mr. Thorvaldson spoke for the party.

Mr. BRACKEN: If the hon. member had to wait to be told that, he is not half as intelligent as he appears.

With respect to my attitude on this matter, no member who is familiar with the history of the cooperatives in western Canada can have any doubt about it. Let me say briefly that if it had not been for the stand taken by myself and two other men—I happened to be premier of Manitoba at the time; another was the premier of Saskatchewan and the other was the premier of Alberta—if it had not been for our attitude with respect to saving the cooperatives from destruction in the year 1930 there would not be any western wheat pools to-day. At that time these well-intentioned organizations, trying to serve their farmer members who formed the organizations, had advanced initial payments on hundreds of thousands of bushels of wheat at a time when the price of wheat was rising. If I remember correctly the payments advanced were 60, 70, 80 and eventually 90 cents a bushel. I am just calling on my memory because this was in 1930.

Mr. WEIR: One dollar a bushel.

Mr. BRACKEN: The hon. member for Macdonald says, "one dollar a bushel." The pools advanced that money to the farmers because the price of wheat was considerably higher, but before the crop was sold the price of wheat went down below the amount that had been advanced. These organizations, in order to finance, had borrowed from the banks, which was a legitimate business transaction, the way they were carrying on their business and had given the banks security on their organization for the repayment of the money. The banks saw the danger that was coming and they were taking the position that the grain should be sold before heavier losses were sustained. The three western premiers, feeling that, if a huge crop were dumped on the market, the price of wheat might be driven down to 30, 40 or 50 cents a bushel, went to the banks and said: "Even though you have the power, do not do this. Do not do anything that will cause the market to crash. If now you want to protect yourself and you are afraid, we will guarantee that you will get back the money you lent to these organizations on condition that you undertake not to have this crop thrown on the market."

So the crop was not thrown on the market. The three western governments guaranteed the banks against loss of the money they had advanced to these cooperative organizations. But when the accounting came, the pools got less money for the crop than they had advanced. There were other steps taken, which I need not go into now, and eventually the dominion government was brought into the matter in later years. As I said, the pools had paid the farmers more money than they got for the crop, because in the meantime the price has gone down.

What was the result? I will deal with only one province. The Manitoba pools came into the possession of the Manitoba government because of the guarantee it gave. The Manitoba government could have kept these pool elevators. It could have sold them to private concerns. It could have sold them back to the farmers themselves. What did we do? We did not keep them ourselves. We had had in that province a previous experience with government-owned elevators which was not to the credit of government ownership, although I am not blaming government ownership generally. But the results in that particular case were far from satisfactory.

We did not sell the elevators to private concerns. Everybody was looking to get the elevators at a low price. We sold them back to the original owners—the farmers—on time. They had no money, but we had faith in their integrity, and we sold these elevators back to the men who had owned them before. We sold them back to them, not at the amount we had to pay to rescue them, but at a loss of one and a quarter million dollars, and if the farmers of Manitoba to-day have a cooperative organization know as the Pool Elevator companies, it is because of that act.

While I am telling the story, let me say that the agreement entered into by that organization, as I remember it, was this. It was to pay for the elevators so much a year over twenty years. We had even to help them with their operating expenses. They have lived up not only to the spirit but to the letter of their agreement, and they now have those elevators practically all paid for.

The cooperatives in Manitoba never asked for any favour from me or from the government I led, and we never promised them any. But they expected, and we were always willing to assure them, that they would get a square deal. And now, as the hon. member for Calgary West has said, the job in this house to-day is to find a fair system of taxation of these and other organizations, to find it without discouraging or hurting these organizations, which, as so many members have said, are a splendid acquisition to the economic life of this country. I would not have referred to this personal experience of the past if it had not been for the question raised this afternoon by the hon. member for Dauphin. I do not ask this house to give favours to the pools. I agree with those who say that we must find a system of taxation which by itself will not drive the industry of this country from one kind of economic industry to another. At the same time we must recognize what Doctor Coady said this afternoon, that the pools are not only a great economic organization but a great social organization, and we in this house must not do anything to discourage their sound development.

Mr. CLEAVER: While I support the cooperatives I think it would be well that all the facts should be brought out, and if it is not going to tax too much our already overworked officials in the department I think it would be helpful if we had on the record the amount of taxes paid by the line elevators during the last five years and an estimate of the volume of business done by the line elevator companies in that period as compared with the volume of business done by the pools.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not think we can give the information for individual line elevators.

Mr. CLEAVER: I am only asking for the totals, and I am not pressing for it.

Mr. ABBOTT: We will try to get that information along with the information asked for by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I have a few questions which I think should be answered because they deal with the principle of this matter, and I think this is the proper place for them. Could the minister tell us whether the legislation he has in mind as based on the resolution to be adopted will in any way differentiate between private business and cooperative business?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, it will, more particularly with respect to non-member business. My hon. friend will appreciate that the legislation will have a differentiation in that respect.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: The next question is this. I understand that one of the first provisions of the resolution is that section 4 (p) of the Income War Tax Act will be repealed, although it does not say so in those terms?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct, and that is what the commission recommend.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Could the acting minister tell the committee briefly what are the chief reasons why it is proposed to repeal this legislation?

Mr. ABBOTT: The reasons are those given in the report of the McDougall commission and also given by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech, Hansard, page 2920, as follows:

The reasons for this recommendation—

That is, that section 4 (p) be repealed.

—are summarized in the report as follows:

"As a result of the ambiguities of language and the difficulty of administering the section, and because we are of the opinion there is no general class or group of cooperative associations in Canada to-day whose income should be declared not to be liable to taxation, we are of the opinion that the section in its present form cannot survive the attacks made upon it."

Mr. BENTLEY: I am not quite satisfied with the reply I got a little while ago, and I also think it might be well if the hon. member for Calgary West had a little bit of a reply, so far as possible, given him to-night to his question. His question was, "What is a cooperative and what is a profit?" This resolution is important because it deals with those two very things.

All through our life in western Canada we were in the low income groups, mostly speaking. Every dollar we had to spend to provide for the needs of our families was important. We endeavoured to deal with the various dealers and concerns which we had to buy our goods from at the place of business where we thought we could get the best services or goods for the least amount of money. We found that this was not working as well as we should have liked. We had learned that in other countries, and even in other parts of Canada, there was a way of doing this, to save ourselves some money by buying collectively, because we felt there were too many middlemen between us and the place where our goods were manufactured, or between us and the product of our labour from the farm and the place where it was finally put into consumable form, that we did not get our full share of the consumer's dollar for our wheat and meat and other farm products, and that we paid far more than the actual cost of manufacture of the goods we had to buy; that there were too many middlemen. Therefore we built these cooperative organizations so that we could pool our money in a collective way, to buy the goods we required with the least use of middlemen or speculators between the makers of these goods and ourselves. We did the same thing in building our marketing organizations. We endeavoured to build by the pooling of our money, not for the sake of interest on the money, but to put the money together to build marketing facilities and a machine which would take a little bit closer, under our own control, our grain and products to the people who were actually going to consume those goods.

That was our purpose. We tried a variety of methods in both the producer and consumer fields, and the dividing line is so thin that some day we may have to debate that point, but I will not do it to-night.

Earlier in the evening I asked the minister a question about the revolving-door fund and how it would be taxed, and when I had finished someone said that I was just as clear about it as the minister, and he did not understand a word. I said I appreciated the compliment. I am sorry if the minister did not understand what I meant, and I am going to try to make it clear to him. He stated that the intention is to tax any increase in a revolving fund. My question was, what place do you decide is the point above which is an increase? I drew up a little table here to show how a revolving fund works, and why I wanted this question answered, and how the minister might answer it.

I am going to assume that we started a cooperative, a consumer cooperative, if you like, in 1940. We operated that year. One man who had a good-sized family and ran a tractor bought his gasoline, drugs, hardware and groceries from that place, and the amount was a thousand dollars. I make it a thousand for the sake of the even figure. The patronage dividend declared at the end of the season was four per cent, which is $40, fifty per cent of which, by agreement with the cooperative is retained, in the revolving-door fund, to revolve back into his pocket after being employed for four years; that is, in the fifth year it would come back. So that in 1940 he put $20 into that reserve. In 1941 business was not quite so good, so that the dividend declared was not quite so high; it was three per cent on the same amount of goods bought by this man. Therefore the dividend at three per cent is $30, half of which stays in, namely, $15, making $35 all told. In 1942, on the same amount of business, but because of fluctuations in cost of operation and so on, the dividend is 3½ per cent; that is $35 on the $1,000, or $17.50 in the revolving fund.

Do you wish to call it eleven o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. ABBOTT: I wonder if the committee would allow my hon. friend to complete his example, so that I can have the week-end to look it over.

Mr. BENTLEY: It will take me about five minutes. I should like to complete it.

Mr. ABBOTT: It would be helpful to have the statement, so that I may have an opportunity of checking on the matter.

Mr. BENTLEY: I gave the amount in 1942, $17.50. In 1943, the fourth year, the business in the cooperative has been a little better; that is, it has been more efficient in operation, or in some way the dividend is as high as it was in the first year; that is, four per cent again, or $40, fifty per cent of which, or $20, remains in the revolving fund. Added together, this means that in those four years this individual has in the fund $72.50.

Let us now understand the purpose of this fund. It is not for investment purposes; it is his share of the money necessary to provide the facilities and the machinery required to supply him with these goods and services from the shelf, out of the tank, or through the warehouse. He has already paid for these facilities with that. Having served their purpose, they then come back to him from the earnings of the next year, because in that year new members come in and should take a responsible share of financing their share of these facilities which are to serve them, because this is clearly a service organization.

In the fifth year, 1944, the dividends declared on the same amount of money are 4½ per cent, which makes $45. That gives him $22.50. That would be a total of $95 that year. The first year, 1940, revolves, and therefore he gets $20 back. That leaves his fund $75. There has been a variation in the fund of $2.50. This year, having got the first year's back it is $2.50 higher, if my mathematics are correct. Does the minister get the point? It can vary from year to year according to the efficiency of the organization and the ability of the men they hire to operate it and buy the goods that they wish to buy collectively to put there. All the way along, because of the operations, they can increase or decrease the dividends, which will vary from year to year. The point I am getting at is, at what stage does the government's plan say the fund has reached a level from which an increase in the revolving fund is considered to have taken place for taxation purposes? Does the minister get the point?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think I follow my hon. friend, but I would ask if he would allow me to read his statement in Hansard and give him an answer later? If the committee wishes to pass the resolution I shall give the answer on the next resolution or at some other time. It would be better if I followed his statement in Hansard and gave a considered reply. Will the committee care to pass the resolution?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Resolution stands.

Progress reported.

It being five minutes after 11 o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, July 29, 1946

The house met at eleven o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

MANUFACTURE OF RAILWAY CARS FOR RUSSIAN GOVERNMENT

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Did the government arrange for the manufacture of railway cars for the Russian government with the Eastern Car company and other concerns in Canada?
2. If so (a) what number; (b) at what price; (c) at what point of delivery?
3. Have any such cars been condemned, sold or offered for sale for scrap or other purposes? If so, at what price?
4. What loss, if any, is entailed and who pays same?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Yes; under mutual aid board arrangements.

2. (a) 1,500 flat cars. Eastern Car company, New Glasgow, N.S.

700 flat cars. National Steel Car Corp., Hamilton, Ont.

800 flat cars. Canadian Car and Foundry Co. Ltd., Montreal, Que.

(b) Eastern Car company. 1,500 cars including all spares and components—$4,370.29 each.

National Steel Car Corp. Ltd. 700 cars including all spares and components—$4,697.02 each.

Canadian Car and Foundry Co. Ltd. 800 cars including all spares and components—$4,383.99 each.

The basic unit prices on all three contracts were originally established at a firm price of $4,260 per car, including standard spare parts. However, the final prices paid were slightly higher due to the fact that extra spare parts and other components were required on some of the cars as production got under way. The reason for the discrepancy in the final prices paid to the different contractors is due to the fact that some of the cars manufactured by one contractor required more extra spare parts and extra work than did other cars which were produced by the other contractors.

(c) The above prices are all f.o.b. contractor's plants and shipments were consigned to the legation of the U.S.S.R. in Canada, Vancouver, B.C. for transhipment to the U.S.S.R. in Soviet ships.

3. Of the 3,000 flat cars produced, 1,356 units were delivered to the Soviet Union and the balance, 1,644 units, were declared surplus to War Assets corporation by the mutual aid board. The cars are of a type not standard in this country and although offers have been solicited for them as cars on a very wide basis by War Assets corporation, no sale has been consummated to date. Because of the acute shortage of cast iron and steel scrap and the possibility that the cars may ultimately have to be scrapped, an experimental scrapping operation was run on six cars to determine the net scrap recovery and the price which would therefore have to be obtained for the cars as cars to justify the loss of the scrap.

4. As the whole cost of this project was being borne by the Canadian government as a part of mutual aid to the U.S.S.R. any receipts by War Assets corporation from the sale of these cars as cars or as scrap will result in a reduction of the total expenditure made by the Canadian government to assist our ally.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX—REFUNDABLE PORTION

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia):

What is the total amount of refundable portion of the excess profit tax payable to Canadian companies for the years 1941-42-43-44-45?

Mr. McCANN:

Tax Year	Estimated Refundable Portion
1941	Nil
1942	$30,000,000
1943	65,000,000
1944	70,000,000
1945	68,000,000
1946	10,000,000

HULL IRON AND STEEL FOUNDRIES—INCOME TAX

Mr. HOMUTH:

1. Does the Hull Iron and Steel Foundries Limited, owe the Income Tax Department any money?
2. If so, how much?
3. Is this sum for the year 1945?
4. If not, what years is it for and what sum for each of such years?

Mr. McCANN:

1. Yes.
2. Not finally determined.
3. Only in part.
4. For the years 1941 to 1946 inclusive.

PENSIONS TO WAR VETERANS

Mr. GRAYDON:

How many service personnel of world war II have been granted pensions?

Mr. TUCKER: Return at June 30, 1946: disability pension, 45,298.

REDCLIFF-RONALANE IRRIGATION PROJECT

Mr. WYLIE:

1. Have any contracts been let in connection with construction on the Redcliff-Ronalane irrigation project in 1946?

2. If so, to whom and when?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier):

1. No.

2. See answer to No. 1.

EXPORTS TO CUBA—FISH AND POTATOES

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. What was our total export of fish, with value, to Cuba, each year from 1915 to 1945 inclusive?

2. What was our total export of potatoes, with value, to Cuba, each year from 1915 to 1945 inclusive?

Mr. MacKINNON:

1 and 2. Canadian exports to Cuba of fish and potatoes during each year from 1915 to 1945:—

RADIO BROADCASTING—C.B.C. CONTRACTS WITH GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS OR AGENCIES

Mr. FRASER:

1. Has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation any contracts with any departments, or agencies, of the government?

2. If so, what are these contracts for?

3. How long do they run?

Mr. McCANN:

1. Yes. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has advertising contracts for the wartime prices and trade board, the Department of Agriculture food information committee, and the Department of Labour, entered into on behalf of its own stations and private stations on its networks.

2. Contracts for wartime prices and trade board: "Household Counsellor"; "Ami du Consommateur".

Contracts for Department of Agriculture food information committee: "This Hungry World"; "Partageons avec ceux qui ont faim"; spot announcements.

Contracts for Department of Labour: spot announcements.

3. "Household Counsellor": Monday through Friday, July 1 to October 25, 1946.

"Ami du Consommateur": Monday through Friday, July 15 to November 1, 1946.

"This Hungry World": Thursdays, June 20 to September 12, 1946.

"Partageons avec ceux qui ont faim": Thursdays, June 20 to September 12, 1946.

Spot announcements for Department of Labour, dealing with unemployment insurance in the lumber industry: Six occasions commencing July 26.

Spot announcements for Department of Agriculture: Four occasions commencing July 18.

SALES TAX

Mr. PROBE:

1. On what consumer goods or services does the government levy the 8 per cent excise sales tax?

2. What consumer goods or services are exempt from payment of the 8 per cent excise sales tax?

3. What revenue was derived by the government for each of the goods or services enumerated in question 1 above in each of the three past fiscal years?

Mr. McCANN:

1. The Special War Revenue Act imposes the sales tax on all goods produced and sold for consumption or imported into Canada. Services are not subject to this tax.

2. Those goods specifically enumerated in the exempting sections of the act, particularly schedule III.

3. No segregation of the yield of sales tax from any commodity is made. The total revenue derived from this tax for the past three fiscal years was as follows:—

1943-44, $339,255,631; 1944-45, $401,108,503; 1945-46, $326,252,798.

ST. MARY-MILK RIVER IRRIGATION PROJECT

Mr. WYLIE:

1. What steps have been taken by the government to proceed with the construction of the irrigation project on the St. Mary-Milk river, during 1946?

2. Have contracts been let?

3. If so, to whom and at what figure?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier):

1. Headquarters have been established, arrangements for power have been made, acquisition of necessary lands is in progress and a contract for the irrigation and diversion tunnels has been let.

2. See answer to No. 1.

3. To Bennett and White Calgary Limited: $798,916.

IMMIGRATION—MEDICAL INSPECTION DEPOTS IN EUROPE

Mr. THATCHER:

1. In what European countries does the immigration department maintain medical inspection depots at the present time?

2. What steps have been taken by the immigration department to set up additional depots?

3. At what points will these new medical depots be located?

Mr. GLEN:

1. There are no Canadian immigration medical officers located in continental European countries at the present time.

2. The matter is under active survey and the governments concerned are being consulted.

3. Decision cannot be made until action referred to in No. 2 above is completed.

UNITED NATIONS—EDUCATIONAL, SCIENTIFIC AND CULTURAL ORGANIZATION

Mr. KNIGHT:

What action has the government taken towards (a) the ratification of the charter for UNESCO; (b) the setting up of a national commission or committee to act as an agency of liaison between the Canadian government and the main body of UNESCO?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

(a) If time permits during the present session of parliament a resolution will be introduced in parliament for approval of Canadian participation in UNESCO. Following upon such approval acceptance of the constitution of UNESCO will be completed.

(b) For some time past the government has been considering the form a UNESCO national commission might take in this country. It is not expected that such a national commission would act as "an agency of liaison between the Canadian government and the main body of UNESCO" but rather it would assist the government in dealing with matters relating to the activities of UNESCO.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY—CLAIM OF DENNIS H. SAUVE

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East):

1. Did the crown sue the Canadian Pacific Railway company to recover damages as a result of injuries sustained in 1940 by Dennis H. Sauve, K37496, a Canadian soldier when travelling to Vancouver over the Kettle Valley line?

2. Was this claim settled out of court?

3. How much did the crown accept in settlement of this claim?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. $300.

*VIOLATION OF ALTERNATIVE SERVICE REGULATIONS

Mr. COLDWELL:

How many men are now serving prison terms for violation of alternative service regulations?

Mr. MITCHELL: None.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Mr. PROBE:

1. What mileage of Trans-Canada highway is now completed and hardsurfaced (a) in Canada; (b) in each of the provinces?

2. What mileage of the Trans-Canada highway still remains incomplete (a) in Canada; (b) in each of the provinces?

3. What contracts for construction work on the Trans-Canada highway have been entered into by the federal government in the fiscal year 1946-47 in each of the provinces?

4. What financial grants have been made by the dominion government for highway construction of any nature in 1944, 1945, 1946, in each province?

INDIAN RESERVATIONS

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. How many Indian reservations are there in Canada?

2. Where is each located?

3. How many Canadian Indians are (a) in reservations; (b) outside reservations?

Mr. GLEN: Return tabled.

VETERANS LAND ACT—OXFORD COUNTY, ONTARIO

Mr. DANIEL:

1. How many farms have been purchased in Oxford County, Ontario, under the Veterans Land Act?

2. Where are these farms located, when and from whom were they purchased?

3. What are the names of the veterans now established on these farms?

VETERANS LAND ACT—INGERSOLL, ONTARIO

Mr. DANIEL:

1. How many houses are being constructed under the Veterans Land Act at Ingersoll, Ontario, in the township of West Oxford?

2. Who has the contract for the building of these houses?

3. How soon will these houses be ready for occupancy?

4. What does it cost to guard these houses while they are under construction?

5. What is the average cost of each house?

6. From whom was this land purchased and what was the price per acre paid?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Order for return.

Mr. TUCKER: With the exception that the figures will not be given in regard to the prices paid.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

WAR ASSETS—FAIRMILES AND CORVETTES

Mr. FRASER:

1. What Fairmiles and corvettes have been declared surplus by the navy?

2. What equipment was on each of these boats at the time they were declared surplus?

3. What inventory of equipment was received by the War Assets Corporation regarding each of these boats?

WAR VETERANS—YUKON TERRITORY

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. Are war veterans of Yukon Territory entitled to financial assistance from the government of Canada in purchasing lots in towns in Yukon and in the construction of homes thereon for their families and themselves?

2. If so, from what department of government, in what amounts and on what terms?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT—DOCTOR DAVID SHUGAR

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

For a copy of transcript of evidence given by Doctor David Shugar before the royal commission appointed under order in council P.C. 411, and including therein any observations or statements made by the commissioners.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to have to oppose this motion. The following is from page 689 of the Report of the Taschereau-Kellock royal commission:

We respectfully recommend:

(1) That, because of the introduction into the evidence, necessarily and unavoidably of secret technical data, the publication of which, according to the witnesses most concerned, would not be in the public interest at this time, none of the evidence or exhibits relating to any top secret, secret, restricted or confidential matters be published except with the approval of the government in consultation with the heads of the services, departments or organizations concerned.

The motion of the hon. member is for all the evidence of one Doctor Shugar before the royal commission. I have not read the whole of the evidence, but I have read enough of it to find that it does refer to and discuss matters which come within the terms of that recommendation of the royal commission, and which it would be against the public interest to publish at this time. The matters which I noticed particularly were those having relation to scientific apparatus called asdic and radar.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, in view of my right hon. friend's explanation, I must necessarily accept the decision made. But there is one thing—and I speak with the consent of the house and Your Honour—that strikes me as most improper in the report of the royal commission. It is this, as it appears at page 683 of that report:

While it is sitting, and until its existence terminates, it is not subordinate to any body.

That is a serious thing, particularly in view of the fact that this commission saw fit to publish part of the evidence condemning certain persons, unheard; and when those who are placed under suspicion ask for the opportunity to let the people of Canada know what they said, and in respect of which guilt was fixed on them, unheard, the answer is that it is not in the public interest to give the information. That is a very serious invasion of private rights in this country.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I suggest to the minister that many of us are much disturbed about this matter. Could not a small committee of the house be set up on the understanding that any reading of the evidence would be regarded by them as confidential, so far as the safety of the country is concerned?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have no objection to the evidence given by Doctor Shugar being made available to a small committee, provided of course the members of that committee would say that they would not use the information they would gain from a perusal of the evidence, or that they would not themselves publish the information which they might have gained through such perusal. I understand that it will be rather difficult to draw a line. If some hon. members differed from us on the question whether the making of certain things known would endanger the safety of the state, it would be difficult to discuss such disagreement without referring to what is in the evidence. However, if the leaders wish to have a small committee join with me to go over it, I should have no objection.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If I might make reference to what has been said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), I would not agree to a committee laying secrecy on top of secrecy.

Mr. COLDWELL: What about a royal commission?

Motion dropped.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—RESIGNATION OF CHIEF COMMISSIONER

Mr. DUBOIS:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents in the possession of the department relative to the resignation of Louis J. Trottier, chief commissioner of the unemployment insurance commission.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have already tabled the documents referred to in this motion, and I suggest that it be dropped.

Motion dropped.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION—VANCOUVER "PROVINCE"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour, of which I was unable to give him notice, but which I am sure he will be in a position to answer. Has he taken steps to implement the report of the industrial disputes inquiry commission which looked into the dispute between the Vancouver Province and the international typographical union?

Mr. MITCHELL: I believe I received the report on Friday. Steps have been taken by myself to endeavour to bring the parties together.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister's statement refers to the principal parties suggested in the report.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

IMMIGRATION

ADMISSION TO CANADA OF MEMBERS OF POLISH ARMY—WIVES OF SERVICE PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice respecting a matter discussed last Thursday. Will the Dutch and Belgian wives and fiancees of service and ex-service men be given priority over the 4,000 Polish army men to be admitted to Canada?

Right Hon. L. S. St. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): That is a question I cannot answer. The arrangements to bring to Canada 4,000 Polish ex-service men are being made by the United Kingdom government and the Canadian government, in cooperation. Some of the men are to be brought directly from Italy to a Canadian port. I cannot say in what way that might clash with the movement of wives or dependents of our own army personnel.

Mr. FRASER: I should like to ask the Minister of Mines and Resources if the transportation to Canada from Holland and Belgium of the wives and fiancees of ex-service men has been held up because the immigration branch has not had officers over there. I understand officers are being sent from Canada to those countries. Will these wives and fiancees now be given priority?

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): I shall take note of the hon. member's question and answer it to-morrow.

WAR ASSETS

AVAILABILITY OF DREDGING EQUIPMENT FOR EMERGENCY PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. DESMOND (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Reconstruction. Would it be possible on priority if that can be obtained, to procure dredging equipment, if it is available, prior to its being turned over to War Assets corporation?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): I did not understand what kind of equipment the hon. member referred to.

Mr. DESMOND: Emergency dredging and drag-line equipment.

Mr. HOWE: I presume that this equipment is owned by some department of government. It might be possible to borrow it to meet an emergency, but the sales of any war equipment can only be through War Assets corporation.

Mr. DESMOND: I have been given to understand that if there were a priority to meet an emergency it would be possible to release such equipment for use prior to its being placed in the hands of War Assets corporation.

Mr. HOWE: As I have said, the present custodian of the equipment might be able to release or to lend it. But if a sale is contemplated, it must be made by War Assets corporation in due course.

WHEAT

INITIAL PAYMENT AND DOMESTIC PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. When answering a question the other day from this side of the house the minister indicated that he would be making a further statement with respect to the initial payment for wheat and possibly the domestic price for wheat. Can he now say when he will be able to make that statement.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): It must be made before Wednesday.

Mr. BRACKEN: That means to-morrow.

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes.

[Mr. Glen.]

ATOMIC ENERGY

PUBLIC CONTROL AND SUPERVISION OF DEVELOPMENT, APPLICATION AND USE—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to bill No. 165, relating to the development and control of atomic energy.

Mr. GREEN: Explain.

Mr. MacINNIS: Has the minister a statement to make on the amendment? Is there anything that he disagrees with?

Mr. HOWE: The amendments are purely in connection with language. There has been no change in the intent of the bill, and therefore I am quite prepared to move concurrence.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENT AS TO LOAN PROVISIONS—CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved the second reading of bill No. 306, to amend the National Housing Act, 1944.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving the second reading of this bill, I would like to comment upon the amendments to the National Housing Act which we seek at this time. The bill itself is rather voluminous. However, the real changes are fewer than would appear.

Hon. members will recall that at the last session of parliament the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act was passed. The act provides under section 18:

> The Corporation shall, on behalf of His Majesty and in the place of the minister, have, exercise and perform all rights, powers, duties, liabilities and functions of the minister under the housing acts or under any contract entered into under the said acts, except the authority of the minister under the said acts to pay moneys out of the consolidated revenue fund, or under section twelve of the National Housing Act, 1944, to make grants for slum clearance.

This bill contains thirty-eight clauses, of which twenty-six clauses make no substantial change to the National Housing Act other than to give effect to this transfer of authority which I have just described. I do not think hon. members will wish me to review each one of these twenty-six clauses, particularly as they do not involve any change in principle or policy. I will, therefore, limit my remarks to an explanation of the other twelve clauses of the bill, which in varying degree, affect the operations of the act.

I will deal first with clause 2 which deletes, from the definition of the cost of construction, the proviso that in the case of a loan for the construction of a house on a farm, the appraised value of the land shall be deemed to be not more than 20 per cent of the actual expenditure and other expenses and charges. This deletion is desirable to make the definition of cost of construction conform to a subsequent amendment changing the basis for loans for farm housing.

Clause 3 of the bill redefines economic rental of a family housing unit. No change in principle is involved, and the purpose of the amendment is to clarify the intent of the definition.

Similarly clause 4 clarifies the meaning of the definition of housing project. We wish to make it clear that in the case of a rental housing project, buildings other than houses necessary to a planned development may be included in the lending value.

Clause 5 of the bill introduces an amendment to the definition of a metropolitan area. "Metropolitan area" is now defined as a city together with one or more adjacent municipalities in the same province. We wish to delete the phrase "in the same province" which serves no useful purpose. The adjacency of Ottawa and Hull is the main reason for this change. This clause also redefines the "minister" as the "Minister of Reconstruction and Supply" instead of the "Minister of Finance". When speaking on the resolution I outlined the administrative changes which had taken place.

The change contemplated by clause 7, besides replacing "minister" by "corporation" is rearrangement of order and involves no change in principle. This clause was previously contained in the section dealing particularly with farm housing, whereas the travelling expenses allowed to lending institutions are equally applicable to other joint loans. We feel that it would be more logical and would avoid confusion if this section formed a part of section 3 of the Act.

Clause 8 provides for the heading of part I, "Housing for home owners" to follow rather than to precede section 3, because section 3 has application not only to loans for home owners, but also to housing for rental purposes and farm housing.

Clause 9 widens the scope of the operations of the National Housing Act in that the corporation will be given authority to make loans on houses where the owner has a leasehold interest in the land. At present it is not possible to make a National Housing Act loan in our national park areas. The Department of Mines and Resources quite properly is unwilling to sell land to a prospective home owner in our national parks. However, they are willing to grant a lease for a satisfactory term. I think hon. members will agree that it is desirable for the terms of the National Housing Act to be available in such areas as Banff and Jasper. It is not the intention to use this authority, if granted, to promote National Housing Act loans on leasehold land in urban areas. In most cases the crown in right of Canada or in right of the provinces will be the owner of the land. Consideration has been given to qualifying for National Housing Act loans only leasehold land owned by the dominion or the provinces. It may well prove to be the case that it will be desirable to finance housing on leasehold land owned by individuals who are willing to arrange leases of sufficient term and under conditions which adequately safeguard the interests of His Majesty as mortgagee.

Clause 10 defines the type of security to be taken with leasehold property. It is complementary to Clause 9.

Clause 10 also provides for loans to home owners for a period of twenty-five years instead of twenty years as at present. It also provides that in areas adequately planned the loan may be made for a term of thirty years. When speaking to the resolution I dealt rather fully with the reasons for this change. I would like to repeat that the increased costs of construction have resulted in larger loans. The veteran is faced with heavier monthly repayments on the larger loan. We feel that under the present system of lending, there is no great risk incurred by increasing the term of amortization to twenty-five years. Monthly payments of principal, interest and one-twelfth of the annual taxes afford a large measure of protection. It is interesting to note that under the National Housing Act in the United States, the most usual term of loan is twenty-five years. It is to be remembered that the period of risk is not the period of amortization. For instance, in the case of a twenty year loan, 50 per cent has been repaid in twelve years. In the case of a twenty-five year loan, 50 per cent of the loan has been repaid in sixteen years. Generally I believe that when about one-half of the original loan has been repaid, the mortgage is well out of the risk area, not only because of reduced amount owing, but also because of the long record of payment by the borrower. We intend to apply the extra five years of amortization particularly to types of housing which we wish to encourage. For example, we feel that the extremely small four room bungalows of some seven hundred square feet are not the type of construction which should be encouraged by a loan with longer amortization. We would prefer for the same home owner to arrange a larger mortgage with the longer amortization on a one and a half storey six room house even if the upper two rooms are not finshed until a later date. Extra financing of 13·9 per cent can be made available with longer amortization without increasing the monthly payments of principal and interest. It would be our intention to apply the twenty-five year amortization basis only to the more desirable classes of property which we wish to encourage.

Clause 13 introduces a new section—section 4A—to give authority to the corporation to enter into agreements to safeguard the interests of His Majesty in loans on leasehold land.

Hon. members will recall that in the War Measures Act provision was made by order in council for housing under the integrated plan. In my remarks upon the resolution I reviewed operations under this plan and indicated its terms and conditions. We feel that the integrated plan, which this year will produce some two or three thousand units, lends promise of even greater development next year. We feel that the plan is admirably suited for the best interests of the owner, builder and the government. It is affording control upon the sale price of new houses; it is assuring that materials are channeled into veterans' housing. Clause 13 also gives authority to the corporation to continue with this plan after the order in council is repealed. It will also be noted that provision is made for the appropriations already voted for loans and losses under part I to be used to finance loans under the integrated plan.

Under clause 14 a change is made to section 6 (1) of the National Housing Act. Hon. members will notice this subsection gives authority to determine the amount of the loss in respect of a loan under part I. It is quite evident that the intention of this subsection was to give authority for determining losses under all parts of the act. The amendment which I propose gives effect to this intention.

This clause also introduces two new subsections, 6(3) and 6(4). Subsection 3 is necessary to carry out the powers given in respect of the integrated housing plan when it becomes necessary to purchase a house which, under the integrated agreement, the builder may require the corporation to buy. Subsection 4 provides for the funds to make these purchases out of the appropriation provided by section 7 of part I.

[Mr. Howe.]

It will be noted that clause 14 rearranges the manner in which regulations are made for the administrative functions of parts I and III of the act. No very great change in principle is involved, but now that the corporation is taking over the main administrative duties in operating the act, it is felt that the revision proposed will be more practical. The governor in council will continue to make regulations on these administrative matters where necessary, but it will be noticed that the new section 5(2) of the act provides that the corporation may prescribe procedural matters in connection with an application for a loan, the calculation of the cost of construction, standards, and whether it is desirable to take additional security.

Clause 15 substitutes the corporation for the minister, but makes no change in the length of amortization for rental housing comparable to the lengthening of the amortization period we seek for home owners. Section 8(2) of the National Housing Act provides for a term of loan for rental housing not in excess of twenty years. Where the project is protected by community planning and appropriate zoning, the loan may be for a period not in excess of twenty-five years. Although we would like to see an increased amount of rental housing, we do not believe that lengthening the amortization period will have that effect. We believe that it is not advisable to make any change in this section at this time.

Clause 15 introduces additional lending facilities under new section 9A of the National Housing Act which I reviewed when speaking to the resolution. We are in very short supply of housing in outlying areas. This is particularly true in mining and lumbering communities. From all points of view it would be desirable for on-site operations of lumbering and mining companies to employ a larger number of men, and particularly married men. The day of the bunk house is over, even for single men. Mining and lumbering companies are having difficulties in inducing married men to enter their employ because of the impossibility of bringing their families with them. We feel that every encouragement should be given to the development of family housing units in outlying areas, particularly adjacent to on-site operations of the lumbering and mining compaines. The type of housing will vary according to location. It will range all the way from temporary housing units on skids to fully modern permanent houses. The development of such programme is hampered by the lack of materials. It is also restricted by lack of financing facilities. Loans on this type of security are almost a blind spot in our credit structure. In many cases they are so remote or are located in such unmortgagable property that the mortgage lending institutions cannot provide financing. The capital investment for a substantial number of units places too great a strain upon the working capital position of the lumbering or mining company. Bank loans, besides being a demand obligation and current liability of the lumbering and mining company, are generally made with terms of repayment which provide too short a period to be appropriate for housing units, particularly when the company is depending upon the rentals from such housing units to provide the cash to liquidate the loan. The proposed amendment outlines in detail the type of loan which we propose. The main features are:

1. The loans are made to, or are guaranteed by, the lumbering or mining company.

2. The term of amortization may be as long as fifteen years.

3. The rate of interest is 4 per cent.

4. The company cannot earn on its investment in the housing project more than the 4 per cent interest rate. Any current surplus must be used for a rent reduction fund. Should an equity exist after the loan is repaid, and the company has recovered its investment with not more than the 4 per cent interest, the value of the residue shall be used for charitable purposes or community benefits.

5. Minimum standards for this type of housing will be very flexible because the type of housing, the locality, and the needs will vary greatly.

6. The maximum loan will be 80 per cent of the lending value, although in many cases I think that the loans will be considerably less than 80 per cent.

7. Provision is made for the sale of such houses by the company to home owners. In such cases the company will remain on the covenant of the mortgage even for that portion which has been sold to a home owner. Provision will be made that if the home owner's account is current, default in the blanket mortgage will not prejudice his position.

8. The corporation, before recommending a loan for approval by the governor in council, will satisfy itself through inquiry to other government departments that the area in which the housing is to be erected has a productive period sufficient to justify the loan, and that the proposed housing is necessary in the area, and generally will result in additional employment.

I feel that this proposal will be a very valuable addition to the lending facilities under the National Housing Act. Many lumbering and mining companies are interested in housing and willing to do something about it. In most cases that have been brought to our attention, the obstacle has been a lack of suitable financing even more than the lack of materials. I would hope that it might be possible for prefabricated housing to be used for this purpose, particularly in areas where on-site skilled building labour is very scarce. In my opinion, the proposed amendment is the most efficient, cheapest and expeditious manner of meeting a very real need.

Clause 15 puts in statutory form the home conversion plan as new section 9B. There is only a modest amount in the estimates for additional development of the home conversion plan because it is not likely that many projects will be undertaken during this fiscal year. Materials are in short supply, costs are high, the number of houses suitable for conversion under the plan are few, and even those houses which are suitable cannot, in most cases, be vacated to allow the conversion to take place. As I mentioned in my remarks on the resolution, there are two hundred and sixty properties which have been converted, creating some twenty-one hundred units. It is our intention to repeal the orders in council under which this plan was authorized. We seek this new section of the National Housing Act because the corporation must continue to hold, operate and manage existing properties. Moreover, we would like to be in a position to convert any buildings suitable for the purpose, few in number though they may be.

Clause 15 also reenacts section 10 of the act, which gives the governor in council power to make regulations for rental housing. The changes proposed for new section 10 of the National Housing Act are similar to those that I described earlier for new section 5 of the National Housing Act which provides for the same type of regulation for housing for home owners.

Clause 17 of the bill proposes a modification to the authority already granted to the insurance companies to make direct investments in low or moderate rental property. It will be remembered that such investments when approved by the corporation, are subject to a guarantee by the government ensuring a 2½ per cent return to the insurance company. The insurance companies may invest up to 5 per cent of their Canadian assets under section 11.

Some of the insurance companies are showing great interest in this form of investment and would like to develop in Canada projects similar to those of the Metropolitan Life in the United States such as the Parkchester multiple unit development in New York and the horizontal developments in other communities. In light of our very great need for housing of this type, I am sure that the house will commend our efforts to stimulate the interest of the insurance companies in this field of endeavour.

We believe that section 11 is satisfactory in its present form, except for one factor. The first step towards the development of projects either individually or on a national basis is the acquisition of land suitable for the purpose. Experience both in Canada and the United States has shown that this must be done some time before the project can be determined in final form. In order to secure land at a reasonable price, some degree of secrecy must be maintained. In some cases this can be achieved by securing options, in other cases, the land must be purchased. It would be most inadvisable to secure firm bids for construction from a number of contractors while the acquisition of the site was still under negotiation. Some companies are anxious to plan on a national basis, and for various reasons do not wish to proceed with all projects simultaneously. Opportunities to secure very desirable sites arise from time to time and it would be desirable for the companies to be in a position to acquire land which would be developed over the next two or three years.

The legislation in its present form makes such investment legal for life companies—including the purchase of the land or an option—only when the corporation has approved the project in all detail including the cost of land, the cost of construction, design, lay-out, rental levels, etc. The existing section contemplates simultaneous acquisition of land and approval of the project including the cost of construction. This is not only impracticable but also increases the cost of the project and makes an orderly two or three year programme virtually impossible. Even if the land is acquired and the project approved in the same year, and listing the land as an asset in the annual statement of the company is not involved. No authority exists. There is provision in the insurance laws of the state of New York to allow an orderly approach to the problem.

Therefore, with the concurrence of my colleague, the Minister of Finance, I propose this amendment making it possible with suitable safeguards such as prior approval by the corporation, for life companies to acquire or option land suitable for such purpose. The corporation will, at the time approval is given, ensure that:

[Mr. Howe.]

(a) The land is suitable and that the corporation will be willing to approve the project on the land at a later date.

(b) Only land within the over-all plans of the life company for projects will be approved for purchase.

(c) The amount of land so purchased will not be greater than can be developed within the limitation of 5 per cent of Canadian assets of the company. Roughly, the maximum purchases allowed will be one half of one per cent of the company's Canadian assets.

(d) The project will proceed within a reasonable period of time and there are no speculative influences in the purchase.

Inside land and even serviced land in residential fringe areas is not plentiful. We must ensure that too much of such land is not acquired for development by life companies in the distant future to the detriment and disadvantage of others who wish to erect residential property on the land in the near future.

Under this section, the guarantee to the life companies only becomes effective after the project has been approved by the corporation and construction commences. Land held for a future project is not revenue producing and it would be inappropriate for any guarantee of interest return to be applicable. We propose, that when determining the cost of construction at the time the project is approved, to include the cost of land previously acquired and to allow, as an addition to such cost, the taxes paid less any net revenue from the use of the land. We will not consider as part of the cost of construction interest on the cost of the land from the date of acquisition to the time the project is started.

Clause 19 repeals section 14 of the act and substitutes a new section providing for financing new farm housing. The existing provisions have not worked well. Except where a lending institution, willing to make the loan on the new house, is the existing mortgagee, no provision is made for refinancing an existing encumbrance. Even under such circumstances and in all other cases, the section contemplates farm land as one part, and the farm home another part of the farm. Financing has been difficult under such provisions and no loans have been made.

The amendment now proposed authorizes loans up to $5,000, the cost of the farm house or two-thirds of the appraised value of the farm, whichever is the least. If the farm is mortgaged, refinancing can take place so that the loan may be $8,000, the cost of the house and amount to repay the existing mortgage, or two-thirds of the appraised value of the farm whichever is the least. The interest is 4½ per cent and the term of the loan twenty years.

The method of appraisal has been revised and is comparable to the method used in regular farm lending. It will be noted that where sufficient equity in the farm land exists, the equity in the new farm home can be financed by that means.

Revision of minimum standards and specifications will take place. Suitable flexible requirements will be devised to ensure that sound standards of construction will be reconciled with varying local conditions and requirements.

We will try to convince the lending institutions to enter into an agreement with the corporation to make loans under this section. We wish to avoid blind spots in coverage such as we have had in the past. Although the mortgage companies are not wildly enthusiastic about farm loans at the moment, I believe they, like ourselves, are anxious to see that the facilities of the act are available to all Canadians. Their cooperation under the recent arrangement to make non-farm National Housing Act loans in the smaller outlying communities is evidence of this desire.

Hon. members will immediately recognize that this change puts the corporation into the farm loan business. This is deliberate because a farm home is an inseparable part of the farm. If we mean business in promoting and financing new farm housing the loans cannot follow an urban pattern. We prefer the principle of joint loans with a lending institution in the pattern of the National Housing Act rather than direct loans in the manner of the Canadian farm loan board. I therefore propose the amendment on that basis and expect that it will be effective. Should I be wrong, other techniques will be found because, although we like the proposed joint loan approach, the important end result is success in making these facilities available to farmers throughout the country.

I propose that this section come into force upon proclamation. Agreements with lending institutions must be worked out. Forms of joint mortgages for each province must be determined and in this respect we intend to break some new ground especially in the case of grain-growing farms. The old form of mortgage, together with a crop share lease, was not good enough even twenty years ago. We have no intention of imposing default on all housing act borrowers within an area just because there happens to be a general crop failure in that area. We will want full rights of collection from borrowers able to pay and will insist upon an adequate escape clause to postpone amounts owing by the borrower when, due to conditions beyond his control, he is unable to pay. Towards this end we will be consulting with the provinces so that their legislation, protective and otherwise, will fit National Housing Act farm mortgage deeds. This will take time and it is not likely that this section can be proclaimed for two or three months.

There are in this house a number of hon. members very familiar with the need for farm housing and who have had experience in the farm mortgage field. When we come to discuss the bill, section by section, I will welcome their comments. I think that this section is based on sound principles and will prove effective. Nevertheless, I am ready to accept suggestions for its improvement. It is an important section in light of the need of new and improved housing in the farm field in the years to come.

This, Mr. Speaker, has been a rather lengthy review of the major changes which we propose in the National Housing Act. I have attempted to touch upon each change of major import and principle. As we go through the bill clause by clause, hon. members will have the opportunity of asking questions about changes which I have not specifically mentioned today.

There is one change which might have been included in my remarks. The act in its present form gives authority for loans for a maximum number of years. Take for example, a loan under part I for twenty years with the first of the progress payments being made on January 1, 1946. Mortgage practice and convenience results in mortgage deed being drawn in a form that the borrower makes the first of his two hundred and forty monthly payments on, say, May 1, being a month or two after the completion of the house. Technically it might be argued that authority under the act only allows a loan to run until January 1, 1966. Changes are included in the present amendments to allow the period of the loan to run from the date of the completion of the house rather than from the date of the first advance.

I would like to call hon. members' attention to the fact that although "corporation" has been substituted for "minister" throughout the act, no change has been made in the sections dealing with appropriations. We propose to rely on relevant clauses in the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act which authorize the minister to advance moneys from the appropriations to the corporation for the purposes of the act.

Mr. C. C. I. MERRITT (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, the bill and the important statement which the minister made on the resolution stage are a new departure in the handling of the housing shortage in this country. They indicate to me something which I am sure everyone in the house and in the country will be very glad to hear—that the government has at last come to grips with the number one problem in the country, the housing of our people, and particularly of the returned men who obviously are bearing the brunt of the housing shortage. But at the same time, and while we welcome this evidence that the government has come to grips with the problem, surely that statement and this bill emphasize the previous lack of government policy in connection with this great problem. Surely the measures proposed by the minister and the things he has done in the last few months are proof of the government's failure to face a situation which has now prevailed in acute form for a year. And surely it shows that their attitude has been a passive waiting for improvement rather than an active attempt to deal with the matter.

The chief criticism that one can make of the statement and of the bill is that very simple one, and I submit, Mr. Speaker, it is a telling one too—that the bill is exactly a year late. This bill, and the appointment of the expediter of building materials and the concentration of housing activities under one minister, should have been brought into force at the last session of the last parliament, just before the end of the war, when victory was in sight. The need was apparent then, and plans should have been laid then. Had that been done, we would not have had the minister's statement the other day that the worst is yet to come, and his estimate that in the spring of 1947 the situation will be twenty per cent worse than it is now. I suggest that the "grin and bear it" stuff that the minister has given to the house would have been acceptable last year. The Canadian people would have realized the difficulties and, with such proposals as the minister is making now, and knowing that something was being done about it, they would have been willing last year to face a worsening of the situation in the spring of 1946 and to "grin and bear it." But this year the Canadian people will not find such a statement in any way acceptable. They will, I believe, look upon it as a confession of failure on the part of the government.

Having made that criticism, I want to refer to some of the good parts of this proposal, not only the bill but the executive measures which the minister has taken. There are, apart from some very proper developments, and, I might say, modernization of the procedure under the National Housing Act, five most important new departures which the minister has taken.

First of all, housing has been centralized under one minister, where it should always have been.

Second, we have a full-time executive charged apparently with the development of over-all policy; and it is my understanding that that wholetime executive is a very able man indeed.

Third, we have what we obviously needed for many months—for a whole year—and that is an expediter of building materials. This, I understand, is to be one of the functions of the coordinator of housing. In addition we have the committee that the minister has mentioned, set up to deal with the building material problem. He tells us that progress has been made, and we are very glad indeed to hear it.

Fourth, and very important, the National Housing Act has been redesigned to meet Canada's particular needs. I think it is right to say that prior to the amendment proposed by the minister with regard to loans for farms and for the housing of the people engaged in mining and logging—three of our great primary industries—the National Housing Act was a mere copy of the procedure in the United States and in Great Britain, and had not been orientated to suit the particular Canadian need. This has now been done, and it is a very welcome advance.

Fifth, in the minister's statement with regard to the increase of the lending value under the National Housing Act, and also in the extension of the amortization period under the act, we have further evidence of improvement which will be very much welcomed.

All these particular matters can be dealt with when we come to the sections of the bill, when no doubt many hon. members will have improvements to suggest even beyond what the minister has proposed. But the point I want to make now with respect to these five important new departures in housing practice is this. All five new departures are simple; all five are practical; all five are obvious, and all five were urged from this side of the house during the last session of parliament and no doubt before that. The members of the opposition cannot take any particular credit for suggesting such obvious advances; but what we can take credit for, and what heightens my previous statement about the delay of the government in dealing with the housing problem, is that we did recognize that all these steps should have been taken immediately, and not a year after the close of hostilities. We urged that these steps should be taken at once, but that was not done.

The minister has made some great improvements, but of course there will be very much more to do after the present emergency has somewhat settled down. I can suggest to him three rather important things he will have to do in his capacity as the minister responsible for the housing policy of the country. First of all, we will require a real low rent housing policy. Such a term is used in the act now; we talk of moderate rent housing and low rent housing, but what we have now is not low rent housing in the sense that it caters to families in the bottom third of the income brackets.

In the second place a great programme of slum clearance will have to be developed over the years. In connection with these two subjects particularly there is real need for a settlement and a definition of the relative responsibilities of the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities with respect to housing. I urge upon the minister that he lose no time in holding conversations with the provincial governments and representatives of the municipalities so that a plan may be agreed upon for a division of responsibility which will suit all those bodies and which will give us a housing policy with as little red tape and friction as possible.

The fourth point I want to suggest to him, and this is the immediate matter I wish to bring to his attention, is that there should be at once an upward revision of the targets he has set for the construction of houses in Canada and for the provision of building materials. What has the minister said with regard to the targets for the construction of homes? He has given the immediate over-all need as 150,000. That, of course, is the emergency need. According to the James report on housing, the actual need over the next ten years, as hon. members will recall, is some 730,000 houses. Then the minister said that in the spring of 1947, despite all efforts being made by the industry this year, the situation will have deteriorated so there will be an immediate need, an emergency need, for 180,000 houses; and he gives as the five-year goal the construction of 480,000 houses. His estimate for the fiscal year 1946-47 is 60,000 new houses constructed, of which I understood him to say about 15,000 will be provided by direct government agencies and the remaining 45,000 by private builders. I want to call the attention of hon. members to the fact that if, as the minister has projected, we have 60,000 houses this year, 80,000 next year and 100,000 for the following three years we shall still fall short of the target he mentioned in relation to that five-year period, namely 480,000 houses. So it is obvious that if we are to meet this need with anything like the speed and efficiency the Canadian people would desire, the minister will have to shoot at a higher target in the production of houses, starting this year. It might be said that the minister is being properly conservative, that he is going to do this but he does not want to disappoint the people by aiming too high. If that is so I am entirely in agreement, but I would point out to him also that not only may his estimate of the numbers which will be constructed be conservative, but in my opinion at least his estimate of the number that will be needed is also conservative. So I say to the minister, let him give the number as 60,000, but let him work for a very much larger number.

The other matter upon which I suggest he should raise his sights is in connection with the material shortage, which of course is the paramount factor in housing to-day. The other day the minister gave a picture which to my mind was designed to show how the situation was improving and how the government was contributing to that improvement. There is no question that the government's measures, taken on April 29, have begun to bear fruit now, and certainly we wish them well; but surely it would be wrong to suggest that the improvement in the first half of this year resulted from government action taken at the end of April. I think I can show it to be the fact that these great percentage increases in production have resulted from the natural recovery of business after the end of the war, from a very low total production during the war years when, as the minister has said, the material, the men and the effort were being put to other uses. Just to give that comment some point I want to refer to some of the figures mentioned by the minister. At page 3675 of Hansard he said:

> The supply of cement and cement products is moving steadily forward. Production volume is the highest since 1931. . . . By May, 1946, the monthly production had again increased so as to raise the per annum volume to a figure somewhat over 10,000,000 barrels.

That sounds very good, and it is very good; but I want to call the attention of the house to the fact that according to the figures of the dominion bureau of statistics, in 1929, Canada's production of cement was twelve and a quarter million barrels, so we have yet some distance to go to catch up to our production in a good year—but seventeen years ago.

Again the minister spoke about great percentage increases in the manufacture of brick. According to the figures of the dominion bureau of statistics I find that the present average monthly brick production is almost identical with that of 1945; that there has been no actual increase in the average monthly production as between 1945 and 1946. I find, too, that Canada's production of brick in 1945, and the way it is running now, is less than half the brick production in 1929.

The minister referred to the increase in the supply of wire nails. There again I find the production is no better than 1943, which appears to have been one of our highest years.

The minister referred to an improvement in the production of structural tile. In 1929 we produced 221,300 tons of this product, while in 1945 we produced only 94,244. In 1929 we produced 307,400 square feet of floor tile, while in 1945 the production was only 197,164. In 1929 we produced, in thousands, 35,077 roofing tile, whereas in 1945 none was produced. For the first five months of 1946 the figures for structural and floor tile, which are lumped together in tons by the bureau of statistics, show a production running at the rate of 120,000 tons a year, or well under half of the production in 1929.

I mention these figures not by way of criticism of the minister, but in an effort to place in true perspective the statement he made the other day, and to urge him—if he requires any urging—to go after this problem in a bigger way, a way of which he is capable, and not to be satisfied with the progress he indicated in his speech.

I turn now to the problem of increasing supply of building materials. At page 3674 of Hansard the minister said:

> Extra costs may be involved in obtaining increased output and, if so, the government is prepared to consider meeting these costs. Where plant expansion is necessary to eliminate materials bottlenecks, the method used to stimulate expansion of war plants will be made available.

I would make two comments on that statement, the first that again it is a year late, and the second that it is in the identical words, I believe, and certainly in the same sense, as the speech made by the minister in April to the Canadian club in Toronto. The house will notice that the earlier statement and the more recent one are both couched in the future tense, and do not indicate that any great progress has been made in dealing with extra costs, or with other problems which have been troubling the building materials industry.

The minister insisted the other day that price ceilings are not hampering production of building materials in Canada. At that time I attempted to indicate, offhand and from memory—I had no material in front of me—one way in which the production of one type of building material, namely lath, was being hampered by the price ceiling. Since that time I have received a report of a committee set up to deal with lumber prices and distribution in secondary industry and retail yards in Vancouver, This report is dated July 12, and a copy was sent to the minister. The whole report deals with the effect of price ceilings on the production of various articles which these lumber yards and secondary woodworking industries manufacture in Vancouver. If the minister will consult his copy, I believe he will find an answer to the problem he put to me.

One of the specific articles entering into the construction of houses, which is mentioned in the report, and the production of which is allegedly being held back by the illogical price ceilings in force with respect to these products, is fir flooring. It is stated that the retail price ceiling of flooring, when manufactured is less than the price ceiling on the flitches from which it is manufactured. Doors are almost unobtainable, and the reason given is the price ceiling. A similar condition exists with respect to lath, to which I referred the other day.

I do not wish to read in detail from the report, but in the section dealing with millwork operations they say:

> The millwork factories, generally speaking, state that they are unable to make long-distance plans unless the prices board will state its policy in regard to increases in prices of material and labour.

And again:

> In regard to doors, the prices at present authorized result in very few doors being made.

In the summary of the report one finds certain rather significant statements, in these words:

> The two most troublesome matters with which industry has to deal are the dicta of the prices board:
> (a) That industry must absorb increased labour costs without price relief unless financial distress is shown.
> (b) That price increases cannot be granted on single items or groups of items if over-all profit is satisfactory.
> In addition, the members of the committee find a distressing lack of knowledge as to what the policies of the prices board are; which prevents long distance planning and reduces business almost to a day to day venture.

And again:

> No firm faced with rising costs is willing to institute any long distance manufacturing plan based on past results. Manufacturers can only concern themselves with the conditions here present, and they state that unless the prices board can be more realistic they are unable to swing into full production.
> Concerning the suggestion that firms must manufacture loss items if the all-over profit position is satisfactory, the plain facts are that only in a few cases are these loss items continued in production.

That will give some indication of the views of this body, at least, as to the effect of price ceilings on the production of goods needed in house building. I would ask the minister when we reach the committee stage to indicate in greater detail what he is going to do to help the industry produce more building material. If the minister is right, and if price ceilings are not hampering maximum production, then what does he mean by the promise that the government will meet extra costs involved? Does that mean an increase in the price ceiling? Does it mean subsidies? What does it mean?

To my mind we must remember that we in Canada have faith in a free enterprise economy. Surely with the shortage of materials and houses the minister has shown, there should be the greatest possible challenge to private enterprise, to free enterprise. Under normal circumstances private enterprise should have no difficulty in meeting that challenge and getting after production without any great help from the government. In my view private enterprise in most respects is capable of doing this job and standing on its own feet. When the minister speaks of assisting with extra costs, I should like to know whether he means subsidies or price increases. The policy with regard to price controls on imported goods has recently been changed. I am wondering if before that policy was changed there was a lessening of importations into Canada of such items as glass and electrical equipment required in the building of houses, which are two items that we must necessarily import. One other difficulty which faces private enterprise in its efforts to meet this problem may be the necessity of obtaining quotas from the minister before they can go into production. Then again sometimes they cannot get the machinery necessary to set themselves up in business.

The minister has properly lamented over the strikes and work stoppages that have occurred. Is this not a problem for government labour policy? Should there not be a policy that would prevent these strikes and that would satisfy the various partners in industry? The government cannot just say that the strikes have occurred, and then wash its hands of responsibility for their effect upon the production of building material.

The minister spoke of assistance to building material producers by way of double depreciation. Does that mean that the taxation policy of this government is going to hamper production? The minister spoke also of a labour shortage. I will go all the way with him when he talks about the lack of skilled tradesmen and the necessity of our developing a skilled working force in the country, but what about the people who are already trained and working? Is the taxation policy of this government such that those people are willing to work and produce to the maximum of their capabilities, or is that taxation policy hampering production?

One does not hear a great deal about extra shifts, certainly not in the part of the country from which I come. I am told that the reason why there are no extra shifts being worked in the mills is a lack of logs. What can be done now that the lumber strike has been settled to get more and more men into the woods so that we can have extra shifts and increase the supply of lumber for the home market?

I should not criticize the government like this without admitting wholeheartedly that there is one factor for which the government cannot be held responsible. I refer to the shortage of materials and work stoppages in connection with the production of materials that are imported from outside Canada. I realize the serious effect that this has had upon the minister's efforts to increase production.

However, I contend that the solution of this whole problem is the government's ultimate responsibility. The reason it is not being solved faster is that which was given so regretfully by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech. After referring to the size of our national income and the amount of money we were making, he expressed regret that he did not see in the country that cooperation toward a single end which would make all things possible for us in Canada. If we could get that happy cooperation toward a single end, many of the minister's problems with regard to the production of materials and houses would be solved. It is the responsibility of this government to see that policies are put into effect which will obtain that cooperation. After all, that is the ultimate purpose of any government.

The last thing I should like to refer to is the increase in the lending value, which the minister has said will be ten per cent. This will bring the lending value up from 135 per cent to 145 or 150 per cent of 1939 prices. The minister went on at some length to explain why no other increase was possible. If, as he says, the figure of 150 per cent closely represents the additional cost of home building from 1939 to 1946, I should have no great complaint to make. But I have some figures here which I obtained from a Vancouver paper and which suggest to me that the percentage of increase over 1939 costs is much greater. If I am right, then the ten per cent increase will not do any good.

My figures deal with a house 1,000 square feet in size, built on a lot costing $500. With the lot at $500 and a 1,000 square foot house, the National Housing Act figure of $4.20 per square foot would give a total lending value of $4,700. The loan which would be granted under the act would be $4,100. The cost of construction is taken at $6 per square foot, which would make this house of 1,000 square feet cost $6,500. The owner would have to contribute $2,300 out of the total cost of $6,500, which means that he would be contributing about thirty-three per cent as a down payment. That makes it most difficult for many people to build houses.

The minister has announced a ten per cent increase. Using the same house as an illustration, and taking a similar lot costing $500, we find that the lending value on the basis of $4.62 a square foot amounts to $5,120. The loan which would be granted would be $4,384. The cost is still $6,500, and the amount the individual must put up in order to build the house is $2,116. The total saving to the person who wishes to put up a house is $184, or let us say $200 out of a total investment or a total down payment of $2,300. I suggest to the minister that that is not adequate relief. If my figures of $6 per square foot for the actual cost and the figures given by the National Housing Act authorities of $4.20 and $4.62 are accurate, they would suggest a need of further revision. I suggest to the minister that he try to raise the lending value to something more closely approximating the total cost.

Mr. JAMES SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few general remarks on the housing act and the housing policy, especially as they affect British Columbia. I have no apologies to make for speaking from the provincial point of view, because this policy is of special importance in British Columbia—not just because the difficulties of our housing problem in Vancouver are much more aggravated than in any other part of Canada, but because lumber is the basis of housing, and lumber is the real basis of our industrial economy in British Columbia.

Vancouver has long been the timber capital of Canada; indeed, it is one of the great timber centres of the world. The people in the Vancouver area have always been used to having cheap lumber in plentiful supply. So to-day when lumber is in short supply, at least to the private builder and to the veteran in the Vancouver area, you can understand why the irritation over the present housing policy is perhaps greater there than it is anywhere else in Canada. When I was at home at Easter, which is one of the few chances a western member gets to visit his constituents during the session, I visited the operators of the saw mills in my riding, which includes the greatest number of saw mills in any riding in Canada. I also visited what was left of the retail lumber yards in the Vancouver area, and also a number of building contractors, and discussed this problem with them. I found, to my surprise, that there is no lumber shortage in Canada to-day. The shortage is not in the production of lumber. It is the improper and inadequate distribution of the lumber that is being cut that is causing the trouble. I want to give a few brief figures to illustrate this point. This year we expect the greatest cut in Canada's history, roughly five billion feet of timber.

Mr. HACKETT: At some time in his speech would the hon. member be good enough to indicate what underlies this faulty distribution?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I am coming right at that now so far as the Vancouver area is concerned.

Mr. HACKETT: There is no lumber in the east.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): The cut this year across Canada will be approximately five billion feet, of which it is estimated that two billion feet will go into poles and ties and pulp and paper, leaving a balance of 3 billion feet. The domestic quota until recently was thirty-five per cent, but after the disastrous timber strike in British Columbia the Minister of Reconstruction raised that to fifty per cent to keep an abundant supply of lumber on the domestic market. Averaging those figures we get 1,200,000,000 feet of lumber, out of that three billion feet, for the domestic market. If all of that were turned into housing, which I do not believe is practicable, it would build 120,000 houses. The ordinary five-room house in Vancouver uses from 10,000 to 12,000 feet of lumber. In the east it is not as much, because you use stone and brick much more than we do. But even if just half of that estimated domestic supply of lumber were used in the houses, we would still have enough for 60,000 five-room houses in Canada. Yet on my visit home, driving around by riding, I had many complaints from veterans that they could not get lumber for building houses. In the city of Vancouver

I saw a tremendous building boom—barbecues, theatres, baseball stadiums, stores, all consuming a large amount of lumber, were being built. At the same time I was flooded with calls and letters from veterans complaining that they could not get lumber for housing, that the big operators were getting all the lumber. The answer is bad distribution—and I am speaking entirely in terms of the British Columbia trade; I cannot speak with authority on anything else.

In British Columbia there is this unusual factor. Most of the saw mills are concentrated in the Vancouver area. The logs are towed down the coast and are sawn up in the big mills. Before the war these big mills were not in the retail trade to any extent. Where they were selling big orders locally they would sell retail as any wholesale house would. But generally speaking the British Columbia market was supplied by the little lumber yards all around the town. The mills are highly specialized. Some cut big dimension timber, some pine, some flooring and laths, and so on. The small lumber yards did a very useful job in collecting the products from the great saw mills and selling them retail to the small builders. I agree with what the hon. member for Vancouver South said on the resolution, that these small lumber dealers in British Columbia have been put out of business and as a consequence the small builder who dealt with them has been practically put out of business because he cannot obtain the lumber. The reason is that these big mills have gone into the retail business completely. Before, there was a selling job to be done through the retail outlets. Now there is no selling job to be done. Everyone wants every bit of lumber he can get. It is all a matter of price. The mills are getting $26 a thousand for the lumber they turn out. The cost of logs is $25 a thousand. The saw mills are selling their lumber at below the cost of production. They have produced figures to show that it is $15 a thousand below the cost of production. I questioned Mr. Donald Gordon about that on Friday before the industrial relations committee—it is an excellent thing to give hon. members a chance to question him—and he agreed that it was government policy to sell British Columbia timber for housing in the domestic market at greatly below the cost of production, telling the operators to recoup themselves with high prices on the export trade. It is natural therefore that the mills should try to make this domestic loss as little as possible by selling their lumber retail, which gives them another $10 a thousand, making a price of $36 a thousand. If you are buying logs out of the water at $25 a thousand you are not going to make much by selling the lumber at $36 a thousand.

Mr. MERRITT: I understand that there has recently been an increase of $6 a thousand in logs, so that No. 1 logs are now selling at $40, No. 2 at $35 and No. 3 at $25.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I am talking about cheapest grades at the mills. Those are similar increases in the higher grades.

Mr. MERRITT: I am simply pointing out that the situation is worse.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Yes, and when these big saw mills go into the retail trade they have not the facilities that the small yard has. The price of labour in the British Columbia lumber industry is the highest in Canada. The big contractor who is building a factory or a baseball stadium wants hundreds of thousands of feet of lumber, with say fifty thousand feet of two by fours. In the lumber yards lumber is stocked in sling loads, 2,000 feet in a stack, which can be lifted on a truck as a unit. It is no bother for the saw mill to sell to such a buyer, who simply lifts the stack on to his truck. However when the veteran goes to the mill with a requisition for 10,000 or 12,000 feet, four pages of typewritten requisitions for different types of lumber, so much flooring, so much sheeting, so much joists, wall board, shingles, and all the rest, the saw mill has not sufficient labour to go running around the yards to sort out fifty feet here, a hundred feet there, five hundred feet there, and so on, to fill the veteran's order. So it is the big contractor who is getting the bulk of the lumber produced in the Vancouver area to-day, simply because the saw mills are trying to cut their losses. He is engaged perhaps on a big-time housing project but also in building moving picture theatres, baseball stands, barbecues and all the rest.

The saw mills which were in business before the war are still selling their quotas to the retail outlets, but there has been a great change in the ownership of the saw mills. Buyers from the east have come in, even brewers, who saw that the lumber trade was going to be profitable in time of war. The result is that many of the mills have changed hands and then have broken off the relations the mill had with the retail outlets, and as the hon. member for Vancouver South has said, many of the retail lumber yards are closed as a consequence. They are trying to stay in business by selling anything which comes to them—cement which they cannot get, nails which they cannot get, paint, tiles, and so on but they have not got lumber. Because of that the small builder and the veteran who are seeking small orders of lumber are having a very difficult job to get it.

One other thing I must say in support of the pre-war saw mill operators. Last year a movement was started by Mr. King of the King Mills to make building supplies available for veterans, entirely aside from any government priorities. Through his efforts, a movement was started amongst the mills which provided lumber for 1,200 veterans' houses last year in the Vancouver area. The great weakness, therefore, as I pointed out, as far as British Columbia is concerned, is in distribution, the fact that because of being forced to sell at below the cost of production without any sort of subsidy, the mills are naturally trying to cut that loss as far as possible by selling retail in large quantities, and at the expense of the small builder who cannot get lumber.

I come back to the lumber yard in the Vancouver area. The Minister of Reconstruction made the comment that he thought the retail lumber yards were doing very well out of this present emergency; and I agree that they are, in the east, but not in Vancouver. I want to give you some figures which one operator gave me when I was visiting him. He had an order for 50,000 feet of structural timber, 12 x 12 and 16 x 10, from eastern Canada. He got $26 per thousand, wholesale price loaded in the railway cars. It was taken to Montreal at a freight cost of $29 per thousand, or a total cost of $55 per thousand. This of course was consigned to a retail yard, in Montreal, and all this man had to do was to pick up the phone and tell the construction company their timbers were at the siding and the construction company picked it up. The retailer got $84 a thousand, or $29 net profit, $3 more per thousand than the logger got for logging and sawing the timber. The retail yards in British Columbia think they have a real cause of complaint; for on a similar deal in British Columbia they would get nothing. The small builder in British Columbia feels that he has an even greater cause of complaint.

The next point is the priority system. I agree with the hon. member for St. Paul's that this business of having the cities issue priorities is not working out. I am convinced that we should not have priorities laid down on a hard and fast national basis, but I do believe that the award of priorities should be on a regional basis. He used the example, I think, of the city of Toronto having no control over priorities in Mimico. I might take my own district of Vancouver. The city council of Vancouver have no authority over priorities issued in North Vancouver or in New Westminster. So if some enterprising business man comes from the east to build a factory, and finds that he cannot get a timber priority from the city of Vancouver, he will go to North Vancouver or to New Westminster—New Westminster will invite him there—and they get the industry but the lumber comes out of the local domestic supply. The situation involves local pressures on local aldermen as well. It would be better if we had a regional system from, say, Chilliwack to Vancouver and West Vancouver to Ladner, and some system of priorities laid down within that area.

Mr. HACKETT: Would it not be better to get rid of the priorities altogether?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): No, I would not get rid of the priorities altogether. I am convinced, speaking as a veteran, that a veteran's priority could be properly worked in that area. The sawmill people themselves showed it could work with those 1,200 veterans' houses which they supplied lumber for last year. Veterans and small builders would be encouraged to go ahead and build houses, and I am convinced that it is the small builder who is going to build houses in this country, not the large construction companies, formerly in heavy construction, who are in the housing business for money.

I want to summarize the effect of this policy on various individuals. First, on the small builder who cannot get lumber. He scrapes around from mill to mill. In the Vancouver area each mill makes something different; and he goes from one mill to another in search of lath, flooring, pine for wallboards, and shingles. During this time the house is standing idle. The rains come—and we have rain out there. He has to continue paying his help. As the minister has pointed out, we are short of carpenters, plasterers and bricklayers, and unless he continues to pay them, even when they are idle for lack of money, one of the big companies who are getting lumber will employ them, and so his costs will mount. So this $15 below the cost of production is no boon to the small builder since he can't get the lumber. One contractor who has an enviable business in West Vancouver told me that this business of shopping around to all mills within forty miles of Vancouver for lumber formerly assembled by local yards costs him a minimum of $30 per thousand more than the cost price of the lumber.

Now I am going to recapitulate the effects the present policy has in British Columbia, first on the retail lumber yards in Vancouver.

Most of these, except those fortunate ones who are dealing with mills still in the hands of the pre-war owners, have been driven out of the lumber business; they are trying to sell paint, nails, wallboard, cement, et cetera, hoping they will last out until conditions become normal again. We are always going to need, even in the Vancouver area, good active retail lumber yards, just as we need in this country retail outlet of every description; and the responsible saw mill operators who have been in the business for years gone by, and who intend to remain in the business for years ahead, are the very ones who realize that most strongly.

Now I want to speak, secondly, of the effect on the British Columbia timber industry—and that is the worst effect of all. Timber is and has been and will be the very bedrock of our British Columbia economy. One-third of the people in British Columbia earn their bread and butter directly from the timber trade, and I think most of the rest of us earn it indirectly. Members from the west and the maritimes have spoken here, of course, again and again and again of how the trade policy of this country is determined down here for Ontario and Quebec; that has certainly been true of our timber industry. We have had to go abroad to seek markets for British Columbia lumber. Before the war we did not sell any British Columbia lumber to speak of—apart from a little of the big dimension construction timber,—here in the east, or on the prairies, except clear finishing stuff, because the prairies have quite a good saw mill industry. Apart from what we sold in the British Columbia market we sold clears to the prairie market and some structural timber to the eastern market, and to sell the rest we had to go out in the markets of the world—and when I say "we" I mean the provincial government and the industry itself. It is a well-organized and highly developed industry. They built up their trade routes and made their own contacts. Our people competed with high quality and low price against Russian and Baltic timber in Britain, in spite of the very long haul from Vancouver, and also obtained markets in South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, and even in the United States. And now government policy is forcing us to ruin deliberately that entire long, slow, difficult and entirely provincial development of our world trade, because we are being forced to sell at far below the cost of production here on the domestic market, and told to recoup it by charging exorbitant prices—the timber trade would be the first to admit it—in the export market. The effect in the future will be that the people of Canada will expect British Columbia timber to be sold at less than the cost of production. Eastern lumber is being sold retail here at, for example, $60 per thousand, while $36 retail is the domestic price as far as British Columbia is concerned. The effect on our export markets is obvious; and in British Columbia we lived in the past, live now and are going to have to live in the future, on export markets. Yet we are being driven out of our painfully established pre-war export markets by the very tactics which this government refuses to condone as far as wheat is concerned. If we proposed to go on world markets with our wheat to-day and charge all the market would bear $3, $4, $5 a bushel, in order to sell our wheat cheaply at home for a dollar or less, you know the screams which would go up from the prairie members on this side, and the even louder screams from prairie members on the opposition side. Yet that is the policy which is being followed in regard to British Columbia lumber. Quite true, it is to alleviate a national housing emergency, but even the present emergency does not demand a course that will ruin British Columbia's primary economy, and that is exactly what this policy is doing.

Now as to the present allocation of markets. Fifty per cent local; and no one would dispute the allocation of thirty-five per cent to Britain: we are for that, because Britain was our best and surest pre-war market, despite Baltic competition. There remains the fifteen per cent which at present is being broken down, ten per cent to Australia, New Zealand and other British dependencies and dominions, and five per cent to the United States. On that fifteen per cent we are expected to recoup the losses made selling fifty per cent domestically at a loss of $15 a thousand, and we cannot do it without charging export prices which will ruin any hope of keeping these markets in the years ahead.

One other thing as far as the timber trade in British Columbia is concerned. You all know of the recent wage increase which has been granted of fifteen cents an hour. It is being used as a pattern by the unions across Canada in their present demands and it has put the British Columbia industry, including the operators and the workers, in an even more difficult position to maintain production under present price policy. I would suggest certain remedies, and I do so realizing that the price ceiling must be maintained. I represent a labour riding, and realize that it is unpopular in British Columbia to suggest that prices, and especially timber prices, be raised; but despite this I suggest first of all that the price of domestic British Columbia lumber be raised $15 a thousand, so that at least the industry will be given a chance to sell at cost of production and not at loss. That would enable them to scale down a little their prices to our export trade. It would be still $10 less than the domestic price of eastern lumber.

Second, I think there should be a control reinstituted on the price of logs. When the ceiling was taken off logs the price went up $6, and the saw mills who did not own their own logging operations were squeezed, buying at $25 and trying to sell lumber at $26. I am afraid that if an increase were given to the saw mill operators on lumber without a control being reimposed on logging, once again you would have the loggers putting up the price of logs almost to a level with the price of lumber. That would not affect the big operators, H. R. MacMillan, Fraser Mills and the new British Columbia Products, who log their own timber. But the small operators and saw mills in the Vancouver area who buy from logging operators would be in just as difficult a position as they are at present.

Third—and this is most important to all the small builders in Vancouver—with that price the government should insist on every mill in the Vancouver area sending a high quota, as high as in peace time, to the retail yards, so that any man wanting to build a house could go to the retail yard as he could in peace time and get his lumber—because there is sufficient lumber on the market if available for proper distribution. Such a policy would actually save the builder money in British Columbia. He would have to pay $15 a thousand more on a ten thousand foot or five-roomed house, which would cost him $150 more; but on that estimate, which my contracting friend gave me of $30 a thousand extra cost to-day because of the present delays, and the time and difficulties involved in hawking around the saw mills trying to get fifty feet of lumber here and a thousand there, exposure of the unfinished house to the elements, the cost of having to keep men in employment without having work for them to do, and paying them—all these difficulties and inconveniences would be removed if the retail yards were given their proper quotas so that if the builder wanted lumber he could get what he wanted, no matter how small an order and all from one source. The net effect would therefore be to save the small builder $15 a thousand on his costs.

Lastly, I suggest that the system of priorities be put on a regional basis so that there will not be competition between adjoining towns, one town decently trying to carry out the present emergent housing policy while another town looks to the future, desiring industries, and giving priorities for lumber to factories, theatres, shops, athletic stands and the like, lumber which should be used for housing. Only when these priorities are put on a regional basis, embracing a region which is more or less an economic unit, can there be satisfaction in the matter of priorities.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. E. B. McKAY (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I need not say that we all consider the present housing conditions in Canada as most critical; as a matter of fact some have even gone so far as to say that it is bordering on a disgraceful state of affairs. For a nation with such unlimited resources and at the moment, as in the past, idle man-power, there is positively no excuse for a shortage of houses. There has always been a housing shortage, so the war cannot be blamed entirely for the present deplorable lack of living accommodation. It is not a temporary condition, though it is particularly bad at the present moment. This is just another unpleasant result of capitalistic policies. People have moved from rural areas throughout the country to crowd out our urban centres. This has been going on for decades. In 1871, according to the Canada Year Book, our rural population was 80 per cent of the total population of the country. By 1941 the number of people living in rural areas had decreased to just under 45 per cent of our total population. The development of large overpopulated urban centres, at the cost of a depleted rural population, is a situation to be deplored; for a nation's strength always lies in its rural folk. It indicates that a most unsatisfactory economic situation existed in the rural areas; and for that matter, Mr. Speaker, it still exists or people would not be continually migrating to the larger centres of population.

Large industries located in our cities are taking a disproportionate share of the wealth of the nation, leaving rural districts on the whole in an impoverished state. As a result of the removal of wealth from the rural areas, housing generally there is at a very low standard. On the other hand workers flock to the cities to operate private enterprise. The wealth in our urban centres is concentrated in a few hands, with the result that thousands of workers are inadequately housed. They are paid low wages and thus cannot afford to provide themselves with houses of their own, or even to pay rentals that would provide decent housing accommodation. According to the Curtis report, in 1941 one-third of Canada's population lived in the metropolitan areas of twelve cities in Canada. In these specific areas 63·6 per cent, or almost two-thirds of the population were tenants living on incomes too small to enable them to purchase houses of their own. Of this group only one-third had incomes of $1,800 per year or more. Anyone should know that incomes below this amount are insufficient to permit people to buy or build their own dwellings.

It seems obvious, then, that unless the incomes of these people are increased the government must evolve some system of subsidized housing in order to provide these folk with decent living quarters. There is no subsidized housing in Canada as there is in the United Kingdom or New Zealand or even the United States. The few houses provided on small holdings under the Veterans Land Act or by Wartime Housing Enterprises represent a weak-hearted attempt to meet an almost hopeless situation; and because of this crisis in housing, what do we find? Three and four and five families living in dwellings only large enough to house one family decently. I need hardly say that such overcrowding breeds delinquency among children and creates a generally unwholesome atmosphere everywhere. This shortage of houses existed before the war, as was freely admitted by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) in his address on housing last Monday. The war aggravated an almost intolerable situation. Lack of construction during the war years and the accelerated movement of people from rural to urban areas to work in munition plants contributed to the crisis in housing we face to-day; and the veteran returning to Canada has to face that situation.

To say that similar conditions exist elsewhere is to beg the question. Canada has the material for construction; she has the man-power for it; but the programme thus far outlined by the government is woefully inadequate. The veteran is the forgotten man as far as housing in urban centres is concerned. Even in rural and suburban areas, projects for veterans have to wait because of shortages of building materials, shortages caused by the lack of any provision in our statutes prohibiting the erection of theatres, garages, filling stations and luxury homes throughout the country. Veterans do without, while materials are being used in non-essential building. Ceilings should have been imposed upon house building, as has been done in the United Kingdom. Until the present crisis is relieved, the construction cost of houses should be limited to $7,000; and until veterans are provided with houses a regulation should be invoked giving priorities to veterans only for house building. Luxury houses can wait until veterans secure shelter for their families. I am certain this nation does not want men who fought for our way of life to be homeless. Nothing to-day is more important in my opinion than the provision of houses for the boys who fought for democracy.

Besides the difficulty of obtaining materials, the veteran is faced with inflated prices. To finance a pre-war modest home of $3,600 now requires $5,000 or more. The government provides little assistance to the veteran in securing a building loan at a low rate of interest. National housing provides only a portion of the money he requires for financing his dwelling, and at 4½ per cent interest. No preference is given to the veteran over the civilian. An interest rate of 2½ per cent might well have been provided as a maximum. The government could well have absorbed the difference between 2½ per cent and the 4½ per cent which is charged to civilians. This would in small measure meet the inflated prices with which the veteran is faced in the purchase of construction materials—inflated prices which in most cases developed while he was in uniform serving his country. He was unable to provide a home for his family, as most civilians here in Canada were able to do when they saw prices of construction products rising.

The government provides ex-servicemen with a few hundred dollars as a civil reestablishment credit, to assist them to provide accommodation for themselves and their families. With the inflated building costs and high prices for houses, this is only a drop in the bucket. The move was a commendable one as far as it went. The credit looked big to the soldier when he served on European frontiers, but when he endeavours to locate a house to-day it looks pathetically small.

Even second rate houses have advanced in price 50 per cent to 100 per cent. Veterans cannot hope to pay these excessive prices. Indeed it is anything but fair for a grateful country to expect them to pay those exorbitant prices. Long ago a ceiling should have been placed on the prices of houses. Ceilings have been placed on other commodities; why not on houses? They need not be selling at such unreasonable prices. I appeal to the government to do that at once.

During the war the wartime prices and trade board placed a ceiling on rentals. This was an attempt to control rates which in many cases had become excessively high. It was for the most part successful—perhaps everywhere except in the city of Ottawa, where some of us had to pay as high as $35 for one room. Nevertheless it was a step in the right direction. But no attempt has been made to control prices in house sales. Speculators and real estate dealers have been allowed to make a killing at the cost of the veteran. By allowing prices of houses to sky-rocket, and prices in general to run wild, the government has defeated the purpose for which the civil reestablishment credit was set up.

Prices have reached prohibitive heights. It has been a field day for private speculators. It is not fair to the boys who were seeking a place in which to live; it is unfair to the buying public at large. People have made enormous profits by selling homes to veterans scarred by war. Veterans have been forced to pay fantastic prices in order to obtain shelter for their families. This sort of thing should have been stopped long ago. Ceiling prices should have been placed upon these houses. It is not yet too late to rectify that error. If rental controls could be made to work, surely ceiling price controls could be made effective on housing.

It has been suggested that this type of control would be difficult to establish. I am not so sure about that. Has it been tried? I am satisfied that controls could be based, first, upon location—whether houses are urban or rural; second, upon the size and number of rooms; third, on the type of house, whether modern, semi-modern, or unequipped; and, fourth, upon age. I ask the government now to remedy this situation, which is working to the detriment of almost every married veteran in Canada.

There is a dearth of low-rental homes throughout the country. The bill before the house will not provide low-priced housing and therefore will not provide low-rental housing. Subsidized housing is the only answer to the problem. Private enterprise has never met this situation and is not meeting it to-day. It has failed miserably. The Canadian Legion is cognizant of the true situation. In the Ottawa Journal of July 19 the following appears:

> The "primary need" in the national housing emergency is to provide low-rental homes for war veterans, Major Gen. C. B. Price, of Montreal, president of the Canadian Legion's Dominion Command, said in an address at a luncheon meeting of the Dominion Construction Association management committee here yesterday.
> A "good many" married veterans in low income brackets were "terribly discouraged" because all their efforts "to secure decent living accommodation, for their families, at anything like the rentals they can afford to pay, had been of no avail."
> It was "nothing short of deplorable" that the veterans' chances of success in reestablishment in civilian life were "far less than they otherwise would be, due to the constant strain of anxiety on the score of living accommodation."
> Gen. Price appealed for the association's cooperation both in obtaining low-cost housing and in helping veterans reestablish themselves in building trades.
> The only "practical relief" so far provided veterans seeking low-rent accommodation has been through Wartime Housing Limited, and the only satisfactory solution to the emergency was in making more subsidized housing units available to low income veterans, he said.
> "Not nearly enough" had been done to ease the veterans' housing problem and veterans should be given a "right of way over all other house building activities."

In conclusion I wish to emphasize again these points:

(1) The shortage of building materials could be substantially relieved by banning non-essential building.

(2) Materials would go further if restrictions were placed on the erection of dwellings exceeding $7,000 in value.

(3) A building loan should be provided veterans at a lower rate of interest than is charged under National Housing, to enable them to meet the high costs now prevailing.

(4) A priority should be set up for veterans for home building.

(5) A ceiling should be placed on selling prices of houses as a temporary expedient to enable the veteran to secure housing at a reasonable cost.

(6) A subsidized housing programme should be set up by the government to meet the demand for low-rental housing.

The veterans are not receiving a square deal to-day in the matter of housing. All they ask is a square deal and nothing more. I believe that if the suggestions I have made are acted upon by the government, more and cheaper housing can be provided.

This country must provide housing for its ex-service personnel at reasonable cost, and the public would support any move on the part of the government to meet that situation. As Theodore Roosevelt said, a man who is good enough to shed his blood for his country is good enough to be given a square deal; more than that no man is entitled to, and less than that no man shall have. Let us give our veterans a square deal in housing. They ask for nothing more, and to that at least they are entitled.

Mr. LEWIS MENARY (Wellington North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the minister about the statement he made the other day in the house. He can answer it now or at some future time. He stated that to add a basement to a house would increase the cost $7 per month for the length of the loan, which would be twenty years. That would amount to $1,680. I telephoned a builder the next morning and he gave me some figures. He told me that cinder blocks would cost 18 cents apiece, and for a cellar 22 feet by 28 by 7 feet deep the blocks would cost $126. I have allowed $30 for a bulldozer to dig the cellar. I do not know whether that is enough, but there is a man up home who has a bulldozer and he can dig a cellar in an hour. I have allowed $50 for the laying of the blocks, and another $50 for the mortar and sand. This totals $256, or $1.07 a month for the period of the loan, twenty years. I should like the minister to tell us where the additional cost of $5.93 per month comes in. I know what the blocks cost, and I am sure the other information I got is correct. If he cannot answer now, a subsequent time will be quite all right.

Mr. HOWE: Ordinarily questions and answers come at the committee stage. All I can say is that Wartime Housing has built certain projects with basements and other projects without basements, and it has been found necessary to charge $7 a month more for a house with a basement than for one without a basement, in each case the computation being on the same basis. I think if my hon. friend undertook to put a cellar under his house for $256 he will find that he is very optimistic and is likely to be severely disappointed.

Mr. MENARY: I know I have the right figure for the cost of the blocks, and I am sure I am allowing enough for wages for two men to lay the blocks in two days.

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) is going to have a rather rough time with this bill, and yet I should like him to know that we all realize the magnitude of the problem which he has inherited, and that we want to see that problem solved. However, I feel quite certain that it will not be solved on the basis of the statement which the right hon. gentleman made to this house last week. It was a frank statement; it was an honest statement, interspersed with occasional dashes of the minister's insuperable optimism. He told us that the deficit confronting the country was approximately 180,000 houses, but it is really much greater than that. Were the people of Canada to be properly housed we should have to build anything between 700,000 and 1,000,000 more houses.

The minister has told us that it is the intention of the government to build another 480,000 houses by March, 1952, and that private enterprise is being depended upon to build them. I state quite categorically that private enterprise, I do not care how much it is assisted by the government, will not build that number of houses in this country by 1952. The aspiration is laudable; we should like to see these houses built, but I think we know from experience in the past in Canada, and from the experience of other countries, that private enterprise is not capable of handling the housing problem in a country such as ours, and the minister has said that that problem is rapidly worsening. He should know by now, from the deputations which have waited upon the government, from resolutions passed by municipalities, and from statements which have emanated from commissions of inquiry, that private enterprise cannot build these houses. If he is dissatisfied with the statements of groups outside of the government I will quote him part of pamphlet No. 21, issued as long ago as 1938 by the Department of Pensions and National Health at Ottawa, as follows:

> We need dwellings for the lowest income groups who have not, and may never have the ability or opportunity to earn sufficient to pay a self-supporting rent for the size of dwelling required to house their families under minimum permissible conditions of sanitation and decency. The construction of such dwelling accommodation obviously will never be undertaken as a commercial venture by private initiative. These people need to be assisted by the community, and the manner of this assistance is the housing problem in its thorniest aspect. Almost altogether this group is a class of renters, both due to limited finances, and to their necessity to be free to move in accordance with the location of their employment.

The officials of the government have been aware for many years that private enterprise cannot solve the problem of housing for the people of Canada. Private enterprise will invest money only in the type of construction from which it can make a profit, and there is no profit in building houses for the people in this country who need them most, the submerged third who must have houses which rent at from $10 to $16 a month. Private enterprise will erect the buildings we have been hearing about—theatres, garages, filling stations, and so on. I was in Montreal and I saw the foundation being laid for a new hotel of 1,100 bedrooms. I do not say for one moment that Montreal does not need another hotel, but I do say that if Montreal has got along for the last two or three years without another hotel they should be able to get along for the next two or three years and permit the plumbing supplies which will be used in the hotel to be made available for houses for veterans.

Once we solve the problem of slum conditions in Canada; once we solve the housing problem of those in the lower third of the income brackets, then we shall have solved the problem of housing. I think it is just as clear and plain as that. Yet the minister tells us that Housing Enterprises is building houses which will rent at from $39 to $45 per month for four or five rooms. Such rentals are completely outside the capacity of the ordinary wage earner to pay. These dwellings are all right for the white collar worker or the person who has an income of $2,400 or $3,000 a year, but such rentals cannot be paid by the majority of the people.

I was sorry to see—I hope I am not doing the minister an injustice—that the minister anticipates that the rentals of Wartime Housing units may be raised because the municipalities want additional taxes. A six-room wartime house rents for $30. According to the Curtis report the rental paid by a family of low income should be 20 per cent of the family income. A rental of $30 presupposes an income of $150. The great majority of the workers in my constituency who are now in wartime houses are not earning as much as $150, and the additional overhead of $2.50 for local taxes is going to bear heavily upon them.

But most unfortunate of all was the minister's statement at page 3688 of Hansard that slum clearance is considered to be inopportune at the present time. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the right hon. gentleman does not appreciate the housing conditions in Canada if he believes that. I will admit that there are psychological maladjustments which will occur when people double up in houses. They are dangerous, and socially regrettable, if you like, but they are not nearly as serious as the problems confronting those who are to-day living in slum houses, whose bodies and minds are being warped by the wretched conditions under which they live. I should like to think that an attempt to clear slums would be carried out concurrently with whatever else the minister has in mind.

The minister also mentioned at page 3691 of Hansard certain principles which were actuating the government. One I have already mentioned, the dependence on private enterprise. Private enterprise will never solve the housing problem of Canada; I say again dogmatically, it cannot do it. It has done it in no other country I know of. The only solution is for the government to tackle the problem and solve it.

[Mr. Stewart.]

The minister also states—and this is interesting:

> If, however, with all the assistance we can provide for financing, materials and labour supply, the houses required to substantially improve the housing standard of the Canadian people are not forthcoming, then the dominion government will take a direct position in the housing field.

That I feel, sir, is a shadow perhaps of things to come. But it is unfortunate that the government has not yet made up its mind that it is going into the housing field, because circumstances will compel it to do so, no matter how much it may try to dodge the issue.

Our principal housing problem in Canada is that of the submerged third, those whose incomes are under $1,200 and who can get decent housing conditions only when houses are subsidized or are built in such a way that low rentals are made available to them. Perhaps the house may think that I labour this point unduly, but the facts are on the record. The need for low rental housing is obvious to anybody who travels through the big cities or almost anywhere in urban areas.

Many of us receive pamphlets and publications from companies perhaps with an axe to grind. All of us are in receipt of the monthly bulletin I have here from the Imperial Oil company. A few months ago, in presenting their own social security plan within the company, they gave us an interesting table which shows that out of fifty persons at the age of sixty-five, four will have retirement incomes, four will be virtually penniless but able to work, forty-two will be without income and dependent on charity or the state. In other words, to put it into percentages, at the age of sixty-five, ninety-two per cent of our people have no incomes and no financial reserves. Surely it is obvious from that, that the people of Canada are still working with insufficient incomes.

But even more interesting and rather more specific is this quotation which I should like to give from a magazine called The Montrealer, which is distributed among the members of this house. It is an advertisement in the March issue. It is headed, "Gold is Where you Find it," and it says:

> One section of Montreal, about fourteen miles square, is unique—"The gold vein" of the island.

In this area about fourteen miles square are housed some 14,000 families of this particular class, on the slopes of Mount Royal and Westmount, embracing St. George's and St. Andrew's wards, Westmount upper and lower level, Notre Dame de Grace, Hampstead, Montreal West and South, and Outremont. The advertisement goes on to pose the rhetorical question: How does "the gold vein" live? It proceeds to inform us how the gold vein lives. It says:

"THE ACTIVE" constitutes the younger element—the offspring of "The inactive"—junior executives, the junior clubmen of town, their young wives, the debs and subdebs of town, young ladies of affairs.

I have no idea what sort of affairs they are. It goes on:

"He" and "she" play golf, tennis, badminton and bridge. They ride, fish, hunt, ski and skate. They travel in smart sport cars. They drink and smoke and, most certainly, they entertain their friends and do it in a lavish manner.

Meanwhile Europe starves!

"He" wears flannels, golf pants, sport shirts, and his hats have to be just so. His feminine prototype is known for her smart coiffures, the very latest in perfumes and cosmetics, her enviably correct sport shoes and swanky evening gowns. Together, they buy anything the imagination can create, and there is continual competition to own it before it has been discovered even by the other alert "he's" and "she's" of "the gold vein." Quality is their criterion. They are "the people other people follow."

And "THE INACTIVE"? Never were quotation marks better placed than around that word, for it doesn't look as though they do much more than sit and sit. But don't fool yourself! They are merely the "active" grown older, and their minds are active still and decidedly mature. At their every decision the market goes up or down a point or two. "He" and "she" wear the very finest clothes. "He" is a connoisseur of food, liquors, liqueurs and wines. "She" is interested in the newest fashions and clings to all that she found enjoyable and comfortable in the past. Both patronize the theatre and the arts, take cruises and can always be counted upon for substantial subscriptions to charity and cultural endeavours.

Those are the people of "the gold vein," Mr. Speaker, and these 14,000 people in "the gold vein" in the city of Montreal have collective incomes which are greater than the total earnings of the wage earners in the provinces of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta. These 14,000 families have assessed incomes of almost $135,000,000. The wage earners in the provinces mentioned have incomes of almost $125,000,000. These people in "the gold vein" in the city of Montreal can afford fine houses. Where do they get the money? By exploiting the people. These are the people who to-day can still get large dividends from industry. There is no hint of inflation apparently when we are told that the dividends paid by corporations in Canada were $5,000,000 greater this month than in July of last year. But let the steelworkers ask for a minimum wage of $33 a week; that, sir, is inflation of the foulest type and must be stopped. I should be inclined to agree with the government's policy if I saw them preventing this distribution of unearned income in Canada to these people in "the gold vein" who to-day are living so well. That is how one section of the people live—"the gold vein". But go up to the parliamentary restaurant any time and look over into the city of Hull. The Hull police department reported recently about seventy-five buildings which contained 112 dwelling units which, in turn, contained 123 families. Only six of these seventy-five buildings were habitable. Thirteen of the buildings had indoor toilets, thirty-eight of the buildings had outdoor toilets, twenty-four had none at all. These are the people we have to help, these are the people whom the government is not helping.

But I should like to speak of an area of which I have some knowledge, my own city of Winnipeg, a young city, and yet one which has slum conditions which are an eyesore and a shame, not only to Manitoba but to the Dominion of Canada as a whole—and at that our slums are not so bad as those which exist in the eastern part of Canada. According to a census taken at the beginning of this year in my constituency, in which there are some 78,000 people, there were only nine vacant houses in January; eight of them were unfit for human habitation, and one was so broken down that no one could occupy it, and indeed there were no "to let" signs out at all. I went around to some of the slum homes. We have in Winnipeg a first-class health and sanitation department, of which Doctor M. S. Lougheed and Mr. Fred C. Austin are in charge, and it it was through their kindness that I was able to see some of these slums. I had seen them before; they have not improved with keeping. I went around with an able young inspector, Mr. George Kelly. I am not going to tell parliament about all the houses I saw, but this is symptomatic of affairs as they exist. I went to one building with nineteen rooms, and there were seventeen family units living in it. It was a frame building, dilapidated and down-at-heel, rented out to one of these pestilential house farmers. As one went in the door one was almost hit physically in the face by the foul and fetid stench in which the people were living. Here was the smell of cooking, of putrifying garbage, and of human excrement. Windows were broken in almost every room, patched up here and there with burlap or with paper. There was the occasional curtain, so dirty and grimy as scarce to deserve the name of curtain. Plaster in every room was cracked, broken, stained, perhaps with rain dripping down it, more often with the desiccated bodies of vermin which had been squashed to death on the walls. In most of these rooms the gas stoves were not properly working. I walked into one room where a young soldier had brought his wife that very day from hospital where she had given birth to a baby. She was heating water on a gas stove, which was leaking, to bathe the infant. The room was 14 feet by 10 feet, and they were condemned to stay there and to bring up the infant in such surroundings. In every room there was a slop pail, of course. It was used for garbage and everything else, often for lavatory purposes where there were children, because there was only one toilet in the whole building, only one bath for all these people. The beds were dirty and in many cases foul. I came across one old man lying in bed and we asked him the stock question, "Are there any vermin in here?" He said, "Hell, no, not even a bedbug would live in this place"; but he was wrong, because every time we lifted up a mattress there were colonies and clusters of these vermin just waiting for the onset of night to begin their daily meal.

It may be said, why do not these people improve their conditions? Are they so lost to all sense of decency that they want to live there? No sir, they do not want to live there, but we have conditioned them to such a state that they do live there now.

Let me quote from Mr. Austin's report. As I have said already, he is chief inspector of the division of sanitation and housing in Winnipeg. This is from a report which he read at the annual general meeting of the Canadian institute of sanitary inspectors in Toronto in May. Speaking of these areas, Mr. Austin said:

> Infectious diseases spread rapidly in such areas. Offenders against the criminal code have their haunts in such areas. Juvenile delinquency rears its ugly head in such surroundings and sexual promiscuity is more or less commonplace, primarily due to the lack of privacy. Common use of inadequate plumbing fixtures is also a factor here. These all have their perpetuation, if not their origin, in the decline in the will, or wish, or ability on the part of the submerged, to overcome the handicaps of inferior accommodation, congestion of population, vermin infestation, dirty rooms and habits, general slovenliness, and the acceptance of debilitated living standards, due to a decisive breakdown in their morale. The latter is a concomitant of a debased standard of living, and to expect these people to get out of their ruts of their own accord or effort, is to expect them to raise themselves by their boot straps.

It is these people whom we have to help, it is these people whom the plan of the right hon. gentleman does not help, because as a principle he abjures subsidies, as a principle he will have nothing to do with them. He says: Let the municipalities and the provinces attend to subsidies. He is going to find out that it is financially impossible for the provinces and the municipalities to remove these sore spots from all across Canada. I should like to extend an invitation to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, and I should be quite prepared to pay the financial cost of such invitation. It would cost me six dollars and a quarter. I should like the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply to find out these things for himself; I invite him to come to Winnipeg and to live in one of these hovels, and when he comes back to Ottawa his mind will be radically changed, sir, about slums and how soon they should be eradicated. I said I would give him six dollars and a quarter. He may feel that that is not unduly generous, but his government feels it is generous enough for the old people of this country. That is the weekly allowance of an old age pensioner, and since the government asks old age pensioners to inhabit these hovels, I think it is reasonable to ask the right hon. gentleman to do the same. Out of this six dollars and a quarter he will pay $4 for rent, and from the $2.25 left he will supply himself with all the food he needs to keep body and soul together. If he is willing to undertake the experiment, I shall be very glad indeed to pay up the six dollars and a quarter.

I want to point out that there is a lot of talk in this house about economy, about saving dollars and cents. Mr. Speaker, saving dollars and cents is not nearly as important as saving human lives and human respect. That is much more important than the financial economies we can make. But, speaking to this question from the point of view of dollars and cents, let me remind the house of certain reports which have been made. For instance, in 1935 there was a survey and a report made to the city of Detroit housing commission which showed that in the slum areas the death rate from pneumonia was three times as high, there were five times as many crimes, six times as high an infant mortality rate, ten and a half times as high a tuberculosis death rate, and fifteen times as many criminals in a small area as compared with a normal residential area. Surely, sir, there is an extraordinary extravagance with human lives and human happiness in these slum areas. Or let me refer to the city of Cleveland, Ohio, which made a survey of a blighted area which houses 2·5 per cent of Cleveland's population, and it was found that over a ten-year period this small area had 21 per cent of the city's murders, 12 per cent of the city's cases of tuberculosis, seven per cent of its juvenile delinquents; and eight per cent of the city's relief families.

But again let me come nearer home. Let me take my own city, where a similar survey was made in 1935 by the city health department. The department took two areas in Winnipeg, area 1 being the Assiniboine river north to Notre Dame avenue and Red river west to Sherbrook street, area 2 being Notre Dame avenue north to the C.P.R. tracks and Red river west to Sherbrook street including all Point Douglas. In other words, they took areas in the constituencies of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and myself. What did they find? They found this:

	Area 1	Area 2	Rest of city
Infant mortality per 1,000 live births	50·2	52	43
Scarlet fever and diphtheria per thousand	13·6	15·7	7·5
Tuberculosis per ten thousand	4·6	7·9	2·9
Municipal hospitals annual admission per thousand	7·2	10·5	3·9
Public wards admissions per thousand	91·1	101·4	52·9
Juvenile court cases from public schools per thousand students registered	16·9	23·7	11·5
Arrests per thousand	21·1	52·2	6·5
Venereal disease clinic per thousand	5	16·5	1·8

The population in the first area was 29,479, in the second area 23,246, and in all the rest of the city 170,292. This committee found further that the cost of social services such as police, municipal hospitals, children's aid societies, General Hospital, St. Boniface outdoor clinic, social welfare and children's bureau in area 1 was $257,000 and in area 2, $381,000, while for the rest of the city it was $612,000. If the cost of social services for areas 1 and 2 had been at the same rate per thousand of population as for the rest of the city, the cost would have been $189,000 instead of $638,000, thus saving the city of Winnipeg roughly $450,000 per annum. Surely no additional proof is needed to show the extravagance and wastefulness of slums in this country. We can eradicate slum areas and build decent homes for the people and save money in the long run. That is looking at it from the financial point of view. From the human point of view we can give the people of Canada an opportunity for gracious living which they have never known before.

The right hon. gentleman's reputation stands high, and deservedly so, for what he did in the line of production for the war effort. He can make that reputation even higher if he grasps the immensity of the problem that confronts him and realizes that it can be tackled only by the help of public funds.

It would be entirely negative were I to criticize without offering some suggestions of the type of policy which the minister should follow. In the first place, the federal parliament, I believe, eventually will have to pass enabling legislation to which the provinces can adhere, and this legislation will contain in it provisions for a tremendously enlarged programme of research into problems of house building in Canada. It might even go so far as to have an experimental area where these houses could be constructed and people could live in them.

The dominion government will have to be prepared to take the responsibility to a large extent financially, even perhaps as high as ninety per cent, to provide loans to provinces and regional areas in order to wipe out these festering blots called slum areas. The federal parliament will have to make money available for low rental housing all across Canada. This is not a local problem; it is not one particular city's problem; it is a Canadian problem. I submit therefore that only the Canadian House of Commons can tackle it adequately.

Loans which are advanced will have to be far beyond those at present envisaged. Loans should be for a minimum of at least forty-five years, and the interest rate must not be any higher than two per cent. We shall be asked, how can we afford it? If we go to the people and borrow at three per cent and lend at two per cent we shall have a financial loss. I do not think that is so. Assume for the moment that we raise a billion dollars from the Canadian people for a special housing loan —and that money would be readily forthcoming—we could lend it at two per cent. Despite the confusion which exists in the minister's statement as to whether the national income depends upon housing or housing upon the national income, I suggest that the increase in national income would be so marked that the Department of National Revenue would get back far more than the ten millions which we had apparently lost by lending the money at two per cent.

But if both houses passed enabling legislation, the provincial legislatures should also be encouraged to do the same thing, and I do not think they would require very much encouragement. The provincial legislature which to-day refused to take advantage of such an offer from the federal government would not exist beyond the next election, we can be sure of that.

There should be created in the provinces, departments responsible for community planning under the jurisdiction of a cabinet minister. I should like to see the matter of housing under separate portfolio in this parliament, but I am content at present to see it in the hands of the Minister of Reconstruction. The responsibilities of these departments of community planning would include the defining of various metropolitan areas and regions within the province, so that enabling legislation might permit them to establish community planning and housing commissions in such areas. I think it is a mistake, if the government is going to go into housing, as I think it will, to deal directly with the municipalities, because they are too small. We have to deal with metropolitan areas, and, in rural areas, regional divisions. Any moneys granted should be granted to the provincial governments, who in turn would channel it down to the metropolitan housing and planning commission and the regional housing and planning commission.

Of course it is obvious that these metropolitan and regional areas could be used for other administrative purposes, such as health, education and social services. The province would enter into an agreement with the dominion government which also, I hope, would have a department of community planning and housing, with loans to enable the metropolitan and regional commissions to undertake planning for future development and redevelopment, the acquisition of land for urban and regional development and housing construction, such as community centres and so on, and rental subsidies for tenants whose income is less than $1,000 a year.

Let us remember that almost one-third of our people are in the income brackets of less than $1,200 a year. These are the people whose houses would have to be subsidized. Above that level it is possible that, with ingenuity, we may have housing schemes built so economically that we shall be able to rent houses to those earning above $1,200 a year, and rent at reasonable rates.

This department should allocate dominion loans to the various metropolitan and regional commissions with the aid of the provinces. The local government has to take an important part in this picture, because while we may keep centralized control; while we have a centralized policy, to make it work we must have decentralized administration, first through the province and then through the regional group. It is on the level of local government that the question will be decided whether good modern housing will be provided for those who need it. It will be only with the support of the whole local community for the planning scheme that any worth while action will be taken. With the exception of the land speculator and the jerrybuilder, community planning and housing is beneficial to all. It helps the home owner by reducing taxation; for slum clearance lightens the cost of fire, police and social services, and makes property values more stable. It helps the tenant by offering a good house in a nice neighbourhood. It helps the small storekeeper by leaving more of the consumer's dollar for food, clothes and furnishings. It helps the business man by providing a planned locality for his factory, with maximum traffic advantages. We should note that it is very important that this planning be done not in the sense of individual housing units but in the sense of complete areas. Such a scheme helps the municipal governments in the metropolitan area by relieving them of the drain that slums made upon their budgets, and offering them security for the future in planned development.

I could pursue these ideas very much further, Mr. Speaker, but my time is almost gone. I only want to point out to the right hon. gentleman that facts are already available showing that private enterprise is not going to do the job he wants done. Plans are available showing precisely what the government should do and what in my opinion it will be compelled to do by force of circumstances. At the moment the government has given no appearance of facing the fact that our problem lies in the lower third of the population of this country; and until it applies itself seriously to building houses for the submerged third of our people, the government consigns itself to impotence while it condemns the Canadian people to frustration.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to join in this debate for a few moments because, like the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) who preceded me and the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. McKay), who spoke a little earlier, I feel the time has come to speak plainly to the government about its housing policy.

During the last few years the problem of housing in this country has been very serious; yet we had on our hands the needs of the war. We in this group did our best, while pointing out the impending difficulty which now confronts the country, to be constructive in our suggestions to the government and not hamper the various items of housing legislation that were brought before us. Each time we have had under consideration some new measure, or the amendment of existing legislation, we have pointed out that it was inadequate, but recognizing that at least it was an attempt to improve inefficient legislative machinery we hoped it would have some beneficial result. But now the war is over; we are thinking in terms of reconstruction and the future; and I think, as do all the members of this group, it is time to point out to the government that it has failed miserably in dealing with this problem, and that as long as its mind is set on some of the principles to which it adheres it will not solve the problem that is facing the Canadian people.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat made it clear that what we need in this country is not just a target for so many housing units per year; what we need is to tackle the whole problem of the conditions under which our people are living. I dare say some hon. members felt that my hon. friend's description of the slum conditions in the area which both he and I represent in the city of Winnipeg was, shall I say, picturesque. It was partly because of that portrayal that I felt, even though my colleague had covered the subject so well, I could not refrain from saying something at this time. It is not good enough to go on telling the people who are condemned to live in these impossible buildings that theirs is a problem which must wait until some other angles of the problem have been dealt with. I have suggested before, and I suggest again, that there is no time like the present to tackle the problem of slum clearance in some of the most disgraceful areas to be found in some of our large cities. I urge upon the minister and those under him who are dealing with this matter that even yet they give consideration to taking an area such as that along both sides of the main line of the Canadian Pacific railway which divides our two constituencies, clear out the buildings which are not fit for human habitation, and really establish in that whole area decent living conditions for the people, who incidentally are workers who produce enormously in terms of wealth for this country.

When I first rose I said if the government adheres to its present basic policy it will not get anywhere with this whole problem. I have in mind the statements the minister made, as recorded in Hansard for July 22 at page 3690 from which page my colleague has already quoted in part. At that time the minister admitted to us that there was a real problem. He said:

> That a deficit of housing will confront us for some time to come is virtually certain.

Then he went on to say:

> At the same time, I can assure hon. members that no effort will be spared by my department and by the government as a whole to meet the deficit, to relieve a critical situation.

Further down on the same page he summed up the main principles underlying the aims and objects of his department, and gave this as number one:

> High priority. Adequate housing for the Canadian people is one of the major tasks before us. The utmost effort will be directed towards meeting this need, and the resources of the country will be used to this end.

When one hears forthright statements of that kind one expects the government to mean them, and that nothing will stand in the way of the government's determination to get houses built to meet not only the immediate need in terms of housing units but also the need in terms of better standards of housing and the improvement of whole areas. But having said that the minister immediately went on to say, referring to his department and his government:

> It is the policy to ensure that as large a portion as possible of housing be built by private initiative.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I could, but at the moment I am not going to, enter into an argument as to the respective merits of private and public housing, but it does seem to me this is the crux of the matter as far as this government is concerned. It says nothing will be allowed to stand in the way; then immediately afterwards it says: We are fastening our flag to the mast of private enterprise. It seems to me the government needs to turn its policy right around and say: Our first concern, the first item in our policy, is to get houses built. But as one goes through the speech of the minister, and as one goes through the legislation we have before us, it becomes clear that the government's first concern is not the building of houses. The government's first concern is the maintenance of private enterprise in the field of housing. I insist that what we want is not the enunciation, first of all, of the method or the principle by means of which the end is to be achieved, but rather the determination that that end is to be achieved. The need is recognized by the minister as well as by the rest of us; for even when he gives his plausible reasons for not going ahead with slum clearance he is making an admission that the problem is there.

Then, respecting the government's activity in the housing field, the minister went on to say that the government is there only because it has been forced into it. But the thing that annoys us, entirely apart from the fact that we are dealing with differences in political faiths, is that we represent a people who are sorely pressed by these needs, and we hate to see loyalties to a way of doing things put ahead of a determination to meet actual needs.

On the next page the minister said this:

> We are in these endeavours because in each instance housing of this type would not otherwise be forthcoming. We would be very happy to withdraw, but there seems no immediate prospect of housing of this type being produced by other means.

All the way through the government's attitude there runs that refrain—that they do not like being in the housing field; that they would be happy to withdraw. They want to get out as soon as possible. Again I quote from the minister's remarks:

> I hope that the dominion government's direct participation in the housing field will reduce rather than increase, but we are determined to see that an adequate number of homes are built in Canada in the future.

If the minister will stand by the last half of that sentence, I shall go down the line with him, because it implies that he is willing to throw over his prior insistence that they are going to stick by private enterprise. Surely after the observations of the hon. member who has just taken his seat the house is not going to be satisfied with legislation that will leave us with a worse situation a year hence than we now have, and which does not tackle the needs of our people who are living in substandard homes and in slum areas.

Again at page 3691 the minister said this:

> The dominion government has made and will continue to make adequate provisions to make the financing of low and moderate rental housing projects possible. But subsidies to create uneconomic rentals are, in my opinion, a matter for provincial and municipal concern.

In that statement, as I see it, the minister not only throws the responsibility back to the provinces and municipalities, but he begs the question by referring to subsidies as involving the creation of uneconomic rentals. On the other hand the government by its housing legislation, and by all the various financial provisions the minister has announced from time to time, is doing just this for the financial interests. It is quite prepared to back the life insurance companies and lending institutions. It is prepared to take the risk completely out of the hands of private enterprise in the housing field, which is supposed to be the lifeblood of private enterprise, and yet is not prepared to come to the assistance of people at the point where it will do the most good, namely in connection with the actual subsidizing of houses so that our people might begin to get more decent places in which to live.

I rose particularly to support whole-heartedly the appeal made by my colleague from Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), and also to say to the minister that while members of the government may have thought we were hard on them in other years when discussing their housing legislation, they will find that this year by comparison we shall be much more critical. We are now in a period of peacetime reconstruction, and we are convinced that this sort of thing does not meet the needs of our Canadian people.

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise to criticize the government for its failure to provide adequate housing legislation in the past, and also to point out where the present legislation will prove inadequate for the future. To that extent I am in agreement with the last two speakers, particularly, who did not hesitate to criticize the government, but I do not agree with them in many of the specific criticisms they have made.

I believe it is essential in this respect that we should clear our thinking on the question of low-cost housing, or the providing of low-rental housing for people in the low income group. To my mind that is an absolute necessity. But the fact that it is necessary to provide subsidized housing for those groups does not mean and does not imply that the government must go into the housing business. The fact that the government subsidizes housing does not mean that it must enter the field of the building of houses.

Listening to both hon. members from Winnipeg one would imagine that they believe the solution to the problem would be for the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) to go out with a hammer and nails and build houses himself. I do not believe that is the solution. To my mind the solution would be for the minister to give real and efficient direction to an effective housing programme which would clear the tracks for people who know the building business, and make supplies available for those who are ready to build.

As it strikes me, the confusion in the minds of hon. members of the C.C.F. is that they believe that in order to have anything done the government must get into the business itself and, in this instance, have companies formed to build houses. I do not believe that that is the solution. It is true that every housing report I have seen indicates that some measure of subsidized housing is necessary to provide those in low-income groups with adequate living accommodation; but this does not mean that the government must build the houses. What they must do is tackle the subsidy problem, and particularly the supply and control problem, and make it possible for builders to go ahead and build, as they are ready to do.

I should like to interject here that if the slum conditions in Winnipeg are anything like those outlined by the two hon. members from that city who have just spoken, then I agree with them that the government cannot stop until it has found a solution for that problem. It must tackle the housing question as a whole. It cannot stop and say: Well, we will not tackle slum clearance at the present time. If conditions are as the two hon. members have stated them—and I have no reason to doubt what has been said—then the government is most certainly open to violent criticism. The minister cannot say: We shall not tackle this problem of slum clearance at the present time; we will wait until we have done something else. The thing must be tackled as a whole, or it will not be cured as a whole.

In making a criticism of the government for its delay in beginning to solve the housing problem, and because the programme it advances now is not sufficient, I would recall to the minds of hon. members what the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt) said this morning, that the minister's statement and the forecast which he made, even as far as it goes—and that is not far enough—is approximately a year too late. We all remember that the password in the first two years of the war was "too little and too late." We urge the government not to let it be said in the post-war period that they have introduced that watchword into the Canadian housing programme. If the government had faced these facts a year ago, when all opposition parties were doing their utmost to point out the seriousness of the situation, we might now be well on the way toward betterment of conditions—which the minister says will not arrive now until late next year, or possibly 1948. The minister was a year late in starting, and even now he is not going far enough, because, to judge by his own words, he is not prepared to tackle this question of slum clearance. But mainly, he is not going far enough because he is not tackling the real root of the problem, the question of getting supplies to the builders so that houses may be built.

I want to emphasize that, in western Canada at least, we know that materials are available in the raw state. All we need to do is to get them out and then manufactured. We have the builders available if we can get the supplies. It is not necessary for the government to set up any more housing or construction companies; all that is necessary is for them to solve the problem of getting men into the woods to get out the supplies and then have them manufactured so that the builders can use them. In this connection I should like to refer to a statement which the minister made just a week ago when he was discussing this housing question. He was questioned, by the hon. member for Vancouver South and the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard in particular, as to what he was doing to readjust the price structure, or what other steps he was taking to make sure that supplies flowed in a measure adequate to meet the construction programme which he had outlined. The tenor of the minister's replies was that there was no delay in producing supplies because of an unfair price balance. He is reported on page 3706 of Hansard, in reply to a question put by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, as follows:

> Can my hon. friend tell me of a case where production is being curtailed by unbalanced prices?

The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard referred to-day to a survey which had been undertaken by the British Columbia Lumber Survey Limited, representing some eighty lumber manufacturing companies. In a letter which I have here they state the following:

> I observe that Mr. Merritt was asked to name one case of curtailment of production which has been due to failure to get a fair price from the wartime prices and trade board. I suggest that Mr. Merritt ask the minister what the situation is in regard to doors. He might also ask how much flooring he expects to make when the price of fir flooring is less than the price of the flitch before they cut it.

Fir flooring was referred to this morning by the hon. member. The situation with regard to doors is one case where production is being curtailed by an inadequate price adjustment. I know that is a fact because in Kamloops, which is a city of some 8,000 people, there is a construction project of 100 houses being carried on under the auspices of Wartime Housing Limited. An increase was recently authorized of forty additional houses. The first 100 have been under construction since August of last year, and so far only forty-five are ready. One reason why the completion of these houses has been so slow is that they were held up for doors. There is certainly a case where the construction of houses has been slowed down because no proper steps have been taken to encourage the manufacturers to make one of the essential parts, namely, doors.

It is not enough for the minister to attempt to brush off this question by making a blunt statement that construction is not suffering. Construction is suffering, and the results are something that Canada should be ashamed of. As I say, this project in Kamloops has been held up because of a lack of doors, one item which is in short production as a result of not meeting this price question. I should like to direct attention to an incident that took place the other day and which was occasioned by this lack of housing. The following appears in a letter which I received three days ago from a citizen of Kamloops:

> We have had one tragedy this past week where a poor little expectant mother who was housed in impossible quarters had to be taken to the hospital and lost her baby. In several cases the husbands have been told by the doctor that some change in dwelling conditions must be made to give the mother a chance of successful pregnancy.

That indicates the results of this shortage of housing. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North said, the minds and the welfare of the Canadian people are being warped by the perpetuation of these conditions. That is why we criticize the government for being too late; that is why we criticize them for doing too little when they try to face the problem.

There is a question I should like to ask the minister in connection with the Wartime Housing Limited programme in my own city. I notice that he is reported on page 3682 of Hansard as having said:

> As I mentioned earlier, the 1946 Wartime Housing Limited programme is now committed to some 4,700 units. It is not our intention to proceed with more of these units during the current year. Future operations of Wartime Housing Limited will be dependent upon the 1947 programme for housing . . .

I hope when we get into committee the minister will give some further explanation and tell us why it is intended to cut off the operations of Wartime Housing Limited at that limit this year. This is one of the agencies in existence which is potentially capable of helping solve this housing shortage.

Mr. Speaker, the facts which I have just given with reference to the situation in Kamloops are duplicated all across the country. I mention this case because it is an illustration of the difficulties encountered in attempting to provide additional accommodation in our cities. This situation leads me to make certain suggestions to the government as to how it might further help relieve the shortage of accommodation. I suggest that there be even more coordination of the housing agencies within the government. The suggestion was made by this party at the last session that there be set up a ministry of housing. This suggestion was acted upon to some extent when a housing coordinator was appointed, and when more recently all the housing activities of the government, including a part of those carried on under the Veterans Land Act, were brought into the one Department of Reconstruction.

But there is still conflict between the agencies in the minister's own department, and considerable confusion of direction. For instance, there is confusion in the minds of those trying to obtain emergency shelter as to whether they should deal with War Assets Corporation or the emergency shelter supervisor in order to obtain surplus military accommodation. I suggest to the minister that he approach the Department of National Defence and work out a plan whereby military buildings which may be wanted in the future and which the department is not at the moment willing to declare surplus be placed under the control of the emergency shelter supervisor so that he in turn can make them available to the municipalities to provide shelter in this desperate emergency.

To refer again to Kamloops, there are certain buildings there which the army is reluctant to declare surplus because they feel they may need them to meet their own requirements in the future. They are not available through War Assets Corporation, and yet they are vacant. If the minister and the Minister of National Defence could work out a plan whereby supervision over these buildings could be given to the emergency shelter supervisor, I think it would do a great deal to relieve the immediate shortage.

In addition I suggest that when the buildings are declared surplus they be disposed of through the emergency shelter supervisor rather than through War Assets Corporation, in order, again, that all questions having to do with housing and accommodation may be coordinated under the one agency.

Another specific suggestion which I should like to make has been advanced already to-day by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair), and that is that the licensing powers be taken back under the control of the minister's department. At present they are exercised by municipalities, but the municipalities are, as the hon. member pointed out, subject naturally to pressure from concerns who want to start business within the limits of the municipality. Take for instance a small city on the main line of a railway. Some large concern might well approach the city and say: We should like to build a large warehouse here, employing probably ten or twelve people, and it is important to us to start early on this construction. The city council may say: We have a housing shortage and are giving priority to housing. The concern will say: We are sorry, but we shall have to go to such-and-such a town. And since the city hates to lose the business, they are on the horns of a terrific dilemma. Shall they deny a licence to this business concern and so lose potential employment for their people, or shall they give a licence for employment for their people who then will have no houses built? It is not fair to put the municipalities in that position. Further, there is no point in giving the municipality control over permits for building when at the same time you do not give them control over priorities for building materials. I raised that point in conversation with one of the city councils and they agreed entirely that, without control over priorities of materials, the power to licence was meaningless. It is meaningless, and I suggest therefore that the minister take the licensing power back and keep it within his department, where control over the allotment of materials now lies. Further I suggest that he make control over the allotment of materials a really operative control. I suggest that so far as our province of British Columbia is concerned he examine the brief of the organization to which I have referred, and I think he will realize that control over the allotment of materials, to be effective in that province, must be handled through the retail outlets, who will make the supplies available in turn to the contractors. I am sure that if the minister would make that study he would find at least in our part of the country, that that system could be worked out. We have the facilities and the materials, and the contractors are most anxious to get to work and build houses to end the housing shortage.

Mr. J. O. PROBE (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) should, before we enter the committee stage, satisfy the members of the house that he is going to do something beyond what he outlined a week ago to meet the housing shortage in this country. Unquestionably the minister has done nothing about the low-rental housing problem, and no department of government or any public or private agency except his own department is in a position to do anything about it. The minister should give us some assurance of early action on that specific problem. I hope that in the committee stage he may see fit to add a clause which will allow him to come to grips with that phase of the problem.

Further, I should like the minister to tell us why the government is not prepared to adopt some form of the Swedish self-help plan for rural home construction. It has been stated a number of times in the house that under the National Housing Act there is possibly one loan in effect under that section which provides for assistance to rural home owners. I put it that way, a possible one loan, because when I conferred with the representatives of the Central Mortgage and Housing corporation they were unable to assure me that they could lay their hands on that one loan.

The government should investigate what other countries have been successful in doing in connection with housing. I should like to remind my good friend the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) and his party that even the Conservative government of Britain had to get into and subsidize low-rental public housing because it could not be done on a private enterprise basis. Surely that ought to satisfy my hon. friend's and his party's ideological viewpoint.

Mr. FULTON: I advocated subsidizing, but not that the government build them.

Mr. PROBE: I agree that my hon. friend mentioned subsidizing, but he and his party are definitely averse to any government or cooperative operation having any part in the building of houses.

Mr. FULTON: I would ask the hon. member where in our platform or in any of the party's publications he can find ground for that statement.

Mr. PROBE: My hearing is reasonably good. I might turn the question around and ask my hon. friend: Does he himself believe in municipal house construction? Apparently there is no answer. I think that is a vindication of the thing I wish to bring out, that his party stands for free private enterprise in all forms of activity, and therefore it is no stretch of the imagination to carry it into housing as well. But I have no wish to get into an altercation. I am simply pointing out that even Conservative governments in other parts of the world have found that private enterprise was incapable of providing low-rental housing. Private enterprise can only function at a profit, and low-rental housing is a non-profit, subsidized undertaking. Consequently private enterprise and low-rental housing simply will not mix.

I would ask the minister to explain to the house why a longer period than twenty-five years can not be provided for amortization. Also why is it not considered good business for the government to borrow or provide money at a lower rate than the present 4½ per cent which is permitted under the National Housing Act?

We should also have an explanation of why we are subsidizing builders to the extent of providing them with money at one-half per cent less than prospective owners, and why we cannot expand that concession, poor as it is, because the four per cent interest rate will not in my opinion meet the low-cost housing problem, even in part, to such co-operative and municipal building societies as are prepared to go into the housing field. It seems to me that if we are doing business we should do business with all prospective customers on the same basis, whether they be insurance companies, large building corporations, cooperative housing societies, municipal or provincial building societies. Surely this federal government of ours should be able to undertake the same form of contract with them all, and not put private building corporations on a preferred basis.

Then I think the minister owes this house an explanation as to why he has not gone into investigating fully the creation of a proper price ceiling on materials. I listened to an interesting discussion on the part of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair). As he developed his theme I wondered what point he was leading to, and I found that the Genesis and Revelations of his talk were: let us increase the price of lumber another $15 a thousand and we shall get all the building we require. Heaven knows we have increased the cost of building materials from $38 and $40, in the case of lumber supplies to $70 and $75, and we are still unable to get buildings completed. It is not a matter of raising prices; it is a matter of coordinating the entire construction industry. If we cannot secure a proper ceiling price which will permit individuals to acquire houses or builders to provide houses at a fair return to themselves, the minister has had plenty of experience with crown companies, and I for one would give him the green light if he were to create enough crown companies to get into the production business and show us that our natural products can be used for the citizens of Canada.

In the light of what the hon. member for Vancouver North said this morning, I believe the minister should reveal to the house what regional differences exist in the price of such things as logs, rough dimension lumber, finishing lumber, and the rest, throughout the various regions of Canada; give us an explanation as to why such prices exist, and, if possible, bring them into line so that there will not be the danger of flooding one market with materials to the exclusion of other parts of Canada. The minister did curtail somewhat the export of lumber and building products to other countries, but in my opinion he has not yet gone far enough. If the foreign market is too attractive to our cutthroat competitive businessmen, so that they would prefer to sell there in preference to dealing with their customers in this country, I think it is time we got a little bit rougher with people who have no other shrine at which to worship than that of the almighty dollar.

I intend to support the minister in the amendments which he is bringing into the house, but I appeal to him to do something further, because, while this is a temporary or a partial alleviation, it does not get to the root of the Canadian housing problem, and I am convinced that the minister is as well aware of that as is any other member of this House of Commons.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1— "Corporation."

Mr. IRVINE: Before this clause carries, I want to bring one matter to the attention of the minister. I have information which would seem to indicate that a cooperative organization has been seeking to get support for their building programme through the act as it now exists, and I believe they have been refused. The association to which I refer was formed last fall under the sponsorship of branch No. 768 of the Canadian Legion in Vancouver. The purpose of the organization was to attempt to solve a veterans' housing problem by providing moderate rental accommodation on a mutual ownership basis. I understand that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, while approving the technical details of the project, has refused the loan on the ground that, because this organization is a cooperative organization, it would not be a rental housing project but in essence a form of home ownership, and therefore is disqualified under the terms of the act. What I want to know is whether in the bill now before us there is provision by which associations of the type I have cited would receive financial assistance from the government housing scheme.

Mr. HOWE: The point brought up by my hon. friend is one which I attempted to explain in my remarks last Monday. He himself gave the answer when he said that the association he suggests is not a true cooperative, it is an association of home owners. Take a typical case. Ten people desiring to own homes band together and call themselves a cooperative. They believe that the homes will cost $6,000 and are prepared to enter into a contract each to buy a home for $6,000. The cooperative has no other means of income except the payments due from these ten men who are home owners. We will say that something happens to the cooperative. We will say that one of the houses costs a good deal more than others; some foundation or other difficulty is encountered, or we will say that the whole project gets into difficulties; instead of the houses costing $6,000 they cost $7,000. Well, that is an incident which occurs in the course of business; prices and costs change; difficulties in building occur. Eight of the men might be able to go on and complete the agreement for a house costing $7,000; two men cannot do so. What happens to the position of those two? There is a collective agreement with the government. In other words, the group of ten are bound to carry out the obligation assumed by the ten, and two are unable to do their part. The other eight have the option of taking on the obligation which the two are unwilling to undertake, or the whole project is placed in default. Surely that is not a sound enterprise either for those who participate in it as prospective home owners, or for the government as a lending institution.

Mr. PROBE: The minister will recall that in the public accounts the auditor general himself drew attention to considerable underestimates in connection with certain housing and reconversion projects, notably in Montreal. The Department of Reconstruction or the National Housing Act administration met that cost in the case of the individual, and I do not see that any public furore was raised because of it. The auditor general drew attention to it because it was not according to the original contract; yet the minister supported it. What is wrong with doing that on behalf of the Canadian people generally instead of in the case of an exploiter?

Mr. HOWE: The home conversion programme was the government's own programme. The government was in a position to amortize its loss by extending the period during which it would collect rentals. But surely the government cannot underwrite every man's contract for a house, as it would be expected to do if the government assumed losses in the case of a cooperative formed by home owners who, instead of building individually, build as a group.

Mr. PROBE: Suppose there were some intermediary between the cooperatives, and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. If we put a cushion in there to take on the guarantee against loss, would the Minister of Reconstruction consider an improvement in the terms under which he would do business with the cooperative?

Mr. HOWE: The government would be delighted to do business with the cooperative on the terms stated, provided that the cooperative has a source of income apart from the project itself. For instance, we would be delighted to do business with the Saskatchewan Cooperative Elevator company, which is now the Saskatchewan pool, or with any number of other cooperatives. We would be pleased indeed to allow the act to apply in those cases, but not to a group of home owners. There are other sections of the act designed for individual home owners. The type of organization suggested by the hon. member for Cariboo is not a true cooperative in the sense in which cooperatives are mentioned in the housing act.

Mr. IRVINE: I fail to see the point which the minister makes in answer to my question. I cannot see how the government would be in any worse position if two of the ten cooperatives failed to meet the original agreement than they would be if some private corporation failed to meet it. The house, if constructed, would be in itself the government's own security, and I cannot see that any great harm would be done in carrying on business with an organization of that kind. But I would ask the minister whether he knows of the housing bill in the United States, S-1592, sections 404 and 405. Is it true that they provide particularly liberal terms to mutual ownership or cooperative associations for the very reason that these associations provide a form of house ownership for families of low income, and would it not be possible to incorporate in this bill similar classes to meet the requirements of Canada?

Mr. HOWE: We are discussing the preamble at present. If my hon. friend will allow that point to stand until we come to the amendment dealing with that matter, I will look into the United States housing provisions and discuss the subject with him then.

Mr. GREEN: When the minister made his preliminary statement on July 22 he pointed out clearly and on more than one occasion that the dominion government would provide every facility to private enterprise to build as many houses as were needed. He intimated that the government believes that the bulk of new housing for Canada will be constructed by private builders. My hon. friends to the left are very much against any suggestion of that type, but I think the minister was right in his summing up. On that same day I questioned him about priorities, about allotment of materials, about the price ceiling on lumber, and to the different questions he gave answers which, from information received from the Pacific coast since that day, are not strictly in accordance with the facts. I believe there is something the government can do to help private enterprise build more homes, certainly on the Pacific coast. In the first place, take the small builder. Ordinarily he gets no priority at all and he is having great difficulty in obtaining supplies. I have here a press dispatch of July 23 from Vancouver, in which there appears this statement by one contractor:

"I simply don't know what to do with my time," one contractor said. "I have no priorities and no material. I might as well fold up my shingle and go out of business."

That is the picture from the point of view of the small contractor. Then take the lumber yards. In reply to my questions the minister said that the lumber yards were making good money. At page 3707 of Hansard he said:

The retail lumber yards have never made as much money in their history as they have in the last year. I cannot imagine why they would close down.

That answer was given in reply to my statement that the retail lumber yards were facing difficult conditions. I have had telegrams since from different lumber yards in Vancouver. One is from Fletcher-Wells Lumber Limited, dated the 24th July, which was two days after the discussion in the house. I quote:

According to papers, Mr. Howe claims retail yards getting material same basis 1941.

If the minister will remember, he said that lumber was being allotted to the yards according to the material they got back in 1941. The telegram continues:

This is untrue. All retail yards here have no stock and cannot buy from mills. You have our authority to give him our name as one who cannot get stock and would be glad to give you names of every dealer in city in same plight. Understand all this information sent to Mr. Howe last week.

Presumably it would arrive here about the time the discussion was taking place in the house. I am not suggesting that the minister had it when he gave me the answer.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. HOWE: Has not the lack of stocks in the yards some relation to the strike in the lumber industry, which closed all the mills for a month?

Mr. GREEN: I have no doubt that has made the position worse than it was before, but that is not the main explanation of the shortage. Dealing with the answer given by the minister to the effect that the wartime prices and trade board were allotting lumber on the 1941 basis, I have here a letter from B.C. Lumber Survey Limited, dated July 26, three days ago, which states:

The timber control office in Vancouver has informed the newspapers that they make no check whatever of local movements of lumber, whereas the minister has informed the house that domestic lumber is distributed to dealers on the 1941 basis.

I do not think there can be any doubt that there is no allotment made in Vancouver. I believe if one were made it would help remedy this situation by giving the retail lumber yard some lumber to sell, and the retail lumber yard in turn could make lumber available to the small builder. Then there is the matter of the small sawmill. This afternoon I received last Thursday's issue of the Vancouver Sun, on the front page of which I see an article headed "Extinction threatens 300 B.C. sawmills." The first paragraph reads:

The threat of closure before the summer is out to-day hung over close to 300 British Columbia sawmills, whose only hope of relief is action by the prices board to adjust lumber price ceilings. The threatened mills—half of the total number in the province—are those which buy their logs on the open market, where price ceilings are suspended on logs. But the prices they charge for their lumber are still fixed, making it increasingly difficult for them to meet expenses.

The article goes on to say, in part:

The mills are now completely regimented on fixed prices, below cost of production (in the vast majority of cases), and there are existing arbitrary quotas and regulations which preclude any clean-cut normal business proceeding.

The article makes it quite clear that, whereas the big firm which has its own timber limits, cuts its own logs and saws them into lumber, is not affected by the fact that there are ceiling prices on lumber and no ceiling prices on logs, the small mill that has to buy its logs is caught between two fires. It would be a great tragedy in the coastal province if these small sawmills were put out of business.

Mr. HOWE: If I may ask my hon. friend a question, who fixes the price of logs? Is it not the same small sawmill he is talking about, which is the only buyer of these logs?

Mr. GREEN: No, it is not.

Mr. HOWE: Then who does fix it?

Mr. GREEN: The logging men fix the price.

Mr. HOWE: Surely my hon. friend has heard of a buyers' strike. If the buyers refuse to pay these prices, where would the loggers sell?

Mr. GREEN: It is not quite as easy as that. It is not a case for a buyers' strike. If anything like that happens the big mills can simply hold their logs which they do not need to cut for themselves, and the small sawmill has to get them or go out of business.

Mr. HOWE: But surely the big mills are not the sellers of logs?

Mr. GREEN: Some of the biggest firms are. Nearly half of all the logging in our province is done by firms who have timber limits and also mills; they are huge interests, and they are being benefited by this price control which is in existence at the present time. The minister can interview anybody in the logging industry of British Columbia, and I think he will find that the price control system there is entirely out of gear. Further, in answering me the minister said that if the ceiling were taken off lumber and the price were to go up $20 a thousand it would mean an increase of from $600 to $1,000 in the cost of a house. The first reaction to that statement was this article which appeared in Winnipeg the next day, dated July 24, headed, "Western lumbermen say Howe's statement misleading, harmful." The article states:

> Approximately 12,000 board feet of lumber is used in the average small home built in this area . . . This estimated increase of $600 in the cost of lumber per home carries the implication that those responsible for the manufacture and distribution of lumber would impose upon their customers an increase of $50 per 1,000 feet, approximately 75 per cent.

Actually the minister's figures were based on an increase of $20 per thousand. The final paragraph states:

> The statement added that the association, whose members operate nearly 900 lumber yards in western Canada, considers such statements as Mr. Howe's "not only misleading, but definitely harmful, and feels they should be retracted."

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend realizes that you cannot take ceilings off lumber and leave ceilings on nails and other materials entering into the construction of a house. Surely he would not suggest that; he is not wedded to the lumber industry to that extent.

Mr. GREEN: As this business is being carried on at the present time it is going to be difficult to get the number of houses the minister requires, and I am suggesting that he give further consideration to this question of the ceiling on lumber. The other day Donald Gordon explained to the committee on industrial relations what he was trying to do. He is trying to make these lumber people get their money out of the export of their material.

Mr. HOWE: Not at all.

Mr. GREEN: At the same time they are losing money in the domestic market. Human nature being what it is, the result has been and will be that these people will not produce for the domestic market if they can avoid doing so. Donald Gordon is quoted in the press of July 27 as saying:

> My job is to hold domestic prices and I'll use any weapon—any weapon at all—to do it. I'm holding domestic prices of lumber at a low level in relation to export prices because I believe the industry can still operate at an over-all profit. In other words the export market is subsidizing the domestic market.

I have a telegram here dealing with that question from Mr. Harold B. Collins, president of the British Columbia wholesale lumber and shingle association. It is dated July 23, the day after the minister made his statement in the house, and states:

> Vancouver News Herald to-day quotes Hon. Mr. Howe as saying that if ceiling prices were taken off lumber the price of houses would increase six hundred to one thousand dollars. We point out that a five-room all-wood bungalow takes approximately twelve thousand feet of lumber which at an increase of ten dollars per thousand feet would mean an increase of one hundred and twenty dollars per house or double this amount if prices were increased twenty dollars per thousand. Under present conditions with lumber in short supply through being sold in Canada by manufacturers at less than cost of production it requires several months longer to build than formerly. It seems reasonable to suppose cost of building would be reduced if contractor could complete building in less time which he could do if building materials were available. British Columbia wholesale lumber prices are approximately twenty dollars per thousand lower than export prices. It is not likely domestic prices would increase to this extent if ceiling were removed. Suggest you point out to Mr. Howe discrepancy in his figures which can be confirmed by any legitimate contractor and press for complete review of wholesale and retail prices of lumber in Canada by committee composed of manufacturers, wholesalers and retailers along with government representatives.

I suggest to the minister that this last idea is worthy of some consideration; in other words, that the whole question of wholesale and retail lumber prices should be carefully considered by a representative body. I also have a letter from the British Columbia Lumber Survey Limited dated July 26, dealing with this matter of the increase in the cost of a house. They say:

The lumber contained is never more than 15,000 feet which would give an increase of $300 per house at the outside.

Mr. HOWE: An increase of $300 in the cost of a veteran's house is not important?

Mr. GREEN: Oh, yes, it is important; but actually, because of the way these supplies are being handled, the builder is forced to run around from one mill to another and from one yard to another, and he loses valuable time. In addition, I believe there is a black market, and all these things mean added costs which have to be paid by the man buying the house. I am not sure that the remedies suggested are the correct ones; they may not be, but in any event they merit the most careful investigation by the minister. The Vancouver Sun, which is a strong supporter of this government, said editorially on June 26 in an article headed, "Drop lumber controls now; how to build houses in Canada", by Roy W. Brown, the editorial director, who is a well informed and level-headed man:

You have a choice of two positions. You can maintain controls and have a scarcity of lumber with the many abuses which go with that scarcity; or you can take off the ceiling prices and pay more for the lumber, but have it in abundance.

That was his stand about a month ago. I come back to my opening statement, which was that the government is relying primarily upon the private builder to build homes; yet he is being given very little by way of help to do that building. I suggest that the minister have his officials investigate the points I have raised. If he does so I believe he may find that the situation will improve—at any rate, on the Pacific coast.

Mr. HOWE: I think I should discuss this question. In the first place, the department over which I am minister does not regulate prices. My hon. friend will understand that that is in another department of government—and quite properly so.

But I will say this: I have found the wartime prices and trade board ready to adjust prices whenever a manufacturer or producer can show a case for the increase.

Mr. GILLIS: They do it quite easily, too.

Mr. HOWE: However, he must show that under the present price set-up his operation cannot make a reasonable profit. It has been suggested to-day that Canadians are driving up the price of export lumber. That is not so.

Mr. GREEN: I did not suggest that.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. HOWE: I know, but others did. Canadian lumber commands an export market, and it is quite irrespective of any action Canada could take. All the wartime prices and trade board says to the producer of lumber is this, "We want a certain proportion of your lumber. We set a proportion for various parts of Canada. At the present time it is 50 per cent on the Pacific coast, though it has been 35 per cent. We want that lumber. We are willing to pay enough for it to let you make an over-all profit. If we fail to do that, make your case and we will make an adjustment. But you must first make your case."

Surely that is a reasonable attitude. My hon. friend is interested in financial matters. I suppose he has read the financial statements of the principal lumber firms on the west coast, several of which are a matter of public property, and all of which are on file with the wartime prices and trade board. If he will read those statements I think he would not suggest for a moment that the lumber industry on the Pacific coast is not in an exceedingly prosperous position.

Mr. GREEN: The minister is referring to the big fellows; I am talking about the little fellows.

Mr. HOWE: The little fellow can also make his case. The hon. member is trying to confuse the issue when he says that the big fellow sets the price of logs.

Mr. GREEN: I am not trying to confuse any issue at all.

Mr. HOWE: The log-producing and log-buying industry is, for the most part, quite separate from the operations which combine both. The small mill, which my hon. friend is speaking about to-day, buys from the independent producer of logs. The small mill group sets the price of logs. As soon as the small mill refuses to pay the current price of logs, then the current price of logs will drop.

Mr. GREEN: What is to prevent a big mill, which also cuts its own logs, from buying logs from the independent log producer?

Mr. HOWE: Because they have their own source of supply.

Mr. GREEN: They are always glad to get extra logs.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps so. Timber control in its earlier stages was controlling the price of logs. Effective control became almost impossible, on account of black market operations which again came from the small sawmill. We found that, while we had a ceiling price on logs, the ceiling was being violated. Those who had given the matter greatest consideration recommended to me that in the interest of over-all production it would be desirable to maintain the ceiling on finished lumber, and take off the ceiling on logs. That is the usual method of applying price control, namely to control the price of the consumer product, and not the intermediate product.

There is a flurry in logs at the present time, due largely to the strike. No logs were produced for a considerable period during the strike.

Mr. GREEN: The price went up again a few days ago.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, but who buys them? If my hon. friend can show me that the big mills are bidding up the price of logs against the small mills, I shall be interested in exploring the situation. But that is not my information.

Mr. GREEN: I am told that small mills cannot afford to produce lumber at the price that is being asked for logs. That is sufficient consideration to merit an investigation by the Department of Reconstruction, or at least by the wartime prices and trade board. If that information is correct there will only be one result, namely that the small mill will go out of business, and there will be less lumber produced at a time when Canada needs lumber more than anything else.

Mr. HOWE: May I point out that all the logs which are cut are being sawed into lumber by someone. I do not think my hon. friend would suggest that the same number of logs will not be cut into lumber, or that the same amount of lumber will not be put on the market.

Mr. GREEN: Logs can be held in the water for a year.

Mr. HOWE: I should like to know of a concern that is holding them for a rise in price.

Mr. GREEN: You could not do anything about it, if they were?

Mr. HOWE: Could I not?

Mr. GREEN: No, not under your present law.

Mr. PROBE: Who is the timber controller, and what are his duties? Then, what are the prices of logs and rough lumber in various regions of Canada? I believe this information would be useful. I am alarmed at the concern shown by the hon. member for Vancouver South respecting the small operator, and particularly when I think of the way in which lumber prices in my own city have risen. It seems to me that if the small operator is suffering in the transaction, then the fellow at the other end supplying the logs is receiving an inordinate share of the total price. A statement showing the amount each of these individuals receives, from the tree to the finished house, would have considerable merit in this discussion. I know that in my own city lumber has increased in price since before the war from $40 to $75 per thousand. When I think of logs being worth from $6 to $12, I am inclined to think the difference is not all taken up by freight. Could the minister give a picture of the timber control situation, with figures?

Mr. HOWE: I have not the figures before me. Prices of lumber in various areas of Canada are different, having regard to the conditions in those areas.

Mr. PROBE: Freight conditions?

Mr. HOWE: No. The difference is largely governed by the amount of the product which goes for export. For example, on the Pacific coast the export quota was 65 per cent of the cut, this for historic reasons. The bulk of the coastal lumber has always been exported. Then, in the prairie provinces the export quota is two-fifths of the cut; in Ontario and Quebec it is one-third, and in the maritimes a different proportion.

The timber controller sees that the requirements of the home market are looked after in accordance with the formula set. He takes care of such priorities as may be issued by the director of priorities. He generally sees that the distribution of lumber conforms with the needs of the various areas in Canada. He has charge of the whole lumber programme and he functions with a staff of, I think, 300 persons. He has officers in all parts of Canada to see that the regulations are carried out.

Mr. PROBE: You have not discussed the prices of materials.

Mr. HOWE: Prices are such that the producer is allowed a reasonable margin of profit.

Mr. GREEN: There is no ceiling on logs.

Mr. MERRITT: Going back for a moment to the subject the hon. member for Vancouver South was talking about, I should like to add my voice to his in asking the minister to investigate the situation in British Columbia with respect to price ceilings and the supply of lumber. It is apparent to me from what the minister has said—and I say this with all respect—that he is not as familiar with the situation there as are some of us who live in Vancouver.

For instance, the minister said that the lumber yards are doing better than they have ever done in their history. I understand that that is perfectly true of those located east of the rockies, but it is not true of British Columbia where the mills are direct competitors of the lumber yards and have simply forced them out of business. In order to get a return for its cut, a mill must take the retail price fixed by the board and not just the wholesale price.

The minister suggested that the financial position of companies in British Columbia was quite satisfactory and that, therefore, no price adjustment was necessary. Where do they get that profit? We who are from British Columbia know it comes from the export trade. As the hon. member for Vancouver North said, the domestic trade is carried on at a loss of something like $15 per thousand. There is another interesting thing about the structure of this industry. The minister referred to the large capital which had been built up on the export trade. These are the mills located on the Fraser river or at Port Alberni. In the normal days of peace their domestic trade was almost nil; practically 90 per cent of their business was export. Deep sea ships would come along their wharves, load and sail without coming near Vancouver.

On the other hand, a large number of mills —these are the mills referred to in the press report mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver South—are domestic mills. Many of them are located along False creek in Vancouver, or in other cities and towns. Their natural outlet is a rail haul to eastern Canada. In order to sell their lumber export, they must put it in scows, perhaps tow it around from False creek to Vancouver harbour, unload from the scow into the ship which goes overseas. Under the quota system which is now 50 per cent, these domestic mills are being forced into a business for which they were never designed.

A comparison of the figures in relation to the large mills which have timber limits and so on and those in relation to the small mills which have no timber limits, no towing facilities and which are being forced to seek a market in an unnatural sphere will show that a great hardship is being borne by these small mills.

The minister said that if the cost of logs has gone up too much let there be a buyers' strike and the cost will come down. The minister knows as well as I that logs are quite scarce and that any refusal to buy the logs offered would mean an almost immediate shut-down by the log buying mills. Surely the minister is not suggesting that they should shut down and cease production in order to get the log price down.

The last thing I want to point out with respect to conditions in the lumber trade on the Pacific coast is that the small log buying mill started this year not making a profit on its domestic business. Since that time there has been a $6 increase in the price of logs and a $2 per thousand increase in the cost of labour; that is, the hands in the sawmill itself. They have lost the ten cent premium on the dollar on their United States business. The domestic quota has been increased from 35 to 50 per cent. At the spring session of the legislature the working week was reduced from forty-eight hours to forty-four hours. No great complaint is being made against any one of these things taken by itself, but when an industry which was not making a profit on its domestic business suffers five such blows within a few weeks it indicates that before the end of the year the earning position of these mills will become seriously impaired. I urge the minister to look into this matter, because I believe in this particular case he will be able to find something to his advantage in his efforts to stimulate the supply of lumber.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend has made out a good case for the small mill to present to the wartime prices and trade board for an increase in prices. I do not see why these mills do not present their case. I am assured by the wartime prices and trade board that no case has been made for an increase in prices at this time, and I am also told by that board that when a case can be made an increase will be considered.

Mr. IRVINE: I have just one question I should like to ask the minister. I think he said a moment ago that it was the business of the lumber controller to see that the home market was supplied. The hon. member for Vancouver North gave some figures which, if they were correct, would prove that ample lumber is now being produced in Canada to supply the home market and to permit the export provided for. His claim was that it was not being properly distributed, and I wish to know from the minister where the difficulty lies. I should like to know whether the controller is not controlling, or whether the figures given by the hon. member for Vancouver North are incorrect.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I referred to distribution within British Columbia; I quoted no authority for distribution outside the province.

Mr. IRVINE: It is British Columbia that I am talking about, because we have a problem in Prince George which is similar to the problem that exists elsewhere. I want to know where the trouble lies.

Mr. HOWE: I do not know of any surpluses of lumber anywhere in Canada. It seems to me that there has been a fair job done in distributing lumber. All the lumber is consumed somewhere. The export quota is certainly being met in full and, so far as I know, all parts of Canada have a reasonable quantity of lumber. For a time we had great difficulty in getting lumber in to southern Saskatchewan. It was much easier to ship across the border. That was worked out, and arrangements have been made which, I think, have brought about a reasonably equitable distribution of lumber so far as geography is concerned. If there are accumulations in one part and shortages in another, that would indicate that the distribution was not reasonably even.

Mr. IRVINE: Is the controller limited to geographical considerations, or has he power to distinguish between industries and certain human needs? Can he not give direction to some extent as to which industry shall be supplied with lumber and whether it shall go for homes or for something else?

Mr. HOWE: About thirty per cent of all small homes and a much larger percentage of the homes for veterans, are built under priorities, and special arrangements are made to divert materials into these homes. The remainder of the material goes into the retail market, and no control is exercised over what is built with that lumber.

There has been some discussion about the federal government assuming the over-all programme of construction control. It has been said that it is difficult for a city to do so, because the city may want an industry, and it would be difficult to say no to that industry; regardless of the need of lumber for homes. That bland assumption would indicate that it is very simple for the federal government to exercise similar control. But of all the controls which the federal government attempted to operate in time of war—and I think our wartime controls were more successful than those in any other country—we failed miserably in exercising construction control. Why? Because no one would accept our judgment as to what was essential building and what was not. We received terrific pressures from cities to allow exemptions from the established rules. Black marketing got so bad that the situation became quite uncontrollable. We had more difficulty in getting convictions for black marketing against building control than against any other control. It was practically impossible to obtain a conviction. There would be a flagrant violation of the control in some cities; a prosecution would take place, and the offender would be fined $5 and given a clean bill of health to go ahead. I am willing to operate any control that can be operated, but I know from experience that the federal government cannot successfully operate building control. Just as an example, a delegation of six mayors from large cities came to see me just after we passed the order in council permitting municipalities to operate building control. They said, "We cannot do this because it would never be uniform." They said: "We want you to prohibit certain types of buildings." I said, "I shall be delighted, if you will tell me what types of building to prohibit. Tell me and I will pass the order in council to-morrow." Some said: "Theatres." I said, "Fine; we will start with theatres." Then one mayor spoke up and said, "We have been trying for years to get a theatre built in my city and one is coming along now. You are not going to prohibit theatres." Somebody else said, "Prohibit luxury hotels." At once another mayor spoke up and said, "You are not going to prohibit hotels because we are promoting a hotel to be built in my city and we are going to have it in spite of anything you do." Two or three other types were mentioned, such as bowling alleys. Hon. gentlemen would think that surely we could prohibit bowling alleys during the war, but we had more trouble with bowling alleys being bootlegged than almost anything else. Finally I said to this group of mayors, "Perhaps you will retire and come back later when you have agreed on what you would like prohibited." They met all next day, but they never came back. So I wish that hon. members would drop the idea that the federal government is quite capable of telling people what they can use lumber for and what not.

Mr. GREEN: What about the distribution of lumber? Is it not possible for the timber controller to see that there is an equitable distribution of lumber?

Mr. HOWE: I believe that is being done. I should like to know of inequalities in the distribution of lumber as between geographical areas.

Mr. GREEN: I mean within a geographical area, is it not possible for there to be an equitable distribution?

Mr. HOWE: I am certain that if the industry within an area could agree on what is an equitable distribution, the timber controller would be glad to see the distribution made accordingly.

Mr. GREEN: I have a further letter from the B. C. Lumber Survey Limited, dated July 26, 1946, in which they say:

What is certain, however,—

That is referring to the minister's statement on page 3709 of Hansard:

What is certain, however, is that Mr. Rosenberry and the wartime prices and trade board were fully informed on the subject and have been so informed for a good many months. Mr. Rosenberry and Mr. Ashbaugh of the wartime prices and trade board received a delegation of the retail lumber men in Vancouver at the beginning of 1946. The only subject discussed at that meeting was the distribution of lumber, the yards having made the request that the board's policy of equitable distribution be applied to lumber. Thus Mr. Howe's department was fully informed that lumber is not being distributed on the 1941 basis and nothing has been done in Vancouver to implement this policy of the board.

Why cannot that policy be implemented in Vancouver?

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to call that to the attention of the timber controller.

Mr. McMASTER: Nobody has spoken so far from Ontario, which is suffering from a lumber shortage most of all the provinces. I understand that five billion feet is Canada's normal cut of lumber and that that will be the amount produced this year. More than half of that is produced in British Columbia. The government may have made a mistake in allowing, until recently, 65 per cent to be exported. I also understand that the railways have a priority on about 20 per cent of the whole cut. If that is the case, with 65 per cent exported, now 50 per cent, and 20 per cent of the whole cut going to the railways, there is only 15 per cent left for ordinary construction, so that only a mere trickle comes from the northwest part of British Columbia toward the east. I am very much surprised that members from Saskatchewan and Alberta are raising so much trouble about this matter, because I learn from several sources, which I believe to be reliable, that the prairie provinces have an advantage over Ontario of $3 a thousand in price, although the lumber coming from British Columbia to Ontario must travel very much farther. As a matter of fact, the lumber does stop in the prairie provinces, where they have not much lumber of their own.

I think I mentioned that British Columbia produces more than half the total cut of five billion feet. Let us, for the sake of argument, say that British Columbia produces two and three-quarter billion feet. Ontario, where there is such a large demand for building, and where the timber is now getting farther and farther back, produces one billion feet. A certain amount of that is hard wood and white pine, which does not go into building construction but is used for furniture and other purposes. The minister has just said that one-third is allowed to be exported. So the amount of lumber produced in Ontario that can be used for housing purposes is not large. Then there is Quebec and the maritime provinces which must grow the greater portion of the remaining one and a quarter billion feet that is produced from these other sources. The minister did not say exactly how much of this latter is allowed to be exported. If it is one-third you will see that, when you take into consideration the demand which is made in the maritimes and in Quebec, there is only a mere trickle coming into Ontario, and on that account we suffer more, perhaps, than any other province from lack of lumber.

I have often wished that in the beginning of the housing crisis the government had not been stampeded to the extent they were, because, as I said at the last session when dealing with this question, during the war the government were the largest consumer of lumber and they must have had and did have, throughout Ontario especially, buildings containing seasoned lumber, which could have been taken down and the seasoned materials used for the first six or eight months in the erection of new houses. Some person who should have known told me that the recovery could have been 70 or 80 per cent. This provision would have bridged the period between the time we needed lumber for building and such time as new lumber in a more seasoned condition would become more readily available.

I have often wished that the government had erected a more permanent type of building in their housing operations. I have mentioned once or twice before, and many other members have risen in their places in the house and made valid complaints about the situations in which these veterans' houses were built. That is, they were not built in urban districts, although they were meant for urban workers, but were located some distance out. I do not believe that the matter of a half acre of land surrounding a building would make up for the increased inconvenience the occupier would have in getting to work, or the extra expense involved in putting in different services, such as electricity, water and sewage, as well as the extra trouble the man would have in providing schooling for his family. However, the government did go out some distance, partly necessitated by the fact that they did not provide a more durable type of building. I will mention one municipality I know of, the township of York, which, as some hon. members know, is supposed to be a rural district, although there may be eighty-three thousand people in that comparatively small area, making it the largest rural municipality in Canada. But there are still unoccupied streets, although maybe not paved, provided with sewers, water and electricity, on which houses could have been built if the government had consented to erect them with brick, or concrete blocks, or some other substantial material. Had the government done this there would have been a great saving of lumber. An amount of 15,000 feet has been spoken of to-day as the amount of lumber in a house. I am not a builder or a lumber man, but it strikes me that that is exaggerated for the type of building which has been erected by the government for the veterans. Indeed I would say that half that figure would be more nearly correct. Of course, of this amount, the better part of the lumber is used for the trimming and siding, and it is unfortunate that an attempt was not made to provide more substantial material for the outside, so that this good lumber would have been more available for inside work.

During the war we heard a good deal about plastics and other synthetic materials, and that attempts would be made to create buildings entirely different from anything which had been made before. Strange to relate, the building industry is about where it was forty years ago. Mass production has been applied to practically everything except building, but in that industry they are still back in the old times when they produced very slowly, and with manual labour. Of course to-day increased labour costs have had much to do with the increased cost of building.

Houses being so necessary, I was interested in what the minister said about demands from municipalities for other buildings. I have not the figures, and my memory may not be very accurate, but I believe that for the month of April last the amount of construction in Canada was something in this ratio: $18 million for dwellings and about $42 million for industrial buildings, for churches, hotels, theatres and other kinds of buildings. That strikes me as a little out of line when we hear such moving stories as we have heard here from both hon. members of my own party and hon. members belonging to the C.C.F., possibly also hon. members supporting the Liberal party about the shortage of houses. Surely the government should have sufficient control to see that buildings are provided in a more fair proportion as between homes and other types of construction than they have been. To that extent, I believe, the government has failed in its duty.

There is a black market, and if I were asked where these black markets are located I might not be able to tell you of them. When I suggest, to people who know, that about half the lumber which is distributed in Ontario goes to that market they tell me that the estimate is a little low. The reason for that condition, which has been touched upon by several other speakers, including, I believe, the minister and several hon. members from British Columbia, is that the ceiling is actually so low that the man who manufactures the lumber now eliminates the old retailer; he has to sell direct to the customer in order to get a fair return, because these large prices which he gets from the export trade do not balance the results of the very low ceiling and the extra costs of production. The result is that only a large buyer, shall I say a large consumer buyer, is able to secure this lumber, and the small man who ordinarily went to the retailer to get a few hundred feet of lumber as he needed it cannot find any now, because—I do not care what anybody says—the small retailers are actually without lumber for the people who want it. People tell me that a certain company, which operates more largely in the prairie provinces than anywhere else, and in a small way in Ontario, is well supplied with lumber. I thought there was something strange about that, and I inquired from a man who has no reason to wish to do the government either a favour or an injury. He said it was because that particular company has always been a large buyer, and its very large buying power enabled it to purchase where the small man could not do so. That does not represent equality of distribution; and I think, since the government has undertaken this job, it might do it a little more equitably.

Mr. MERRITT: Would the minister explain a statement of his on the resolution stage with regard to the assistance being given to manufacturers of building materials to get increased production? Would he give the committee an idea of the type of obstacles they are encountering, the methods he is using to meet them, and what is being done about increasing the capacity of various lines in the country?

Mr. HOWE: I shall be very glad to do so. Would my hon. friend like me to do so now?

Mr. MERRITT: I think this is the proper time. As far as I know, there is no part of the bill which deals with it.

Mr. HOWE: It is almost six o'clock. Would it be all right to do it at eight o'clock?

Mr. GREEN: There is a distribution as between areas. Would the minister tell us whether that applies also to such supplies as steel? Since the discussion on July 22 I have had a letter from Smith Sheet Metal Works Ltd., Vancouver. They state:

> We are, and have been for thirty years, the only manufacturer of metal cornerbead, west of Winnipeg We are not able to obtain sheets for the production of cornerbead this year, although we have approached the steel controller on several occasions for a quota for this purpose.
> Under normal circumstances, we acquire our requirements from the Canadian steel mills through a local supplier.
>
> Due to the shortages, however, they will no longer accept an order for this purpose as it would come off their small monthly quota. As a result, we are not able to supply metal bead, and the housing programme is being seriously held up. The eastern manufacturers are able to get sheets for this purpose and ship the goods out here.

I presume, the manufactured goods.

> We feel that this is certainly very discriminating inasmuch as we are an old-time manufacturer of this article. Last year we produced three-quarters of a million feet, whereas this year to date we have turned out only 20,000 feet. We have tried to obtain from the steel controller, a definite quota per month but as yet we have received nothing but a run around, as he refers us to our local suppliers who in turn refer us to the steel controller.

What should a person do in a case like that?

Mr. HOWE: The administrator of the wartime prices and trade board has that matter in charge. My over-all experience is that supplies of sheet metal on the Pacific coast have been better than in the east for the last several months. Evidently this man has depended on a supplier who has let him down. Ordinarily each industry has its own supplier and it is the duty of the administrator of the wartime prices and trade board to see that suppliers get their fair share of the over-all production. I think my hon. friend will find that this man's usual supplier gets his fair share.

Mr. GREEN: Is there anyone to compel the local supplier to supply him with the material?

Mr. HOWE: If he can make a good case, the administrator will no doubt try to see that he is kept in business.

[Mr. Merritt.]

Mr. BENTLEY: Will there be restricted areas in the application of the act? Will there be any parts of Canada where loans will not be made available? There was a time under the National Housing Act when we could not get anything in Swift Current. Shall we be able to get any now?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. The whole effort over the last several months has been to make sure that every part of Canada will obtain service. That is the purpose of the amendment. It is to make sure that rural areas and areas producing raw products will get the same service as is obtained in the cities.

Mr. MERRITT: Will the minister give the committee figures for various parts of Canada, including Vancouver, as to the estimated cost of constructing per square foot of, say a house under $6,000, and the lending value per square foot—whatever figure is used by the National Housing Act authorities?

Mr. HOWE: We have never released these prices. It is difficult to say. Under integrated housing there is a controlled price which would be a criterion. The floor price for speculative building would be something else. We can hardly give it.

Mr. MERRITT: I am only asking with respect to the estimated cost upon which the lending value of the loan to the home owner is based. Since the lending value must be established, and he must be told what that is, there should not be any secrecy about that particular cost.

Mr. HOWE: The variation in lending value depends on the location of the house, the desirability, and various other factors. If we laid down a rigid lending value for any kind of house in any location, such procedure would be hardly fair to the lending authorities. The only way in which the prospective buyer can get a lending value on a house is to produce the plans and location of the house. Then he is given the lending value of that particular house.

Mr. MERRITT: In my speech this morning I quoted the figures $4.20 and $6 which I got out of a report in a Vancouver newspaper respecting certain houses there. The minister has placed his limit of ten per cent on the increase in the lending value squarely on the ground that the cost of building houses has gone up 150 per cent from 1939, and, as I said, if that is so his argument in his statement the other day is one with which I agree. But when I see a spread of $1.80 per square foot between the lending value and the actual cost in connection with a particular house in Vancouver, then I am led to believe that the actual cost must have gone up very much more than 150 per cent since 1939. Therefore, the actual increase of ten per cent in lending value, so far as I can see, is not going to relieve at all the situation which it was designed to relieve.

Mr. HOWE: It is necessary to see the plan of the house before we can say whether the figures given by my hon. friend are valid, as regards the difference he mentions. If it is a controlled-cost plan of building, the spread is entirely out of proportion. If costs are controlled the spread should be very much less than that mentioned. In the case of the speculative builder, the purchaser makes his own deal, but I would be surprised if he went ahead on the basis of the spread indicated. I know of no way in which the government can protect that man against an exorbitant profit of the builder.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MERRITT: Subject to the statement which the minister will make, it is carried.

Section agreed to.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On section 2—"Cost of construction".

Mr. HOWE: Before the recess, I undertook to answer a question asked by the hon. member for Cariboo, I believe, as to what methods were used for stimulating production. In my remarks on the resolution, I stated that we were prepared to use the same methods for stimulating production of home building materials that were used for stimulating the production of war materials during the war period. Various methods have been used to increase the production of nails. We examined the industry and found that a price increase was required, and a price increase was granted. In the case of asbestos, an amount representing a very large investment was made by a private company in return for receiving double the usual rate of depreciation. In the matter of plumbing supplies, negotiations are now proceeding which may involve the government paying for certain equipment, under the proviso that the government will own the equipment until the cost of it has been refunded through depreciation account or otherwise. In the case of brick, new brickyards were opened by government assistance in providing labour; and also in one case by the government undertaking to purchase the output of the yard in the event that the brick could not be sold privately. In the case of wallboard, an old mill was opened by the government diverting raw material from the industry as a whole and undertaking to purchase any material that could not be sold privately at the ceiling price.

These are samples of devices that have been used in stimulating production. A great number of cases have been examined and have received treatment. In the matter of soil pipe, it was felt the difficulty was that the ceiling was too low, and the ceiling was adjusted in a manner that greatly increased production. The practice is to examine a situation, find out what is preventing the required expansion, and then to take remedial steps accordingly.

Mr. PROBE: Has the minister considered adding another safeguard which, in my opinion, is exceedingly necessary. I believe that the production of all these items the minister has mentioned can vary considerably within the plants themselves. That is, production may be either slowed down or speeded up by a variety of more or less artificial devices: at the wish of the management, for example; continuous delay in getting a spare part, and so on. Has the minister considered making part and parcel of any contract he has entered into with any of these various industrial groups a requirement that double shifts, or three shifts if necessary, be maintained in the plants? What is the safeguard with respect to seeing that this machinery is continuously employed? That is extremely important. Certainly it is a much more difficult thing for the minister to assure than it would be to say, "We shall raise the price of nails from $5 to $6.50."

Mr. HOWE: In examining a situation the first question asked is, is the industry operating at full capacity; in other words, is it operating three shifts? If not, the first step taken is to bring it into three shift operation and to correct any difficulties that prevented that being done previously. It is very simple for the officer in charge to check whether a plant continues to operate with three shifts, because the rate of production on a three-shift basis is established and any drop in production calls for an explanation.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is it possible for any company manufacturing bathtubs or boilers or iron pipe fittings or soil pipe to get enough pig-iron to operate to capacity on one shift, let alone three shifts? Is not the trouble with all such businesses to-day the question of pig-iron?

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend is talking about to-day, he is quite correct. Before the steel strike, however, the steel controller was supplying industry generally with all the pig-iron it could use. At Algoma Steel we cut back the production of steel by 25 per cent in order that the coke and other supplies required for making cast-iron could be devoted to that purpose. As long as the industry was working at capacity under government direction, I do not think anyone requiring pig-iron failed to get the amount needed.

Mr. MacNICOL: In that regard I can say that a prominent manufacturer with whom I am well acquainted and with whose business I am thoroughly familiar told me just about three weeks ago that it was almost impossible for him to get enough pig-iron to manufacture cast-iron boilers and plumbing supplies. He said he had scoured the United States from end to end and had been most fortunate in obtaining two thousand tons of loose pig-iron in an American city near the border. But two thousand tons would not go any distance in meeting the present requirements for boilers, radiators and iron pipe fittings alone.

I think we have a real problem there. No one can blame the minister. It is not his fault. I am sure he has been doing all any human being can do, but, as far as I know, the pig-iron has not been available lately. As far as the Algoma plant is concerned, their own raw iron for processing would not amount to over 300,000 tons a year, and that is a small item in relation to the demand to-day. No one need blame the minister because this material is not available; it just is not there. That is why I rose to say that, among other items, pig-iron is simply not to be had in large quantities. Only to-day I was reading about nails in the United States, and perhaps we may find the same thing here they found over there. The controller in the United States, I suppose holding the same position held by the minister here, is up against the very same problem. They have a housing problem that is infintely worse than ours. I read that after scouring around they had found some 12,000,000 pounds of nails in supplies under army control. That is not very much, but have we any warehouses with nails, under the army or any of the war departments? That might help a little. The 12,000,000 pounds of nails would be enough for about 30,000 houses, but even that amount is not very much in the United States. It would, of course, be a lot here. Is not the real problem that of getting material?

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. HOWE: That is, of course, the real problem. Before the strike, we were forcing our steel economy to the limit. But up to that time, while everyone using pig-iron was on the ragged edge, I know of no case where an industry had to shut down for any considerable length of time owing to a lack of pig-iron. We were just about getting by with what makeshifts we could use. No industry had any considerable stock of pig-iron, but all were getting current supplies sufficient for immediate needs, so far as I know.

In the matter of nails, we have been running our industry to capacity. The present curtailment in production of nails is due to the curtailment in production of steel rods, as well as strikes in one or two of the nail plants. Of course we have plenty of steel rods inside a picket line at one plant, but unfortunately they are not available at the present time. The industry is completely disorganized to-day, and it will be a matter of several weeks before we get back into our stride. But when we do, I think we shall be reasonably in balance, so far as raw materials of steel are concerned.

Mr. MERRITT: Will the minister assure the committee that the capacity of the building materials industry in the country is great enough to deal with the programme of housing he envisages for the next five years? Will he say at the same time whether that capacity is such that the programme could be increased over the figures he has given?

Mr. HOWE: The reason the limit to the programme is set is to keep parallel with our ability to expand the materials market. The reason we set 60,000 houses for the current year is that we believed we could raise our sights on the required materials in order to produce 60,000 houses. The reason we have set 80,000 for next year is that we believe we can raise our sights on materials to supply 80,000 houses. The following year we believe we can hit the 100,000 level, and keep up our supply of materials.

But the supply of materials is the wholly governing factor in the number of houses. If we had twice as much material, and a sufficient amount of labour, we could build twice as many houses this year. We are forcing up this materials position as rapidly as we can, and as rapidly as experience tells us is possible of attainment. That is the wholly limiting factor in the number of houses to be built.

Mr. IRVINE: I should like to ask a question respecting devices which the minister indicated were used to increase production of materials necessary for the building of houses. Is it not so that to offer increases in prices to private corporations to increase certain products means that pressure is brought to bear upon price ceiling control? In the second place, does the minister not think it is a weak device to remove from any private corporation all risk whatsoever, and promise to take over any surplus which may be left after the building programme begins to slacken? In that event, the community is absorbing the entire loss; or, if the surplus materials are put on the market subsequently, it means that the companies will have to shorten their production, just as if the device had never been put there.

Mr. HOWE: The agreements are made for a limited period, perhaps for two or three years. We are in the happy position that we are most anxious to step up our programme, and to use any surplus materials. We feel we are quite safe in guaranteeing to take the entire output, because we are delighted to step up our programme so that we can be sure of the housing output. In other words, we have an expanding demand, and any temporary surplus of materials, which has almost never occurred and is not likely to occur, would be bought by us and put aside until we could step up the over-all production to a place which would allow us to reabsorb that material.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What are the prospects for securing galvanized iron? In my part of the country I know of a number of buildings now under construction, but the people who are supplying the heating equipment in considerable quantities are short of galvanized iron.

Mr. HOWE: At the present time the prospects are just terrible. Not a pound is being made in Canada.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I was afraid of that.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask another question, to which I would expect the same answer. When I was home over the week-end I discussed the question of glass with a large dispenser of that product. I gathered from him that there will not be a pound of glass anywhere in their organization for some time.

Time is rapidly going on. Here we are almost to the first of August. A month from that, people will be protecting themselves against inclement weather. What can they do? Are any big buildings available to be refitted to accommodate the multitudes of people who are living in tents? It is not the industry's fault. Everything is being held up at the present time and the situation may get worse. It is not the minister's fault or mine. But we must look forward to saving our people from freezing to death, or suffering bad health from exposure to weather. The next month will go by rapidly, and when that time is over we are up against it.

Mr. HOWE: I am happy to say the situation respecting window glass is not as bad as that in connection with steel. It is true that our glass-making industry is gradually closing down, owing to a strike in a plant which manufactures soda ash.

But window glass is not made on a large scale in Canada. I made the mistake of saying in an earlier debate that it was not made here at all. It was called to my attention that we have one plant, Industrial Glass Works Limited, St. Laurent, Quebec, which manufactures glass, and which is back in business.

However, imports of window glass are improving. Belgium, which was one of our great pre-war sources of window glass, is gradually coming back into the market, and in the meantime imports from the United Kingdom and the United States are stepping up slowly, as well. So that I think in the matter of window glass we are fairly well off.

Mr. PROBE: Has the minister taken the precaution of leaving an avenue open for the renegotiation of prices he is currently allowing producers, in case the profit margin gets too high, in the opinion of the government; or has the minister left that to look after itself?

Mr. HOWE: Contracts made to-day are not subject to renegotiation. But the position of the manufacturer is closely examined before increases are granted. I believe that adequate precaution is being taken to make sure that excessive price increases are not granted.

Mr. MacNICOL: I learned only a few days ago from a soldier who had served overseas for five years some facts concerning the purchase of a house. When he came back he had to find a house for his bride and his child, and went to the organization set up for that purpose. Its name escapes my memory at the moment. He bought the house from them at $6,000. Upon going back later to inquire as to when he could get possession, he was told that it would now cost $6,500, and after he waited for some time longer and made a further inquiry, the price of the house had gone up to $7,000. I was just wondering what controls there were in connection with Wartime Housing.

Mr. HOWE: Wartime Housing does not sell houses. I am sure my hon. friend is referring to the Veterans Land Act. I am not familiar with its operations.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does it get its supplies from the government?

Mr. HOWE: That comes under the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. MacNICOL: When I spoke a moment ago I said that I was not familiar with the name and I referred to it as Wartime Housing. However, after hearing what the minister has said I realize that it is the Veterans Land Act. Is there any authority to prevent them from advancing the price of a house after making a contract with a returned soldier? I do not believe any working man or any ordinary chap would be able in his lifetime to pay for a house costing $7,500, unless he had perfect health and had no trouble in his home or was not faced with many of the problems that confront people in his circumstances. God must love these people more than he loves the others because he makes so many of them. Their troubles are legion. I do not believe any ordinary man, even in a reasonable length of time, would be able to pay for a $7,500 house.

Mr. IRVINE: I should like to be assured by the minister that I shall have an opportunity to return to the matter of cooperative housing schemes which, so far, have not been able to use the provisions of the act. I believe this matter would come under section 9 of the old act, and I should like to ask the minister if it will be appropriate for me to discuss this matter under section 5 of the present bill?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend spoke of United States legislation, but I think he has become confused between bills introduced in congress and legislation. Was it the Wagner bill he was discussing?

Mr. IRVINE: It is No. S-1592, sections 404 and 405.

Mr. HOWE: That is the so-called Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill. It has been introduced in the senate, and it is having a rather rough time there if one can believe the press.

Mr. IRVINE: It is still living.

Mr. HOWE: It is like the amendments to the National Housing Act; it is under consideration. That bill refers to a project constructed by a non-profit corporation organized for the purpose of the construction of homes for members of the corporation. That provision is in the proposed amendment, but it is not in the present legislation. The present national housing act of the United States reads as follows:

Loans under section 207 of this title are rental housing loans made to limited-dividend corporations.

[Mr. Howe.]

Those are corporations offering housing for rent but not for ownership.

A loan may not exceed $5,000,000 in amount, nor more than 80 per cent of the administrator's estimated valuation of the completed property, nor more than $1,350 per room attributable to dwelling use. (In no case can loan exceed 100 per cent of administrator's estimate of building cost.) Amortization basis is stipulated in each case by the administrator.

That applies to a limited-dividend corporation erecting housing for rent. There is no provision in the present United States legislation, as I read it, for cooperative building of homes to be owned by the members.

Mr. IRVINE: That is a good reason why we should take the first step. I ask the minister if it will be appropriate for me to bring up the matter under section 5?

Mr. HOWE: Quite.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—"Economic rental of a family housing unit."

Mr. PROBE: This section provides that the economic rental means an annual rental at the rate of twelve per cent of the cost of construction of the family housing unit. That is the basis for the working out of the rent chargeable by a corporation when arriving at its contract with its tenant. Could the minister give us the background for this twelve per cent rate? I have no doubt it is based on good business practice, but I would presume that if we were able to get money at one or two per cent, or something like that, we might be able to reduce that annual rent to considerably less than twelve per cent.

Mr. HOWE: This is on the basis of one per cent per month. That may not be a very good explanation. I am not very familiar with the act since I was not in on the drafting. This amendment makes no change in the original act in that regard. I cannot tell my hon. friend why one per cent per month is considered to be an economic rental, but apparently the present act provides for that.

Mr. PROBE: It must be based on some financial consideration, and no doubt all the factors that entered into the cost of the house are considered, plus the maintenance, interest on the principal, depreciation, taxes and the replenishment of capital after thirty or forty years. The National Housing Act permits that a housing corporation set up by an insurance company may charge an economic rent of twelve per cent of the cost of the housing project and still be eligible for a government guarantee in the event of loss.

Mr. HOWE: One per cent per month is the maximum that can be charged and it is adjusted down if the facts do not justify that economic rental. In other words, if all the items mentioned by my hon. friend add up to less than one per cent per month, the economic rental is limited accordingly.

Mr. PROBE: The National Housing Act of last year and the amendments of this year refer to the twelve per cent. That would make the rental of a $5,000 house total $500 a year, while the rent of a $3,000 house would be $300 a year. If we are interested in low-rental housing it seems to me that we must work out some basis where we do not have an economic rental of around twelve per cent of the cost of the house.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—"Housing project".

Mr. PROBE: This new section will read:

"housing project" means a project consisting of one or more one-family dwellings, or one or more multiple-family dwellings, or a combination of one-family and multiple-family dwellings, together with any public space, recreational facilities and commercial space and buildings appropriate to the project.

Later clauses of the National Housing Act refer to such things as community planning. There have been put up in my city several hundred structures for which we thank Wartime Housing Limited and other agencies, because they keep the weather off the inmates of those houses, but when I think of the beautiful little city we had before these structures were put up and what we have now from the point of view of community or city planning I consider it nothing less than a disgrace. I think the minister should consider adding these words to the end of this section, "consistent with recognized planning principles." Would the minister comment on that?

Mr. HOWE: Section 9 I think covers the point my hon. friend mentions. It protects the standards and provides for suitable community planning. If my hon. friend is talking to me as a former resident of Regina about wartime housing spoiling the character of the city, surely that is a matter for debate.

Mr. PROBE: We had a planning commission in our city for twenty years, and they have been trying to remove some of the scars left by our earlier pioneers.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Be careful.

Mr. PROBE: Including my good friend the hon. member for Calgary West, who was at one time a resident of our city. When we are discussing planning principles I think we should be consistent in our definitions. That is the only reason I bring this matter to the minister's attention. There is nothing here to indicate that we have in mind the planning of our cities.

Mr. HOWE: That comes later.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—"Limited-dividend housing company."

Mr. IRVINE: I want to bring to the attention of the minister once again the plea of cooperative organizations to come under section 9 of the National Housing Act. I have here the prospectus of the York Mills Cooperative Home Builders' Association, which was granted a charter by the province of Ontario on December 3, 1945. The prospectus sets forth the objectives of the association, conditions of membership, methods of financing, building, tenancy and ownership. This newly organized cooperative, having been granted letters patent, made their application to the proper authorities to be granted a loan on a basis similar to that for private corporations for the purpose of building houses to be rented at a low rental to the shareholders of the association until such time as thirty years had elapsed, by which time the house would become the property of those who had lived in it and had paid back the loan. They received a reply from the department stating, in effect, that no provision was made for making loans for the building of homes that would be ultimately owned by those who rented them, and consequently the whole project has been brought to a standstill.

Would the minister give the committee a real reason why a cooperative should be excluded from section 9 of the housing act? It seems to me to be an act which provides for the care particularly of insurance and loan companies. According to the act, on a house costing $7,000 to build, 95 per cent of the first $2,000, or $1,900, may be borrowed; 85 per cent of the second $2,000, or $1,700; 70 per cent of the next $3,000, or $2,100; making a total to be borrowed under the terms of the act of $5,700 out of the $7,000. It appears that under this section of the act private corporations scheme so that, by borrowing the full amount which the act provides for, they can increase the payments of the borrower by a considerable amount, so that instead of an actual loan of $5,700 on a house of $7,000 they manage to get away with lending $4,410. Thus, instead of 81 per cent of the loan, they are granting 47 per cent of the loan. So it would appear that the act as it is working out is one which chiefly benefits the lending institutions.

The point I wish to make is this. In the first place, is not the security of the property in question, supported by a cooperative organization, just as good collateral, if you like, or just as good a guarantee of repayment of the loan as that given by a limited liability company, or whatever name may be given to the corporation which will borrow the money and build these houses? In the last analysis, the only real security you have is the house itself. If a man fails to meet his payments under this cooperative plan the property will, of course, be taken over by those who made the loan, just as it would in the case of a private corporations making the loan.

In the second place, why should the government insist that houses should always be rented? When a man has been in a house for thirty years and has paid the full amount of the money borrowed, why should he continue to rent it? Should it not be his house? That is the proposal which the cooperative makes. I want the minister to give that serious consideration. I should like the minister to satisfy the committee—and I hope I am not the only one who is not satisfied with things as they are now—that it is not right or that it is not practicable or fair or whatever he wants to say about it, to make provision for a cooperative to borrow under this scheme. If he cannot explain that satisfactorily, I trust that he will make a new provision in the bill to permit the cooperative to obtain a loan which is now available only to private corporations which insist that homes in Canada shall always be rented and never be owned by the people themselves.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I should like to read a letter that I have received from a group organized in British Columbia along the lines my hon. friend has just mentioned, together with a short brief which they have presented, and this is only one group which is considering making similar proposals. This letter is from a group of veterans in the university of British Columbia who have organized to form a Veterans' Cooperative Building Association. It reads:

Dear sir:

I enclose for your consideration a copy of a brief prepared by the Veterans' Cooperative Building Association, of which I have the honour to be president.

Our association was originally legion sponsored, but is now quite independent, although all members are veterans.

We have had every encouragement in our plans from all sources, including the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and now have our building plans complete for an initial project of 52 units.

I feel sure you appreciate the housing emergency in Vancouver, and will give the enclosed material your earnest consideration and support.

Yours truly,

D. Brousson,
President.

They deal with the subject in this short brief:

This brief is prepared and presented by the Veterans' Cooperative Building Association, 553 Granville St., Vancouver, B.C.

This association was formed last fall under the sponsorship of branch 168 of the Canadian Legion in Vancouver, in an attempt to help veterans solve their own housing problems, by providing moderate rental accommodation on a mutual ownership basis.

With this in view, the association has applied for a loan from the Central Mortgage and Housing Act, 1944, to finance an initial project. Loans under this section bear interest at 3 per cent, repayable within fifty years.

In doing so, the association has agreed to submit to all the requirements of the section as regards limitation of dividends, rents and incomes in order to insure the low-rental character of the project.

The central mortgage and housing committee, while approving the technical details of the project, has refused the loan on the ground that because we are a cooperative association this would not be a rental housing project, but in essence a form of home ownership, and therefore disqualified under the term of section 9.

This association does not consider this decision to be soundly based from a legal point of view since the identity of a body corporate and of its membership are separate and distinct things and while it is true the tenants would hold shares in the association, tenants might also hold shares in a joint stock company and at the same time rent houses from it, but this would not presumably disqualify such a corporation from operating under this section of the act. In other words, the decision appears to discriminate directly against the cooperative type of organization.

I am not going to read the rest of the brief, and take the time of the committee in so doing. However, in addition to the questions placed before the minister by the hon. member for Cariboo, I should like the minister to explain why he considers that this is not a practical scheme, a scheme such as has been in successful operation in Great Britain, I believe, for at least fifty years, where the money had to be raised from outside capital. The loans were subscribed in the form of bonds or debentures to form a building association. These associations in Great Britain have had a successful history; you rarely hear of a failure; they have been successful in every way, and I should like the minister to explain why he does not consider, under our present conditions, the necessities of the times and the urge of these men to cooperate in doing something for themselves, that something of that type would not be practicable and satisfactory in this country.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend suggests as a parallel an organization which has been successful in England. I suggest that that is not the case. The cooperative building societies in England are corporations of substance; they build houses for rent and they also build houses for sale. I gave the parallel before dinner; I do not know that I need repeat it. We will say the number will be ten—ten men banding together to form a cooperative. For what purpose? To build houses for themselves to own. That is the real purpose of the thing. The trouble is that the cooperative has no substance. Each man puts in what he expects his own house to cost, no more. If one of the tenants gets into difficulty a flaw is thrown on the title of the entire project, or might be. There is no substance to fall back on if one of the tenants gets into any of the ordinary business difficulties which might be experienced by any one of the cooperators. Therefore it is not a corporation that is desirable from the point of view of the cooperators, and it is not a type of business which is desirable for a government lending institution or any other lending institution. There is no reason why ten people should gather together for this purpose. Under part I of the Housing Act each can build his own house and be better off, because he has title to the property at all stages and has everything under his own control. We believe that it is not good business for the government to support a type of organization that is not businesslike as far as its own internal arrangements are concerned and offers to the government no protection which it would not have in dealing with the members individually.

Mr. IRVINE: I still have to press the point that the minister has not shown that there is not quite as good security under the cooperative arrangement as under any other, for the only guarantee that the government will have from any of these private corporations will be the building itself, and that will still be there. If it burns down it will have been insured. The minister says that there will be the same advantage for a private individual to do it himself. Let me show the minister that he is quite wrong in that. This is from the estimate of a company newly formed, of which I spoke, the Cooperative Association of Home Builders, in Toronto. Here is what they propose. On a house costing $6,000 the rental charge at prevailing rates would be $40 a month. Principal and interest charges on $5,400 amortized over thirty years at three per cent would be $22.84; interest on membership equity, one per cent on $590 corporate equity, would be fifty cents; municipal taxes, approximately $6; vacancy allowance, $1; insurance, sixty cents; special sinking fund for retiring thirty year loan made by each of the applicants, $1.23; making a total carrying charge per month of $32.17. So that there would be paid back each month to the cooperators $7.83, which would go to private corporations under the scheme which is provided for in the act, and would be $7.83 a month more for the wage-earners to pay in order to get their homes. So that it does make a difference whether it is done cooperatively or done under a private corporation.

Mr. FULTON: There is a further point, arising from the brief submitted by the organization referred to by the hon. member for Kootenay West, this veterans' organization in Vancouver. As they point out, if they are ruled out from the operation of section 9 of the act, then as a cooperative they would have to operate under section 4, where the rate of interest on loans is 4½ per cent per annum, instead of three per cent, which it is under section 9. The point the organization makes seems to me to be a good one and not to have been answered by the minister; that is to say, that just because they are a cooperative organization instead of a limited company does not mean that they cannot as a cooperative enter into a project for the construction of homes which they will rent to their members.

Mr. HOWE: Quite so. Will they keep to that business, though? If they do that they can qualify under this part.

Mr. FULTON: I do not know whether they will or not.

Mr. HOWE: If they stop right there they qualify.

Mr. FULTON: They have been ruled out apparently on the ground—

Mr. HOWE: They won't keep to that.

Mr. FULTON: It seems to be a fine distinction which the minister is drawing. If they will form a cooperative for the purpose of entering this arrangement with the institution and renting to members it would be all right, but what is the objection when they start to allow members to buy from a cooperative? Where does the risk become a bad one?

Mr. HOWE: They are getting into a different class of business.

Mr. FULTON: They may be getting into a different class of business, but what is the change in the risk? Why is it less desirable from the government's point of view?

Mr. HOWE: Well, I put the thing on Hansard yesterday. I would be glad to put it on to-day:

Under part I of the act joint loans are available to cooperative housing groups formed for the purpose of building houses or apartments for occupancy by members of the group. Under certain circumstances loans for rental housing projects may also be made under part II . . .

Mr. FULTON: At 4½ per cent.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, that is right, provided that the corporation is already formed and has interests other than housing.

Applications are being received from cooperative groups for loans at three per cent for periods up to fifty years under section 9 of the act. This section provides for loans to limited-dividend companies for low rental housing projects.

Mark the distinction—low rental housing projects.

Generally these applications are from groups of individuals being formed into a cooperative to build houses for their own occupancy with the equity being supplied by themselves. The form of arrangement involves a lease to the member of the cooperative, but in most respects the position of the member is that of a home owner. These applications have been declined because section 9 was not designed for this purpose, its conditions cannot be fulfilled under such circumstances, it was never intended that the tenants of a low-rental limited dividend project should be its owners and the position of the tenant with respect to both his equity and continued occupancy is unsatisfactory.

An individual going into such an arrangement has no security of tenure because under the terms of section 9 he cannot continue to lease a unit in the low-rental project if his income exceeds five times his rental. This condition exists to assure the low-rental character of the project. Even if the tenant's rental—being paid in lieu of principal, interest and taxes—is current, he has no protection against foreclosure with loss of equity and tenancy if the project as a whole goes into default which might be occasioned by default of 5 per cent or 10 per cent of the tenants. In most of the applications we have received there is no indication of any reasonable measure of protection on this score. Nor are there funds, other than the tenants' equity, to assure completion of the project in a period of rising costs.

The position of the tenant when the loan on the project is repaid is not happy. Under the section he, as part owner of a limited-dividend company, or having an interest in it through a cooperatitve, may not receive more than his equity with 5 per cent interest. If the residual value of his house was greater than this amount he would have to make a corresponding payment to retain possession. If it was decided to sell the property as a whole the position would be even more difficult. To avoid this trouble it has been suggested that at this time we should provide that the units revert to the tenants at the end of the amortization period. This is not possible in the light of the intent of the act.

There are other reasons why we should not approve such applications. They, like the ones I have outlined, all add up to one conclusion. Section 9 was not designed for home owners. Nor was section 9, with long-term money at three per cent, designed as a substitute for part I of the act, which provides loans to home owners at 4½ per cent for a term generally twenty years but under some circumstances up to thirty years. If we provide cooperative home-owners with three per cent money, our position becomes difficult with other home-owners.

[Mr. Howe.]

Our position is very clear. We will not approve applications for loans under section 9 of limited-dividend companies where the prospective tenants directly or indirectly are financing the equity of the project nor where factors exist which are not compatible to a limited-dividend rental project as defined by the act. On the other hand, we are ready to approve such applications under appropriate sections of the act, such as section 4 (3), which makes provision for loans to persons incorporated for the purpose of constructing and managing a cooperative housing project.

Mr. FULTON: A good deal of what the minister has read, it is difficult to digest at once; but listening to it, it struck me that the objections made were equally applicable against a low-dividend corporation, particularly the difficulty which might be encountered should it be desired to buy a whole project—the same difficulty would be encountered with a limited-dividend corporation. That was the main impression I got, that all the difficulties which the minister detailed in that statement were equally applicable to the other form of corporation. I do not see why the risk should be affected merely because the members of the cooperative are given the opportunity, by paying a sum in addition to their rent, to buy the homes so that at the end of the fifty-year period they might own their own homes. It works in this way, surely. If the cooperative puts up the necessary money and can enter into this project with the government and the lending institution, then the cooperative as a body would be bound to pay a certain sum a year to the lending institution. That amount would have to be paid monthly by the members of the cooperative as rent. Provided that they complied with these terms and, in addition, were willing and able to pay the sum, whatever it might be, say ten dollars a month extra, so that at the same time they might be buying their equity in their homes, in what way would the risk to the government be increased? Finally, although the experts in the minister's department may have advised him before this ruling was made, there is nothing in paragraph 24 of section 2 of the act, in the definition of limited-dividend corporation, which in itself excludes a cooperative from the provisions of this section.

Mr. HOWE: It is not the intention to exclude cooperatives. We welcome cooperatives in that field, provided that they carry out the purpose of the section, which is to build low-rental housing.

Mr. FULTON: I know that.

Mr. HOWE: I know you do not understand it, but I am telling you what the purpose of the section is.

Mr. FULTON: And I am asking the minister whether he can justify such a ridiculous purpose, because if you can build low-rental houses and there is no greater risk in enabling people to buy the houses back, all houses should be put under that section. However, if the minister has made up his mind I will not argue further about the matter, though I do not see the basis of the decision.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does it not boil down to this, that the minister and the government do not wish to make it possible for home owners to get money at three per cent?

Mr. HOWE: Not at all.

Mr. FULTON: That is the effect of it.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is precisely the effect of the ruling that home owners must come under the section that requires payment of four and one-half per cent. This special provision of three per cent is made available only to these other limited-dividend companies or cooperatives who are building homes for rent. The point which we are trying to get across to the minister, and which we tried to get across to the Minister of Finance in the budget debate, is that this is what cooperatives are for, not to make a profit but to save money to the members of the organization. The hon. member for Cariboo has given figures to indicate the type of saving that could be effected. The minister has already admitted that ten individuals in a cooperative in the case he cited could each come under part I of the housing act, and there is certainly no greater risk if the ten of them come together under this proposal. As a matter of fact, there would be less risk because of the nature of cooperatives. It seems to me that what we have here as in the other debate is a failure on the part of the government to recognize the true purpose of cooperatives and their valuable place in our economy.

Mr. IRVINE: The minister said a few moments ago that one of the reasons why cooperatives could not be considered as eligible under section 9 of the National Housing Act was that they were cooperatives only with respect to building houses. If they were cooperating on something else; if they were a cooperative that entered into some other kind of business, they would be eligible. I just want to point out that the cooperative organization of which I spoke a few moments ago, the York Mills Cooperative Home Builders, give the following as their objects and general programme;

The objects of the York Mills Cooperative Home Builders shall be as stated in the letter patent, viz.: cooperatively for the members,—

(a) To promote home ownership, and to buy, lease, sell, mortgage, exchange, administer, and otherwise deal in real and personal property, to deal in building of homes or other buildings required in connection with homes, and in the creation of parks, playgrounds, swimming pools and the like, with all equipment and accessories in connection therewith; and,

(b) to carry on in all its branches the business of landscape architects and landscape artists and in connection with such business to deal in, buy and sell flowers, shrubs, and every kind of plant and tree;

(c) to do all such other things as are incidental or conducive to the attainment of the above objects;

(d) to draw, make, exchange, endorse, discount, execute and issue promissory notes, bills of exchange, bills of lading, warrants, and other negotiable or transferable instruments.

That is only part of their programme; it is more than merely building houses, and it seems to me that should bring this organization right within the minister's own definition, as one that should receive the benefits of such an act.

Mr. HOWE: We shall see how profitable the other branches of the business are.

Mr. PROBE: The minister referred to the fact that the limited-dividend housing companies were intended merely to manage low-rental housing projects. In his definition of a low-rental housing project in section 25 he states an anomalous position, because he refers to a housing project undertaken to provide decent, safe and sanitary housing accommodation to be leased to families of low income, or to such other persons as the corporation, under agreement with the owner, may designate. In other words, I believe it is recognized, and was stated here in the house by one responsible minister of the crown, that these limited-dividend housing corporations were not necessarily entering the low-rental housing field. I hope the minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I do not think he can under the circumstances, because it is not intended that the low-rental housing project will be held exclusively for the marginal income group of individuals.

While I am on my feet, I should like to draw attention to the wording of paragraph 25, which is contained in section 5 of this bill. It seems to me, with my limited ability to phrase readable English, that the minister has left a loophole for limited-dividend housing corporations or companies to build slum-type dwellings, if I correctly read the word "exceeding" in line 40. It provides:

"low-rental housing project" means a housing project undertaken to provide decent, safe and sanitary housing accommodation complying with standards not exceeding those approved by the corporation . . .

Apparently the corporation has certain other housing projects, but a low-rental housing project must not exceed that standard. In other words, it may fall below the standard. I should like the minister to consider rewording this section. My mind is not that of an attorney, as I have said, but to me this is an invitation to a limited-dividend housing company to get into submarginal construction. Perhaps we might have an explanation on that, and at the same time the minister might tell us the reason for the statement that as other, alternative tenants you may have such other persons as the corporation, under agreement with the owner, may designate.

Mr. HOWE: The purpose of the "not exceeding" is, "not exceeding a certain rental." In other words, the government is not prepared to lend three per cent money to build rich men's houses. The purpose is to keep housing financed by the three per cent loans down to reasonable rental. I may say that Housing Enterprises Limited is very much a borderline case. It is not the type of rental we hope to get with those loans. The standards of construction are, of course, approved by the corporation. The plans and specifications are submitted to the corporation and approved by it as well as by the local building authorities before any agreement is entered into. The "not exceeding" applies wholly to the economic rental.

Mr. PROBE: I applaud that meaning and intent on the part of the minister; but just listen to this again:

. . . a housing project undertaken to provide decent, safe and sanitary housing accommodation complying with standards—

Not rentals, but standards.

—not exceeding those approved by the corporation . . .

I defy any person who understands the king's English, or for that matter any lawyer, to tie that up with rentals. I think the minister must re-word this section.

Section agreed to:

On section 6—Powers of approved lending institution to loan on first mortgage.

Mr. HOWE: I have an amendment to this section which I would ask my colleague the Minister of Justice to move.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I move:

That section 3 of the act as reenacted by section 6 of the bill be amended by adding immediately after the last word thereof the following:

[Mr. Probe.]

"and to protect the mortgage security, the said lending institution and the corporation may join in making supplementary joint loans to the borrower and in the taking of such other measures and steps as may be required in accordance with normal mortgage practice, to safeguard the interests of His Majesty and the said lending institution."

Mr. PROBE: Might we have an explanation of that?

Mr. HOWE: The purpose of the amendment is to assure that the lending institution and the corporation have power to perform the normal functions of a mortgagee in the handling of a joint mortgage account. It is occasionally necessary in the handling of a mortgage account to advance money for taxes, insurance premiums and other matters affecting the security, and in some cases to advance money to take foreclosure action. These are specific examples of what might be done under this clause. I may say the auditor general has expressed doubt as to whether the act permits the mortgage company to make expenditures of the type I have mentioned, to protect the property. In the case of a farm, it might be necessary to advance money as a loan for seed grain; and in a city it is frequently necessary to advance money to pay taxes to prevent loss of the property to the city. This is simply to make it abundantly clear that the corporation has the right to advance money for those purposes.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 7—Contract with approved lending institution in respect to loans and resulting losses for rural housing.

Mr. PROBE: This section deals with the approval or at least with the inspection of farm homes for the purpose of lending money to be used in erecting houses on such farms. As was mentioned by several speakers this afternoon, to date the farm loan clause has been a failure. According to a recent report to the house, there was supposed to be one loan for farm housing alive somewhere in Canada. I paid a visit to the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation a short time ago, in part to find out where this house was, but apparently he was in some doubt as to whether there was even that one loan in existence. There must be some reason why farmers have not been able to avail themselves of the terms of the National Housing Act. Would the minister indicate how extensively farmers have applied for assistance under this act, and what their reception has been. The absence of any loans in Canada in ten or eleven years suggests to me that the act is not meeting with very favourable response, and that there must be a reason for it.

Mr. HOWE: There have been no applications for loans under the farm section. The one loan referred to was in Davidson, Saskatchewan, which I would describe as an urban rather than a farm loan. That application was made under this section. The reason is that, administratively, the section has proved to be impossible.

Mr. PROBE: Are you now amending it?

Mr. HOWE: We are amending it to make it workable, we think; and we hope to have it widely used as amended. The terms are being liberalized, and provision is being made for handling costs in connection with the making of loans, which are very much higher than costs in urban centres.

Mr. REID: In view of the fact that the minister's officials are now sitting in front of him, may I point out that under the old National Housing Act there were certain districts where applications for loans were made to lending institutions. Sometimes those lending institutions took the position that, owing to the fact that a city or municipality from which an application came was under heavy bonded indebtedness, objection should be raised to making such loans. I hope that under the new act this will not take place. I call the minister's attention to this point because it acted to the detriment of a person with whom I am acquainted.

Mr. PROBE: Would the minister indicate if the changes he is proposing with respect to farm lending are such that farmers of all provinces, without discrimination, will be able to avail themselves of the terms of the National Housing Act? I am chiefly interested in Saskatchewan, naturally, where the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has done very little business. I believe that only 199 houses have been built in the last year and a half with money lent by that corporation. Is there to be any discrimination in the matter of lending money for rural homes in Saskatchewan?

Mr. HOWE: The difficulty in making loans in Saskatchewan arises from provincial legislation. I believe that legislation is being tested before the supreme court, and about the end of October we should know what the position is. Obviously the provincial legislation is in conflict with the requirements of the housing act as it stands on the statute books.

Mr. PROBE: Have there been any negotiations between Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Saskatchewan government dealing with those specific points of legislation, in so far as the National Housing Act is concerned?

Mr. HOWE: No, there have been no discussions. I happen to know that the point has been raised by the dominion, on account of the farm loan boards. I understand that a decision will be brought down in two or three months.

Mr. PROBE: There is no question as to the personal responsibility of individuals in that province.

Mr. HOWE: Not at all.

Mr. PROBE: It is just on account of the legislation?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. PROBE: Because, after all, some question was raised as to the value of our government bonds. No doubt the minister is well aware that our bonds are travelling well above par at the present time, and it seems to me that financial institutions generally recognize that we are solvent. I think we are just as honourable as any other part of Canada, and I should like to impress that fact upon the minister. It seems to me that, without going into all this litigation the minister is talking about, we could still ask for the benefit of the act.

Mr. HOWE: The difficulty is that we cannot operate the act differently in one province from what we do in the other eight provinces. I know a great deal about the integrity of the citizens of Saskatchewan, because I dealt with them privately for many years. But it simply is the difficulty of administration, where one finds a law in direct conflict with the provisions of the measure we are now discussing.

Section agreed to.

Section 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Terms of contract.

Mr. KNOWLES: This afternoon, when the minister was speaking on second reading, he made some enlargement of his statement the other day respecting this section. I am sorry I did not get it down in black and white. Would he mind telling us again the addition he made with respect to the national parks.

Mr. HOWE: I thought I was correct when I spoke the last time, but since then I have found that in northern Quebec there is land owned in fee by mining companies which operate company towns and which do not make the practice of selling land, although under the Quebec law they can grant a 99-year lease for the land. Such 99-year lease is quite satisfactory for security of the equity of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and that might be accepted in lieu of ownership. This measure gives that power. The corporation must, however, be certain that the leasehold equity is practically the equivalent of ownership, so far as the purposes of the corporation are concerned.

Mr. KNOWLES: A week ago, when the resolution was under discussion, I asked the minister, as reported at page 3710 of Hansard, whether this section could be expanded to provide for limited-dividend corporations building homes on property they merely lease rather than own outright. The minister replied:

> I can hardly imagine a government agency lending money on houses where the control of the land is not permanently in the government.

The statement the minister has just made is generous on his part; but the thing that bothers me is that, a further extension of what this may mean now having come to light, still more may be involved in the wording of the section. It seems to me that the minister should word it a little more closely than it is now worded, to make sure that it will not be used to cover more than he has already indicated.

Mr. HOWE: I am prepared to admit that the section is wide open. It permits the corporation to lend on housing on leasehold land.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is, it permits what a week ago the minister could not imagine the government doing.

Mr. HOWE: I could not imagine it then, but I find now there is a reason for it. In grants to mining companies or paper mills it is quite often the policy not to sell but to give long-term leases. If a lease is for ninty-nine years, that is regarded as suitable security. May I say that when I spoke a week ago I spoke in good faith, because I understood that the sole purpose of the amendment was to take care of the situation at Banff and Jasper.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not doubt the minister's good faith of a week ago, but I doubt his judgment now.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps so.

Mr. PROBE: I feel the minister would have every justification to make it possible for residents to build on crown lands in national parks which they intend to hold in perpetuity. After the word "lessee", he can add two or three words such as "of crown lands", or their legal equivalent, which would make it possible to provide housing on crown lands that are national playgrounds or resorts. I take strong objection to money being lent by the Canadian people to individuals who are simply tenants of large corporations which are exerting a permanent hold on any given property. It seems to me that this provision would not be dangerous if it referred to land in the hands of either the dominion or a provincial government, but beyond that I feel the the minister should not go.

We do not want to perpetuate the land holding system of England which, as the minister knows, is now causing considerable difficulty in connection with the housing programme. Even before the present Labour government came into power, there was trouble because of the manner in which land was held by family corporations. It seems to me that we are moving backward rather than forward if we leave this section unchanged. The minister has said that the purpose of this was simply to make it possible to build in national playgrounds. Why not state it in that way and let the other people sell their land rather than just lease the right to build houses?

Mr. MERRITT: I want to refer again to the lending value. If the minister cannot give us the cost per square foot I wonder if he can give us some idea of what percentage of the total cost of a small house, say one costing up to $7,000, the prospective home owner has to put up? In the example I cited to-day, it appears he would have to put up 32 per cent. If the corporation and the lending institution put up only 68 per cent we are not very much better off than we were before we had the act. It is my understanding that private lending institutions will lend 60 per cent as a normal practice.

Mr. HOWE: A four-roomed house built in Vancouver under integrated housing, in which case there is a cost limitation, costing about $5,500 would require an equity of about $600. In the case of a house costing in the neighbourhood of $6,500, the equity would run as high as $1,000. That is under integrated housing where profit limitation applies to the contractor.

Mr. MERRITT: I understand that, but am I to assume that it is the policy of the government to presume that, in the cases of houses built by ordinary contractors for veterans and others under part I of the act, exorbitant amounts are allowed for profit? Is that the basis of distinction between an integrated housing scheme and one carried on under part I?

Mr. HOWE: We have no way of checking the profit made on a house not built under a government plan. If a contractor cares to limit his profits and operate under integrated housing he would have the benefits of priority for materials and so on. We assume that the only reason a contractor would not want to qualify under that scheme is that he wanted more profit than was allowed.

Mr. MERRITT: I do not want to get into a theoretical argument and I know the minister does not, but surely some practical figures must be available with relation to loans to home owners under part I of the act within the last six months or so which would give us some idea.

Mr. HOWE: I would say it varies a great deal. Certainly he could get no more favourable terms than those I have quoted if they operated under integrated housing, but they may be much higher if the builder is taking a larger profit.

Mr. MERRITT: According to the minister's statement the other day, the present cost of houses is estimated at 150 per cent of the 1939 cost. Why not find out what the cost of a house is to-day and work out your lending value in relation to that rather than use a base line which, so far as I can find out, is not used by any other agency?

Mr. HOWE: I do not know anyone who is building more houses than the Department of Reconstruction and Supply. We know to a gnat's eyebrow how much it costs to-day as compared with the cost in 1939.

Mr. PROBE: I am still not satisfied with paragraph (a). Will the minister explain just why that clause is left wide open for the building of houses on leased property? Is the minister quite happy over the fact that by the terms of this bill any landlord may ultimately acquire a house which a tenant has put on his property and paid for? That will be the ultimate goal of various individuals who will use this legislation. Why could this paragraph not be reworded?

Mr. HOWE: I am not very keen anyway about the section and I would be quite willing to limit it to parks. However, I am told that that would prevent the building of certain projects in northern Quebec where the transfer of property is not possible, but where it is possible to obtain a ninety-nine year lease. I believe this has something to do with the mining laws of the province.

Mr. PROBE: I would suggest adding the phrase "of crown land" after the word "lessee", or some equivalent wording. Then this concession could be made where the land is perpetually owned by the people of Canada in the right either of the dominion or of a province. If it is held by some corporation which is simply subleasing the mineral rights, then I think we are starting up a dangerous business. I should like the minister to give some assurance on that point.

Mr. MICHAUD: I do not know about the other provinces, but in my province we have continued the old English practice whereby land is leased for building purposes on long-term leases, 99 years or 999 years. I have drawn up hundreds of such leases. In many cases, the owners of the land do not wish to dispose of the fee simple and they divide up their land into building lots which they refuse to sell. The land upon which my home is built is under such lease. I have not approached the lady who owns the land, but I know others in the vicinity have and she definitely refuses to dispose of the fee simple. These particular leases are for 999 years. There are quite a few in northern New Brunswick and some in the city of Saint John. Whether the practice should be encouraged or not, I am not prepared to say. The fact remains that the practice has become established, some people happen to be in possession of a lot of land under leases of that kind, and unless the act is amended as suggested they would not be eligible to operate under it. Insurance companies, for instance, when they hear of these leases inquire about them and, when they find what the situation is, they withdraw any objection which they otherwise would have to shorter leases. If the leases are confined to long-term leases I do not see anything objectionable about it.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think the minister has clearly revealed that he does not think this practice should be encouraged. I will quote again his words of a week ago, and I want to make clear that I am not doing so to suggest any bad faith on his part but rather to suggest that the snap judgment he made when I put the question to him a week ago expresses what he really thinks about this matter. He said at page 3710 of Hansard:

> I can hardly imagine a government agency lending money on houses where the control of the land is not permanently in the government. It could do it in the parks, because the control of park lands is in the hands of the government, but I cannot imagine a corporation lending money to build houses on land merely leased from a private citizen.

I went on to reply that I could not imagine it either, but that I wanted to be sure on the point. If the minister has a special case in mind, such as he has referred to in a mining area, I would suggest that some special provision be made for that in the section that relates to mining and lumbering operations. But let us not, in taking care of one special case, leave the door open to something which the minister himself says he is not very keen about.

Mr. HOWE: This is a big country and the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska has pointed out that it is the practice in New Brunswick to have long-term leases running up to 999 years. In the United States, of course, a large part of New York city is built on land under 999-year lease. The same is true of Great Britain. I see no reason why a limitation should be put in the act which would prevent a corporation from lending on what is practically a perpetual lease equivalent to ownership.

Mr. KNOWLES: Then we have got what I was suspicious of a week ago.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Terms of Contract.

Mr. PROBE: Paragraph (f) says:

> The interest payable to His Majesty on the portion of the joint loan advanced by His Majesty shall be at such rate as is agreed upon between the corporation and the lending institution and set out in the contract.

What is that rate, and why is that rate not included in paragraph (f), or does the rate vary?

Mr. HOWE: It is simply to permit the rate to be varied with changing money conditions. The maximum is 4½ per cent. The interest rate on money may warrant a lower rate, but it cannot go higher than 4½ per cent.

Mr. PROBE: This is purely affecting the contract between His Majesty, represented by the corporation, and the lending institution. Am I correct in that?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. PROBE: What rate of interest does the lending institution which borrows this 25 per cent, or whatever it might be, from the Central Mortgage and Housing corporation pay to the corporation for the money which it borrows and lends to the ultimate home owner? He pays 4½ per cent, regardless of how money fluctuates. What rate does the lending institution pay to the corporation? Is that a flexible and fluctuating rate? If so, why is the benefit of lower rates not also available to the ultimate purchaser, the man who borrows in the first place under the National Housing Act?

Mr. HOWE: The lending company pays the government three per cent for the money. It is the joint rate which provides the maximum for the borrower. The maximum is fixed at 4½ per cent. By agreement it can be lowered if money rates justify a lower rate. We hope that if present-day trends continue it will be possible to lower the rate to the private borrower.

Mr. PROBE: If money rates continue to decline, the private borrower under the housing act may expect to receive the benefit of that? That is why this is left in?

Mr. HOWE: That will certainly be the effort of those who are responsible for the administration of the act.

Mr. PROBE: Paragraph (k) on page 5 of the bill deals with a loan made to a builder. This is a new principle which is being introduced by the minister. Is there in the contract between the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the builder who has built a house for sale a limitation of any sort on the profits allowed to the builder on resale to the ultimate purchaser, and, if so, what is it?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is referring to the statutory provision for the integrated housing plan. There the profit margin to the borrower is limited by agreement.

Section agreed to.

Sections 11 and 12 agreed to.

On section 13—Corporation to safeguard interests of His Majesty.

Mr. KNOWLES: Subsection 4B(1) deals with the matter which has just been under discussion. The minister, when speaking on integrated housing, gave a short outline of the plan and statistics as to the number of projects that have been launched and the number of units included. Can he give the committee a little more information about this plan with particular reference to costs, selling prices of homes under it and what has been the experience thus far? What have been the selling prices provided for in these contracts, and how much profit do these selling prices involve? May I also ask him whether there is any difference in the amount of profit per unit between a project of twenty units and a project of 117 units? I use those figures because they are taken from his table.

Mr. HOWE: Under the agreement the builder agrees: (a) to provide land in any urban area; (b) to erect a specified number of houses thereon; (c) to apply for a loan under the National Housing Act in respect of each house; (d) to offer each house for sale for the approved lending value and certain carrying charges, plus the sum of $350 in the case of a two-room house, $425 in the case of a three-room house, and $500 in the case of a four-room house; and (e) to give preference to veterans in the sale of such houses.

Mr. FULTON: Under section 4B, subsection 3 (b) it is provided:

that such other things shall be done as the corporation deems necessary in order to carry out the intent of this section and to safeguard the interests of His Majesty.

There is, on the face of it, no great objection to that provision, except that it does seem to be very wide, and as such, I think, might be open to objections in the future, when possibly the corporation will say that it will require a prospective owner to carry out this or that undertaking, and the owner may say, "Well, that is not in the act." I think it might be desirable to have defined more specifically what is the intent, and within what range the corporation may make regulations under this subsection. Would the minister take that under consideration?

Mr. HOWE: I shall be very glad to. I think this is a special arrangement to meet a special condition. In other words, at the present time the demand is for houses for veterans, and low-cost housing is required; profit margins must be rigidly controlled. It may be that in later years the demand will be for another type of house, perhaps for others than that for veterans. It may fill up the demand for low-cost housing for veterans and require a different type of house. I think it is simply a flexible provision which will allow the regulations to be amended accordingly.

Mr. FULTON: The only thing I am trying to get at is this: in what sorts of categories may the corporation make these regulations? Will it be for planning, standards of construction, standards of maintenance, times and methods of repayment; or what categories of expression are intended to be given to the corporation under this subsection?

Mr. HOWE: This is an integrated housing plan; it simply provides for financing a contractor to build houses of a certain class with a profit limitation. As I say, present regulations require conditions which apply to the present day; in other words, it covers only low-cost housing for sale to veterans. I am simply pointing out that under this clause it may be desirable at a later date to encourage contractors to build another type of house, and this is a clause which provides that the regulations may be geared as the times may indicate.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does it work out that the profits in these cases are the amounts indicated by the minister, $350, $425, and $500?

Mr. HOWE: That is right, yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: Do I understand, then, that the profit bears no relation to the cost but is rather in relation to the number of bedrooms in the house?

Mr. HOWE: Well, we put on the lending value of the property; that is, the corporation sets the lending value, and these are the additions to the lending value which make up the maximum sales price. It is the lending value, plus the additions which we have shown here, that is the over-all price.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am still not satisfied as to the basis for the limited profit which is supposed to accrue to the builder per unit.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the supposed average price of a low-cost house?

Mr. HOWE: It depends a great deal on who builds it. If Wartime Housing build it it is very reasonable, but if it is built by private capital it is about $6,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: That, in my judgment, is a very high price to ask any returned man to pay. I do not see how these men can pay for a house costing more than $3,500 or $4,000 and have anything left for themselves.

Mr. PROBE: With respect to subsection 6, I notice that in two cases it suggests that purchases made by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act are listed as losses. Would the minister please explain this section? To me it reads that if the housing corporation buys a house from a contractor following a contract entered into between a corporation and a builder; if within a year he fails to sell that house, the corporation buys it back from him or guarantees to take it back, and that the amount it pays is written into the books of the corporation as a loss. I may be quite wrong. I can see in connection with subsection 5, referring to taxes, that you could write those down as a loss, but certainly not the price that the builder of the property is going to be reimbursed in a bookkeeping transaction; that certainly should not be written down as a loss.

Mr. HOWE: The reason the contractor cannot sell a house is, we will assume, that it is priced above the market price. Under the guarantee we are obliged to take it off his hands at the price under the agreement. We assume that if the contractor cannot sell it at that price neither can we. Therefore the cost of the house to us is recorded as a loss until we sell it, and then the recovery is registered as a gain.

Mr. PROBE: You are holding an asset against a loss for the time being?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Section 14 agreed to.

On section 15—Loans for low-rental housing projects.

Mr. PEARKES: Referring to the amending section 9A of section 15, dealing with the scheme for providing houses in what are called the lumbering and mining areas, as I indicated in the resolution stage. I believe that that scheme will have a stabilized effect upon the industry. But there are a couple of questions which I should like to ask.

First, does the term "the lumbering industry" refer specifically to lumbering, because in British Columbia a lot of the forest industries are divided up into logging industry or logging operations and lumbering operations, pulp and paper operations. Will this include all these operations? In other words, are logging operations included under the general term of "lumber operations"?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. PEARKES: Because some are quite distinct; they are merely dealing with the export of logs. I think it might help things if the words "logging and lumbering" were put in that paragraph, because we regard those as two distinct operations.

Mr. HOWE: We regard anything having to do with the cutting down of a tree as "lumbering" under the act.

Mr. PEARKES: It is not so regarded in British Columbia. We have operations which are solely concerned with the cutting down of a tree and the exporting of logs to mills either, shall we say, on the mainland of British Columbia or, sometimes, to the United States.

Mr. HOWE: I am proposing an amendment to this clause, and I shall be very glad to add the word "logging" to the definition.

Mr. PEARKES: Thank you.

There is only one other point I should like to make, on the same subject. I am not at all sure that the eighty per cent of the loan is adequate. I have had it represented to me that some of these logging and lumber companies have already invested practically all their fluid capital in the construction of mills. I can quote one instance where a new mill has been constructed, where new bunkhouses have been put up, and where thirty-five houses have been constructed by that company. The management of that company have written in to me that they are at the end of their available capital and that the eighty per cent is not adequate to enable them to finance another building project. They suggest that another 200 houses in that particular area are needed immediately. Is there any chance of the minister reconsidering that and allowing it to go up to ninety or ninety-five per cent, instead of keeping it at eighty per cent?

Mr. HOWE: I am satisfied that with the type of loan we are discussing eighty per cent is stretching it to the limit of what is prudent.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): With reference to this section, I wish to thank the minister very much for having introduced this legislation at the present session. During my travels through the constituency last winter, I found that one of the greatest causes of dissatisfaction among the workers in basic industries was the fact that the National Housing Act was not applicable to them in unorganized communities. I brought back a suggestion to the minister that something might be worked out along the present lines, and I wish to thank the president of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, Mr. Mansur, for the excellent work he did in preparing the legislation.

It is about time we realized the great debt we owe the workers in our basic industries who have left their homes and gone to isolated places where they have contributed so much to the economic welfare of the country. During the war period, we lost some of our best loggers. Jobs were available in the cities and in the shipyards where they needed the type of workers we have; loggers are men capable of handling large and heavy loads and heavy equipment, and the men have now found that they do not wish to return to the woods if they cannot take their families with them. I do not blame them. The logger has become tired of endorsing his cheque every month and sending it a distance of two or three hundred miles to his family, simply having enough money once a year to get home for the Christmas holidays.

There has been some criticism of the minister as evidenced by the question that some people ask as to where the jobs are coming from to employ the owners or the tenants of these homes in the urban areas. It is said that you are building homes in the cities, and it is suggested that the greatest feature about it is that these people will be close to the unemployment insurance office. In my opinion it is important to provide homes for men where there are jobs to be had, and in this legislation provision is being made to that end. As the hon. member for Nanaimo has said, it is difficult for companies that are trying to finance their operations, particularly under the present ceiling price of lumber in Canada, to provide extra working capital for the erection of homes for their employees.

One thing I might mention is this. One of the great causes of dissatisfaction in the lumber strike in British Columbia is the fact that a great many men have to travel two hours each way to and from work. Men working in Alberni have to travel two hours out in the morning and two hours back at night, so that they are actually working a twelve-hour day instead of putting in eight hours. Under this provision, the company could provide homes and that would obviate one cause of dissatisfaction.

One thing I would suggest to the minister—and I have discussed it with him to some extent—is the desirability of bringing fishermen under this section. It is confined to mining and lumbering operations, and I would appreciate it if the minister would give consideration to the fishing industry, bringing it under the same provisions as are extended to the others.

As regards cooperatives, about which we have been speaking, the minister is not partial to providing them with that type of loan. I believe that in my own constituency—and I have no doubt that other coastal members from British Columbia would say the same thing—we have fishing cooperatives of considerable substance, as the minister would discover, and they would probably be eligible for loans under a fishing section of this act. They would be excellent risks, and I can see no reason why they should not come under the heading of incorporated companies. I offer that as a suggestion to the minister.

Mr. HOWE: When I visited the Pacific coast last winter I was greatly impressed with the necessity for the type of housing covered by this section, but I had difficulty in working it out, and the advice of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni was helpful to myself and the department in finding a solution which we believe will be workable. I wish to make that acknowledgement at this time. I have an amendment which will include the fishing industry, and I would ask the Minister of Justice to move:

That subsections 1 and 2 of section 9A of the act, as enacted by clause 15 of the bill, be repealed and the following substituted:

"9A. (1) The corporation may on behalf of His Majesty, and with the approval of the governor in council, make a loan to a borrower engaged in the mining, lumbering, logging or fishing industry, to assist in the construction of low or moderate-cost housing projects in areas or localities that are adjacent to or connected with the operations of the borrower.

(2) For the purpose of this section the expression 'borrower' means an incorporated company engaged in the mining, lumbering, logging or fishing industry, and includes a company (in this section referred to as a 'subsidiary company') incorporated for the purpose of owning, constructing and managing a housing project, all the share capital of which, except directors' qualifying shares, are owned by an incorporated company (in this section referred to as the 'parent company') engaged in the mining, lumbering, logging or fishing industry."

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. PROBE: I hope that does not preclude some questions on the section as amended. Under a concession such as this, will the minister explain why a company which is borrowing from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is favoured with a four per cent rate, while a cooperative, if it can borrow, has to pay 4½ per cent? I should like some explanation of that.

Mr. FULTON: May I ask whether, in the opinion of the experts of the department, for the purposes of this section an incorporated company may include a cooperative company, provided that it is definitely associated for the purposes specified in the section?

Mr. HOWE: If the cooperative is also a lumbering or logging company it will qualify.

Mr. MacNICOL: Or a fishing company?

Mr. HOWE: A cooperative simply for the building of houses in a lumbering area would not.

Mr. FULTON: If it is a cooperative logging company it will be covered?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would it include fishing companies?

Mr. HOWE: Hon. members will remember that there is a 4½ per cent rate for home owners and privately owned rental houses. In the case of loans to limited-dividend companies a three per cent rate is available. It is felt that outlying area loans should be at a rate between three and 4½ per cent. The rate should be lower than 4½ per cent, because in every case we have the guarantee of the lumbering or mining company. Further, the company is subject to limitation of earnings on investment to the rate established for the mortgage. Therefore the mortgage rate must have relation to a fair maximum rate allowable on the company's equity. On the other hand, the rate should be higher than three per cent for limited-dividend companies, if for no other reason than that the housing will be of great advantage to lumbering and mining companies. In the light of these factors, we felt that a four per cent rate was appropriate.

Mr. KNIGHT: I should like to ask the minister the position in connection with lumbering camps, particularly. I realize that mining towns have more stability, more permanence, and it seems to me that lumber camps are fleeting things.

Mr. MERRITT: It is just the opposite.

Mr. KNIGHT: All right; you tell the minister that when I have finished. If a logging operation runs out, what is the position if we have what are called ghost towns? What is the position if the project is abandoned?

Mr. HOWE: The corporation must exercise care to see that the life of the loan is not longer than the life of the community or the operation. In my discussion of the bill this afternoon, I mentioned that the best possible advice must be obtained from appropriate authorities as to the life of the operation, and as to the appropriate type of housing. For example, housing for a short-term operation probably would be built on skids so it could be moved to another operation, if that were appropriate; but skill must be exercised by the corporation to see that their loan is protected, having regard to the nature of the operation.

Mr. MERRITT: Under subsection 6, which has to do with the terms of the contract, paragraph (a) reads shortly that the loan can be made only if evidence satisfactory to the corporation has been furnished as to the need for such housing accommodation—a perfectly proper provision—and that such housing accommodation will result in an increased number of people being employed in connection with the operation. It would seem to me that if there were a switch from bunkhouses to houses, so that people working in the operation were able to bring their families there, the purposes of the plan would be served. Surely it would not be necessary that these beautiful houses should bring many more people into the employ of the company. It seems to me that a logging operation or a mine has a set crew, and presumably they are there now even without the houses, if the project is being operated properly. I was going to suggest to the minister, in the first place, that this second provision, with regard to an increased number of people being employed, should be dropped altogether, or, in the alternative, that it be amended to provide that an increased number of people should reside in the area of the operation or in connection with the operation, rather than being restricted to an actual addition to the crew employed on the job. I think, too, that the retention of the men employed on one of these operations is perhaps just as important as increasing their number. One thing we should try to guard against is a continual turnover of men because they must go down to the cities to see their friends and their families. I wonder if the minister would consider making that change.

Mr. HOWE: It seems to me that the position at the moment is very much the same as slum clearance. We would like to undertake slum clearance. However, we are faced with the difficulty that if houses were torn down before alternative housing was available there would be real and natural resistance. If housing in lumber camps was torn down to provide better housing, there again it might be depriving someone who would have no other housing at all. I think the purpose of the act was not simply to improve living conditions for the men who happened to be there, but also to provide a better class of accommodation for an expanded operation.

Mr. MERRITT: Yes, but at the present time, as I understand it, the husband working there is living in the bunkhouse, while his wife and family are living in Vancouver or Victoria or Alberni. If you built him a house and took him out of the bunkhouse you still get his family out of the city, and free accommodation there. I believe in that way you would more quickly achieve the purpose you are seeking, without imposing this additional restriction. To my mind, it is a restriction that is unnecessary, in that it ties the hands of the corporation too much. The corporation could quite easily give preference to those cases which would increase total employment in the camp, in getting this thing started, and then come in with the type I am talking about later; but I think to leave it in the statute is to limit the scheme quite strictly and quite unnecessarily.

Mr. HOWE: Well, I will ask my colleague to move that the words "and that such housing accommodation will result in an increased number of people being employed" in lines 33 and 34 be struck out.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Might we go back to subsection 4 of section 9A, where I read:

The loan shall be secured by a first mortgage or hypothec on the land . . .

Would the minister consider putting in the words "or second mortgage"? I know a great many lumber companies, in their depressed conditions, have already blanket first mortgages with the banks, and this might be a little restrictive.

Mr. HOWE: I am afraid we could hardly accept that. I think we must have a first mortgage.

Mr. KNOWLES: Despite the fact that the reference to providing employment has been struck out, I should like to comment upon the other side of the medal, as the Minister of Labour sometimes says. My colleague the hon. member for Saskatoon City asked what happens in the event that one of these places becomes a ghost town. I notice that paragraph (i) of subsection 7, on page 15 of the bill, reads:

The borrower during the term of the loan may with the approval of the corporation, and upon terms and conditions satisfactory to the corporation, sell under agreement for sale or lease and option, units of the said project to prospective home owners.

I am wondering whether among the conditions satisfactory to the corporation before it consents to the sale of individual units is a concern for the position of the individual employee who might be buying the house, in the event of the operation closing up.

Mr. HOWE: That is the reason for the approval of the corporation, that the sale be bona fide and not the sale of a ghost town.

Mr. KNOWLES: In order words, it is quite clear that the company cannot sell on its initiative, that it must have the approval of the corporation?

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I should like to refer back to paragraph (h) on page 9 of the bill, which provides that the maximum period for which the loan may be obtained is twenty years, or, under special conditions, twenty-five years. Could the minister tell us the minimum number of years for which a loan may be obtained?.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is going back a long way. We passed it sometime ago.

Mr. KNOWLES: No, we have not. We are still on section 15 of the bill.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is talking about the length of time for a mortgage on rental housing, is that correct?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: No. This refers to a joint loan which sets a maximum period of twenty years, and, under special conditions, twenty-five years. Is there a minimum as well as a maximum period, and, if so, how long is it?

Mr. HOWE: There is no minimum. The loan is ordinarily for twenty years, and can be for twenty-five years under certain sections. There is no minimum length of time. However, if someone wanted to borrow for ten years I should imagine that the corporation would be glad to lend on that basis, if conditions permitted repayment in that time.

Section agreed to.

Sections 16, 17 and 18 agreed to.

On section 19—Corporation may enter into contract with approved lending institution.

Mr. FULTON: The minister gave some explanation of this to-day. I think he said that the object of allowing a loan to aggregate $8,000, if the land is already mortgaged, was to enable refinancing of the mortgage to take place. But it seems to me that it may have another effect, that is that since a man whose land is clear can only get $5,000, it makes it more difficult for a man whose farm or land is clear of all encumbrances to institute a wise project than it does for a man whose land is already encumbered. It seems to me that this requires more explanation. If the land is already encumbered, the security is not as good. It should be made clear in the terms of the contract that the existing encumbrance must be paid off, and I have not found any such provision in the section. Would the minister give us more information about it?

Mr. HOWE: The corporation can lend only on a first mortgage. If there is an existing encumbrance it would be necessary to pay it off in order to give the first mortgage to the corporation. I think the two would be in exactly the same position. The size of the loan depends upon the value of the farm.

Mr. FULTON: Does it mean that an existing encumbrance must be $3,000 before one can get an $8,000 loan? If not, such person could borrow more than the man who has not already a mortgage?

Mr. HOWE: The principle is that he gets $5,000 for building his house; and if he requires to remove an encumbrance in order to qualify for the loan he can refinance that encumbrance up to $3,000. But in any event the loan for the purpose of building a house must not exceed $5,000 in the case of either unencumbered or encumbered land.

Mr. FULTON: The minister said that the corporation is allowed to lend only on first mortgage. Is that in the form of contract specified for their use or in the act?

Mr. HOWE: In the original act.

On section 30—Investigation into housing conditions.

Mr. PROBE: I note that under this the corporation will have the responsibility of causing investigations to be made into housing conditions in Canada. Prior to this time, I believe that was the responsibility of the minister. This might be the opportune time to ask the minister to give us a report on the state of housing in Canada, or to refer us to a booklet he recently caused to be published which would give us up-to-date information, somewhat more current than that found in the Curtis report of some years ago. What reports are available on the state of housing in Canada?

Mr. HOWE: I assure the hon. member that any report prepared on the subject by the corporation will be tabled in the house by the minister.

Mr. PROBE: We have had none yet.

Mr. HOWE: No; the study has not yet been made.

Mr. PROBE: Then, that is not helping us. Surely the minister has someone assigned to the responsibility of preparing statistics dealing with housing.

Mr. HOWE: Yes; there are ten people devoting their entire time to the study. But it takes time; the corporation is not very old.

Mr. PROBE: But the minister has been associated with the subject for some time. I am serious about this, and feel that we should have periodic reports. I should like the minister to tell us what is being done to make such reports available to the nation as to the state of housing. The minister has entered into contracts with certain corporations in Canada to provide certain housing materials. Surely to goodness a businessman will base his negotiations on contracts on statistical information of some kind. I maintain that the minister is remiss in not having reports available to us.

How many houses are we short in Canada at the present time? How are we to meet the housing needs of the people of Canada; or, to come more to the point, the people of Regina?

Mr. HOWE: I have made a fairly exhaustive report on that, in connection with the discussion on the resolution.

Mr. PROBE: And I read every word of it.

Mr. HOWE: I said that at the present time we are short 150,000 and that by next spring I believe it might be 180,000. I gave the results of the survey made to date. I have given several reports on housing, and I can assure hon. members that I shall keep the house advised from time to time on the position.

Mr. PROBE: Is there a publicity department? I read the minister's statement made to the house, and also heard it. Then, I was deeply interested in what he said that afternoon. However, it seems to me that what he gave was not an exact picture, but rather a rough approximation. If it is based upon statistical information, surely there is a written report to support it, one which we can study at some length. Is such a report available?

Mr. HOWE: The Department of Reconstruction and Supply prepares a report on the state of the nation—

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. HOWE:—every two weeks, I believe it is, or possibly every month. It is an interesting report. Indeed, as a rule I use it from which to make public speeches, and from time to time I shall be glad to make it available to the house.

Mr. KNOWLES: Do any of these figures the minister has bring up to date the kind of information given in the Curtis report?

Mr. HOWE: The Curtis report is largely out of date, owing to the enormous change in distribution of income. It was a valuable report at the time. The report made this year will certainly be out of date three or four years from now. However, the situation will be kept before the house in much the same form as the Curtis report, but in line with present-day conditions.

Mr. MacNICOL: Have we any record of the number of evictions that take place monthly, in Toronto for instance? Every time I go home I see a pile of furniture in front of some house; then next day I read in the paper that so-and-so was evicted and quite frequently it is a returned soldier. I have one case in mind on Dufferin street. This was a soldier who had a distinguished record. The situation is nothing short of appalling. They have the same serious situation in the United States, but I should like to know what we are doing to prevent it here?

Mr. HOWE: We have a close record of all evictions and we maintain close liaison with the mayor of Toronto in the handling of evicted persons. I might say that we have almost a running battle with every sheriff in the country in attempting to stop these evictions. My hon. friend probably knows that there was a court decision in Vancouver against our stopping evictions. A total of 179 evictions are being pressed in Toronto, and we are doing our best to stop their being carried out, but I am afraid, without success. We do our best, through emergency housing, to provide shelter for the persons evicted.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to hear that. This particular returned soldier's family consisted of the father and the mother. A son had recently returned from overseas with a war bride, and there was a daughter who was seriously handicapped by ill health. The father and mother must now live apart in separate rooms, and the son and his wife are also living apart. I do not know what became of the daughter. The son came to see me when I was home the second last time, and he said it was driving them distracted to be separated. I hope something can be done to stop these evictions.

On section 33—Powers.

Mr. PROBE: Will this section permit a corporation to enter into an agreement with any housing agency other than those specified in sections 4, 8 and 9? I am hoping this will give the president of Central Mortgage and Housing corporation power to enter into contracts with cooperatives.

Mr. HOWE: This gives no right to lend money; it is just to cause the promotion of housing. The only change in the section is to change the word "he" to "it".

Mr. PROBE: Has any type of community construction been undertaken? That was recommended in the house last year, and I should like to know if any planned community has been undertaken anywhere in Canada?

Mr. HOWE: There are paper towns such as Marathon and the Kimberley Clark project, and there is the small scale project in Ottawa where we have some 200 houses in a separate community.

Mr. FULTON: Could the minister answer the question I asked earlier about the operations of Wartime Housing Limited for 1946 being cut off?

Mr. HOWE: We started in July, 1945, to undertake a programme which we called the 1945 programme, but it was October and November before a start was made. The result was that that programme was carried over into 1946. The programme for 1946 was cut off at June in order that the houses started under the 1946 programme could be completed in 1946. We are now undertaking a 1947 programme, and it is hoped that we can build the foundations for a good part of that programme in 1946, but as far as materials required for the superstructure of the houses and fittings and so on are concerned, these may come along later. We should like to concentrate upon finishing the 1946 programme before we commence working on the 1947 programme.

Mr. FULTON: It does not mean that you are not going to authorize any projects, or that projects just authorized recently are to be suspended?

Mr. HOWE: No.

On section 36—Advisory committees.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): What advisory committees have been appointed?

Mr. HOWE: The town planning committee was appointed, and a conference of town planning authorities was held recently in Ottawa. A permanent committee was appointed as liaison between the work of the corporation and the work of similar bodies in the provinces and municipalities. Then, there was the committee of the construction association which was formed to study the extension of building materials. I believe there are others as well.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Might we see the reports of the construction committee?

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to table the reports.

On section 37—Loan insurance.

Mr. PROBE: Apparently this section provides for equity insurance, something that has been long overdue. We have had lots of concern for the creditor but none for the debtor. Apparently some arrangements are to be made, or perhaps they have already been made, because this is simply a rewriting of an old section, whereby the man who has borrowed money from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation under this act or from a mortgage company is to have his equity protected in the event of death. What are the rates for this type of insurance in a typical case? Would the minister state whether he is favourably inclined to extending the principle of equity insurance to cover payments by the home owner under circumstances of all kinds?

Mr. HOWE: I am sorry to say that this portion of the act is completely inoperative at the moment. The Department of Finance met with the insurance companies and attempted to work out suitable provisions. I think hon. members will all agree with the desirability of permitting a man to insure his life in order that he may carry out an obligation such as the purchase of a house. However, I am sorry to say that suitable provisions have not been arrived at. Since the responsibility passed to the corporation, it has been so busy with other matters that it has not attended to this particular duty. I hope sincerely that it will be possible for the corporation to work out terms with the insurance companies which will permit the bringing into force of this section. The present amendment is simply to change the word "minister" to the word "corporation."

Mr. PROBE: There is no real difficulty in coming to an agreement? It is simply that the negotiations have not been carried on sufficiently long to bring about an agreement. Is that correct? In the event that that is not feasible, I would suggest that in any event the government undertake this insurance principle itself, because many home owners could not meet the physical requirements of an insurance contract. Then we could handle it in the same way as veterans insurance. However, I thank the minister.

Mr. KNOWLES: Bearing in mind that the wider the coverage, the lower the cost, I hope that any studies relating to this matter will include an appraisal of the possibility of doing it for all contracts under the act.

Bill reported.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house, since the amendments are very simple and we should like to see the last of this legislation, perhaps third reading could be given now.

Mr. KNOWLES: Often when we do this we get representations next morning, and that is too late. I have no desire to say anything further on third reading, but I think, in fairness, it should stand over until the next sitting of the house.

SUPPLY

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I realize that the government is in a position to call any order they wish, but I understood from the order of business given on Friday night last that we would go into supply only after we had concluded certain other business.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If there is any objection I shall not press the motion. We are not exposed to running out of work for some time to come. The motion was made only for the purpose of calling items concerning the Prime Minister's office and the Department of Justice and letting them stand, without proceeding with the discussion of the items.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the Acting Prime Minister indicate how many other departments have not yet been called?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think these are the only two, construing the word "department" as it has been construed since I have been here. The auditor general's items are usually dealt with as part of the affairs concerning the Department of Finance, and the items concerning the office of the privy council are usually dealt with as items relevant to the Prime Minister's office. They are the only ones that have not yet been called.

Mr. KNOWLES: If there were other departments I would not press my objection.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If there is any objection I am quite willing to withdraw the motion, because I think we make more progress by cooperation.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if I might say a word, I was not aware that there were two departments not yet in supply. If it had been otherwise I would have been agreeable to following the minister's suggestion; but if there are only two departments that have not yet been moved into supply, I suggest with all deference that we should not be asked to go into supply now, since there will be plenty of time to move those two in.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the leader of the opposition would prefer that we wait, there is no objection.

Mr. BRACKEN: It would deny the opposition the right to raise some matter on a motion to go into supply. That is what I had in mind. If there are only two departments not yet in, we shall not be holding up the work of the house by not going into supply now.

Motion withdrawn.

JUDGES ACT

CONSOLIDATION AND AMENDMENT—SALARIES, ETC.

The house resumed from Friday, July 26, consideration in committee of bill No. 250, respecting judges of dominion and provincial courts—Mr. St. Laurent—Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 3—Eligibility.

Mr. HACKETT: We had not finished the general discussion, I think, Mr. Chairman.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I think we were on section 3 when the committee rose.

Mr. HACKETT: It was my recollection that the hon. member for Cariboo had asked a lot of questions which were not answered. I wish to ask the minister about the provision for a division between a judge and his wife of the retirement allowance allotted to a judge on his retirement. I believe that, under section 26 of the Judges Act, county court and circuit court judges are retired compulsorily when they reach the age of seventy-five years. Under section 26A, which was enacted on August 15, 1944, it was provided that the judges mentioned in sections 23 and 25 might arrange that a portion of their retirement allowance would be payable to their wives. If I have correctly read sections 23 and 25, the option was not extended to county court judges or judges of the circuit court for the district of Montreal. I may tell the minister that I am referring for the moment in particular to county court judges. In fact, was the option not extended to them?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It was, in fact, extended to them, but perhaps it would be more convenient for the members if we had this discussion when we get to the pertinent section of the bill, because it is dealt with in this bill. This bill purports to reproduce what was done in that regard in 1944, and there are sections which expressly deal with it.

Mr. HACKETT: I am willing to accept the minister's suggestion, but I thought that if we were still discussing the general terms of the bill, and since there are a number of sections involved, it might be more convenient to do it now. I am going to suggest to the minister—and I am doing it at the instance of the hon. member for Calgary West—that judges of the county courts who, under section 26, were forced to retire when they became seventy-five years old, might now be permitted, by an appropriate amendment, to make the option which was denied to them by section 26A, subsection 1 (a). It does not mean any increase in salary or any more money, but it would ease the minds of those county court judges who were retired before section 26A, subsection 1 (a) was passed if their wives were permitted to avail themselves of the benefits granted by that subsection. It affects a very small number of judges, a group which is rapidly diminishing, and would dispel a great anxiety which has overtaken many of them, especially in view of the decreased value of the dollar.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think I understand the point the hon. member wishes to make. If I do understand him he wishes to know if it would not be possible in this act to give gentlemen who had become pensioners before the provisions were made in 1944, allowing for an optional division of pension rights, the right to make that option at this time. That matter was under consideration both in 1944 and again at this time. The pension provisions enable the governor in council to issue to a judge who has retired letters patent giving him an annuity, and his right to an annuity then is evidenced by and founded upon his letters patent. It is not by virtue of the statute that he is paid the annuity, but because of the letters patent which have been issued to him establishing that annuity in his favour. When he gets those letters patent his contractual rights with the crown have come to an end; he has ceased to be a judge, and he has received a document which is full settlement of what the statute enabled the governor in council to grant him. It was felt in 1944 that these gentlemen, having received everything they were entitled to under the Judges Act, could not or should not be dealt with by amendments to the Judges Act. The amendments were made for those to whom the Judges Act still applied, and they were given the right to exercise an option. That right was extended to them for a period of ninety days, and it was an irrevocable option. They were all notified that they had the right to exercise the option, and practically all of them did exercise it. But when we considered the preparation of a bill to be introduced at this time we did not think we could deal with this aspect, or with another application which has been before the government for at least twenty-five years; that is to say, for an amendment which would provide pensions for widows of judges. There are, I believe, over three hundred widows of former judges, some of whom are in straitened circumstances. It was felt that we could not deal with this class of retired judges still living unless we dealt with the widows of those who had predeceased them, and we felt that we could not do that until such time as we were putting before parliament something more satisfactory than at present exists with respect to old age pensions. That was the reason we felt that we could not single out one class of Canadians and ask parliament to make provision for them until there was something being done generally with respect to old age pensions.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is a good argument against the whole bill.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; I submit it is not an argument against the bill. The bill deals with the judiciary in office at the present time, and we are taking the responsibility of saying to parliament that we consider it desirable that these additional provisions be made for them, because they are the judiciary of the country at the present time.

Mr. HACKETT: And the judiciary of the future depends to some extent upon this measure.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, upon this measure, because it affects the judiciary in existence at this time. But I felt that it would not be proper to ask parliament, when dealing with the present and the future, to deal with pension provisions for those who had in the past served the country in a judicial capacity. It was that reason I had to give as an answer to a great many letters which I have received, and I must say that the answer has been accepted. I suppose there was not very much they could do but accept the answer, but I have not had anyone say that it was not a reasonable answer to make. I have had to answer the requests that were submitted to me, that more should be done at this time in this bill than it does provide for, and I have had to say that I did not feel that I should come to parliament and ask parliament to do more at this time than the bill envisages. It is for that reason that we have kept strictly to the situation which deals with the present and the future.

Mr. HACKETT: The matter has been considered?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It was considered and discussed at great length; and I knew that even these provisions would not meet with unanimous approval. I did feel, however, that I could conscientiously recommend these provisions to parliament at this time, but that I could not go beyond, because there was nothing being done at this time for old age pensioners generally.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Salaries of judges of Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. HANSELL: On this section I wish to ask one question which could really apply to all the following clauses covering schedules of salaries. Does this schedule of salaries represent accurately what the judges really get? What I have in mind is this. I understand that judges carrying on some district court work in the provinces receive, in addition to their salaries, some amounts paid by the provinces. Would the minister enlighten us on that? I should like to get an accurate picture. Or are the amounts paid by the provinces included in this schedule?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There are no amounts paid by the provinces to judges of the supreme court or judges to the exchequer court, nor to judges who exercise the functions of judges in admiralty or in divorce courts in the provinces. I have no official information about this matter, but my impression is that there are performed by high court judges in the province of Ontario duties for which each receive an additional sum of $1,000 from the province, and there are additional duties performed by district and county court judges where there is not more than one in a district or county, duties as surrogate judges, for which an additional sum is paid by the province. In the province of Quebec there are no additional sums paid by the province, and there are other provinces where I understand no additional payments are made. I do not know what the situation is in the hon. member's province.

Mr. LOW: There is paid $1,000 for the probating of wills.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There are provinces where there is no additional payment for that purpose.

Mr. MacINNIS: I had a few words to say on the first section on Friday last. After I had finished the hon. member for Stanstead

(Mr. Hackett) took me severely to task. Since what I said at that time related to salaries, I think my reply to the hon. gentleman will be in order on this section, because it, too, relates to salaries.

I have listened to the hon. member for Stanstead on many occasions in this house and have appreciated and admired the way in which he could marshal his arguments and his facts, and whether we all agreed on the case he made out, it was certainly appreciated by myself. I was not in the house when he spoke on Friday, and I had only an opportunity of reading his speech in Hansard. May I say I have never seen such a conglomeration of inanities in a speech delivered by a gentleman of his legal standing. But what I take exception to mostly is what he said in regard to myself. It has no basis in fact, either as regards my personal character or as regards the philosophy which I accept and expound. At page 3910 of Hansard he said:

> The argument of the hon. member for Vancouver East is an expression of his own political philosophies; eloquently and cogently stated, I admit.

I do not know whether it was eloquently or cogently stated, but I was certainly dealing with facts. He went on to say:

> It is a statement of the doctrine of making everybody equally poor, which is a denial of the system which obtains here, namely, private initiative and competition. His is a socialistic system, a class system. Nobody must emerge ahead of anybody else. Everybody must be on a dead level of competence—or incompetence.

Did anyone in this house; did the hon. member for Stanstead ever in this house, hear me urging that we should bring everyone down to a dead level of poverty? As a matter of fact, everything I have said in this house has been said to try to raise everybody up to a high level of living. Surely, when I urge that the government of Canada should not increase the salaries of those who have already a high standard of living until it has done something to improve the standard of living of those who are grovelling in poverty, that is not to say that I wish to bring everyone down to the same dead level of poverty. If the hon. gentleman has not a better argument than that to put forward against my reasoning, it would be far better for him to hold his peace.

There are many things in his speech that are really not fair to the judges of the country. On the following page, 3910, he says:

> To-day the judicial office has gone begging for good men.

That is to say, the judges we have to-day are not good men. I never said anything of that kind, because I believe we have good men as judges. He says:

> To-day the judicial office has gone begging for good men. Oh, there are multitudes who are willing to serve. I admit that, but the best men are not available and we need the best men.

I maintain that that is a distinct reflection on the character and ability of the men who act as judges in this country to-day, and it was not I who made that statement. The hon. gentleman ended his speech with a most amazing assertion. He said:

> I say to the Minister of Justice, give to the judges an increase in salary; give it to them immediately, that they may protect their own virtue even if the government is not as solicitous of it as it should be.

Surely, if it requires a decent standard of living to maintain one's virtue, my attitude is away ahead of the hon. gentleman's. He wishes to maintain the virtue of a mere handful of people. I wish to maintain the virtue of the whole of the people of Canada. That is the difference between the doctrine that is held by my hon. friend and the doctrine that is held by myself, and certainly I am not ashamed of my doctrine.

I have served the people of my community for the past twenty-five years. I served them first on the school board in my city; I served them later as alderman in the city council, and by virtue of the service I gave at that time I am here. I would not be here if I were advocating such a doctrine as my hon. friend would have the members of the house believe I am advocating. As a matter of fact, his whole speech is all the proof that is required of the bankruptcy of his social thinking.

WHEAT

STATEMENT OF POLICY FOR WESTERN PRODUCERS—DOMESTIC AND EXPORT PRICES

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as the house has been advised, the government's attention has been directed for some time to the question of wheat policy for western Canada. The United Kingdom-Canada wheat contract, signed on July 24 and announced to the house on July 25, is an important element in the new policy for western wheat producers that I now wish to describe. The contract establishes a market for a considerable proportion of the next four western wheat crops, with underlying price guarantees. This factor, along with the continued shortage of foodstuffs and the high prices of competing wheats, makes it possible to deal more generously with the wheat producer than I indicated in this house on March 20, 1946. At that time, I announced the continuation of the initial price at $1.25 per bushel basis No. 1 Northern in store, Fort William-Port Arthur or Vancouver, for the 1946-47 crop year.

The new policy is based upon an initial price of $1.35 per bushel basis No. 1 Northern in store Fort William-Port Arthur or Vancouver, applicable to all the wheat delivered to the Canadian wheat board in the five-year period from and including August 1, 1945, and July 31, 1950. The 1945-46 deliveries, based on an initial price of $1.25 will be brought up to a $1.35 basis by payment of a flat ten cents per bushel on all grades.

As the house has been informed, the payment of about 12 cents per bushel as participation on the 1943 crop is now under way. This participation payment will be followed by one on the 1944 crop the sale of which has progressed to a point where I am safe in saying that the participation payment will be upwards of 16 cents per bushel. After the ten cent payment on the 1945 crop has been made—to bring the initial payment up to $1.35—the plan is to place the remaining surplus from that crop in a five-year pool with the succeeding four crops of 1946, 1947, 1948 and 1949. Participation certificates will be issued in the usual way, but the payment on these certificates will not be made until after the conclusion of the five-year pool at July 31, 1950. In other words, the deliveries of all five years will be bulked in one pool, with the same initial price of $1.35 ruling throughout the period and the surplus resulting from the marketing of these crops will constitute the participation payments.

In connection with deliveries, there was, of course, no restriction on 1945-46 deliveries and it is the intention of the government to instruct the Canadian wheat board to accept all the wheat that producers wish to deliver in 1946-47. The best information we can get indicates a continued over-all world shortage of wheat and wheat flour in the coming crop year. Deliveries in the last three years of the pool will depend upon conditions of production and of markets. It will be provided in the new orders that the deliverable quantities will be determined by the governor in council before each new crop year, but in any event, the deliverable quantity shall not be less than 14 bushels per authorized acre. The latter provision should safeguard wheat producers against an extreme reduction in deliverable amounts, should available markets be smaller than we expect.

I should also mention the provisions for domestic and export prices. In the interests of general price control that benefits the wheat producers along with other Canadians, the domestic price of wheat will be continued at $1.25, with the government assuming carrying costs on the amounts of wheat used domestically. The government will continue to pay a drawback to millers covering the difference between 77⅞ cents and 125 cents per bushel on wheat used in Canada for human consumption. This is, of course, not a direct charge against the producer. With regard to export prices, the supplies for the United Kingdom will obviously be sold within the terms of the contract. In sales to non-contract countries, a serious effort will be made to sell at prices roughly corresponding to those of the other principal supplier—now, the United States. To this end, order in council P.C. 6122 of September 19, 1945, has been revoked. It will be remembered that through this order the government directed the Canadian wheat board for the time being not to exceed a sales price of $1.55 per bushel for No. 1 Northern in store Fort William-Port Arthur or Vancouver in its export sales.

It will be apparent from what I have just said and from the terms of the United Kingdom-Canada wheat contract that the government considers it wise and advisable to continue the Canadian wheat board as the sole purchaser of western Canadian wheat from the producers. The government believes that the great majority of western producers are satisfied, for the present at least, with this method of marketing. The present powers of the Canadian wheat board will be extended under the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act for the duration of this statute. When it expires, the government will direct its attention to the form and authority under which the board's powers may be further continued.

Other powers of the board, such as delivery quotas, will continue to be employed as in the past. For 1946-47, however, the quotas will not be finally restrictive but employed for the purpose of fairly dividing elevator space and railway cars among all the producers.

The representations that have been made to the government by spokesmen for the organized producers of western Canada stress their great desire for stability, so far as it can be attained by government action, during the post-war years. I think it can be fairly said that the policy I have outlined helps the producers materially toward that objective. There is no question that the wheat producers have made possible the success of domestic price control by immediate sacrifices in their 1945-46 and current export prices. These sacrifices have also assisted in overseas rehabilitation. The government is convinced that the outlined policy will give fair and comparatively stable returns to the producers, so far as it is within the power of the government.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the minister for certain aspects of the announcement he has just made. I should like to ask one question which has to do with the non-deliverable wheat after this year. As I understand the minister's statement, he made four or five definite announcements. First, the initial price is to be increased from $1.25 to $1.35; second, the participation certificates are to be increased from 12 cents to 16 cents.

Mr. MacKINNON: For one year.

Mr. BRACKEN: Third, the Canadian wheat board is to be continued; fourth, all the wheat from this year's crop is to be accepted under the present terms, and fifth, the dominion is to assume all the cost of carrying the domestically used wheat.

Mr. MacKINNON: Assume the carrying charges.

Mr. BRACKEN: I understood the minister to say that there is no assurance that more than 14 bushels would be accepted in any one year after this year. Am I correct?

Mr. MacKINNON: Included in the statement is an announcement that the amount of wheat that will be taken from the producers each year will be reviewed each year, but there will be a minimum of 14 bushels per authorized acre.

Mr. BRACKEN: For each of the four years after this year?

Mr. MacKINNON: Each of the three years. The period for 1945-46 is almost past. For the next year we are taking all the wheat, and for the following year a minimum of 14 bushels per acre.

Mr. BRACKEN: It would be the next three years after this year?

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes—for 1947-48, 1948-49 and 1949-50.

Mr. WRIGHT: Is it the intention of the government to continue the wheat board as the marketing agency for coarse grains as well?

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes, as has been done for several years.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PRISONERS OF WAR IN HARVEST OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. WHITE (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the urgency of harvest operations, would the minister consider the request of the farmers of western Canada that the hours of work of prisoners of war engaged in harvest operations be from 9.15 a.m. to 5.00 p.m. daylight saving time, instead of from 8.15 a.m. until 4.00 p.m.? Four o'clock daylight saving time is really mid-afternoon.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I can assure my hon. friend that the matter will be discussed with the Department of National Defence which has jurisdiction over prisoners of war, the Department of Labour being merely the placement agency I am sure that all hon. members, irrespective of the side of the house on which they sit, are anxious to help the farmers in this very difficult time.

UNITED NATIONS

PARIS PEACE CONFERENCE—POWERS OF SMALL NATIONS—CANADA'S STATUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called perhaps I may be allowed to trespass upon the exclusive extraterritoriality of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). I see in the morning paper that a representative of a British dominion has demanded in Paris that the small nations be allowed greater power. I should like to know if Canada, a sister dominion, is still a small nation or a middle power.

Mr. GLEN: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. POULIOT: The question is a reasonable one. I want to know if Canada is a small nation or a middle power, and why and when it occurred.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I think the hon. member knows Canada as well as any of us, and he will have to arrive at his own opinion as to what class she is in.

Mr. POULIOT: My opinion is that Canada is not a small nation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIANS HELD BY GOVERNMENT OF YUGOSLAVIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct a question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. I note that in answer to a question raised in the United Kingdom House of Commons yesterday the Minister of State, Mr. Noel Baker, said that he understood five Canadians were among the British subjects at present held by the Yugoslavian government. I desire to put to the minister the following questions: (1) Does this statement coincide with the information possessed by the Canadian government? (2) What are the names of the Canadians so held? (3) What are the reasons for such detention? (4) What steps is the government taking to see that they are released?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to take the hon. member's question as a notice and see if there is information available upon which proper answers could be based.

TOMAHAWK IRON MINE

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT IN "CANADIAN MINING REPORTER"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) asked a question of me on Friday last regarding a report in the Canadian Mining Reporter dealing with the Tomahawk Iron Mines Limited. I have a reply here which is very lengthy and with the consent of the house I would ask permission to have it placed on Hansard as an answer to the question.

In the July 26 issue of the Canadian Mining Reporter, serious charges are made against certain officials of the mines and geology branch in connection with work performed and reports made for Tomahawk Iron Mines Limited.

At the request of Mr. C. F. Edwards of that company, the bureau of mines conducted concentration tests on a five-ton sample of their ore to determine if a high grade (99 per cent) metallic iron powder could be prepared on a commercial scale. The results obtained were not encouraging with respect to the production of such a high-grade product and were so reported. It was explained to Mr. Edwards that a commercially acceptable iron powder could be prepared, though this would not command the high price aimed at by him. We have no reason to doubt the ability or good faith of the officers concerned with these tests.

At the request of Tomahawk Iron Mines Limited, Doctor T. L. Tanton, a geologist on the staff of the geological survey, spent several days examining the magnetite occurrences on the Tomahawk property and subsequently submitted a report which he concluded by expressing the opinion that no body of iron ore of economic importance had been revealed. Doctor Tanton has been the geological survey specialist on iron ores for some years and the department has had no reason to question his ability or integrity.

The article in the Mining Reporter lists seven specific questions, and I shall read, for the benefit of the house, these questions and my answers to them:

Answers to questions asked by the Canadian Mining Reporter of the Hon. J. A. Glen in its issue of July 26, 1946, in regard to the mines and geology branch and Tomahawk Iron Mines Limited:

1. Question: What is Doctor T. L. Tanton's previous experience in the realm of magnetite iron geology?

Answer: Dr. Tanton's experience with iron ores dates back at least twenty years, and has been concerned with deposits of all types, magnetite included, and in different parts of Canada. Much of his field work during this considerable period has been devoted to the examination of iron ore both of productive properties and of various occurrences and prospects. Doctor Tanton has served on the field staff of the geological survey since 1913. He received his undergraduate education at the university of Toronto, from which he obtained his B.A. degree in 1911 and his M.A. degree in 1912, and continued with post-graduate studies in geology at the university of Wisconsin, under such internationally known iron experts as Professor C. K. Leith, eventually securing his doctorate degree in geology in 1915.

2. Question: Has the bureau of mines any recognized magnetite iron expert on the staff of its geological survey? If so, what is the name of the expert and what is his experience?

Answer: The geological survey is not part of the bureau of mines but of the bureau of geology and topography. These two bureaus are the main components of the mines and geology branch of this department. The recognized magnetite iron expert on the staff of the geological survey is Doctor Tanton and his experience and qualifications have been given above.

3. Question: Are the bureau's ore dressing laboratories suitably equipped for the efficient concentration and examination of magnetite?

Answer: Yes.

4. Question: If so, why did they fail to produce a concentrate purged of impurities in as high degree as was done under Professor Lord's supervision at Queen's?

Answer: We have no information as to Professor Lord's report nor the technique he followed.

5. Question: If not, why did the bureau's laboratory staff at Ottawa presume to issue the damaging report which they released on this iron concentrate?

Answer: The report issued (No. 1775) was the result of carefully prepared tests on the basis of a tonnage mill operation. The results indicated that a 99 per cent metallic iron powder (which is considered the requirement for a high-grade iron powder) could not be produced, owing to the fact that the magnetite concentrate contained unreducible non-ferrous matter and that 100 per cent reduction is not experienced in an iron reduction process.

The conclusion in the report referred only to "high-grade" 99 per cent plus iron powder.

I am advised that no complaint has ever been received from Mr. Edwards or Tomahawk Iron Mines regarding the contents of these reports, but that on the contrary Mr. Edwards wrote as follows in a letter dated February 8, 1945:

"I would like to take this occasion of very sincerely thanking you and all the staff for your work and effort expended on the concentration of our magnetite to such a high degree of purity and for your very comprehensive and complete report on same. I can assure you that our appreciation of the efforts of the bureau of mines in our regard is very deep."

Again on March 31, 1945, Mr. Edwards wrote in part as follows:

"Thanking you in anticipation of your cooperation in this matter and again extending heartfelt thanks for your invaluable work done on the concentration of our ore."

6. Question: What person or persons in the bureau of mines "leaked" the damaging aspects of the Tanton and the ore dressing laboratory reports in advance of release to the public to the Northern Miner, enabling that newspaper to publish statements damaging to the company on what they "understood" the report would contain when released?

Answer: The geological examination and report on the property and the ore dressing work on the bulk sample were both done free of charge. In such cases the mines and geology branch reserves the right to make such distribution of reports as it sees fit. In this case copies of the reports were sent to Mr. C. F. Edwards of Tomahawk Iron Mines shortly after their completion and to Ontario government officials, as is our usual practice. Some time later in the spring of 1945 it was found that Tomahawk Iron Mines Limited was issuing what was considered misleading advertising in that it was quoting sections from the bureau of mines report which were favourable to its operations and omitting other parts of a contrary character. Because the manner in which this report was being utilized was unfair to the investing public it was decided that the company had forfeited any claim for confidential treatment of the results and the reports were released on authority of the director of the mines and geology branch. Mr. Edwards was advised of the reason for their release. Subsequently the Ontario securities commission saw fit to make a full investigation of Tomahawk Iron Mines Limited and to cancel its registration certificate.

7. Question: If, as stated, by W. B. Timm, director of the mines and geology branch of the bureau, in a recent letter to a director of the company, his office "is organized to assist in the development of the mining and metallurgical industries," what instructions are issued to staff members relating to external dealings in confidential material?

Answer: All members of the staff of the mines and geology branch are required to take the oath of office and allegiance on joining the public service. The first oath deals specifically with the fact that confidential information shall not be released. Confidential reports are released only on the authority of the chief, bureau of mines, or the director, mines and geology branch.

In concluding, I should like to say that the mines and geology branch is organized to assist in the development of the mining and metallurgical industries of Canada and endeavours to the best of its ability to fulfil that function.

IMMIGRATION

WIVES AND FIANCEES OF SERVICE PERSONNEL—TRANSPORTATION TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) asked if the transportation to Canada from Holland and Belgium of the wives and fiancees of ex-service men had been held up because the immigration branch had not officers over there, and if these wives and fiancees will now be given priority.

The movement of dependents of service personnel is wholly within the jurisdiction of the Department of National Defence. The immigration officers have nothing to do with their transportation. The fiancees are not entitled to any transportation priority. As a matter of fact there is no transportation at the present time to have them brought here.

As to inspectional facilities on the continent, I am dealing now with the governments of countries where we wish to place our inspectional facilities, and, as I stated a little while ago, we expect within a very short time to have these inspectional facilities established.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): May I ask if these wives and fiancees will not have priority in transportation over the Poles? That is the question I wished particularly to ask.

Mr. GLEN: The Acting Prime Minister, in replying to the hon. gentleman's question yesterday, stated that his understanding was that these Poles were being brought here under arrangement with the United Kingdom government. There is no question of priority for the Poles; the wives will continue to have the priority they have always had.

Mr. RODNEY ADAMSON (York West): The minister said wives and fiancees. That is an enlargement, a good enlargement, is it not, on the rule?

Mr. GLEN: I did not say fiancees. The wives and dependents are under the jurisdiction of the Department of National Defence, and the question of their transportation does not fall within this department.

WHEAT

PAYMENT OF PARTICIPATION CHEQUES—HARVEST EXPENSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. ARGUE (Wood Mountain): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the rapidly approaching harvest in western Canada, will the minister announce when the wheat board cheques will be in the mail? Farmers need this payment to meet harvest expenses.

Hon J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I presume that the hon. member is referring to participation cheques for 1943. Many of these cheques are in the mail now, and the others will follow just as quickly as it is physically possible to get them out.

RYE

QUESTION AS TO CONTROL BY WHEAT BOARD—CEILINGS ON OATS AND BARLEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, of which I have given him notice. As we are nearing the close of the crop year, has the minister considered the advisability of putting rye under the control of the wheat board? If not, why not?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's notice of his question reached me just as I came into the chamber. Last February or March the leader of his party, the C.C.F., wrote me about this same matter, which is of considerable interest to many members of the house. At that time I made inquiries from my officers and received from them a memorandum which I think I can do no better than give in answer to the hon. member's question.

The hon. member asked whether the minister had considered the advisability of putting rye under the control of the wheat board. A proper appraisal of the rye position requires a number of observations. These are:

During the war the production of certain crops became a matter of national urgency and consequently the principle of established minimum prices was extended to include oats, barley, flaxseed and other oilseed crops. The dominion government felt that when producers were asked to increase the production of certain crops to meet wartime needs, minimum prices should be established in order to give the producer the necessary confidence in the products which were urgently needed. In successive wartime grain programmes rye was never included and at no time was the production of rye a matter of urgency. Producers who grew rye during the war years and since did so entirely on the basis of their own judgment and without direct encouragement on the part of the dominion government.

In the lack of any degree of urgency in the production of rye, it is difficult to find a reason why the dominion government should include rye within the scope of its national grain policies. In establishing measures in respect to wheat, oats and barley, the government was acting on behalf of crops which were produced by most farmers in the prairie provinces and any policies established in respect to these crops had a broad significance to western agriculture. In contrast, rye is a crop produced on a very limited scale and is without significance to a very large number of producers in the prairie provinces. This situation may be illustrated by the following table showing the 1945 acreage of rye, wheat, oats and barley for each of the prairie provinces:

	Acreage
	Rye	Wheat	Oats	Barley
Manitoba	26,000	2,132,000	1,697,000	2,139,000
Saskatchewan	259,000	13,610,000	5,717,000	2,672,000
Alberta	125,000	6,824,000	3,335,000	2,048,000
Total	410,000	22,566,000	10,749,000	6,859,000

It will be noted from this table that in 1945 rye acreage amounted to 410,000 acres as compared with a total of 40,174,000 acres seeded to wheat, oats and barley. These figures indicate that rye production in the prairie provinces is not sufficiently important nor sufficiently widespread to justify inclusion within government policies in the general interest of western agriculture.

For the reasons outlined in paragraphs 1 and 2, rye has not been included in successive grain programmes announced by the dominion government.

The only point at which dominion government policies have impinged upon the rye situation has been in connection with the maximum price regulations. When price ceilings were first published for grains in January, 1942, a ceiling was placed upon rye. This ceiling was removed in April, 1943, for the following specific reasons:

Maximum price regulations were intended to control price levels in Canada. Canadian consumption of rye is relatively small, the bulk of rye marketings going for export. Consequently, as far as price ceilings were concerned rye had very little significance. The Canadian consumer had practically no interest in the maintenance of a ceiling price for rye which was predominantly an export product.

The price of rye having practically no effect upon domestic price levels in Canada, the government felt that no good purpose could be served by continuing the ceiling price on rye.

The dominion government felt that the producer of rye, not having the protection of minimum prices, was entitled to whatever price could be obtained for rye.

Points 1, 2 and 3 combined led to the decision to remove the ceiling price on rye which represented the only control which the government had exercised—and only for a brief period—in respect to this grain. The question may be reasonably asked as to why a ceiling price was not maintained on rye and domestic ceilings enforced in respect to wheat, oats and barley. The answer is that the domestic price of wheat has a very definite effect upon living costs in Canada, and prices for oats and barley have both a direct effect and an indirect effect upon price levels in Canada. The major effect of the price of oats and barley is in relation to production costs of live stock and live stock products—very important items in the cost of living structure in this country. In short, control of the domestic price of wheat, oats and barley was essential to proper price control in Canada, while on the same basis, the maintenance of a ceiling price on rye was not important.

The rise in the price of rye has taken place on an open market and consequently it is difficult to appraise the validity of price levels as established. The price of rye can find its own level without limitation on the upward trend of prices, and without government support on a falling market. During the past two or three years prices have advanced and producers have been able to secure going market prices for whatever quantities of rye they desired to market.

The question at issue is not whether the price of rye is too high or too low. Fundamentally the question is whether or not the government should have intervened in connection with the marketing of rye in the first instance, and maintained a needless ceiling in the second instance. As pointed out earlier in this letter, it is difficult to find reasons why the dominion government should have included rye within its various grain programmes and should have maintained a ceiling price which had little or no significance in connection with the broad price policies which the government established in the general interest in Canada. These are the main points to be considered in connection with the rye position up to the present time.

Mr. WRIGHT: I should like to ask a supplementary question of the minister. Has the government given consideration to raising the ceilings on oats and barley to bring the prices of these grains into conformity with the new price on wheat?

Mr. MacKINNON: I think that is a matter of government policy. When there is any policy to announce it will be announced.

COMMISSION TO BROKERS ON WHEAT SALES TO UNITED KINGDOM

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): My question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arises out of the statement he has just made; for that reason it has not been possible for me to give him notice. The question is, will payment of commission to brokers by the wheat board be continued on sales of wheat to the United Kingdom under the new agreement; and if so, why?

Mr. MacKINNON: That, Mr. Chairman, is also a matter which has been under discussion in the cabinet, but no decision has been arrived at, and it is a matter of government policy which will be announced at the proper time.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENT AS TO LOAN PROVISIONS—CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved the third reading of bill No. 306, to amend the National Housing Act, 1944.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): May I be permitted to say a word of explanation with respect to the order of business to-day? Hon. members will recall that last night I stated that the Minister of Veterans Affairs would like, if it were agreeable to members of the house, to advance one stage the resolutions dealing with the legislation resulting from the recommendation of the committee on veterans affairs. There are already nine of these resolutions on the order paper—eight in the name of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, and one in the name of the Minister of Finance but dealing with veterans affairs. There are three more of which the text is in the Votes and Proceedings of yesterday, but those Votes and Proceedings have not yet been distributed, so I suggest that this be allowed to stand until three o'clock, when hon. members will have had the Votes and Proceedings and will have seen the other three resolutions which make up the twelve I mentioned last night.

[Mr. Wright.]

Mr. GREEN: They are out now.

Mr. BROOKS: The Votes and Proceedings are out now.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have not yet had an opportunity to see them, so if hon. members will allow that to stand until three o'clock we will proceed now with the budget resolutions.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, there is one matter on which I will not take more than two or three minutes, and which has been raised several times in this chamber, about soldiers not being able to get into a house they have purchased. They spend their means and use up their credit and gratuities in buying a house, and then are unable to occupy it. A man's house is his castle; he wants to live in his own house. Will the minister look into it?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must remind the hon. member that the bill to which he refers has been given third reading.

Mr. CHURCH: I was on my feet when the motion was called.

Mr. SPEAKER: We are no longer on that order of business.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, I claim the right to ask a question. No member has a copy of the bill, and if I have not got it I am going to appeal. I was on my feet when the motion was made for third reading.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. member that the third reading of the bill was adopted by the house; moreover that I put the motion to the house "that the said bill do now pass", and that motion also was adopted. Unfortunately for the hon. member, there can be no debate on a bill which has been passed. The house has proceeded to other business.

Mr. CHURCH: With all due deference, Mr. Speaker, I was on my feet when the motion was called. I wish to appeal from your ruling, because I wished to put my question on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: No point of order is raised by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CHURCH: I am a member of the House of Commons and I am going to do my duty. I do not intend to be interfered with on any technical interpretation of the rules.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would say to the hon. member that on many occasions such as this I have been very polite and generous to him and I did not want to tell him that it is sometimes hard for him to hear what is going on in the house; and this is why he does not rise at the proper time.

Mr. CHURCH: The bill was not passed when I rose; the assistant clerk had the bill in his hand, and no copies of it were available.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

12. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years, the provision exempting the income of certain cooperative companies and associations be repealed and that for the 1946 and subsequent taxation years provision be made that there may be deducted from a taxpayer's income the aggregate of the payments made,

(a) in the taxation year or within six months thereafter to his customers of the taxation year; and

(b) in the taxation year to his customers of a previous taxation year after the 1941 taxation year and not previously deducted under paragraph (a) in respect of specified allocations in proportion to patronage for the said years the prospect of which was held forth;

(c) by the statute or by-laws under which the taxpayer carries on business or by his contracts with his customers; or

(d) by the taxpayer in a specified manner prior to the commencement of the taxation year except that portion of such payments as would if deducted leave the taxpayer with an income less than an amount determined by deducting from three per cent of the capital employed in the business, including therein borowed moneys, the interest paid by the taxpayer on borrowed moneys and deductible as an expense in computing his income.

Mr. BENTLEY: When the house adjourned on Friday night I had given the minister an example in which I regret I made an error in arithmetic of half a dollar. However, the illustration I gave him is on the record, and I should be glad if he would reply now to the question.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Acting Minister of Finance): When we rose on Friday night the hon. member had given an example with respect to the operation of the revolving fund, and he asked me this question: "At what stage does the government's plan say the fund has reached a level from which an increase in the revolving fund is considered to have taken place for taxation purposes?"

I think I can answer the question best in this way. A cooperative, like the one described by my hon. friend, will be permitted to deduct from its income for tax purposes patronage dividends paid to members or customers whether in respect of the current year or some earlier year. If it can be established that the patronage dividends have been paid, actually or constructively—and I explained what I meant by "constructively"—they are deductible, subject of course to the 3 per cent rule. The balance is the income of the cooperative and taxable in its hands. A cooperative is therefore taxable on any increase in its undistributed earned surplus. That is a simple statement of the proposed law.

One of the reasons for this rule is of course the difficulty of taxing as income in the hands of the recipient a patronage dividend declared by a producers' cooperative but not paid. To be specific, what is the value for tax purposes of a patronage dividend declared by a producers' cooperative but not paid? Is it the discounted value of a payment to be received several years hence? If so, what rate of interest is to be used, and what would happen if the patronage dividend were not paid when intended or were never paid?

I am adding this because I would not want any hon. member to think that the government is being arbitrary in its proposals on this point. There are strong practical reasons for insisting on actual or constructive payment—and, as I say, I explained the other night what is meant by constructive.

Mr. BENTLEY: We can take it that actual or constructive payment is the key to the whole thing.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think that is correct.

Mr. McKAY: It is my conviction that resolution 12 will still have very serious consequences to cooperative enterprises as it now stands. It seems to me that cooperative enterprise is so far-reaching in its effect upon the economic life of the Canadian people that anything that is done to limit cooperative activity is most undesirable and will because of its ramifications affect the lives of thousands of people. In the past, cooperatives have received reasonably good treatment at the hands of government. As a matter of fact most provinces have encouraged cooperative enterprise, and that of course is in keeping with the recommendation of the united nations conference on food and agriculture which in 1943 made certain recommendations which appear in the "Canada Year Book". While in convention in the United States, the conference recommended that all countries study the possibilities of further establishing producer and consumer cooperative societies in order to provide necessary production, marketing, purchasing, finance and other services.

Over the years cooperative development has been on a vast scale in this country. According to the "Canada Year Book" in 1942 membership in the organizations from coast to coast was in the neighbourhood of 561,000 persons, and besides this there were over 600,000 patrons. In that year cooperative associations conducted business on a large scale, totalling in all over a quarter of a billion dollars. These associations embraced consumer cooperatives for the sale of petroleum, food and clothing in some 1,722 different organizations.

In the case of fruit cooperatives, largely located at the Pacific coast, stores were operated which provided fertilizer, barrels, boxes and spray materials for the growers, while on the western plains cooperatives handled fuel for tractors, feed and household needs.

In Saskatchewan a great producer cooperative operates for the marketing of grain, namely, the Saskatchewan wheat pool, which has a membership exceeding 125,000 persons. Other producer cooperatives include poultry, live stock and dairy products marketing. Indeed, cooperatives of this type are found in almost every province of Canada. To meet the needs of farmers for low-cost fuel, a cooperative oil refinery operates in the city of Regina and its record to date has been most encouraging.

On the coasts of Canada, both west and east, fishermen have banded together in some 67 associations. I believe that figure is up considerably now, because my figures are taken from the Canada Year Book for 1942. In these 67 associations there were some 5,000 members banded together for the purpose of processing and marketing their fish.

In the province of Quebec cooperative enterprise takes on a somewhat different form. There the credit unions have been most enterprising and on the whole most successful. Loans have been provided by these unions at interest rates considerably lower than those provided by the small loan companies, and profits are distributed to members in the form of patronage dividends.

Throughout Canada, in 1942, $137,000,000 in loans was provided by these cooperatives to the people, who in many cases would not have been able to obtain these loans elsewhere. That is the point which I wish to make most emphatically.

In order to provide fire insurance to farmers at low cost, some 150 farmers' mutual fire cooperatives are now functioning. In 1942 these organizations had risks valued at more than a billion dollars.

Finally I should like to refer to cooperative enterprise in the province of Nova Scotia. The hon. member for Cape Breton South is occupied this morning in the industrial relations committee and is unable to participate in this discussion. In Nova Scotia the British Canadian Cooperative Society of Sydney Mines was born because of the great need of the folk of that area during the depression years. It has been an outstanding success. The people have remained loyal to the principles of cooperation. Several stores now handle groceries, dry goods, meats, and men's wear, things the people who work with their hands must have. The society operates a bakery, a dairy and a tailoring department. Legislation which interferes with such development strikes deep into the lives of these people. There are many other hundreds of cooperatives, including group life insurance, which were born during the depression when thousands of people had to relinquish high-priced line company insurance policies. Cooperatives dealing with hospitalization operate in most of our larger cities. Rural people have set up cooperative telephone systems in places where private enterprise failed to provide them with that much needed communication service.

The scope of cooperative enterprise is vast. People in low income brackets were not only forced to group themselves together to sell their products most advantageously, but also to enable them to purchase consumer goods to the very best advantage. And now this resolution is presented to the house. In spite of what the minister says, cooperatives are of the opinion that the adoption of this proposal will restrict their activities and the general effect may well damage the whole cooperative movement.

There is a fundamental difference between a cooperative and a non-cooperative enterprise. Obviously the government does not recognize this difference in the resolution now before this committee. Differences were recognized in section 4p of the Income War Tax Act, and unless they are recognized now it will have a serious effect upon the cooperative development generally. Section 4p has been repealed, and so far as I can determine there is nothing specific to replace it. I am pleased to note, however, that the government is prepared to accept the representations which have been made by cooperatives and members of the house that there should be some differential between the treatment of members and non-members. The extension of the time for the payment of patronage dividends from six to twelve months is also an alteration in the resolution which commends itself to all cooperatives. However, I believe a longer period than twelve months will be much more acceptable. It has been suggested to me that twenty-four months would meet with the approval of all cooperatives.

If I understand the minister correctly, the revolving fund will be permitted to revolve even though set up subsequent to 1941. But the legislation before us will make it almost impossible for cooperatives to outlive a depression of any length of time. The cooperatives should have power to limit the amount paid out to ten per cent of the total in any one year, and in times of crisis to be able to suspend payments of patronage dividends entirely. If this resolution is adopted, members of cooperatives will not be permitted to use their own money in operating the business unless interest of at least three per cent is paid on the capital, or an alternative tax is paid on an equivalent amount. This, in effect, forces the cooperative into the position of a profit enterprise, and is contrary to the non-profit principle set up by the Rochdale pioneers. If individuals wish to place their money in the cooperative, interest free, they should have that privilege. Interest free loans were not uncommon during the war when the government was in grave need of money. After all it is the people's money, and this restriction on their use of it in cooperative enterprise without expecting interest should be removed.

I wish to place on the record a letter and two telegrams protesting against this proposed legislation. These telegrams and letters were received from cooperatives. One comes from the Saskatchewan Credit Society Limited of Regina. I shall read the resolution which was passed on July 26:

That this board urge most strongly that parliament adopt the recommendations of the royal commission on cooperatives with respect to the taxation of credit unions, including federations of credit unions whose membership may comprise other credit unions, cooperative associations, parishes, school districts and other similar bodies.

The first telegram comes from the Cooperative Union of Saskatchewan, and reads as follows:

Cooperative Union of Saskatchewan strongly urges first cooperatives be exempt three years from commencement of operations. Hardship to many new cooperatives if three year tax exemption confined to those organized after 1946. Second, exemption of retained patronage dividends if withdrawals subject to discretion of directors to protect cooperative; third, exemption of medical housing rural telephone electricity cooperative desired.

The second telegram comes from the cooperative association of Riceton, Saskatchewan, and reads as follows:

Our cooperative association and credit union urge that all new cooperatives be allowed three year tax exemption; that allocated dividends be exempt if stated reasonable term for payment announced; that federations of credit unions be included in same category as unions; that hospital, housing and electricity cooperatives be included.

In conclusion may I draw the attention of the committee to resolution 17 on cooperative movements which was passed by the united nations conference on food and agriculture, held in the United States in 1943, and attended by forty-five different nations. Section 3 of resolution 17 reads as follows:

The democratic control and educational programmes, which are features of the cooperative movement, can play a vital part in the training of good democratic citizens, and assist in inducing a sound conception of economic matters.

It is my hope, and I am sure it is the hope of every cooperative, that nothing will be done by this parliament to destroy the movement which plays such an important part in developing sound democratic citizenship, and which has done so much to create a better understanding of the economic life of our nation.

Mr. KNIGHT: There are two things which I like particularly about cooperation. The first is that it teaches men to help themselves, and the second is that it gives them an interest and a stimulus in helping each other. I am pleased to note that the government is showing a greater disposition to be fair to the cooperative organizations throughout the country. With its finger on the public pulse—and no one will deny it has that—it has sensed a growing resistance throughout this country toward legislation which would be unfair to such institutions. So I believe the minister is to give consideration to our representations, with a view to reviewing the whole situation before presenting the bill. True, the three per cent provision in respect of capital remains, but such excellent expositions were given on this subject by my colleagues from Dauphin and Cariboo that I shall be content to leave the record as it is.

Perhaps I should apologize for the observation I intend to make to-day, because of the simplicity of the matter which has come to my mind as a result of the question asked by the hon. member for Calgary West. At page 3960 of Hansard the hon. member said that the minister would first have to define a cooperative, and that then he would have to tell what profits are, and also what patronage dividends are. The committee may be disappointed in what I have to say, because I believe every hon. member could answer those questions, and none more ably than the hon. member for Calgary West. However the issue has become so much confused, and the propaganda of the enemies of cooperatives so widespread, that I believe it would be wise to answer the hon. member's questions.

He has said that when he drives along the road in his automobile he comes to two little stores. He sees a sign in the window of one store and another in the window of the other. He goes into the store the sign of which he likes best, and there makes his purchase. He says there seems to be no difference in the operation of the two stores, and I take it he assumes there should be no difference in the treatment they receive at the hands of the taxing powers of the country. In what I shall say I shall ignore the large cooperatives, including the wheat pools, and shall confine my remarks to the small stores on the corners, as described by the hon. member.

First of all, the little store with the cooperative sign in the window meant nothing to the hon. member. He saw only a sign. Although it meant nothing to him, to me it means years of organization in that district. It means a protest against conditions as they were, and an attempt on the part of the people to do something about it. To me it means people gathering in meetings and, perhaps after repeated failures, electing a board of directors to look after their interests, and appointing a manager to run their store.

One would say that the stores are identical in appearance and in operation. They sell at the same prices. But here is one point I would call to the attention of the committee: The retail store has nothing to fear from the cooperative, as I know it. The enemy of the retail store is the same enemy as confronts the cooperative. Cooperatives have never cut prices. They have sold at the regular rates charged by retail merchants. They get their cut-back in patronage dividends. They do not interfere with the retail merchant in any way; nor will they, unless by unjust taxation they are compelled to cut their prices to a point where they will have practically no patronage dividends. It will be a sad day for the retail merchants of Canada when that takes place. If those merchants were wise they would not fall for the submissions of such organizations as the Income Tax Payers' Association.

To come back to the two stores: I am not a business man, but I would ask the committee to take note of the selling prices of the cooperative store which, for purposes of clarity, we shall call store A. The selling prices of that store are made up of three factors, the first of which is the original cost of the goods, the second the expenses in connection with the operation of the store, and the third the overcharge.

For the moment we shall leave store A and turn to store B, which is a cooperative but which operates in exactly the same way. Its selling prices consist of the original cost of the goods, the cost of operating the store, and the overcharge.

One will ask what the difference is. In reply one could say that a cooperative institution is an organization in which one finds a number of people who want to buy a certain article for a dollar. They find that by banding themselves together they can make the purchase for ninety cents. Would any sane man say they should be taxed upon the ten cents they do not pay for the article which they have been able to buy for ninety cents through the process of joining together? One would say that that is self-apparent, that it is oversimplification. I admit it is simple, but the actual process is just as simple as the description I have given.

What is the difference between the two stores, or the two processes of merchandising, which I have described? The whole difference lies in what is done with the overcharge. And by making an explanation of that I hope to answer the question of the hon. member for Calgary West when he inquired as to the meaning of profit and of patronage dividends.

Let us return for the moment to a consideration of store A, with its cost, expenses and overcharge factors. The overcharge of store A is paid back into the pockets of Smith, Jones and Thompson, who bought the goods and paid for them on the understanding that they were charging themselves a little too much with a view to holding something in reserve and taking care of the expenses in the operation of the store. So that overcharge returns to the pockets of those individuals who in the first instance paid money for the goods. This much is clear.

On the business done in store B all the overcharge paid by Jones, Smith and Thompson goes into the pocket of Brown, the owner of the store. In the first instance I believe one is using a misnomer when he refers to patronage dividends paid back to the people who originally made the purchases. In other words that money disappears; it goes out of the picture; it is no longer there as an overcharge. It is that part which was paid in excess when the purchaser bought his goods from store A, and has been returned to such purchaser. On the other hand in the purchases from store B the overcharge goes from the pockets of all the purchasers I have named to the pocket of one man. This in simple language is I believe the definition of profit.

The minister will say that he is not going to tax such organizations, and of that I am glad. But I believe it is time someone, for the benefit of those who may be confused, should lay down facts as simple as those I have set forth.

The hon. member for Calgary West asked for the definition of a cooperative. In that connection I would bring to the attention of the committee a matter which I have already discussed with the minister's department and to which I received an answer. It has to do with a medical aid society which operates a branch in my city. I should like to have it defined as a cooperative which would escape taxation. This society has a large membership in the three prairie provinces, and is made up of employees of the Canadian National Railways. Its purpose is similar to that of other medical societies, namely that of providing surgical and medical care, in this instance, for the railway workers and their dependents. Why should there be any doubt about this organization being tax free? When the society was organized there was no suitable legislation then in force in Saskatchewan under which it would come and they had to organize under the insurance act. It is a non-profit organization, and we feel that it should be free of income tax levy. What would be the status to-day of such an association? The royal commission on taxation of cooperatives paid some attention to these non-profit making organizations. The recommendation No. 9 of the commission report reads:

> That associations incorporated or registered under provincial cooperative legislation, or incorporated as a cooperative under dominion authority, for the purpose of providing telephone services, distribution of electric power, or medical and hospital services, be exempt from income and excess profits taxes.

It will be noted that the legislation must be cooperative. At the time of the inauguration of this Canadian National employees association, although it is mutual and cooperative in nature, they were unable to register under a cooperative act. Although it has been overlooked, we are satisfied it was the intention of the commission to recommend that all such societies or institutions should be tax exempt. Can the minister tell us what would be the status of an institution of this kind?

Mr. ABBOTT: Offhand I would think that an organization of that kind would probably not have income within the meaning of the act and consequently would not be subject to tax. The question is a technical one, and I should like to take time to look into it. Perhaps I can give my hon. friend a more definite answer when we are on the bill.

Mr. STIRLING: I have had great difficulty in finding out just how this legislation will apply to the various cooperatives in the riding I represent, of which I suppose there are thirty or forty. Some are consumer cooperatives, there are producers' cooperatives, there is an egg producers' cooperative, a seed growers' cooperative, but the great majority are fruit and vegetable shipping houses. They receive produce from the farmer and they estimate that it will cost a certain number of cents per package to grade, pack and prepare for shipment. If it is found at the end of the season that they have deducted more than enough for that purpose they rebate to the producer so many cents per package. I think that could be described as being the simplest form of cooperative. Of course there is no profit.

This organization, in order to assist its members, may set up a store which sells feed, seed, tools, groceries and all sorts of things. Here again it endeavours to buy as economically as it can and sell as economically as it can, and at the end of the season it may be in position to make rebates, or possibly they would be termed patronage dividends to members and non-members alike.

From what the minister said in amendment two or three days ago I understand that the rebates or patronage dividends paid to members will be allowed as a deduction, but a deduction from what? This organization is occupied principally in handling and packing the farmers' produce, and it is only as a convenience for its members that it sets up the store. It surely cannot be conceived that the target amount of three per cent on capital can apply in this case, where but a small portion of the capital of the cooperative is tied up in the store which it runs.

I find it hard to ascertain what the three per cent really means. Am I right in assuming it is the amount which shall be considered to be taxable if the cooperative makes a profit and if, after deducting the patronage dividends paid to its members, it has left a comparatively small sum of money which is profit? We agree that a cooperative which makes a profit is taxable under this legislation, but is it to pay a tax up to three per cent of its capital when only a small part of that capital is used for the business which produces a small profit?

Mr. ABBOTT: I will see if I can explain it. The assumption is that the cooperative which my hon. friend has described, which might be both a consumer cooperative and a producer cooperative, has certain employed capital, that is, it has certain capital tied up in buildings, machinery, equipment and perhaps as working capital of some sort. This being a small cooperative it may have from $10,000 to $15,000 tied up in that type of asset. The legislation proceeds on the assumption that capital as such earns a return qua capital. If I have $15,000 and I put it into victory bonds, I get three per cent. If I have $15,000 and I put it into real estate, I get the rental. If I am a business man and I invest $15,000 in plant and equipment, I get a return on that capital as distinct from the return I get from my business acumen and other aspects of my trading venture. If a cooperative employs $15,000 of capital—I am using that as an example—and has that much income, it is considered as earning three per cent on that $15,000. That three per cent of $15,000 will be considered as taxable income and subject to tax. The whole kernel of this three per cent proposal about which there has been so much discussion is that capital is considered as producing a reasonable return, whether it is in a cooperative, in a grocery store, in a factory, or anything else; and it is suggested here that three per cent on that capital is a reasonable return. I do not know whether I have made myself clear, but I have tried.

Mr. STIRLING: I gave an illustration of of what I conceived to be a true cooperative, that is, a business which receives the farmers' produce, grades it, packs it, prepares it for shipment, and sells it. There is no profit, because any excess over and above the cost of that work is returned at the end of the year. I understand from the minister that three per cent of its capital would be subject to tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not if it operated on the basis my hon. friend suggests and returned everything at the end of the year. A cooperative of that type would have no profit out of which it could pay interest on capital. A great many cooperatives will not have earned three per cent on their capital; if their operations are conducted in such a way that they do not have a taxable income, then the three per cent rule just would not apply. My hon. friend has cited what to me appears to be a combination cooperative, a consumer cooperative and a producer cooperative. It is perfectly true that for the producer cooperative the result may be no taxable income on that end of its operations, whereas on the consumer cooperative end there may be a profit. If you combine the two, some of the so-called profits on the consumer end of the operations may be income available for this three per cent return on invested capital.

Mr. STIRLING: In this instance we agree that the purely shipping house is a true cooperative and that there is no profit.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not use the term "purely shipping house." It may so conduct its operations that it will not have a profit.

Mr. STIRLING: Now I will cite the case of such a cooperative, and we will say that eighty per cent of its business is in handling the produce of the farmer, but it wishes for the benefit of these farmers to set up this store. It employs but a fraction of the capital of the association, and surely it cannot be right to set up that as a figure on which taxation can be levied, three per cent of the total capital. Can it not be three per cent of that portion of the capital used for the purpose of setting up the store?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think my hon. friend is right, but I must reiterate that if the cooperative, for its own convenience or for reasons of its own, combines its producer and consumer functions, and if it has what is taxable income within the meaning of the act, then to the extent that it has capital invested in its general enterprise, three per cent on that capital must be considered as the return which the cooperative orgainzation has earned on invested capital. There has been a lot of talk that it should be perfectly free to members of cooperatives to lend money to a cooperative without interest. That is quite true. They are free to do it. That is their privilege. But the organization as such must be deemed to have earned a return on that investment, and that applies to any organization that has invested capital. I know it is a little confusing.

Mr. STIRLING: Take as an illustration this association whose primary business is the handling of the produce of fruit or vegetable growers. Such associations have their annual meeting in the winter, and the directors of the association put it to their members that they deduct from any moneys coming to the growers in the coming year the sum of money required as working capital, a levy, if you will, in the form of so many cents a package or so many cents a box. In that way it sets up what practically amounts to what is called here a revolving fund, although that is not the term we use in the Okanagan valley. I take it that that sum certainly is looked upon as the growers' own money and is in no sense a profit and therefore is not subject to tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct. I gave that answer to the hon. member for Fraser Valley the other night. If there is an agreement that so much per box or per barrel or per quart of milk shall be deducted for that purpose, my hon. friend is correct. But that cannot be determined solely by a resolution of the directors of the cooperative. The member himself must agree that there shall be so much deducted per box of apples or whatever it may be.

Mr. STIRLING: He must agree—what does that mean?

Mr. ABBOTT: Sign a contract, or send a letter to the association, the other contracting party.

Mr. STIRLING: Signifying his agreement?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, and the other contracting party is the cooperative association.

Mr. BENTLEY: The minister has left me a little bit confused. He was not consistent in his statement. He said in reply to the hon. member for Yale that if the organization pays out all its surplus in the way of dividends it has no income and is not taxable.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not say that. My hon. friend was citing a type of cooperative which operates in British Columbia, where the growers enter into a contract with the cooperative whereby they get an initial advance and authorize the cooperative to hold back so much per box of apples or per quart of milk, which they get back at the end of the season if the money is not needed.

Mr. BENTLEY: Even in that case you are going to insist on applying this clause, "except that portion of such payments as would if deducted leave the taxpayer with an income less than an amount determined by deducting from three per cent of the capital employed in the business." That is to apply to the capital equipment.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right. Some of the cooperatives may have substantial capital equipment which will not earn income within the meaning of the act, and against which three per cent could be allocated. That will probably apply in the case of a great many cooperatives. I think a lot of the cooperatives are crying before they are hurt. I think a great many of them will find that this three per cent rule will not apply.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am not clear on that, and I should like to have an authoritative statement on it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am doing my best. I say again what I said the other night, that the process of trial and error is the best way to demonstrate how this will work. Admittedly it is a very complex question, and I can only do my best to explain it.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am going to give an example close to home. In Swift Current we have a cooperative association in which some people hold at the present time more capital shares than others, but we are gradually working to the point where all members will hold exactly the same number of dollars of shares, perhaps $10 per capital share. That is to provide the facilities we require for the distribution of our supplies and services. We have 1,500 members now, and hope to reach 2,000 in the next year or two. Then we shall have 2,000 members each with a capital share of $10. I can see no earthly reason for forcing us to pay ourselves three per cent on that $10 of capital equipment. It only means extra bookkeeping for us, and does not do the government any good. All it does is to make trouble for us. But it does establish one thing, and that is the government's determination that interest must be paid on capital, even if you are paying it back to yourself. If the reason for that can be made clear to me I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is to be no compulsion to pay three per cent on the figure my hon. friend mentioned. If there were 2,000 members in the cooperative, that would presume $200,000 invested capital in plant and equipment. If that cooperative operates in such a fashion that it has no taxable income, there will be no three per cent on the $200,000 which will be considered as subject to tax. It might operate in that way. I think it would be within its power to do it if it operated as the hon. member for Yale suggested. But if it does not, if it operates in the ordinary way in which an association ordinarily operates, without any contract with its members to deduct a certain amount per box or per barrel and then refund it at the end of the year, it may end up the year with, let us say, for the sake of example, a profit of $10,000. It then proceeds to distribute the final patronage dividends. During the year, let us say, it has paid an instalment patronage dividend, but after it gets its accounts closed at the end of the year it finds it has $10,000, after estimating as closely as it could what it could pay out. Three per cent of $200,000 would be $6,000, and therefore of the $10,000 there would be $6,000 which would be considered as subject to tax, and $4,000 which it would be free to distribute in any way it saw fit. The $6,000 would be subject to tax at the present rate of 30 per cent, which would be $1,800, so $1,800 would be deducted from the $10,000, and the balance of the $10,000 or $8,200, would be distributed as a final patronage dividend for the year and the balance would have been paid as tax.

Mr. BENTLEY: The minister is getting a little closer to it, but—

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I should add that if by any chance the cooperative had borrowed money, if it owed money and had paid interest on it, the interest on the borrowed money would be offset against the three per cent to which I made reference.

Mr. BENTLEY: The minister mentioned the possibility of a $10,000 profit. That $10,000 profit would be the amount of money that was not allocated, under the terms the minister suggested to us the other evening and again to the hon. member for Yale in reply to his question. That would be unallocated money which remains in the hands of the cooperatives and for which there is no authority from any member to withhold to his account; or would it be in some other way that the profit would arise? There is no place for a profit to arise in this cooperative, even the $10,000 the minister suggests, because we do not make estimates at the end of the year after stock taking and the auditor's report; our managing force and directors must provide an exact statement. There is no residue, neither $10,000 nor one dollar, after the allocation of the dividend is declared. The only amount held is what we have agreed to by resolution of the meeting. Now the minister is going to insist that we have an individual authorization of our board of directors to withhold it. We will not quarrel with that now—that is only another way of getting the authorization; but there cannot be any $10,000 or any other amount, so where will the profit arise?

Mr. ABBOTT: If my hon. friend has paid out only what are contractual obligations—and I emphasize that word "contractual"—there will not be any income. Perhaps I had better quote what the minister said on that point in his budget speech, Hansard, page 2921, because it brings the point out fairly clearly:

> The first step in determining the tax liability of a cooperative or any other company will therefore be to compute its taxable income in the ordinary way. In this computation the cooperative or company will continue to be able to claim as an expense payments that are found to be enforceable obligations of the cooperatives and not profit-sharing distributions. Having determined its taxable income the cooperative or company will then be able if the proposed amendment is adopted to deduct distributions in proportion to patronage paid out of income in that year subject to the limitation I have outlined above.

[Mr. Abbott.]

So that if my hon. friend's cooperative operated on the basis of paying out only contractual obligations to its members and patrons during the year and ended up the year with no income, the three per cent rule simply could not apply.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am to understand, then, that the profit of an organization will be only that part that is not exigible by the members in any circumstances, and therefore three per cent of the capital employed will be taken from that, and become taxable—

Mr. ABBOTT: Not exigible under a valid contractual obligation.

Mr. BENTLEY: Not exigible under a rule or contract, or whatever the law prescribes. Then it will be the unallocated reserve which will be liable to income tax?

Mr. ABBOTT: I would have to say, not necessarily.

Mr. BENTLEY: What other place could it come from? That is the point I am trying to get at.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not clear what my hon. friend means by "unallocated reserve". If he means what is left over after they have met their contractual obligations for the year—yes.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): This becomes more confusing than ever. I had an idea that this was the theory of rent and investment income, but I suppose that is not so. Will the minister explain the situation with respect to the pool elevators? I understand that their elevators and all that system are recognized as capital; are they to be assessed on three per cent of these capital assets, or is it just the amount of money which is involved in their business for the year? What is the situation with regard to all their capital assets, including their elevator systems?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that the patronage dividends declared by the pools are not contractual obligations in the sense in which I have referred to them. They are profit-sharing distributions.

Mr. BENTLEY: Oh, well; that is all wrong. I do not know where the minister got that understanding.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not an expert on the way the pools operate, but I am told that that is what the Department of Justice has ruled.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Is it clear that none of these capital assets, such as pool elevators, are to be assessed?

Mr. ABBOTT: If the pool elevators or any other elevator has capital invested, and it earns a profit within the meaning of the income tax act, the first item taken out of that so-called profit will be 3 per cent on its employed capital. It will be considered that that investment will have earned a return before the member is entitled to a rebate on the price of his product. That is the essence of the thing, I think, and it seems to me that that is eminently fair as between cooperatives or any other type of enterprise, as between the consumer cooperative which is on one side of the street and the corner grocery on the other side of the street.

Mr. BENTLEY: But pool elevators have not an investment in anything.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend appreciates that a pool may have a separate legal entity in the same way that a large number of cooperatives are incorporated; they are a separate legal entity from the individual members. The McDougall commission recognized that unanimously; there is no question about it. I think we must accept the principle. My hon. friend shakes his head. There may be a difference of opinion, but I think the majority opinion is that we must accept the fact that they are a separate legal entity, and proceed on that basis.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I find it very difficult to understand this resolution. It seems to have been drafted in a way that cannot be understood either by those who are for the cooperatives or those who are for the Income Tax Payers' Association. Certainly in my experience I have never seen a section drawn so incomprehensibly as is this one. I am sure the acting minister will take no praise for having drafted it; and it will be difficult to ascertain just who did draft it. The minister has had to resort to the explanation of the Minister of Finance on the budget in order to elucidate what apparently he himself is having difficulty in understanding—and I am not saying that in any derogatory sense at all. But would it be possible for the minister to let the committee have a copy of the bill in so far as it will implement this section?—because if the bill is no clearer than this resolution, litigation will be the order of the day.

As I understand it, a cooperative exists for the express purpose of giving service at cost and without profit. But as one reads this section, and I am saying this in the most cooperative spirit, it is meaningless. It may be understood by those who will be administering it, and they may place their interpretation upon it. But surely a committee of parliament, men in all walks of life with all the dissimilar points of view that are being expressed here, have the right to ask the minister to bring down a resolution that we can understand and that will not be subject from time to time to different interpretations. Certainly the minister's point of view will not be the interpretation placed by the courts on any section based upon this resolution.

May I ask the minister a question in regard to a cooperative I referred to when I was speaking on the budget itself—the Davidson Cooperative Association. This has been a true cooperative giving service over the years, to such an extent that during 1945 it did business just slightly under half a million dollars. The directors have been dividing up any surplus by way of patronage dividends, subject to this condition. When a member is entitled to a patronage dividend, until he has earned a credit of $20 he may not draw that dividend. It becomes part of a reserve fund placed to his credit, and may be withdrawn on request at any time he withdraws from membership in the association. In other words, it is held as a trust fund to assist in the purchase of goods and in the assurance of credit at any time the member withdraws, when he is entitled to that $20. Would that now be subject to tax?

Mr. ABBOTT: Listening to what my hon. friend has said, I should think it would be allocated. I should think it would come within the terms of the resolution, though I would have to look at the particular regulation.

I know the hon. member has had to be elsewhere in the last day or two when we were discussing some of these resolutions, but I have pointed out on previous occasions that it is necessary that some of them be worded in fairly general terms; one cannot be as specific as one is in the legislation itself. The resolution covers not only cooperatives but similar payments in other concerns in accordance with the McDougall commission's report. A number of matters which the minister dealt with in his budget speech and which I have been discussing here do not need to be dealt with by specific legislation. They can be dealt with under the provisions of the income war tax act as it stands to-day. It was felt desirable, however, that as part of the whole plan there should be a clear statement, or a statement as clear as it can be made, as to how some of these various matters would be dealt with.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: So there is really no change in the law except for the three per cent.

Mr. ABBOTT: There will be, yes. My hon. friend will see when the legislation comes in that there will be a change in the law, particularly in view of the statement I made on Friday that cooperatives may deal with members and non-members on a different basis, which is of course different from the original proposal based on the recommendations of the McDougall report. I do not think the resolution is quite as badly drafted as my hon. friend would indicate. It is broad in its terms, admittedly.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Was not that always the law, the principle which the minister has just enunciated? What changes are being made?

Mr. ABBOTT: The most fundamental change is that we are making patronage dividends deductible from gross income for the purposes of taxation, which the Department of Justice stated was not the case when it gave its opinion in 1943. That is the big change, which the Minister of Finance referred to as a great victory for cooperatives. That is the big change that is being made in the law, and it is a pretty important one, I can tell you.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There could be no "victory" until the courts had so determined, and as a matter of fact, while the members of the Department of Justice did give that opinion, the government apparently did not regard the opinion too highly.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I ask whether patronage dividends paid in shares are subject to the tax?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think they are deductible, yes. They will be income in the hands of the recipient, the same as if they were in cash.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: And subject to taxation.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: In our province we are compelled by law to have a ten per cent reserve. I do not know about the other provinces, but I should like to know whether that ten per cent is subject to taxation.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that if the ten per cent reserve is beyond the amount required for depreciation and bad debts, it will be an unallocated reserve, considered subject to the tax.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I understand that in British Columbia if the amount is less than $100,000 a reserve of ten per cent must be set up. There are certain special rules, I presume, under a statute governing some cooperatives. The normal reserve in the province must be ten per cent, but in some cooperatives, owing to the capital structure, ten per cent is not sufficient.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would have to look into that question and give an answer later. I am not clear what the ten per cent is on. Perhaps the hon. gentleman could enlighten me on that.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I understand that in the province of Quebec the provision is five per cent. Ours is ten per cent, fixed by statute, and I cannot see why, when a provincial law compels a cooperative to set aside that reserve, it should be subject to taxation.

Mr. ABBOTT: If that amount were in excess of what is allowed under the dominion income tax law for depreciation and bad debts, it would be taxable. Presumably under the provincial law the ten per cent is for one or other or for both those purposes, and I should not think it would be beyond what is allowed in the dominion law. But if perchance it is beyond what is allowed in the dominion income tax law, to the extent of the excess it would be taxed. It would not be taxed up to the amount allowed by the dominion income tax law.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Another point that affects us is this. We have certain odd amounts left over as we make our normal payments, and we put these odd amounts into a fund. Would that be subject to taxation? Suppose the amount were $750.

Mr. ABBOTT: It would be subject to the same rule. If the ten per cent amounted to $1,050, if that did not go beyond the permissible limit under the Income War Tax Act, in respect of bad debts and depreciation, it would not be taxable. If the $50 ran them over $25 it would be taxable, I suppose, to the extent of $25. The governing factor would be the permissible reserve for depreciation and bad debts under the Income War Tax Act.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They are not permissible; they are mandatory under the provincial law and not subject to taxation.

Mr. ABBOTT: They are not subject to tax except to the extent that they may exceed the permissible reserve under the dominion income tax act.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If the provincial law specified that it must be a certain amount, why should it be subject to taxation? I do not care whether it comes under the dominion income tax or not. If the provincial legislation allows them that right, why should we penalize the members of the cooperative who had nothing to do with the legislation here, and who operate under provincial law?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think the answer to that must be that it cannot be within the power of any province to defeat the purpose of the federal income tax law, which must be a law generally applicable to all of Canada. Therefore so far as that law is concerned the various provincial governments should bring their legislation into line, or if they do not, if they impose a condition for depreciation and bad debts along the line we have been discussing, then the excess amount would still have to be considered taxable income for the purposes of the dominion act, but only to the extent of the excess; otherwise, as my hon. friend will see, it would be open to provincial governments pretty well to defeat the purpose of the Income War Tax Act. I do not mean to imply that we are saying to the provinces that they must bring their legislation in line with ours. But I do wish to make it clear that if their reserve requirements were greater than those permitted under the dominion law, the dominion law would apply and the excess would be taxable.

Mr. WRIGHT: Has the minister or his department any estimate of what this tax would return to the government on the basis of the cooperative business done in Canada in 1945?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, we have not any estimate of that.

Mr. WRIGHT: In my opinion it would not be a large sum of money. I believe there is a basic difference between the thinking of the members of this group and the minister on this subject. This tax contravenes the cooperative principle, namely, that a cooperative is a non-profit making organization. The minister has accepted the McDougall report. That report says that cooperatives are profit-making organizations. So far as the cooperatives are concerned the report was unsatisfactory because it contravened that principle. The cooperative movement in Canada has grown out of the needs of the people over the past twenty-five or thirty years. Little groups of people here and there in every province have themselves tried to solve some of their economic difficulties. They used the cooperative method to do it.

I agree that across the dominion there are many cooperatives formed which are not true cooperatives. That was natural. We had no legislation either in the provinces or in the dominion to guide the various groups which formed themselves into these organizations. Gradually some of the provinces developed cooperative acts which define a cooperative within provincial jurisdiction, but we have never had a dominion act which would unify cooperative practices across the country. It is because of the lack of an act to do that that we find ourselves in our present position.

The hon. member for Lake Centre said that this is a controversial resolution, that it is not clear. I do not think that it can be clear under our present set-up; I do not think we can ever have a clear position in this matter until we have defined what is a true co-operative, and when we have done that any cooperative which can come within that definition should be considered a non-profit organization and its capital or any part of its money should not be taxable. These organizations are groups of people mutually joined together to do business with themselves, to use their own money. That money is taxable in the hands of the individual, and by making it taxable in this way we are simply imposing double taxation on that money.

There is a second point which is important so far as the cooperatives are concerned, namely that it is going to make it difficult for them to expand. I believe that is the purpose of the resolution.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, it is not.

Mr. WRIGHT: It will mean that if they build reserves, which are necessary in any business, whether it is individual or otherwise, the reserves will become taxable. Reserves are necessary to expand. You must have capital for expansion. If those reserves become taxable it will make it more difficult for these mutual organizations—I say "mutual" when they come within a specific definition which states what is a cooperative—

Mr. JUTRAS: Does the hon. member mean that a cooperative should be defined as such, or its operation? Would he define a co-operative itself, or the operation of the cooperative?

Mr. WRIGHT: The cooperative as such. Its operations will be included in it. We must have a definition of what is a true cooperative. We shall not have satisfaction under this or any other legislation until we do that. For the life of me I cannot understand how the government is to interpret resolution 16, which allows a cooperative a three-year exemption from taxation. Co-operative will have to be defined.

Mr. ABBOTT: "Incorporated or registered under provincial cooperative legislation". That is the definition.

Mr. WRIGHT: The government is transferring the responsibility of defining a cooperative to the provinces instead of our accepting the responsibility here. That is a poor way for the government to do business. It is going to accept what the provinces may define as a cooperative. One province may define a cooperative in one way and another province in an entirely different way. I do not think that will be satisfactory so far as this legislation is concerned.

I wish to repeat that this section contravenes two cooperative principles, namely, that a cooperative is a non-profit making organization, and that it will prevent, I am positive, the proper expansion of true cooperatives in Canada. Because of that I think the resolution should be withdrawn.

Resolution stands.

Progress reported.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move, with the unanimous consent of the house, and only with unanimous consent:

That the three resolutions standing in my name as notices in the annex to the Votes and Proceedings of this day be now proceeded with, notwithstanding standing order 45.

I move this in order to have complete discussion, as was agreed upon last week, by the various parties in the house.

Mr. BRACKEN: I have no objection to that procedure.

Motion agreed to.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF VARIOUS RESOLUTIONS—INTRODUCTION OF BILLS

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolutions:

SUPERVISORS WAR SERVICE BENEFITS

That it is expedient to present a bill to provide financial and other benefits for certain persons who were attached to and served with the naval, military or air forces of Canada, outside the western hemisphere, during world war II, as supervisors in the auxiliary services.

FIRE FIGHTERS WAR SERVICE BENEFITS ACT

That it is expedient to present a bill to provide financial and other benefits for certain fire fighters who served outside the western hemisphere during World War II, as members of the corps of (civilian) Canadian fire fighters.

VETERANS REHABILITATION ACT (UNIVERSITY GRANT)

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Veterans Rehabilitation Act by authorizing the minister to make, with the approval of the governor in council, grants to universities supplementary to those by the act authorized, to assist in meeting the expenses incurred in training veterans.

ALLIED VETERANS BENEFITS ACT

That it is expedient to present a measure to provide rights, privileges and benefits to and in respect of veterans of world war II domiciled in Canada at the time of joining the forces of allied nations, and to the widows and mothers of such veterans as died in service or subsequently but before they had received such rights, privileges and benefits in full.

PENSION ACT AMENDMENT—ENLARGEMENT OF SCOPE AND APPLICATION—REORGANIZATION OF COMMISSION

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Pension Act to provide for extended payments of pensions to veterans and their dependents as therein set out; to provide further for reorganization of the commission and for the salaries and duties of the chairman, deputy chairman and other members of the commission and generally to enlarge the scope and application of the act.

SPECIAL OPERATORS WAR SERVICE BENEFITS ACT

That it is expedient to present a measure to make applicable, the allowances and benefits accorded to a veteran, to certain persons described as "special operators" who were enrolled in Canada by United Kingdom authorities for special duty during world war II, under the Veterans Land Act, 1942, the Veterans Insurance Act, the Veterans Rehabilitation Act, part I of the War Veterans' Allowance Act, 1946, the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, the Department of Veterans Affairs Act, the Civil Service Act, the Pension Act, the Income War Tax Act, the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act, and the War Service Grants Act, 1944.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT, 1946

That it is expedient to present a bill to make provision for the payment of allowances to or in respect of veterans of a prescribed age and veterans permanently unemployable or incapable of self maintenance through physical or mental disability and widows and orphan children of veterans. Provisions of the bill apply to veterans of the North West Rebellion, the South African war, world war I and world war II. Provision is made for establishing a war veterans' allowance board to administer the act and for the payment of the salaries of the members and pensions on retirement.

VETERANS BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONAL LOANS ACT

That it is expedient to present a bill to authorize payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of losses, within the limitations therein provided, to banks incurred in respect of loans made to veterans resident and domiciled in Canada who have received or are entitled to receive a gratuity under the War Service Grants Act, 1944, and who have not elected to take benefits under the Veterans Land Act, 1942. Such loans to be confined to the purpose of establishing the veteran in business or professionally. Provision is also made for the payment of the necessary expenses of administration out of moneys appropriated by parliament.

VETERANS REHABILITATION ACT AMENDMENT

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Veterans Rehabilitation Act, whereby provision is made, inter alia, that the Minister of Veterans Affairs may,

(a) provide Canadian universities with moneys to enable them to make, as an emergency measure, small loans to veterans attending universities and also to pay expenses of repatriation of certain veterans discharged in the United Kingdom in order to take training outside of Canada and to pay transportation expenses of the wife and child of such veterans from the United Kingdom to Canada or other designated place outside of Canada;

(b) provide training and re-training and pay allowances to a pensioner requiring such training by reason of an increase in his disabilities.

Provision is also made for entitlement of a member or former member of the Canadian forces to the statutory allowances and benefits in respect of all of his full-time service, if he is not accepted as a member of the permanent or regular force, or is not accepted for service for a special prescribed period; also for bringing a veteran suffering personal injury by accident when in training under the Government Employees Compensation Act.

WAR SERVICE GRANTS ACT AMENDMENT

That it is expedient to amend the War Service Grants Act, 1944, to make provision inter alia (a) for the full payment of the statutory supplementary gratuity of a member who has joined the permanent naval or military forces or the regular air force or who has been accepted in the interim force, notwithstanding that he may have been required to accept pay and allowances at lower rates than were issuable to him or on his behalf immediately prior to the date of his joining the permanent or regular force or his acceptance in the interim force; (b) for a reestablishment credit for a member who does not elect to take benefits or training under the Veterans Land Act, 1942, or the Veterans Rehabilitation Act; (c) for a reestablisment credit to the widow or mother of a member who dies after discharge; (d) to permit a member to use his credit for the reduction or discharge of indebtedness on his home where he has already reduced such indebtedness.

CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES ACT

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to give statutory authority to a group of Orders in Council passed during the war conferring pension benefits on various classes of persons other than members of the armed forces and further to confer pension benefits on certain additional groups.

VETERANS LAND ACT AMENDMENT

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Veterans Land Act ,1942, to provide a change in the status of the director so as to integrate the administration of the Act more closely with other departmental activities administered by the minister and to provide authority for the director to contract with a veteran for the sale to him of land and improvements, building materials, and live stock and farm implements to a total cost to the director of five thousand eight hundred dollars upon the terms and conditions of payment therefor and in respect thereto contained in the said bill and regulations to be made thereunder.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of these resolutions, recommends them to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. BROOKS: Is the minister dealing with only the first three he mentioned?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): It was my intention, Mr. Chairman, with the consent of the committee—and only with that consent—to deal with all twelve measures in a short, concise statement. Then, by consent of the house, I would move them on to the second reading stage, at which time my hon. friend or any other hon. member would be free to adjourn the debate, to criticize or to commend as they might feel desirable.

The CHAIRMAN: With the unanimous consent of the committee, it is suggested that all the resolutions be considered, and that one motion be passed covering all of them.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN: Is there unanimous consent for that procedure?

Mr. BROOKS: On behalf of the Progressive Conservative party I would say that this matter was discussed by the steering committee, with representatives of all parties, and we agreed to the procedure now suggested by the minister. The agreement was on the understanding that when these bills came before the house on second reading there will be every opportunity for debate.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is quite correct.

Mr. BROOKS: With that understanding we are in agreement.

Mr. BENTLEY: The same understanding exists in this group.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the house that I report these resolutions?

Mr. BROOKS: Was it not the minister's intention to make a statement at this time?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Perhaps I might have permission, Mr. Chairman, to give a concise, synoptic and factual statement of what the committee on veterans affairs has recommended, and what the government is prepared to accept, so that hon. members at second reading stage may have the opportunity of making such comments as they may deem advisable.

For the convenience of hon. members, and after consultation with other parties, I have decided to ask the indulgence of the committee in order that I may present in one concise, composite statement the entire programme of veterans' legislation. I have received the kind consent of the house, and having that consent, I purpose discussing the twelve measures with respect to which resolutions have been introduced. Eleven of these stand in my name, and one in the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). With the kind indulgence of the house three of the resolutions have been moved forward this afternoon. These resolutions relate to the civilian war pensions and allowances bill and bills to amend the War Service Grants Act and the Veterans Land Act.

All twelve bills have been considered by the special select committee on veterans affairs. I wish at this point to pause to say that for thirty years I have been in parliament and have watched committees function. I want to pay a tribute—an entirely non-partisan tribute—to the finest committee of the House of Commons of Canada I have ever seen in action. That, sir, was the veterans affairs committee. We have had our contentions, and probably still have more of them; we have had our controversies; we have had occasional animadversions; but I never saw a more devoted band of loyal gentlemen in my life. Indeed, if I were in charge of decorations and awards—which I am not—I would recommend them all for the Canada medal. They did a grand job—a wonderful job. We disagreed at times, of course. There were times when we did not go as far as some of my hon. friends, like the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), or the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) would like to have gone. But I think the work has been a wonderful work. The committee has written a veterans' charter for Canada, and for that work it will have the eternal gratitude of the veterans of this country. It will have the gratitude of a nation for the work it has done.

Ten of these bills have been recommended by the committee as such. With respect to two of them the committee has made recommendations; but the bills as introduced by the government are not completely in accord with the committee's recommendations.

These bills, and two which have preceded them, together with possibly one or two others standing in the name of other ministers, will be incorporated in the veterans' charter to be compiled. It is my intention to issue a veterans' charter, with the names of the sixty members of the committee on the front page, and to send it to every veterans' organization in the Dominion of Canada.

Five of the bills covered by the twelve resolutions to be discussed in this statement are amending bills. One is, in effect, an amending bill, but the amendments were so numerous that a completely new consolidation and revision is being presented.

Six of the bills are new legislation so far as this house is concerned. Four of the six new bills, however, deal with legislation which has already been in effect for some time by order in council under the War Measures Act. Nine of the twelve bills represent, to a substantial extent, the ratification by parliament of legislation enacted by order in council under the War Measures Act. Three of the bills are entirely new, and in almost all the bills, which are either amending bills or for the purpose of giving parliamentary sanction to orders in council, some new principles have been incorporated.

This body of legislation affects not only the veterans of world war II but the veterans of world war I, the veterans of the South African war and of the northwest rebellion. It affects Canadians who served in the forces of other members of the British commonwealth and in the forces of nations allied with His Majesty. Provision is made with respect to eleven different groups of persons who rendered loyal and hazardous service in world war II, although they were not formally enrolled in His Majesty's forces.

This statement will be exceedingly concise. I shall merely enumerate under the heading of each resolution or bill the principal enactments which are proposed without explanation or argument.

The first bill to which I shall refer is that covered by the resolution which I now move. It introduces a bill to amend the Pension Act. This bill with the one exception to which I shall refer later, is in exactly the terms recommended by the select committee. It consists of thirty-two sections and it affects all the veterans of any and every war in which Canada has participated.

The principal features of the bill are as follows:

1. The insurance principle, about which many of us have fought, including the hon. member for Vancouver South, which is restored.

Mr. GREEN: At last.

Mr. MACKENZIE: 2. The benefits of the Canadian pension scale are extended to all Canadians who served in the forces of the British commonwealth or of allied nations.

3. The pensions payable to dependent parents, in cases where a widow is also pensioned, are doubled.

4. The salaries of the pension commissioners are increased.

5. The duties of the veterans' bureau are expressly defined.

6. The language defining non-pensionable preenlistment conditions has been restricted or narrowed, according to the particular interpretation put upon it.

7. The period for which pension may be paid retroactively has been extended when delay in making the award has been due to conditions over which the applicant had no control.

8. Pensioners entering hospital for treatment of their pensionable disabilities will receive their pensions during such periods of hospitalization.

9. Blinded pensioners, on entering the department's institutions for custodial care, shall continue to receive the helplessness allowance by which pension in such cases is augmented.

10. Widows who have obtained divorce or separation decrees from their pensioned husbands may when pensionable as widows be granted pension rates higher than the alimony awarded by the courts, at the discretion of the commission.

11. Canadians who served in the ranks in the imperial forces during world war I are to receive the full benefits of the Canadian Pension Act as the act may have been amended subsequent to the agreement of 1920, by which the government of the United Kingdom agreed to pay to such veterans the Canadian scale.

12. The principle of equal pensions for women, as for men, is adopted.

13. The datelines of pension eligibility for wives, widows and children of world war I veterans have been advanced from 1930 and 1933, so that all wives married and children born prior to May 1, 1944, are included.

All the foregoing amendments were recommended by the select committee.

I want now to pay a tribute to the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes). In addition, the government, in deference to opinions expressed by many members of the committee but mainly advocated by the hon. member, has broadened the provision regarding the eligibility of children. The bill provides that children born of marriages contracted prior to May 1, 1944, even though the birth is subsequent to that date, shall be eligible. I think my hon. friend was the one who advanced that before the committee.

Next is the war veterans' allowance bill. This measure, while essentially an amending enactment, takes the form of a completely new, revised and consolidated bill. It is for the most part a submission to parliament of amendments adopted during the war by order in council. The bill will come before the house exactly as recommended by the select committee. It covers the veterans of four wars, and it incorporates into the act the widows' allowance measure approved by parliament in the appropriation act of 1943.

The bill is in three parts. Part I refers to veterans; part II refers to widows of veterans, and part III refers to what has formerly been known as the dual service pension.

The principal features of the bill which are new to this house are as follows:

1. Women veterans are made eligible at the age of 55, the same as widows.

2. It increases the basic allowances from $20 single and $40 married, to $30 and $60 respectively, thereby permitting the allowable income to be calculated on the higher figure. The small pensioner, eligible for the allowance, is thus permitted a materially improved standard of living. A single person may have a total income of $640, and a married person $1,130.

3. Six items are added to the lists of types of income not deductible from allowances.

4. The value of the veteran's home permissible without deduction from allowances is raised from $2,000 to $4,000.

5. Salaries of the commissioners are increased.

6. Several amendments have been made in the interests of children. First, step-children, adopted or foster-children are included within the definition of "child." Second, allowances may be paid with respect to children during their educational period up to the age of twenty-one years instead of nineteen as it is now. Third, allowances with respect to handicapped children may be paid beyond the age of twenty-one.

The bill to amend the Veterans Land Act is exactly as recommended by the select committee. Its principal provisions are:

1. Assistance may be given to tenant farmers, and to farmers holding land under agreement for sale.

2. Former soldier settlers in default of their contracts are permitted to qualify under the Veterans Land Act, if they have served in world war II.

3. In conformity with the long established principles of responsible government, the minister is made responsible for administration of the act.

The next is the bill to amend the Veterans Rehabilitation Act. For reasons well known to the select committee, there are two bills amending this act. The first bill authorizes the government to make grants to universities, not exceeding $150 per student veteran, to enable the universities to provide the additional premises, equipment, staffs and services required to meet the extraordinary increase in enrolment, arising out of educational benefit provided for veterans under this act. The resolution covering this short bill was placed on the order paper, in advance of the other proposed amendments as an assurance to the universities that the government accepted responsibility for this proposal. Once the government had accepted the principle of the bill the universities felt justified in proceeding with their financial arrangements.

The second bill to amend the Veterans Rehabilitation Act contains a number of amendments which had not been fully dealt with by the select committee at the time the first bill was introduced. This second bill has now been recommended by the committee. Its principal provisions are:

1. The government is authorized to advance money to universities, for the purpose of making loans to student veterans, under regulations. It is contemplated that loans shall not exceed $500 per year—or $2,000 in all. Applications will be dealt with by boards of senior faculty members with representation from the Department of Veterans Affairs.

2. Veterans accepted for vocational training but not able to enter upon their training on account of lack of facilities or the necessity of conforming to entrance dates may receive out-of-work benefits while waiting, and the receipt of such benefit shall not count against the time for which benefits are otherwise available.

3. The minister is granted power to make regulations regarding the extension of university training beyond a period equivalent to the length of the veteran's service.

[Mr. Mackenzie.]

4. Recipients of educational and vocational training benefits shall not be eligible for the benefits of the Veterans Land Act, with certain minor exceptions in the case of agricultural training.

5. Disabled pensioners who may acquire retraining as the result of their disabilities may receive such training at any time without sacrifice of their reestablishment credit.

6. The periods of service upon which benefits under this act may be based and the dates at which service shall be deemed to have ended are specifically defined with respect to veterans who enter the interim or permanent forces. The definitions and cut-off dates are identical with those in the War Service Grants Act.

7. Veterans in receipt of vocational training who may be injured as the result of such training shall be eligible for compensation under the Government Employees' Compensation Act.

Now I come to the bill to amend the War Service Grants Act. This bill is exactly as recommended by the select committee, except for a minor amendment to section 4. Its chief provisions are:

1. Supplementary gratuity payable to a veteran who upon joining the permanent force reverts to a lower rank shall be calculated on the basis of the higher rank that he held before reverting.

2. For the purpose of calculating gratuities and credit in the case of veterans who join the interim or permanent forces, the dates at which service counting towards gratuity shall be terminated are defined in the terms of an order in council promulgated early this year. The dates are the same as those in the bill to amend the Veterans Rehabilitation Act.

3. Widows and dependent mothers of veterans who die subsequent to discharge without having exercised all their reestablishment credit rights may receive the balance of the reestablishment credit to which the veteran was entitled.

4. The uses to which reestablishment credit may be put are expanded in relation to the building of a house under the National Housing Act and in relating to the retirement of debt arising out of encumbrances on the veteran's house.

Now I come to a new piece of legislation that was recommended by the committee, the veterans business and professional loans bill. This is an entirely new piece of legislation. Its purpose is through a government guarantee to enable a veteran to borrow from a chartered bank a sum up to $3,000 at five per cent interest for the purpose of acquiring a business, an interest in a business, or the tools, implements or equipment of a trade, business or profession. The loans depart from ordinary bank practice in the Bank Act in that: (a) the maximum interest is fixed at five per cent; (b) the taking of security on land is authorized; (c) the period for repayment may be extended to ten years. Loans may not exceed two-thirds of the expenditure upon the purpose for which the loan is granted. The maximum of loans subject to the guarantee is $25,000,000. The guarantee is in the form of a blanket guarantee to each individual bank, at the rate of twenty-five per cent of any loss incurred on the first million dollars lent by such bank, and at the rate of fifteen per cent on loans in excess of one million dollars by any bank.

Next is the supervisors war service benefits bill. This bill has not been specifically recommended by the select committee. It was considered by the committee, which recommended that supervisors be granted exactly the same rights as former members of the forces. The bill provides that they shall be with respect to their overseas service on a par with former members of the forces with the single exception of income tax exemption. The subject of income tax has already been debated in this house on the budget resolutions.

I come next to the fire fighters war service benefits bill. This bill has not been recommended by the select committee. The committee made a recommendation that members of the Corps of (Civilian) Canadian Fire Fighters for Service in the United Kingdom should receive the same rehabilitation benefits as former members of the armed forces. The government did not concur fully in this recommendation. The bill confirms the following benefits already granted by order in council: Gratuity on the same basis as veterans with regard to overseas service; rehabilitation grant; the Veterans Land Act with respect to pensioners. Additional to the benefits conferred by order in council the bill will grant all former members of the corps who served overseas the right to vocational training, and will allow their overseas time to be calculated under the Unemployment Insurance Act the same as for veterans.

Next is the civilian war pensions and allowances bill. This bill substantially represents the recommendation of the select committee but with slight variations, which will be explained as I proceed. Its purpose is to confer the right to pension upon certain groups of persons who rendered valiant service in the war but who were not attested as members of His Majesty's forces. With respect to the following groups, the bill is in the terms recommended by the select committee:

1. Merchant seamen.
2. Commercial fishermen.
3. Auxiliary services personnel.
4. Canadian overseas fire fighters.
5. Royal Canadian Mounted Police.
6. R.C.M.P.—Special constable guards.
7. Air raid precautions workers.
8. Potential recruits sustaining disability while undergoing treatment in the care of the Department of Veterans Affairs for the purpose of removing disabilities which debarred them from enlistment.

The draft bill as recommended by the select committee included also civil government employees incurring death or disability as the result of enemy action or counter-action. Upon consideration the government was not satisfied that this was the appropriate method of providing for the pension rights of these government employees, and this group is not included in the bill. The opportunity for further consideration of the most appropriate method of providing for this group is desired by the government. I can assure the house, however, that this does not result from any desire or intent to diminish in any way the rights which civil government employees acquired under the order in council which provided for their pension entitlement. The government has been assured by its legal advisers that no rights already conferred will be lost as the result of deferring legislative action with regard to them. All the civilian groups to which I have already referred were covered by order in council, and the parts of the bill recommended by the select committee referring to these groups follow the terms of the orders in council with exceedingly minor variations.

The select committee also recommended that five other groups be accorded pension rights in this bill, but did not pass upon the actual terms of the legislation now to be introduced with respect to those groups.

One group recommended by the committee has not been accepted by the government, and is not included in the bill. This group consists of former members of the Pacific Coast Militia Rangers. No claims have arisen from members of this organization and it would seem unnecessary, therefore, to include them in the bill at this time.

The four groups included in the bill upon the committee's recommendation, but with respect to whom the committee did not have the opportunity of passing upon the precise terms of the legislation, are as follows:

1. Members of the voluntary aid detachment serving with the Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps in Canada.

2. Overseas welfare workers, which include those who, under the auspices of the Canadian Red Cross Society or the Saint John Ambulance Brigade, left Canada to serve overseas as welfare workers, nursing aides, ambulance or transport drivers, members of the overseas headquarters staff, or in any other capacity.

3. Orthopaedic nurses selected by the Canadian Red Cross Society for service overseas with the Scottish ministry of health.

4. Canadian civilian air crew of the Royal Air Force Transport Command.

The government's proposal in the bill to follow the resolution is that members of the voluntary aid detachment shall be pensionable on the same terms as members of the air raid precautions organization. The scale of pensions for these two groups corresponds closely with the rates payable under workmen's compensation.

Overseas welfare workers and orthopaedic nurses are granted their eligibility for pension on approximately the same terms as merchant seamen.

The civilian air crew personnel of the Royal Air Force Transport Command are granted their entitlement on a basis of need upon very much the same principle as was applicable under the former section 11 (3) of the Pension Act.

Now I come to the special operators war service benefits bill. This bill is exactly as recommended by the select committee. I think the house knows who these special operators were—about seventy men who were taken by External Affairs and who flew over and descended by parachute into enemy areas during the war and did magnificent service. The purpose of the bill is to confer all rehabilitation, pension and other veteran legislation upon these men. There are three others who served in other theatres of war, and they also will be looked after in regard to these benefits.

Mr. BROOKS: I understood there might be some others besides these three.

Mr. TUCKER: It will not be limited to them.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The last one is the allied veterans benefits bill. This bill is exactly as recommended by the select committee. It affects Canadians who served in the allied forces in the event of their returning to Canada, and their dependents domiciled and resident in Canada. The bill is designed to ratify an order in council passed early this year on recommendation of the select committee on veterans affairs which sat in the autumn of 1945, and goes a little further. By the order in council and by the bill, Canadians who served in the allied forces upon returning to Canada, are eligible under: the Veterans Rehabilitation Act; the Veterans Land Act; the War Service Grants Act; and the Department of Veterans Affairs Act.

Owing to the fact that members of the forces of certain of our allies were, in effect, discharged in 1940 when Germany overran the low countries and France, the language of the bill has been sufficiently broadened in comparison with the order in council to ensure that Canadians in the forces of those countries shall not be excluded by reason of the fact that they were unable to return to Canada within two years of their discharge.

In conformity with the War Service Grants Act, widows and dependent mothers are made eligible to receive gratuities and reestablishment credit under the same conditions as the similar dependents of former members of the Canadian forces. The bill provides that any similar benefits received from the country in whose forces beneficiaries under the bill may have served shall be deducted from the Canadian benefits.

I wish to conclude by saying that we shall have our differences in debate in regard to some of these matters, but no committee of the House of Commons ever did a finer job than the veterans affairs committee of 1946. May I say in regard to my colleague and parliamentary assistant that no committee ever had a finer or abler or keener chairman than the hon. member for Rosthern, and even if he be conscripted or bludgeoned into other duties in a far-away province in the near future the veterans of Canada will never forget and the country will always gratefully remember, the work that he has done on their behalf.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mackenzie thereupon moved for leave to introduce twelve bills founded on the resolutions, as follows:

Bill No. 325, respecting benefits to certain supervisors in the auxiliary services.

Bill No. 326, respecting benefits to fire fighters who served in the United Kingdom.

Bill No. 327, to amend the Veterans Rehabilitation Act (university grant).

Bill No. 328, respecting veterans of forces allied with Canada.

Bill No. 329, to amend the Pension Act.

Bill No. 330, respecting benefits to certain persons who were recruited in Canada by United Kingdom authorities for special duties in war areas.

Bill No. 331, respecting allowances for war veterans and dependents.

Bill No. 332, respecting loans to veterans to assist in their establishment in business or professionally.

Bill No. 333, to amend the Veterans Rehabilitation Act.

Bill No. 334, to amend the War Service Grants Act, 1944.

Bill No. 335, respecting civilian war pensions and allowances.

Bill No. 356, to amend the Veterans Land Act, 1942.

Motion agreed to and bills read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall said bills be read the second time?

Mr. BROOKS: Why cannot we get second reading now?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I should be very happy indeed to accede to the suggestion of my hon. friend, but I thought that possibly it might be found desirable by some hon. gentleman, when he sees the actual bills, to move the adjournment.

Mr. BROOKS: The understanding we had in the committee was, I think, that there would be first reading with second reading immediately after, and then adjourn the discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is quite acceptable, sir.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Mackenzie moves that the bills be now read a second time.

Mr. BROOKS: May I object to that? The bills, on second reading, should be read individually, so that if there is any motion to adjourn the debate after that it could be made individually by different members.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is the idea I had, exactly.

Mr. TUCKER: The difficulty is, I suppose, that these bills should be distributed to hon. members before second reading. We have made very good progress and we appreciate it; I think we could have second reading to-morrow.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes; I think that will be better.

Motion stands.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

The CHAIRMAN: The committee is on resolution 12.

Mr. MOORE: I did not intend to speak at any length on taxation of cooperatives, either on the budget or on the present resolution. The reason is that three members of our group before becoming members of the House of Commons were for a great many years members of cooperatives. On the budget resolution, and also on the budget itself, they dealt very ably with this matter, and laid the views of this group before the House of Commons. I do not want to take up too much time in discussing the matter this afternoon, but because I have had a great deal of correspondence in the matter from my own riding, I thought I ought to put myself on record.

As I understand it, the cooperatives throughout this country object to the government's taxation proposals on five main grounds. Just before the house rose last session, I believe it was December 18, the royal commission which investigated this question made its report. That report was studied by practically every cooperative throughout this country, and between the first of January and the first of June of this year they communicated with every member of this house urging them to oppose the taxation of cooperatives. Personally I had about thirty-eight resolutions from different cooperatives in Manitoba urging me to oppose this taxation. When the government brought down its budget proposals, particularly the present resolution, a large number of our members and, I suppose, members of other parties as well, received telegrams and registered letters from various cooperatives urging that we ask the government to reconsider some of their suggestions with respect to taxation and, if possible, to discontinue entirely the proposal for taxation of cooperatives.

I was particularly interested in the remarks made by the hon. member for Cariboo with respect to this situation. I think he judged the matter rightly when he stated the purpose of the royal commission which investigated this problem some time ago was not to find out if cooperatives should be taxed, but how it would be possible to apply taxation to the cooperatives. I think that is a true statement of the situation.

In the communications I have had on the matter, cooperatives in my district and elsewhere in Manitoba are worried because the government ignores the basic difference between a cooperative business and a private business. They contend that we fail to recognize the difference between business done on a cooperative basis and business done on an individual basis.

Their second objection is this. Cooperatives are treated, according to government legislation, as private businesses. The government's resolution forces cooperatives to treat members and non-members on the same basis. Non-members are entitled under resolution 12 to patronage dividends.

Third, this legislation prevents cooperatives from providing service at cost by forcing them to pay taxes on not less than three per cent of the employed capital. I think that should come in for a little discussion at this time. I presume that means three per cent of the capital employed in the business. There is one question which I should like to ask the minister. Does that mean that the remainder of the revenue of the cooperative is to be distributed as patronage dividends? Suppose a cooperative decides by a vote of its membership to use, we will say, sixty per cent of its income for the expansion of its business; will that sixty per cent be subject to tax under the Income War Tax Act or under the corporation tax act, in the amount, I believe, of about thirty per cent?

Mr. ABBOTT: It would if it were retained in the company for expansion of business. If it were declared as a patronage dividend, and if the member lent it back to the cooperative, no question of taxation would be involved. The essence of it is that a cooperative no more than anyone else can build up capital out of tax-exempt income, in the proper sense of income.

Mr. MOORE: I am glad to have that statement from the minister, because a great many cooperatives have been extremely worried as to what the government's policy would be in that regard. The fourth matter is this—interference with the right of the individual member to leave savings with the cooperative for the provision of further service by forcing payment of cash within six months. That has been extended to one year?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. That point is cleared up. There is no interference. The individual member is perfectly free to leave the whole or a portion of his patronage dividend with the cooperative if he wishes to do so.

Mr. MOORE: Would it not be taxed at three per cent? The fifth question is with respect to retroactive taxation, and I take it that refers largely to the wheat pool. I know it is the wheat pools in my riding that are particularly concerned about retroactive taxation. I submit that for two reasons there should not be retroactive taxation. First, it would be a reversal of the policy declared by the Minister of Finance when section 4 p was enacted, and secondly, cooperators generally relied upon section 4 p as granting them exemption under the Income War Tax Act. In the opinion of the royal commission they were justified in that reliance. Secondly, it would be a reversal of the attitude of the administrative officials for years. When the department changed its attitude, cooperatives were placed in a position of uncertainty which has continued to this time. Until the uncertainty is removed, cooperatives are at a loss to know how to conduct their operations in compliance with section 4 p.

Mr. LESAGE: From what paper has the hon. gentleman been reading?

Mr. MOORE: I have been referring to an article appearing in the Manitoba Cooperator with reference to the first two paragraphs of section 4p of the Income War Tax Act. The wheat pools in Manitoba are particularly concerned about this matter: The set-up of the wheat pools in that province is somewhat different from that in Saskatchewan and Alberta, as I understand it. The pools in Manitoba are operated on a community basis, so to speak, in that the pool belongs to the individual community in which it is located. Since 1942 and 1943 there has been a fear that they would be subject to taxation. The result is that the wheat pools, in Manitoba, particularly, are not certain what their position is with respect to taxation, and they have urged that the whole matter be reconsidered by the government.

There is something else to which the attention of the government should be directed. It is not only the fishermen and farmers that are opposed to the present taxation of cooperatives. I have an interesting letter from the Manitoba trades and labour council dated June 11, 1946. It is a long letter and I am not going to quote it, but I think I ought to give the substance of its opinions. All other members from Manitoba have received this same letter. The trades and labour council goes on record as urging the government to desist from applying taxation to the cooperatives throughout the country, and they also go on record as opposing the taxation of cooperative organizations.

There is only one other item that should be dealt with at this time. Up to the present a great many members have spoken on this subject and, I presume each individual member has been speaking for himself. I think the leaders of all groups should go on record as speaking for their respective parties so far as taxation of cooperatives is concerned. This is too important a matter to be discussed on an individual basis, and I do not think that because one member gets up and speaks in the first person singular he should be regarded as speaking for his party. Every party should go on record and tell the country where it stands with respect to the taxation of cooperatives.

Mr. HLYNKA: Having listened to the discussion of the resolution during three or four sittings of the committee I am still debating in my own mind whether I should reserve my comments for the second reading and committee stages of the bills, or present them on this resolution. In any event I feel I should say a word or two at this point.

I rise chiefly to register my opposition to the remaining two or three objectionable features of this resolution respecting the proposed taxation of cooperatives. Although the Acting Minister of Finance has proposed three minor amendments which remove some of the objectionable provisions of the resolution as it was originally proposed, it appears to me that the most objectionable feature remains. I have in mind the adoption of the principle of imposing taxation on a true and genuine cooperative. I am not so much concerned about the amount of the tax or the rates of taxation; it is the principle that matters.

The minister said that if capital produces a reasonable return it should be taxed. But suppose the capital of a cooperative is made up entirely of the benefits which accrue from business which has been done strictly among the members of the cooperative, and who were in the first place taxed when they received their earnings and of course paid the tax. I should be inclined to think that if the members of a cooperative desire to purchase their requirements through their own cooperative organization in order that their dollars may be stretched as far as possible they should not be taxed on the money which they have saved in buying goods cooperatively, after they have already paid tax on their original earnings.

In the discussion that took place the other day the acting minister did not fully explain the revolving fund, even though hon. members came back to it more than once. I should like to have an explanation. In fact, the minister has made two statements which seem to me to be contradictory in answer to questions by the member for Acadia and the leader of the Social Credit group, the member for Peace River. At page 3945 of Hansard the following appears:

> Mr. Quelch: Are we to understand that if a certain amount is paid out of the revolving fund and a certain amount of new capital is put in, that new capital will be taxable?
> Mr. Abbott: Not unless it increases the fund.
> Mr. Quelch: Then it will not be possible to expand the business without paying the tax?
> Mr. Abbott: That is right.

At page 3950 of Hansard the hon. member for Peace River said:

> Is there not just one limitation to what the minister has just said in connection with the $25 which is kept by the cooperative on behalf of a member—
> Mr. Abbott: And on his instructions.
> Mr. Low: Yes. If that results in a net increase in the revolving fund, does not that become taxable?
> Mr. Abbott: No. I realize that it is a little confusing, but the answer is definitely, no.

I wonder which of these answers is the correct one.

Mr. ABBOTT: Both statements are perfectly correct—no contradiction.

Mr. HLYNKA: I still need some explanation.

Mr. ABBOTT: If my hon. friend will read the rest of my statement on page 3950 he will see that I made a further explanation of the revolving fund.

Mr. HLYNKA: At any rate it appears to me that even if the cooperatives do business strictly with their own members they will still have to pay taxes, provided that they have an income which is taxable. I personally object to the introduction of the principle of the taxation of cooperatives. I concur in the proposition that in fairness to other forms of business, earnings derived from business done with non-members should be taxed.

Speaking on this resolution on July 26 the hon. member for Cariboo in effect said that he would not worry very much if private enterprise were to go out of business. On the other hand there are those in the income tax association who would like to see the cooperatives go out of business. Personally I cannot subscribe to either of these views. I am in favour of both private business and cooperative business. The cooperative type of business and private business are necessary in the economy of a democratic country. Perhaps that is the line which the group to which I belong can draw in contrast to the stand taken on this matter by our friends to our immediate right. When cooperatives do business with their own members who have paid personal income tax on their earnings they should not be taxed. When people get together and decide on buying goods and services in a cooperative way they should not be taxed a second time. They have paid their tax on their original earnings, and if they choose to stretch their dollars as far as possible, why should they not do it? Why should they then be taxed a second time on these earnings, or on the saving which acrues and which makes up the lump sum which may be called capital, and which, as the minister says, will be subject to taxation under the proposed legislation?

I received twenty telegrams from cooperatives representing several hundred members, and also fourteen letters, protesting against the taxation of cooperatives. I also received 271 cards asking me to support the taxation of cooperatives. It is therefore obvious that there are two different views on this matter. Personally I should like to be fair to these two groups, and I should like to see justice done to both private enterprise and to cooperative business. A man who goes into private business and renders to the people a good service should have the opportunity of expanding and continuing his business and further rendering this service. On the other hand, if a group of individuals choose to get together and buy cooperatively in order to remedy their lack of purchasing power, they should have the privilege of buying cooperatively in bulk, perhaps saving a little bit, and at the same time stretching every dollar as far as possible. Once we introduce legislation adopting the principle of taxation on cooperatives I am afraid that if the government decides to raise taxes in the future all it will have to do will be to present the legislation to the house and we shall have higher taxation on cooperatives. On behalf of the people I represent I object to the taxation of genuine cooperatives. I know it is difficult to define what is a cooperative, but the government should present legislation defining cooperatives and at the same time should introduce a cooperative act within the four corners of which all the cooperatives could fall.

That is all I wish to say at this stage. If I have any further remarks to make I believe they can be best made when the bills are presented.

Mr. ABBOTT: During the morning debate there was a great deal of discussion on the three per cent provision of the resolution, and perhaps some confusion. It seemed to me that much of the misunderstanding may be due to a misunderstanding of accounting principles and practice rather than to provisions of the law. It may be that all my answers were not strictly accurate, although I believe they were substantially correct.

I think the situation can best be described in this way. If no legislation were to be enacted respecting the tax status of patronage dividends, cooperatives would be taxable on their income as determined under the Income War Tax Act. In some cases, as I have pointed out, they would have no taxable income. In other cases, cooperatives and ordinary companies would find themselves subject to taxes and would be unable under the ordinary law to deduct patronage dividends as an expense. For example, according to the law officers of the crown the wheat pools would be unable to deduct patronage dividends as an expense of doing business. The proposed legislation, therefore, enables a cooperative or any other company to pay patronage dividends out of income that would otherwise be taxable under the Income War Tax Act, and to deduct such patronage dividends before paying tax. The only limitation is that they shall not be able to distribute their income in the form of tax-free patronage dividends to such a point as to reduce their taxable income below three per cent on capital employed, as set out in the resolution.

In order to illustrate the reasons for the three per cent limitation, I am going to compare the relative positions of two cooperatives, alike in all other respects except that one cooperative has financed itself with the issuance of share capital on which it pays a limited dividend, and the other has financed itself on a revolving fund basis, no interest being paid on patronage dividends declared but not paid.

Taking cooperative A, with a capital of $50,000, represented by shares on which a limited dividend of 4 per cent is paid; it has a surplus in a given year of $5,000. Ordinary dividends to shareholder members amount to $2,000, and patronage dividends $3,000, making up a total of $5,000.

We then take cooperative B, with a similar capital of $50,000, which is represented by a revolving fund on which no interest is paid. There is the same surplus of $5,000, with no dividends or interest paid. Patronage dividends amount to $5,000.

If there were no three per cent rule, cooperative A—the first one I mentioned—which financed with share capital would pay tax on $2,000, whereas cooperative B, which earned exactly the same amount but which financed on a revolving fund, would pay no tax. Yet the only difference between the two organizations is in their method of financing. The members are the same, and the surplus is the same. The three per cent rule, as the committee will appreciate, corrects that discrimination to some extent, although not entirely.

Mr. IRVINE: I wish to correct one point of view expressed by the hon. member of Vegreville. I have no disagreement with his expressing his own view, but he did say I had expressed the view that there was no room for private business. His justification for saying that arose from an interchange between the acting minister and myself during the course of my remarks on the subject. The point under discussion at that time was that if a private corporation requires legislation of this kind for the taxation of cooperatives in order that that corporation may exist, then we can do without it.

Let us look at the recommendation of the commission in this respect. It says that the object is to make certain that the solution finally adopted will not ruin one or the other. Apparently the only way to prevent the ruination of private business in certain communities is by putting on a tax such as that to which my hon. friend has just objected. I say if that is the only way to save them, then they ought to be ruined. That was my view.

I do not say there is no room for private business. If a community wishes to pay a private business a profit for doing their business for them, that is a matter for them. But if another community wants to do its own business and to save its profit for itself, so that it will not be paid out to any other person, then I say it should not be compelled to keep alive in that community an organization which can exist only by taking profit or toll from that community, and to do it at the expense of the cooperative. That is very different from saying that I want to wipe out all private business. There may be room at any time under any system for a certain amount of private business. But I am saying that that private business must not be permitted to exist by imposing a restriction upon a cooperative. That was the argument of the commission, and the argument I used in my interchange with the minister.

Mr. HLYNKA: I do not wish to be unfair to the hon. member, or to place upon his words an interpretation different from what he had in mind. For that reason I should like to place on record the exact words of the hon. member for Cariboo as they are recorded at page 3938 of Hansard:

So what the minister regards as fairness is to try to prevent the cooperatives from entirely swallowing up private business.

Mr. Abbott: Why not?

Mr. Irvine: Why keep the bally thing alive if it is not functioning in the best interests of the common people? If it cannot stand up and carry out its own philosophy in competing with cooperatives, it ought to go out of business.

Mr. Abbott: Compete on fair terms, yes.

I am afraid that in this regard I am inclined to support the minister's view, even though I have expressed the view, and still do, that cooperatives should not be taxed. But when it comes to private business I believe it would be well for hon. members to state definitely whether they do or do not support private enterprise, because we must recognize that private enterprise also plays an important part in the economy of the nation.

In recent months and years we have heard a great deal against private enterprise. I accept the hon. member's statement as to what he had in mind, but I suggest that all groups should definitely express themselves as to whether they are supporting private enterprise and its expansion, while at the same time wishing to see cooperatives expand.

Mr. IRVINE: I do not believe it would be possible for a private corporation successfully to compete with a true cooperative in the same community, unless this parliament or government gave some privilege to the private corporation.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): They are competing in the matter of management. That is all they need.

Mr. IRVINE: They will not be able to do even that, because we have developed and are still developing some able management in cooperatives. While I am on my feet I would add that we have to make up our minds whether we are going to bolster up certain things which have outlived their usefulness at the expense of new developments, in order to try to balance them. That is the principle stated by the commission, namely that of making certain that the solution finally adopted would not ruin one or the other. Well, if the day were afraid of the night and the night were afraid of the day, and this government were to pass legislation to keep them balanced, we should have perpetual and eternal twilight, with neither day nor night.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is expecting too much, even of this government.

Mr. IRVINE: I am not charging the government with trying deliberately to destroy cooperatives. I know the Minister of Finance is one of the most sincere, diligent and competent members of the government. I would not suggest he had any such thing in mind. And I would even add that the acting minister is not far from the same calibre of man.

Mr. ABBOTT: Damning with faint praise.

Mr. IRVINE: But I do say the government is ill-advised in following the recommendations of those who are in direct competition with cooperatives and who find that the cooperative method is making it difficult for them to carry on. As I have said, the reason it is difficult is just this: A community through its cooperative would have no profits, but the savings made from the cooperative effort remain as savings instead of going to a private corporation to help to make up its profits. That is exactly the situation, and the legislation which the government is now discussing is of such a type as to leave no line of demarcation between the private corporation and the cooperative. In other words, it is a hypodermic injection of capitalistic virus beneath the skin of the cooperative.

Mr. McCUAIG: I should like to place before the committee my view with regard to the taxation of cooperatives. It has been contended by the grain exchange and by others who wish to have cooperatives taxed that there is no difference between the line elevators and the cooperatives, since they both handle grain under the Canada Grain Act. But as a cooperator for over thirty years I know there is a fundamental difference. The line elevator companies are in business for one purpose only. They are not set up to do missionary work among the farmers, but rather to make money as joint stock companies—to make all the tariff will bear, all the time. When new railroads were built through the west, and even before the steel reached the different points, there was a frantic rush by line elevator companies to acquire elevator sites; and what a wonderfully remunerative business it was! The line elevators had five shovels which they stuck into every load of grain, namely, weight, grade, dockage, price spreads and service and handling charges.

In connection with weights, it was a common practice to show 200 pounds less on the grain ticket than was recorded on the beam of the scale. As to grades, a man had to take any grade that was offered, the standard excuse being that there was room only for No. 3. The spreads were between three and five cents between Nos. 1 and 2 northern—and I am talking now about 1915, 1916 and 1920, before the cooperative elevators started, and 1923, before the pools started. As I say, there was a difference of from three to five cents between No. 1 and No. 2 northern, from five to seven cents between grades 2 and 3, and from six to eight cents between grades 3 and 4. The wheat board spreads to-day are just about half of that. In many instances there was a loss of 15 to 20 cents a bushel between wagon load and car load lots. This was discrimination against the small farmer, the man with the wagon load, in favour of the man who could sell in car load lots. The pool put street wheat or wagon loads on the same basis as car load lots.

Mr. HARKNESS: What about the United Grain Growers; did they not have a considerable effect on that?

Mr. McCUAIG: Possibly at one time, but in later years they stayed pretty close to their friends the grain exchange and refused to go into the pool. The hon. gentleman knows that.

In the matter of dockage it was a common thing to lose two bushels in excess dockage on a 75 bushel load by the policy adopted by the trade. Because of that method literally hundreds of thousands of bushels were sold by the trade for which the farmer never got credit on his statement.

The pools have reduced service and handling charges by about one-half. All this saving goes into the price the farmer receives for his grain and constitutes a part of his income. It was such abuses as these that forced the farmers to form cooperatives, to come together to do things for themselves. I personally went through all the experiences I have related. I found that when I took exception to those abuses, changing elevators did not help any. The farther down the line I went, the tougher it got. I was a rebel. As I say, the difference between the line elevators and the pool elevators is that the line elevators are in business to make money, while the farmers in a cooperative elevator know that they are going to get service and save money for themselves. Farmers grouped themselves together in a cooperative in order to save money.

In my view the pool elevator is nothing more or less than an extension of the granary on the farm. I joined in building a pool elevator in order to save myself from exploitation—just plain stealing. The money saved by the cooperative method of handling grain is directly a part of the farmer's income. Just as I went into the modern mechanized farming to cut costs so I went into the modern cooperative methods in order to help myself and eliminate excess service and handling charges.

My returns from the cooperative are not based on my share capital, as in line elevator joint stock companies. In the cooperative, one share means one vote. If I did not deliver any grain to the cooperative, my one share would not increase in value, and I would not receive any share in the earnings of the cooperative. Anything over and above the actual cost of handling the grain is either returned to me in the form of excess handling charges, or is used as a reserve to carry on the business or to take care of liabilities, in proportion to my contribution of grain. In either case it would be credited to me as a member. There are 127,000 members who are direct owners of the cooperative wheat producers. As individuals they are liable to income tax on earnings saved, but the cooperative as a whole should not be subject to taxation.

The Saskatchewan Cooperative Wheat Producers now receive over fifty per cent of all the grain delivered to country elevators in Saskatchewan. This is the real cause of the fight. The heyday of the private grain trade is over, because the farmers have learned the hard way. They know what the so-called "farmer's friends" have done in the past and they know what they would do in the future if they get the chance. The grain trade's last bet is to call upon the government to cripple the cooperatives by taxation. Surely, Mr. Chairman, an institution like the wheat pools which have to borrow from $45,000,000 to $50,000,000 must have some reserves. They must put up at least fifteen per cent of their own money in order to get credit. In a year like 1937, with little wheat to handle, the pools kept their elevators open to distribute relief, and provided a great service to rural municipalities. Their deficit was nearly $2,000,000. It was a service that was helpful to the government, because it provided people with the means to live, and kept them off the relief rolls. The line elevators were mostly shut down at that time. We found out then who the government's friends were, who the farmers' friends were and who the country's friends were.

In my opinion a cooperative democracy is the only solution to avert the fast approaching crisis within our capitalist economy. If the government is going to take sides with the people who want to see the cooperatives taxed and crippled and put out of business, then I say the war is on. The British people had the good sense to see the handwriting on the wall. I hope that this government will sit up and take notice.

The Progressive Conservative members to my right have said that the Liberal government is going socialist. I think it can be honestly said that any steps which the Liberal government has taken towards socialism have been brought about by the pressure of sheer cold necessity. I am very glad that the government has had the good judgment to have this whole question of taxation of cooperatives looked into, and I hope that the minister will continue to exercise his good judgment in the interests of equity, justice and liberty.

I have had a number of telegrams and letters which I shall not read, because many of them have been put on the record a number of times, but I would strongly urge the government to place a truly dominion cooperative act on the statute books, and then we shall know where we are going and what we are doing.

Mr. ARGUE: I have two or three questions to ask the minister, but before doing so I want to go on record as whole-heartedly supporting the stand taken by other members of this group in opposing completely any taxation of cooperatives apart from the business which they might do with non-members. It has been said by others in this group that there is something more involved in the taxation of cooperatives than the loss of funds to the government, because within the cooperative movement there is an opportunity for people of all political and religious faiths and of various racial origins to meet on a common plane and work out their problems together.

I have received a number of communications from cooperatives in my constituency, and one which I was exceedingly pleased to get was from Mr. Eugene Bachelu, of LaFleche, president of the French-Canadian cooperative associations of Saskatchewan. Mr. Bachelu is also secretary of the LaFleche Cooperative Association, which is composed of both French and English-speaking Canadians.

There are one or two questions I would ask the minister which have not, I think, been asked at least in this way before. Does the minister believe that any government measure should reflect the desires of the majority of the electors?

Mr. ABBOTT: I will answer that in the affirmative.

Mr. ARGUE: The minister says yes. Then I would ask the minister if he believes that that the majority of Canadians support the present measure for the taxation of cooperatives.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would think so.

Mr. ARGUE: I disagree with the minister. I do not think it is possible for him to show definitely that the majority of Canadians support the taxation of cooperatives.

Mr. ABBOTT: No more than it is possible for my hon. friend to show that they do not.

Mr. ARGUE: I will wager that I can make a better job of showing that the majority of the people who have spoken on this question do not support the government's position, than the minister can do to the contrary.

Mr. ABBOTT: The majority of persons who have spoken on it come from the group of which my hon. friend is a member.

Mr. ARGUE: But there has been discussion of it elsewhere than in this house. I was in touch with various labour organizations and was informed that they have gone on record as supporting the cooperative movement and have asked their members to study and support it. I have a resolution here passed by the Ontario federation of labour, in convention February 10-11, 1945, representing 150,000 workers. The resolution unanimously opposed the taxation of cooperatives and credit unions. That is the voice of organized labour in Ontario. There is a total of 600,000 organized workers in Canada.

I have also a booklet from the Cooperative Union of Canada in which it is stated that at least three-quarters of a million members in their cooperative union or in cooperative associations are affiliated with the Cooperative Union of Canada. There you have the voice of 750,000 people supporting the cooperative movement, as well as the opinion of a large proportion of the working classes who are organized in labour unions. I say to the minister and to the government that if any government measure falls in line with the opinions of organized labour and of the organized farmers, he can take a chance on it that it is in the interest of Canadians generally. I would also say this, that when the government brings in a measure that is opposed by organized labour and the organized farmers through their cooperatives, it is a measure which in my opinion does not represent the opinion of the majority of Canadians.

I would ask the minister another question. Does he believe that any taxation by a government should be based on the principle or belief that the moneys derived from the tax can be better spent for the welfare of the population as a whole in the hands of the government than if left in the hands of the taxpayer?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a long and involved question, but I will answer it in this way. I believe that any system of taxation should be fair as between Canadians, and if a Canadian doing one type of business should pay his share of a tax, a Canadian doing the same type of business in another way should pay his share of the tax. I agree with the commission's statement—I have not the statement before me, but it is to the effect that fiscal measures are a poor way of assisting a particular type or method of carrying on business.

Mr. ARGUE: I do not think any taxation proposals can fit equitably private enterprise and cooperatives, because they are diametrically opposed; they have different objectives. If it is to be taxation based upon the same formula it will not meet the interests of the majority of Canadians. I do not know, and the minister says in answer to another question he does not know, how much money is likely to come to the coffers of the government through this taxation proposal. It may be a million dollars, it may be two or three million dollars; I do not know. But I suggest to the government, while recognizing the need for government institutions to have money, that that one, or two or three million dollars would benefit Canadians generally much more if it were left in the hands of the patrons of cooperatives rather than taken into the government treasury. A cooperative oil refinery was set up in Saskatchewan a little more than ten years ago. Within a few years the price of gasoline, not only to members of that cooperative but to non-members, to all the people within that area, went down from six to eight cents a gallon. The amount of money invested in that refinery at that time was less than a million dollars, and I suggest that the consumers in that area with that million dollars were able to do something which was of greater benefit to the people of that area than if that money or any part of it had gone to the federal treasury. So I believe that, as cooperatives are able to expand throughout Canada, at least during the time when they are combating and overcoming monopolistic interests it is to the benefit of the people that the cooperatives should have all the money possible left with them so that they can complete the job they have undertaken.

We had a long debate in parliament on the 12½ per cent increase in farm machinery. The members of our group thought at that time, and still think, that that increase was not justified. But if we had had a cooperative movement for the production and distribution of agricultural machinery we would not have needed to concern ourselves with the question whether the competitors of the cooperative farm machinery companies were able to increase their prices or not, because the people who saw fit to support and patronize their own cooperative would receive their farm machinery at cost.

We debated, too, this session the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act. Those amendments, it is hoped, will allow the government to deal more successfully with the problem of monopoly and enable it better to break up existing combines. I believe it is a much wiser procedure not to tax any part of the savings of cooperatives but rather to encourage and if necessary sponsor them, because cooperatives are the best assurance in the world that combines will be broken and that they shall not be formed in future to the detriment of Canadians.

A good deal of consideration was given by this government to the problem we are likely to be faced with in another two, three or four years in the way of unemployment, depression and deflation. I was sorry to hear that the government, at least for the time being, has abandoned its social security and its public investment programmes.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is covering the waterfront here, with cartels and unemployment programmes. I hope he will stick as closely as possible to the terms of the resolution.

Mr. ARGUE: I thank the minister for his interjection. I was just going on to say that cooperatives are the instrument that prevents deflation, and when we are considering the taxation of cooperatives we must consider them in relation to the whole Canadian economy and determine how their growth will react upon the economy generally. The government, according to their own submission, believe that at some time public investment may be necessary. An ordinary corporation at various times has surpluses, which it may decide to distribute as dividends. Often the people who receive those dividends are not in the low income brackets but possess high incomes and do not feel the need of spending that money. Other profits of corporations may be retained as reserves, undistributed reserves, and reserves not used for capital expansion or for the increasing of inventories. That does not apply to cooperatives. If a cooperative retains within the cooperative association part of the savings it has made, it uses it for expansion, and because it spends, employment is provided. If the cooperative does not retain the money, it then pays it out as patronage dividends, and that money in the hands of low income earners is spent and goes into circulation and provides employment. When the government is considering taxation of cooperatives it should not consider it merely from the point of view of what advantage cooperatives may or may not have now as compared with private enterprise, but rather it should consider the whole cooperative movement in Canada, how it affects Canadians at this time and how its growth and expansion may be used to better economic conditions in this country. I suggest to the government that if it wants to do in respect of cooperatives that which is in the best interests of Canadians generally, now and in the future, it will totally abandon any proposals it now has for the taxation of cooperatives.

Mr. COLDWELL: Early this afternoon the minister took as an illustration two cooperative associations, each with a capital of $50,000 and each paying a patronage dividend. In the first case the cooperative paid four per cent on the capital of $50,000, and in the second case the $50,000 in the revolving fund was interest free; and it seemed to me that the minister's argument was that under this legislation they were to be placed on all fours.

Mr. ABBOTT: To some extent.

Mr. COLDWELL: To some extent, yes. As I sat listening to that, my mind roamed over the debates we have had in this house for a long time; I remembered how on occasion I have sat here, as my colleagues have done, and we have had thrown at us the accusation that we believe in compulsion. Of course that is quite untrue; but if ever there was a case of the compulsion of a group of people, here we have one. We have a group of people who organize a cooperative society, public-spirited citizens who say that, for the benefit of themselves and of the institution they are going to build, any funds they put into the capital of the cooperative association shall be contributed freely and without interest for the entire group. We now have legislation which says that before a patronage dividend can be paid by the people who comprise that group they must first of all compute three per cent interest on the capital employed. In other words, we are compelling a group of people to do something which they themselves do not wish to do because they believe it is against the best interests of the organization they are establishing.

As I interjected on the night the budget was introduced, I believe that this provision in the budget in regard to cooperatives is fundamental. We have had a great deal of discussion of patronage dividends; we have had a great deal of discussion of other phases of the government's proposals; and may I say that I am thoroughly in accord with my colleagues who have placed the point of view of this party before the house in this long debate. But if there is one feature of the proposals which, in my opinion, is bad from the point of view of cooperatives, it is this three per cent feature. It strikes at the very basis of the cooperative movement.

I do not think this has perhaps occurred to the minister himself; it may not have occurred to his advisers; nevertheless what the government is actually doing is placing these non-profit organizations on the same basis as profit-making corporations, and as the years go by I can see the arguments of my hon. friends and those across the country who argue that there is no difference between a cooperative and a corporation reinforced by this provision, reinforced because the government is injecting into the cooperative movement something which is really foreign to that movement.

If I were asking specifically for a single provision to be removed from the proposals which the government has made, this is the one that I would choose first, because I think it strikes at the very root and basis of true cooperative movements. I am, therefore, again urging the minister to consider the removal of this particular provision in the budget resolutions. I know that the view I am expressing here this afternoon is the view which is widely held by the cooperative movement. I do not think hon. members have altogether come to a realization of what the cooperative movement really is. If I wanted to place before the committee completely the difference between a private profit-making corporation and a cooperative society, I do not think I could do better than quote the letter which was quoted by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond and the hon. member for Cumberland the other evening, written by the Reverend Doctor Coady of St. Francis Xavier university. That letter placed before the house clearly the fundamental difference between the two. Here is the way in which he actually put it:

> Private profit business and cooperatives are specifically different kinds of business. It is logical to suspect, therefore, that no tax legislation that applies to the former would be applicable to the latter. Violence will have to be done to fundamental principles if this is tried.

That is the point I am trying to make, that you cannot inject into the cooperative movement a provision of this sort, which is foreign to the cooperative movement, without dealing a serious blow at the movement. I do not believe the government desires to deliver a serious blow against it. But I believe that the government has failed to understand the difference between what Doctor Coady speaks of as private business and what he speaks of as the cooperative movement. You cannot inject into one something that is foreign to it and expect the business to prosper.

I have kept out of the debate pretty well because I felt that the ground had been well covered; but I am urging the minister, since I heard him speak earlier this afternoon, to reconsider the position. This is not much of a revenue producer. I do not think it will materially affect the revenue of the government; but it is a material consideration from the point of view of a cooperative society, and it injects into the cooperative something which is entirely foreign to it. In the days to come, when perhaps this parliament has gone and our successors are in our places, just as to-day we are the successors of those who in 1930 introduced amendments to the act, which we are now dispensing with, just in the same manner, I say, some sixteen years later parliament may come back and say there is no difference between a cooperative and a corporation. They both pay interest on the capital employed.

Mr. ABBOTT: They do not have to pay it. They pay the tax if they do not pay it.

Mr. COLDWELL: They must compute taxable interest before they pay patronage dividends, or before they can expand their business.

Mr. ABBOTT: As usual, my hon. friend has stated his point with clarity and conciseness. All the points he has made as to a cooperative differing from another type of business were made at full length before the McDougall commission, and it found unanimously that a cooperative, even a true cooperative, can and does, under certain circumstances, make income which is taxable income. It does, and hon. gentleman opposite realizes that a true cooperative which does business with non-members makes income which is and should be subject to taxation.

Mr. COLDWELL: You are not asking us to agree with all that the McDougall commission says?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, but my hon. friend is asking the government to give consideration to the special character of cooperative enterprise, and all the points he has been making were made fully before the McDougall commission. As regards this three per cent question, we are not forcing cooperatives. This legislation does not force a cooperative to pay interest to anyone; but it does say that a cooperative enterprise which employs capital earns a return on that capital which is in the nature of taxable income, and the McDougall commission acknowledged that a cooperative enterprise could and did earn income which should be subject to taxation. That is the whole point. I agree with my hon. friend; I do not think the tax revenue from this provision will be large because I think it will affect most cooperatives little, if at all. But I say that it maintains a principle which, in my judgment, it is most important to maintain, namely, that when a person in this country, whether it is a cooperative association, a corporation or an individual taxpayer, earns something which is taxable income, then it should be taken into account and a tax paid on it. That is the whole principle here.

Mr. COLDWELL: The difference between the minister and myself is that he is regarding the cooperative as a corporation;—

Mr. ABBOTT: Or an association or an individual.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not.

Mr. ABBOTT: The individual would be in the same position.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not; I am regarding a cooperative as a group of individuals who are doing business with themselves individually.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I rise to support the position taken by the cooperative union of Canada and the various cooperatives that have wired and written me, and the arguments put forward in this debate to which I have listened with a great deal of interest. I refer particularly to the arguments adduced by hon. members to my right. I am not going to repeat these arguments; I support them.

I just wish to make a few observations in connection with this matter and perhaps to bring out one or two points which have been overlooked to date. The government appointed a royal commission to investigate the taxation of cooperatives. That is to the credit of the government. The appointment of the commission has had quite an effect in Canada. I am sure that many hon. members noticed that, when the commission held its sittings new public interest in cooperatives was aroused. I noticed that particularly in British Columbia. The sittings were often attended by quite a large number of people and in addition to that, the press carried extensive reports of the proceedings. That has had a tremendous effect on Canadian opinion and the Canadian people's understanding of the cooperative movement. That is one of the reasons why to-day the government, in its defence of its stand in this matter of the taxation of cooperatives, has to give further consideration to the pressure being put on by the cooperative movement, and to public opinion. We find the fishermen of the maritimes, the French-Canadian farmers, the Ontario farmers, the prairie farmers, the fishermen of the Pacific coast, the fruit-growers of British Columbia and the dairy cooperatives throughout all the provinces have united in their stand against the government's present tax proposals. I submit that in this issue we have had a demonstration of national unity around a principle which goes beyond race, creed or occupation.

As I said before, the government has reacted to the pressure of the cooperative movement. It has bowed to public opinion and has made certain amendments to the tax proposals. Personally I wish the government would go farther, as the previous speaker said, and delete this three per cent proposal. But I understand the government's position. At the last election they received a mandate from the people to operate the free enterprise system. At the same time they plastered the country with slogans about building a new social order. Therefore they are somewhat between the devil and the deep sea in this matter. It reminds me of what a friend said to me on one occasion. He said: "I always look on the Conservative party as a porcupine. It is exclusive, and its bristles are rather inclined to rise if you trespass on its preserves. I look upon the Liberal party as a rabbit." I asked why. He said: "It is always timid when it is facing a new set of conditions." That is what I think this government is at the present time. It does not realize the conditions which it is facing. I might say further that I asked the same party what he thought of the C.C.F.; what animal would he describe them by? He said: "Oh, a beaver, always building."

Mr. ABBOTT: He must have been a member of the C.C.F.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Aside from that, does the government realize that the cooperative movement has revitalized the fishing industry on the Pacific coast, has done an immense amount of good for the farmers of Quebec, has been the cause of building up a dairying industry in this country, has saved the wheat situation on the prairies, has made it possible for the fishermen on the Pacific coast to earn a decent living, has salvaged the fruit growing industry in British Columbia? In doing that, the cooperative movements have actually saved the taxpayers of this country far more money than would be lost if this taxation proposal were removed. I suggest to the Acting Minister of Finance to give this question consideration from the point of view of the value of the cooperatives to the Canadian economy as a whole, on the basis of principle, and the value of the cooperatives in saving the government money.

Mr. KNIGHT: I made my contribution to this debate this morning; but there is one point that I wish to make now, namely, that the Acting Minister of Finance constantly comes back to the fact that the McDougall report was unanimous. The Minister of Finance took the position that this is what the cooperative people and the people of Canada want and therefore the government is giving it to them. I agree that the report was unanimous, but that unanimity was bought at the expense of certain definite reservations. I know that Mr. Arnason, who was a member of that commission, certainly does not believe that cooperatives make a profit. While the McDougall report so states categorically, I want it on the record that that report was just a compromise. The cooperatives' side of the argument was also compromised before the decision was made unanimous. I think that is a clear statement of fact.

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Arnason made no reservations on the point to which my hon. friend is now referring.

Mr. HANSELL: May I also make a little contribution to this debate. My contribution may not be large; nevertheless I consider that it may be valuable; at least I think it is going to be. I rise because I feel in duty bound to say something on the basis that I, too, have received a good deal of correspondence, form letters, cards, briefs, telegrams and private interviews in respect of the whole matter of the taxation of cooperatives. If I were to review the position in which I find myself I would have to say, first, that the royal commission made their report almost a year ago. I believe it was on September 25, 1945, if my memory serves me correctly. Almost immediately there began to flow into my office a number of requests. I found that most of these were printed form cards. I suppose all hon. members received their fair share of these cards. Generally speaking, the cards requested that I should take a stand that private enterprise and cooperatives be taxed on the same basis. I thought those cards should have an answer, and I was not alone in sending out a personal letter to each of those who had sent in these printed cards. I might say, in passing, that I received about 350 of them—more than some members, and not as many as others. I felt there might be such a thing as those who had signed the cards not being completely informed in respect of all that might be involved in the subject.

However, I wrote each of them a personal letter, pointing out one or two recommendations made in the report of the royal commission on cooperatives, and asking for any comments they cared to make in the matter. I believe I am not doing any harm by disclosing the fact that in answer to those 350 letters I received only eight replies. The eight I received showed considerable intelligence, and a number of them were several pages in length. These letters indicated to me that the few who replied had an extensive knowledge of their subject. It is needless to say, however, that only eight replies to 350 letters was disappointing. This all happened after the report of the royal commission had been submitted, but before the budget was brought down.

After the budget was presented, the picture changed to some extent. Then my office began to be flooded with a different type of request. Telegrams and letters began to come in, and further briefs were submitted, all asking me to take a somewhat different stand. It was suggested that, generally speaking, I should remain pretty well within the confines of the recommendations made by the royal commission.

Might I revert to a discussion of those few letters I received in answer to the form card? They were sent to me by small merchants, small businessmen who were operating what would be described as private enterprises. I fancy that many small businessmen would have said many of the things which were said in those eight replies. It was pointed out to me in those replies that the writers were small businessmen such as clothiers, grocers, operators of general stores, and garage operators. They complained that they were being taxed on their meagre profits.

It is all very well to say that private enterprise builds up huge profits, but it must be remembered that that does not apply to all people who are in business under the private enterprise system. Nearly all my constituency is composed of either rural municipalities or small towns, and I found that many of the small businessmen in those areas find it difficult to keep their heads above water. Indeed, had it not been for the war, and a general expansion of credit with more money in circulation, many of them would have gone broke long ago.

Some of these people take this attitude: Why should my small profits be taxed when other individuals who are more wealthy than I am but who are members of a cooperative movement can take advantage of certain advantages which apply to cooperatives but do not apply to me? That is another side of the picture. I do not want it to be interpreted that I am against cooperatives. I cannot possibly be against them, because I cannot bring my mind to the point of thinking that people should not be permitted to get together to cooperate with each other in carrying on business for themselves. The principle of it seems right, to me. For that reason I favour cooperatives, and I want to do all I can to foster the spirit which actuates their formation.

At the same time, there is the other picture in respect of small private businesses struggling in outlying districts. I put in a word for them. Generally speaking, I must support the position taken by the royal commissioners, for I find that most of the briefs sent to me favour that report. There may be some details wherein there are differences of opinion, but these are on matters of administration.

In trying to think my way through the maze of complications surrounding this matter of the taxation of cooperatives, compared with the taxation of private business, I cannot help asking myself why we are really fighting about this matter. I wonder if we have really got down to asking ourselves that question, and trying to answer it. Is there any need to fight about it? I suppose, if we want to attempt to run the country under a restricted system, then perhaps we shall have to fight.

But why do we fight? What is wrong? There must be something wrong or we would not have to fight. Are we short of anything? I know we are not living in normal times to-day; but legislation of this type is not imposed upon the people for a specific year or because of the exigencies of the times. Legislation of this type is put upon the books and will remain there forever or until it is lifted again. It is put on the books because the present administration is operating under a certain financial arrangement. They refuse to move away from the rules and regulations imposed upon society by that system. In normal times we are not short of anything; the only thing we seem to be short of is money. That is why we are fighting over the shortage. We have an industrial relations committee sitting at the present time. What are they fighting over?

The CHAIRMAN: May I ask the hon. member to confine his remarks a little more closely to the clause under discussion?

An hon. MEMBER: Perfect skidding.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not understand what my hon. friend is saying, but I understand what you have said, Mr. Chairman, and I shall try to confine my remarks to the resolution. I want to know why we are fighting over this question of the taxation of cooperatives versus private enterprise. In my opinion, I do not see that there is any reason to tax either. That is my position. In my opinion, the only reason the government would have to tax these people is that it is short of money. To some that may appear to be a good reason, but I cannot understand why we should be short of money when money is a creature of the law.

I want to pursue my illustration, Mr. Chairman, but I am afraid you will call me to order again if I do, and perhaps I should not impose upon your generosity, your fairness and your kindness. Therefore I shall not pursue my illustration any longer. It always occurs to me that we are working under a system where we believe there is only one bone for two dogs. I could never figure out why there is only one bone. Who said there was only one bone? Who put the one bone there? Why did they not put two there? I will not pursue my illustration, Mr. Chairman, because I know it will only aggravate you.

I should like to ask the minister one question and perhaps follow it with another. I want to ask him why he taxes the profits of industry or cooperatives. Why does he do it anyway? I want a satisfactory answer to that. I am not saying that under the present system we can do away with all taxation, but it seems to me that we are going too far. The hon. member for Cariboo passed out a few bouquets to the Minister of Finance. He said he was a most capable individual and had done a marvellous job. All my Liberal friends over there began to pound their desks. Then he went on to say that the Acting Minister of Finance was coming right along in his tracks, and the Liberals patted their desks again. Well, I did not pat my desk. I am not going to applaud any man who attempts to bleed the people. Why should I?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a strong statement.

Mr. HANSELL: That is a strong statement. If the government takes anything from my pocket it is taking something that belongs to me. A union man once spoke to me in terms of "take-home pay", and I said, "What do you mean by 'take-home pay'? Don't you take it all home?" It had not dawned upon him that it was his pay but that he could not take it all home.

An hon. MEMBER: They took it home for him.

Mr. HANSELL: Somebody was confiscating it. I contend that when the government taxes me it is confiscating something that belongs to me. Am I going to applaud a Minister of Finance who confiscates? I am not going to do so. I like the minister because he is a nice fellow. Whenever I go to him with a problem, he hears it and tries to solve it for me. I do not like to be too strong in my statement, but the present system is something like a fellow who goes in to rob a bank and gets away with it because he is respectable. We applaud him and say, "Now, you know you are a fine fellow, you did that so nicely that everybody thinks you are a respectable gentleman." We applaud him.

Mr. BENTLEY: We permit him to go back and do it again.

Mr. HANSELL: The hon. member for Swift Current says that we give him a mandate to go ahead and do it again. I want to ask the minister why he taxes profits. I am not saying there is no place for excess profits taxation. I want to know why the minister taxes. I want to know why he cannot go to our own bank, the Bank of Canada, and say, "I want you to issue me a cheque for so much money and put that down on your books as a debt against the people of Canada." It is our bank and it would be our debt. We would owe that to ourselves and we would pay it to ourselves when we were good and ready to do so, not before. I want to ask the minister why he taxes. I want to ask him why he could not do that with the Bank of Canada.

Mr. ABBOTT: The answer is quite simple: because he does not believe in Social Credit.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not know whether the minister considers that a good answer or not, but it will be on the record so that all the people of Canada may know that he has evaded my question.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am going to be brief on one condition. I am going to ask the minister a question and his answer will decide whether I go any farther.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is that a promise or a threat?

Mr. BENTLEY: It is both; you can take it any way you like according to your nature. After all the debate he has heard and the information he has received, is the acting minister now irrevocably determined to maintain this three per cent clause in the bill?

Mr. ABBOTT: The answer is yes.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am going to tell the committee why I think it is there. A little while ago the minister gave us an example which I expect was well worked out by some of his advisers who have advised him that this three per cent is necessary. I am going to attempt to trace that to what I think is its source. Hon. members will note that the statement says that a cooperative may not pay out its surplus as patronage dividends beyond the point which would reduce the earnings below the amount which would be three per cent of the capital employed. Suppose the surplus does not quite amount to the three per cent. Then there is no dividend to pay out, according to the writing and the reasoning I see there. There is a reason for that. It is directly connected with the wheat pools of western Canada. I have here their brief. I shall not take time to read it, but it definitely states that the Northwest Line Elevator Association made representations to the government asking that the pools be taxed. When I was a boy going to school I was always told, like anybody else might be: Do not interfere with the other fellow's business; stick up for yourself; get all you can in the way of justice—some may say more—but do not run squealing on the other fellow. But the Northwest Line Elevator company—and a letter written by President Lamont of the company to the government accompanies the brief—did run squealing to the government asking it to tax the co-ops. They have been doing that since 1939 and 1940. They started doing this then, and continued to do so during the next few years up to 1942 and 1943.

When the wheat pools were finally told that the justice department at Ottawa felt that they did not come under section 4(p) of the act and might be taxable, the president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool made this statement at a meeting in Saskatoon. He said that if it is the intention or ever becomes the intention of the government of Canada to tax the wheat pools on the money that belongs to their members by virtue of their having saved that money in handling charges and owning their own outfit, then the Saskatchewan wheat pool —and it is the biggest one and the toughest one for the grain trade to handle—will proceed to plan its business in such a way that the member will get his dividend at the time that his wheat is delivered at the elevator and there will be no surplus at the end of the year. So the advisers—and one of them is advising the government to-day and is keen on this and is a good friend of the private grain trade and not very friendly to the pool—have been advising this thing in order to prevent the possibility of the wheat pools of western Canada from adopting that policy.

Mr. ABBOTT: This does not prevent that in any way.

Mr. BENTLEY: It does, the way it is written. It says it must be three per cent on the capital employed, and the capital employed by the Saskatchewan wheat pool is $18,800,000, plus nearly $5,000,000 in a special reserve.

Mr. ABBOTT: It does not matter if they have $180,000,000. If they do not earn taxable income, there would not be any tax paid on three per cent of the capital employed.

Mr. BENTLEY: Thank you. I hope the minister puts it that way in the legislation. It does not say so in the resolution, which reads:

. . . except that portion of such payments as would if deducted leave the taxpayer with an income less than an amount determined by deducting from 3 per cent of the capital employed in the business . . .

If the minister reads that differently from the way I do I wish he would write the legislation so that it will mean the same to me as it does to him.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have already said that I think it would be helpful if members of the committee would wait until they see the legislation. There is also a question of legal interpretation involved. I do not underestimate at all my hon. friend's high qualities. He is as good a speaker as most lawyers I know, but I do not think he has had training in the legal interpretation of statutes.

Mr. BENTLEY: That is quite correct. But I have had a lot of free legal advice since I came to this house.

Mr. ABBOTT: It may be worth just about what you are paying for it.

Mr. BENTLEY: I shall know when the fellows that gave it to me send in a bill. Seriously, however, if the minister will write into his legislation the words that will mean to me what he says he means I will withdraw my objections, but I should like the legislation to mean what he says it means.

Mr. BRYCE: I want to take two minutes, Mr. Chairman, since the minister has already said that the C.C.F. is doing all the talking and I have not done my share. I do not want to repeat what has already been said. But I would draw the minister's attention to the fact that the McDougall commission in their report said that in their opinion the cooperatives were a profit-making business, and it seems to me that this legislation is making that opinion an established fact. No true cooperative will stand for that, and I want to make that clear. I have listened to the leader of the opposition. I know that he knows about the cooperatives back west. He has told us that his group is supporting the cooperatives, and my hon. friends to my left have said that they are for the cooperatives. Members on the other side of the house have written in the public press that they are also supporting the cooperative movement.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have said the same thing myself.

Mr. BRYCE: And then you bring in legislation that is against the cooperative movement.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, no.

Mr. BRYCE: When the minister was answering the hon. member for Melfort this morning he said that he would use the legislation of the provincial governments in order to determine what a cooperative was.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not quite say that.

Mr. BRYCE: You pretty nearly did.

Mr. ABBOTT: I pointed out that under resolution 16 that was to be the test.

Mr. BRYCE: If you take the legislation that is in effect in the provinces, you would have nine cooperative acts. What is needed is a dominion cooperative act, and we shall never get anywhere until we have one. Until that is done, we shall continue to have the unfortunate position of what the McDougall commission said, what the opinion of the Minister of Justice was, and opinion expressed by many different people, but nothing definite.

I am going to appeal to the minister to withdraw these clauses in connection with cooperative taxation until he can bring in a dominion cooperative act so that we may have something definite to go on. This three per cent on capital being held for taxation purposes is perhaps in itself not serious; but it is driving the cooperatives, which are non-profit-making organizations into the profit-making class, and then you can come along next year or the year after and make the tax fifteen or twenty per cent and tax the cooperatives out of existence.

I do not want to take any more time. I have had my two minutes. I feel, within myself—I am not referring to the acting minister or the Minister of Finance—that this legislation is being introduced on the advice of big business to curb the activities and the expansion of the cooperative movement, which has done so much for the rank and file of this country.

Mr. FERGUSON: There has been a lot of discussion, and if most of the members who have spoken on cooperatives would spend their time in advising the government how to cut taxation they would not have to worry about the tax on cooperatives. Under the monetary system that we are using in Canada, we must all make up our minds to the fact that taxes must be paid if the government is to continue to spend large sums of money. I do not agree with these large expenditures, but if they continue to be made the bills must be paid. If an individual makes money, makes a profit, it must be taxed. If private corporations make money they must be taxed on their profits. If a group of men make money, a profit, it must be taxed. Why waste much more time talking about this matter?

Mr. BRYCE: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FERGUSON: You have been on your feet ten times on this subject. This is my first and last speech on it.

Mr. BRYCE: Tell us where you stand.

Mr. FERGUSON: If you will listen you will know where I stand. Listen more and say less. As regards the story told about that porcupine, I heard it once before. But the way I heard it was that the little porcupine represented the Conservative group, very sharp, very solid, and coming to the point very quickly. The same description of the rabbit would apply to the Liberals. But then my friend who was showing me around the zoo came to another animal who, he said, "represents the members of the house who talk too long and say nothing." I asked him what that animal was, and he said, "You must have a bad cold".

Mr. BRACKEN: When this matter was up, I think on Friday last, I asked two questions of the minister. I do not know whether he has been able to get answers to them or not. If he has I wish he would give the committee the benefit of them, and if he has not perhaps he would say that he is unable to get them. Whatever changes the government may have proposed in connection with its first proposal as outlined by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech, it still intends that at least two taxes shall now be imposed on cooperatives. One is the tax on three per cent of the employed capital, and the other is whatever tax is imposed with respect to earnings by cooperatives in the last two years. My first question to the minister was, what is your estimate of the revenue you would derive from the taxing of the three large wheat pools in western Canada, on the basis of this three per cent on employed capital?

Mr. ABBOTT: May I correct my hon. friend? It is a tax on three per cent of employed capital, not a three per cent tax on employed capital.

[Mr. Ferguson.]

Mr. BRACKEN: My words may not have been correctly placed, but there is no doubt as to what the government intends. It means there is so much employed capital, that three per cent is figured on it, that a thirty per cent is taken on the three per cent of the employed capital. What revenue, approximately, would this bring to the government from the wheat pools—the three great cooperatives in western Canada? And what revenue would the proposal of the Minister of Finance in his budget speech bring to the government of Canada on the basis of his plan as outlined in that speech to tax the pools for the years 1944 and 1945? I should like to have those two figures.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that that information is not yet ready, but it will be given.

Mr. BRACKEN: Since the minister has not the answer now, perhaps he would tell me on the basis of one or two hypothetical figures whether my approach to the question is correct. Assuming that these three western wheat pools have employed capital to the extent of $30 million; three per cent of $30 million would be $900,000; the present tax on $900,000 at thirty per cent would be $270,000. On the assumption that $30 million is the employed capital of these pools, this plan would give to the government of Canada $270,000 a year.

Now the minister has not the answer to what the tax would be on these same organizations for the years 1944 and 1945, on the other basis proposed by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech. In view of the fact that he has not that answer, I wonder if he would give me an opinion on this statement, that that tax might amount in two years to a sum between six and twelve million dollars. Would the minister give us some idea as to whether that is approximately correct?

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot give an answer to that second part. I can give an answer to the hypothetical case my hon. friend has raised as to the three per cent of employed capital, if he wishes.

Mr. BRACKEN: I think the minister would say that that was approximately correct.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, but with some important qualifications. The tax might be $270,000, as my hon. friend has suggested, if taxes to that amount were not paid in some other way, such as the setting aside of taxable reserve or tax paid on non-member business; it might come under either head. Provided that the pool organization paid $270,000 in tax either on non-member business or by setting aside taxable reserves, on the figures my hon. friend has mentioned there would not be an additional tax of that amount because of the three per cent provision.

Mr. BRACKEN: What I was getting at is this: the government now, after all these years of studying this question and trying to get a fair system of taxation as between cooperative enterprises and other enterprises, has arrived at a policy for the future. By that policy the government proposes to impose a tax on three per cent of the capital employed, and that would be an imposition on these cooperative organizations of about $270,000 a year.

Mr. ABBOTT: Might be.

Mr. BRACKEN: Might be; probably it would be somewhere near that figure. Now the government is saying with respect to the past, when it did not require the payment of whatever the law demanded, when for many years it did not even assess the pools—it is saying with respect to the past, upon which a test case was before the courts, the proceedings of which were stayed when the royal commission on the taxation of cooperatives was appointed, "We will settle with the pools on that disputed matter if they pay the tax on the original basis for the past two years." My information is that on that basis the tax would be in the millions of dollars, probably between six and twelve million dollars. The point I am making is this, if, after all this work this government has arrived at what it considers wise policy for the future, it will have a difficult time in establishing its own position with respect to the imposition of much heavier taxes for years that are now gone by.

I should like to ask one other question of the minister. Can he say or can he not whether there is any modification of the government's position as outlined by the minister in his budget speech with respect to this tax on these organizations in 1944 and 1945?

Mr. ABBOTT: I made a statement on that question the other day, and if my hon. friend will look at Hansard of Friday last I think he will see how I expressed it. I can turn it up and quote it to him if he wishes.

Mr. BRACKEN: Perhaps the minister could tell me without turning it up.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will read it. I made a considered statement, not a read statement either. It was considered but not read. It will be found at page 3924 of Hansard:

There is a question which has been raised by a number of hon. members in the course of the budget debate relating to what in my judgment has been inaccurately referred to as retroactive taxation. I refer, of course, to the assessments made against the western wheat pools for income tax during the years 1942 to 1945 inclusive. The committee will recall that in his budget speech the minister made an offer to the pools of settlement of these claims. Following the delivery of the budget speech the minister met the representatives of the pools and discussed the question with them. The members will recall that later the minister said that he had had this discussion, and that if it were felt by the pools that the proposed offer of settlement was not fair he was prepared to consider some further adjustment. Following the minister's departure I met the representatives of the pools on Monday. They submitted to me a counter-proposal for settlement of these claims. That counter-proposal is now under consideration by the government, and I simply want to say I am confident that a settlement will be arrived at which will be satisfactory to all concerned, but which I must emphasize, must be fair to all those, including the general public, who are affected. Other than that I do not wish to say anything more at the moment.

Mr. BRACKEN: Does the minister take the position now, which he took on that occasion, that he does not care to say more about the counter-proposal?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have nothing more to add.

Mr. BRACKEN: The minister does not care to let the committee know what the counter-proposal is?

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is an unusual attitude to be adopted by the minister.

An hon. MEMBER: It is quite usual.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is becoming usual with him, but in a matter of such importance I do not see why the committee should not be permitted to know what plans the government has, or at least the nature of the proposal. May I ask the minister this? In regard to settlements covering the period from 1942 to 1945, if the government arrives at a basis of settlement with one of these cooperatives, will the same basis of settlement, the same percentage, be used for all others?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. The basis will be uniform. It should be and will be the same for all.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am glad to hear that, because otherwise there would be available to the minister or the government a discriminatory power that should not be permitted to exist.

Mr. ABBOTT: May I hasten to add that as soon as a settlement is arrived at it will be announced and the exact basis will, of course, be disclosed.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If there is to be equality and the same percentage settlement for all, then I can see no reason why the minister should not reveal what that percentage is or the basis of settlement that is being considered. If the minister does not wish to give information regarding the offer, what is the basis upon which he as minister is prepared to go in order to secure a settlement? Surely we are entitled to know that.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is too good a lawyer not to know that you do not announce the basis of settlement in the middle of discussions. Moreover, you do not announce, before you conclude your settlement, how far you are prepared to go.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This comes back to just what I am beginning to suspect this particular section is. It is a section designed to lead those who are in private business to believe that cooperatives are to be taxed and to lead the cooperatives to believe that they are not to be taxed.

An hon. MEMBER: It is highly successful.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Highly successful, because the usual method of approach by the government is being adopted, namely, silence and refusal to answer questions dealing with the matter.

Mr. ABBOTT: This section has nothing to do with the past.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I know, but it is the only section that deals with the matter of taxation of cooperatives. The rest was merely an ex parte statement on the part of the minister with reference to the attitude he would take in respect of income tax allegedly owing in the past. Possibly the minister, having taken that attitude—and it is not an unusual one of refusal to give information, will answer this question. We meet with that attitude every day, I may say, and we have no power to force an answer. In taking the stand he is now taking, the minister is merely following the best traditional principles of secrecy which the government has followed.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is fundamental in government.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My hon. friend says it is fundamental in government that when the opposition ask for information in the matter of finance, or anything of the sort, no answer shall be given. That, of course, is a new doctrine that would not have been enunciated five or four, or even three years ago. However, that is the general attitude and I will not pursue the matter farther. The question I wish to ask is this: What is the meaning of capital employed in the business? Is there to be a definition?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. There will be a definition in the statute, and that definition will probably be the one which is now used in the Excess Profits Tax Act, which has been carefully thought out and is a very fair definition. Perhaps there will be some modifications; but, broadly speaking, that will be the definition.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: So that we who are not acquainted with it may be able to find it, what is the definition?

Mr. ABBOTT: I will read it, but it is a very long one.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I would expect it to be.

Mr. ABBOTT: The first schedule reads:

1. Capital employed at beginning of period.—For the purposes of this act, capital employed in any year or fiscal period means the capital at the beginning of the said period computed in the manner hereinafter specified.

2. Capital includes.—Capital shall be taken to be the following, subject to the deductions hereinafter provided:

(a) Cost of assets.—So far as it consists of assets acquired by purchase on or after the commencement of the business, the price at which those assets were acquired and where the price of any asset has been satisfied otherwise than in cash, the then value of the consideration actually given for the asset shall be treated as the price at which the said asset was acquired;

(b) Accounts receivable less reserve for bad debts.—So far as it consists of assets being debts due to the person carrying on the business, the full amount of those debts subject to any deduction which has been allowed under the Income War Tax Act in respect thereof on account of bad debts;

(c) Value of assets acquired otherwise than by purchase.—So far as it consists of any other assets which have been acquired otherwise than by purchase as aforesaid, the value of the assets when they became assets of the business;

(d) Amount of money and bank deposits.—The amount of money or bank deposits which are actually used by the taxpayer in the business.

Then there are the deductions.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: To summarize, it covers the assets.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct, assets less deduction for liabilities, depreciation and depletion and so on, except borrowed money. The explanation is set out in the first schedule to the Excess Profits Tax Act.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Can the minister give us an assurance that capital employed will not be construed as including turnover of the cooperatives?

Mr. ABBOTT: I give that assurance readily.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The matter of retroactive taxation is vital so far as the pools are concerned. Retroactive taxation will take into account money which was set aside by the pools for a number of years. It is vital because, as far as the pools are concerned, they have operated their business under the protection of what they thought section 4 (p) gave them, ever since 1930. This will amount to millions of dollars, money which the pools have used in paying off claims on old estates taken up. At the present time patronage dividends are worked into revolving-door plans which will go back eight and even ten years, and probably more. In turning over in his mind the meaning of capital assets and the use of capital so far as the cooperative organization is concerned, I hope the minister will notice the basic difference between that and the money put into an ordinary enterprise for the purpose of declaring profits upon the sale of goods. The cooperative does not place capital into an organization for the purpose of paying profits; it puts it in there to create capital assets out of which the members will have assets from which they can operate their business. Their aims and objects are not to declare profit. That is why we so strenuously oppose the idea that the government is to compel all cooperatives to declare this three per cent. They are not to be allowed to declare and distribute patronage dividends beyond three per cent on the capital investment. It is clear what the government intends to do.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am very conscious of the point which my hon. friend has been making.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It is clear that by this legislation the government intends to compel all cooperatives to declare that three per cent. That is basic so far as we are concerned. This resolution has been placed before the committee, and before it passes we intend to call for a recorded vote. We can see the basic principles of the cooperative movement violated by this legislation, and we cannot permit it to pass without registering our protest. When the bill is before us it will be impossible for us to do so.

Mr. ABBOTT: Why? I made it clear the other night, when we were discussing this resolution, that it could pass on division. I said that to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. When the bill is up for second reading it is open to any hon. member to attack the principle and to suggest amendments.

Mr. KNOWLES: Suggest them only.

Mr. ABBOTT: Obviously, amendments which involve charges on the revenue have to be proposed by a member of the government.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is the point I wish to make.

Mr. ABBOTT: Any amendment which can be proposed here can be proposed when the bill is in committee after second reading.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: We cannot get a vote on it.

Mr. ABBOTT: It can be done in exactly the same way as here. You have three chances.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: We are going to contest everyone of them, and we are going to make our position clear in regard to this matter.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think the C.C.F. party has made it abundantly clear. I have not heard one member who has spoken on that side say that he was in favour of this three per cent clause. It has been made abundantly clear to the country that the party is 100 per cent opposed to it.

Mr. KNOWLES: And a few Liberals, too.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think we can take that for granted.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Let me conclude by saying that when this motion is put we are going to rise and ask for a vote on it.

Mr. FAIR: In the event of the government successfully collecting or extracting some money by way of back taxes, is it the intention to look over the field and see if there is some money to be extracted in the form of back taxes from other firms or organizations?

Mr. ABBOTT: Did my hon. friend ask me a question?

Mr. FAIR: Yes. In the event of the government being successful in extracting some money by way of back taxes from the pools, is it the intention to look over other cooperatives with the purpose of getting back taxes from them?

Mr. ABBOTT: So far as other cooperatives are concerned, I think the minister made it perfectly clear in his speech that what was described as the good faith principle would apply. Where they believed in good faith that they were not liable for taxes no attempt will be made to go back on that. My understanding of the pool situation is that in 1941 or 1942 they were advised that the Department of Justice had given the opinion that they were liable to tax, and then later in 1943 they were advised that the Department of Justice had given the opinion that patronage dividends were not deductible as an expense. The legal position would be, so far as they were concerned, that they could not plead ignorance of the stand taken by the Department of Justice.

Mr. BURTON: I was interested in listening to the minister give an explanation of the various stages that this legislation would go through. It is quite true, as he explained, that when the bill is before us an opportunity will be given to hon. members to register their protest; but at the same time this resolution stage, if it has any value at all, gives hon. members an opportunity to try to persuade the government to make worth-while changes before the bill is brought down. If that is not so, then I can see no value in having the resolution before us. Since it is nearly six o'clock, I suggest that the chairman call it six o'clock and possibly after dinner I may be able to persuade the minister to make a few changes before the bill is brought down.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have listened to a lot of persuasive speakers, but I shall be delighted to listen to the hon. member for Humboldt.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair, and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CANNED FISH

REQUEST OF UNRRA FOR RELIEF FROM CANADIAN COMMITMENT—STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FISHERIES

Hon. H. F. G. BRIDGES (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair, and with the unanimous consent of the house, I should like to make a brief statement.

In order to clear up a misconception which may have been created by some press and radio announcements yesterday, I think it may be well for me to explain to the house the present position as regards UNRRA purchases of canned fish from Canada's 1946 production. Briefly, these announcements, which apparently originated in Halifax, were to the effect that UNRRA had asked Canada to release it from its commitment to purchase 30,000,000 pounds of canned herring, mackerel and chicken haddie and that thereby the maritime canners had been placed in a serious position.

What has actually happened is that UNRRA has asked to be relieved of this commitment as far as possible; but, at the same time, it has expressed its readiness to purchase whatever part of the 30,000,000 pounds, whether a large part or small, that Canada is unable to market through other channels. In other words, the commitment holds, even up to the total amount of 30,000,000 pounds if necessary.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Government departments, my own and the Department of Trade and Commerce, are exploring the possibility of finding other export outlets for some of this canned fish. On the domestic side, the wartime prices and trade board has recently lifted all restrictions as to the quantities of these products which may be released in Canada. In this way it may be possible to relieve UNRRA of some part of its commitment by disposing of some of the fish through other channels, but UNRRA will remain committed to take from us the remaining part of the 1946 output making up the 30,000,000 pounds. Thus the herring, chicken haddie and mackerel canners are assured of market outlet for this full quantity.

Mr. REID: Will those who have supplies of canned herring and other fish be allowed to find markets outside Canada, apart from what UNRRA has stated it will take?

Mr. BRIDGES: I will accept the hon. member's question as a notice, and give an answer later.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

12. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years, the provision exempting the income of certain cooperative companies and associations be repealed and that for the 1946 and subsequent taxation years provision be made that there may be deducted from a taxpayer's income the aggregate of the payments made,

(a) in the taxation year or within six months thereafter to his customers of the taxation year; and

(b) in the taxation year to his customers of a previous taxation year after the 1941 taxation year and not previously deducted under paragraph (a) in respect of specified allocations in proportion to patronage for the said years the prospect of which was held forth

(c) by the statute or bylaws under which the taxpayer carries on business or by his contracts with his customers, or

(d) by the taxpayer in a specified manner prior to the commencement of the taxation year except that portion of such payments as would if deducted leave the taxpayer with an income less than an amount determined by deducting from three per cent of the capital employed in the business, including therein borrowed moneys, the interest paid by the taxpayer on borrowed moneys and deductible as an expense in computing his income.

Mr. BURTON: When the committee rose for the dinner recess our genial Acting Minister of Finance indicated that he would listen to me for a few minutes, but at the same time he gave the impression that little attention would be paid to what I might say.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not necessarily; it depends upon what the hon. member says.

Mr. BURTON: I should like to make use of this first opportunity I have had to discuss the resolution since the minister gave notice of the fact that two important changes have been made in what originally had been planned for the taxation of cooperatives. I wish to compliment the minister and the government, and to thank them on behalf of the cooperatives for the faltering step they did take. Even if it was done hesitatingly, at the same time it gives some of us the satisfaction of knowing that when occasionally we raise our voices the government listens. That is good, so far as it goes. The agreement to extend the period from six months to twelve months for the payment of patronage dividends is at least of some benefit to the cooperatives. The same observation would apply to the government's willingness not to compel cooperatives to treat members and non-members alike in connection with the payment of patronage dividends, a provision which is of considerable importance to the cooperative movement. As has been pointed out previously in the house, with benefits and privileges go some distinct responsibilities and obligations. Therefore I am pleased to see that the government has gone to this extent.

That leaves us with a resolution which still contains two undesirable features, from the point of view of the cooperative movement. The Minister of Finance on a number of occasions has objected to a reference to what has been called the retroactive feature in the taxation; nevertheless that is what people out in the country consider it to be, and it is something of great concern to some cooperative organizations.

As previously pointed out, this government and those which have preceded it are to blame for the situation in which the cooperatives find themselves to-day. Had we had a proper dominion cooperatives act which would have given cooperative organizations from one end of the country to the other a proper yardstick with which to govern themselves, in all probability we would not find ourselves in this position to-day. Furthermore, as has been pointed out, a former minister of finance in moving an amendment to this act some years ago—and this has been placed on record—distinctly told the house at that time that it was the intention of the government to make provision for cooperatives.

The question was asked this afternoon respecting the exact amount involved, and how much the taxation would bring to the treasury. While I admit that is important, yet to my mind there is something more fundamental in this than the mere counting of dollars and cents. Consequently I say that the principle involved is of more concern to the people of this country and to the cooperatives in particular than are the actual dollars and cents, even though they may amount to quite a sum.

There is a second feature that I take serious objection to being retained in this resolution. I refer to the three per cent clause. I wish the Minister of Finance, the Acting Minister of Finance and their colleagues in the government would realize that the principal motive of the people who comprise the cooperative movement, their thought and their desire when they banded together, was not the return that they might get on the money invested but the service that they could render to the community.

The story has been told many times in this house, and I have no doubt that there are many members in the present parliament who have a working knowledge of how these different cooperative organizations were formed. However, I fail to see where that knowledge and understanding has been of any benefit to the government in bringing down this legislation. It is not my intention to take up the time of the committee or to weary hon. members, but I should like to give a brief resume of the history of cooperative organizations. In order to shorten that resume, I shall deal with only one organization which has been mentioned a number of times this afternoon, the wheat pools of western Canada. I want to assure hon. members from other parts of Canada that when we speak of the wheat pools we are speaking of only one part of the cooperatives, and we know that other parts are vitally interested.

I well recall in years gone by when we did not have a cooperative organization in so far as the marketing of grain in western Canada was concerned. A former minister of agriculture who sat on the same side on which members of the government now sit, the late Doctor Motherwell, played a most important part along with other people in forming the original grain growers' association of western Canada in an attempt to obtain some redress from the treatment that the farmers were receiving from the grain trade of that day.

We had a suspicion, in fact we had fairly definite knowledge that the grain trade of that day were not giving the farmers a square deal. It was commonly said that an elevator agent who could not make enough in operating an elevator for one year to pay for the elevator three times over was of no use to the elevator company. I have seen a farmer drive in forty or fifty miles with a little jag of grain. When he got to town the agent would examine the wheat and say, "That is a nice sample of No. 1, but I am sorry, I have room only for No. 3". The farmer had to take No. 3 price or haul his load home for another forty or fifty miles.

We had knowledge of those things. From the old united grain growers' association we established the Saskatchewan cooperative elevator company. In establishing that company we had a desire, not to make a profit on the money we invested, but to build a cooperative that would give us service and a fair share of the consumer's dollar. However, in building up that organization we did not accomplish what we had hoped to accomplish. I would not say that we were deliberately misled; but it finally turned out that, while there was a decided improvement in the service, while an attempt was made to give service in preference to making a return on investment, we still did not attain that cooperative principle for which we were striving. In the final analysis, the cooperative elevator company was run on the basis of a return for the money invested. As an example, if I hauled all my grain to the cooperative elevator I would not receive any more in proportion to the money I had invested than would the man who did not haul a single bushel.

As things went on, we could see more and more that we had not built our structure properly. In spite of the fact that the elevator company was giving improved service at reduced cost, we were piling money on top of money. Shares which cost $7.50 went up to $50, after the original investment had been returned time after time in the form of dividends. That confirmed the idea that we had that we were not getting a fair share of the consumer's dollar for the grain that we had been putting into the different elevators of this country.

That is what brought on the next step, the formation of the wheat pools and the subsidiary pool elevators. We learned from the mistakes of the past that if we were to build a true cooperative we had to get away from the idea of obtaining a return on our money. What we tried to do was to build an organization that would give the individual farmer a fair return on the consumer's dollar that was paid for his grain. I do not need to go over the history of the wheat pools. They had their ups and they had their downs, but throughout the years they have endeavoured to adhere to the principle that, instead of getting a return of money on the investment, the main concern should be to give service to the members and endeavour to obtain for them a fair share of the consumer's dollar.

As has been pointed out, for a considerable number of years the Department of National Revenue did not assess the wheat pools. Finally they came to the conclusion, rightly or wrongly I would not say, that under the act as it was and in spite of what the Minister of Finance has said in years gone by, the pools should be assessed. They intimated to the pools at that time that if they were not satisfied they could take the case to the courts and it would not cost them any more than if the government took the case to the courts itself. But no sooner had that action been taken than the government blocked it all by appointing the royal commission. That stopped any further litigation.

Mr. ABBOTT: It did not block it. It was done by mutual consent.

Mr. BURTON: It prevented a decision from being given.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, it did not prevent getting a decision, but by mutual agreement I believe, the litigation was not pushed ahead.

Mr. BURTON: That shows that the government was no more certain than the pools about the right to tax.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The pools were more certain than the government.

Mr. BURTON: We can argue that back and forth. I do not know why the government are so determined to follow the McDougall report in some respects and then throw the rest of it overboard. They established a commission a year ago, and now they come back and adopt certain parts of its report and say: There it is, boys. The rest they simply let go by the board.

I was quite prepared to give the government credit for having done what they have done since the budget was brought down, but I wish to emphasize to you, Mr. Chairman, and the members of the committee that the other two parts of the resolution that I have mentioned are of fundamental importance to the members of the cooperative organization.

I have given the minister a brief resume of how we formed one cooperative. I will give another example. In Saskatchewan we formed the consumers' cooperative refinery, which brought about equally beneficial results for the consumer of gasoline in Saskatchewan, not in the way of returns on the money invested, but in giving service to the people of the province. It seems, however, that the government is determined to make those of us who do not believe that the wages of money must be given first consideration accept that principle. Those of us who have banded ourselves together in cooperative movements have done so with the sole purpose of trying to help one another and for the benefit of the community, not for the purpose of seeing what we can get out of the money invested in this or in that. We say that on any money that we as individual members of a cooperative receive in the way of patronage dividends and returns from our respective organizations we are prepared to pay income tax just like any other citizen, but we contend that the money that we put into the cooperative is the money of the individual and not the corporation's money to be used with the idea of making profits to pay dividends to certain shareholders. If a person does not want to do business with our cooperative, regardless of what that cooperative organization may be, that is his right and privilege and he can go ahead and do business with any other organization or company. But we contend that we have built up an organization that has striven for the advancement of the community instead of piling up profits on top of profits, and that we should not be penalized for doing that. I repeat I am satisfied that the government is determined to force upon the cooperatives of this country the idea that the wages of money come before service to the community.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have denied that every time the statement has been made, but I suppose I had better do it again.

Mr. BURTON: In biblical days some people received a severe reprimand for worshipping the golden calf. To-day we have a lot of people in this country who, I think, should be reprimanded for giving precedence to interest on money above everything else. It is on that basis that I oppose this resolution.

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution as amended carry?

Mr. GRAYDON: Would you read it, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: This is the amended resolution:

12. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years, the provision exempting the income of certain cooperative companies and associations be repealed and that for the 1946 and subsequent taxation years provision be made that there may be deducted from a taxpayer's income the aggregate of the payments made,

(a) in the taxation year or within twelve months thereafter to his customers of the taxation year; and

(b) in the taxation year to his customers of a previous taxation year and not previously deducted under paragraph (a) in respect of specified allocations in proportion to patronage for the said years the prospect of which was held forth

(c) by the statute or bylaws under which the taxpayer carries on business or by his contracts with his customers, or

(d) by the taxpayer in a specified manner prior to the commencement of the taxation year except that portion of such payments as would if deducted leave the taxpayer with an income less than an amount determined by deducting from three per cent of the capital employed in the business, including therein borrowed moneys, the interest paid by the taxpayer on borrowed moneys and deductible as an expense in computing his income.

Does the resolution as amended carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BRACKEN: Mr. Chairman, have I the right to speak? A moment ago we had a vote on the amendment proposed by the government to its own resolution. To that amendment I saw nobody in this chamber vote in opposition. We now have before us the government's resolution as amended. That resolution as amended by the government this party will not support, and for this reason. The government, after many months—in fact after some years of study—after it has had a commission examine into this whole question, brings in a proposal with respect to the taxation of cooperatives. On two or three features of that policy it has changed its mind since its proposal was introduced, changed its mind on the suggestion and with the approval of nearly the whole house. But two taxes still remain in the government's programme: one, a tax on three per cent of the employed capital of cooperatives—a tax to be applied in future. That is one considered policy of the government with respect to the taxation of cooperatives in this country.

But with respect to the past, during which time the government imposed no tax on cooperatives, and during much of the time did not try to collect any, the law officers of the crown, whom it assigned to interpret legislation which was not intended to tax cooperatives, have recently interpreted the legislation to mean that it can tax cooperatives. In the light of that circumstance, certain of these large cooperatives did not pay patronage dividends over the last two years; they held the money back which would otherwise have been paid out—held it back in order to have funds to meet the threat of possible taxation. It is held there in huge sums; and on the basis of the tax laws of the past this government is saying in effect, "Now we are going to tax three of the large cooperatives in western Canada to the extent of millions of dollars. For the future these organizations will pay less than $300,000 a year; but for the last two years we are going to make them pay possibly ten or fifteen times that amount each year." They are now discussing just how much the latter tax will be—a proposed compromise on the legislation as it was.

My position is this. If it is wise policy from now on to tax these cooperative organizations, in round figures—because that is all we can get—say less than $300,000 a year, this government cannot justify taxing these organizations ten or fifteen times that much for the last two years. For that reason we shall have to oppose this resolution as amended.

Mr. COLDWELL: The amendment improved the resolution; but, as the leader of the opposition has stated, the amended resolution is, except for that slight amendment, as objectionable as ever. The principle is wrong. What the leader of the opposition has said in regard to the taxation of the large cooperatives is, I think, justified. This afternoon I objected strenuously to the three per cent feature of the resolution, and because of the unsatisfactorily amended resolution we shall oppose the resolution as amended.

Mr. LOW: I have been deliberately refraining from much talk on this whole resolution because I wanted to learn exactly what it was that the government intended to do. There have been so many confusions in the course of the debate thus far that it has been most difficult to get at the kernel of the truth; but I think I now see the whole situation quite clearly, and I am definitely and unalterably opposed to the idea of applying that three per cent tax. My objection is not based on what will happen or what has happened or what could happen, we will say, retroactively with respect to the wheat pools—important as that matter is—so much as it is upon this principle of placing the cooperatives in exactly the same category as other corporations. If there are true cooperatives in this country—and there must be a good many true cooperatives—they certainly cannot be placed in the same category for taxation purposes as an ordinary corporation. The principle involved is to my mind, an important one, and the resolution as amended certainly does not in any way appeal to me. I shall oppose it with all my strength.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I happened to be out of the chamber, attending various committees, during this discussion, and I have not had an opportunity of making any statement regarding this matter. I have no desire to speak at length, but I believe that the whole situation with respect to what is proposed ought to be clarified. I cannot find out what is proposed under the resolution and the amendments of the resolution. The meaning, significance and impact of this three per cent proposal are indistinctly understood.

I have a feeling, and have had ever since the campaign was developed against cooperatives, that there is in this country a body of men that is deliberately aiming to destroy cooperatives; and I do not believe that the present proposals of the government are entirely without a devious hidden influence somewhere seeking to accomplish that nefarious objective. The campaign which was conducted throughout western Canada in an endeavour to bewilder and confuse the people with respect to cooperatives and their taxation was financed with tremendous sums of money. That money did not come from any group of people who were anxious about the dominion government getting that much more revenue; it came from a group of people desirous of destroying cooperatives, and the only reason they wished to destroy cooperatives was that they had found that the cooperatives were doing the work for which they were organized, namely protecting the individual citizen throughout Canada against the rapacious greed of monstrous organizations aiming at the destruction of the common man.

That is precisely the situation; and in order to clarify matters so that the committee may know where it is going and what it is doing, I would make this proposal. Let the government withdraw the proposal to tax cooperatives at the present time and devote at least a year to the clarification of the situation. Nowhere have I been able to find, even in the commission's report, a distinct and clearly demarcated definition of what constitutes a cooperative and what does not. Neither do I find in the speeches of hon. members on the government side or in the legislation which is apparently proposed any exact definition of what constitutes a cooperative. Merely to pass a law to tax cooperatives, when we have no idea what we are going to tax is, I consider, a reckless procedure.

It may be argued that if we pass the law and find later on that it is undesirable we can rescind it. That is simply not the way matters work in democracies. No matter how pernicious a law is, it will be next to impossible for us to organize a body of public opinion sufficiently strong to repeal it once it is passed.

I should like to make some suggestions; but, before doing so, I would read a statement made last January by Clinton B. Anderson, United States secretary of agriculture. I am quoting an excerpt from his speech, taken from the Alberta wheat pool budget of July 19, from an article entitled, "Clamps Down on Cooperatives":

When I think of farm cooperatives I think of them not as complex business concerns, but as groups of independent farmers banded together to do some job that is too big for them as individuals. They are not seeking profits as a group, but are seeking to use modern business methods to maintain their way of life. It is this basic objective of farm cooperatives that has caused congress and the courts to recognize generally and in specific legislation the right of farmers to organize cooperatives and the public welfare obligation of cooperatives. Shorn of all technicalities, it is this basic purpose that frees cooperatives from income tax.

I believe that with the sentiments of that statement virtually every member of this house is in accord, whether he be on the Liberal side or on the opposition side. I wager that eighty per cent of the members of the house are in sympathy with these remarks; yet at the present time we have no assurance whatsoever that the legislation proposed by the government is in accord with the spirit of these words. We have no such evidence at all. We need to know exactly what is a genuine cooperative. The definition ought to be worked out with minutest care by men thoroughly qualified for the task.

Of all the organizations in Canada at present operating under the name of cooperatives, exactly which ones can qualify under the definition implied in Mr. Clinton Anderson's statement, and precisely why? That question every hon. member ought to be able to answer, but there is hardly one of us who is capable of giving an answer to it, simply because we have not the information at our disposal. On the other hand, which organizations cannot so qualify, and precisely why? That is something which we ought to know.

All this ought to be worked out, first of all; the facts should be publicized in every nook and corner of the dominion, and every cooperative should be given at least a year in which to bring its organization and practices into conformity with principles universally accepted as those of genuine, bona fide cooperatives. Until this is done, we are in no position, either as a house or as a country, to pronounce on the important matter of the taxation of cooperatives. I submit in all earnestness that the government should withdraw these resolutions and allow the people of Canada to know exactly what is being proposed with respect to their welfare where the taxation of cooperatives is undertaken.

The CHAIRMAN: I am about to put the question, and thereafter no further discussion will be allowed. Is the committee ready for the question?

Resolution as amended agreed to on division: Yeas, 70; nays, 56.

The CHAIRMAN: I declare the resolution as amended carried.

Mr. BRACKEN: Mr. Chairman, I understand that on a vote in committee pairs are not recognized. I did not vote, only because I wished to carry out the spirit of an arrangement I had with the Prime Minister. Otherwise I would have voted against the resolution as amended.

Mr. IRVINE: I am in a similar position in relation to another hon. member.

Mr. ABBOTT: I suggest that the committee now take up resolution 16. This is the other resolution dealing with cooperatives generally. Resolutions 13, 14 and 15 deal with credit unions and mutual insurance companies.

16. That the income of a corporation or association commencing business after December 31, 1946, incorporated or registered under provincial cooperative legislation and organized and operated as a bona fide cooperative for the purpose of marketing natural products of or acquired from its members, or of purchasing supplies, equipment or household necessities for, or to be sold to, or of performing services for, its members be exempt from taxation during the first three complete taxation years following the commencement of business.

Mr. WRIGHT: Will the minister further clarify the statement which was made that the government would accept the cooperative acts of the provinces as the basis of determining a true cooperative for taxation purposes under the resolution? Is that a fact?

Mr. ABBOTT: I believe there will be some other provisions; but cooperatives which are recognized as such, incorporated, organized or registered under provincial cooperative legislation, will be recognized as coming within the legislation to be founded on this resolution. There will be some other provisions in the bill, but I cannot give definite indications as to what they are until I am able to bring in the bill itself.

Mr. WRIGHT: We should have something more definite than that on this matter. This is changing entirely the principle of taxation in this country when the dominion government has to rely on provincial legislation to determine those who are taxable under dominion statutes. I am not a lawyer, but I think that is a departure from any taxation principles which I have known before in this house.

Mr. ABBOTT: Will my hon. friend allow me to repeat what I said before? Resolutions of this kind are largely in the nature of notice on broad lines of intended legislation. If my hon. friend will reserve his specific criticism until the bill is before the committee he will see the exact conditions which will be laid down to render a bona fide cooperative eligible for the three-year exemption contemplated under this resolution.

Mr. WRIGHT: Then what will be the position of cooperatives such as many of those we have in the province of Saskatchewan, which have been formed during the war years? Most of the cooperatives which have been formed took over existing businesses. That was the only way they could get a quota of stock to sell. In most rural areas and small towns we find that it is much better for all concerned for the cooperative being formed to take over an existing business rather than set up a competitive business and perhaps put out of business someone else who is serving the community. Am I to understand that if a cooperative is formed in that way it will not be allowed to obtain exemptions for the three years as will other cooperatives which are formed and do not take over an existing business?

Mr. ABBOTT: As indicated in the minister's speech, that was the intention, although it is not so specified in this resolution. The real purpose of the exemption to a new cooperative is to enable it to get on its feet. If a cooperative takes over an existing business which is already established and has a clientele, has inventory, has working capital and all that kind of thing, it does not need—

Mr. WRIGHT: It will not have working capital.

Mr. ABBOTT: It may or it may not; it will depend on the type of cooperative. If it takes over an established business it has not the same need for this exemption, for what it may be worth. It certainly should not be the intention of this or any other legislation to encourage groups of individuals to take over existing businesses and be prepared to convert them into cooperative enterprises, which, in some cases, might be for the purpose of obtaining tax exemptions.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I just say a word on this resolution? I know some members of the committee feel that the cooperatives are inclined to deal rather harshly economically with existing small businesses. I know there is nothing that any cooperative has done—if what is alleged is correct—which may equal what is proposed under this legislation. This is what is happening in many of the smaller towns in western Canada. The farmers organize a cooperative society. Instead of going into a town and competing with the merchant already established there and putting him out of business because of the membership at large in the community, the cooperative goes in and suggests to the business man that they are going to organize anyway. He has an established business there and on a fair basis they are prepared to take over his business. In many instances of which I know they appoint the owner of the store the manager of the business. As a matter of fact I know that some of the managers of these stores—and I have several in mind at the moment—who have accepted such a proposition are to-day actually better off than they were as independent merchants in the villages. In the interest of equity, and from every other point of view, I say that the explanation given by the minister in the budget speech is frequently against the interests of the small businessman in the area where the cooperative starts up. What you are going to do is to say to the people in the community—and I have particularly in mind the farmers in a given community—you may start a cooperative society, but if you take over an existing business you cannot get the same relief as you would if you started a new business of your own.

With regard to what the minister says concerning a business established with its own working capital, I would ask him to think it over. I do not think it is a sound argument. As a matter of fact a cooperative organized to take over a business begins in exactly the same way as a cooperative starting a new business. It has to raise working capital in the same way; it has to do its business in the same way as any other cooperative beginning business would do. On the other hand, if the interpretation given by the minister in his budget speech to the words "commencing business" is adhered to, in many instances it will work a hardship on men who have established a small business and who might otherwise be protected by coming into the cooperative and acting as managers for the cooperative society. The minister should give consideration to that point.

Mr. ABBOTT: Let me say at once that there is nothing in the resolution which would preclude that, and on this particular point, whatever it may have been on some others, my mind is completely open. I shall be glad to give consideration to that point and to discuss it with my colleagues. In its terms the resolution does not preclude it; it is in broad general terms.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am thinking of the budget speech.

Mr. ABBOTT: I mentioned that. I pointed out, as the minister indicated in his budget speech. that was the intention.

Mr. WRIGHT: What is the position of a cooperative which was formed in 1944?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is not affected at all by this resolution.

Mr. WRIGHT: Will it have exemption from taxes for three years?

Mr. ABBOTT: No; this applies to the ones commencing after December 31, 1946.

Mr. WRIGHT: Then the minister is making a distinction there. This resolution should be framed in such a way as to include a cooperative which started in 1945. As it reads now, it refers to cooperatives starting in 1946.

Mr. ABBOTT: We do not like retroactive legislation.

Mr. WRIGHT: It does not need to be retroactive. Start from this year and say that from this year it will not be taxed. It is not retroactive so long as it is made applicable to cooperatives which started in 1945 or 1944. It would simply mean that the cooperative which started in 1944 would have one year in which it would be free from taxation; the one which started in 1945 would have two years, and the one which started in 1946 would have three years. The minister will have to do that to make the legislation fair.

Mrs. STRUM: I was delighted to hear the minister say that he had an open mind on resolution 16, because there is one particular aspect which interests me very much. During the war years, cooperatives starting up could start only by buying out existing businesses. Under the wartime controls they were not allowed to start new businesses. I happen to know of one case because I was a shareholder and it was in my home town. The only way they could start up was by buying out a retired merchant. It meant that we had to raise a substantial amount of money to take over. We had to pay for the business in cash and we were crippled for lack of liquid capital; we were crippled in the matter of stocking our shelves with merchandise because we were forced to put out such a large outlay to begin business. Had we been able to start under other circumstances, we might have been able to rent a building and we would have had only the cost of rental, but we were forced to buy a building which contained living quarters and which was much larger than the sort of unit we would have started with ordinarily. I am sure that there are many cooperatives in this position. From the beginning they are forced to purchase existing businesses. They are forced to put out a large amount of available capital in order to get started. Anything that will make it difficult for them to carry on will be a crippling move, and I am glad to hear that the minister is open to conviction.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I was interested in the answer which the minister gave to the hon. member for Melfort in connection with the three-year exemption from taxation. Had the answer been more favourable, I would not have thought it necessary to move an amendment. However, in view of the attitude taken, I move the following amendment:

That resolution No. 16 pertaining to Income War Tax Act be amended by striking out the words "commencing business after December 31, 1946" as such words appear in lines 1 and 2 of the said resolution.

The effect of that amendment would be that any cooperative commencing operations in 1944, 1945 or 1946 would come in under the exemption, the same as the others.

Mr. ABBOTT: As my hon. friend probably anticipates, I am obliged to take the stand that his amendment is out of order, having been moved by a private member. Clearly, if adopted, it would alter the balance of ways and means for the current year, and would render cooperatives which might otherwise be taxable exempt from taxation. Therefore I must take the stand that it is out of order.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the minister allow this whole resolution to stand, in view of the representations made, and give consideration to the various aspects of it?

Mr. ABBOTT: If the committee insists I will allow it to stand. I have pointed out that it is in broad terms, with the exception of the point now raised by the hon. member for Dauphin. But I also point out that section 4(p) of the Income War Tax Act will continue in force until December 31, 1946. So that whatever rates are available to cooperatives under section 4(p) will continue until that date, and the new legislation will become effective as and from January 1, 1947. Therefore I think it is consistent to give a three-year period of complete exemption from January 1, 1947. I shall give further, and perhaps even sympathetic consideration to the point raised by the hon. members for Rosetown-Biggar, Melfort and Qu'Appelle, as to the question of extending the privilege to a cooperative which acquired an existing business.

However, I must take the stand that any amendment to change the date is out of order and, in fairness, I should add that I would have to have much more convincing reasons than have thus far been offered to make me change my view that we should make the commencement of this exemption period coincide with the effective repeal of section 4(p).

I should hope that, subject to further discussion on the general principle, the committee could accept the resolution, thereby enabling us to proceed with the others.

Mr. WRIGHT: I appreciate that the minister will give consideration to the points raised, but I should also like him to give consideration to the matter of cooperatives formed in 1944 or 1945. Under section 4(p) they may be, and in many cases are exempt from taxation. Now they will find that when section 4(p) is revoked they will be taxable. The fact is that they will be taxable for the last year, upon which they would not otherwise be taxable if they were new cooperatives being formed in 1947. There would be two years in the case of one, and one year in the case of the other, under section 4(p). But now they become taxable. I believe it will be found to work out in that way. An unfairness will be created there, unless this provision applies to all cooperatives as from 1947, whether they were formed in 1945, 1946 or 1947.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will think over the point raised by the hon. member. Frankly I do not think there is any danger of their being involved.

Mr. ISNOR: In view of the statement made by the minister that he would give sympathetic consideration to the case made out by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar when that hon. member painted a picture of a merchant going into a village and taking over the business of another, I should like to say a word respecting a similar situation, and approaching it from a different angle.

Two merchants are competitors in the same village. They carry on in a friendly way, doing business and serving the community for years in a satisfactory manner. A cooperative comes to one store and says to the owner, "We have a proposition whereby you will turn over your business to us and we will make you our manager. If you do not do that we will open another store in competition with you. Because of our membership and the friendly feeling existing toward us in the community, you can figure out for yourself what will happen to you."

Because of that pressure, one of the merchants gives way, sells his business and takes the position of manager. He is now in competition with the second merchant across the street. One of these merchants enjoys a three-year exemption, while the other suffers no handicap at all.

In the course of time the cooperative organization will set up certain profits, perhaps in the form of patronage dividends. The other evening the sum of $25 was mentioned, of which $10 is kept and $15 goes back into the business. The reserve is set up until such time as they have sufficient money to spend $500 or $600 for the installation of a new front. Notwithstanding the fact that the prices in the two stores may be the same, people will naturally turn to the one with the most attractive front, and with the better window lighting. Because of the reserve and the handicaps set in his way, the second storekeeper would be placed in an unfair position. That is why I should like to see fair taxation for all types of business.

Mr. BENTLEY: A minute ago the minister said that he had an open mind, and that he would possibly give sympathetic consideration to the suggestion made. Then he qualified his statement by saying that he had not yet heard any convincing evidence.

Mr. ABBOTT: That was on the other point.

Mr. BENTLEY: I believe it applied to both these points. If the minister will turn to his copy of the McDougall commission report he will find at page 45 the most convincing evidence in support of our contention. I would ask him to direct his attention to paragraph 7 on that page, and the seventh line in that paragraph where he will find these words:

> . . . with the consent of the minister, be exempt from income tax for its first three fiscal periods following the commencement of operations.

That was the recommendation mentioned by the hon. member for Melfort. I do not offer it in any spirit of criticism, but I believe the minister will see the justice of it.

I should like to point out one important cooperative which will be affected by the proposals in resolution 16 of the budget resolutions, and the minister's statement respecting the budget, to the effect that this three-year exemption will not be applicable to those who begin operations prior to December 31, 1946. In the budget speech it is indicated that those who take over an existing business will not be exempt, either.

We have in Swift Current what is known as the cooperative horse-marketing association, through which we pack horse meat for Belgium and UNRRA. We have found through the years that the ranchers who used to be in the horse-raising business, when it was a good business, have found that the country now needs cattle more than it does horses. Horses are very hard on grazing land because they clip close to the ground like sheep.

A couple of years ago, in an attempt to get rid of these horses a marketing and packing organization was established under cooperative laws. They had great difficulty in getting started because the war was on and buildings and supplies were hard to get. There was considerable competition in the way of getting capital because campaigns were being carried on for the purchase of victory bonds and so on; yet they had to be financed. First, the Saskatchewan government guaranteed the organization to the extent of $50,000. Next, the Belgium buying committee helped them by way of advance orders. The Bank of Montreal made considerable advances on the understanding that when they became organized and the members' capital began to come in they would be reimbursed from that and from the earnings when they started to work.

They got going under those difficulties. If they had had to build a new building, as the budget indicates is necessary, they would never have got started. However, they took over an old power plant which belonged to the city of Swift Current. That was an existing business, and technically, according to the budget, that stipulation would apply to this particular case. On both counts this new association is going to suffer severely unless the minister gives more than sympathetic consideration to its case. That is one reason why I believe the most convincing argument I could offer is the recommendation of the McDougall commission.

Mr. ABBOTT: This goes farther than the McDougall commission recommended. As my hon. friend has pointed out, the McDougall commission recommends that it be with the consent of the minister. In other words, they were suggesting that another of these discretions to which objection has been taken in some cases should be conferred upon the minister. The resolution proposes that the exemption will be given as of right; there will be no discretion in the minister to approve or refuse it. That is why I say the proposed legislation goes farther than the McDougall commission recommended.

Mr. BENTLEY: That is quite correct so far as those who started after December 31, 1946, are concerned; but it is not so good, as I think the minister will admit, with regard to the case to which I referred. I believe they should receive some consideration because they have done a useful job for that part of the country and for the world. Poland and Belgium are very happy about it, as is UNRRA.

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. member has almos convinced me to eat horse meat.

Mr. BENTLEY: I would be glad to give you a can because I have one upstairs.

Mr. POULIOT: Until what age does a horse remain palatable?

Mr. BENTLEY: Mr. Chairman, is this germane to the discussion? I am not an expert on the packing of horse meat. They have an expert at the plant who decides what horses shall be used. They are graded according to the amount of flesh.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Old horses are better than young ones.

Mr. BENTLEY: That is my opinion. Generally speaking, horses between five and ten years of age in good flesh are considered the best. Those are range horses, and they are always good.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I say just a word to the senior member for Halifax because probably the minister will read what the hon. member said and what I said in connection with the taking over of an existing business. Of course, what the senior member for Halifax said is true to a large degree. If a cooperative society with a large membership came into a community where there were two stores and made a proposition to one of the storekeepers to sell out to the society and take over the management, that new cooperative store would then be entering into competition with the other store which was not taken over and which was already in existence. I submit that the argument that the new cooperative society has an unfair advantage is not soundly based. I take it from the legislation before us that we all recognize that a cooperative society is on an entirely different footing from that of a private profit-making business.

Mr. ISNOR: In what way?

Mr. COLDWELL: I quoted what Doctor Coady had to say this afternoon. I shall not repeat the quotation, but Doctor Coady made this statement:

> The essence of private profit business is that the businessman takes a toll from his fellow human beings—legitimate in some cases, and positively unjust in other cases. In cooperatives on the other hand no member of the firm or company—to use the terminology of old-line business—can take a toll from his fellows. Any money he receives back in the shape of patronage dividends is his own money. These dividends are overcharges that were made by himself in the course of a year's business. By no stretch of the imagination, therefore, can patronage dividends be called profit or income.

I think that is sound. The hon. member for Swift Current made a statement during the budget debate. I am not permitted to quote that statement, but I think I can summarize it in this way. When a man joins a cooperative society he begins to serve himself. He puts a can of peas on the shelf for which he has already paid. Then he goes to the store to get that can of peas from the shelf. All that is required is that there shall be sufficient taken from him to put a new can of peas on the shelf. However, the cooperative society usually takes from him at the moment more for the can of peas than the actual service and the can of peas require to be taken, and at a subsequent period he gets back the overcharge. But that is not profit. Consequently the two types of business are not analogous, and that is the point we have been trying to get before the committee ever since this debate started.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Suppose I who am not a member of the cooperative society buy the can of peas?

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not think any cooperative society objects to paying a tax on the profit made on business done with non-members. That has been said over and over again.

Mr. MacNICOL: How can they keep track of purchases by non-members?

Mr. COLDWELL: It so happens that most of us belong to cooperative societies. When we buy something in the cooperative store we are given a slip on which the purchase is registered. At the end of the year the cooperative society knows exactly what business it has done with its own members. In fact, your own number is placed on the slip for the records of the cooperative society.

Mr. MacNICOL: If I walk into a cooperative store as a stranger and make a purchase, is the clerk going to ask me if I am a member?

Mr. COLDWELL: He would say, "Are you a member and what is your account number?" You would then give your name and number if the clerk did not know you, but in most instances they know their own members.

Mr. ISNOR: I would point out to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that there is a difference in the manner of doing business described by him and the ordinary business carried on by a cooperative store and the average so-called free enterprise store. The two stores I cited both purchase from wholesale houses;—these stores may be general or grocery stores;—they each have a manager and two clerks and they pay the same scale of wages. The overhead in each store is about the same. It is fair to say that their overhead expenses will be on the same plane at the end of the year. They purchase $80,000 worth of goods in the course of their operations and mark them up 25 per cent, which gives them a gross profit of $20,000. Both stores sell their goods at the same price. Take a look at their windows. Peas, beans, and so on, are all ticketed at the ceiling prices, and their profit is exactly the same.

An hon. MEMBER: No profits in the cooperatives.

Mr. ISNOR: I am dealing with actual facts, not imaginary. They are definitely profits, or there is gain, the difference between the cost and the selling price.

Mrs. STRUM: You mean margin.

Mr. ISNOR: Term it anything you wish to satisfy your own mind. The fact remains that the cost is the same and the selling price is the same. You can call it profit or margin or gain; it all amounts to the same thing when you put it in the cash register and total up your profits or gains at the end of the year. As I say, there is $20,000 profit, less the operating expenses. So that the net profit or gain or margin is the same in the case of both; the consumers are all paying the same price.

You may ask, where is the difference? The difference is that the private enterprise store, No. 2 store, is paying income tax year in and year out to the government to help carry on the business of the country. The cooperative pays no tax; it pays out its profits in the way of patronage dividends, and if the member of the cooperative does not wish to hold on to them he is allowed to give back $15, we will say, out of $25 to build up a reserve. If there is any fairness in taxing one store and not the other, I may be stupid but I cannot see it.

Mr. COLDWELL: The individual store owner puts his margin, if you wish to call is that—

Mr. ISNOR: I call it profit.

Mr. COLDWELL: He puts his margin or profit into his own pocket. The cooperative society, on the other hand, does not distribute a profit but returns to the individual members the overcharge which in the other case went as profits to the individual store owner. In the case of the cooperative it is returned to the members of the organization, being an overcharge that was made in the beginning. The reason why the cooperative store has about the same mark-up as the private enterprise store is because it does not wish to enter into a price-cutting competition with the private enterprise store. As to the payment of income tax, the individual members of the cooperative society, if their incomes are large enough, pay income tax on them.

Mr. ISNOR: May I deal with that? There is a definite difference between the income of an individual and the income derived from the operation of a store.

Mr. McMASTER: What tax would store No. 2 pay, the one that was not run by the cooperative?

Mr. ISNOR: I wish to deal with the overcharge which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar mentioned. There is no such thing as an overcharge. When two stores set up to do business they both sell at the ceiling prices laid down by the regulations of the wartime prices and trade board. There is no overcharge. If a store tried to overcharge it could not possibly compete with the store that did not. The reason the small merchant is able to compete with the largest chain store or departmental store, no matter how big, is that he sells service to his customers. That is why the great majority of them succeed.

I am not opposed to cooperatives. I rather welcome competition on fair lines, but I certainly do not think the government or anyone else should subsidize one competitor against another. That is the whole point. You could not possibly succeed in business if you were continually overcharging your customers. Common sense will tell you that. If you adopted that course you would not last very long in business. Only by fair dealing can you carry on and build up a bigger business.

One hon. member asked me, would they not pay the same income tax? During the war, when we were paying excess profits tax over a certain standard basis, our entire profit beyond that point went to the government. But if we are allowed to distribute that excess to one hundred or one thousand individuals they in turn will pay a very much smaller amount individually, and the aggregate amount of income tax paid by these individuals on that distribution will not begin to represent the amount paid in taxation under the Excess Profits Tax Act or even under the standard profits tax by the store.

Mr. WRIGHT: The hon. member in distinguishing between two types of business called one a free enterprise business and the other a cooperative.

Mr. ISNOR: Just to distinguish them.

Mr. WRIGHT: I should like to know in what respect a cooperative business is not a free enterprise business.

Mr. ISNOR: I do not think it is necessary to go into detail on that. The hon. member knows my views in regard to free enterprise and individual incentive to make the best of one's opportunities, and I know his ideas in regard to cooperatives and public ownership. But I would say this, that there is a difference between the two, and the difference is that one continues to pay income tax from January 1, 1947, right through for three years, while the other pays no tax whatsoever. Surely that is a difference.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. ISNOR: I hesitate to receive questions from the hon. member because I may not be able to answer them.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am sure you can, because I make my questions extremely simple when I am addressing them to you. My thought is this. We will assume that nineteen of my hon. friends to my immediate left form a cooperative.

An hon. MEMBER: We are twenty-eight.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I said nineteen, because in Alberta you cannot have a partnership of over twenty people. We will also assume that nineteen of you on the other side of the house—I will leave my own party out of the discussion—also form a partnership. My hon. friends to my left open a grocery store on one side of the street in the town of X. You have a grocery store on the other side of the town of X. Your windows are dressed the same; you are selling groceries. I drive along the centre of the street in my borrowed motorcar—because I have not one at the moment—I am going out to shoot some ducks, or something of the kind, and I want some grub. I look at the windows and I go to one store or the other. Now, the cooperative pays no income tax, but the partnership does. Both adopt exactly the same methods of display and salesmanship. Will the senior member for Halifax, knowing that they adopt exactly the same methods, tell me why one should be favoured in the matter of taxation as against the other?

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member always makes his questions so interesting and states them so simply, and then he surrounds them with a lot of frills. But after all—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The answer is, there should be no difference—if that will help you.

Mr. ISNOR: The answer I would give him is exactly the same answer as he would give me. The hon. member gave the answer to the question the other day when he asked much the same question, and cited the two stores; I agree with him and I know he agrees with me.

Mr. CASE: I think this is a time when we should take a practical view and not be merely idealistic. I can claim a close association with the cooperative movement in Canada from its earliest beginnings in the province of Ontario and in parts of the province of Saskatchewan. But I also have the benefit of a background of municipal experience, and I know this, that one of the bugbears that municipal governments face is tax exemptions on land and on some enterprises which may be located within the municipality. I tell the committee this, that the costs of government in this country are now reaching proportions when somebody must dig down deep to raise the wherewithal to carry on.

As I view the cooperatives, the one method that they can employ to save money for their patrons is their method of purchasing. They purchase in large volume. Their costs of distribution are very little less than those of private enterprise, if there is any difference at all. The fact of the matter is that in a majority of cases the private enterprise man is probably providing his clients with some accommodation by way of credit, whereas the cooperatives will certainly seek to collect on the goods as they are sold; and quite properly so. I know that when I was associated with the Saskatchewan grain growers, whether the organization was selling binder twine or whatever it might be. we had cash on the barrel head when we sold, while probably the fellow down the street gave a range of credit for the goods he was selling.

Since someone has to make up the volume of money required, bear in mind that every time you grant an exemption somebody else must dig a little deeper. Not long ago I rose in this chamber and said that I had no objection to crown companies, provided that they bore their share of the nation's taxation; and in my contribution to this amendment, I am only trying to be consistent. I can remember that we had a motto in the Sunday school, in the days when I was interested in that particular work:

If everyone in the Sunday school is just like me,
What kind of Sunday school will the Sunday school be?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is an interesting question.

[Mr. A. L. Smith.]

Mr. CASE: If people find a means whereby, when they call themselves cooperatives, they will be granted a preference, the net result may be that you will have many cooperatives but someone will pay the costs. So what I am suggesting is that, since the costs of government are so great, I believe every individual and every corporation and enterprise should bear its fair share of the nation's costs.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: If I may be permitted to refer to the question asked by the hon. member for Calgary West, I think an answer should be given to his question, because I believe he was seeking an answer in all sincerity. May I point out there are two differences between a cooperative enterprise and the type of partnership which he described to us. In the first place, if any surplus is acquired, whether we call it profit or anything else, in the case of a cooperative it is divided on the basis of business done, while in the matter of a private business it is divided on the basis of the amount of money invested. That is one difference.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): And the amount of risk taken.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: That does not enter into it. The other difference, which I think is probably more important, is that in a private business, as I understand it, those who own shares have one vote for each share, or the basis is such that the more shares you own, the more control you have over the business; in fact, if you own more than half the shares you have the controlling interest in the business. In a cooperative you can own as many shares as you like, but it is "one member, one vote." No matter how much any one member invests, he has only one vote, and it continues to be a democratically run and operated enterprise. Those are the two differences.

Before I take my seat, perhaps I had better do two things at once. I am given to understand, Mr. Chairman, although you have not yet so ruled, that the amendment I have moved is out of order. I am also given to understand that if I withdraw it at this time there will be a more appropriate place to move it, on the third reading of the bill. So that with your permission I should like to withdraw my amendment at this time.

The CHAIRMAN: Has the hon. member leave to withdraw his amendment?

Amendment (Mr. Zaplitny) withdrawn.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I made a suggestion a moment ago which was criticized in a very kindly way—if I may use the expression of the Minister of Labour who is not here at the moment—and it was this. I suggested that nineteen people over there formed a cooperative and nineteen people there formed a partnership. Let us assume that the nineteen people in the partnership put up $100 apiece and that each had an equal vote because each had an equal investment. The answer of the hon. member was this, that in a cooperative, no matter how many shares a person owns, he only has one vote. A partnership can equally well have a partnership agreement stating the same thing. There is nothing against it in law, in equity, or in common sense. Having that in view, I hope to hear from the hon. member again, because he did say that his method was the more democratic. The most democratic thing I know of in this world is a willingness and even an eagerness to pay taxes, because that is the way the country lives. Governments have no other source of income. My whole point is just this: why, because you use a difference in method, is there a difference in obligation? Those nineteen men, let us say, are selling to nineteen hundred people to make their profit. "Profit" is a good word and I intend to use it. I drive along the street; there is their store and there is your store, and I am invited to buy at either place. In my judgment there is neither logic nor reason —perhaps they mean the same thing—why one in a matter of taxation should be treated any differently from the other.

Let us take this horrible thing, a corporation —because all you needed to do in the terrible thirties was to mention that something was a "corporation" and you could fill a hall in any part of the country and get lots of cheers if you just abused the corporation sufficiently. My hon. friend is quite right that a majority in shares, which means a majority investment, controls the corporation. In that, I frankly confess, it differs from a cooperative. If you have a real cooperative, be it a consumers' or a producers' cooperative, and a consumer, whom we will call A, buys more than B, then A will get more of the profits than B. That is the basis on which it is done. In other words, by purchase he makes a greater investment and therefore gets a greater return. What is the difference between that and a person making a greater investment in money, in buying shares, and therefore getting a greater return? Frankly I can see no difference whatever, and I should like my hon. friend, or the hon. gentleman who is almost on his toes ready to go, to answer what I have said.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I join with those who have tried to answer the question of the hon. member for Calgary West. I still prefer to think of us as a group of twenty-eight, all of whom would be in the cooperative, but we will accept his example of nineteen persons forming a cooperative and nineteen others forming a partnership. We have been asked to indicate differences. One particular difference that I would point out is that the nineteen of us in the cooperative will receive back patronage dividends, or whatever you call it, from that cooperative only to the extent that we ourselves make purchases. The nineteen of us will not gain by any of the sales which we may make to the hundreds of others who come along to buy, although actually a cooperative does not work in that way; most of the others would also be members. On the other hand, the nineteen who are in the partnership share in the profit that is made from sales to the hundreds who come to buy from that store. To that should be added the fact that we nineteen who are members of a cooperative cannot and do not make our living on the basis of what we save by being members of a cooperative. We have to have some other source of income, on which we pay taxes, and it is out of that other income that we effect a saving in purchasing the things we buy from a cooperative. But the nineteen, who form a partnership and are in a position to sell goods to hundreds of customers who come in, do make their living out of the profit they make from their investment in that concern, and hence should pay taxes thereon.

One other point I would put on the record has relation to a remark made by the hon. member for Grey North. To be perfectly fair, he did not make a misstatement; but when he referred to the difficulties that municipalities have with tax exemptions, the impression may have been gained by some that maybe cooperatives were in this position. I wish to make it perfectly clear—and I think he will confirm it—that cooperatives have to and do pay taxes to the municipalities on their property.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. KNOWLES: On division.

Resolution agreed to on division.

13. That for the 1946 and subsequent taxation years, paragraph (q) of section four which exempts from taxation the income of credit unions be amended to exempt the income of any credit union or any corporation or association the members of which are credit unions which derives its revenue primarily from loans made to members residing within the province to which is is restricted for carrying on its business.

Mr. ABBOTT: This resolution relates to credit unions. These credit unions are at present exempt under the law and will continue to be so exempt. The McDougall commission, however, recommended certain changes in the wording of the exemption, and this resolution is generally in line with its recommendation.

Mr. COLDWELL: Resolution 13 refers to any corporation or association the members of which are credit unions, and which derives its revenue primarily from loans made to members residing within the province to which it is restricted for carrying on its business. During the war, a good many credit unions took any spare money they had and put it into victory bonds. What is the interpretation, under resolution 13, regarding investments made by such unions in victory bonds? Would that be taxed, or does this primarily cover the point? I should like the minister to give us a statement regarding that, because it is an important point.

Mr. ABBOTT: The effect of the legislation which will be introduced upon the basis of this resolution will be to exempt the whole income of credit unions. There is a question under section 4 (q) as it now stands that income such as my hon. friend has referred to would not be exempt because of the language of the section which now provides that the revenue shall be derived from loans made primarily to members residing within the territorial limits, and so on. This refers to revenue derived primarily from loans made to members residing within the province to which it is restricted. The intention is that the legislation when drafted will exempt the entire income of credit unions.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is the point.

Mr. WRIGHT: We have in Saskatchewan what is known as the Saskatchewan cooperative credit society. The membership of this society consists of all the credit unions in the province, or, if not all, a very large proportion of them. There are other members of the society of the various cooperative associations in the province, a great number belong to the society. The spare funds of the credit unions are made available to these cooperative societies through the Saskatchewan cooperative credit association. Would the minister tell us what the position of that society will be under this resolution with regard to taxation?

Mr. ABBOTT: That will be taken care of. The point has not been overlooked. There is some difficulty in preparing a suitable drafting of the act in order to bring in recommendation 2 A of the commission, but I am told by the officials that they believe it is going to be possible to work out a satisfactory section to cover the point which the hon. member has just raised.

Resolution agreed to.

14. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years, the provison exempting from tax the income of mutual corporations not having a capital represented by shares be amended to remove therefrom mutual insurance corporations except mutual insurance corporations which derive their premiums wholly from insurance of churches, schools or other religious, educational or charitable institutions.

Mr. ABBOTT: Resolutions 14 and 15 deal with mutual insurance companies and parallel generally the main proposals with respect to cooperatives. The main proposals with respect to cooperatives are, as the committee knows, the repeal of the exempting section 4(p) and allowance of deduction for patronage dividends. Resolutions 14 and 15 propose similar action with respect to mutual insurance companies other than life insurance companies. That is to say, resolution 14 repeals the present provision exempting mutual insurance companies, while resolution 15 allows these companies a deduction from income on patronage dividends; that is to say, amounts returned to the policy holders. In effect, the companies will pay tax on the amount of profits retained by the company and transferred to general reserve which is free from the individual claims of policy holders.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Does this refer to fire insurance companies only? It says mutual insurance corporations.

Mr. ABBOTT: Fire, casualty, automobile and the like, other than life.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I understand that a number of mutual companies carry on business in rural communities, insuring farm buildings. As the minister knows, it is not a lucrative type of business, and the ordinary fire insurance company is not at all fussy about insuring farm buildings because of the hazards. I was wondering whether it would be possible to include, along with religious, educational and charitable institutions, such as schools and churches, farm buildings.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be glad to consider that and take it into account when the legislation is being prepared.

Mr. MENARY: In our riding we have two companies, one a mutual insurance company and the other a wind and weather company. These companies were organized by the farmers putting up so much money and charging a certain fee. Afterwards they obtained some capital which they have not paid out, but they pay the losses. Would these companies be subject to taxation? They are mutual companies, as I said before and they have a reserve now.

Mr. ABBOTT: If these companies or the mutuals transfer anything to reserve from the claims of policyholders, then they would be subject to tax in the same way as a cooperative; otherwise, they would not. As the committee probably knows, in the case of mutuals such as my hon. friend has referred to, the principal tax imposed under the Special War Revenue Act is a premium tax. The provision there is that if more than fifty per cent is from farm buildings premiums the tax is not imposed.

Mr. MENARY: These are all insuring farm properties.

Mr. ABBOTT: Anything transferred to general reserve would be subject to tax.

Mr. McMASTER: I should like to say something on this resolution. The minister may overlook this, but these companies are really true cooperative institutions. In my hand I have the Ontario sessional papers. In Ontario there are sixty-seven farmers mutual fire insurance companies. To show how small they are, the county of Middlesex has ten. Nearly every township has its own fire insurance company. The total amount of premiums received during 1942 was about $1,736,000, as compared with a total of nearly $14,000,000 received from joint stock companies. The amount of premium is small. In the case of the Ontario companies I have not the exact amount of the reserve, but the companies have paid their fire losses as they arose; consequently they are bound to have a certain reserve; otherwise they could not meet the losses when they occur.

This afternoon the Acting Minister of Finance was helpful in telling hon. members of the party to my left how they could evade taxation by getting rid of their assets, revolving them around and paying patronage dividends. But these companies cannot get rid of their assets; they have to keep them. Let us take an example, the Pictou county farm mutual which has a dominion charter. Its statement appears in full in the bluebook put out by the department which has to do with fire insurance. I find that the Pictou county farmers' mutual has about the same premium income as the Ontario companies have. This company considers it must have gross assets of at least $99,000, or practically $100,000. On the basis of the three per cent rule it would pay a cooperative tax on $3,000, or a corporation tax of $900. When we consider that their total expense for commissions is only $1,620, that their total fees, salaries, directors' fees, auditors' fees and everything else are only $1,583, the minister will see at once that a great burden will be placed on these companies if they are taxed. These companies do business which the old-line companies do not want; that is, these companies do business in small areas where they know the people and buildings, and do it cheaply, whereas the old-line companies would have to send out special assessors to look at the buildings and perhaps fix the rate in different cases. They are doing work which is essential, because the experience of the farmers in Ontario is that, once a building is burnt, it is difficult to have it rebuilt and the farm becomes practically abandoned. Instead of taxing these companies $900 a year, I would suggest that the government would be well advised to bonus them to the extent of $900.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be glad to take my hon. friend's remarks into consideration. As my hon. friend knows, many of these companies operate on a premium note basis and consequently do not need a reserve.

Mr. McMASTER: They may not get the money in fast enough; they must have a reserve.

Mr. HACKETT: A moment ago the minister referred to the Special War Revenue Act.

Mr. ABBOTT: We shall be coming to that resolution. I referred to it in replying to the hon. member.

Mr. HACKETT: Shall we be coming to it to-night?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is doubtful; I had not intended to.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister discuss it if it is reached to-night?

Mr. ABBOTT: Not the question which I think my hon. friend has in mind. That resolution is to stand to-night anyway.

Mr. BENTLEY: I should like to ask a question for information purposes, but I am not certain that this is the proper place. I cannot find the place in any of these four resolutions, although I think it must be here somewhere. If the minister will turn to page 45 of the McDougall report he will find a reference in paragraph 9 to the exemption from income tax of telephone services, distribution of electric power and medical and hospital services. Where are these items dealt with, or is it intended to deal with them?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that this is the place to deal with them. They are not dealt with specifically particularly, because it was not desired to make a great many exceptions in the legislation. I shall be prepared to discuss these when we come to the bill. I believe some are already covered in the act as it now stands. The income of any company, or commission, or association not less than ninety per cent of whose capital or stock is owned by a province or municipality is exempt. That would apply to some of them. That is section 4, paragraph (d) of the Income War Tax Act. If my hon. friend will let that question stand we can discuss it in more detail on the bill. I believe that most of these corporations he referred to are already exempt under the existing provisions of the act.

Resolution agreed to.

15. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years, there may be deducted for the purposes of this act, from the income of insurance companies, other than life insurance companies, whether mutual corporations or joint stock companies, amounts credited to policyholders by way of dividends or refund of premiums or of premium deposits and either

(a) paid to the policyholder,

(b) credited to the policyholder on account of premiums for renewal of policies or

(c) credited on terms under which the policyholder is entitled to or may obtain payment thereof within a period not exceeding thirty days after demand for payment by him and if notice of crediting on such terms has been given to the policyholder.

Resolution agreed to.

30. That a corporation or joint stock company shall pay a tax at one-half the ordinary rate of income tax for corporations upon income derived on or after January 1, 1947, from the operation of a mine:—

(a) that has come into production during the period commencing January 1, 1944, and ending December 31, 1949, and

(b) that, in the case of a mine that has come into production before January 1, 1946, is a basic metal or strategic mineral mine and in the case of a mine that has come into production after January 1, 1946, is a metalliferous or industrial mineral mine, during the first three complete taxation years after the mine comes into production.

Mr. ABBOTT: In a moment I shall ask one of my colleagues to move an amendment to this resolution. Resolution 30 provides that new mines coming into production after January 1, 1947, shall not pay corporation income tax for the first three years. The amendment to the resolution which I shall ask to have proposed in a moment grants this complete exemption instead of the half rate called for in the resolution as it stands. This more generous provision is introduced in the light of the disappearance of the premium on United States funds which was announced recently. Paragraphs (a) and (b) of the resolution deal with the unexpired portion of the three-year period in the case of certain mines which came into production after January 1, 1944, and in respect of which exemption for excess profits taxes was granted. These mines will also be exempt from corporation income tax upon income derived on and after January 1, 1947.

Mr. McCANN: I move that:

Resolution 30 be amended by striking out the words "pay a tax of one-half" and substituting therefor "be exempt from."

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Where does that come in?

The CHAIRMAN: In the first line of the resolution.

Mr. ABBOTT: The resolution would then read:

That a corporation or joint stock company shall be exempt from the ordinary rate of income tax for corporations . . .

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am not smart enough to follow this.

Mr. HACKETT: Shall be exempt from what?

Mr. ABBOTT: In colloquial language the provision is this. The original proposal was that new mines coming into production after the first day of January, 1947, would pay income tax at half rates for three years. The amendment now proposes that they will be completely exempt from income tax for three years. In other words, instead of paying half the rate they will pay no tax. In place of the words "pay a tax at one-half" we substitute the words "be exempt from".

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I wonder if this could stand for a moment. I believe the hon. member for York West will have something to say about it, and he will return to the chamber in a short time.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have no doubt some other hon. members may wish to offer some observations in the meantime.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Will this provision apply to oil wells?

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Why not?

Mr. ABBOTT: We have other provisions applying to them.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Surely an oil well is a mining operation, just the same as a gold mine.

Mr. ABBOTT: We have other legislation for oil wells, as my hon. friend knows. There are some resolutions included in these now before us, and I should be very happy to listen to the hon. member if he would make his observations on the appropriate resolution.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am anxious to know now if there are any similar amendments with respect to oil wells.

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): As it is now proposed, it applies only to mines.

Mr. ABBOTT: There are no similar amendments.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then perhaps I may discuss this matter from the point of view of mining. An oil well is nothing but a mine. Why does the minister make a different provision for mines from that for oil wells?

Mr. ABBOTT: For obvious reasons we have to give tax relief to oil wells on a slightly different basis. I am told that the first three years of an oil well are generally the best, whereas in mining that is not generally so. Then there is the matter of the change in the exchange rate which has affected gold mining, but does not apply to oil wells.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Oh, it affects them tremendously. But, leaving that aside—and perhaps, Mr. Chairman, I am out of order in discussing the matter at this time.

The CHAIRMAN: A discussion of the taxation of oil wells would more properly come under resolutions 31 and 32.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I, with the greatest deference and respect, agree with you that such discussion would be more appropriate on those items. But it seems to me germane to the point as to whether or not they are to be treated in a similar manner. Certainly the drilling of an oil well is mining, in the broad sense. While the minister exempts mines for three years—and I am not complaining—I would remind him that when one opens a mine he has some idea of what is underground. The drills work this way, that way and the other way, and ore bodies are proved. But in connection with the drilling of an oil well, the drill is the only geologist found thus far which has ever been any good, because what the drill finds controls whether you lose your money or whether you get back a return. Certainly the geologist has gone a long way. We have seismographs, and all that sort of thing. The most that the sponsors for these instruments have ever claimed for them is that they can find a structure. And, that structure, having been found, no method has yet shown whether the structure will contain salt-water or oil. No scientific method has yet been found which will determine that fact. Accordingly I suggest to the minister that by the time he reaches his resolution respecting oil, he should have some regard to the fact that both of these endeavours are mining endeavours, and that he might find some assistance for the people of Saskatchewan and Alberta who are so busy these days in trying to find oil.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall not answer the hon. member's point at this time, because it will be dealt with more fully on resolution 31. I would point out to him, what he probably already knows, that under section 8 (10) of the Income War Tax Act a special 50 per cent tax credit is given to oil wells for deep drilling, and the like, and that there is no comparable exemption for the mining industry.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): With great respect I suggest that the acting minister is quite wrong about that. He has a special provision for deep-test wells, but no provision at all for the man who goes out in the province hon. members to my immediate left come from, and in the plains of Alberta where shallow-test drilling is found. The minister has nothing to help those people.

Let us always remember that great companies never discover oil fields. They have always been discovered by the small man who does some wild-catting, and those discoveries are later bought up by the big interests.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is a 20 per cent tax credit; it was 26⅔ per cent.

Mr. ADAMSON: I wish to refer to the minister's statement of last Friday evening, but I doubt whether this is the section upon which to do it. However, I have a suggestion to make to the minister on this resolution. The resolution as it is amended provides for exemption from ordinary income tax for the first three years for mining companies coming into production. My suggestion—and I believe it is an important one—is that most young mines coming into production are not profitable enough in the first three years to come under the provisions of the Income War Tax Act. Seldom do they make a profit in those years. But under the regulations of the department they are forced to make annual write-offs for both depreciation and depletion. The write-offs are at the rate of 15 per cent per annum. So that when the three years are up and the income tax payments begin, the pre-development charges, depreciation and depletion are written off to the extent of 45 per cent. I am speaking more to a ruling of the department than to an amendment in the section.

I am asking that new mines coming into production, and exempt from taxation, shall not be forced to undertake depletion and depreciation at the rate of 15 per cent per annum for the first three years. If that is done the minister will really bring into effect the meaning and intention of section 3. If that is not done it means that the mine has virtually 50 per cent of the depreciation written off when it should be in a tax-free period.

The intent of the regulation is that mines shall be tax free for the first three years. Therefore I am asking the minister to rule that this shall also include suspension of depreciation and other write-offs.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend will appreciate that that is a matter for the Minister of National Revenue in the administration of the income tax act.

Mr. ADAMSON: I am making this plea in this house because, unless that is done, the whole intent of this resolution will be abortive. Mines do not pay taxes in the first three years because very few of them make sufficient profit, although there is occasionally one that may. If you force them to make their write-offs at 15 per cent it means that when the three-year period is up their depreciation will be virtually 50 per cent gone, at a time when they begin their normal life of tax paying.

I realize that this is a matter for the Department of National Revenue, but I want to make the plea now, and I want to make it as strong as I possibly can, that they should not be forced to write off any part of their pre-development expenses, the cost of structures, the cost of the mill, the cost of sinking a shaft and all the other essential costs in bringing a mine into operation until such time as the first three years are up. I think that is the true intention of the framers of this resolution.

Mr. ABBOTT: As my hon. friend has pointed out, it is not a matter for legislation; it is a matter for administrative action on the part of the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think this proposal is an exceedingly generous contribution to the mining industry. I should like to put this point of view before the committee. A mine or an oil well taps the natural resources of Canada and those natural resources are the property of the people of Canada. When gold or some other mineral is taken out of a mine, nothing but a hole remains and the same thing applies to oil. I know of no industry in Canada which has been as wasteful of the natural resources of the people of Canada as the oil industry. One has only to go to the Turner valley in Alberta to see the amount of valuable gas which is being wasted, gas which could heat most of the homes in western Canada. He would then realize the valuable resources that have been wasted in that particular area.

It is always said that private enterprise is prepared to take risks, but it seems to me that much of the legislation we have adopted in this country over the last few years has been designed to take the risk away from private enterprise. To a great extent that is true of the legislation we have passed concerning the mining industry during the last number of years. Year by year we have extended to the mining industry valuable concessions in the way of being able to write off certain depreciation, to have allowances made for prospecting done, and now we come to a proposal which will give new mines complete exemption for three years. Where is the risk to capital in proportion to the rewards which they expect? If a rich mine is found the profits that accrue are out of all proportion to the amount of money invested in the undertaking.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): How many mines do not find anything?

Mr. COLDWELL: It is quite true that a large number do not produce, but the individuals who go into the mining industry go into it with a view to getting large rewards. If they are going to get large rewards they should be prepared to take a commensurate risk.

Mr. LENNARD: There is not one in a thousand that makes anything.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is all very well, but during the past few years, from what I have been able to see, persons engaged in mining have done pretty well.

Mr. CASSELMAN: You have not heard about the losses.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is just like the old story about the widow and the orphans, always a loss but never a gain. The industries that are receiving this concession, mining and so on, bring about a terrific depletion of Canada's natural resources. Once these resources have been taken out of the ground, they are gone completely. Very often we find the people who have benefited from this kind of operation have no interest in Canada except the amount they can take out of Canada somewhere else.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is perfectly true. How about Sir Harry Oakes? How about Sir

Herbert Holt? How about a number of others I could mention? What interest had they in Canada except to take everything they could out of the country and go somewhere where they could get tax exemption and would have to pay no succession duties?

Mr. LENNARD: Only one or two people have done that.

Mr. ABBOTT: That may apply to Sir Harry Oakes, but it did not apply to Sir Herbert Holt. I am told by the deputy minister that it did not apply to Sir Harry Oakes either.

Mr. COLDWELL: Leave Sir Harry Oakes out of it entirely. The fact remains that these natural resources belong to the people of Canada. These persons are going to take those resources and use them for their own profit.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): They put in more than they take out.

Mr. COLDWELL: Do not tell me a story like that, that they put in more than they take out. The statement is an obvious absurdity. Many people are trying to get into the mining industry to-day. So far as I am concerned, I am opposed to this concession being made. Once the resources are taken out, there is nothing left but a hole in the ground, except that frequently there is also a ghost town. In many cases the workers who have done the work in the mining industry have had to leave and take a loss on the homes which they have built. Ghost towns dot many parts of this country, and these have been created by mining and other industries of that description which have squandered the natural resources of the country by private exploitation. I am just saying that I am opposed to this legislation.

Mr. HANSELL: While the hon. member was speaking, I picked up a paper which contained an interesting Canadian Press dispatch under date of July 27, from Moose Jaw. This reads:

> Resources minister J. L. Phelps of Saskatchewan yesterday told delegates to the C.C.F. provincial convention here that the Saskatchewan government is permitting private enterprise to develop northern oil resources because it does not feel ready to take the step itself. He said that the "government will move" at the proper time.
>
> The statement came at the closing session of the three-day convention when P. G. Makaroff of Saskatoon C.C.F. provincial council member, asked why a socialist government was permitting private enterprise to develop oil resources in Saskatchewan and to sell stock.

Mr. COLDWELL: The two cases are not analogous. In the first instance, the Saskatchewan government will get a royalty from the oil taken out of the ground.

Mr. LENNARD: That is all right, is it?

Mr. COLDWELL: In the second instance, we are proposing as a federal parliament to give complete exemption to the mining industry for three years. Those are two entirely different propositions. We are not opposed to private enterprise, but we demand that private enterprise shall take the risks if it takes the rewards. That is the point. Otherwise it is no longer private enterprise. But what you are trying to do is to remove the risk from private enterprise and to place upon the people of Canada the risks that private enterprise should assume if it is to take the profits for itself.

Mr. BURTON: While I realize that this resolution does not deal with oil and with what took place at the C.C.F. convention in Moose Jaw recently, I want to advise the hon. member for Macleod that, as usual, that press statement carried only half the story. I shall not take time to tell the whole story now.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to make one or two comments on what was said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I quite agree that we should not take all the risk out of private enterprise, and if he will take the record of what happens in these various mines he will see that there is quite enough risk and loss left even if a certain concession is made at the outset. Before he commits himself against these alleviations granted to the mining industry, he might take into account one thing he did not mention. He talked of one or two or three people making a lot of money and then leaving the country, and when they do that my feelings are about the same as his. But he forgot to mention the people who do not make any money. He also forgot to mention another important factor, and that is the amount of labour that goes into these things, which is paid for before anybody makes a nickel out of the mines. He also forgot to mention that we have reasonably efficient income tax laws which take a very large amount of money away from the very few individuals who, after taking the risks, make a little money. Therefore I suggest that his speech was based on unsound premises.

Mr. HARKNESS: The hon member for Rosetown-Biggar introduced the matter of exploration for oil in this country, and he made some disparaging remarks about the terrific waste which had gone on in Alberta and which was going on there now, he said. His remarks indicated a deplorable lack of knowledge of the history of the search for oil in Alberta and a lack of understanding of the oil situation as it exists at the present time. There is no tremendous amount of waste of gas going on in Alberta, particularly in the Turner valley, now and has not been for many years.

Mr. COLDWELL: For how many?

Mr. HARKNESS: For a number of years. I would not be prepared to say just how many, but conservation measures have been taken there for at least the past ten years.

Mr. COLDWELL: After twenty-five years of waste.

Mr. HARKNESS: The hon. member's statement was as to what was going on now. Following that up, I might point out to the hon. member that had what he thinks should have been done been done, if the oil wells drilled in Turner valley when the field was entirely a wet gas producer had been capped, we would have produced no oil in that country whatever, and the result would have been that the taxpayers of this dominion would have been called upon to pay a bill of some $7,000,000 more in subsidies last year for the prairie provinces alone, let alone the tremendous value that has come from the development of oil in that province. Furthermore, he seems to think that all a man has to do is to drill a mine or an oil well and reap a fortune. Over $150,000,000 of risk capital has been put up to drill oil wells in Alberta and up to date there have been returns of less than $130,000,000. There have been losses of between $20,000,000 and $25,000,000 to the enterprisers who put up the money to bring oil into production. Possibly he thinks it would have been an excellent thing for the Alberta government or the dominion government to do this oil exploration under government ownership and take that loss. My answer is that they never would have done so and there would have been no oil development if it had been left to governments. Unless private enterprise is given encouragement through proper taxation to go ahead and develop the industry, it will not develop.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: This resolution contains what I was trying to secure under resolution 16. In other words, the tax exemption applies to mines that have come into production during the period commencing January 1, 1944, and ending December 31, 1949, which means that a mine coming into operation in 1944, 1945 or 1946 will have a three-year exemption. That privilege is not extended in the case of the cooperatives. I withdrew my amendment at that time because I felt that the minister had given us an undertaking that he would give the matter consideration. I am pointing this out as a further argument to those I used on resolution 16. In the case of these mines there is an exemption granted which may be considered as being retroactive. The minister made quite a case by saying that we should legislate for 1947 and subsequent years, but in this case we are legislating for as far back as 1944. I am not asking for special privileges but for something along this line under resolution 16.

Mr. ABBOTT: The answer to that is that paragraphs (a) and (b) of this resolution simply carry forward an existing exemption which these companies had from excess profits tax in connection with mines which came into production after January, 1944. We are simply continuing that exemption from the excess profits tax.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I do not know that we understand each other. All I am asking is that the same consideration be given to existing cooperatives which started this year or in 1945 or 1944. I think the cases are parallel.

I was interested in hearing, as I always am, what the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario had to say. He said that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar did not mention the part that labour played in the development of mines. I do not think he was quite correct, because my leader did make reference to the fact that it was the labourer who produced the wealth which he does not always share. If this exemption from income tax also included the man who works in the mines for the first three years, it would have my support.

Mr. LENNARD: I would remind the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that to keep one man working underground in the mines in southern Canada eight men are employed outside the mine.

Mr. JACKMAN: I was interested in hearing the leader of the C.C.F. say that more money was taken out of the mines than was ever put into them. That statement of his seemed to draw a lot of support from his followers. I am glad that he has such an optimistic impression of the mining industry, particularly the gold-mining industry. I hope, on behalf of himself and his followers, that his optimism is born of personal experience, because so far as gold-mining is concerned it is much too rich for my blood. It is too risky an enterprise, and I will leave it to younger and more enterprising individuals.

Mr. LENNARD: Why look at me?

Mr. JACKMAN: I should be interested if the hon. member who is the leader of the C.C.F. has any figures to demonstrate that far more has been taken out of the ground than has been put into it. I well recall Mark Twain's definition of a mine, "A hole in the ground in which fools throw their money." However, the hon. member may have figures for us. But I think the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar's quarrel is not with lack of enterprise on the part of private individuals, but with the niggardliness of mother nature, who saw fit to deposit gold in very small quantities in very few places in the world. I not only support the recommendation of the government to grant some tax exemption to these new mines which are now being drilled and which are expected to come in, but I also support the admirable recommendation of my colleague the hon. member for York West for further relief. I do that because I recognize, and if the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar will be practical and forget his theory he will see, if he has taken the trouble to acquire any knowledge of the facts which now face us, that there is a whole field of gold-bearing rock structure, particularly in the province of Quebec, which is not commercial ore except with the ten per cent premium which golds formerly commanded in terms of Canadian currency, namely $38.50 per ounce as against $35; and if the premium is not available, as is the case to-day, a great many mines which were scheduled to go into production will not be in conjunction with that of his colleague, the able to do so.

It is not a question of whether there is sufficient venturesome money around; it is simply a question of looking at the assay values of the gold-bearing rock and knowing that it is going to turn out so much per ton. It is perfectly foolish to continue to develop that property if you are not going to get back a dollar for the dollar you put in. There must be at least an honest return in that way: otherwish we would be wasting the assets of the country.

The government now sees fit to give these mines on the borderline—and it may apply to the occasional rich mine; I do not know, but the great problem in Canada to-day is the majority of new mines in the Quebec mining area, which badly need it—this alleviation from taxation which the Minister has indicated in the present resolution. However, I should also like to endorse as strongly as I can the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for York West, and say that much of this advantage which the government proposes in the resolution will be lost because the new mines will have a substantial proportion of their pre-development costs and of their mine structural costs—I am not familiar with the exact terminology of the mining industry—written off compulsorily when they are supposed to be getting three years relief, and perhaps when they have not even profits of any sort from their operations against which to write off the depreciation and depletion costs. In those circumstances, I believe the resolution of the minister is certainly abortive and is nullified by the working of the Department of National Revenue. I hope that the minister's department, Minister of National Revenue, will take these two considerations under advisement, in the interest of these marginal mines, which will either pass out of the picture, or will live, because some relief is given to them, in hope of better times to come. There will then be a chance for this large mining field in Canada to continue to operate.

Mr. GREEN: There is one thought I should like to leave with the acting minister about the remarks which were made by the leader of the C.C.F., the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I do not question for a minute that he was sincere in what he said, but the unfortunate result of a speech like that is this, that when the Department of Finance comes to consider assistance for mines in the years that lie ahead, or even in this session, the thought is apt to arise at once, "Oh, well, some of the members of the house are against any help being given; they think the miners are all big fellows and should not get any help; we had better just go slow about giving this relief. The whole of the C.C.F. are against it. We had better let it ride for another year." The result may very well be that relief will not be given that should be given.

The remarks of the leader of the C.C.F. stem, I am afraid, from the fact that he does not know anything about mining. He comes from a wheat-growing province, Saskatchewan, and his remarks are entirely out of line with the needs of British Columbia. My province is a great mining province. I think that, next to lumbering, mining is our most important industry. I was born in a mining town and raised in a mining district. It was not a case of half a dozen men coming in and making a lot of money and then getting out; everybody in the whole district was interested in mining; nearly everybody had a claim and expected at some time to make forty, fifty, a hundred thousand dollars or perhaps a million. Storekeepers financed prospectors, and many of the prospectors made good. From my own experience, these prospectors were the backbone of that district. Prospectors have opened up large parts of British Columbia; they have made a great contribution to that province. The unfortunate position today is that the prospectors are practically all gone. And here we have the leader of the C.C.F. rising in his place to-night and complaining about help being given to prospectors.

Mr. COLDWELL: Prospecting.

Mr. GREEN: Oh, well, "prospecting". Prospecting is done by individual prospectors. Somebody has to put a pack on his back, go out in the hills and try to find a new mine. Very few new mines are being found in Canada. That is the alarming fact in connection with our mining industry. So I say to the minister, don't just be led up the garden path—

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, I won't.

Mr. GREEN:—by the leader of the C.C.F.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not by the C.C.F. My hon. friend may rest assured that we shall be on our guard.

Mr. GREEN: The relief given in this resolution is needed. It will be of help to the mining industry and that industry deserves all the help it can get.

Mr. MacINNIS: I hesitate about taking part in a discussion of this kind when there are so many experts.

Mr. LENNARD: Oh, not that business again!

Mr. MacINNIS: I was not referring—

Mr. LENNARD: Every time you rise you take that line.

Mr. MacINNIS: I was not referring to the hon. member for Wentworth. There is something strange in the arguments which I heard to-night. If I understand aright what was said, no one makes money in mining; everyone who goes into it takes a loss. That is the argument.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is the argument that was made—that there was more money put in than was ever taken out.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The argument is that more people are losing than are gaining.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is right—that there was more money put in mines than was taken out.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Not money; more people lose.

Mr. JACKMAN: I asked you to prove the contrary; that is all.

Mr. MacINNIS: I took down the remarks of the hon. member for Rosedale. He said it would be perfectly foolish to go on if we did not get a dollar back for every dollar we put in. Surely it would be perfectly foolish, and soon even my hon. friends, who are so enterprising that they are willing to venture everything, would not carry on very long. It would be foolish even if we got a dollar in return for every dollar invested or ventured. Consequently somebody must be getting more than a dollar's return for every dollar that goes in. But what is happening in this country is that people who cannot afford it are putting money into mines.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the horse races?

Mr. MacINNIS: If the hon. gentleman wishes to play the horses, that is his business. I did not know that was a particularly good business, and I am interested in good business. The people who buy mining stock, the great majority of those who put their money into mines, do not derive the benefits from it. The big fellows do not lose, and if you observe what is going on in Ontario to-day under the security commissioner—I believe that is his title—you will find that many of these men are being prosecuted for fleecing innocent people in this sort of thing.

I am not opposed to the principle of what is proposed here, but it should be done properly. The minerals of Canada are the property of the people of Canada. They are a Canadian asset. A mine is different from a forest or a river or the sea from which we get our fish. Once you have taken the mineral out of the mine there is nothing left.

An hon. MEMBER: You could take all the fish out.

Mr. MacINNIS: No. There would still be suckers left no matter what you did. What should be done—and some government, some day before the mines are depleted will do it, I hope—is to see that the people of Canada as a whole, and not only those who put money into mines shall derive some advantage from these national assets. The miners themselves have an interest in them. What has happened? The member for Vancouver South said that he was brought up in a mining town, but there is not much mining there now. There are heaps of slag and holes in the ground and lots of dead towns in British Columbia all over the province.

Mr. GREEN: Oh, no; they are not all over the province.

Mr. MacINNIS: They are all over the province except that part of the province that is not habitable. I have gone all over the province and I know what it is like. What happens is this. The mines are worked out, and the people who have settled in those localities find themselves without means to make a living. The result is that they have to move and start life anew somewhere else. What a responsible government should do is to take a part of the profits of the mine and a part of the proceeds of taxation that is levied on the mines and set up a fund, so that when a particular area is worked out the workers who have made their homes there can be removed to new areas where new work is starting up.

Besides that, there is, around these mines, land that can be used for other purposes. There are some agricultural lands that could be developed at the same time. Nothing is done, however, except to take out everything that is in the ground and then to clear out. That is pretty much the case so far as the forests of British Columbia are concerned. It is only within the last few years that, after great pressure, sometimes from the government's forest service employees, who each year drew attention to what was happening to the resources of the province, some action has been taken. Whether it is soon enough to catch up with the spoliation of our resources is a question which no one can answer at the present time. This sort of thing, done in a hit-or-miss fashion to help a few speculators, is not good enough. We should have a programme extended over a number of years that would be beneficial not only to those who are getting money, by hook or by crook, from people who are so innocent that they will put their money on the horses or in a mine—

Mr. JACKMAN: Or even on the C.C.F.

Mr. MacINNIS: Oh, no. These people do not put money on the C.C.F. Those who put money on the C.C.F. are people with intelligence who want something for the future. Some day they will get a return, and it will not be a depleted mine.

Mr. LENNARD: The hon. member for Vancouver East made a remark to the effect that I was not expert in anything. Let me assure him that I have never posed as an expert in anything, but I will say this. Those hon. gentlemen who sit directly to my left profess to be experts on everything under the sun, but I would remind them that those who live in glass houses should be the last to throw stones.

Mr. LITTLE: I have lived in a mining district for the past thirty-five years and have seen prospectors going out prospecting. I knew Sir Harry Oakes when he was a poor man like the rest of us in that part of the country, and I know he was one of the best prospectors we had. I do not, therefore, like to hear anyone say things about a man who has gone. I have no brief for him in having left the country, but I can say that there was no finer man than he when he was plain Harry Oakes.

In my opinion, we would not have had a mine in Cobalt or Noranda or Kirkland Lake or Timmins if any government had been developing those properties, let alone my hon. friends opposite who profess to know so much about mines. I have seen men, prospectors, leaving and staying away for six weeks at a time, and when a prospector comes back one would hardly know that it was the same man. That was the effect that his sojourn in the bush had had upon him.

Of course there is the motivating idea of making money. That was the idea that I had when I first went to that part of the country. I went into lumbering and remained in it until I went to Kirkland Lake and got into transportation. I put up the first building in Cobalt and I know what these mining men went through. I should like my hon. friends to start mining, going into a place and spending thousands of dollars in a hole and not getting a cent out of it. See how long they would stay in power under those conditions.

Mr. ADAMSON: I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Timiskaming on what he has said. He has shown something of the pioneering spirit that has made this country what it is to-day, and it is to be devoutly hoped that that spirit will not be killed in this chamber.

I wish to put on the record some figures in answer to the contention that labour and other people in general get no benefits out of mines. The figures I am going to put on the record will show that labour and the town do profit from the mines. In the first place, there is an entirely wrong impression about the development of mining. A ton of rock is absolutely of no value to the country unless it is developed. If it is developed it is worth to the country in new wealth the minerals it contains.

Briefly, I should like to put these figures on the record, because I think they are germane to the argument we have had to-night. These are the official figures compiled by the department of mines of Quebec for all the mines in western Quebec for 1944. The average value of a ton of ore was $6.35. This was at $38.50 an ounce for gold. The cost of developing was as follows: general development, 57 cents; development, 74 cents; mining, $2.32, and milling, 93 cents, making a total of $4.56 for direct mining costs. That figure of $4.56 represents very largely the cost of labour. Therefore, out of the $6.35, labour got the bulk of the $4.56 which went for direct mining and milling costs.

Let us get down to cases. Let us look at the profit which all these mines made. The earned surplus of all these mines after taxation was sixty-two cents a ton. The country was better off to the extent of $6.35. Labour got $4.56, or very nearly $4.56. The cost of steel and powder and other things are there, but the great bulk of the cost of mining and milling is labour. Therefore labour got many, many times more out of the $6.35 than did the owners of the property. Surely it is of tremendous advantage to this country that this sort of thing should go on. It is of advantage to labour, because labour gets the bulk of the value of the ore. It is of advantage to the country, because the country is $6.35 richer for every ton of ore that is treated, and there are a great many other advantages as well.

I merely wish to refute as definitely as I can that it is the rich man and the rich company that make the profit. The cost of mining was $4.56, and the profit, sixty-two cents. These are the figures and I think they should be on the record in this debate. That was at $38.50 an ounce for gold.

Amendment agreed to.

Resolution as amended agreed to on division.

31. That the deductions from tax allowed to a corporation whose principal business is the production, refining or marketing of petroleum or petroleum products in respect of drilling and exploration costs be extended to oil wells spudded during the year 1947 and the deepening of oil wells which is commenced in 1947 but that in respect of such wells the deductions be reduced from 26⅔ per cent and 40 per cent of the cost to 20 per cent and 30 per cent respectively.

Mr. ABBOTT: With respect to resolutions 31 to 35 inclusive, the tax credits now granted to petroleum, natural gas and mining industries, in respect of exploration expenses are continued for another year with an appropriate adjustment in the reduction of the flat rate tax on corporation income from forty per cent to thirty per cent. Also under resolution 31, the existing tax credit granted for expenditures in regard to a new oil well is extended to include expenditures incurred in the deepening of an existing well.

Mr. HARKNESS: In connection with resolutions 31, 32, 33 and 35, which are the ones which deal with oil, gas drilling and exploration. I do not wish to repeat what I said in the budget debate, with reference to these matters. However, I should like to draw to the minister's attention the five suggestions which I made at that time and to ask him what action the government is prepared to take in connection with them.

So far as the oil industry is concerned, I have been cheered by some of the concessions which the minister has made to the cooperatives and to the mining business since the budget resolutions have been discussed. I was particularly interested in his announcement that, so far as the gold mines were concerned, the depletion allowance was to be changed so that, as he said, those who need help least will not get most. I strongly recommend to him that he change the regulations so far as the depletion allowance for oil wells is concerned, with that same idea in mind.

The other concession given to gold mines is that new mines would pay no income tax for the first two years of operation. In a modified form that might very well be applied to the oil business. As the minister has said earlier this evening, the first three years of an oil well's operations are its most profitable ones. That is quite true; nevertheless a concession which will accomplish much the same effect should be given to oil wells to encourage further drilling.

The five suggestions which I made when I spoke in the budget debate were as follows: First, the extension of the fifty per cent tax drawback for deep-test wells, to completing abandoned exploratory wells. Whether that is covered in the present regulations, I do not know. I hope the minister will clarify that and afford the extension of that fifty per cent drawback to wells drilled in the plains areas, where it is practically essential to have a large amount of drilling if we are to keep up our present oil production in Canada, let alone expand it. Second, an increase in the depletion allowance from the present 33⅓ per cent to 50 per cent, with probably a regulation in connection with it similar to the one they have in the United States, so that it can be spread over several years and carried forward or backward as desired in order to take care of years in which there is no profit, and other years in which there might be a big one. Third, that all drilling costs, permit and leasing expenses, geological and geophysical expenses and so forth be allowed as deductions for income tax purposes and that these deductions be taken as and when desired. That is, they may be carried forward or backward. Fourth, that the present income tax regulations in connection with oil and gas wells be made part of the permanent tax structure in order that operators may be able to make future financial plans knowing where they stand. Fifth, removal of the subsidies now being paid on crude oil being imported into the prairie provinces in order to enable western crude oil to reach its true economic level. If the minister would make a statement covering these points we might have a good basis on which to proceed.

Resolution stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

FARM IMPLEMENTS

SHORTAGE IN WESTERN CANADA—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Mr. Speaker I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, namely, the serious situation in western Canada with respect to the shortage of suitable farm machinery for the harvesting of the present large crop, due largely to the policy of the government in having, during the year 1945, issued export and reexport permits for 20·2 million dollars' worth of Canada's total production of 46·4 million dollars' worth of farm machinery during that year; and having, during the first six months of 1946 issued export permits for $16,382,400 worth of farm machinery, and having during the first five months of 1946 issued export permits for $4,319,626 worth of reaper-threshers—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman has not the right to make these remarks on his motion.

Mr. WRIGHT: Mr. Speaker, am I not allowed to state the reasons why this matter is urgent?

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not the practice in presenting a motion for adjournment under standing order 31 to discuss the reasons for the motion at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. WRIGHT: I do not wish to discuss the matter at this moment. I merely wish to put before you, Mr. Speaker, certain facts which will permit you to decide whether the situation is urgent.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. gentleman to put his motion before the house without any criticism. If it is adopted he will then have the opportunity in the debate to say whatever he has to say as long as it is relevant to the motion.

Mr. WRIGHT: I will comply with your wishes, Mr. Speaker. I have just returned from western Canada and I found there a very serious situation with respect to the shortage of farm machinery. I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, namely, the serious situation in western Canada with respect to the shortage of suitable farm machinery for the harvesting of the present large crop.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. member shall have leave so to move?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

And more than twenty members having risen:

Mr. WRIGHT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I stated when I first rose, I have just returned from western Canada, where I found a very serious situation with respect to farm machinery for harvesting our present crop. I interviewed a large number of farm machine agents while out there, and found that practically all of them have orders for from one to twenty pieces of farm equipment which they cannot supply at the present time. This is a serious situation in view of the fact that we have a prospective crop of approximately 450,000,000 bushels of wheat coming forward in western Canada—wheat that is urgently needed throughout the whole world.

This situation has arisen because of certain actions of this government. We have heard a lot of discussion of the causes of this serious shortage. We have heard members of the government say and have read in the press throughout Canada that this farm machinery shortage is the result of a shortage of steel, a shortage of pig iron, and various other causes. But in my opinion these are not the real reasons for the present shortage. As I started to say when you called me to order, Mr. Speaker, the shortage is owing mainly to the policy of the government in having during the year 1945 issued export and reexport permits for 20·2 million dollars' worth of Canada's total production of 46·4 million dollars' worth of farm machinery during that year, and having during the first six months of 1946 issued export permits for $16,382,400 worth of farm machinery, and having during the first five months of 1946 issued export permits for $4,319,626 worth of reaper-threshers, of which $2,395,318 worth have been exported to the United States, in consequence of which the present serious situation exists.

Some four weeks ago I received a letter from a returned man in my constituency. While serving overseas for four years his father died and left him a section of land, which he returned to farm. He stated in his letter that he wanted nothing from the government, that all he wanted was the opportunity to buy sufficient farm equipment to do a proper job on that land. He needed a new plough, and asked me if I could get for him a priority for the purchase of it. I was unable to do so. The only thing he could do was to take a loan from the Veterans Land Act administration, thereby obtaining a priority. He did that, but the type of plough he wanted was not available. He wanted a larger type of implement than the Veterans Land Act administration had available for him.

In spite of the fact that this machinery was not available to this veteran we exported from Canada in the first five months in 1945 $2,251,960 worth of disc ploughs, ploughs and plough parts, to the following countries: Belgium, Costa Rica, French Africa, Greece, Mexico, Morocco, Peru, Dominican Republic, Eire, United Kingdom, Syria, British East Africa, British South Africa, Southern Rhodesia, British India, British Guiana, Jamaica, British West Indies, Newfoundland, Australia, New Zealand—it sounds like a lesson in geography—Argentina, Belgian Congo, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, France, Iceland, Italy, Mexico, The Netherlands, Paraguay, Poland, San Salvador, Santa Domingo, Sweden, Turkey, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia, and the United States. Yet we could not supply our own returned men, who have been overseas fighting for this country for the last four years, with the implements of production when they return to this country. I say that is a serious situation, one which this government should be prepared to face.

Why should the government issue to our machine companies permits to export machinery to every country in the world, or practically every country? As a matter of fact I have the list of exports for 1945, which shows that we exported farm machinery to seventy-one countries. I was alarmed at this situation, and I placed certain questions on the order paper with respect to this matter. Not only that, but I asked on the orders of the day on June 20 of this year—Hansard, page 2659 the following question, which was directed to the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Trade and Commerce:

> Is the minister aware that there are pools of farm machinery in western Canada and that the machinery is being held and not distributed? Is he aware that this machinery is urgently needed by veterans? In view of the fact that in some cases it is proposed to reship this machinery back to the United States, will the minister make the necessary inquiries and issue the necessary orders to see that this machinery is distributed in Canada and not sent back to the United States?

I received the following answer to my question:

> The wartime prices and trade board say that the only "pools" of farm machinery in western Canada are Veterans Land Act pools. No farm machinery is being exported to U.S.A. which can be used in Canada.

Note that sentence.

> Export is controlled by the administrator of farm machinery, wartime prices and trade board.

In view of the facts which I have just placed before you, that in reaper, harvesters or combines alone in the first five months of this year we have exported $4,220,148 worth, urgently needed in western Canada, and that we have exported to the United States in that same five months $2,395,318 worth—

Mr. ABBOTT: How much did we import from the States?

Mr. WRIGHT: We have imported from the United States $1,392,760 worth, or approximately one million dollars' worth less than we have exported. I want to be fair about this: we have imported from the United States much more farm machinery than we have exported; in fact than we have exported to all the rest of the world, but that does not alter the fact that we have produced a lot of farm machinery in Canada and have exported approximately forty per cent of it to almost every other country in the world, in face of urgent need of machinery right here in Canada to harvest our present crop.

Mr. ABBOTT: What about other countries which need to grow food to feed themselves?

Mr. WRIGHT: Yes, there are some other countries which need to grow food; but we are exporting to Brazil, Argentina, Spain, Costa Rica,—

Mr. ABBOTT: How much to the Argentine?

Mr. WRIGHT: And to practically every country in the world.

Mr. ABBOTT: How much to the Argentine?

Mr. WRIGHT: We are exporting machinery to build up agriculture in these countries to enter world markets in competition with Canadian agriculture in the next two or three years.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is a pretty selfish argument that my hon. firend is making.

Mr. WRIGHT: The government's policy is a shortsighted policy. We should at least supply our own veterans and our own farmers with the machinery they require. I am not against exporting. Let nobody in this house try to interpret my remarks as opposition to the exporting of farm machinery once we have supplied the needs of our own farmers. But the needs of our veterans and of our farmers should be the first consideration and the first charge on the production of this country, not the obtaining of a market in some foreign country because owing to prevailing exchange rates our manufacturers are able to get a better price for their machinery in those countries than they can get from Canadian farmers.

That is the position we are in to-day in Canada. This government is prepared to back the people who are out to make money through the export market at this time, irrespective of the needs of the Canadian people. And this applies not only to farm machinery but to a lot of other commodities as well. If I were to quote statistics of exports in the first five months of this year as contained in this publication before me, with regard to the sale of other articles, you would find the same condition existing.

Mr. ABBOTT: You might quote exports of wheat too, while you are at it.

Mr. WRIGHT: If the minister will just hold his remarks he will have plenty of opportunity to reply to me.

Mr. TUCKER: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WRIGHT: I wish, Mr. Speaker, to continue my remarks.

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. TUCKER: Is the hon. member afraid to answer questions which are put in order to get information? I wondered if the hon. gentleman had the figures for imports of farm machinery into Canada in the same period.

Mr. WRIGHT: Yes, I have imports and exports. I will give them before I sit down.

Mr. TUCKER: Do the imports not exceed the exports?

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. WRIGHT: The hon. member has not yet gone back to Saskatchewan; he cannot override me.

Mr. TUCKER: Do the imports not exceed the exports? You cannot have it both ways.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is a fair question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would call the attention of hon. members to the fact that when an hon. member has the floor he should not be interrupted without his permission.

Mr. REID: We are all having a good time, anyway.

Mr. WRIGHT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am prepared to answer any reasonable question.

Mr. TUCKER: Is that not reasonable?

Mr. WRIGHT: But I should like to complete my argument first, and then if there are any questions I shall be quite prepared to answer them.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is no argument.

Mr. WRIGHT: I have plenty of figures here to justify everything I am saying. I have the import as well as the export figures. When

I placed my question on the order paper with respect to this matter I asked that the imports and exports be given for all farm machinery and farm equipment imported to or exported from Canada, the amounts, the cost, and the countries with which the business was done. I was told here in the house that this would require the work of three stenographers, probably for a week, and would fill several pages of Hansard, and I was asked to withdraw my question. The department very kindly sent certain information to my desk in my room; from that information I have compiled a table, and with your permission and the permission of the house, Mr. Speaker, I should like to have this placed on Hansard.

Mr. REID: No; it should be read.

Mr. McCANN: Read it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house to place it on Hansard?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Read it.

Mr. WRIGHT: It is quite a table.

Mr. McCANN: You wanted to use it.

Mr. ABBOTT: You are a good reader; go ahead.

Mr. COLDWELL: Don't take up your time. One of the rest of us will read it.

Mr. WRIGHT: I can leave it to be dealt with by some of the other members of this group.

Mr. REID: Good.

Mr. COLDWELL: We will put it on record.

Mr. WRIGHT: But I should like to read this table, and I am going to read it. It is not long; it is a record of the exports of farm machinery from Canada during the six-month period ending June 30 in each year, from 1935 to 1946.

Mr. MacKINNON: Is the hon. member reading from an official document?

Mr. WRIGHT: I am quoting from a document which is headed "Dominion Bureau of Statistics, External Trade Branch, July 13, 1946."

Mr. MacKINNON: I just want to make it clear that the hon. member is reading from an actual table prepared by the bureau of statistics and not from a summary made by him.

Mr. WRIGHT: I am reading from a table prepared by the bureau of statistics and sent to my desk. It shows that between January 1 and June 30, in the years indicated, we exported the following quantities of farm machinery:

1935	.....	$2,760,603
1936	.....	3,220,973
1937	.....	4,386,083
1938	.....	5,279,262
1939	(the first year before the war)	3,419,144
1940	.....	5,055,914
1941	.....	6,433,256
1942	.....	5,297,175
1943	.....	5,676,845
1944	.....	7,022,256
1945	(the first year after the war)	10,082,578
1946	(first six months).....	16,382,400

That was four times the amount exported in a similar period in the first year before the war, and yet we cannot obtain farm machinery in the west. We cannot settle veterans on the land because of the lack of machinery. There is something radically wrong with such a situation, and I plead with the government to do something about it. We have not much time now. In only a month we shall be in the midst of harvest in the west, and we need that equipment now. I urge upon the government that they take immediate action to see that these requirements are met in western Canada.

As I said before, I do not wish to be interpreted as being opposed to the obtaining of suitable foreign markets for any of our surplus Canadian products when they are not needed for our own consumption; but where they are needed for our own use, then I say that we should supply our home market first.

Hon. members were asking about our imports of farm machinery. They are very large.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will say they are.

Mr. WRIGHT: Our total imports of farm machinery in 1945 were $50,435,476, and our imports from the United States in the same year were $50,128,617. These are large imports, but that does not alter the fact that we are exporting machinery which we need in this country.

Mr. ABBOTT: You cannot import without exporting. Trade is a two-way street.

Mr. WRIGHT: The same should apply to all our products. That principle should apply all along the line.

Mr. TUCKER: Does the hon. gentleman suggest that we should stop exporting machinery? I note there is no desire to have the question answered, but it is a fair one.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. TUCKER: I should like to ask the hon. gentleman a question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. WRIGHT: I shall be pleased to answer any question—

Mr. TUCKER: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. TUCKER: Does the hon. gentleman suggest—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ABBOTT: No questions.

An hon. MEMBER: That is socialism.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): They are assuming the government's attitude now.

Mr. WRIGHT: I do not know why our worthy friends are so much alarmed—

Mr. TUCKER: We are anxious to get the truth.

Mr. WRIGHT: —but I suppose I am treading on their toes. I am prepared to answer questions—

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. member was asking a fair question.

Mr. WRIGHT: —in an orderly manner, when I have completed my remarks; but not until then. We have large imports of farm machinery, but at the same time we are exporting needed equipment, equipment which we require on our own farms, and we should first meet the needs of our veterans and of our own farmers. When that is done, then we can export all that we can spare. Let us obtain all the markets we can for all the equipment we can manufacture in the country, after we have supplied our own needs.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): If the minister will permit me, before he replies I have a few words to add to what has been said.

The farmers of eastern Quebec have great difficulty in securing agricultural implements from War Assets Corporation, and there is one thing that surprised me when the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave information about Canadian trucks being delivered by UNRRA to other countries, and that is that we are still at war with Finland. Finland is an enemy country, and our farmers need trucks very badly. How is it that through UNRRA 500 Canadian trucks have been given away to Finland, an enemy country, while our farmers need them so badly? This is one thing that struck me. It is that spirit of internationalism, which I have denounced bitterly, that runs everything in this country. I should like to have the production of trucks under the control of the Minister of Reconstruction, and he should also have the delivery under him so that Canadians would be served before the enemy. The minister is all right, and he alone should have both controls. The consul of a minor country has more influence than all the members of parliament put together in regard to the disposal of our own property.

Canadian citizens have a mortgage on the production of this country; Canadians should be first served, and if something is left over then we shall be able to serve others. We speak about housing; if housing is far behind it is because many men have not the trucks they need to carry lumber to the mills and the manufactured product to the consumer. These trucks are indispensable. We need them very badly, and yet we send them to an enemy country. Then we speak of the sovereignty of Canada; we speak of Canada being an autonomous country. We are run by Stalin, Bevin, Byrnes, Chiang Kai-shek and Bidault. They are the ones who run the country. They are the bosses of UNO and the bosses of UNRRA, and what UNRRA says we have to stand for; what UNO says we have to stand for.

Mr. BENTLEY: But you always vote for them over there, no matter who runs them.

Mr. POULIOT: I will tell my hon. friend that on all major issues he and the other groups over there support the government, whereas on the loan there were only six of us who voted against the government. My hon. friend voted for the government. There is no possible distinction between the major parties and groups because, on the main issues, they vote together. I wonder if it is the atmosphere of Ottawa. They seem to be magnetized or hypnotized by the power of bureaucracy. How can they dare to denounce bureaucracy when they support bureaucracy every time it drafts legislation which is swallowed by nearly everyone in the house?

Mr. BOUCHER: Evidently Ottawa has a good influence on the members.

Mr. POULIOT: Ottawa? No. It is not exactly Ottawa; it is the bad atmosphere of the House of Commons which disturbs the minds of intelligent members. I respect my colleague, but I cannot stand for that kind of policy, the policy of sacrificing Canada to everyone else. There is something else wrong with the distribution of tractors, of trucks and of everything that is under the War Assets Corporation. In eastern Quebec it is impossible to get anything. When we know that a piece of material is to be declared surplus we write to the corporation and we are told that it has not been declared surplus. I wrote to the private secretary of one of the ministers that when the request is made by a Quebec easterner instead of by someone from Ontario, or even a foreigner the latter has a better chance to get these goods than a Canadian. How is it we have to write so much to get so little? I do not blame the minister; he is not to blame now because he has not the full control of the whole thing and cannot give us the distribution we would have if this government and this parliament had not that silly policy of giving everything to others without keeping anything for ourselves. That is the policy. Members appear to complain about it, but they supported the so-called external policy of this government, which amounts to nothing for us, because all the dominions of the British empire are run from outside; their sovereignty is an illusion.

Canada had nothing to do with the war with Finland except to declare war. We did not send a man there, but we are sending trucks. We were at war with that country because another power was at war with it. We sent trucks which our farmers are crying for, but they do not get anything. That is the way it stands.

I hope that I shall be permitted to say something to my colleagues about the reform which is necessary in this country. Everybody is for reform, but reform in the abstract, which means nothing at all. When we come down to brass tacks it is easy to count the members who make constructive suggestions to improve conditions in Canada. There is a haze which blurs the eyesight of men who should see clearly through the disorder which exists precisely because of the neglect and carelessness of the members of parliament. I regret it, but the trouble is that no distinction is made between what is important and what is not. It is taken for granted that so-called experts are those who should run this country, men who are not responsible to the people, men who are the products of universities and who are ready to teach the world about what is to be done immediately after they get a degree with a gold seal. And here we are. We listen to them just as if no one knew how to read and write, no one could make a sound decision. I ask hon. members to make their own decisions about everything, to consult their own judgments and act accordingly, and the country will be much better run.

Sometimes it is a very small suggestion which may be accepted. But what is swallowed by the whole House of Commons? It is precisely the product of the intelligentsia which all denounce so bitterly as bureaucracy. All the laws are prepared by bureaucracy. Members may denounce bureaucracy, but they swallow the draft legislation which is prepared for them, without asking any questions. Sometimes they denounce it, but they do not go to the source of the evil.

When I was on the other side of the house I suggested that we should have a union opposition, an opposition composed of all men of good will—and nearly all members are members of good will.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: When I say nearly—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the question before the house is a motion to adjourn the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, namely, the serious situation in western Canada with respect to the shortage of suitable farm machinery for the harvesting of the present large crop. The remarks of the hon. member should be relevant to the motion.

An hon. MEMBER: They never are.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank you, sir. What I just said was the preface to my conclusion. My conclusion is that instead of complaining about the state of things which everybody deplores, members of the House of Commons irrespective of party should unite and decide what the majority wants. In this case I suggest that all members of parliament should unite to give full control to the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe). Give him a trial; give him an opportunity to settle the question as well as he can, notwithstanding the steel strike and the other difficulties which confront us. It is precisely because of the domestic difficulties that we have to be indulgent to the minister. We must not blame him for conditions for which he could not be held responsible. The duty of members of parliament, if they really want what they ask for, is to set aside all party considerations and unite to put the business of the country in good shape. In this particular case it would be very easy. Each member would have only to consult his own judgment and make his own decision, and I am sure a large majority of the members would join together and settle this difficult question of the distribution of farm implements, trucks, and even automobiles.

If one spends his time blaming the Minister of Reconstruction for all he has done to improve manufacturing conditions in this country I do not find it fair. I will not say that it has been done for political considerations, but it should be done for a higher political consideration; it should be done to improve the lot of those who are in need, and the need can be shown. How is it that it is impossible to secure advice? We get only criticism. There is ground for criticism.

Mr. BURTON: The hon. member will not listen to advice.

Mr. POULIOT: I always listen to advice which is full of common sense, but I never listen to criticism which is full of bitterness. We have a duty to fulfil; we have a duty to help our fellow citizens, to help them right away instead of wasting our time in useless criticism. There should be constructive criticism in order that there shall be useful suggestions to improve the lot of the farmers of Saskatchewan and of farmers all over the country, particularly the farmers of eastern Quebec. I remind my hon. friends of the prairie provinces that they are not the only ones to suffer. In eastern Canada we suffer as much, and my colleagues of Quebec are as much devoted to the cause of the farmers as my colleagues of Saskatchewan may be to the cause of the farmers in their part of the country. But the time has arrived to do something, and if my hon. friend who interrupted me a moment ago has another constructive suggestion to offer, I shall listen to him with delight. If a suggestion is sensible I shall support it; but I should hope that from the fertile minds of so many hon. members something will come to help out the farmer, and not only the farmer but all those who earn their living with implements of any sort.

It is time for us to make a thorough investigation into what is going on. The war expenditures committee has been sitting for a long time; I have read its reports, but there is no improvement. What has been said by the hon. member who moved this motion shows that the work of the committee has not been either practical or profitable to this country, because now we have a state of affairs about which everyone complains, in spite of the fact that this committee has held numerous sittings and heard numerous witnesses. Therefore all I ask my colleagues to do is to think, to listen to the voice of their conscience and to obey their own natural judgment in coming to decisions that will serve this country.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I have been in this House of Commons eleven years and I must say I have never heard a more fallacious argument than that advanced by the hon. member who moved the adjournment. He has pictured Canada as a great reservoir of farm machinery, shipping it in a prodigal way all over the world to the absolute neglect of our own people. The fact of the matter is that Canada is a deficit country in regard to farm machinery.

Mr. WRIGHT: I stated that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HOWE: It has never in its history—

Mr. WRIGHT: On a point of order—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Privilege!

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. WRIGHT: On a point of privilege—may I proceed?

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. gentleman wish to speak to a point of order?

Mr. WRIGHT: Privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: Very well.

Mr. WRIGHT: The minister has just stated that I painted a picture showing Canada as a reservoir of farm machinery.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. WRIGHT: My point is that this is not the picture I painted.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. HOWE: As I said, Mr. Speaker, Canada is a deficit country in regard to farm implements, in that we have always imported far more than we exported and have required far more than we produced. That is just as true to-day as it was in earlier days, in spite of the fact that the production of farm machinery in Canada trebled between 1939 and the present time. In other words our capacity for manufacturing farm machinery is three times as great to-day as it was in 1939. The farm implement industry is operating to capacity and has been for several years, up to the limitation imposed by the recent steel strike. My hon. friend suggests that we could stop exporting entirely, and that other countries would still export to Canada.

Mr. WRIGHT: I did not say that.

Mr. HOWE: He certainly implied that. I suggest to him that farm machinery is just as short in the United States as it is in Canada, yet the United States is exporting to Canada. Why? Because throughout the war Canada and the United States worked with each other on the basis of equality of sacrifice. That has been the principle on which we have dealt with the United States since the early days of the war. The principle was established at the time of the Hyde Park agreement and has been followed in recent years, I may say very much to the benefit of Canada. Only a few months ago the United States made a move to cut off the export of tractors to Canada; there was a terrific shortage of tractors in the United States. Canada is wholly dependent upon that country for tractors. We immediately went to Washington, raised the principle of equality of sacrifice, and succeeded in having our quota maintained. Could we have done that had we adopted the policy suggested by my hon. friend and kept everything we made in Canada for our own purposes, depriving our foreign customers of the Canadian implements upon which over the years, they have been taught to depend?

Mr. WRIGHT: How much did we get from the Argentine?

Mr. HOWE: Canada has been a supplier of implements to the Argentine republic for a great many years. I was in that country between 1930 and 1934, and I noted then that Canadian implements had a very large share of that market at that time, as they have had ever since. I do not know that my hon. friend would suggest that we cut off such an historic market under present conditions.

Mr. REID: Well, he did suggest that.

Mr. HOWE: Who has been the principal buyer of Canadian farm implements for export in recent years? I can tell my hon. friend that. The principal buyer has been UNRRA. Why has UNRRA been buying? So that it could help solve the food situation in the devastated countries. Why do we ration flour in Canada? Let me ask that. We do it so that we can send food to the devastated countries and help them avert starvation. Well, farm implements are the equivalent of food. All during the war we cut back many items of civilian production, but we did not cut back the production of farm implements; we expanded that production. Why? Because farm implements were implements of war. It was just as important to England during the battle of Britain to obtain farm implements from Canada as it was to obtain food itself, because farm implements meant food. We did maintain our exports of farm implements to the United Kingdom during the war years, and we expanded them as much as we could, in the meantime taking care of Canada's most urgent needs. We kept up that traffic during an acute shortage of shipping. Britain gave it the highest priority in shipping, and every effort was made to maintain those shipments as a matter of the highest importance to the people of both countries. We are exporting to the devastated countries to-day, though the proportions of those exports are not as great as in war years. We fully recognize the need to take care of the Canadian market; and let me say that I believe the needs of the Canadian market are satisfied to a higher degree in connection with farm implements than in connection with most other consumer items.

It is our policy to continue to fill those needs. That is why we are fighting the supply situation; and I may say we regard agricultural implements as having the highest priority in the division of available supplies. In the matter of pig iron, material that is in exceedingly short supply, we are robbing other industries in order to see that the agricultural implement industry is kept in full production. Throughout the war years the administrator of the wartime prices and trade board responsible for farm implements was fighting the battle of the implement industry in a very aggressive manner. It is because of his vigilance and because of the vigilance of this government at Washington that we have maintained our imports from that country; and the reason we have been well treated is that we have shared with the United States the burden of taking care of the agricultural implement requirements of the devastated countries. I sincerely hope the speech made by my hon. friend is not broadcast in Washington, because if it is, it may very well follow that the position concerning tractors may be reviewed in the light of comments made in this House of Commons.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, because of your ruling the motion moved by the hon. gentleman has had to be amended, and it now includes only two matters. It is claimed that the situation in the west with respect to the shortage of farm machinery is serious because of the large crop. There is no doubt about that. It is "in consequence of this that the present situation exists". The members of the C.C.F. and most Liberals have contended all along that the agricultural implement industry was a free trade industry. The protection which was 32 per cent when the present government came into office has been cut down to seven per cent.

Only the war saved the remains of that great industry in Ontario. The Massey-

Harris company built up a large factory in Toronto under the system of protection. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) has referred to this, and it seems to me that he is the only Liberal on the government side who wears the mantle and tie of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He was not a free trader, but a protectionist, and the protection afforded by Sir Wilfrid in 1897 was the same as in 1896. As I say, the hon. gentleman seems to wear the mantle of Elijah—of Sir Wilfrid—and now it would seem the hon. gentleman himself is Elisha because he is the only Liberal on the government side who is ready to defend the principles of the national policy which built up this great agricultural implement industry. Elijah divided the waters of the Jordan, but the hon. gentleman is trying to unite the waters of the Ottawa.

Shortly after I came to the house I remember the council of agriculture coming down here in the early twenties with Mr. Drury, then premier of Ontario, and contending that protection was an unmitigated evil, that the manufacturers of farm machinery throughout the country were a lot of robbers and extortionists. They asked that the protection which was afforded should be destroyed. What has been the effect?

The war devastated the agricultural implement industry throughout the world. As I said before, the industry in Toronto engaged in war work and were thus able to keep open. Massey-Harris is established on King street west of Shaw street. This very large industry in conversion is now manufacturing many articles that are necessary and useful. In 1937 and 1938 I contended in this house that the government should give assistance to this industry which was in a serious condition. I also contended that large storage reservoir facilities be built up in England. In 1936, 1937 and 1938 I was the only member in this house who urged that storage reservoirs be established in the old country so that stocks of grain could be built up because I saw that war was surely coming. The British Medical Association said at a meeting in 1938 in London that this grain could be kept in good condition for ten years in such reservoirs.

You have to consider the cause and effect of the two situations set out in this motion. As I said, away back in the twenties the agricultural industry operated under a system of protection. Drastic reductions were made in the budgets of the twenties, and in the thirties the protection was down to seven per cent, as a result many of these industries were forced to the wall.

The grain growing industry was never a free trade industry. It should be the best protected one for us. It was never a north and south industry but an east and west industry to Britain, France, Italy, and our old allies as well.

What has been the result since Mr. Drury and the council of agriculture came down here in 1923? During the war we saw hon. members to your left, sir, standing up in the house and urging nine, ten, eleven and twelve different forms of protection for the great grain growing industry. Some of them supported the middlemen and elevators and the Winnipeg grain exchanges which were fleecing the dirt farmer out of the profits he should have got from his crops. They were the people to blame for the conditions that then prevailed on the prairies. It was not the man who sowed the crop, because he was a good man and true. Men of that type were a blessing to the country. You have to look at the cause and effect of the policies then put into force by hon. gentlemen to your left.

The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) when he came here supported those free trade policies, and there were many others. The result was that the small protection enjoyed by this industry was cut down to seven per cent. Mr. Speaker, you come from western Ontario and you know that in the early days there were manufacturers who wanted to claim all the benefits of protection for themselves. In the twenties those manufacturers were the worst enemies protection had. Protection as properly applied in the days of the Conservative party, and in practice continued by Sir Wilfrid and Mr. Fielding and others, was not applied for the benefit of one class; it was applied for the benefit of the people. The application of protection in that way meant that we were able to maintain our own markets for our own products and for our own workmen. By this national policy of the Conservative government the great cities of this country were built up.

That policy has never been seriously interfered with as it relates to the agricultural implement industry. The protection was cut down so low that two or three companies were driven to the wall. They could not pay their taxes and overhead charges on the seven per cent. What was the result of the policy of hon. members to your left? The market was left to the American manufacturers. McCormick's in Chicago were able to ship farm implements across the border and avoid taxes.

I have the deepest sympathy for the people of the prairie provinces, especially the grain growers, and all along I have supported their cause in the house. However, I fail to see where this is an emergency, because it has been referred to many times during this session. Instead of talking for days about the price of wheat, as is done each session, we might think more about the people of the mother country who were our steady and best customers for grain. I believe we should have given them 200,000 bushels of wheat and saved the mother country from having to put in bread rationing. That would have been a blessing because they were the pioneers and the best friends of the great grain growing industry, as were the people of France and the people of our old ally, Italy. I appreciate the sincerity of the mover of the motion and others to your left, but they are not following the policies they and all their predecessors used to follow when they were free traders. Now that the war is over I am afraid that without adequate protection this industry may have to close up as was demanded in 1923 when the council of agriculture came down here. We shall either have to have adequate protection for the industry or free trade in agricultural implements, and that is what we are heading for. The old Conservative party were absolutely right and always have been. They were the best friends the farmers on the prairies ever had—not the free traders who forget all about cause and effect. We need a policy that will preserve our own markets for our own products and our own work for our own workmen. It is the fallacies of hon. gentlemen to my left which are responsible for the decline in the agricultural implement industry. Some of the manufacturers themselves in the early days were the worst enemies that protection ever had, because they wanted to claim all the benefits of it for themselves and none for the consumer or at times for their workmen or for the country at large. There is a shortage now of agricultural implements, it must be admitted, but there is also a world shortage of suitable farm machinery, and transportation and strikes play an important part in that shortage. There is no doubt that with harvest coming on the situation is serious, but not because of all the reasons put forward by the hon. member for Melfort.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to detain the house more than a few moments, but I should like to put some actual figures on the record. I am really surprised at the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) presenting only one side of this picture. I think he should have considered the best interests of the farmers of Saskatchewan and of the rest of Canada before he undertook to speak as he did this morning.

This subject came up in our veterans affairs committee, where the question was raised about the exporting of farm implements. We went to the trouble to get the actual figures We already of course knew quite well that practically all our imports of the most vital farm implement we have—the tractor—are from the United States. We also know that there are people in the United States, just as there are in Canada, who talk in the same manner as the hon. member for Melfort did this morning, that they need their own tractors in the United States and therefore the government of the country should place an embargo on the export of American tractors and let other countries get along as best they can without them. But in the United States the attitude of give-and-take, of carrying on on a comradely basis, prevailed over this argument, and so they continued to export to us our fair share of tractors and other farm implements.

I ask any member representing a farm community in this house what would have happened to the farming industry in Canada if the United States had actually listened to arguments similar to those made this morning by the hon. member for Melfort and discontinued the export of their tractors? Can it be suggested for a single moment that if we took that attitude, if we stopped all shipments of farm machinery to the unfortunate peoples of Europe so that they could raise crops and feed their starving women and children—

An hon. MEMBER: Boo-hoo.

Mr. TUCKER: Someone may sneer at that. I do not want to name the member who did it, because I am sure that on second thought he will be sorry for it. It ill behooves any hon. member to sneer because we are a country most blest by Providence, and if we took the selfish attitude indicated by that "boo" we would not be showing gratitude to divine Providence for the way in which Canada has been blest in a world torn by suffering and starvation. Is it to be suggested that if we did take that attitude towards the unfortunate peoples of Europe and refused to send the farm machinery we are sending to them through UNRRA we could still go to the United States and ask them to ship to us a fair share of their tractors? They would almost certainly say to us: You are not as badly off as the peoples of Europe, and if you are placing an embargo on the shipment of farm machinery to them and also to our farmers, we will hand out to you the same measure of justice that you are handing out to them and to us. The future organization of the world cannot be on the basis of going amongst one's own people and saying: "Why are we sending abroad this machinery and this food that we need at home?" and thus working up hatred and antagonism towards international cooperation, which is the only sound basis for world peace and cooperation.

Now I wish to put on Hansard the actual figures tabled in our veterans affairs committee on June 28, to indicate that if we stopped exporting farm machinery and had that same policy applied to us, not only would we lose on the most vital piece of farm machinery we need, the tractor, but we would lose on the total amount of farm machinery available to us. We cannot have it both ways. That was the old idea of the protectionists—that you could stop buying and go on selling abroad. Here are the figures.

In 1939 the gross selling value at the works of our production of farm implements and machinery was $16,000,000 odd. Our imports were $20,000,000; our exports and reexports $7,000,000. That meant an apparent consumption in 1939 of $29,000,000 worth of farm implements in this country, which was $13,000,000 worth more than we produced in 1939.

In 1945 we produced $46,400,000 worth of farm implements. We imported $27,300,000; we exported $20,200,000. Our apparent consumption was $53,500,000 worth, or $7,100,000 worth more of farm machinery consumed than we were able to manufacture in this country.

I would draw the attention of the house to the fact that in spite of the gloomy outlook of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), in 1945 we actually produced in Canada $46,400,000 worth of farm machinery, as against $16,000,000 worth in 1939. I would also point out that in 1945 while we imported $27,300,000 worth, we exported only $20,200,000 of farm implements, so we gained on the whole transaction approximately $7,000,000 worth of farm machinery, and that farm machinery was the most vital of all to our farmers on the western plains, tractors being a large item of it.

In 1946, from January to April, we imported $16,400,000 worth of farm implements, and exported $10,600,000 worth. In other words, in that period we imported three dollars' worth of farm machinery for every two dollars' worth that we exported.

The proposal of the hon. member would strike at our importations of machinery, including tractors, of which, as I have just said, we imported from January to April three dollars' worth for every two dollars' worth that we exported. It means that we would have $6,000,000 worth less of farm machinery if we did not export and import. I leave it to the judgment of the house and of the country whether that would be in the best interests of the farmers of Canada.

We hear a great deal in Saskatchewan about these nefarious interests which are exporting in order to make a profit, that they do not care about the farmers' needs, and so on. It is perhaps a good thing that this question has been raised on the floor of the house, because it shows that on balance we have gained during the period from January to April of this year almost $6 million worth of machinery over what we would have had if we had not exported and imported.

Mr. McILRAITH: Six million dollars is our total apparent consumption in 1932.

Mr. TUCKER: Yes. For people to go around the country in order to stir up a feeling like this, making demands on their government which might have the most serious repercussions in their effect upon the farmers, and in particular for this to be done by any party or any member in this house, is, I think, very much out of place. However, I am glad that the matter was brought up on the floor of the house, because when it is said around the country many people do not think of the other side at all. They say, "Why are we exporting all this stuff?" They do not think that if we stopped exporting we would stop importing. That is true with regard to the very thing that hon. members have been speaking about—tractors. I venture to say that every one of them came from the United States.

An hon. MEMBER: And combine engines.

Mr. TUCKER: Perhaps combine engines too. Tractors, anyway. If the ultimate result of the hon. member's speech were what he appeared to wish it to be, these very people would have no tractors at all. It is quite true that a plant to manufacture tractors for cooperatives is being set up in Brantford, but the basis on which that implement industry which is to supply the cooperatives of Canada and the United States is to be built up is this. In times past it was found that owing to the comparatively smaller demand for tractors in Canada compared with the United States, tractors cost more to manufacture in Canada than in the United States. If we did not permit the free importation of tractors the farmer would be paying more for his tractor, because, owing to the smaller output it could not be made in Canada nearly as cheaply as in the United States. As a result of the policy of this government in taking the tariff off it is now possible for the implement industry to supply the cooperatives in the United States and the cooperatives to be set up in Canada, which will result in a very much larger output because it will supply the cooperatives in the United States. As a result, for the first time in many years it will be possible to have a successful tractor industry in Canada which because of the large output will be able to manufacture tractors as cheaply as factories in the United States. That arises, not from a policy of exclusion and interference with trade, but by virtue of the very policy we are following. The clear effect of my hon. friend's attack on the trade in farm implements, if carried to its ultimate conclusion, would be the destruction of the possibilities in the tractor industry of establishing a set-up to supply tractors in Canada and the United States.

So I say that on two counts the hon. member for Melfort was ill-advised in bringing this up. In the first place, his words will be read in Washington, and the very people who talk as he does in the United States will say, "There, on the floor of the Canadian House of Commons they say that they should place an embargo on farm implements; therefore we had better follow their policy and place an embargo on much-needed tractors"; and when trade is interfered with, the basis of the most hopeful developments in the matter of the supplying of farm implements to the farmer at or near cost, namely by having them built in a cooperative plant which is to supply the United States and Canada, would be cut away. I say that to get some temporary applause in the country by attacking a policy which has so much in the way of good, of hope for the future, and of fairness to humanity, is too high a price to pay for that sort of thing.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): I think the present situation may be looked upon as a logical outcome of the government's policy on foreign trade. They have always overemphasized the importance of the export trade at the cost and in some cases to the exclusion of the home market. Hon. members on the other side—the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) and the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe)—have emphasized the fact that we are getting a large amount of imports in the form of machinery from the United States. Well, first of all, that points to the absurdity of our exporting machinery when we have a chronic deficiency of machinery in this country and are having to import it.

The hon. member for Rosthern said that we have a moral obligation to the devastated areas of Europe which are short of machinery. Let me ask the hon. member for Rosthern, or any member of the government, what is the main shortage in Europe to-day? The answer is food. Therefore in considering the question of machinery you must consider what is the most efficient use which can be made of machinery to-day, and I think it can be proved beyond the shadow of a doubt that more bushels per machine can be produced in Canada than anywhere in Europe.

We in western Canada are suffering a great loss of production on account of the shortage of machinery. To-day in western Canada we are facing, I hope, a very large crop; the present situation looks good, and if that large crop comes we are going to lose millions of bushels of wheat because of the lack of machinery.

There is another thing: this chronic shortage of machinery is having an adverse effect on machinery prices. Old machinery is selling at higher figures than the list prices of new machinery.

In the discussion of loans to foreign countries we in this group pointed out that we were prepared to support these loans purely on one ground, and that was the moral obligation to make them, but that it was not to the advantage of Canada to finance exports of goods which were in short supply in this country; that these loans should be used mainly for the exporting of any goods which happened to be surplus. As I said, Europe is depending on us for tremendous quantities of food; therefore it is essential that our production be kept up at the maximum level, and that can be done only if our farmers have the machinery needed for that maximum production. Therefore I would urge upon the government the desirability of curtailing exports until that chronic deficiency has been made up.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few observations on this motion. Coming from the quarter of the house from which it did, it seems a bit strange when one recalls the history of this session. The leader of the official opposition moved an amendment in this house that agricultural production in Canada was being hampered because of controls and other government policies, but if my memory serves me rightly we were not supported on that motion by the group to my immediate left. So I think they show a strange inconsistency.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: More of us voted for it than members of your party.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Not on the particular amendment I refer to, namely the throne speech amendment last March. But despite that fact I want to support the principle of the motion moved by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright). May I say, with respect to some of the resolutions for the settlement of our veterans, which is an all-important matter at this time, the greatest difficulty is the handicap arising from a lack of proper farm equipment, and the veteran's inability to obtain it.

I was interested in some of the figures put on Hansard by the last speaker on behalf of the government, the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker). He said that some $53 million worth of farm implements were distributed in Canada during 1945. That is approximately the normal consumption of farm implements in Canada in pre-war years.

Mr. McILRAITH: No—six millions.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): This motion referred to western Canada, and I was going to say that in western Canada alone the normal annual requirement in pre-war years was approximately $50 million worth of farm machinery.

Mr. McILRAITH: That is the second highest in the history of Canada.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am not arguing the point. I say that the normal requirement by western farmers in pre-war years, as can be ascertained from the bureau of statistics, was approximately $50 million. I am speaking, of course, of agricultural implements. When war was declared in 1939, as admitted by everyone in Canada, agricultural price levels were most unfair, and as a result the farmers were unable to purchase the farm implements they required. There was consequently a backlog of $200 million worth of farm equipment which the farmers required and which they would have purchased had they the means of buying it. These are figures which cannot be disputed. We also realize that farm implement companies and other concerns of the kind do not produce equipment when there is no demand for it, but farmers go ahead producing. They have greater difficulties, therefore, than these other people have to face.

One of the ministers asked, what about export wheat along with the export of farm implements? One of our greatest difficulties to-day is that in the export of wheat the price is held down by the government and the commodity is not sold at the prevailing world market price, as farm implements, lumber and other manufactured goods are sold.

Mr. ABBOTT: Does the hon. member advocate a wide open market for wheat?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): On export? I have always done so, yes, and I do to-day, so far as the export of wheat is concerned. I certainly do.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Including England?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Any country. Much is made of this great contribution of Canada to Britain, and I do not object to it, but I do object to the producer making the contribution and not the taxpayer of Canada as a whole.

Mr. ABBOTT: You object to the four-year contract for wheat?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I certainly do, on the present basis, and you will hear more about it before the session is over—under the present set-up. In my opinion the crux of this situation is to be found in a statement made by Donald Gordon the other day before a committee of this house, wherein he intimated that it was the duty of many enterprises and business concerns in the country to carry on for the national welfare, whether they made a profit on the goods they sold in Canada to-day or not. He went further and said that certain companies, essential to the country, were able to operate only by virtue of the fact that they made a profit on the goods they exported. I do not know what that means, except that it is all bound up in the present government control system. At any rate that is the statement of Donald Gordon, who is responsible for the price ceilings. He was then talking about the production of lumber for houses and other requirements, and he said that you could not procure lumber at present prices in Canada. The same applies to farm implements.

Figures were put on Hansard by the member for Melfort showing that there was $16 million of farm implements exported out of a production of $46 million in this country. That bears out the philosophy of Donald Gordon under the present price control system. I do not know how far you can carry that, but I do say that there is a decided shortage of implements in Canada at the present time.

Mr. ABBOTT: A shortage of other things too.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Certainly there is, and it is all due to the policy of the government of the day.

Mr. ABBOTT: Nonsense; it is due to the war.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): No such thing; I will be fair enough to say—

Mr. ABBOTT: You are burying your head in the sand.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I hope I am not burying my head in the sand any more than the Acting Minister of Finance has done in the past few days.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a snappy come-back.

An hon. MEMBER: There aren't any heads there to bury.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There is something there.

Mr. ABBOTT: Somebody else had to think of that one for you.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): At any rate, we do not make little jests and write them out and pass them back and forth and put them in our desks, as I have seen the Acting Minister of Finance doing in the discussions in the house.

Mr. ABBOTT: What's that?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The member for Melfort pointed out that harvesting would be in full operation in a month's time, and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that in southwestern Manitoba it is progressing to-day. According to a letter I received from home, my men are cutting fall rye, and barley is ready to cut. I am sure the government whip will say that harvesting is taking place on his farm in central Manitoba, and so on through the west. This farm machinery shortage is a serious situation and something that is not new. It has been discussed in past sessions and on several occasions during this session.

Something has been said about free trade. There is no tariff on implements now, as I understand it, and despite that fact, once more, owing to the government's control system, we find that a power binder manufactured in Canada costs over $100 more than an international binder from across the line. There is a difference of more than $100 in the purchase price of the two binders, and that again by virtue of the controls that are operated by the present government.

Without taking up more of the time of the house, I wish to register my objection to the present shortage of farm equipment in Canada, which is the result of the present policies of the government. I hope they will see their way clear to changing these policies in the future, because, as I pointed out before, this and other policies of the government are decidedly hampering the production of essential foodstuffs, which are needed here and in Europe, as has been pointed out by hon. members on the other side of the house as well as on this side.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): As seconder of the motion I merely wish to straighten out some statements made with regard to the mover (Mr. Wright). The hon. member moved the adjournment of the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, namely, the serious situation in the west with respect to the shortage of suitable farm machinery for the harvesting of the present large crop. The member for Melfort should be the last one to be accused of wishing to cut off the importation of tractors. He would like to see more farm machinery imported, because we have not sufficient manufacturing facilities in Canada to-day to meet the requirements.

Mr. TUCKER: Will the hon. member permit a question? Can he expect, if an embargo is placed on exports, that other countries will continue shipping such things to Canada?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The hon. member did not suggest that.

Mr. TUCKER: Yes, he did.

Mr. ABBOTT: What did he suggest?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: He was referring to the policy of the government and what they had done with regard to exports. The hon. gentleman has had his little say and has presented his case; I wish to make my speech now.

To-day we have one of the largest crops that we have ever seen, east and west. Western Canada went through ten years of depression prior to the war, and all machinery was worn out. The farmers were unable to get new machinery, and they tried to keep what they had in a state of repair. The prices of repair parts have gone up until the farmers are in desperate straits, and now that a bumper crop is expected in some areas where there has not been a crop in years, the farmer does not know how he will manage to take the crop out. This is an emergency situation, and it is the situation that has given rise to this resolution.

We think that machinery should be sent to UNRRA and to other places in order to promote production. It is a matter of meeting the immediate need, and the question is whether you will take tractors and combines and ship them to Greece or Belgium or southern countries where they will not have a harvest for another six months, or whether you will use the equipment in Canada to-day. That is the point. If you ask the people of those countries whom UNRRA is feeding whether they would take a carload of farm machinery, or wheat from western Canada, I have no doubt they would reply at once: Send us the wheat now and the machinery later, because we need the food. Reports from UNRRA depict a terrific situation; for they indicate that death from starvation can hardly be averted among the thousands of people who need foodstuffs. In a situation such as this, can we see food in western Canada lying in the fields, freezing, rotting, rusting, spoiling in the stooks for lack of machinery?

To me that is the situation. Canada's capacity to produce that food in the next few weeks is the important thing. Take all the machinery we can get hold of to-day and ship it out to that western country. We have another year to carry on our production. It will be of no use to bring in that policy and ship out the machinery in two months' time. It will be too late. That is all we want. We want something done immediately. We are not asking that exports to other countries be stopped. We understand these things have to go on, but we do say that there is an immediate situation which has to be met. We have to meet it now.

People wonder why this shortage continues. They do not understand it. I believe the debate will do something toward enlightening the people as to Canada's productive capacity. Whenever there is a great shortage the pressure for producing is greater and the prices are apt to go up. The wartime prices and trade board does not always keep prices under control. Second-hand tractors were sold this spring in western Canada for $600 or $700 above the price of a new tractor. Why were these prices not controlled? Farmers would pay double the price for a binder to-day if they could get hold of it. We must prevent the building up of a black market; that kind of thing should not be permitted.

What we should like to see done with respect to this particular motion is that the government take immediate cognizance of the fact that there might be a spoilage and a wastage of food which is right there, practically in the bag, at a time when the world is starving. Let the government take hold of the supply of all the machinery that is available in the country and all that it can get from anywhere else, and put it into that western country to relieve the immediate situation which is facing the people there. This would help to save the food which could be sent abroad to feed a starving world. The whole matter of stepping up the production in the farm implement business to meet these needs—it is too late for this year—should be taken well in hand. The government should make a complete survey of the farm machinery productive capacity of Canada, with a view to improving conditions in our own country if the imports cannot be obtained from other countries.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Victoria, B.C.): I have no intention of delaying the house at any length on this matter, because it has been fully discussed and probably will bring about some improvement. I am sure that the statement which was made by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) and also the statement made by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) will clear up the situation considerably. However, I do wish to clear up one matter, if I can. Close to eleven o'clock last night the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) came over to me and was kind enough to say that he intended to bring up this matter in the house. He did not know just when it would be done. He again read the answers which I gave him some time ago on this subject. At that time I suggested to him that there would be an opportunity to bring up the matter when we were going into supply, and that it could be done satisfactorily then; therefore I was surprised when the question was raised to-day.

This subject is not one in which the Department of Finance alone is interested or should take the sole responsibility. It affects three other departments. The question whether we should or should not export farm machinery is one of government policy. I think the present policy is a good one, and the only one that Canada can adopt. So far as our trading with the United States is concerned, if we had not been willing to trade in many articles with that country I do not know what would have happened to us. We have been in short supply in steel ever since the beginning of the war. At all times they were ready to share their steel with us, particularly when we were in a much more serious position than we are at the present time. Had we not been willing to adopt that trade policy, the good neighbour policy, the chances are there would have been considerably less farm machinery than we have been getting.

From the point of view of good business I think it should be the policy of Canada to look after our trade abroad. It probably will not be long before these very same people will be crying for more work for our men. If we close the door to-day on machinery for export, or anything else that we can export, they will be the first to complain that work is not available. In my opinion Canada should endeavour to hold on to what export trade she has at present. I shall give the house an illustration. Quite recently an advertisement appeared in our home paper. It was placed there by the Hudson's Bay company. What were they advertising in Victoria? Fancy biscuits manufactured in England. England wanted to continue to hold that market. Some may ask why we are sending food to Britain and they are sending food back to us. There was probably not more than an ounce of food value in those biscuits, but there was a large monetary value in them. England was going to hold her trade in the future. I think it was good policy for her to do that. It may not have been good policy for the Hudson's Bay people to put it on the front page of the paper where it would be read by people who do not think and do not understand the ramifications of this kind of business. I think England was doing the right thing, and we are doing the right thing in this regard.

So far as farm machinery is concerned I think the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) made the situation clear. In only one year since 1931 have Canada's exports been more than her imports. That year was 1933. In every other year we have been debtors so far as farm machinery is concerned. I have not the figures with me, but I want to say something about our own consumption or delivery of goods to the farmers. I have not the figures because when I asked the question over the telephone I was told that they could not give it by provinces; they did say however, that in the first four months the delivery of farm machinery to the farmers of Canada was twenty per cent more than it was in the other years. Up to date we have already delivered to our own people some $10,600,000 worth of farm machinery. Last year our requirements were $53,000,000 in all. Therefore we are well ahead, and if we continue with our production this year the way we did last year we shall produce in the neighbourhood of $60,000,000 worth of farm machinery.

As soon as I got around to the questions this morning I asked the department to prepare a comprehensive statement which I might be able to give to the house on this subject, and I shall do so on a later occasion. That is all I wish to say at this time.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to hold up the business of the house, but I do want to make a few references to the trend this debate has taken. The hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) I think has rendered a public service in introducing this resolution, which is to the effect that there is an emergency in the west in the matter of the supplies of farm implements required for the harvesting of this year's crop.

Much has been said on the question of foreign trade. Personally I cannot see where that question enters into this discussion at all. We have in western Canada to-day an emergent situation which demands action now, not consideration by the government of questions of trade. In the few moments at my disposal I have taken the trouble to get some statistics which indicate that the government has been negligent in discharging its responsibility in the matter of providing for reapers, reaper-threshers, combines and the like, necessary for the harvesting of our crop. This is not a new problem. The government was aware last April of the condition and of the necessity of increasing the supply of farm machinery this year, because that was the reason given for the increase in price. The 12½ per cent increase was to assure the production of farm implements in order to meet the increasing demand of this country. One of the major considerations then before the Department of Agriculture, and I believe the Department of Trade and Commerce as well, was the necessity of making available the necessary farm machinery to replace that which had become obsolete during the war but which had continued to be used because no replacements were available.

What has the government done? It realized that under normal conditions a large crop was to be harvested this year. It has known that for a period of months, but it strikes me as very strange that in June alone, at a time when the government must have fully realized the situation, exports of harvesters, binders, reaper-threshers and the like from this country were materially greater than they were a year ago. In the period from January to November, 1945, Canada exported 9,729 harvesters and binders. In the six months ended June 30, 1946, our exports totalled 8,083, or almost as many in six months as had been exported in eleven months in 1945. Take reaper-threshers; to-day in the western provinces particularly agriculture is mechanized. Without combines, labour being in short supply as it is to-day, our crops will not be marketed. What is the record? From January to November, 1945, the number of combines exported from this country was 1,888. For the six months ended June 30, 1946, the exports totalled 2,616. I could go through the list of threshing machine separators and so on, showing material increases at a time when the government must have realized—and it is not so much averse to exercising certain types of controls—what the condition was going to be. Take the month of June as an example. During that month, with the great crop coming along in western Canada, which must have been known to the government, Canada exported 473 combines, 1,599 reapers and 1,073 mowing machines, harvesters and binders. One can sometimes excuse the necessity for trade, but at the moment the greater necessity is the harvesting and preservation of that food in this country.

Mr. MAYHEW: Do you think you can just go out and pick up trade when you want it? You have to give some consideration to these matters.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, Mr. Speaker, that very question answers itself; nor can one pick up food once it is destroyed over hundreds or thousands of acres. The government asked for production, and it was its responsibility to make available to the farmers the necessary machinery and parts. The government does not discharge that responsibility by flippant remarks such as have been made here this morning by certain ministers of the crown. My hon. friend points—

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not pointing at my hon. friend; it was just an aside concerning the Siamese twins sitting in front of him.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is just a coincidence that the hon. gentleman who pointed was one of those who this morning made those flippant remarks concerning an emergency situation which demands not the display of partisanship but cooperation by all of us. What minister has risen and given the farmers any assurance that their call will be answered?

Mr. MAYHEW: What better trade could we be doing, as a matter of preserving food, than having our machinery over in the United States harvesting their crops, with the promise that their machinery is going to come back to help us harvest ours? Is that not reciprocity of the best kind?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, Mr. Speaker, the government does not meet the situation with alibis like that. The answer the government should give at this time is an assurance that this situation is going to be met. That is all that is asked; the promise, not the expectation or the hope, that it is going to be met. I do not know whether my hon. friends on the other side of the house are out of touch with the electors, but during the last few days I have received numbers of letters from my own constituency pointing out the difficulty. Those who have written are not very hopeful. Some are veterans who have found it impossible to get any machinery in order to carry on their farming operations without first binding themselves by a loan under the Veterans Land Act. There are veterans all over Saskatchewan who have asked for a priority for machinery but have been denied that priority, and the reason given has not been a denial of their need but the fact that under the regulations now in effect they cannot have priorities unless they bind themselves under loans.

Mr. MARTIN: Let us forget politics.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh, my hon. friend says, "Let us forget politics."

Mr. ABBOTT: Some people can't.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No; there is the voice of experience echoing my hon. friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin). Two better examples could not have spoken at one time.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I wonder if my hon. friend would withdraw the resolution now, so that we could get ahead with the business of the house at three o'clock.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I wish to take part in the debate, Mr. Speaker.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I would not be holding up this matter any longer except that only one hon. member from Manitoba has spoken. I think it should be understood that this question affects Manitoba as much as any other province in Canada.

I was a little surprised at the attitude taken by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) in his reply to the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright). Instead of showing some appreciation for the fact that the hon. member for Melfort had taken the trouble to bring this serious matter to the attention of the government, the hon. member for Rosthern attempted to scold him. I do not think that is what this house expected. I realize that the government cannot be conversant with everything that develops throughout the country, and there are many things which possibly slip by unnoticed. It may be that they were not aware of the serious shortage of farm implements on the prairies, and the hon. member for Melfort has performed a public service for all the farmers of Canada by bringing this matter up for discussion to-day.

I think he made it abundantly clear that the only reason he was bringing it up at this time was its urgent importance. In some parts of the prairies harvesting has already begun, while in most other parts harvesting will begin in the next few weeks. There is a definite shortage of implements, and I think the government should have taken a more cooperative attitude than it appeared to take to-day.

A great deal has been said about the export of implements and the possible effects of preventing exports to other countries. So far as I am concerned I would be the last to say that we should place an embargo against the export of any materials to countries which require them, provided that we can spare them. To the extent that we can spare farm implements or anything else, we should be prepared to export them to countries which need them. But we are faced with an immediate shortage of implements in this country just before the harvest season begins.

It should be understood that if we export reapers and harvesters to the United States or to European countries they will not arrive there in time for use in harvesting. For the most part harvesting in the United States is either completed or well advanced, and the same may be said of many European countries. Anything we might ship now would not reach those countries in time to help with their harvesting. This should be clearly understood. It is not a question of depriving other countries of harvesting equipment which they might be able to use; it is a matter of making available to the farmers of western Canada, and all Canada, implements which have been manufactured and which are lying in pools, perhaps consigned to other countries but not yet shipped. I do not think it is unreasonable for members of this group or anyone else to request the government to give immediate consideration to releasing some of these implements which if shipped to other countries will not turn a wheel for a whole year while we are suffering a shortage in this country.

Mr. REID: How much wheat does the hon. member think will not be harvested because of a lack of machinery?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I do not know, but if one bushel of wheat is likely to be wasted because of a shortage of implements which are lying around and not being used, we should try to see that it is not wasted.

I think the argument about exports and imports was beside the point. I would not mind if we were to have a full dress discussion on imports and exports, because I am sure hon. members on all sides could contribute something to it. But I would point out that there seems to be a metamorphosis occurring in the thinking of hon. members on the Liberal side and hon. friends to my right in the matter of exports and imports. It was not so long ago that hon. members who support the government used to tell this house and the country that we must export in order to have a favourable balance of trade. That was their story then, but to-day they say we must export in order that we may have imports in exchange. I congratulate them upon that changed attitude; I believe it is far more sound. I think it was the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) who not very long ago coined the phrase that we must export or die. I may be wrong in crediting that phrase to him, but I think that is where it came from.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What about the socialists?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: To-day we heard the hon. member who has just interrupted me tell us that if we export we shall die. It is a little different type of story that we heard to-day.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That statement was never made at any time, and the hon. member knows better.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Hon. members on all sides are beginning to realize that we export in order that we may get goods in exchange, not to bring about a mythical balance of trade, which was the argument advanced before. Bringing in the argument of exports and imports at this time seemed to me to be getting a little away from the subject. I believe all the hon. member for Melfort wanted to do, and he presented his case ably, was to rivet the attention of the government on the shortage of implements in the west and throughout Canada generally, so that in the next twenty-four hours they might do something to supply implements which are already available but are being held or consigned to other countries. I do not think that is unreasonable.

The argument that people in the United States might feel offended if we refused to give them implements which normally might go there is not a very good one. I have been in the United States several times and I have spoken with farmers and others. I found these people most reasonable. I do not think they would object to the Canadian people supplying their own farmers with implements when there is a great need for them rather than ship them across the border. I believe they understand our situation, and I submit we are underestimating the friendliness and understanding of the people of the United States when we say that they would feel offended or would take some action in reprisal. I do not think that is correct.

It is not because of politics that we bring this matter to the attention of the house. I have in my hand a letter addressed to the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Probe) by the Saskatchewan associated boards of trade. Most of the members of this association are not farmers, but they recognize the shortage of certain types of implements. They say:

There is much concern in Saskatchewan and I presume on the prairies generally, that there will not be sufficient vehicles to transport the current crop from the farms to the rail head, in order to expedite its delivery to the peoples who are so much in need of it.

A little further down they make the following recommendation:

The Saskatchewan associated boards of trade respectfully urge that of the available supply, increases be made in the ordinary current allotment of commercial vehicles, or that quotas for winter months be diverted to fall delivery in time for the crop season.

It is evident that the associated boards of trade of Saskatchewan are aware of the impending shortage for this harvest. In all fairness the government should not take this merely as something in respect to which we are criticizing them, but as something that we have brought to their attention because we feel it is necessary that they take immediate action. I hope that is the spirit in which they will take it eventually.

Before I resume my seat I should like to put the record straight in connection with what the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) said earlier to-day. I am sure the hon. member did not wish to be unfair when he said that the members of this group failed to support his leader in the amendment he moved deploring the policies of the government which resulted in holding back production. But possibly he did not check the record. The vote on that amendment was taken on May 24, and it shows that the shoe was on the other foot. I have the record of the vote before me as contained on page 1874 of Hansard of May 24, 1946. If my hon. friend will refer to that he will see that of the members in the house at that time only nine Progressive Conservative members voted for the amendment of their leader.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I referred to the amendment to the address and to the amendment on the budget as well. We expressed the same criticism in all three amendments.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I am bound to accept the hon. member's explanation, but he definitely said that when the leader of the opposition moved his amendment—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): To the address in reply to the throne speech.

Mr. ZAPLITNY:—to the effect that government policies were interfering with full production, it did not receive the support of this group. I am referring to the amendment practically in those very words. I shall not read it, because that would be out of order.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The amendment to paragraph 3 of the address in reply to the speech from the throne is what I was referring to.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: The record speaks for itself. It shows that on May 24 only nine Progressive Conservative members voted to support the leader of the opposition.

Mr. GREEN: Be fair. How many were paired?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Exactly. There were many times nine members of this party paired at the time and present in the house.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Only nine of the Progressive Conservative members present voted for their amendment. I think that is correct. Nobody objects to that.

Mr. GREEN: State how many were paired.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Give the whole story.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. When an hon. member has the floor he should not be interrupted without his permission.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do not mind questions, or even interruptions if they come one at a time so that I can sort them out. The hon. member for Vancouver South asked how many members of his party were paired. I am not prepared to say at the moment, but it is on the record.

Mr. GREEN: That upsets your whole argument.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: We will start the whole story once again from "once upon a time." Nine members of the Progressive Conservative party voted for the amendment of their leader, and the rest were either paired or absent from the house.

Mr. MacNICOL: The ones who were paired could not be absent.

Mr. TUSTIN: Would it not be fair to say that 47 members of the Progressive Conservative party were present?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is all on Hansard.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: All I was attempting to do was to set the record straight.

Mr. STIRLING: Set it straight, then.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: But if my hon. friends do not wish me to do that, I shall go no further.

Mr. MERRITT: Is the motion to adjourn the house to discuss a shortage of farm machinery in western Canada, or to discuss division lists?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): If the hon. member for Dauphin will look at page 1874 of Hansard he will find the whole story there.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I have been discussing this shortage of farm implements; and I referred to how the Progressive Conservative members voted for their leader's amendment, because the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) had said that the members of this group had not supported them on that particular amendment. I thought it was my duty to set the record straight.

Mr. MacKINNON: You certainly have.

Mr. STIRLING: He has not.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: The Progressive Conservative amendment was simply a want of confidence motion, and the members of the Progressive Conservative party should have been here to support their leader's motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must remind him that the motion before the house is for adjournment to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, namely, the serious situation in western Canada with respect to shortage of suitable farm machinery. I would ask that the hon. member's remarks be relevant to the motion before the house.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I shall be glad to comply with your ruling, Mr. Speaker. We in this group are not objecting to exports from Canada of farm implements or anything else that we can spare, but we do say that if the export of farm implements at this time is in such volume that it may, and it is quite evident that it may, result in a wastage of food in Canada, it might be better for the government to take cognizance of that and take immediate action to make available to our farmers the implements which are necessary to gather in an abundant crop.

Mr. J. A. CHARLTON (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in support of the motion of the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright). I do not want it to be thought that the western part of Canada is the only part of this country that is short of implements. Instead of the shortage being merely a western problem, it is a national catastrophe. It has been brought about by the shortsighted policy of the government in granting export licences for such a large percentage of our farm implements. True, we want an export market, but surely we do not want it at the disadvantage of our own Canadian producers, especially in view of the great scarcity of farm labour this year. Even though some people may not realize it, crops that are ready to harvest will not wait. If I may be pardoned a personal reference, I have had a 15-run fertilizer hoe drill on order for three years, and up to this spring it was not available. I had to get a disc drill to take its place; otherwise I would have had no drill at all.

[Mr. J. A. Ross.]

Here is another special case. A man had a tractor ordered for two years, and he had already bought some of the implements to go with that tractor. Being assured that the tractor would be available in 1946, he sold his last team of horses last fall. He has not received the tractor, and only for his good fortune in being able to borrow one from a neighbour was he able to save half a canning factory pea crop. I can cite dozens of other cases in my own community where people have been working at a great disadvantage on account of the shortage of agricultural implements.

We are told that the shortage is caused by strikes, shortages of materials and so an, but we find on investigation that a little more than $14,000,000 worth of implements were exported from this country in the first six months of 1946. The present situation is not the result of shortages. It is the result of the shortsighted policy of this government in allowing that volume of implements to be exported when we are in terrible need of them right here at home. Why is this so? The reason is obvious when you compare the prices of these implements in Canada with the prices procured for them in various foreign countries. I say to the government that even at this late date it may still save part of the crop in western Canada and eastern Canada by allowing some of these implements destined for export to be retained to meet the domestic demand.

Mr. F. W. TOWNLEY-SMITH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, the motion calls attention to the urgency of the need of farm machinery in order to take off this year's crop. The discussion has wandered all over the well-known half acre. The amazing thing to me is that there should be any argument or debate about this at all. It is a condition which could have been and should have been anticipated and taken care of by the government, but this was not done.

To come right back to the actual matter. Does anyone argue about the importance of food? I do not think so. Does anyone argue that the western crop is not heavy? I do not think so. Does anyone argue that it is not within a few days of being harvested? Again I do not think so. Does anyone argue that in the west machines are not badly worn and badly in need of replacement? No argument has been made about these matters. That is really the subject matter of the motion—the need of more machinery, of new machinery. Instead of that, we get into an abstract discussion or debate on our export trade, and even at that we discuss principally exports into the United States. The statement has been made to-day that some seventy-one countries were receiving Canadian machinery, that exports were being made to all those countries. Well, what about the other sixty-nine, if we are just discussing exports into the United States and to those countries which have been devastated by war? The need for these machines is undoubtedly very great. The fact that the crop is heavy simply aggravates the situation, because a machine which is capable of taking care of a farm crop of ordinary, normal proportions is not able to cut a crop which is extraordinarily heavy; and I fear that as soon as harvesting operations begin there will be great distress among the farmers who are attempting to use worn-out machines.

My suggestion is that, since the situation in the United States is practically cared for now—at the end of July and beginning of August all arrangements for their harvest have been made, they have the machines, and if they have not got them they have managed in some way without them—the urgency which you, Mr. Speaker, are allowing us to discuss is in our own country, and for the time being, anyway, the great concentration should be on our own particular problem, for which purpose we should stop exports for the present and see to it that the west is supplied with the machines which, I believe, are necessary in order to take off this most important crop.

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): In rising to withdraw my motion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank you very much for having given the house the opportunity of discussing this matter. That was my sole object in bringing it up now—that the urgency of this matter should be brought to the attention of the house and of the country. I assure you that I do not wish to see the poor people of Europe described by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) starve; rather I was trying to point out the way in which we could secure more food for them. Nor was I endeavouring to antagonize our good friends to the south, as suggested by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe). I was merely trying to draw attention to the urgency of the matter.

Motion (Mr. Wright) withdrawn.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—FREIGHT RATES

Mr. ISNOR:

1. Has the Canadian National Railways made an application to seek upwards of a 25 per cent increase in freight rates?

2. If so, is it necessary to have approval from (a) the transport commission; (b) from the wartime prices and trade board?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The board of transport commissioners advise as follows:—

1. No application has been made to the board by the Canadian National Railways to increase domestic freight rates between points in Canada.

2. Answered by No. 1.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT—SAM CARR

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. When was Sam Carr (also known as Kogan), mentioned in the report of the royal commission on espionage, first granted naturalization in Canada?

2. (a) Was this certificate afterwards revoked; (b) if so, when, and for what reasons?

3. (a) Did Sam Carr thereafter make an application for naturalization; (b) if so, when; (c) who furnished him with letters of reference as to his good character; (d) in addition to these letters did any other person write letters of recommendation? If so, who?

Mr. MARTIN: In tabling this information I also wish to table reply to the same question put to me some time ago by the hon. member for Vegreville.

Mr. SPEAKER: Answered.

MEXICO TRAMWAYS COMPANY

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Have any representations been made by the Canadian government to the Mexican government on the subject of the Mexico Tramways Company?

2. If so, what is the nature of these representations?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: 1 and 2. The Canadian embassy has discussed with the Mexican authorities the difficulties being experienced by the Mexico Tramways company. The embassy has not, however, proposed or advocated any specific solution for the problem, although it has been indicated that the Canadian government assumes that just and reasonable consideration will be given to the Canadian interests concerned.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

Mr. FRASER:

1. How many employees of the National Film Board are Canadian citizens?

2. Are there any employees of the National Film Board who are not British subjects? If so, how many?

Mr. McCANN:

1. Of the 726 persons employed by the national film board, 710 are Canadian citizens.

2. Yes. There are nine, employed as follows:

Ottawa—1 Motion picture cameraman (United States citizen); 1 stills photographer,

1 motion picture producer and 1 production assistant (United States citizens) who served overseas with the Canadian armed forces.

United States—1 distribution officer (Chicago); 1 stenographer (Chicago); 1 office boy (New York).

Mexico—1 Spanish-speaking secretary; 1 Spanish-speaking messenger.

HIGH COMMISSIONER TO EIRE

Mr. GRAYDON:

Has the government appointed a high commissioner to Eire to succeed the late Merchant Mahoney, C.B.E.?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The government has not yet appointed a new high commissioner to Ireland to succeed Mr. Mahoney.

PASSENGER COMMUTATION RATES—TORONTO

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. From what railway stations are passenger commutation rates to Toronto in effect?

2. What are the mileages from Toronto and the commutation rates in the case of each of such stations?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1 and 2. The board of transport commissioners advise as follows:

POST OFFICES IN ROYAL CONSTITUENCY

Mr. BROOKS:

1. What was the revenue for the fiscal years ending March 31, 1943, 1944 and 1945 of the following post offices in the constituency of Royal; Chipman, Gagetown, Norton and Rothesay?

2. How large a revenue is required before recommendations are made for the construction of a post office building in incorporated or other villages?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier):

1.	1943	1944	1945
Chipman, N.B.	$6,057.47	$7,625.88	$8,163.92
Gagetown, N.B.	2,276.90	2,967.19	3,199.40
Norton, N.B.	3,425.37	4,586.41	4,896.92
Rothesay, N.B.	5,238.48	6,174.73	7,270.76

2. It is the present general policy of the Post Office Department to recommend to the Department of Public Works the construction of public buildings for post office purposes only when the postal revenue for the previous fiscal year is over $10,000 and where it is reasonably certain that the revenue will be maintained at that figure.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—32MM. MACHINES

Mr. FRASER:

1. Did the National Film Board buy two 32 mm. machines in 1944?
2. If so, from what firm, or individual, did they buy these machines?
3. Were these machines new or used?
4. Was part of the National Film Board shut down for part of the summer of 1944 while these two machines were being set up?
5. During the time that these two machines were being installed, what contracts, if any, were given to outside firms?
6. What footage did each contract cover?
7. With what firms were contracts made?
8. What was contract price in each case?

Mr. McCANN:

1. No. One 35mm. positive developing machine was purchased in 1943. Initial payment was made in 1942 and final payment in 1943. The existing negative developing machine was rebuilt.

2. The 35mm. positive developing machine was purchased from General Pattern and Model Co., East 140th St. and Walton Ave., New York City.

3. The machine was new and built according to required specifications.

4. There was no shut down in the laboratory in 1944 but the laboratory was partially closed from August 15, 1943 until December 7, 1943. The installation of the new machine gave an opportunity for the redesigning of the circulating system, the centralization of the chemical mixing and the installation of a process control room. In general the laboratory was modernized.

5. No contracts for processing of footage were given to outside firms. Purchase orders were placed as required.

6. Purchase orders sent out by the laboratory totalled 1,197,661 feet at Associated Screen News, Montreal and 85,292 feet at Film Laboratories of Canada, Toronto.

7. Orders were placed with Associated Screen News in Montreal and Film Laboratories of Canada in Toronto.

8. Purchase price in each case was the standard commercial rate offered by these companies: 16 mm. B. & W. composite, 2¼c per ft.; 35 mm. B. & W. composite—1st print, 4c per ft.; 35 mm. B. & W. composite release, 2¾c per ft.; 35 mm. B. & W. from negative, 4c per ft.; 35 mm. duplicating positive, 5c per ft.; 35 mm. duplicating negative from lavender, 6c per ft.; 35 mm. lavender, 4c per ft.; 35 mm. fine grain duplicating negative, 6c per ft.; 35 mm. developing duplicating negative, 1½c per ft.; 35 mm. developing sound track, 1½c per ft.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—TAXICAB ACCOUNTS

Mr. FRASER:

1. Did the National Film Board pay taxicab accounts for Mr. Grierson or Mr. Legg during the time these men were employed by the National Film Board?
2. If so, to whom were these taxi accounts paid?
3. What was the amount in the case of each of the above named men?

Mr. McCANN:

1. Yes.

2. In Ottawa payments were made to Buske's taxi, Red Line taxi, Gibson's taxi and Landreville taxi.

3. Taxi charges for Mr. Grierson in Ottawa totalled $1,090.15, and outside of Ottawa $1,370.39 during the period September, 1940, to October 31, 1945.

Taxi charges for Mr. Legg in Ottawa totalled $623.94, and outside of Ottawa $395.80 during the period September, 1940, to April 2, 1946.

AMBASSADORS AND FOREIGN MINISTERS

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. How many Canadian ambassadorial and ministerial posts in countries outside of the British commonwealth remain vacant?
2. What are the names of such countries and for how long had the vacancy in each instance existed?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. One.

2. The Canadian embassy in Chile has been headed by a Chargé d'Affaires since the departure of Mr. W. F. Chipman, K.C., on August 21, 1945, to assume his new post as Canadian ambassador to Argentina.

TAXES ON DISTILLERIES AND MALTSTERS

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia):

1. What was the total revenue from tax on distilleries for the years 1939, 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943, 1944 and 1945?
2. What was the total revenue from tax on maltsters for the years 1939, 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943, 1944 and 1945?

Mr. McCANN:

1. Apart from sales tax, the total revenue from tax on distilleries during the years mentioned was nil. It is impossible to state the amount of sales tax paid by distilleries for this is not kept separate. The amounts of excise duty paid year by year were as follows:

1939	$ 9,929,585
1940	12,478,114
1941	17,695,951
1942	21,994,307
1943	31,612,277
1944	30,908,236
1945	31,576,776

2. The same remarks apply to question 2. The amounts of excise duty paid year by year were as follows:

1939	$ 8,177,299
1940	11,405,151
1941	16,801,740
1942	25,241,291
1943	33,952,237
1944	35,080,381
1945	35,121,290

GULF OF GEORGIA—SEINE AREA NO. 17

Mr. REID:

1. Have any representations been made to the Hon. Minister of Fisheries requesting the enlarging or opening up seine area No. 17 in the Gulf of Georgia, for the operation of seine fishing during the fishing season of 1946?
2. If so, what are the names of individuals, companies or associations who have made such representations?

Mr. BRIDGES:

1. Representations have been made to the Department of Fisheries.
2. Salmon Canners' Operating Committee, Vancouver, B.C.; Fishing Vessel Owners' Association, Vancouver, B.C.; United Fishermen and Allied Workers' Union, Vancouver, B.C.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION IN INDIA

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. Has Canada any representation in India through its departments of Trade and Commerce and/or External Affairs?
2. If so, what is the nature of such representation and who are our representatives?

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

VETERANS AFFAIRS—LEGAL SERVICES—W. C. THOMSON, K.C.

Mr. HOMUTH:

What fees have been paid to W. C. Thomson, K.C., 21 Lombard street, Toronto, by the Department of Veterans Affairs for each month since he has handled the department's land transfers?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

GULF OF GEORGIA—SEINE AREA NO. 17

Mr. REID:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents forwarded to the Hon. Minister of Fisheries in regard to the enlarging or opening up of seine area No. 17, in the Gulf of Georgia, for the operation of seine fishing during the fishing season of 1946?

Mr. REID: With regard to this notice, with the permission of the house I should like to add the words, after "the Hon. Minister of Fisheries", "and any of his officials."

Mr. MARTIN: Perhaps in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries the hon. member will allow this to stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stand.

REDISTRIBUTION—AMENDMENTS TO BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents exchanged between the federal government and the provincial governments, since the census of 1941, relative to amendments to the British North America Act and the redistribution of seats in the House of Commons.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: As I understand the hon. member's question, it refers to correspondence dealing with amendments to the British North America Act on the subject of redistribution. On that understanding there would be no objection to the motion being passed; otherwise it would require that every department make a long search of all its files to see if there have not been suggestions of possible amendments to the British North America Act in respect of other matters. As an illustration, my department has had correspondence with attorneys-general with respect to the possibility of making some provision for fixing a retiring age of judges. The terms of the motion seem a little ambiguous, but if we are to understand that it refers to such correspondence as may have dealt with the problem of redistribution it can be passed.

Mr. BROOKS: The hon. member for Cumberland is not here, but I understand that that was his intention.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Then perhaps it can be passed with the understanding that that is what it refers to, and if he wishes something else he can make another motion.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN ESTIMATES TO COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): With the permission of the house, Mr. Speaker, I should like to revert to motions, and to move, seconded by Mr. Chevrier:

That items Nos. 41 to 56, both inclusive, of the estimates for 1946-47, approved and reported upon by the standing committee on external affairs, be referred to the committee of supply.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, may I rise in connection with this matter of the report from the external affairs committee. This, I believe, is the first occasion on which the House of Commons has referred to a standing committee ordinary estimates relating to a department, and the point I desire to make is this. I am querying the procedure. It may be that it is correct, but I had thought that on the motion for concurrence in the report, which has been presented only to-day, these estimates would be dealt with instead of being sent to the committee of supply. I do not wish to raise a question at this time except as a form of notice, because I am not quite sure of my ground, and I doubt very much whether the government itself is, since this is a new problem and presents a new issue. Those who are responsible in matters of this kind, together with Your Honour, would perhaps look into the question. What we do here may be regarded as a precedent in the years that lie ahead, because no doubt as time goes on more estimates will be referred to standing committees. I suggest therefore that we ought to have the procedure delineated and clarified at the beginning.

Hon. IAN A MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I understand the procedure to be this. The Department of External Affairs as such is not yet in supply, and only when it is in supply can these estimates be properly referred to supply.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIANS HELD BY GOVERNMENT OF YUGOSLAVIA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) referred yesterday to a report in the press that the minister of state of the United Kingdom had said in the House of Commons in London that he understood that five Canadians were among the British subjects at present held by the Yugoslav government. I informed the hon. member that I would look into this matter and try to let him have some information to-day.

The reported statement by Mr. Noel Baker coincides with information available here. Five persons who are Canadian nationals are at present known to be in internment in Yugoslavia. These persons are:

Mrs. Nick (Anna) Schwartz and daughter Hilga.
Miss Barbara Mueller.
Mrs. Mathias (Katharina) Dorner and daughter Catherine.

Of these persons, all except Catherine Dorner were born in Yugoslavia, and all are dual nationals—that is, all are Yugoslav citizens under Yugoslav law as well as Canadian nationals under Canadian law. It is understood that the Yugoslav government has interned all Yugoslav citizens of German race.

The repatriation of these five persons to Canada has been authorized, and the British embassy in Belgrade has been requested to ask the Yugoslav government to release them for such repatriation. The house will appreciate, however, that a case of this kind, where the persons involved are also citizens of the state in which they are held, is very different from a case in which a foreign government is holding persons who are aliens under its own laws.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the Acting Prime Minister any information as to the place of residence in Canada of any of the five persons mentioned?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, I have not. They were in Yugoslavia and were interned while residing there, at least temporarily, and because of their dual nationality an intervention on their behalf has been made for the Canadian government by the British embassy at Belgrade.

PUBLIC WORKS

DISTURBANCE CAUSED BY AIR DRILLS OPERATING AT NIGHT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. RUSSELL BOUCHER (Carleton): May I ask the Minister of Public Works whether steps can be taken immediately to discontinue the nightly nuisance caused in the vicinity of the Chateau Laurier by the working of air drills on the streets at Confederation square? This nightly nuisance unduly disturbs our tourists and guests, including members of this august parliament, in their midnight slumbers. Possibly the temper of this chamber is being damaged thereby.

Mr. PEARKES: On a question of privilege, may I say that I am convinced that my efficiency as a member of parliament is seriously curtailed by this nightly torture, which is reminiscent only of a dentist's chair, and I have no intention of supporting any vote for the federal district until the noise stops.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): I sincerely hope hon. members do not blame the Minister of Public Works for all that noise. I am probably the most quiet man in this chamber. I have just received notice of the question and am having an inquiry made. I do not know personally about the noise, nor have I any personal knowledge whether the work is being done under my department. In fact I have no personal knowledge of any of these things, because after midnight I am generally not in Ottawa.

IMMIGRATION

ADMISSION TO CANADA OF MEMBERS OF POLISH ARMY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): Since I answered the question of the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) concerning the movement to Canada of 4,000 Polish army men, further information obtained from the office of the high commissioner in London has been received, and I am now able to say that arrangements being made for the movement of these Polish army men are for shipping that is to be in addition to all that had been previously arranged, and that there is no question of this shipping reducing the tonnage to be available to the Canadian government for other purposes.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE

REPORT OF COMMITTEE UNDER BRIGADIER LETT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I wish to direct to the Minister of National Defence a question, notice of which, I am sorry to say, I have not given him. I understand there is a committee sitting under Brigadier Lett in connection with the future of the royal military college. Has the minister any report in that regard?

[Mr. Boucher.]

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): Yes. The committee was under the chairmanship of Brigadier Sherwood Lett of Vancouver, a very distinguished soldier. It has made its report, but owing to pressure of other work I have not yet had an opportunity of giving it full consideration. That will be done in due course.

PARIS PEACE CONFERENCE

REQUEST FOR COPIES OF PROPOSED TREATIES WITH FORMER ENEMY COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): In view of the interest, which is very widespread, in the proposals being made by the allied powers with respect to the peace treaties of five ex-enemy countries in Europe, I wonder whether the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs could arrange to have those proposed peace treaties incorporated in some form so that the members of the house may be enabled to read them concurrently with the discussions and deliberations that are taking place in Paris. Everyone is intensely interested in the matter, and only newspaper reports are available at the moment. I suggest that members of parliament ought to have in their possession something official, if that is at all possible and convenient to the government.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): I shall be glad to make inquiries and to endeavour to accommodate hon. members to the greatest possible extent in that regard.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

ACTION AS TO AGREEMENTS IN ABSENCE OF PRIME MINISTER AND MINISTER OF FINANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): Arising out of a letter I received to-day, I wish to direct a question to the leader of the house. During the absence of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance will the Minister of Justice and the Acting Minister of Finance be in a position to deal with the provinces regarding agreements on dominion-provincial matters?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Acting Minister of Finance): The answer is yes.

EXTRADITION

TREATY BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): I wish to ask the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he has any further information concerning a treaty which very directly affects my constituents; I refer to the extradition treaty between the United States and Canada.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): This is the first reference I have heard to that treaty for several weeks, but I shall be glad to take the question as a notice and make inquiries and find out what is the present situation.

PENSION ACT

ENLARGEMENT OF SCOPE AND APPLICATION—REORGANIZATION OF COMMISSION

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of bill No. 329, to amend the Pension Act.

He said: Since I dealt with this matter yesterday I have just two words to say. In the first place I believe the committee on veterans affairs practically unanimous in regard to at least the general principles of this legislation. In the second place the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), the parliamentary assistant, will have the honour to direct and pilot the legislation through the house.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): Yesterday the minister made a concise statement with reference to the matters which had been before the veterans committee. As he indicated, these matters have been carefully considered for many weeks. We did come to an agreement as to the procedure to be followed with reference to these bills. We agreed that any discussion which took place would be not on the resolutions but on second reading.

As the minister pointed out, this has been a long and tedious task for the members of the committee. We met sometimes two and three times a day. Speaking for myself—and I know that my experience was that of every other hon. member of the committee—I found it difficult at times to carry on other duties so far as the House of Commons was concerned.

The minister will agree that we were not unanimous on all bills. Neither was the committee unanimous on all the recommendations with respect to individual bills. I think I can say with regard to some of the bills that possibly there was unanimous consent. Others were carried by the majority vote of the committee. While still others had the majority support of the committee, they were changed to suit the will and pleasure of the government. That is a fair statement to make.

I agree with the minister that a prolonged discussion of these bills is unnecessary. These matters have been discussed in the committee for some weeks. All the arguments pro and con have been advanced, and they can be found in the reports of the committee. However, there are certain things which hon. members would like to mention in the house. I was much interested yesterday afternoon in the minister's remarks. Since I was a member of the committee I was pleased with the eulogy he paid to the work of the committee. I am also looking forward to the presentation of the medals to which the minister says the members are deserving. I should also like to point out that while the minister rather takes all the credit for the veterans' charter—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh, no.

Mr. BROOKS: Not to himself, no. While he gives credit for it to the committee, and possibly to his own actions as minister over the last number of years, I think in all modesty that we cannot take all the credit. This veterans' charter is not the product of the present committee; it is the product of many years of work of committees which have met in the past. Take our Pension Act as an example. It is not the product of the work of the 1946 committee. As a matter of fact we made few changes in it. The Pension Act has been an evolution from 1916, when the first committee was set up, down to the present time. Hundreds of members of different parliaments who sat on previous committees also deserve credit for this so-called veterans' charter. Credit is also due to organizations entirely outside of parliament. I wish to pay tribute to the men of the Canadian Legion. I believe there would be no veterans' charter to-day if it were left entirely to the members of the House of Commons. The results of our work have been based partly on the recommendations made by the Canadian Legion, the Canadian Corps Association, and the Amputations Association. I could mention the Canadian army and navy veterans association and many others which have contributed to a great extent to this so-called veterans' charter of which the minister spoke yesterday.

As to its being the finest committee that has sat, I will agree with that, but in reading over the names of some of the men who have headed committees in the past I must say that I have been greatly impressed by their stature both in public and in private life. There was Mr. W. F. Nickle, an outstanding man in his time. There was Mr. Newton W. Rowell, an outstanding man of his time, Mr. Hume Cronyn, Sir Herbert Marler, the Hon. Cyrus Macmillan, the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), also a member of this committee. May I also add, Mr. Speaker, that he is an hon. member who had the affection of the soldiers of the last war and has at least the affection of the men of the air force of this war. Therefore we cannot claim all the credit when we consider the names of the men who have worked hard on committees in the past.

The minister paid a tribute to our chairman. We all enjoyed working under the chairman. We did not always agree with him. Sometimes we were afraid that he might blow up, but fortunately it did not happen. I will agree that he is deserving of a medal. I would also suggest that not only is he deserving of a medal in the work he did in the veterans' committee, but he should get a bar to his medal for going out to lead the Liberal party in Saskatchewan.

Mr. MacNICOL: He ought to get the V.C. for that.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is a great act of bravery.

Mr. BROOKS: It is not my intention to review, as the minister did yesterday, all the legislation which is to come before us. We have the Pension Act before us at the present time. The introduction of the Pension Act creates great interest not only here but also throughout the country, because it is the expression, through its representatives, of Canada's intention to provide for those who have suffered most in the defence of this country and of civilization. In their gratitude the Canadian people should feel, and I am sure do feel, that the best is none too good. We sometimes compare our veterans' legislation and our Pension Act with the legislation of other countries, and perhaps make comparisons without knowing the facts. I am not going to belittle Canadian legislation relating to veterans; I think possibly it is as good as the legislation anywhere in the world. Not long ago I read an article in a United States magazine in which it was claimed that they had the best legislation, so perhaps it is a case of each man thinking his own home is the best. However, I am satisfied that our legislation is good. It should be. There is no reason why Canada should not make provision as good as if not better than that of any other country in the world, because I believe Canada came through the war better than any other country. That is so for many reasons. In the first place, of course, we were a long distance from the scene of conflict and had no cities or towns destroyed. Our countryside was not devastated. Apart from the great loss we suffered in young manhood, Canada was not greatly disturbed or greatly troubled. So perhaps when we compare our legislation with that of Great Britain, whose cities were devastated from one end of the country to the other; with that of France or Holland or Belgium, or the enemy countries of Italy and Germany, we are not actually comparing comparable things. So I say there is no reason at all why we should not have the finest veterans legislation anywhere in the world.

This legislation, I believe, can be divided into two distinct classes. First, and very important, is the legislation providing for the men who returned to this country sound in body and in mind. These are the young men who went over to fight our battles and who returned to take their place in civilian life. We have passed a good deal of legislation affecting these young men; but I sometimes wonder what is their reaction when, after fighting overseas for five years or more, a year after the end of the war they find the present chaotic condition in regard to labour and industry. I am not going to blame either industry or labour for this situation, since a committee of this house is considering the matter at the present time, but it must be the subject of serious thought on the part of these young men who gave years of their lives in the defence of liberty to find a certain amount of chaos in the country, with more in prospect. There are two things in particular which these young men want. They lost four or five years of their lives as far as education is concerned, and it is the duty of the government, the duty of the people of Canada, to see that they are provided with educational opportunities. This is being done in a large way by the government and the country; but the principal thing a young man wants, coming back to Canada to-day, is the opportunity to earn a living. We sometimes hear irresponsible people, both ex-soldiers and civilians, say, "Oh, the country owes me a living." The country does not owe any man a living. The country does owe every young man and woman in this country an opportunity to make a living. It also owes them an opportunity to establish homes for themselves, where they can bring up their children with proper educational facilities and in pleasant surroundings. These are the two things which I believe should be kept in mind in regard to the reestablishment of our young men who have returned from the war.

The second and probably most important class of legislation deals with the men who have come back maimed in body and mind, and the dependents of those who lost their lives overseas. They are supposed to be protected by the Pension Act and its amendment. It would take me a long time to go into the different sections of this act and comment upon them; as a matter of fact we received it only a few minutes ago. Yesterday the minister emphasized that one great principle was to be included in the act; that is, the insurance principle. We remember that this principle formed part of the Pension Act for a great many years. It was first enacted in 1919, and was removed in 1940. So while this insurance principle is perhaps the most important feature of this legislation and the most important thing to be done in connection with pension legislation by the committee, we are simply restoring something which was in the act from 1919 to 1940.

There are two principles in connection with Canadian pensions, and I should like to quote something that was said in connection with the 1919 legislation:

> The so-called insurance principle. On this basis ex-members of the forces were pensioned not only for any disability "attributable to military service," but as well for any disability "incurred on" service.

That is the explanation of the insurance principle.

> Canada insured her soldiers for all disabilities incurred by them during their service period . . .

Commenting on that principle Mr. Rowell said:

> Our law as it stands is broader than the pension law in any other country, so far as we know. The insurance feature which I have mentioned is not in any other law, so far as I am aware. In that respect we give the soldier the benefit of insurance during the whole period of the war.

That was the attitude in 1919.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That was Mr. Lemieux and Mr. Rowell, in the 1919 committee.

Mr. BROOKS: And I may say that early in the proceedings of the committee dealing with the Pension Act I moved that the insurance principle be restored. That motion was generally supported by hon. members, and though we were left in doubt by the government for a considerable time, eventually the principle found its way back into the act, and I am sure everyone is very pleased as a result.

Another point gave us considerable concern in the committee, where it was debated on numerous occasions by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) and others, having to do with section 11(1)(c) of the act, reading as follows:

> No deduction shall be made from the degree of actual disability of any member of the forces, who has served in a theatre of actual war during the great war or during the war with the German Reich, on account of any disability or disabling condition which existed in him prior to his period of service in either of the aforesaid wars.

Then it goes on to mention three exceptions:

> . . . no pension shall be paid for a disability or disabling condition which, at the time he became a member of the forces, was wilfully concealed, was obvious or was recorded on medical examination prior to enlistment.

There was no exception taken, but the committee felt, and I think they were expressing the opinion of most returned men, that the phrase "wilfully concealed" should be struck out of the act, and it was so moved by the hon. member for Vancouver South. I believe the committee carried that motion but the department did not feel that this could be done. However, there was a compromise and I see that in the bill, instead of the phrase "wilfully concealed", we have the phrase "wilfully and deliberately concealed." I understood from the members of the commission when this matter was being discussed before the committee that they did not like the words "wilfully concealed." However, apparently they have adopted some modus operandi, if I may call it that, and while a certain stigma against a returned soldier intimating he was concealing something might be implied, I think they got around it in some way in actually carrying out the intentions of the act. I am sorry it is not being taken out now, and I hope at some time in the future it shall be taken from the act.

Another point brought up was in connection with the dateline. I was pleased to hear the minister say yesterday that as far as children of veterans are concerned there will be no dateline with regard to the granting of pensions.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We can thank the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) for that.

Mr. BROOKS: That is a fact, that is, provided that the parents are married before May 1, 1944. The minister will remember that this point was the cause of considerable controversy, because it was felt to be unfair that children born after that date should not be given the same opportunity as children born before. It is a matter of some disappointment that the dateline was not eliminated entirely from the act, that is, as it applies to widows as well as to children. There are many veterans of the first war who are getting to be comparatively old men and who have lost their first wives. In their later days many of them feel that they would like to have companionship and they marry again. If a veteran marries a second time I do not see why his second wife should not receive the same consideration as a first wife.

We were met with the argument that there might be deathbed marriages, but in looking through the act I find that there is ample protection in that regard. Subsection 2 of section 32 provides that if the death of a husband has occurred less than one year subsequent to the date of marriage and the commission has information that at the time of such marriage he had a reasonable expectation of survival, for at least one year afterward, the matter shall be considered. That section provides for the non-payment of a pension where there is a deathbed marriage.

Another matter discussed extensively in the committee was the question of preenlistment condition. I do not intend to take up the time of the house this afternoon in discussing this matter, because there are other hon. members who will follow me and I am sure they will discuss it fully. There was also the question of the automatic increase in disability pension. Many members of the committee felt that not only should the man who suffered a gunshot wound and who was in receipt of a fifty per cent pension receive a higher entitlement on reaching the respective ages of 55 years, 57 years and 59 years, but that any man who had a disability, whether a gunshot wound or other impairment of health, should have his pension increased. This was not granted.

I should like to say a few words with reference to hospitalization. When overseas in 1942 and again for a short time in 1944 and 1945 I had the opportunity of visiting many of our military hospitals. I do not think I can pay too high a tribute to the work that was done in those hospitals. I think the lower casualties in the last war can be attributed more to the improved science of medicine and the treatment of wounds and disease than to anything else. In those hospitals we had the finest doctors and nurses that it was possible to get. I hope an effort will be made to get the same type of nurse and the same type of doctor for our veterans' hospitals as were in charge of our military hospitals.

There seems to be some overcrowding in the veterans' hospitals at the present time. The minister has increased greatly the number of beds in the different hospitals during the last few years, but there is still some overcrowding. I think it was shortsighted on the part of the government not to have certain hospitals ready immediately the war was over. We knew there would be a great need for hospitalization. For instance, the hospital in Toronto should have been completed before the war ended.

Large sums of money were expended upon building and equipping military hospitals throughout the country. For instance, three or four hundred thousand dollars were spent upon the military hospital located at Windsor, Nova Scotia. This hospital was located on diked land, and at times the dikes broke and water surrounded the area. The department was advised to build the hospital upon higher ground, but they did not do so. This was one of the best equipped military hospitals in the country. Doctors going overseas who inspected the hospital commented upon the splendid equipment. My submission is that hospitals such as the one at Windsor and those in other parts of Canada should have been built in locations where they could have been used as veterans' hospitals.

Mr. MACKENZIE: During the last four or five weeks we have taken over about fifteen military hospitals. I sent a list across to the hon. member for Vancouver South.

Mr. BROOKS: I know the department has taken over those hospitals, but my point is that certain hospitals such as the one at Windsor, Nova Scotia, were not built in the proper place. If that particular hospital had been built half a mile from its present location it would have been better suited as a veterans' hospital. I know the minister has taken over the hospital in my own town of Sussex, New Brunswick, which hospital has a very beautiful location and I am sure it will be popular.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I agree with that.

Mr. BROOKS: There is another matter which was not taken up in the veterans committee but which I think will have to receive the attention not only of parliament but of the country within the next few years. I refer to the plight of our older veterans. I believe there are some seven veterans' homes in Canada, but they are more or less for veterans who need hospitalization. I am referring to the older veteran, the man who perhaps is living alone in some isolated part of the country. There must be hundreds of them. I think we should do what other countries such as Great Britain and the United States have done, build homes in which our older veterans can live. Canada has been engaged in two major wars in the last thirty years, the first great war and the last great war.

It has perhaps not been necessary to have old soldiers' homes in this country hitherto, but I believe the time has now come when we should have homes where these older men can get together and be happy and discuss the battles of the past, or as Goldsmith said, shoulder their crutch and show how wars were won.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer; it has to do with my own section of the dominion. I want to read a statement made by Major General Burns as reported in the Montreal Gazette of July 4 of this year. Speaking of the rehabilitation programme he said:

> The department was satisfied with the rate of employment in its various districts across the dominion except for the maritimes, where veterans applying for out-of-work allowance were three times the proportion of elsewhere.
>
> The difficulty there appears to be, the general noted, that in certain regions conditions for employment will not improve particularly and, although some authorities had recommended a programme of public works for the area, the Department of Reconstruction has decided against such measure at the present time. The question that remained was whether migration to other areas should be encouraged.
> By the same token, veteran's preference has been effective right across the country except in the maritimes.

It will be noted that General Burns emphasizes four points in that statement. The first is that three times the number of veterans applied for out-of-work benefits in the maritime provinces than applied in other parts of Canada. That indicates one thing, that the opportunities for employment in the martime provinces are not nearly as great as they are in other parts of Canada. It means that we have three times as many veterans out of work in the martimes as there are in any other part of this country.

The second point was that while the authorities had recommended a programme of public works the Department of Reconstruction had decided against it. I have been surprised, Mr. Speaker, that with the amount of unemployment which there has been in Canada, and which there is to-day particularly in the maritimes, some programme of public works has not been started by this government and by the local governments in order to give these young men work.

His third statement was whether migration to other areas should be encouraged. That is a suggestion to which I am sure we in the maritime provinces take strong exception. For too long have our young men from the maritime provinces been migrating elsewhere. Of the class that graduated in engineering from the university of New Brunswick a few months ago, and it was one of the largest engineering classes they had ever had, only two young men could find employment in their native province. We of the maritime provinces want employment for our young people. We want them to have an opportunity to live and work and remain in their own province and not be forced to go to the United States, as tens of thousands of them have had to do in years past, or to the central provinces or to the west. We want them to stay in the maritime provinces. I do urge upon the government so far as that section of this country is concerned that some public works be started, and be started at once in order to retain the young men from the maritime provinces in their native land and in their own home. I could suggest many public works that could advantageously be started, but I will not take the time of the house to do it to-day.

The fourth point made by General Burns was that the veteran's preference has been effective right across the country except in the maritimes. That simply means that there is more attention paid to political appointments in the maritime provinces than to appointments based on the veteran's preference. I have had many communications with reference to different departments of the government where the veteran's preference is not being observed as it should be. I appeal to the government that in making appointments in all departments of the government the veteran's preference be given every consideration. Only a few days ago I had a letter from a lawyer in the maritime provinces, a man who had a very fine record overseas. He lives in quite a large town, but he gets no work in connection with the Veterans Land Act administration. He writes me that men who never saw service at all are doing all the legal work. This should not be. The returned soldier would rather deal with another returned soldier than with a civilian. I hope that the different departments will check up on this matter.

In closing I should like to pay a tribute to some of the heads of the different branches administering veterans' affairs. I believe that at the head of these branches and departments we have some of the best men it would be possible for us to obtain. I might mention Mr. Woods, the deputy minister of the Department of Veterans Affairs; General Burns, whose statement I have just quoted with respect to the maritimes—and let me say that I was not criticizing him when I quoted his statement because I think the department was fortunate indeed in getting such a man. I will also mention Brigadier Melville, Colonel Garneau and Mr. Murchison. I believe that they all have the interests of the veterans at heart. The difficulty is not with the men at the head, but rather with the men spread across the country. Sometimes there is too much red tape and too much confusion.

I have nothing to add, Mr. Speaker, except to repeat that I hope that the veteran's preference will be very carefully considered in all appointments made in all the provinces.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. and gallant member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) upon his very fine speech. He has a fine military record, and he loves the soldiers. He himself has done a lot for them. I remember that on the civil service committee several years ago during two sessions he made some most valuable suggestions. I can say the same of my hon. friend the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) who sits in front of him.

I shall not take very long, Mr. Speaker, to express what I have to say on this bill. But first I should like to pay a special tribute to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie). He is gifted with a very kind heart, and when there is some difficulty we may appeal to him in confidence of having the wrong redressed. I understand that his task is not always easy, but it is made less difficult by the excellent cooperation which he receives from his parliamentary assistant, the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker). Both are good giants, giants in mind as well as in body; they work a lot; they know how to work—which is happening quite seldom in this vicinity—and they do their best to help others. But before going farther, I hope that the minister will be in a position to make an estimate of the approximate cost of these eleven bills. It will be quite heavy, and it is the kind of information which we should have.

Mr. MACKENZIE: This year, $850 million —$693 million in the main estimates, plus $175 million supplementaries.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes. This is where one large proportion of the taxes will go.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is right.

Mr. POULIOT: Will it be $690 million next year?

Mr. MACKENZIE: No; it will be much less next year.

Mr. POULIOT: What will it be next year?

Mr. TUCKER: The total cost of the programme, not counting the pensions with respect to world war I, and one other item having to do with world war I, will be approximately $1,500 million for the whole programme of rehabilitation.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is quite a lot.

Mr. POULIOT: It is a very large sum of money, but I would be better disposed to vote for it than to vote for the loan, and if the loan had not been made we would have had that much more to spend.

Mr. TUCKER: May I interrupt my hon. friend? That $1,500 million will be spread over the next six years, approximately.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Cannot we have both?

Mr. POULIOT: Well, I wonder. If my hon. friends like the taxes that the Canadian people will have to pay we could double it, just because of their liking taxation.

But there are unpopular measures which are necessary, and one, which was suggested years ago by the hon. member for Temiscouata, would be a check-up of all pensions of the first war. At the present time we expend a considerable amount of money for pensions which are paid on account of service in the first world war. Would it not be profitable for the country to have an independent check-up made of each case to see if the money goes to those who are entitled to it, or if the circumstances have changed? This would be unpopular, but I remind the minister that a large amount of money can be provided for military pensions without the expected political return being received. No one forgets that in 1930 the government was lavish with pensions and the government was defeated, and that in 1935 another government was also lavish and that government was defeated—which means that no one should have a political motive in dealing with matters of the kind.

Another thing which struck me in reading this bill No. 329, to amend the Pension Act is the reference to world war I and world war II which is often repeated in the various sections of the bill. I hope that, in the future, amendments to the Pension Act for world war III will not appear; that we shall stop at world war II. When I think of the pensions to those who are still alive after having been disabled, and when I think of the pensions to the dependents, I have to think also of the fine youth who had to pay the price of war with their own blood, and the loss of powerful brains, young brains, brains of men who could have served their country very well and who lie under white crosses in the cemeteries of Europe and other parts of the world. It impresses me deeply, and I consider that the country has a duty to perform with regard to those who have been in the army. It is the duty of the collectivity.

But it is not because a man has been in the army that he is entitled to a pension. He is entitled to it because of certain considerations due to the difficulties he has encountered in service. If a young man has enlisted or has joined the colours and has done his duty either in this country or outside it, has followed the orders of his commanding officer and has done well, and comes back in good health, he is not entitled to any pension. The pension is for the disabled and for the dependents of the departed and of those who are unable to earn their livelihood. It may be that service in the army is a very good and profitable experience to the young man who comes back in good health. But so many are handicapped; so many have suffered wounds, have lost an arm, a leg, an eye or are totally deprived of sight, or have sustained other disabilities that it is impossible to think of them with "a dry heart." I was in close touch with soldiers and veterans during the whole war; I considered it my duty to listen to them and to try to help them out whenever the occasion occurred if it was possible to do so. It was done in various ways, and I saw the close connection that existed between the Department of National Defence and the then Department of Pensions and National Health. It is my duty to pay a special tribute to my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Macdonald), who did so much for the boys when he was parliamentary assistant to the then minister of national defence. His kindness, his thoughtfulness and his conscientious study of long and tedious files brought cheer to many homes. It was not interesting; it was not pleasurable, but in spite of his other occupations he considered it a duty to come to the assistance of young men who were not treated by the medical corps with the consideration that they deserved.

A member of parliament has many things to do, but one of his duties is to listen to those who are in trouble and in difficulty and to try to do something for them, and what I happened to do was to receive in my office some boys who were unfit. In spite of the fact that they were unfit and sometimes disabled, they were graded A by the army. Some were suffering from goitre; others from chronic appendicitis; others had one eye; others had lumps the size of my fist on the spine. They could neither stand nor sit upright. Others suffered from other disabilities. They were, however, all graded A. I have a letter from the department to the effect that they were fit and that if they complained it was because there was something wrong with their minds rather than with their bodies.

I asked my friend Colonel Desrosiers, who as deputy minister of national defence did so much for the boys, to look into the matter, and these men were submitted to another examination. I asked that they be examined by competent doctors. After instructions from the deputy minister and my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax, they were examined and found unfit; and they were found unfit because of disabilities that existed at the time they were declared fit.

What happened afterwards? They were not given a pension but were told that their unfitness predated their entry into the army, and the matter was left at that. It is cruel; but at least, with the assistance of my hon. friend and the assistance of Colonel Desrosiers, I succeeded in getting them out of the army, because it is my deep conviction, in spite of what has been said about the Pulhems system, that it is absurd to keep in the army, and at the expense of the country, one who is practically unfit. But that is not all. There were times when pensions were granted to everybody, and the expenditure was so great that the tap was turned off so that afterwards no one, not even those who were most meritorious, could get anything. They could not get anything because of the enormous expenditures that had been made carelessly before. It is hard to correct it.

I have some files here. There is, for instance, the file of a man who was in the first world war, No. 897, who was one of the first to join the colours and one of the last to be discharged. He was wounded through the body; but, since he was a big man, his disability was not so apparent at the start and he was discharged A-1. Subsequently, however, he had a premature predisposition to certain disabilities, especially rheumatism. He would probably never have had rheumatism if he had not been five years in the trenches, but because he was classified as A when discharged it was impossible to get anything for him. The facts are there, and his number is 897.

This is not the first time that I have mentioned his case in the house, but I have never succeeded in getting anything because of the stubborness of the officials in the Department of Pensions and National Health. I put the name of Brigadier Melville in brackets because he seems to be well disposed, but there are still many who belong to the old school tie and whom it is impossible to move. I wonder what power is needed to make them move and move sensibly. They are there to effect economy for the country; but watch their own expenditures for themselves and see how lavish they are, while they are stingy to those who deserve something.

I have another case, No. 23923, a man who had a sore leg when he enlisted but who was classified A notwithstanding. He was put in charge of the barracks on the hill in Levis in the winter—barracks not needed. They were outside, and there was no place where the men could go and warm themselves in the winter. They were exposed to the wind. This man got a disability but it did not count. His disability was said to have predated his enlistment and therefore he got nothing.

I find it a crime; I find it shameful; and I call the attention of the minister and of his assistant to these cases. But I do not speak to deaf ears, because in many cases they have helped me out in spite of the procrastination of some men in the department. In fact, procrastination is a euphemism.

Then there is the case of E-36159, who suffered a rupture. The rupture was cured and to that extent he is all right, but he suffers from a nervous affection and the explanation given is not clear.

There is another case right here in the House of Commons. I mentioned it earlier in the session. It is the case of a man who had a bullet through the cheeks and who was given a fifteen per cent disability. He suffers from cancer. This is an elevator man, No. 889897. I am told that he gets all he should get. Well, if we are ready to open the doors of Canada, and to open the taps of the Pension Act to anyone who comes here and who belongs to an allied army and who may be domiciled in Canada within two years after the war, we should do something for our own people first.

There are several cases. The minister and his parliamentary assistant have settled admirably the case of Captain Bellew, V.C., who passed over the head of everybody, including the Canadian Legion, and sent an S.O.S. to the member for Temiscouata, who looked after him with all his heart. I thank the minister and his assistant for what they did in this case. But what they did in the case of Bellew should be done for the elevator man here. We hear a lot about public welfare. There is not one of us who would tolerate a thing like that in his own home, and it is done in the home of all of us. I also believe that those who perform a duty in the House of Commons are entitled to the special consideration of members of parliament, just as old employees who live in a home sometimes for two generations, old servants knowing everybody in the family, give good service and deserve special consideration. I cannot see a man suffering without trying to help him, and I am sure that is the feeling of all hon. members who are doing me the honour of listening to me at this time.

Speaking of cases, there is something else I would mention. I have murder cases, cases of men of the army who were nearly murdered by the incompetency of the medical corps under Chisholm, that most nefarious man. He was in charge of the medical corps under the Department of National Defence, a most incompetent man, a cruel man. He was responsible for all the suffering of many soldiers who could not get justice, who could not get fair treatment. He is now in charge of the health of the world. What a shame! I do not discuss the theories which he has expounded over the air or in public meetings. I say that man is a criminal because so many men in the army have suffered on account of him, and I have to fight twice as hard because of his stupidity and ignorance.

Mr. GRANT: Poor Santa Claus suffered, too.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not talking of Santa Claus; I am talking of the soldiers who have suffered because of the stupidity and incompetence of Chisholm.

I have many murder cases. The Hornblow family of Toronto has sent me a whole file which was transcribed by the hand of the mother of the boy who was killed because of the stupidity of the doctors who did not give him the proper treatment, and the doctors were exonerated. We cannot have justice, because it is precisely the guilty party who supplies the evidence against those who have grounds for complaint. Here is my murder case. He was a fine boy, and his mother is a widow. His number was E-630952. Here was a boy suffering from a heart condition. He did his duty. He was called and reported. He had leave during Christmas about two years ago. He went home and fainted while he was there. He had a certificate from his family doctor that he was suffering from a heart condition. He brought the certificate to the camp and gave it to the sergeant. He was examined. And mark you, sir, I know whereof I speak. He was examined by a heart specialist who found that there was something wrong with him and marked it on the sheet. Then the chairman of the board struck it out and the boy was told to go back to the barracks. He could not do any drill. He asked for a doctor. The doctor was refused. They told him that he was a faker. He asked for a padre. They did not inform the padre. This faker, according to the words of the sergeant, went to bed. He was found dead fifteen or twenty minutes afterwards. Those who were there reported that his face was crimson when he went to bed, because he was suffering from a heart condition. I asked for a pension for his mother who has been bereaved so deeply by the death of her child. Because she is a mother who has other children it does not follow that she did not suffer deeply when that child died. I was told that his death was not the result of his military service, and that it had nothing to do with it. Well, if it had nothing to do with his service, your name, sir, is not Mr. Speaker and mine is not Jean Francois Pouliot. It is incredible. It is stamped with cruelty just as is the face of the man who was the chairman of the board and who took upon himself the tremendous responsibility to strike out the report of the heart specialist. The mother is entitled to a pension, and I send my whole file to the parliamentary assistant to the minister and ask him to have the case reviewed. I want a pension for the mother, and if I do not get it I will speak on each bill until the mother gets it, but I know I shall not have to do that, because it is a big file like a book. I know that I shall not have to do that because I do not speak to deaf ears, but it is something incredible.

There is something else; there is the distinction which has been made between those who followed the law strictly and those who have enlisted. Can you blame a man for following the law and abiding by it? Take a man who is a draftee, and who has been called a zombie. The law called upon him to report to a medical examiner, and then to the registrar. Then, if he had no cause for exemption, he had to report to the camp to follow the instructions of his commanding officer. He did all that, but he is looked upon as an untouchable of India. He is a despicable man because he did not enlist. It was so bad that even the man who followed the instructions of his commanding officer over the seas on the continent, and who did very well there, was not entitled to the military preference of the civil service because he had not signed a paper. Because he did not sign for overseas he was disbarred from preference. Happily I got in touch with the deputy minister of national defence and had it corrected, and that man was put in a position to enjoy the military preference just the same as the other boys in the army. Military preference has been so stupidly considered that even a sick man who enlisted, a man who knew that he was unfit, that he would be rejected, is on the honour roll as one who served his country, although he enlisted only to be discharged. That is the difference. It is absurd. And those men who have enlisted for overseas are not entitled to gratuities. Here is a letter which was written by Mr. McTaggart, assistant director of reestablishment credit:

> We wish to acknowledge receipt of your letter dated July 14 in regard to your entitlement to war service gratuity.
> In the War Service Grants Act the definition of service is and we quote "while enlisted or obligated to serve without territorial limitation." It has been confirmed from your file that you were enrolled under the National Resources Mobilization Act and, therefore, you are not qualified by having been enlisted; your file also reveals that your entire service took place in Canada and, therefore, since you did not in fact leave the country, there is no question of your having been "obligated to serve without territorial limitation."

I did not have time to read the whole bill, but when a man abides by the law he is entitled to the consideration given all good citizens. If the law was made in that way, they were not responsible for it. They obeyed the law, and now there is a difference in the treatment of those who followed both the spirit and the letter of the law and those who signed a paper. How many of the brass hats made Cook's tours over there just in order to qualify for the preference given in respect of overseas service? How many are there in the Department of National Defence who have never been in any theatre of war? Not so long ago I had a list of 280 officers, brass hats of the Department of National Defence, to say nothing of the N.C.O.'s and men, who had never been in any theatre of war but who were sending others over there. What a shame! But these men have received promotions, and they have been given efficiency medals.

There is something else I want to say. With the assistance of the minister, the assistance of his parliamentary assistant, to whom I wish good luck in whatever field he decides to carry on his activities, and the assistance of Brigadier Melville, to whom I want to give the benefit of the doubt and treat just as generously as I can, I hope something will be done to correct the injustices of the past and redress all wrongs. This morning I said Canada was generous to outsiders. That is true. At the present time we complain about the scarcity of lumber; we complain about the scarcity of food, and at the same time we keep men in the clink because they believed what had been said in this house by the Prime Minister, that the farmers were to be exempt from military service. Those men are in the clink now, and some of them are in gaol. Those connected with the air force are in Bordeaux gaol, in Montreal, and they are handicapped as a result.

We are now discussing the pensions that are to be given. I am ready to give pensions to those who deserve them; I shall not kick about them; but, on the other hand, I think it is time to consider the war as a thing of the past and to look at the future in a different way from what has been the case up to the present. Those who have run the Department of National Defence, those who have been the power behind the throne in that department, are jingoists without war records. Those who have been in theatres of war, during either the first or second great wars, are more lenient. They have a broader outlook and are ready to act as civilized human beings. The others know very well they will be out on the street as soon as the army is demobilized; there will be no more soft jobs for them, so that they exercise their cruelty against honest citizens who deserve better treatment. If you are not satisfied that what I have said is the truth, Mr. Speaker, I can give the names of all those parasites who would be on the streets to-morrow if the clinks were closed. They are in the department; they are important; they travel like Xerxes when he crossed the Hellespont. One must admire them in their smart uniforms; they think they are masters of the land. I do not believe members of the House of Commons are precisely masters of the land, but they could easily be the masters of parliament if they ever felt like it. It is time to close the clinks. Why is it necessary to follow the example of the Meighen government, which was so unpopular that it was rejected by the people and Meighen could not be elected afterwards? Why follow that example? Well, there is a very good reason. It is that those who rule now in the Department of National Defence are exactly those who ruled when Meighen was in power, and it is those men we have to fire at once.

There is one thing more I want to say before closing. It is that we are more united in misery than in happiness. At the present time, on the shoulders of everyone there is a heavy burden of taxation. It makes us all feel more like brothers, and we should not be discouraged as to the future. But I hope that out of misery may come good understanding among Canadian citizens, and the example should be given by members of this house, who should come to a common understanding on main issues and decide them according to their good judgment and their patriotism. If I did not believe sincerely and deeply in the good will, honesty, good purpose and patriotism of my colleagues I would not have come back from God's country, especially at this time of year, to perform a necessary duty as a member of parliament. There is a ray of hope, and that ray of hope exists because of an event which has more importance than any legislation, an event of more importance in the constitutional life of Canada than any statute of Westminster. I refer to the debate and discussion that took place on the Canada day bill. The matter is of minor importance. Whether it be called confederation day, national day, Canada day, Dominion day or anything else, I do not attach much importance to it; but on that occasion members of the House of Commons united to show that they were conscious of their responsibility, and that they wanted to do something. It was in connection with a minor issue. I hope this will occur each time a major issue arises in parliament; that members of parliament will unite, leaving aside all party considerations to do what they honestly think is good and right and in the interests of the country at large.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, with much of what was said by the honourable and amiable member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) I am in agreement, particularly his remarks dealing with the pre-enlistment disabilities of veterans and their treatment when they apply for pension. However, like the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), I believe those matters were pretty thoroughly discussed in committee, and I do not propose to take the time of the house in going through all the discussions we carried on there.

It was my good fortune, along with the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. McKay), the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Archibald) and the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Moore), all new members, to be placed on the veterans committee. Two of the senior members of our group, the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) and the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), were also members and were able to give us guidance. Like the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), I want to say that we enjoyed our association with the chairman. We did not have any really pitched battles. I expected there would be more in the way of political discussion, but there was much less than I expected. As has been mentioned, the chairman did not blow up, but once or twice I would not have been surprised if several people had blown up. However, we got over those difficulties with a minimum of partisanship. I believe this was due to the fact that every one, in spite of what other ideas he may have had, was sincerely interested in trying to see what could be done for the veteran. On certain occasions the genial Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) honoured us with his presence. Occasionally he told us that there were certain points the government refused to accept, but that was the responsibility of the government. The committee could do nothing but accept those statements.

I cannot agree with the hon. member for Temiscouata when he said that officialdom is to blame. I think the officials of the department will do what the government tells them to do. We are hoping that some day the government will tell them to do some of the things that up to date they have not been told to do.

What I rose mainly to say on behalf of the party I represent was that so far as the pension bill is concerned we feel that we have had our part in the debate in the committee. A bill is now before us, having come from the committee, and the legislation will operate in its present form until further amendments are made. In the main we are prepared to watch the operations under this measure and be guided by the experience we gain. When we assemble at the next session we may make suggestions for amendments in the light of the experience we have gained by that time. It is doubtful if any new argument could be advanced, and we feel that that is probably the wisest course to take.

We hope that when parliament reassembles the veterans committee will again be set up. However, I remember one time when the Minister of Veterans Affairs was before the committee and the tension was pretty tight, he expressed the hope that never again would he have to have such a committee to deal with. But that was only on one occasion, and we hope that the committee will be reestablished at the next session so that we shall have an opportunity to make recommendations in the light of the experience we shall have gained. At that time some further appeals may be made by this group. I believe one member of this group has a certain definite matter regarding pensions to bring up, and I shall not take any further time because I am under threat of being shot if I speak for more than ten minutes.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the veterans committee I should like to join other hon. members in complimenting the chairman upon the way he filled his position. There were times when the debate waxed decidedly acrimonious; but, so far as I remember, on only one occasion did he find it necessary to call on the deputy chairman to take his place while he let off a little steam. I believe this committee did a good job and has justified the amount of time that it has taken in its deliberations. On the other hand, it is perhaps unfortunate that the government has found it necessary to turn down some of the important recommendations of the committee, thereby nullifying some of the work that was done.

When the veterans committee was set up in 1945 there existed three main objections to the Pension Act. First, the insurance principle had been destroyed; second, pensions were being denied on the ground that the disability was of pre-enlistment origin and, third, there existed a dead-line of April, 1944, in connection with marriages. By the time the committee had revised a draft of a proposed pension bill all these objections had been removed. Had the government seen fit to accept the draft bill in its amended form, I think we would have had a Pension Act of which we could have been proud. Unfortunately the government found it necessary to refuse to accept our amendments in regard to the question of pre-enlistment origin and the deadline for marriages.

I should like to deal first with the insurance principle. I heard a few Liberals praise the government for having reinstated the insurance principle. This was done at the very commencement of the deliberations on the Pension Act. Hon. members should, however, remember that it was the Liberal government that destroyed the insurance principle in May, 1940, by order in council.

If I remember rightly that was done largely as a result of a recommendation by the Minister of Finance. As a consequence several thousand veterans were deprived of pensions during the war and something in the neighbourhood of 200 widows were denied pensions.

A number of the members of the veterans committee which sat in 1940 tried to have the insurance principle reinstated, but the government of that day was not prepared to accede. There was a compromise to the extent of accepting the insurance principle in connection with veterans who were found to be in necessitous circumstances. I think it is important to remember that, while the insurance principle has now been restored, the payment of pensions will start only as of June 1, 1946, and as a consequence several thousand pensioners will have been without pension from the time the insurance principle was destroyed until June, 1946. But certainly I am pleased that the government saw fit to restore the insurance principle even at this late day.

The next point I should like to take up is the question of pensions being denied on the ground that disability was of pre-enlistment origin. The committee discussed this matter at great length. I think veterans have always felt that when a man was medically examined upon enlistment and declared to be in A-1 condition, then if he were found to be medically unfit after several months or years of service, no attempt should be made to rule that his disability was of pre-enlistment origin. I think that was quite generally the opinion of the veterans committee. The committee proposed that a man's condition as recorded on his medical sheet at the time of enlistment should be presumed to be his true condition, unless it were found that some disability had been recorded on an examination prior to his enlistment. That amendment was carried; but unfortunately the minister declared, on behalf of the government, that they could not accept it; the bill we now have before us does not contain that amendment and the objectionable feature still remains in the act.

My last point concerns the dead-line for marriages of pensioners. If a pensioner marries after April 1, 1944, no increase is made in his pension because of the change in his status from a single to a married person, and no allowance can be made for children born of such a union. In the event of his death no pension can be paid to his widow. The committee voted unanimously to strike out that dead-line. But again, unfortunately, the government through the minister of pensions refused to accept that amendment, so that the bill before us contains the dead-line of April 1, 1944. The committee I think felt strongly on that question. It is not a big question so far as the money involved is concerned. The cost to the government would not be great to wipe out that dead-line. Today we all consider that it would be to the benefit of Canada to have an increase in population, and no doubt in the not distant future we shall be spending millions of dollars to bring people into this country. I would say that the very best way to expand our population is with Canadian-born children, and what better children could one have than children of veterans? Therefore I cannot understand why the government should discriminate against the old veterans by saying that any children born after a certain date not be recognized so far as pensions are concerned. I hope that, even at this late day, when we get to the section the government may see fit to take that dead-line out of this measure.

[Mr. Quelch.]

Apart from those two points, the dead-line for marriage, and disability of pre-enlistment origin, we in this group are pretty well behind the Pensions Act as it is now before us. But when the appropriate sections come up we shall no doubt have a few words to say on these two particular matters.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, within the last year thousands of our finest young men and women have come back to their homeland from the fighting fronts. Fortunately the majority of them have come back fit, and able to take their place in civilian life. But many have come back disabled. They have been handicapped for life by the service they have rendered to their fellow-Canadians. Many more, fortunately not as many as in the last war, but still many, many thousands of young Canadians who went overseas, will not come back. They are our war dead. But they leave here in Canada to mourn them their dependents and their other loved ones; and these loved ones of our young Canadians who will not come back, are the people in this country who know the real cost of war.

I suggest to this house that our feelings toward these young men and women who have come back and to the dependents of those who do not come back should be feelings of admiration and also of gratitude. That should be our approach when we discuss the problems having to do with them. The prime ministers of the empire put it very clearly away back in May of 1944, when at the end of their historic conference in London they issued a statement which contained this sentence:

> To all our armed forces who in many lands are preserving our liberty with their lives we express our admiration and gratitude.

That was before D-day, before our troops had landed on the continent of Europe. But we should still have that feeling. We should be filled with admiration and gratitude.

We are under two great obligations. The first is to see that the young people who have come back are absorbed into the life of the nation. The second is that those who are disabled and the dependents of the fallen should be compensated generously for the sacrifices they have made. I do not think there is one member of this house who would disagree with my statement of those two great obligations under which we stand at this present time.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is not only a question of being under these obligations at this time. It is comparatively easy to remember them now, with the war over such a short time ago. But these are obligations that will continue year in and year out until the last disabled Canadian and the last dependent of a Canadian who did not come back, have passed on. For so long will these obligations remain on the Canadian people. And I make bold to state to-day that these obligations will not be met by any so-called Veterans Charter of 1946.

The hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) has pointed out that these veterans bills that are to be considered by the house are but one step. They are the legislation which we believe should be enacted at this time. Personally I think it is a great mistake to refer to them as constituting a Veterans Charter. It sounds very nice. It brings a certain amount of credit to those of us on the committee, who really have worked hard and in a fine spirit to see that these bills are the very best that could be written. But the danger is this, that the Canadian people will say: "Oh, well, now that we have written a Veterans Charter we have done what should be done for the veterans; so let us get on with some other business." For that reason I think it was unwise to term these bills a Veterans Charter. I am not questioning the motive in using those words as a title for the bills, but it would have been wiser not to try to spread the impression abroad throughout the land that we are now preparing a great Veterans Charter.

You see, Mr. Speaker, there will be improvements required every year. There are improvements required at this very moment in this Pension Act, which is the bill now being considered. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) has referred to some defects in the bill. I shall deal to-day with only one, which I urge upon the minister should be remedied before the bill becomes law.

There is no provision in this pension bill for the veteran who has been discharged as medically unfit but yet cannot qualify for pension because of a ruling made by the pension commission that his disability arose from a pre-enlistment condition. This applies not only to men who served in Canada but also to the young Canadians who served overseas. We were given figures as of December 31, 1945, by the chairman of the pension commission, showing that there were 7,810 young Canadians who were fit enough to be enlisted in the forces and taken overseas, who eventually were brought back and discharged as medically unfit and yet were not granted any pension entitlement because of a pre-enlistment condition. They were not even granted anything for aggravation by service. I repeat that figure—7,810.

The figure for those who served only in Canada was 54,207. That number of young Canadians enlisted in the forces, served in Canada only, were discharged as medically unfit, and yet were not entitled to any pension either for original disability or for aggravation, because they were said to have a pre-enlistment condition.

There is something wrong there either with the law or with the doctors. All these men were carefully examined, far more carefully examined in this war than those of us were who served in the last war. We, or some of us, "got by" on nearly anything. In this war there was the most careful examination. Yet we find that, after men have been examined and enrolled, and have served for years, another doctor discharges them as medically unfit, and a third group of doctors, working under the pension commission, say, "Well, they had a pre-enlistment condition; presumably they were sick before they ever got in the army, or they were going to be sick anyway, and that is that, and they are not entitled to any pension." These men are being ruled out or, in some cases, granted only a partial pension, on the ground that the condition originated before enlistment.

Mr. Speaker, that is an injustice which should be remedied, and it should be remedied in this bill. I believe that could be done by inserting in the Pension Act a new provision to this general effect—I am not giving the exact wording—which I think should be covered by a new section of the act:

> That there shall be a presumption that a man's condition as recorded on admission to service was in fact his condition at that time and that any subsequent deterioration was due to his service.

In other words, it shall be presumed that if he was enrolled as fit he was actually fit, and that if, during his service, his physical condition deteriorates the state must show that such deterioration was not due to his service; otherwise he would be entitled to some pension.

That suggestion was made before the special committee. As the hon. member for Acadia has said, it was considered at some length, and finally, on motion of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), an amendment to the act was recommended. Hon. members will find it in the proceedings of the committee on May 31, 1946. The hon. member for Nanaimo moved that there be put in the act a new section reading as follows:

> 62A. There shall be a presumption that an applicant's condition as recorded on his acceptance as a member of the forces was in fact his condition at that time and that any subsequent deterioration during service was due to such service.

Then, at the suggestion of the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), a proviso was added, worded as follows:

subject to the provisions of paragraph (c) of subsection (1) of section 11 of this act.

That proviso covers the case where a man's condition was obvious on his admission to the service; in other words, if he had a wooden leg and had been able to get by the doctor even with that wooden leg! Or where he had wilfully concealed his condition, or where his condition had been recorded on another medical examination, say a civilian medical examination, prior to his enlistment. That amendment was adopted unanimously by the special committee on veterans affairs.

But then the government came in, a week later, and said, "We are not willing to accept that amendment." I think the reason they did so was that the pension commission did not like it. The minister showed no particular antagonism to the amendment; I believe he would have been willing to let it go into the bill. That was on June 7, and after we had passed all the sections of a draft bill. I moved that the draft bill be reported to the house, but the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) moved an amendment, and later on the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters) moved other amendments, the effect of which was to change that draft bill into the form that the government wanted. So that the bill as it comes before the house to-day is not the bill which was really recommended by the members of the veterans committee when they were considering it section by section.

The change made in regard to this pre-enlistment condition was that the new section was struck out, and to take its place two words were added to what is known as "the benefit of the doubt" section, section 62. The words added were "and presumptions", and putting them in section 62 meant nothing at all. So I repeat my suggestion to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) that, when this bill goes into committee, he allow it to be amended to include a new section, and I intend to move such a section, No. 63A—there has been some change in the numbering—to this effect:

63A. In respect of an application for entitlement to pension arising out of world war II there shall be a presumption that the condition of the member of the forces as recorded on his acceptance was in fact his condition at that time and that any subsequent deterioration during service was due to such service; subject to the provisos contained in paragraph (c) of subsection (1) of section 11 of this act.

[Mr. Green.]

I will give the minister a copy of the proposed change when I am through.

Another improvement which could be made at this time, without waiting until next year, is to give the dependents' board of trustees power to help out the family of a veteran. As hon. members know, that board was set up under the Department of National Defence—it is not under the Department of Veterans Affairs at all, even at the present time—and was provided with funds so that the case of a needy family could be met. The board has done splendid work. I know that in the city of Vancouver many families have been helped in that way who otherwise would have had no helping hand at all. I suggest to the house that for the next year or two that dependents' board of trustees be provided with funds to help the families of veterans; for example, the family of a veteran who cannot qualify for pension and yet in whose family there will be great suffering without such assistance. The board would not have to carry on indefinitely; it is simply a suggestion for the immediate post-war period.

When I opened my speech this afternoon I mentioned that we had an obligation to absorb these young men and women into the life of the nation. I do not intend to go very far along that line to-day because there are other bills which deal with that obligation. But there are two matters which will not come up under other bills; they are contained in the recommendations which have been made by the committee. The first has to do with the civil service preference. The committee recommended in its final report:

That the present civil service preference for disabled veterans and veterans who served overseas be extended to cover all employment, both temporary and permanent, by the House of Commons—

That means by us, right here; it means on our own front doorstep.

—and by dominion government agencies inclusive of crown companies.

The civil service preference at the present time applies only to those who come under the Civil Service Act. The Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) can correct me, but I should think that would be perhaps only half or two-thirds of the total number of civil servants. In any event, there are thousands of government positions that are not subject to the veteran's preference. I suggest that, without further delay, provision should be made by the government to extend the preference to all dominion government agencies, including these new crown companies that are being set up.

The importance of such a move is that people on the outside, ordinary businessmen, will follow the example set by the government. If the government has a crown company which does not give preference to veterans, then the man doing business with that company, or who knows of its activities, will say, "Why do I have to give a preference to veterans when this government company is not giving it?" And provincial governments are apt to do the same. They will say, "The dominion government does not give a preference. These men served under the dominion and the dominion will not give them a preference; why should we?" It weakens the position of the veteran all across Canada, and therefore I appeal to the government to take action to extend this preference, and to take that action quickly.

The other recommendation of the committee to which I would refer is the following:

That the government consider the extension of priorities in the purchase of surplus war assets to veterans on certification by the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Just within the last day or two another department of government, the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, has said that there is to be no more preference to veterans in the purchase of cars and trucks because you cannot trust them—they will go and make a deal with some civilian and there will be a lot of under-the-table business carried on. Therefore the priority must go.

That is not good enough. The committee on veterans affairs went into the whole question carefully. We say that where a veteran needs a truck or a car in order to become reestablished, and gets a certificate from the veterans affairs department that such is the case, then he should receive priority; and I would urge the government to see that a change is made along that line.

In conclusion, I have dealt to-day primarily with the Pension Act; with the men and women who have been disabled and the dependents of those who have not come back. This house was elected in June, 1945, just a little over a year ago, when Canada was still at war in the Pacific, it is true, but the fighting in Europe had ended and it was obvious that Japan could not hold out longer. Every member elected to this house knew, and the Canadian people knew, that to this House of Commons would be entrusted the writing of laws to protect those who had been disabled, and the dependents of the fallen; and no matter what the members of the house do, no matter what the Canadian people do, they can never adequately repay their fellow Canadians who have suffered. But a genuine attempt to do so should be our first concern, not only in this post-war session, but throughout the whole life of the present parliament.

Mr. J. H. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): I have listened this afternoon with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley), the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green); and, while listening to those remarks, I was thinking of the last session of parliament, prior to prorogation, when the report of the veterans committee was presented to the house. If I remember rightly, there was little discussion of. or comment on the report because we felt in the house that that committee had done its work thoroughly and well and that the country generally was in favour of being generous to those who had served Canada so splendidly in its wars.

Now again, through this session, a committee of the house has been studying veterans affairs, and again its report is coming before the house in the form of the present bills.

I have not had the privilege of serving on that committee, although I was a veteran of the first great war, but I discovered that even if I had been a member of the committee I would not have been permitted to bring individual cases on the floor of the committee. Those have been ruled out, and it seems to me that this is the place where some individual cases should be dealt with when we are considering the principles of the pension bill.

The first case I wish to refer to is that of a Canadian soldier, at least a soldier who fought for Canada in the great war of 1914-18, who was severely wounded in that war and was subsequently pensioned for his disability. Later on, when he tried to go out and do a little for himself to add to his pension, it was agreeable to the pension commission that he should do so, and a promise was made that if he found he could not get along his pension would be reinstated to its original sum. In the meantime, this young man goes down to live in the United States and then discovers that originally he was a United States citizen. He has not had his pension reinstated to its original sum, and in spite of all his appeals he has been turned down. I have taken the matter up with the pension commission, and they inform me that there are fourteen or fifteen bulky files dealing with this particular case. I am not concerned about how many files they have; if an injustice has been done to a soldier who fought for Canada, the matter of the number of files should not enter into the case.

Second, the immigration officials refused to allow this man to come to Canada. All he asks is that he be allowed to come to Canada, go before a medical board and have a rediagnosis of his case. "Oh, no", they said, "we cannot let this man into Canada at all. He is not a Canadian citizen and if we did let him in he is liable to become a public charge on Canada."

When a man is willing to hazard his life and fight for Canada and to be wounded in that service, to my mind such treatment is hardly good enough. Although the pension commission may say it is a closed case; although the immigration officials may say they will not let this man come in, I still feel there is one man who in his breast has a rankling sense of injustice against Canada. To-day all that he asks is to be given a square deal.

The second case that I wish to deal with—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Did my hon. friend ever bring that case to my personal attention?

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Yes, I did, and it was through the minister's efforts that I went before the pension commission.

The second case that I wish to deal with is that of a man from my own constituency. This man enlisted in Cranbrook on June 13, 1940. Two days later he was placed on a troop train bound for Vancouver. While he was travelling on the train, he suffered an accident, a stone came rolling down the mountainside, smashed through the car window and struck the man on the head. As a result of these injuries, he is suffering from a nervous condition, defective hearing in the left ear with perforation of the eardrum, and defective vision of the left eye. This man has been discharged without a pension. When he went before the appeal board of the Canadian pension commission on June 19, 1942, his case was outlawed. He was told that he was suffering from pre-enlistment conditions. I should like to read for the record a statement made by the doctor who examined this man when he enlisted and when he was discharged. It reads as follows:

Cranbrook, British Columbia, April 16, 1941.
To whom it may concern:

To those interested, I examined this man when he enlisted, and according to the records which we have there was nothing to show that this man had any of the following:

1. Nervous condition.
2. Defective hearing, left ear with perforated eardrum.
3. Defective vision, left eye.

The above are conditions for which this man was discharged from the army. I feel that these conditions are largely due to the accident which occurred while this man was en route to the coast from Cranbrook.

Signed Melville J. Swartz, M.D.

[Mr. J. H. Matthews.]

Here is a case, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Has my friend ever seen the real file on that case?

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I shall have it submitted to the committee on veterans affairs and I shall abide by their judgment. The statement my hon. friend is making is absolutely unjustified and unwarranted.

Mr. TUCKER: May I rise to a point of order. I know the hon. member for Kootenay East wants to be fair; I know he wants to do what is right in behalf of the veterans, but it is written into the Pension Act—

An hon. MEMBER: What is the point of order?

Mr. TUCKER: I shall come to that in a moment if the hon. member will permit me.

An hon. MEMBER: Do not make speeches.

Mr. TUCKER: It is written into the Pension Act that the pension commission has the right to adjudicate these cases. That has never been questioned in any way in our committee or in any veterans legislation. When the pension commission rules on these individual cases it is the same as when a court makes a decision. That principle is not being attacked in any way by this bill. If hon. members are to rise in their places and make ex parte statements, then every other hon. member has the same right to do so. Surely my hon. friend would not say that he should do so and that other hon. members who have constituents coming to them and saying that they have decisions which they do not agree with, have not the same right. Surely he would not say that everyone has not the same right. If that right were exercised we would not get this pension bill through until next month. I ask the hon. member to be fair with the house, with the committee, and with the veterans of the country. He is trying to do something which he knows himself would prevent this bill from going through, if other hon. members did the same thing. In all earnestness, I ask him not to press these individual cases.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Where is the point of order?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You would not understand it.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): My hon. friend would.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call the hon. member's attention to the preamble to the second reading of the bill. He well knows that on second reading only the principle of the bill should be discussed.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): I beg your pardon; it is the principle of the bill that I am discussing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): I have not had the privilege of appearing before the veterans committee.

Mr. TUCKER: Did the hon. member ask for it?

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): The ruling of the veterans committee was that individual cases would not be dealt with.

Mr. TUCKER: Did the hon. member ask for it? He knows that we are discussing the principle of the bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that we are on second reading of the bill. The right place to carry on discussion between members is when the bill is in committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I know of this case, and it is well known all over British Columbia.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): If I heard the minister aright he said that he knew of this case and that it is known all over British Columbia.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): As a member of parliament, I am pleading on behalf of a member of my constituency. I may be a new member of the house, and I may not be aware of all the circumstances under which these things are dealt with, but I was under the impression that it was my right and my privilege to speak on this case this afternoon. I want to proceed this much farther. The crown has sued the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in this particular case.

Mr. SPEAKER: I say to the hon. member that under the rules of the house he will have an opportunity to discuss any case in which he is interested as long as it is relevant to the bill which is before the house. But the right place to do so is in committee of the whole. I would suggest to the hon. member that he discuss only the principle of the bill. If he wishes to go into details of the bill the right place to do so is in committee.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In accordance with your ruling, I shall not continue farther, but I assure you that I shall bring the matter up at the proper moment.

Mr. TUCKER: With the permission of the house, I should like to say—

Mr. BURTON: The hon. member has already spoken.

Mr. TUCKER: I do not want to speak on this question, but I shall make an observation. Every hon. member knows that the commission has full jurisdiction in these matters. The minister has no right to overrule the commission; it has full jurisdiction. To try to get a suggestion from the minister that he will overrule the commission is asking him to assume something which parliament has denied him. I urge the hon. member not to bring up individual cases in this discussion. Every hon. member knows that they have dozens of cases which have been brought to their attention. If the hon. member brings up individual cases there will be the feeling that other hon. members should do the same thing. I say this as a matter of getting the bill through without having these cases threshed out on the floor of the house where there is no power to deal with them. Because of that, I ask the hon. member not to press these individual cases.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order. I suggest to the hon. member who has just spoken that it is always the privilege of any hon. member of parliament to bring before the house anything which his conscience tells him should be brought up there.

Mr. TUCKER: I ask him not to do that.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Will my hon. friend grant me the privilege of showing him the personal file in regard to this case?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: On a point of order, I should like to point out that during debate this afternoon the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) dealt at considerable length with a case and there was no objection.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: No; I wish to speak on this matter. What is the policy of the government on the matter of pensions with regard to a case—

Mr. MACKENZIE: We are not in committee. The Speaker is in the chair.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am discussing the principle. Let us presume that a man suffering from nervous disorders is sent back to Canada. We will say that these nervous disorders are the result of intensive training in Britain.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That should be brought up in committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member knows that on second reading he cannot question the minister or his parliamentary assistant. That should be done in committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—"Department."

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): A few moments ago I brought to the attention of the house a case in which I am very much interested. The Minister of Veterans Affairs intimated that he has the file, which he would be pleased to show me. I want to accept his invitation, and to tell the minister I shall be glad to see it at any time.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, certainly.

Mr. MATTHEWS: In the meantime, I know the man; and I know that once the crown has sued the Canadian Pacific Railway Company because of injuries sustained by a soldier in the crown's service and has accepted the sum of $300 from that company in settlement, because that is the answer given to a question which was placed on the order paper, then the crown must accept some responsibility to the soldier who was injured. If I know anything at all of logic that holds true.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I wish my hon. friend would reserve judgment until he reads the file and finds out all the conditions surrounding the matter.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): I think this man has a claim for a pension. Failing that, if his case cannot be reviewed by the pension commission, I want to ask here in this House of Commons for permission from the crown, through the Attorney General, to sue the crown on this man's behalf.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, am I to understand that any man, I do not care whether he is a member of parliament or a private individual, has the right to see any soldier's file; that some man who was afraid to fight for his country can go and see the file of a man who did fight?

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): I want to object to that phrase, "a man who is afraid to fight for his country." I shall not accept it as applying to any constituent of mine. This man enlisted in His Majesty's service.

[Mr. Castleden.]

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If you will sit down you will find out that I am not referring to your man at all. I am merely asking if any private individual or anyone else has the right to see a soldier's file. I think the leader of your party will agree with the point I am bringing up. Do not sound off until you understand what it is all about. Has any individual the right to see a soldier's file.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The Minister of Veterans Affairs made that proposal to the hon. member.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I do not think the minister had any rignt to do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh, yes; the minister has every right in a case like this. Ordinarily the hon. member is quite correct; a soldier's file cannot be seen except with the permission of a minister of the crown.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Then may I ask another question? I presume that is in confidence, is it? In other words, if a member can ask the minister to see a file, and the minister shows it to him, can he go to some political newspaper and give the contents of a man's private file to the public? I doubt it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Where there is deliberate misrepresentation in regard to conditions in any particular case, which imputes injustice to the department, the minister is entitled to show the file.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Well, I should like to ask another question. I am not disputing the minister's statement, but I am trying to protect the interests of the private soldier. I think, if a man has committed deliberate misrepresentation it is the duty of the department to prosecute him, rather than to pass around the information.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kooteney East): I am not yet clear as to what is to be done in this particular case in regard to which I am appealing to-day. Can it be reopened by the pension commission?

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Chairman, if I may answer the question asked, by the hon. member—

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): I have not yet finished asking it.

Mr. TUCKER: The hon. member wants to know what can be done. The law, the Pension Act, definitely provides what can be done. It definitely states that the pension commission has full jurisdiction in the matter, the same as any court of law, and that it must interpret the facts and the law. That is in the statute. When the commission comes to a decision, neither the minister nor this house has any right to interfere with its jurisdiction. That right has been conferred upon the commission, and I am sure no soldier organization would want to change the law so that the judgment of the commission could be interfered with by any member of parliament or any member of the government. When the hon. member asks whether the minister will undertake to interfere with the jurisdiction of the pension commission, the answer must be that he has no right to do so, under a statute of this country. Surely that is an answer to the hon. member.

Mr. COLDWELL: But it does not prevent a member of this house from rising in his place and airing what he considers to be an injustice. I should like to say something with regard to the file. I agree with the hon. member for Fraser Valley, but I think, when a member of parliament is invited to see a soldier's file, that member is placed upon his honour to exercise his responsibility.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I agree.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is always done, as far as I know.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Unless a member has a right to look at a file, how can he bring an injustice to the attention of the house?

Mr. TUCKER: I was going to say that every hon. member who has had anything to do with the pension commission knows that its chairman is ready to go to almost any lengths to discuss any case which any hon. member thinks has not been dealt with fairly or justly. I have never known a public servant more anxious to go into all the facts in order to satisfy a member of parliament that justice has been done. Instead of discussing this matter on the floor of the house, where hundreds of other cases might just as properly be brought up, which would delay the passing of this legislation, I would appeal to the hon. member to take his case to the chairman of the pension commission. There I guarantee that the file will be laid before him, and when he looks at the file and has a chance to see both sides I am sure he will be fully satisfied. I ask him to take up the matter with the board that has jurisdiction, instead of bringing it up on the floor of this house. The hon. gentleman mentioned another hon. member. If the hon. gentleman presents individual cases, I know of others which may be brought up by other hon. members; and if each hon. gentleman exercises the right which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar says is the right of his colleague, we may as well resign ourselves to the fact that this single bill will take up at least two weeks.

I make this appeal for this reason. We had wonderful cooperation in the committee, and our desire was to try to get this legislation through within a reasonable time. The hope was that anything about which we could not do anything in this parliament would not be discussed at any length at this time. Of course the hon. member is not bound by that understanding, but I suggest to him that the representative of his party on the steering committee entirely agreed with that attitude and, I know, is anxious that it should be carried out, in order to get this legislation through in the interests of the soldiers.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I rise on a point of order? As a member who has been in the house for nearly eleven years, I am interested in the point raised by the hon. member for Fraser Valley. I think that is a pretty important point; and I do not believe the solution is that which has been suggested by the minister or by those who have spoken. I do not think any member of the government or any member of parliament would stand for a moment for any ordinary, private member of the house snooping in the files of men who have served overseas, or given any other service. But that is not the point. In each of these cases where files have been opened to a private member of the house, I believe it has always been done under this circumstance, which I think must be borne in mind; that is, that the man asking for the privilege of looking at the file is in a sense the agent of the man whose file it is. I do not think I have any right to go to a man's file unless I am representing him; I do not think I have any right to go into somebody else's file just to find out something, even though I am a member of parliament. However, I think there is perfect justification, for the hon. member for Kootenay East for instance, who is putting forward a man's case, to go to that man's file. The minister should feel at liberty to open up that file, because there is no question then of confidentiality being offended in any way, shape or form.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is what I said.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps it was my fault, but I was not quite clear as to the minister's explanation.

Mr. MUTCH: It has been the practice over a period of years for most members who wish to see the file of a soldier to have his written permission. I have seen scores if not hundreds of files, and I have had the permission every time. I doubt if I have ever seen one without having permission of the soldier.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, August 1, 1946

The house met at eleven o'clock.

UNITED NATIONS

FOOD AND AGRICULTURE ORGANIZATION CONFERENCE AT COPENHAGEN OPENING SEPTEMBER 2

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): The house may wish to be informed that the second regular session of the conference of the food and agriculture organization will open on Monday the 2nd of September, 1946, in Copenhagen.

The Canadian delegation to the conference will be headed by the Minister of Agriculture, who led the Canadian delegation at the meetings of the food and agriculture organization held at Quebec and Washington. In addition, the delegation will consist of the following:

Doctor G. S. H. Barton, Deputy Minister of Agriculture (alternate chairman of the delegation).

Mr. J. D. Kearney, the Canadian Minister to Norway and Denmark.

Mr. D. Roy Cameron, Dominion Forester.

Doctor E. S. Archibald, Director of Dominion Experimental Farms.

Doctor J. F. Booth, Department of Agriculture.

Doctor L. B. Pett, Department of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. J. B. Rutherford, Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

Doctor A. W. H. Needler, Department of Fisheries.

Mr. A. Gosselin, Department of Agriculture.

Mr. H. H. Hannam, Secretary, Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

Mr. Clive Planta, Secretary-Manager of the Fisheries Council of Canada.

Colonel J. G. Robertson, Canadian Agricultural Commissioner in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Douglas Roe, Commercial Secretary for Canada (timber specialist).

Mr. J. H. Tremblay, Commercial Secretary (Agriculture).

Doctor W. C. Hopper, Department of Agriculture, secretary to the delegation.

The special meeting on urgent food problems held in Washington last May recommended that the director general of the food and agriculture organization undertake certain studies and investigations and submit his findings and proposals to the next conference of the food and agriculture organization. It also recommended that any conclusions of the conference concerning the establishment of new organizations or procedures designed to meet long-term problems in the production, distribution and consumption of food be referred to the united nations. The conference is, accordingly, being held at an early enough date to enable its conclusions to be reported to the next session of the general assembly of the united nations.

POSTAL SERVICE

PICTORIAL POSTAGE STAMPS TO BE ISSUED SEPTEMBER 16

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement in connection with the new postage stamps to be issued on September 16.

Our present pictorial postage stamps, which were first issued in 1942 and 1943 to depict the war effort of the Canadian people, are to be replaced by new designs in keeping with the turn from wartime pursuits to ways of peace.

No change will be made for the present in the 1-cent, 2-cent, 3-cent, 4-cent and 5-cent postage stamps which bear portraits of His Majesty the King.

On Monday September 16 of this year a new series of pictorial postage stamps will be issued illustrating the basic industries and raw materials of Canada, which are of such tremendous importance to the future of our country and the world. The new series of postage stamps will be of the following denominations and subjects:

8-cents, brown—Eastern Canadian farm scene, Ontario.

10-cents, olive-green—Great Bear lake, showing scene of first pitchblende discoveries.

14-cents, dark brown—Hydro-electric power station on Saint Maurice river, Quebec.

20-cents, carbon-blue—Combined reaper and harvester, prairie provices.

50-cents, green—Lumbering operations in British Columbia.

$1, purple—New train-ferry, with fishing-boat, Prince Edward Island.

7-cents air mail, blue—Canada geese in flight near Sudbury, Ontario.

17-cents air mail and special delivery, violet blue—Transatlantic mail plane over Quebec City.

10-cents special delivery, green—The arms of Canada, with laurel and olive branches symbolic of victory and peace.

*T.C.A.—AIR TRANSPORT "NORTH STAR"

Mr. FRASER:

1. What was the total cost to the T.C.A. for the purchase of the new air transport "North Star"?

2. Was the total cost price paid to the Canadair Ltd.?

3. If not, to what other firms, or individuals, were moneys paid?

4. What was the total cost of parts and equipment imported into Canada for the building of this air transport?

5. Was the ship built by tender, contract price or by cost-plus price?

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I can answer this question verbally.

The answer to the first question is that Trans-Canada Air Lines has not purchased this aircraft. It is being built in a government-owned plant for government account. After the average cost of the first twenty planes has been determined, the plane will be sold to Trans-Canada Air Lines accordingly.

As to the second question, the plant is a government operation under management of Canadair; the cost has not been determined and therefore not paid.

Question 3, answered by No. 2.

With regard to the fourth question, that can be investigated. It is a very small fraction of the cost of the plane, I may say.

The answer to the fifth question is that it is built in a government-owned plant for government account.

Mr. FRASER: Mr. Speaker, the question really is not answered, because I have not yet been given the cost of the plane.

Mr. HOWE: I have not the cost myself, and it cannot be obtained until it can be averaged over the assembly line. There are other aircraft coming out from week to week and after we are able to average the total cost over, say, twenty aircraft we shall be able to give the house the average cost. The expenditures made to date are not all on one aircraft; they are on a number of them. I believe there are ten or twelve aircraft on the floor at the present time, and the components of a great number of others are included in the over-all cost. The answer can be given in due course, but not in the next few weeks.

PARIS PEACE CONFERENCE—BIG POWERS AND SMALL NATIONS

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Who made a distinction between big powers and small nations, and when and for what particular consideration was such distinction made?

2. What are, (a) the big powers; (b) the small nations?

3. Who leads the small nations at the Paris Peace conference, and in virtue of what authority?

4. What is the present international status of Canada? Is she, (a) a big power; (b) a middle power, or (c) a small nation, and why?

5. Was Canada's status changed from that of small nation into that of middle power? If so, when and why?

6. What is the difference between, (a) a big power and a middle power, and (b) between a middle power and a small nation?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The expressions "big power", "middle power" and "small nation" are not designations recognized in international law. Article 2, paragraph 1, of the charter of the united nations sets forth that "the organization is based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all its members". Article 23, paragraph 1, of the charter states that "the republic of China, France, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America shall be permanent members of the security council". In article 27, paragraph 3, it is provided that decisions of the security council in other than procedural matters "shall be made by an affirmative vote of seven members, including the concurring votes of the permanent members". Apart from the naming of certain states as permanent members of the security council—a distinction also made in the covenant of the league of nations—and the requirement that for certain purposes under the charter the concurring votes of the named states are necessary, there is no legal distinction between the position of all the members of the united nations.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

STRIKES AND LOCKOUTS

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. How many (a) strikes; (b) lockouts, have occurred in Canada during the year 1946?
2. In what plants did said strikes and lockouts occur?

Mr. MITCHELL: Return tabled.

RADIO BROADCASTING—C.B.C. AND PRIVATELY OWNED STATIONS

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. How many radio stations in Canada are owned and operated by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?
2. Where is each located?
3. How many Canadian radio stations are privately owned and operated?
2. Where is each located?

Mr. McILRAITH: Return tabled.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

ARMY REJECTION OR MEDICAL DISCHARGES AT CAMP BORDEN

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Have any criminal proceedings been taken or are any contemplated in connection with an alleged conspiracy arising out of the improper use of army rejection or medical discharges at Camp Borden since 1943?
2. (a) Was the matter investigated by the R.C.M.P., and did they recommend prosecution; (b) were any instructions given by the Department of Labour to the R.C.M.P., with regard to the matter of prosecutions? If so, what were those instructions?

ARMED FORCES—TRACTORS—MANITOBA

Mr. JUTRAS:

How many tractors has, (a) the army; (b) the air force at each of their camps and stations in the province of Manitoba that are not being used?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION—SOUTHAM NEWSPAPERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour? Can the minister make a statement indicating what progress he has made, since he received the report of the Lett commission, in bringing together the principal parties to the typographical dispute?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Justice Richards has agreed to endeavour to get the parties together.

Mr. KNOWLES: Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL: At present he is in Winnipeg. I should like to say that this is not the first time that an attempt has been made; but I am nevertheless hopeful that some good will come out of it this time.

PRICES AND TRADE BOARD

HANDLING OF RATION COUPONS BY BANKS—BANQUE PROVINCIALE DU CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance. According to a return brought down yesterday, the licence of the Banque Provinciale du Canada for the transaction of business in connection with ration coupons was to end on July 31, namely yesterday, and there was an application for reinstatement on the part of the president of that bank. What decision has been made by the wartime prices and trade board in this matter, and is the permit to be continued?

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): I cannot give a definite answer to the hon. member as to whether this bank is being reinstated or not, but the door was left open to them; if they would comply with the wartime prices and trade board regulations they would be reinstated. I will give the hon. gentleman a definite answer later on.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, Mr. Speaker, the discontinuance of the right terminated yesterday, and I am just asking whether the bank is continuing to transact business, having complied with the regulations of the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. ABBOTT: The parliamentary assistant to the minister said that he would get the information and give it to my hon. friend. I imagine that he intends to give it to him to-morrow.

Mr. MAYHEW: After all, this is only the third or fourth hour of the first day after the termination. I will get the information as soon as I possibly can.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It has gone on for five weeks.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ROSS (SOURIS)—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT IN OTTAWA "JOURNAL"

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, on a matter of privilege, a Canadian Press dispatch as reported in this morning's Journal states:

> Mr. Ross praised the work of Canadian hospitals overseas and said they were responsible for the low rate of casualties in this war He hoped the veterans' hospitals in Canada would have the same type of nurses and doctors that served overseas . . .
> Mr. Ross said parliament would have to take up the question of building homes for the older veterans who lived alone and had no one to help them.

I would deem it a great honour to receive credit at any time for the remarks made by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) on behalf of the veterans, but, with all due deference, these remarks should have been credited to the hon. member for Royal. I did not speak on the measure yesterday.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We accept the explanation.

Mr. BROOKS: I thank the hon. member for his remarks.

PENSION ACT

ENLARGEMENT OF SCOPE AND APPLICATION—REORGANIZATION OF COMMISSION

The house resumed from Wednesday, July 31, consideration in committee of bill No. 329, to amend the Pension Act—Mr. Mackenzie—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—"Department".

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I have just a few remarks—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Kootenay East.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): When the committee rose last evening at six o'clock we had been considering section 1 of this pensions bill, and I was speaking of two special cases which to my mind called for adjustment. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs objected to these individual cases being brought on the floor of the house. These men have appealed to me for help. They are not permitted to come on the floor of the house and speak for themselves; they can only speak through their elected representatives. The fact remains that there are many of these special cases that need adjustment in order that justice may be done. I assume, Mr. Chairman, that all these cases have been before medical boards and pension boards and have been thrown out. That does not mean that justice has been done, by any means. Doctors can make mistakes, and they often do. Pension boards also can make mistakes. They have made mistakes in the past, and somtimes action has been taken and those decisions have been reversed. Sometimes I wonder what is behind this refusal to face the facts and to deal justly with these individual cases. Is it a matter of bringing about economy in the department? If it is, I would say that economy is being practised at the wrong end and upon the wrong people. We have a bill before the house now which seeks to raise the salaries of judges. We should forget all about raising the salaries of judges and fix our attention upon these individual cases.

The CHAIRMAN: We are not discussing the salaries of judges, which matter has been discussed in a previous debate during the present session.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): I am merely making reference—

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Excuse me; I have the floor. The hon. gentleman interrupts too many times and—

Mr. TUCKER: On a question of privilege, the hon. gentleman says—

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): I object to the hon. gentleman interrupting. Has he a question to ask?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Sit down.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Sit down yourself.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am sitting down.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I know what I am talking about, which is more than you do.

The CHAIRMAN: A question of privilege can always be brought up.

Mr. TUCKER: The hon. gentleman said that I objected to these matters being brought up on the floor of the house. My objection—

Mr. IRVINE: That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. TUCKER: What I said is being misquoted or has been misunderstood. I urged the hon. gentleman not to bring up these individual cases when we were considering this bill. I would be the last one to suggest that anything that comes within the jurisdiction of this parliament should not be aired on the floor of the house. However, I suggest that the place to do this is when the estimates of the department having to do with the pensions commission are before the committee. If we are to interrupt the consideration of this bill to hear one side of individual cases, in fairness to the department I must take the time to go into the reasons for the decisions and explain them to the satisfaction of the committee. I did urge the hon. member yesterday not to press these individual cases on the consideration of this bill, and I ask him now to defer bringing them up until the estimates of the pensions commission are before the committee.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): If the hon. member had listened to me just for a moment or two longer he would have found that all of his speech was quite unnecessary. I do not think for one moment that the difficulty lies with the Minister of Veterans Affairs, because I believe he has a heart almost as big as himself. I have always found him to be most fair in dealing with anything of this kind. However, if there is departmental red tape I maintain that some of that red tape ought to be cut so that these individual cases may be dealt with in the way that the people in Canada would have them dealt with. I believe that the hearts of the people of Canada are sound as far as the treatment of veterans is concerned. I urge a rehearing of these cases.

Mr. MACKENZIE: This matter was taken up by the hon. member for Vancouver East in 1943. I have all the correspondence, and I shall be glad to give it to my hon. friend for his consideration and attention.

Mr. POULIOT: As you know, when the house is in committee no member adjourns the debate because there is no debate; it is just discussion. I rose first, but as a matter of courtesy I let the hon. member have the floor so that he would not be deprived of the opportunity of continuing his speech. I could have kept the floor, but life is short and we should adopt a conciliatory mood in discussing this bill.

As I understand the purpose of the Pension Act, it is to give an opportunity to members of the armed forces who have suffered disability to obtain compensation for that disability in order that they may be placed in the same position as that in which they would have been had they not joined the army. It is simply a matter of equalizing things as much as possible. I ask the minister or his assistant or the former minister to correct me in what I am about to say if I make some statement that is wrong. I consider this matter so serious that we should take the utmost care in dealing with it. But first I should like to refer to a report of the Canadian Press which appears in the papers to-day. This is an excellent report, but I spoke quite fast yesterday and one statement has been misunderstood.

Murder case No. 5 which I gave yesterday to the parliamentary assistant to the minister refers to a boy who came from my county. I have in my mind another file which was transcribed in longhand by the parents of a boy whose number was B-621503 and who came from Toronto. He suffered cruel treatment at the hands of the army medical corps in the maritime provinces. This is another murder case. I believe that in each of these cases the parents are entitled to compensation. No matter what compensation they receive it would not compensate for the loss they have suffered.

I sent this to the Department of Veterans Affairs. After these files have been returned to me by the heads of the Department of Veterans Affairs I intend to send them to the Department of National Defence so that there may be sanctions imposed against those who are not doing their duty as medical men.

What is the use of complaining? When we complain of unjust treatment we are replied to by precisely those who are guilty, and naturally we are confounded. They lie like Ananias, but what they say is taken as gospel. All they do is try to save their own skins. Of course there are able men in the army. While I was fighting the cases of men who were suffering from disabilities I received a letter from a gentleman in Toronto who told me that his brother-in-law was one of the army doctors and that he was a reputable physician and surgeon. I sent him a copy of Hansard which contained my remarks, which were based not upon abstractions but upon facts, and asked him if he had anything to say please to tell me and I would be ready to correct anything that was not according to the facts that I might have stated in the house. I never received a reply.

The dean of the faculty of medicine of Laval university in Quebec wrote to me and said that I had been unfair to some men in the army. I admit at once that some of those who were in the Quebec district were fair.

Mr. TUCKER: On a point of order, I would ask my very dear friend from Temiscouata if he would not permit this pension bill to go through, and take up this grievance, which has to do with something which happened to a man under the jurisdiction of the Department of National Defence, with that department. As to the matter of the mother of this man getting a pension, I am informed that at any time she is in necessitous circumstances or needs a pension she is eligible to get it. The matter is still under consideration from that point of view. I must repeat the plea which I made to the hon. member for Kootenay East, that this legislation be permitted to go forward on its merits and any grievance be brought up when the estimates of the respective departments are under discussion. I can only ask my hon. friend to do that, I have no right to insist on it.

Mr. POULIOT: Surely. I will tell you, sir, that the kind feeling which the hon. member for Rosthern has for my humble self is most warmly reciprocated, and he knows it. But I am not dealing with a particular case, because I shall mention all the facts. Incidentally I mention one case because I want to establish some principles for the guidance of those who will have to interpret the act. The question is not to railroad this matter through but to see that the act is rightly interpreted by those in charge after it is passed by the House of Commons. If I made a sacrifice to come from my beautiful part of the country, particularly at this time of the year, I mean to do something; I mean to perform a task; I mean to accomplish a duty, and this I shall do to the best of my ability for the sake of all the men who belong to the Canadian army or real Canadians who were in one of the allied armies—and I hope that this measure will not be a disguised form of mass immigration. It may be that because of the delay between the end of the war and the establishment of domicile in Canada all the trouble-makers, the Arabs and the Jews of Palestine, will be permitted to come and settle in Canada and get the same treatment as a truly red-blooded Canadian who has been in the armed forces. To this I object very strongly. But not only that, sir; I want the men of the first great war who have not been dealt fairly with until now and the boys who have been in the army in the second great war, to receive fair treatment and better treatment than most of the boys have received up to now.

Sir, you know very well that it was taken for granted by many medical officers that the boys who complained of some unfitness or disability were complaining because they were slackers, because they were afraid to fight, because they were lazy fellows, because they did not want to drill, and so forth. Consequently they were not given the attention they deserved. It was the same thing when as a lad of ten or twelve I was a boarder at a college. We had a doctor, and every time somebody was suffering from some ailment, a common cold or anything of the kind, he was given the same drug, which was inoffensive. It was good for all, because the children in college were young; they were supposed to be well, and there was nothing wrong with them. When they cut their fingers they received the same treatment as they did when they had a cold.

Mr. MacNICOL: Was it castor oil?

Mr. POULIOT: No, it was something which looked very much like H_2O—plain water. The Pension Act must be interpreted in a different spirit from what it has been up to now by a large number of the officials of the department.

As I said yesterday, I am ready to give the benefit of the doubt to these gentlemen. I am ready to cooperate with them. To my knowledge Brigadier Melville has done very well in some cases, although he is somewhat handicapped by the large burden he has to carry as head of the pension commission. I say to Mr. Woods, the deputy minister, that I am ready to cooperate with him. I consider that his appointment is a progressive step over the maintenance of his predecessor in office.

The pensions question is a big question. If things have to be equalized they have to be equalized in all fairness and in all justice to all. Because Mr. So-and-so has applied for a pension it does not follow that he should get it while the other fellow who is just as worthy of a pension cannot get it. On the other hand, if Mr. So-and-so is not entitled to his pension he should not get it any more than the other fellow who does not deserve it and does not get it. The minister will agree with me in that. It is simple; it is obvious; it is elementary. What I regret is that we have to preach in the house things which are simple, elementary and basic just because of the atmosphere here. When it is impossible to discuss any question on its merits we have to discuss it from a sentimental point of view. The minister, his assistant, and all my colleagues know full well that I am always ready to help and cooperate with them in promoting the welfare of the men who have been or are still in the army. I will not mention the details of this case, but I will tell you, sir, when a Victoria Cross winner from far distant British Columbia passes over the head of all the legion to send an S.O.S. to the member for Temiscouata, when one of the great heroes of the last war does that, and when the parents of a child who has been murdered by the medical corps, both father and mother, take the trouble to transcribe the file by hand and send it to the member for Temiscouata, I feel just as much honoured as if my breast were covered with all the medals of the commander in chief of the allied armies. If those people do that it is because they believe that there is a man who lives far away from them, whom they have never met, who is ready to fight their case against anyone. In this instance I hope that I shall not fight their case against anyone, that I will fight their case with everybody and finally obtain success, and I hope it will not take too long.

Mr. BROOKS: May I say to the hon. member that his experience is the experience of practically every hon. member in the house.

Mr. POULIOT: I know that.

Mr. BROOKS: We have all received letters.

Mr. POULIOT: I know that, but I appreciate the fact that I have been singled out by these people. They have written to me, although they have never met me. I do not say that in a boastful spirit, but I say it because I have done my very best. Perhaps it is the only reward I shall get, but I appreciate it the more for that. I give credit to the Minister of Veterans Affairs and to his parliamentary assistant, as I did yesterday. Whenever I spoke to them they gave me the attention that the cases deserved. That was most appreciated; and it is precisely because I have confidence in them that I again appeal to them to see to it that all wrongs are redressed and that justice is done those who have suffered so much. Here is the file. I told the parliamentary assistant I would not mention the facts, and I have kept my word; but I have enough confidence in them to give them my private files. I have nothing to hide; it is my public duty. Other hon. members are in the same position; I am sure they also have to take up cases which have been sent to them by Canadians whom they have never met, and because that has been their experience I appeal to them to help me in my struggle for these poor men and women who suffered so much anxiety during the war, while their loved ones were in the fighting lines.

That having been said, I have a great sorrow in my heart because of the fact that the young men have been told most dangerous things. They were told that a million jobs were ready for them; that when they came back jobs would be waiting. It was not true. Probably it was said in good faith, and again I give the benefit of the doubt to those who said it; but it is precisely because that statement about a million jobs being available to the young men who were to come from the army after the war was not exact that the Pension Act should be interpreted very liberally with regard to them. What often happens? The boys are told that the disabilities from which they suffer existed before they joined the colours. If that is true, how is it that in most cases they were graded A, as perfectly fit? Later they were told, "Well, it happened before you joined the colours, and you are not entitled to anything." How many times did I have to write the minister just because of the stupidity of those who are the heralds, the champions, of red tape. He helped me to redress these wrongs, but it took a long time; and why should these boys have to suffer in the meantime? The mechanism of the pension department should be on ball-bearings that are well greased, so that action may be taken immediately. Why should a boy wait for months, or for a year or two years, before getting an answer which is in accordance with the facts and which satisfies his mind that he has received justice?

This is the more important at the present time because the boys are being induced to accept false theories; they are given a false picture of public business. It would be a matter of the utmost regret if the boys who fought in the forces for many years, or for any length of time; the boys who joined the colours, soldiers, airmen, sailors or draftees, lost faith in and respect for our parliamentary institutions. To-day I do not rise only as a member of Liberal faith; I rise as a member of parliament who wants these and all our institutions to be respected by the young men in order that they may have faith in them; in order that they may realize that when they appeal to parliament, when they appeal to any one of those who occupy high positions in the civil service, they are entitled to fair play and justice, and that they shall not appeal in vain. We have reached a time when the question is not that of maintaining popular confidence in any one of the parties or groups in this country, but of maintaining the faith of the public in our parliamentary institutions, and it is up to us to correct all that is wrong in the mechanism of those institutions. It is most important with regard to the Pension Act and with regard to all the acts concerning those who have been in the armed forces. It is important with regard to every piece of legislation. I remember that during the war I complained many times that we were passing legislation only for taxation; we were passing a lot of it, but principally for that purpose. We are still passing a lot of legislation with regard to taxation, but we also pass a great deal of legislation for other purposes. Yesterday the minister had the grace to indicate to me the amount of expenditure likely to arise out of this legislation. It is a very large amount, but I am not entirely satisfied with his answer, and in due course I will ask him to give the house the total prospective expenditure under each of the measures he has sponsored, so that we may know what is going to be done for the men and what it is going to cost.

There is something else. I was about to speak of this yesterday, but my time was too short. When another government was in power I suggested that all taxes should be earmarked so that a Canadian citizen would know what he pays his taxes for. I wonder if it is not possible to earmark some of the taxes that will go to pay the cost of what is being done for the returned men, so the people will know those taxes are being paid as a tribute to those who served their country well, or to the dependents of those who gave their lives for their country. I may be told that the exchequer is a kind of melting pot, that it is impossible to keep track of the taxation received; but I believe our taxes would be paid by the Canadian people with more satisfaction if they could be earmarked in some way.

In conclusion, sir, I hope the act will be interpreted liberally with regard to real Canadians; those who have been born in this country or those born outside this country who made Canada their home long enough before the war to show their sincerity. It is very important. Newcomers who have been in other allied armies should not have the same treatment as Canadians. If we make sacrifices for our own people, we are not ready to make sacrifices for the newcomers who come here to take advantage of the horn of plenty which is supposed to be for the benefit of our own people.

Just a few days ago I met an old gentleman —only relatively old, because his heart is young. He urged me to make an appeal about communism. When I replied to him I was speaking of youth and for youth. I said to him, "Sir, I know your grandson; he is a fine boy. The next time you see him, put to him a question. Ask him if imperialism is the kind of theory that appeals to him. He will surely tell you that this is the policy that has been so dear to the hearts of the former generation, but that those boys have not been impressed by it at all. They were coming here as Canadians at heart, ready to do something for this country, and to make it greater than ever. Ask him to choose between communism and patriotism."

Well, communism is not the first choice; patriotism is the first choice. But how is it that we have to reeducate the Canadian people about what was taken for granted by the generation which preceded us? All hon. members have been at school or at college. Were they ever taught patriotism? I was taught in the family. Of course those of the family are dearest to the hearts of the parents, dearer than friends would be. Friends are dearer than strangers. But those who live within the bounds of the home country should have bonds and ties in common because their interests are common. They should have the same ideals. The boys should understand that when something is done for them it is a preferential treatment that is not given only to sailors, soldiers, and airmen. It is a preferential treatment that is given to Canadian sailors, soldiers, and airmen. They must have first choice. The state must do all it possibly can, in a reasonable way, to help them out and to make them understand that their mission is not to cross the border and try to find a livelihood in the United States, where food is now scarce. They will have a better life in Canada than they would have in the United States, and that must be told to them. They must be told, because they will wear the burden of debt which we have increased to such an extent. They must have confidence in their country—in this country. And they will have it only as patriotism is preached to them. Then, if they have the same principles and the same feelings as we were taught, they will think of Canada first and will never believe in the theory of communism, which is the negation of the rights of the individual.

When I left that gentleman he said, "Well, that is food for thought. I will ask my grandson about it." I knew what the boy's answer would be, because he was a fine youth, like all the young men who have been in the army. I have faith in him; I have faith in the boys who were in the army, just as I have faith in all the youth of this country. But they will need more courage than ever to surmount the difficulties we have put in their way. We must help them to the utmost, so that they will remain as they are to-day, good Canadian citizens, making life better for the future generation than perhaps we have made it for them.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I wonder if I could have permission to make a quiet, gentle intrusion in the debate for three or four minutes.

Mr. POULIOT: You are always gentle.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I greatly appreciate the kindly sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Temiscouata, both in regard to myself and in regard to my brilliant parliamentary assistant. I must say however, as one who now for thirty years has been living closely with this pension problem, and knows much more about it than the hon. member does, that I never heard such demagogic nonsense in the house in that time as that to which I have just listened. Canning once said:

A statesman of the world alone,
A friend of every country but his own.

There is no country in the world has done so much for her fighting soldiers as has this country of Canada. I resent and I repudiate as strongly as I can the assertions of the hon. member for Temiscouata. Look at your estimates. You are a taxpayer, and a soldier is a taxpayer too. There are $690 million this year in the main estimates, and $175 million in the supplementary estimates, making a total of $865 million. The total cost of rehabilitation is estimated at $1,500 million, and that for a population of a little over 12 million. And yet we get this demagoguery in the House of Commons of Canada!

The heart of parliament is kind; the pulse of parliament beats true. I have sat on every committee since 1919. I have fought the battles of the returned soldier of Canada, and I am still fighting them—now with authority, previously without authority. And I resent and repudiate silly, stupid animadversion such as we have listened to from the hon. member for Temiscouata.

This parliament will always be generous; this parliament will always be just to the great cause of those who have suffered so in the cause of freedom, the cause of civilization, the cause of Christianity. I say this silly animadversion should be absolutely discarded by members of parliament.

Mr. POULIOT: I will ask the minister to mention a statement that he finds silly demagoguery. I know that he has reached the boiling point, but I want to know what he finds silly and demagogic. If he does not mention it, then I shall believe that he is the one. I would not like to be in the position of having to withdraw the words I have used in regard to him.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Agreed.

Mr. POULIOT: But when I speak about the danger of communism in youth, I know what I speak of—and every member of the committee except the minister knows what I speak of. It is a danger. I have never denied that the country has done well for the soldiers in terms of money. But the government will not bring to life the boys who died because of the declaration of war by Canada, made by old men.

I will tell the minister what I read in the Monetary Times not long ago in answer to a question which had been put by several returned men regarding conscription. This article, which appeared in the issue for August, 1945, is by L.M.V. of Hamilton, and it states:

I have just returned from four years overseas, fighting for permanent peace. I do not think we should have compulsory military service for Canadians in peace time. And I don't think the opinions of those who are not eligible for same should count. I think we should make the San Francisco agreement and every subsequent agreement work . . . not for the next war, but for the permanent peace for which I returned but many of my friends did not.

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Chairman, either I must now rise to a point of order in respect of the remarks of the hon. member for Temiscouata, or we must accept the proposition that every other member of this house can get up and discuss anything and the rules be thrown out of the window. I ask you to call my hon. friend to order, to ask him to keep to this bill and to observe, as every other member must, the rules of the house.

Mr. POULIOT: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I will tell you why I quote this, and I have only one more sentence to read.

If the suggestion made by this returned man had been acted upon earlier, the Pension Act would not have been necessary, because we would not have had world war II or world war I. It is precisely because the amount involved in pensions is of such magnitude that we must take every means of preventing in the future another disaster such as world war II was. I do not want a world war III, as I said yesterday, and I am not going to be bullied by anyone here in this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Neither are we.

Mr. POULIOT: I should be very sorry to lose the good opinion and esteem I have for the minister and his parliamentary assistant, but this must be a free parliament in a free country, and if a member of parliament has not the right to offer to this committee the suggestions for preventing future wars which have been offered by one of our soldiers who fought for freedom, this is no longer a free parliament. It is precisely because I believe that the greatest treasure of this country is the lives of good Canadian citizens that I have been speaking as I have. Members are most generous in listening to me as they do, and I appreciate that. I hope that the minister himself will understand that it is not because of lack of cooperation that I stand up to-day in this house and speak as I do. I do it as part of my duty as a member, not only as the member for Temiscouata but as a member of the House of Commons of Canada. We have a duty to fulfil and I give credit to all my colleagues and to the minister for doing their best. But if the parliamentary assistant had not interrupted me I would have finished the quotation and my remarks long ago. It is precisely because he interrupted me that I have to explain to you, Mr. Chairman, and to the committee why it is of the utmost importance that I should be allowed to finish reading these few lines from a returned man who is not a member of the House of Commons but who nevertheless has a right to be heard and be listened to by all the members. I await your decision, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member for Temiscouata should be allowed to finish reading the few lines he desires to read, and then may I ask all hon. members to confine their remarks to the Pension Act. Discussion should be directly relevant to the measure now before us. Wide scope has been given to-day and was given yesterday in this discussion, but I am sure I express the wish of the vast majority of the members of the committee when I request all members, when the hon. member for Temiscouata has finished his remarks, to make their speeches strictly relevant to the Pension Act.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you, sir. I will continue with the quotation:

> I suggest every parliament in every country on earth enact legislation that only men over forty can be drafted for service in the armed forces. If we could make that stick, perhaps we could eliminate war from the face of the earth for ever.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not wish to detain the committee for more than five or six minutes, because I am a civilian, though coming from a soldier city. I should like to observe first of all that we shall be here until Thanksgiving day if we keep on discussing bills the way we are doing, and it was for that reason, in order to expedite the business of the house, that I took no part in yesterday's proceedings, on these resolutions, particularly as we have in this party, as in all the parties in this house, soldier representatives who are particularly well qualified to speak on soldier legislation.

This is the most important bill that we have had before us for many years. First of all it defines "department" and it repeals and amends certain pension legislation passed in 1927 and 1928. Then it goes on in the second clause to redefine "hospital allowances", extending pay and allowances or compensation to a large number of people.

I wish to speak on two matters particularly. The first is the definition of "department". In these days the work of many departments is being transferred to other departments, and I was hoping that we would have a department particularly concerned with soldiers' welfare. I think one of the main needs of the soldier is for a home for his wife and family to live in. Before the war in the city of Toronto sixty-seven per cent of our people owned their homes, but during the war many of our Toronto veterans lost their homes. That is why I should like to see the matter of houses for soldiers transferred to the department which has to do with soldiers' welfare. As I said, nothing concerns the soldier more than a roof over his head for himself and wife and children, and the fact that our soldiers have not houses to live in is costing the government a great deal of money in allowances. We have a large number of soldiers in our city. Also many soldiers from all parts of Canada have come to Toronto and are going to stay there. No city has contributed more than Toronto in the way of soldiers' aid.

I wish to compliment the veterans affairs committee on the good work it has done for the soldier. Tho hon. member for Temiscouata has referred to a great many matters this morning. He seems to have inherited the spirit and mantle of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He also wears the old school tie. There are few on the government benches who now do wear the same old school tie.

I visit 55 York Street, Toronto, once in a while and I am pleased with a great deal of the work that is done there. We have a large number of soldiers in this party, including two Victoria Cross men. The government party and all the other parties in the house have a large number of soldiers in their ranks, and I have been content this session to leave to them the discussion of matters particularly affecting the soldiers, because I have felt that they were doing a real job. I want to compliment the members of the veterans affairs committee on the work they have done for the soldiers. I should also like to compliment the hon. member for Vancouver South and the hon. member for Nanaimo and all the other soldiers who have participated in the work of that committee.

I should like to see the department expanded along the lines I have suggested, so that it would really be a soldiers' welfare department. The soldier goes to the soldiers' welfare in Toronto at 55 York street; he gets his grant and gratuities and goes and puts the money in the bank. Several banks, such as the Dominion at the corner of Yonge and North Park, do a big soldier business. I have talked to some of the soldiers and soldiers' wives who go there, and I find that they pay in this money they have; they also borrow money; the wife has been frugal while her husband was away, and they go down to the lawyer and deposit money for a house and the title to it. Now they cannot get into the home. I had hoped that the health and welfare department would consider this feature, but it has not done so, and there is no other department doing it. I see in the Toronto papers almost every week letters from veterans and their families complaining about this feature of the work, and I wish the department had considered it. I referred to this on Tuesday last on the third reading of the housing bill.

The second matter is this. I appeared before the veterans committee about it. As you know, this new bill deals with a number of antecedent matters: the work of the military commission, Department of Civil Reestablishment, the Department of Pensions and National Health, and matters going back as far as the acts of 1927 and 1928. Now I wish to compliment the minister, and I was going to compliment the parliamentary assistant, because he comes from a district which is affected by a branch of this work which has not been attended to; I refer to the Northwest field force of 1885. No veteran in the present parliament can afford to forget what the three prairie provinces owe to those who took part in military operations in that rebellion. I appeared before the committee on June 11 on behalf of the dependents of those volunteers, to try to clear the matter up. A year ago provision was made in the regulations, section 4, as follows:

> In this part, unless the context requires, "veteran" means (a) any former member of the Northwest field force who served in a theatre of actual war in the northwest rebellion.

The proceedings are reported in minute No. 30 of the veterans affairs committee. We owe this regulation, I believe, very largely to the present Minister of Veterans Affairs. After a long series of arguments in the house and before the committee the allowances were extended to the Northwest field force, but in effect it has given no help at all. A "means test" is applied to these people. A means test is the meanest test I have ever seen; it is well called a "means" test as it bears upon these poor people, widows and children who would get about $40 a month but are deprived of it because they receive some small revenue from an old age pension or some other source of income. I had hoped that this would be a real clean-up bill of soldier grievances. That is what it should be. I was hoping that we would conclude a long chapter of suffering and injustice in connection with this branch of veterans' legislation.

I wish to speak with appreciation of the work of the members of this group on the committee, and what they have done to extend the scope of the benefits, especially the hon. members for Vancouver South, Souris, Royal, N.B., and Vancouver-Burrard.

I should also like to express my appreciation of the fact that in this war we have had better doctors, surgeons and nurses. I know two or three of them who were at the university of Toronto when the war started; they served overseas and are now in Canada again, some of them in practice in our city. We have there some of the best surgeons in Canada. One, a former captain of the varsity rugby team, Doctor M. F. Williams, is a very fine young surgeon, now with one of America's greatest surgeons, Doctor Roscoe Graham. It is remarkable what progress preventive medicine, science, surgery, and medicine generally have made in this war.

As I have said, I was in hopes that this would be a clean-up bill so far as those are concerned who did not get a pension, men who enlisted and actually were accepted for service after medical tests before one, two, three, four, five boards, who did not find anything the matter with them on enlistment. I agree that subsequent disability should entitle them to pension, and I am sorry the principle has not been adopted. I had hopes of the parliamentary secretary, who was in the chair when I appeared before the committee in the interests of the veterans who served in the 1885 rebellion. Very few of these people got anything. There were a large number of them from Nova Scotia, the old Haligonians and numbers from Hamilton, Toronto and other cities in eastern Canada, and some from Winnipeg, the men of the old 90th Rifles. These men pioneered for the whole of western Canada, and were pioneers of the militia too. Some of them served in the South African war, and their children and grandchildren took part in the two great world wars. Realizing the good work which this department has done, and seeing the plight of these people in my walks around my city, I feel it is a great pity that now a clean-up is being made it does not include them under the first section.

That is all I have to say, Mr. Chairman. I believe the committee as a whole deserves the thanks of the House of Commons for the zeal and diligence and study they have devoted to this question, which is the supreme question in its sacred significance with which we shall have to deal in this or any other parliament.

Mr. HLYNKA: I should like to inquire of the parliamentary assistant, not about an individual case, though I desire to illustrate the point I have in mind by mentioning a particular case. I wish to find out what can be done for widows and children of soldiers who were released temporarily to go into mining and who, while engaged in that occupation, were killed in consequence of an explosion. The particular case which was drawn to my attention does not come from my constituency, but this man has written to me stating that he had two sons, and both enlisted, one in the air force and the other in the army. The boy in the air force was killed while serving overseas. The other son was stationed at Halifax for about eighteen months, was married, and had one son. This young soldier was released temporarily by the Department of National Defence to assist in mining when that industry needed help. While he was engaged in this work at Luscar, Alberta, there was an explosion in the mine and he was killed. The father writes and tells me that he not only lost two sons but he has to support the widow of one son and also her child. Can anything be done to cover such unfortunate cases as the one to which I refer? It appears to me hardly fair for a father to lose two sons and then have to support the widow and her children as well.

Mr. TUCKER: The answer is that if the man was ordered out as part of his military duty he is covered just the same as if he went on any other military duty. But if he got leave of absence without pay he is not covered for anything that happened to him, because the presumption is that he engaged as an ordinary civilian in the occupation and would have the protection which any other civilian has. Several thousand soldiers were let out on leave of absence without pay in order to engage in farm work and so on. They were doing work which had no more to do with the army than that of a great many civilians who never enlisted in the army at all and who were working alongside of them. If they asked for leave to work on the farm and got leave of absence without pay of course they are not covered. It would depend on the circumstances. If this man was ordered to go there as part of his duty he would be covered; if he got leave of absence without pay presumably he would be covered in some cases at least by the proper civilian workmen's compensation act.

Mr. HLYNKA: The information I have is that the Department of National Defence directed this young man to go and assist in the mining industry. I appreciate what the parliamentary assistant has said, and I agree that when a man goes back into agriculture you cannot undertake to take care of his dependents under the army regulations. This may be a borderline case, but it seems to me that when a man is ordered by the Department of National Defence to assist in some industry, just because his family does not get dependents' allowances and he does not get his pay he should not be disqualified. I hope that the parliamentary assistant will do all he can to see that proper consideration is given to cases of this kind.

Mr. BRYCE: Does this bill provide benefits for a widow with an adopted son that are different from those in the previous act?

Mr. TUCKER: There is no change in that regard. An adopted child has always been covered.

Mr. BRYCE: I had a case which I brought before the department and it was ruled out.

Mr. TUCKER: Section 2 (c) defines "child" as a legitimate child of a member of the forces, whether such child is born before or after the award of pension, and also includes his step-child, his adopted child, his foster child, or his illegitimate child.

Mr. BRYCE: I refer to a boy who was adopted when he was nine or ten years old by a veteran just after he came back from the last war.

Mr. TUCKER: That child would be covered by that definition. I suggest the hon. member resubmit his case for consideration.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The proof of government policy is in the way it works out, and there are instances in which this act is not working. I may be referring to a part of the act which is most difficult to administer, but just two days ago my attention was drawn to an instance in which suffering and perhaps harm is being done. This particular young man passed his test A-1. He was sent to England, where he took his inoculations. Following his first inoculation he did not feel very well, but he continued his training. He broke down under intensive training in Great Britain, and suffered from shock. He was sent back to Canada in 1944, and the parents were notified that he would be discharged. He did not arrive home, and the parents finally received word from the department that he was being sent to Ste. Anne de Bellevue for treatment for nervous trouble. In May, 1944, the boy came home, but he was accompanied by an escort. Apparently he was a mild psychopathic case, but since that time he has proved absolutely useless on the farm. He is unable to do any work or to assume any responsibility. Before he enlisted he was a fine, strapping young man who was able to do his work and assume any responsibility, but for two years he has been wholly incapacitated. He lost his father, and the mother and another brother are trying to carry on. In spite of the applications and efforts made by the legion and other people in the area, the only report they can get from the department is, "nervous disorders, preenlistment origin, not aggravated by war service, and not pensionable." How do the officials of the department determine that such a case was of preenlistment origin? This boy passed into the army as A-1, and there is nothing on his record. How do they determine that? Do they question him?

Mr. TUCKER: I should be very curious to know whether they have exhausted all the rights under the Pension Act. There seems to be great misunderstanding about the way these things are dealt with. When the first application is made the pension commission goes over the documents and the ruling is made on the basis of the documents. When that is done, in some cases people immediately consider that the decision is outrageous because they know all the circumstances. All that needs to be done then is to ask that the case be considered by the commission. Then the family doctor can be called or any other evidence. A hearing is set quite readily. It must be admitted that some people try to create the impression that they can get a pension for somebody when nobody else can. There is then a feeling created that you have to put up a big fight in order to get what is coming to you. I assure the committee that if there is any evidence in connection with any of these cases that does not appear in the documents, it can be submitted to the commission. We are giving in this bill more complete recognition to the independent standing of the pensions advocates branch, the veterans' bureau, so that they may feel freer than ever before to fight for the soldier and see that he gets everything he is entitled to before the commission. I should like to know if the case mentioned by the hon. member for Yorkton has reached a point where vive voce evidence has been taken. That would be most important in a case of the kind. Evidence of the family doctor, if they had one, could be given as to his condition before he went into the army. The medical history is examined into most carefully. Neighbours could be heard, or any evidence at all that would show his condition when he went into the army. Suppose he had some sort of nervous trouble and had served in a theatre of actual war where his trouble was aggravated. He would get entitlement for the disability, unless he was covered by one of the three exceptions: first, unless he wilfully concealed it, which would not be the case here; second, unless it was obvious, which would not be the case here, I take it from what the hon. member has said; and, third, unless it was recorded on medical examination prior to enlistment.

I take it from what the hon. member says that this boy entered the army in good health and therefore he would not come under any one of the three exceptions. Even if he had been somewhat emotionally unstable at that time, if that condition was aggravated during service he would be entitled to full pension for his disability. I can only assume that the case cited by the hon. member has not reached the final stage, and I suggest that he take the matter up with the pension commission.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I shall be glad to resubmit the case. I did not submit it myself; it was submitted by the legion. I advised them to do that, but the legion has not been able to get anywhere with it. I shall resubmit it and take it up with the department.

The parliamentary assistant has not answered my question. How would the department determine that that case was of preenlistment origin? Is it based merely on questioning of the soldier?

Mr. TUCKER: On the actual documentation which is on the file. The first decision is based upon the medical examinations and documentation on the file. The commission rules on that in the first instance. If that is not satisfactory, the man so indicates, and the matter is gone into further. It may very well be that the matter has not got to the stage where evidence has been heard from his family doctor, friends, and so on.

Mr. GREEN: Is it not a fact that often the decision is made here by a specialist who never sees the man?

Mr. TUCKER: He advises the commission, but the commission makes the decision.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I had another case of a soldier who was wounded overseas.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. May I remind the hon. member for Yorkton that the committee agreed not to bring up special cases except to bring forth a general discussion.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is what I am trying to do. I am not building these cases out of the air. I have actual evidence of occurrences. I am not going to put any case on the record, but I know of a soldier who was wounded; the ligaments of his leg were torn and he was granted a ten per cent pension. The boy's condition grew worse; he was in constant pain and therefore could do practically no work. At times he was laid up completely; all he could do was to help his father on the farm. The department were asked if they could do something about it, and they asked that he be sent in for another examination. He was sent in for another examination and he came back. After I wrote the minister about it the pension was increased to fifteen per cent, which gives him about $10 a month. The boy still wanted to get evidence with regard to his actual disability. As a result of the disability he was in a cramped up condition and seemed to be getting no relief at all. His capacity for work was cut down to nothing. He and his father went to the family doctor. After the examination the father said: "I should like to have a report from you as to the actual disability of my son." The doctor refused to give him a report. He said: "I won't give you a report; I will send it in to the office in Saskatoon." What is a young man to do when a doctor refuses to give him a report?

Mr. MACKENZIE: A private doctor?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes.

Mr. TUCKER: The only answer I can give is that he should go to another doctor who would cooperate with him.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: He will be put to a great deal of expense to go to doctors here and there.

Mr. TUCKER: After all, the doctor owed him an obligation if he examined him.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Ethically the doctor could not do it.

Mr. TUCKER: There is nothing in the act to prevent a doctor from telling a soldier what is his condition. In addition to that he could have the doctor brought before the appeal branch of the commission to give evidence as to the examination.

Mr. BROOKS: Would not the doctor's report on his file be available to the soldier or to the legion?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. BROOKS: At any time?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the doctor to whom the hon. gentleman has referred was one who had any previous dealings with the department, would it encourage him to side in with the department instead of the soldier?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think he had been used in the department as a consultant.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member's friend would not have much of a chance, then.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: He is in a difficult situation because this is the medical man in the area. It seemed to me that in justice the men should have the opinion of medical men outside of those employed or used by the government.

Mr. TUCKER: On that point, and just for the information of the committee, may I say that on the suggestion of the hon. member for Davenport that the medical men employed by the department are all against the men getting a fair deal—

Mr. MacNICOL: What did the hon. member say?

Mr. TUCKER: I understood the hon. member to say that this gentleman would not have much of a chance if the doctor was in some way connected with the department. I suggest to the hon. member for Davenport that all the doctors working for the department are themselves returned soldiers. I suggest that without exception the department has no knowledge that they are not sympathetic toward the returned soldiers in seeing that they get a square deal. This will be borne out by some figures which I should like to give to the committee. I give them partly because there is a feeling that these cases are not dealt with as expeditiously as some hon. members would like. The amount of work the pension commission has done in the last year has been stupendous. As of June 30, 1946, the disability awards in respect of world war II were 44,199. That is disability awards alone. The dependent awards were 17,125, or total awards made by this commission in respect to world war II alone of 61,324. That means perusing the files, and all that sort of thing. It is a tremendous amount of work. Then when we brought the insurance principle into effect by order in council it meant reviewing thousands of files to give them the benefit of the act. Over 9,700 files had to be reviewed. Over nine thousand decisions were rendered in respect of restoration of the insurance principle alone. The total annual liability in respect of world war II is as follows: Disability awards, $13,250,190; dependent awards, $12,158,565. The total pension annual liability now amounts to $25,408,755. That is for world war II. Here are the figures for world war I at the same date: Disability awards, 73,079, with a total annual liability of $26,429,474; dependent awards amounted to 16,894, and the annual liability amounts to $10,560,562.

Mr. GREEN: That is this year?

Mr. TUCKER: That is up to June 30, 1946.

Mr. GREEN: The annual liability for which year?

Mr. TUCKER: The total annual liability as of June 30, 1946 was $25,408,755 in respect of world war II and $36,990,036 in respect of world war I. The total annual liability in respect of pensions for the two wars is therefore $62,300,000. The total pensioners for the two wars may be obtained by adding 61,324 to 88,973, a figure somewhere around 150,000 pension awards. I give these figures to the committee so that they may take into account some delays which have inevitably taken place. Hon. members can appreciate the tremendous amount of work which must have been involved in making these awards.

Mr. MacNICOL: I would not want any remark of mine to be regarded as a reflection on the medical profession. My remark was not based on any experience I have had with world war II. I had in mind three cases in connection with world war I in which the soldiers themselves told me that when they went to a doctor for an examination he gave them one report in each case, and later when they were sent by the officials of the hospital in Toronto to the same doctor, he gave them a different report.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We have changed all that.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to hear that. I should be sorry indeed if what I interjected in the hon. member's remarks should be construed as a reflection on the medical profession. My remark was based on the three experiences—a limited number perhaps—of soldiers who themselves had felt that their cases had been prejudiced through having to go to the doctor the second time.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not now.

Mr. MacNICOL: Personally I can say my own experience with the department has been very pleasant, and I have no complaint whatever with regard to the departmental officials. Later, when the right time comes, I am going to submit one or two cases to which the department has given a great deal of attention. I am very sympathetic toward the department, but I am also sympathetic toward these poor sufferers who, in their opinion in any event, are not being properly treated. Personally I should like to see the benefit of the doubt clause used much more than it has been used.

Mrs. STRUM: I should like to ask the minister where the final decision rests. Is it with the board; and what recourse does the family of the victim have? I am thinking of a case which has been thrust upon me for the simple reason that the family cannot afford legal assistance, and the boy in question is completely mentally incompetent; he no longer answers when he is spoken to, and his mental condition is such that he is quite beyond the reach of reason. I am not having any satisfaction in dealing with his case. I have written the department a number of times and received very courteous answers. The local doctor is new, a young man who has come there within the last year or so. He is also very sympathetic, but he did not know this boy at the time of his enlistment. The boy has been out of the army for two or three years. He is a victim of sleeping sickness contracted while in the army. His disability is not the result of military service, yet he contracted this illness while in training, and just on the point of embarkation. I should like to know where the boy goes from here, because he is mentally incompetent and has no means of support whatever.

Mr. TUCKER: In the first place, if this disability was incurred during service it probably would be covered by the insurance principle which has been reintroduced in the act in respect of service in Canada, so he may find himself in a very different position now from that in which he would have found himself three months ago before this insurance principle was embodied in the law by order in council. In regard to looking after the claims of soldiers, in the first place the Canadian Legion is ready and willing to take up these cases. In addition, of course, there is the veterans' bureau, an organization of men trained in this work, most of whom do nothing else but present these cases and assist in their preparation. They will assist the boy and his relatives to get evidence, and I suggest that the hon. member direct this boy's relatives to the nearest district pensions advocate of the department. If she has any difficulty finding out where that advocate is located, any person in our department could give her the address. There she will find someone who is paid by the country to press the cases of boys like this.

Mrs. STRUM: I think it has already gone through that procedure, but what happens when nothing is done? What do you do then?

Mr. TUCKER: Well, my hon. friend is very pessimistic.

Mrs. STRUM: I have been working on it since February.

Mr. TUCKER: I suggest to my hon. friend that the law has been changed. I think the order in council went through late in June, and that change may make all the difference in the case she mentions. If she will give the case to the chairman of the pension commission I fancy she may cease to be quite so pessimistic about some of these matters.

Mr. LENNARD: Personally I have about twenty-five cases pending at the present time, but I do not propose to parade them all here now. I shall fight them out with the heads of the various branches within the department. If we are going to carry on in this way, bringing up individual cases hour after hour, we are going to be here until Christmas.

The CHAIRMAN: I think it has been agreed in the committee that no individual cases shall be brought up except to establish a general principle, and I think the cases hon. members have mentioned have been brought up in order to see what the principle is.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think that is very fair, but I do not want it to become a rule of this committee that individual cases are out.

The CHAIRMAN: I might inform the hon. member that it is not a rule, but the committee agreed on that procedure, as I understand it.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Well, you do not bind individual members in that way, or take away their rights to bring up cases. Let us fight it out on that principle. I do not want to bring up individual cases; my intention is to bring up cases to point out instances where the procedure may have failed, so let us try to get the thing done without recriminations and without getting nasty about it. I think a great deal of the difficulty is that in psychopathic cases among returned men the relatives of the men in question do not understand the avenues of procedure, and are at a complete loss to know what they should do. If they were informed as to the procedure which should be followed; if they were given a little more knowledge and a little more information with regard to the steps to be taken, and the location of the offices in the various provinces, I believe it would assist a great deal.

Section agred to.

On section 2—Hospital allowance.

Mr. KIDD: I should like to say a word in regard to these hospital allowances, and I am glad the minister is in his seat. I want to refer briefly to the hospital set-up, and to express the hope that the good feeling now existing between the Department of Veterans Affairs and the general hospitals throughout Canada may continue. I shall take the local point of view and talk about my own municipality of Kingston. There we had five hospitals: the General hospital, the Hotel Dieu hospital, the mental hospital, the D.V.A. hospital and the military hospital. When mental patients are taken in at the D.V.A. hospital, however, they are sent to the mental hospital. In Ontario we have thirteen mental hospitals, one of which is at Kingston. My point is that the government more or less depends on private or other governmental interests to maintain an institution whose doors are open three hundred and sixty-five days in the year; I refer to the mental hospital. I believe that in each of these thirteen hospitals in this province there is an average of over one thousand mentally ill patients. If D.V.A. find it necessary to use the facilities of that institution, they are always available; and I understand it has been used by the department ever since the last war. I regret to say that in our mental hospitals there are some boys who have been in those institutions for nearly twenty-five years, and who have received fine treatment all that time. I do not think better care is being given mental patients anywhere in Canada than in the thirteen institutions in Ontario.

Then may I say a word in reference to the general hospitals. The same applies there. In Kingston we have a hospital which will accommodate four hundred patients. For the last twenty-five years a large proportion of the staff of this hospital has been returned personnel, and the situation is the same with regard to the medical profession. The point I want to bring out is that recently the military hospital was closed and the staff and patients were moved to Barriefield. In the early days, back in 1940, 1941 and 1942, when it was pretty hard to get anything done. I think the department would have been better advised to extend the facilities of the general hospital and use that institution instead of opening its own hospital. It took us two or three years to get the department to realize that they had a service available at their very door. I am glad to say that within the next few days we expect to be opening a new wing, which will accommodate another 125 patients. When that new wing is opened it will probably accommodate a total of 500 patients. In what I have said I have dealt with the matter from the point of view not only of Kingston, but also of Canada as a whole. In four or five years the public will have something, built by public money. To-day the general hospitals are chiefly private, those receiving endowments. When a person passes away he may leave something as a bequest to these institutions.

I emphasize as strongly as I can my hope that the good feeling which now prevails between the Department of Veterans Affairs and the general hospitals will continue. I believe under such conditions the general hospitals will be only too willing to cooperate.

Mr. BROOKS: I should like to refer to the mental institutions about which the hon. member for Kingston has spoken. I believe I pointed out yesterday that I knew there was considerable overcrowding, and that it was unfortunate that we did not have accommodation for all soldier cases. In New Brunswick, soldier cases have been sent to the provincial hospital. I know there has been widespread resentment on the part of some of the families of these men because of the practice of sending them to provincial hospitals, instead of to some other public institutions. I spoke about this matter last year, and the minister told me that he believed other arrangements would be made. Because of having to remain in Ottawa so long I have lost touch with my province and have not had a chance to make a check. Is provision being made in New Brunswick for the mental soldier cases in that province? If so what are those provisions?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Gradual transfer is being effected across the country from provincial institutions to our own hospitals. After the last war to a great extent the policy was to have the unfortunate mental cases placed in provincial institutions. Now the policy is one of transferring them gradually.

Mr. BROOKS: To what hospitals will the men in the New Brunswick institutions be transferred?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I shall be able to tell the hon. member later to-day.

Mr. McKAY: Does the Department of Veterans Affairs operate any mental institutions, or are they simply psychopathic wards devoted to mental cases?

Mr. MACKENZIE: As my hon. friend knows, the two largest are at Ste. Anne's and Westminster, the latter being in London, Ontario.

On section 7—Duties of veterans' bureau.

Mr. BROOKS: It was pointed out a few minutes ago that some people in outlying districts did not know to whom to turn to get information. Will the parliamentary assistant place on record a statement showing the number of pensions advocates and their locations, so that all the information will be available?

Mr. TUCKER: When the first decision is made, full information is given as to where a person can go to get further assistance. The address of the nearest advocate is indicated.

Mr. BROOKS: Why not put a list on Hansard showing where these advocates are located, so that the general public will know? People do not want to have to write to Ottawa.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I agree with the hon. member. The publication "Back to Civil Life" has on the back of it the addresses of all pensions advocates. That publication has been sent to all branches of the Canadian Legion and other returned soldier organizations.

Mr. TUCKER: The complete list is as follows:

Mr. WRIGHT: Are the pensions advocates capable of coping efficiently with the inquiries they are receiving at the present time, or is there need for expansion of their staff?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I cannot speak for them, but I can speak as to my knowledge of their work. They are hard-working people, not only during the day, but sometimes far into the night. The peak of work will be reached in September, following which it will subside. I should like to pay tribute to the pensions advocates across Canada for the devoted service they have rendered.

Mr. WRIGHT: I agree with what the minister has said, but I was pointing out that perhaps to-day, and for the next few months, they should have some additional assistance.

Mr. MACKENZIE: If additional advocates are required, they will be obtained immediately.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How are they appointed and paid?

Mr. MACKENZIE: By the civil service commission.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Are they employees of the Department of Veterans Affairs?

Mr. TUCKER: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Sometimes a soldier feels that an advocate who is an employee of the government and paid by the government—

Mr. MACKENZIE: I was a former advocate, and I can assure my hon. friend that pensions advocates have absolute and complete independence. They are not bound in the slightest degree by any government restriction or policy.

Sections 8 to 29 inclusive agreed to.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

On section 30—Benefit of doubt.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, this clause is the one that amends the benefit of doubt section by adding two words "and presumptions." I should like to get some information as to the significance of the addition of these two words—and in referring to a particular case I hope you will understand, Mr. Chairman, that I am doing it for the purpose of getting information. I admit that I am interested in this case and desire to pursue it further, but my main purpose is to ask one specific question.

The case is No. 420676. I have before me a letter, under date of July 4, 1946, signed by Brigadier C. B. Topp, chief pensions advocate, in which he confirms the fact that this veteran gave gallant service during the first world war, was severely wounded in action, was awarded the Military Medal, and that he has been in receipt of a small pension for many years.

Some years after the first world war this veteran developed a heart condition. This was in addition to the condition already recognized as pensionable. The fact that he had received a gunshot wound in the chest led him to believe that his heart condition might be attributable to the wound he had received while on active service. His claim has been pursued on that basis. As a matter of fact, just about all the machinery there is has been exhausted, and now Brigadier Topp says this in his letter of July 4, 1946:

> The district advocate, and we at head office of the veterans bureau, feel that a good case for entitlement was made out.

He is referring to the hearing before the appeal board. He goes on to say:

> It must be remembered, however, that it is virtually impossible to establish as a fact in such cases that the disorder did or did not arise during service.

I emphasize the words used by Brigadier Topp, that it is virtually impossible to decide that the disability did arise from service, and equally it is virtually impossible to decide that it did not arise from service. That seems to be a pretty fair example of a borderline case in which the veteran himself and the veterans bureau and any of the rest of us who are interested in the case feel that the benefit of the doubt should be exercised.

What I should like to know is this. How can this veteran find out whether the benefit of the doubt clause has been broadened by this amendment so that his case might now be given further consideration? Brigadier Topp said in the concluding paragraph of his letter of July 4:

> The only means of reopening the claim is by proof of error or production of substantial new evidence. We are exploring these approaches but I am obliged to state that I doubt whether anything more can be done.

It seems to me that in a case like this it is difficult to establish that there has been any error, or to bring forward any substantial new evidence. But I imagine that many a veteran in circumstances such as these will feel, once he hears that the benefit of the doubt clause has been broadened, that it may have been broadened sufficiently now to take care of his case. How, I ask, can this veteran and others in his circumstances find out whether the benefit of the doubt may now be exercised to his advantage?

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Chairman, not only is our Pension Act based upon the best principles that prevails in other countries, in that a pension may be awarded for any disablement that arises out of or is due to service, but it provides for a pension for any disablement incurred during service. So far as I know ours is the only country in the world which goes that far. Having laid that principle down, that a pension might be awarded to any person because of a disability incurred during service, it must proved, of course, that it was actually incurred during service; because I do not think it was ever the intention of parliament that we should pay a pension in respect of a disability which the man had when he went into the service and which was not in any way increased during service.

The hon. gentleman says that the chief pensions advocate, who works on behalf of the men, as he should in every way he possibly and properly can, has cited this as a case in which it was very difficult to prove that the disability was incurred during service.

Mr. KNOWLES: And equally difficult to prove that it was not incurred during service.

Mr. TUCKER: That is apparently the opinion of Mr. Topp.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is right.

Mr. TUCKER: The situation with which we are confronted is this. It has been laid down in our Pension Act by section 5 that:'

. . . The commission shall have full and unrestricted power and authority and exclusive jurisdiction to deal with and adjudicate upon all matters and questions relating to the award, increase, decrease, suspension or cancellation of any pension under this Act and to the recovery of any overpayment . . .

And so on. It goes on:

(2) In any case in which the commission finds that a pension has been awarded by the commission or by the Board of Pension Commissioners for Canada as a result of an error and not as a result of fraud or misrepresentation or concealment of material facts on the part of the applicant, if such pension has been paid for not less than five years and its cancellation or reduction would, in the opinion of the commission, result in undue hardship to the pensioner, the commission, in its discretion, may ratify the payment already made and may continue payment in whole or in part.

The effect of that is this, and it cannot be emphasized too strongly. Parliament in its wisdom has set up the Canadian pension commission and has endowed it with full power and authority to make rulings in these cases. No other body has authority to interfere with its decisions in these matters. When it makes a decision, it is like a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada. Its decision has even greater authority than a decision of the supreme court, because an appeal can be taken from a decision of the supreme court, but there can be no appeal from a decision of the pension commission except under this section which provides for reconsideration of the case by the commission itself if an error seems to have been made. It comes down to this; is it the thought of parliament that this system is working better than some other system by which are provided appeals for? At one time we did have a system of appeals, and it was found that it worked so much to the detriment of the veterans that with one accord veterans across Canada said, "We do not want this system any longer"; they wanted a system such as we have to-day. Some hon. members seem to think there should be a power in the minister to overrule the commission. Of course no responsible veterans' body wants it left to a minister to have the right to overrule the decision of the commission—an independent board of judges. So it comes back to this: are members of parliament confident that the present board of pension commissioners is enforcing the Pension Act and giving the benefit of the doubt as it should be given under the act which they are sworn to administer?

Mr. MACKENZIE: They are doing it.

Mr. TUCKER: I think it was established at hearings before our committee that while there might be some difference of opinion about close cases—there are bound to be such —the pension commission had the confidence of every single member of that committee in the matter of their making an intelligent and generous approach to the administration of this act. When my hon. friend says, "They made a decision; it was adverse to the person I am interested in, what do I do now?" the answer is that what can be done is all set out in the act.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has misunderstood me.

Mr. TUCKER: Let me say this, if my hon. friend will be patient for a moment: we are changing this section by adding the words "and presumptions." If there are any cases which are on the borderline the commission will, naturally, if it is brought to their attention, look at this change we are putting into the act; they will bear in mind the intention of parliament in adding it, and assume, I suppose, that we did not do it without some desire to strengthen their powers to lean in favour of the applicant. Some people may say that the words "and presumptions" do not strengthen the act at all; others think it will strengthen the hands of the commission in giving the benefit of the doubt to applicants. I suggest to my hon. friend that he bring the case he mentioned to the attention of the commission when this change becomes law. But, unless it is intended to change the very basis of this act, the Canadian pension commission, while it has the confidence of parliament, must be the body to decide these matters.

Mr. KNOWLES: I want to thank the parliamentary assistant for the information he gave me in the latter part of his remarks. But in all fairness I must point out that the first part of what he said should not have been directed at me at all.

Mr. TUCKER: I assure the hon. member that it was not.

Mr. KNOWLES: I want to make it clear that I accept the principle that the pension commission should be independent, and that parliament should not seek to override its authority. That is not our purpose in giving examples such as we have given in this chamber. But at the moment we are changing the basis on which the Canadian pension commission operates. We are, I hope, broadening the significance of the benefit of doubt clause, and I think it is germane to ask what meaning there is in that change; hence my question as to how a veteran such as the one I mentioned could go about taking advantage of that changed situation. Remember he has been told that he has exhausted all the machinery. I am glad to have now the word of the parliamentary assistant that, despite the fact that he appears to have exhausted all the machinery, he can now, himself, through the pensions advocate, or I can myself, bring his case before the Canadian pension commission and ask them to consider whether a case such as this, which is on the borderline, is not now covered by the power which parliament is giving to the commission to draw on a presumption in favour of the applicant.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is the intention of the amendment.

Mr. KNOWLES: The presumption in this case, since there was a clear doubt, should be in favour of the veteran. I will certainly see to it that it is again brought to the attention of the commission.

Mr. POULIOT: Will the four thousand Polish soldiers who have been allowed to settle in this country be entitled to the benefits of this act?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I must tell my hon. friend at once that that question has not yet been definitely determined. As soon as it has, I shall be very glad to give the requisite information. In the allied veterans benefits bill, which will be considered by the house, certain provisions have been made which will be explained in detail when that bill is under consideration.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the hon. gentleman. I hope, on the other hand, that those who were responsible for the bombing of the King David hotel in Jerusalem will not be allowed to come to this country to blow up the Chateau Laurier.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is a question entirely outside the jurisdiction of this department, but it is in the jurisdiction of His Majesty's government in Canada.

Mr. TUCKER: Just to reassure my hon. friend, none of this legislation will affect those who were not domiciled in Canada at the time they went in the armed forces of Canada, its allies, and other members of the commonwealth.

Mr. POULIOT: What is the definition of "domicile"? It is pretty hard. There is no definition of "domicile".

Mr. GREEN: I think it would be unfortunate if hon. members were to gain the impression that this amendment to the benefit of the doubt section of the Pension Act means very much.

Mr. KNOWLES: Don't take our last hope away from us.

Mr. GREEN: The way in which these two words "and presumptions" came to be added to this section was this. During the discussions in the veterans affairs committee some of us suggested that a presumption should be written into the act to the effect that a man's condition on his admission to the service was in fact his condition at that time, and that if there was any subsequent deterioration during service it would be the responsibility of the state to show that that deterioration was not caused by this service. A presumption of that type was actually passed by the committee unanimously. I read it out in the house yesterday: it was passed on May 31 and is contained in proceedings No. 25 of the special committee. But a week later the Minister of Veterans Affairs told the committee that he could not agree to having that presumption written into the act; that what he would suggest was that we put the two words "and presumptions" at the end of the old benefit of the doubt clause. Government supporters moved an amendment according to our motion to report the bill as it had been approved section by section. That is the reason we now find these words "and presumptions" in the present bill. Obviously they mean practically nothing, because the word "presumption" is not found anywhere else in the Pension Act. This amendment does not tie in with anything; it is just put in as a government suggestion to get away from putting in a proper presumption clause. So there is no point in anyone thinking that the veteran is getting much assistance by the addition of these words. Mind you, if the Minister of Veterans Affairs is kind enough and wise enough to accept the amendment which I offered yesterday, which would follow this benefit of the doubt section and would set out the presumption I had in mind, then the words in the benefit of the doubt section would mean something. They would then refer to the new presumptions section; my suggestion was that there should be a new section, 63-A, which would read:

In respect of an application for entitlement to pension arising out of world war II, there shall be a presumption that the condition of the member of the forces as recorded on his acceptance was in fact his condition at that time and that any subsequent deterioration during service was due to such service; subject to the provisos contained in paragraph (c) of subsection (1) of section 11 of this act.

These provisos are three in number: That the condition was obvious—as for instance if a man had a wooden leg and notwithstanding that was accepted; or that he had wilfully and deliberately concealed his condition; or that he had a condition which had been recorded on a medical examination prior to enlistment. Those are the three provisos to the proposed presumptions clause.

Mr. KNOWLES: I appreciate the force of the amendment which the hon. member is proposing, but it would not cover the kind of case to which I refer, many examples of which, I am sure, he himself is familiar with, namely, the veteran of world war I whose condition, for which he is now seeking pension, is a post-discharge and not a preenlistment condition. Either we need something more than the hon. member is proposing in his amendment, or we need to be assured that these words "and presumptions" in this clause mean something.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I just say a few words? My good friend the member for Vancouver South and I have debated this issue for two or three years, and we are not in agreement. I honestly think that section 62 of our act gives more of the benefit of the doubt to the veteran than any of these new presumption clauses adopted on the suggestion of one of the British ministers about two years ago. I honestly think that with this amendment, and the generous and sympathetic interpretation of the Canadian pension commission, the veterans will be very well considered. The adoption of the British system would be a definite handicap.

Mr. GREEN: In what way?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I believe it is narrower than ours. I may be wrong, but—

Mr. GREEN: No one suggests that we should cut out the benefit of the doubt section.

Mr. MACKENZIE: But my hon. friend last year suggested—

Mr. GREEN: I never suggested for a moment that the benefit of the doubt section be deleted.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I agree with that, but my hon. friend suggested that we adopt the language of the British system. We had a British officer before the committee the other day, and after listening to him there I say that they are far behind us in regard to the interpretation of the benefit of the doubt clause. We are miles ahead of them.

Mr. GREEN: I have his evidence here, which I will read.

Mr. MACKENZIE: My hon. friend and I have the same cause at heart, and I think he is impeding the end in view by not accepting the present suggestion.

Mr. FRASER: Reading this clause, I do not think it covers a case I know of where a man was taken into the service as A-1, medically examined and examined later at another depot. He was absolutely all right, A-1, right through for a year and a half, and later was discharged. This man now has sight only in one eye. The reason he has not had a pension is that, as the commission say, his trouble arose in infancy. Evidently the medical examiners when they examined him were in error. I had letters from the employers of this man as to his condition before he joined the service—I may say that he went in of his own free will—and they declare that he could not have done his work if he had had poor eyesight. At one time he was a weaver, weaving at night, and he could not have done that work with poor eyesight; yet the pension board say that according to their medical men his trouble was preenlistment. As I say, that man was taken in A-1 and is now discharged E-5, I believe. He is out on a limb without any chance of getting a pension. The commission say that he can engage a private eye specialist to check up on his case and pay for it himself; but that man, even with this clause, is no further ahead. With the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver South he would come in, and I maintain that he should, because he will go through the rest of his life with sight in one eye only, and in a few years' time he may not have any sight at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I say at once to my hon. friend that this government will never accept, so long as I am a member of it, the principle of fit for service, fit for pension. It is a principle which would be most detrimental to the people of Canada as a whole. We must be fair in these things, and we have been fair and generous. This government has been generous—no, I must not say the government, but this parliament has been generous—and we cannot accept that principle, in fairness to the taxpayers of the people of Canada. I will go on any platform in Canada and say so.

Mr. BENTLEY: Yesterday, when I made a short statement on behalf of the C.C.F. group here, with reference to the Pension Act, I pointed out that there were some things in respect to which we were not in agreement in the committee and that we would watch the operation of this act, be guided by our experience, and make recommendations at the next session. This is one of the things I had in mind when I made that statement. Like the member for Vancouver South, I remember quite well the discussions that took place in the committee on this particular question. There was a good deal of debate, and I remember the minister taking the same definite position he took a moment ago—and as a minister and a member of the government, it is his right to do so. His contention is that by adding the words "and presumptions" in section 63 of the act, as appears in section 30, it will give all the necessary benefits that the committee wanted in their discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is right.

Mr. BENTLEY: I do not agree with him, but this is one of the things we will watch. We will watch carefully to see how the cases stated by the member for Winnipeg North Centre and others are affected, and if this does not operate in their favour we will make our position definite when we find that it is so. I wish to make that position clear without further debate.

Mr. TUCKER: May I say a few words for the purpose of the record?—because I am afraid that, by reason of one or two specific cases that have been mentioned, a wrong impression may be created as to the manner in which the commission is handling the work. As at December 31, 1945, 7,810 members of the forces who had served in a theatre of actual war had been discharged and the commissioners ruled their conditions as pre-enlistment, not aggravated by service and consequently not pensionable. However, it should be brought to the attention of this committee that in 81 per cent of all disability claims by those discharged after service in a theatre of actual war, a favourable decision has been rendered.

Mr. BROOKS: When was that 81 per cent announced?

Mr. TUCKER: That was at December 31, 1945.

Mr. BROOKS: I understood it was 76 per cent.

Mr. TUCKER: It was 81 per cent at December 31, 1945.

Mr. BROOKS: I believe the evidence in the committee was 76 per cent.

Mr. TUCKER: That may be a different date. In regard to those discharged after service rendered in Canada, the commission ruled the condition preenlistment not aggravated by service in respect of 54,207. As to the extent of service, I think the committee should have some information. A substantial number or those who went overseas were returned after a short period of service and discharged for varying reasons: obesity, refractory errors, old age, and other conditions which obviously have no relation whatever to their service.

With regard to those whose service was wholly rendered in Canada—and I should like the committee to get these figures—12,145 were discharged with less than three months' service, 18,790 with less than six months' service, and 23,340 with less than one year's service, a total of 58,572 who were discharged as medically unfit with service of less than one year.

Mr. GREEN: These are not the same group as are in the 54,207?

Mr. TUCKER: No, I am not saying that, but I am saying that 58,572 were discharged with less than one year's service in Canada. We have said to all these people that if any disability arose during that service they get a pension in respect of it. That is just how far we have gone in our pension legislation. When it is considered that of those who saw service in a theatre of actual war, which means service anywhere outside of Canada, 81 per cent who have applied for pension as of December 31, 1945, have been conceded entitlement, the committee will have an indication of how generously the commission has approached this problem. I say that with no idea of giving credit to the government. The commission is operating under the statute, and I say that in fairness only to them. That is the purpose of it, and in justice to them I think every member of the committee would want me to say it.

Mr. GREEN: It must be remembered always that these men were accepted as fit for service. Of this number 7,810 went overseas. They were all accepted for service as fit men. They were trained in Canada and taken overseas. They broke down and were brought back to Canada, discharged as unfit and yet cannot qualify for a pension. These are the actual figures. The same thing applies to the 54,207 who saw service only in Canada. The minister has implied that we are asking for a change in the Pension Act to provide that if a person is fit for service he shall be fit for pension. Nothing is farther from our thoughts.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I did not say that.

Mr. GREEN: I am glad to know that the minister did not mean to go that far. Nothing is farther from our thoughts. All we are asking is that there shall be a presumption in favour of the man that if he is accepted as fit for service and his health breaks down while he is in the service, it was caused by service. It is merely a presumption which can be rebutted by the state. We believe that that will help at least some of these 60,000 cases, where men have lost their health in the forces of Canada and get no compensation for that deterioration.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is what is being done.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has said that the English system is not as good. Actually I hold in my hand the evidence given by the permanent secretary to the British ministry of pensions, Mr. Parker. He gave evidence on May 9, which can be found in No. 14 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the committee on veterans affairs. Mr. Parker pointed out first of all that in Great Britain they have the benefit of the doubt section, which is our section 62, and which, by the way, is now numbered 63. The British section reads:

In no case shall there be an onus on any claimant under this our warrant to prove the fulfilment of the conditions set out in paragraph (1) of this article, and the benefit of any reasonable doubt shall be given to the claimant.

In effect it is the same as our benefit of the doubt section. Mr. Parker explained that provision as follows:

On the second clause of that article dealing with the onus of proof, the position is that that article makes it clear that the onus is on the ministry to negative the claim; and to do that it requires evidence amounting, as the high court expressed it fairly recently, to a real preponderance of probability. That, I gather, is a rather legal form of phrase, but I think probably most of us understand what is in fact in mind.

Then Mr. Parker went on to read the presumption clause, and it is a clause of this type that should be written into the Canadian Pension Act. The particular clause reads as follows:

Where an injury or disease which has led to a member's discharge or death during war service was not noted in a medical report made on that member on the commencement of his war service, a certificate under paragraph (1) of this article shall be given—

That is a certificate of entitlement.

—unless the evidence shows that the conditions set out in that paragraph are not fulfilled.

He explained that in this way. He said:

If a man is accepted for service in a certain medical category, there is a presumption that at the time of his acceptance he was fit for the kind of service demanded of a man in that category, and that in the event of his discharge subsequently on medical grounds due to deterioration in his health there is a presumption that the deterioration was due to service.

Then he went on to show how the high court had interpreted that provision, and said:

They said that the presumption is not a compelling presumption but a provisional one, and that in order to defeat the claim the evidence had to show a real preponderance of probability—

That is the state's evidence.

—that the condition was not aggravated by war service. Put in other words, the presumption can be rebutted provided there is good and sufficient evidence to do it.

He was asked what was the reason for the British ministry of pensions adopting this presumption provision, and his answer was as follows:

There was a good deal of discussion in the in the House of Commons in 1943 on the provision in regard to war pensions. At the time the government went into the whole matter and they felt that to some extent the criticism was based on misunderstandings and to some extent the criticism had raised points which were worthy of consideration and modification. As a result of a very full review of the whole subject the government decided that in future the basis of entitlement should be expressed in the way in which I have read it to you. I think in further explanation of that all I can really say is that the government felt that expressing things as they did represented a fair deal for the man and a fair balance.

If a presumption of this kind were written into our law it might make the job of the Canadian pension commission more difficult, but here is a wrong to be righted. Here are men who have given their health for the country and are getting no compensation. That condition cannot be allowed to continue. If this presumption is written into the law, then it will be the responsibility of the commission to bring forward some proof that that man's loss of health was not due to his service. The navy, the army and the air force accepted these men, examined them most carefully, and in some instances kept them for years; they then got rid of them as unfit. There should be some presumption to protect a man who is in that position.

Mr. TUCKER: I shall read from the British changes in war pensions, presented by the ministry of pensions to parliament by command of His Majesty. Section 4 reads:

The existing warrant requires that disablement shall be either directly attributable to or materially aggravated by service.

That is the basis in the British warrant. They have to prove that the disablement was directly attributable to or materially aggravated by service.

Mr. MACKENZIE: A basic difference.

Mr. TUCKER: We do not require any such thing. We say that all they have to prove is that it arose during service. Naturally they should have something which carries a man a little farther when the only way in which he can get a pension is to be able to prove that his disability was attributable to service. We do not require any such rule at all. With us it may quite clearly not be due to service, but still the man gets a pension if the disability arises during service. I say, therefore, we do not need this presumption, because under our system the man gets the pension if the disability arose during service. Then my hon. friend goes on to suggest that in some way this presumption is stronger than the one we have. I should like to read from this publication of the British ministry of pensions. They say:

His Majesty's government accepts the view that the fact that a man is accepted for service in the present war in a certain medical category may be taken as presumptive evidence that (a) at the time of acceptance he was fit for the kind of service demanded of a man in that medical category;

Of course our pension commission naturally would presume that also.

Mr. GREEN: We have no such provision.

Mr. TUCKER: No, but they are interpreting the law; and they say if a man was taken into the service to drive a truck, they will assume he was able to do that or he would not have been brought in for that purpose. But they will hear other evidence. They go on to say:

(b) in the event of his being subsequently discharged on medical grounds any deterioration in his health which has taken place is due to his service. While the minister of pensions will pay regard to any other evidence—

Mark that. There is just a presumption that he was in a certain condition when he went into the service, and that any deterioration is due to his service; but they will pay attention to other evidence, weigh the thing and decide whether or not it is due to service. I leave it to any member of this committee whether he would change our system, under which a man does not have to prove that his disability was due to service at all, but simply that it occurred during service, for the British system, where they have a presumption that it was due to service but the medical people can come along and prove it was not, and then if it was incurred during service the man does not get a pension, as he does in Canada. Our rule is just as strong, and I think it is being interpreted by the Canadian pension commission just as generously as the rule in Britain is being interpreted by the ministry of pensions there.

Mr. MACKENZIE: More so.

[Mr. Tucker.]

Mr. TUCKER: In deference to the Canadian pension commission I hesitated to say more so, but I submit we can rely upon them to interpret it just as generously. This is the rule, and it is based upon the fact that it need not be proven that the disability was attributable or due to service. This has application to the question whether the disability occurred during service. We let them all in, whether or not it is due to service, if it arose during service. Then there is this further clause, which reads:

Notwithstanding anything in this act, on any application for pension the applicant shall be entitled to the benefit of the doubt, which shall mean that it shall not be necessary for him to adduce conclusive proof of his right to the pension applied for, but the body adjudicating on the claim shall be entitled to draw and shall draw from all the circumstances of the case—

Which I have just mentioned.

—the evidence adduced and medical opinions, all reasonable inferences in favour of the applicant.

I defy any person to look at these two sections and say the British provision is anything like as generous as our provision; and I say it is not fair to our pension law to make that suggestion.

Furthermore I understood the hon. member for Vancouver South to say that young men have given their health in the service of their country and are not getting pensions. That is a sweeping indictment of the pension commission. If a man lost his health through service to the country, under this act he is supposed to get a pension. When the hon. member says these young men who lost their health have been deprived of pensions, let me say that when the hon. member was attending our committee he never suggested that the pension committee was not doing its duty under the law. In other words he is making a sweeping indictment which is not borne out by any facts he brought before the committee.

I do not want to go into all the evidence heard by the committee. My hon. friend is suggesting that a decision was arrived at by the committee at one time, and later, after hearing further evidence, the committee arrived at another decision; and the decisions he has been reading to this house are not those which were reported by the committee, which after all are the decisions of the committee. He has been reading decisions which were reached from time to time during the proceedings before the committee. I know why the hon. member is doing this, and it is known to other hon. members of this house. On that committee were many very busy members of the government, parliamentary assistants, chairmen of other committees and so on. They were not able to attend the sittings of our committee continuously, but they had a right to their opinions on these matters, and they had a right to vote on them. When my hon. friend tries to suggest that the opinion of the committee was something different from what was reported, he is trying to deprive those people of the right to have their recorded opinions recognized. If we are going to get anywhere, Mr. Chairman, surely we must go according to the recorded opinion of the committee, as finally reported to this house. Any attempt to say that what we reported to this house was not the opinion of the committee I submit is making a nullity of what we tried to do. After all, if we are to sit there and discuss these matters and reach certain decisions, and then have hon. members get up and say: "Oh, but on another occasion something different was done; on another occasion some other thing was decided", what in the world is the use of making reports to parliament? If we are to have all these things read from the proceedings of the committee, before we came to a final report, it opens up the possibility of considering all our discussions, and I think the committee will agree that we cannot hope to retrace all the steps that were taken in that committee. So I urge my hon. friend not to represent to the house that the committee decided certain things, without adding that later on they decided to report to the house the relevant section in exactly the form in which the final report was made. This is the report of the committee on veterans affairs, as made to this house.

Mr. GREEN: The government members.

Mr. TUCKER: My hon. friend has no right to say that.

Mr. GREEN: It was the government members of the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Even the government members have a right to speak in the committee.

Mr. TUCKER: Does my hon. friend suggest that government members have no right to express an opinion in committee? It was the opinion of government members that this provision was just as good as anything suggested by my hon. friend. In that we were borne out by the disinterested advice of the Canadian pension commission, which said that this suggested amendment would not enable them to do a better job for the soldier; and I think this house is entitled to pay some attention to that advice. It was on this, I think, that the government members may have acted, and I believe there was nothing very wrong in their accepting the advice of people of the standing of the Canadian pension commission.

Mr. GREEN: The parliamentary assistant has gone pretty far. He has almost suggested that I was trying to mislead the house, though I do not suppose he meant that. I know he has a way of showing more heat than light sometimes.

Mr. TUCKER: We all have our faults, and I do not pretend to be without them.

Mr. GREEN: We found that out on different occasions in the committee. Here, however, he is overlooking one fact, that in connection with this particular recommendation, when the committee passed the proposed presumption clause it was unanimous. It was not a question of a majority and a minority; they were unanimous.

Mr. TUCKER: Where is that stated in the proceedings?

Mr. GREEN: When the government decided they did not want that—

Mr. TUCKER: Will the hon. member say where that is stated in the proceedings?

Mr. GREEN: At page 752; and other hon. members will substantiate what I have said.

Mr. TUCKER: Does it say it was unanimous?

Mr. GREEN: It does not say so, but that was the fact. Now when the parliamentary assistant suggests that it was changed, by government members, mind you, who had not been there at the time the section was considered, he is stretching the point rather far.

Mr. TUCKER: Is that not true?

Mr. GREEN: Then he himself expressed an opinion about this presumption. I would refer to page 752 of the proceedings of the committee, where I find the following:

> Mr. Tucker: I may say that as long as it does not lead to misleading people, as Mr. Quelch has agreed with me in saying that it might, I do not think this will do any particular harm. So far as I can see, there is no harm in carrying it, as long as it is quite clear that it will not mislead anybody. Of course, if it is carried, naturally the pension commission people will study it and see if the section that is referred to is comprehensive enough to really cover it. In other words, they will have a chance to look into it.

He has said that the government is opposing this stand to-day on the advice of the pension commission. On this question the advice should go from the house to the pension commission, rather than the other way round. Here is the fact, that 60,000 men in our forces have been discharged as unfit, though they were taken in as fit. The parliamentary assistant has made no explanation of how their position is to be improved. He is not suggesting for a minute that these men can get a pension or any compensation now. They cannot, under the law as it stands to-day.

Mr. TUCKER: Is the hon. member arguing that where a disabling condition was neither due to service nor incurred through service, and when a man has come out in just as good condition as when he went in, he should still get pension?

Mr. GREEN: That is not the case at all. Nobody is trying to argue that.

Mr. TUCKER: That is the finding of the commission.

Mr. GREEN: We argue that where a man comes out in unfit condition but went in in fit condition there should be a presumption that such deterioration in his condition was caused by his service. It is true that the state can overcome that presumption by bringing in other evidence. Nobody is asking to make it open and shut, or that a man must get a pension if he is discharged. All we are asking is that there should be a presumption in his favour, that the state, having taken him in as being in fit condition, then having used him for whatever length of time he was in the forces, and having discharged him as unfit, must show that that loss of health was not due to his service. As the parliamentary assistant himself said in the committee proceedings, he could see no harm in that presumption.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is being done.

Mr. GREEN: I cannot understand why the minister and his parliamentary assistant are so firm in their refusal to have a presumption of this type written into the law.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We have it now.

Mr. GREEN: They keep saying, "We have it now"; but the proof that we do not have it now lies in the fact that 60,000 men can get no compensation.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Proof we have it is that we have the most generous system in the whole world.

Mr. GREEN: Oh, that is old talk.

Mr. TUCKER: To place the facts on the record, the commission said there were 54,207 not granted entitlement after service in Canada only because the preenlistment condition was not aggravated by service. In other words those 54,207 did not get pensions because they suffered from a preenlistment condition which was not aggravated through service. Those men were in just as good shape when they came out as when they went in.

Mr. GREEN: That is ridiculous.

Mr. TUCKER: That was the decision of the commission in those cases.

Mr. GREEN: It was not, at all.

Mr. TUCKER: Yes, it was. It was based upon that—the preenlistment condition was not aggravated.

Mr. GREEN: That is like the case brought up by the hon. member for Yorkton.

Mr. TUCKER: That is their decision. If the hon. member says that decision is wrong, then all he is saying is that the pension commission is not enforcing the law.

Mr. GREEN: I am saying the law is not right.

Mr. TUCKER: The law says that you give a pension if a man is suffering from disability due to service or incurred during service. The pension commission have to enforce that law, and they have found that when a man came out in just as good shape as when he went in they have no right to give him a pension. That applied to the 54,207 men.

Mr. GREEN: How on earth does the parliamentary assistant make the statement that these 54,207 who applied for pension because of disabilities are just as fit when they come out as when they went in?

Mr. TUCKER: That is the finding of the commission; that is why they did not get pensions.

Mr. GREEN: Why were they let in?

Mr. TUCKER: Oh, that is another matter. That is the "fit for service, fit for pension" principle, which my hon. friend said he would not favour. Then he asks how they got in, and says that if they got in they are therefore entitled to pension.

Mr. GREEN: I did not say that at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is the logical conclusion from your argument.

Mr. TUCKER: That is what is meant by your argument, there is no doubt about it. These decisions were arrived at with this benefit of the doubt right in the act. And if you say that thousands of the 54,207 who were ruled not entitled to pension because they had a preenlistment condition which was not aggravated, are suffering from service, you are impeaching in a sweeping way the work of the commission.

Mr. GREEN: We say the law is not right.

Mr. TUCKER: That was not borne out by the evidence before the committee.

Mr. QUELCH: I have no intention of debating this question over again. However I would lay emphasis on one point, and that is that it was the opinion of the committee, as represented by members who sat through the committee hearings consistently from beginning to end, who listened to the evidence of the pension commission, the legion and other bodies, that paragraph (c) of section 11 (1) had not operated satisfactorily, and that the benefit of the doubt provision was not working satisfactorily. It was as a consequence of evidence heard, and through experience, that certain amendments to the act were moved. The presumption provision was inserted, and the words "wilfully concealed" were taken out of paragraph (c). Then when the government decided they were not satisfied with those amendments they brought in the rest of their members in order to outvote us. The point is that those members brought in by the government had not listened to the evidence of the commissioners or of the legion. They were merely voting the way they were asked to vote by the government. Therefore the hon. member for Vancouver South was sound in his statement that the real desire of the committee was to pass the amendments as put in the first place.

Mr. MUTCH: This is one place where every man should speak for himself. I shall try not to do more than that. I doubt if any member of the committee attended more meetings than I did. I am glad the committee of the whole has had this opportunity to debate the subject, because some of us went through 1,600 pages of it—discussion very similar to what we have had to-day.

When this suggestion was first made by the hon. member for Vancouver South, who, when he keeps his temper, is always plausible, I was one who at the time could see no difficulty in it. As he was careful to point out last night, I was the person who at a later meeting moved that the paragraph be changed to its present form. I have no apology to make for the fact that I made that motion in committee, reversing my former position. In my experience I have found that on numerous occasions I have had to change my mind, and perhaps even then sometimes I have been wrong. However after mature consideration most of us can bring better judgment to a question. So far as I am concerned, I have heard the evidence, and as a result of further information and representations made by members of the pension commission—particularly the chairman—I became convinced, as I am still convinced—just as I am prepared to give the hon. member for Vancouver South credit for being convinced of his position—that I should change my mind on it. To suggest that I simply changed my vote because other members were brought in who had not been there before is unfair. The committee, in the fifty-two meetings it held, had perfect knowledge in advance of any suggested amendment from those who were not government members of the committee. There were always benches filled from end to end—and quite properly—and when an amendment was produced by the opposition, once it was either accepted or defeated the chairs were then emptied until the next amendment came along. There was no monopoly of absenteeism on the part of the government party in the committee.

This whole debate sounds as if we were sitting in a session two years from now, instead of to-day. I am not a professional veteran, and I carry no torch for the minister or his parliamentary assistant, who are able to look after themselves. But I was one who listened and agreed, listened more and then disagreed; and I am still in the position I was when I suggested that this clause be put in its present form.

Mr. PROBE: I listened carefully to the meticulous and often repeated statements of the parliamentary assistant as to the way in which this provision is working out.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs stated a few moments ago, that it was definitely not a part of Liberal policy to treat veterans on the basis of "fit for service fit for pension". Leaving aside cases often in dispute with respect to the way in which the injury or disablement occurred during service, about which I think most of us have received many letters, may I refer to the preenlistment situation.

This government did during the course of the war take the stand that we were going to have a volunteer army, and it was a matter of considerable pride overseas and elsewhere that ours was not a conscript army. Of course—I know that our boys were not shanghaied into enlisting in the old pirate sense or anything of the kind, but it is debatable whether the enlistments were on a one-hundred per cent purely volunteer basis.

The CHAIRMAN: May I remind the hon. member that we are discussing clause 30, dealing with the benefit of the doubt. I would ask him to confine his remarks to that section.

Mr. PROBE: That is the very point on which I wish to elaborate, Mr. Chairman. The government has an onus in the matter of giving the benefit of the doubt which goes back to the time when the veteran was a civilian and was first accepted into the forces. In order to make a good record of recruitments—and I was a recruiting officer too, as many other members were—I think it is beyond all doubt that the examination of volunteers as they came into the forces was not as thorough as the examination that is made when the men are applying for pension. I think all will agree on that. When a man came into the service the medical inspection was straight routine. The questions put to the men were often mumbled and the answers noted in such a way that the recruit would be given a clean bill of health provided that nothing organically wrong was obvious. Whether you were a medical man or not you could have inspected and passed many of these recruits. So undoubtedly in our anxiety to appear a one hundred per cent volunteer force, we accepted recruits who perhaps had physical disabilities which, while not obvious and of a kind which in civilian life might have lain dormant for years, came to the surface after a few weeks' hard drilling.

Just the other day many members of the house must have seen parading around our buildings a man of the type to which I refer, bearing a placard. He was accepted for enlistment in London, Ontario, according to the documents on his person, on January 17, 1941, and was discharged on April 9 of the same year, after only a few months' service. One might say that that man should never have been accepted for Canada's volunteer army. But what are the facts? His documents show that he reenlisted on May 18, 1941 and was discharged fourteen months afterwards, on July 23, 1942. He was struck off strength as unable to meet the required physical requirements. He was a volunteer. He did not leave Canada. He was, in my non-medical opinion, of the neurotic type. I do not want to say that I am a medical expert, but I have no doubt that this man can not meet the physical requirements, at the present time at least. Someone advised him, or perhaps he got the idea himself, that he should get a pension. He applied for one and was turned down by the commission. Possibly his case was one of enlistment under false colours; I am not prepared to say. I have written to get the documents. All I know about his condition is what appeared on the documents on his person. I feel that the government has an obligation to this man because in its anxiety to make a good volunteer record it accepted him as being in category A-1 and fit for service. After enlistment he deteriorated rapidly, as many of them did, and in three or four months he was discharged. Here was a man who was accepted so that our record of volunteer enlistments might be maintained—at least that is the purpose I see back of this enlisting and reenlisting. Therefore the government must assume an obligation for the physical deterioration of such men, and it is the duty of this House of Commons to make a recommendation to the pension commission that they take that into consideration.

I might cite the case of a man in my battery who to my personal knowledge was injured. For a year and a half I fought his case, along with other members of the house, before he got a 30 per cent pension for his disability. The machinery is not quite as well oiled and smoothly running as the hon. member for Rosthern would lead us to believe, and there are other hon. members who know that. For that reason I am not in favour of the wording of this section.

Section agreed to.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Chairman, before we deal with section 31 I move:

That the bill be amended by adding as section 30A thereof the following:

The said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following section:

63A. In respect of an application for entitlement to pension, arising out of world war II there shall be a presumption that the condition of the member of the forces as recorded on his acceptance was in fact his condition at that time and that any subsequent deterioration during service was due to such service; subject to the provisos contained in paragraph (c) of subsection (1) of section 11 of this act.

I have already made my position perfectly clear, and I will say nothing further at this time in support of this amendment.

Mr. TUCKER: If this amendment means anything at all, and I understand the hon. gentleman contends that it does, it means a possible increase in the charge on the public purse, not necessarily and inevitably, but conceivably; therefore, Mr. Chairman, I submit that it is out of order because it has not received the approval of His Excellency.

Mr. GREEN: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I suppose one could argue the other way, that if it does not mean anything in the opinion of the parliamentary assistant, it is perfectly in order. However, this amendment would insert just the same type of section as the benefit of the doubt section, which is not a section involving the expenditure of public funds, but is in the nature of a direction to the pension commission that in considering applications they shall bear in mind this presumption. That is as far as the amendment goes. It is not a matter involving the expenditure of funds at all, and I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that it is perfectly in order.

Mr. QUELCH: On the point of order, I should like to emphasize the fact that both the minister and the parliamentary assistant have insisted that this will not bring about any change, any improvement, and if that is true it cannot mean any increase of expenditure. On the other hand, a number of us feel that if it does nothing else it will at least give a certain amount of moral support to the pension commission to exercise a wider latitude in handling these cases.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I did not have the privilege of sitting in at any meetings of the parliamentary committee on veterans affairs, and for my own information I should like to have a clarification of what the minister has said. I brought to the attention of the veterans affairs committee a year ago the situation of a veteran of the two great wars, a case which, I understand, had been fought by the Canadian Legion to get a pension for this particular man. The man went into the last war in category A and came out in category E, and not until recently have we been able, with the help of another hon. member, to get any sort of pension for this veteran. Unless some changes have been made in the act whereby disability incurred during service, such as reduces a man from A to E category, entitles him to a pension, I for one am entirely against this legislation.

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Chairman, just to put it as briefly as possible, the Pension Act provides that if a disability is due to service it is pensionable; if it arises during service it is pensionable; if there is an aggravation of a condition which a man had when he went into the service, and he has had service in a theatre of actual war, and the disability was not obvious, wilfully concealed, or recorded on medical examination prior to enlistment, he not only gets pension for the disability in respect of the aggravation but he gets it in respect of the entire disability. Of course that does not apply in respect of service in Canada only. If he did not serve in a theatre of actual war he gets the pension in respect of the disability, or the aggravation of the disability, as the case may be, to the extent that there is an aggravation. That is putting it, I think, as simply as I can.

Now, in interpreting whether the disability arose during service or was due to service, we have the section which is in dispute to-day. The way it was worded before was:

> Notwithstanding anything in this act, on any application for pension the applicant shall be entitled to the benefit of the doubt, which shall mean that it shall not be necessary for him to adduce conclusive proof of his right to the pension applied for, but the body adjudicating on the claim shall be entitled to draw and shall draw from all the circumstances of the case, the evidence adduced and medical opinions, all reasonable inferences in favour of the applicant.

That made the language as explicit, perhaps, as the English language could make it, that if there was any doubt whether this disability was incurred during service or was due to service, or the aggravation was incurred during service or was due to service, the applicant was to get the benefit of the doubt. I really do not see how it could have been made much plainer; but in deference to the committee and in accordance with what the hon. member for Vancouver South—

Mr. GREEN: That is not what we asked for.

Mr. TUCKER: —in order to make it doubly plain we added the words "and presumptions":

> all reasonable inferences and presumptions in favour of the applicant.

If an enlisted man was to drive a truck there would be a presumption that he was able to drive a truck.

Mr. GREEN: Why did you not put it in the bill, then?

Mr. TUCKER: It is in there already. The only thing I can draw from the hon. member's suggestion is this: we say to-day that according to the best opinion of the Canadian pension board, every man who suffered a disability which was due to service or incurred during service or was aggravated during service is getting a pension in respect of the disability. Some hon. members may say, "I know of a case where I do not think that has happened".

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): There is one right here.

Mr. TUCKER: Yes, the hon. member for Kootenay East has a case which he feels is very strong. I happen to be a lawyer; I have been on one side or the other in various cases, and I have had decisions of the appeal court of our province, and I am just as strongly convinced to-day that they were wrong as I was at the time I fought the case. But the decision of that appeal court had to be accepted by me as correct.

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member is not casting any reflection, is he?

Mr. TUCKER: If you ask the commission to adjudicate on a close case you are going to have differences of opinion. That is inevitable; you cannot avoid it. And in order to be sure that the pension commission knew the will of parliament that they should give every benefit of the doubt to the man we put in "and presumptions" in addition to "inferences". As I said before, this is a change in the law, and I would expect that in these doubtful cases the Canadian pension commission would feel that parliament was emphasizing this point, and would review these cases in the light of the change in the act to see if their decisions were in line with that change.

My hon. friend is saying that he thinks some people are not getting a pension who should have it under the act as it stands to-day. If that is so, if he is moving an amendment which will grant a pension to somebody who did not incur disability during service, or where—

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, the parliamentary assistant is now trying to make a second argument on the point of order; he is completely out of order himself, and I suggest that you give your ruling.

Mr. TUCKER: I was just going to conclude the argument.

Mr. GREEN: He is just trying to make a second argument on the point of order.

Mr. TUCKER: Well, I do not wish to press it.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member for Rosthern has answered the question of the hon. member for Assiniboia, and he should not renew or add to his argument on the point of order.

I will give my ruling on the point of order. The question has been raised whether or not the amendment would involve an expenditure of money. I have listened to the arguments since the committee assembled this afternoon; and it has been represented that 60,000 members of the armed forces have been discharged as unfit, although taken in as fit. It has further been represented to the committee that 54,207 have been discharged whose present condition was not aggravated through service.

Mr. GREEN: Those are part of the 60,000.

The CHAIRMAN: Obviously the purpose of the amendment is to bring in a large class of former members of the armed forces, some of whom would under the amendment be entitled to pension, and that would involve an expenditure of money. I think that is very clear, and I have no other course to pursue than to declare the motion out of order, since it would involve an expenditure of money and for that reason can be moved only by a minister of the crown, with the approval of His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. GREEN: I thank you for the ruling, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment would at least have been effective.

Mr. KNOWLES: With regard to section 30, may I ask the parliamentary assistant to clear up what I thought was a bit of confusion he created a moment ago. Earlier this afternoon he and the minister both said that the purpose of the addition of the words "and presumptions" was to make a change and to broaden the meaning of the section; but a moment ago he introduced another idea, namely, that the purpose is simply to make doubly clear the meaning already there. It can hardly be both, and I should like to have it categorically stated now that the purpose of these words is to broaden the meaning of the section.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Our understanding of the present section 62, now 63, is that, interpretatively, it is the most generous section in regard to the benefit of the doubt, but the committee felt that this addition should be made, and possibly it might broaden the section. But it will never widen the sympathetic and generous interpretation of the Canadian pension commission, because they are going as far as they can now.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is, however, the clear intention that the addition of these two words is to make possible the review of some cases formerly denied.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Will the minister undertake to say that the addition of the words "and presumptions" in 63 gives us an assurance that veterans' cases in the future will not be delayed for three or four years, as has been my experience in the past? It should be clarified to that extent. Further, would the evidence of a civilian doctor be taken regarding the medical status of a veteran applying for pension?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I can give my hon. friend the assurance that there will be no delay in these cases. Let him look over the record for the past six months, and he will find that it has been unequalled anywhere.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 30 carry?

An hon. MEMBER: On division.

Section agreed to.

Sections 31 and 32 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

VETERANS UNEMPLOYABLE THROUGH DISABILITY—WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE BOARD

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of bill No. 331, respecting allowances for war veterans and dependents.

Mr. C. C. I. MERRITT (Vancouver-Burrard): There are a few words which I wish to say respecting the War Veterans Allowance Act. This is an act under which allowances are paid to veterans of the first great war, of the preceding wars, and now of course of this war, who have reached the age of sixty, or, in the case of a female, the age of fifty-five, or, third, who in the opinion of the war veterans allowance board are permanently unemployable because of physical or mental disability or who are incapable of or unlikely to become capable of maintaining themselves because of economic handicaps combined with mental or physical inability.

The act has been in force since 1930 and has done a great deal of good for veterans of the first war who have reached an advanced age or who because of war service have become incapable of earning their living.

The present bill not only makes some slight changes in the procedure under the former act but incorporates in its provisions the dual service pension order which was enacted by order in council during the war and which enables the allowance to be granted to certain veterans, who served in both wars, I and II, and who thus have given a considerable period of their life to the armed forces of their country.

On the motion for second reading I shall refer briefly to the outstanding omission from the bill, the omission from the provisions, both of the original part and of the dual service part, of veterans whom we all know as imperials, that is, Canadians who served in the armed forces of His Majesty other than Canadian armed forces in the first great war. Many of these soldiers came to Canada immediately following the war, settled in Canada and became Canadians. The migration continued until about 1930, when it was considerably dried up because of the depression. But there are in Canada a very large number of imperial veterans who are Canadian citizens and who are deprived of the benefit of the act simply because they did not happen to be living in Canada at the time they enlisted in the armed forces in 1914 or in any of the subsequent years. According to an estimate of the board, the actual number who would be affected were they brought under the act would be 4,639.

I simply wish to point out one or two things in this regard, and I do not wish to labour the question, because the cause of the imperial veterans has been fought and brought before this government for many years. Many of these imperial veterans have been Canadians now for twenty-six years—Canadians in every sense, for a whole generation—and most of them for more than fifteen years. They have been taxpayers for that length of time. Some of them were soldiers of the first war, and many of them soldiers of both wars. They are the fathers of Canadian servicemen who served in Canada's armed forces, the navy, the army, and the air force in the second war. They have been Canadian producers for a generation. They have been contributing to Canada's wealth, strength and prosperity for all that time. Recently, they have become Canadians by law under the Canadian Citizenship Act. Every hon. member welcomed that act and thought that it represented a new advance. Only a few short weeks since the passage with great eclat of that act we find that Canadians, all of them for sixteen years and many of them for twenty-six years, are not to be considered Canadians when it comes to benefits under veterans' legislation. They are not considered Canadians although in the case of the dual service pension they have actually served in Canada's armed forces in the second great war. All of these men served in a common cause in an actual theatre of war in the forces of His Majesty, and yet in Canada they are deprived of the benefit of these allowances, although other Canadians who served in the Canadian forces of His Majesty are given these benefits, and rightly so, because their services have been as great and because of their present need.

The reasons given by the minister for refusing to admit the imperial veterans when the matter was raised in the committee and was voted upon were two. He said that our veterans' legislation was based upon a great principle; that people coming within its scope must have been domiciled and resident in Canada before they entered the armed forces.

The second reason was that our first duty lay to Canadians. By that I take it he meant people who were Canadians before they started to serve.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is right.

Mr. MERRITT: Surely, Mr. Speaker, the question of the domicile or the residence of a man when he enters the forces of His Majesty cannot be the great principle which must be the background of entitlement to benefit. The domicile or residence of a British subject, of a soldier of His Majesty, is an incidental thing. If we want a principle upon which to base such legislation surely the important thing is not the fact of twenty-six or thirty years ago, but the present fact that they are now Canadians and that they served His Majesty in the common cause about which we all talk so much in this enlightened year of 1946.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Will my hon. friend permit an interruption? Is there not an essential right inherent in Canadians who were domiciled here before they served His Majesty?

Mr. MERRITT: Of course there is an inherent right in such Canadians, but does that exclude the inherent right of Canadians who served His Majesty before they were domiciled in Canada but have now been Canadians for twenty-six years?

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I interrupt again?

Mr. MERRITT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Does not my hon. friend think that the essential right of Canadians as Canadians should be observed before the rights of those who come to our country afterwards are observed?

Mr. MERRITT: My answer to the minister would be that the essential rights of Canadians are observed.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, they are not. Take the War Veterans Allowance Act. Canadians who served in England are absolutely ignored.

Mr. GREEN: They were not under fire; that is why.

Mr. MERRITT: I was waiting for the minister to bring that up, because just before I moved a motion in the committee to include the imperials within the scope of this legislation I moved that the Canadians who served in England but who did not serve in an actual theatre of war should be also included. In stating that the government could not accept that amendment, the minister, as I understood him, gave as the basis for his refusal, first that many of the people to whom I referred were draftees in the last war, and second, the question of expense. Is not that correct?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I do not think so.

Mr. BROOKS: These two points were brought out and argued.

Mr. MERRITT: Therefore in arguing the case for the imperial veterans at least I am free from any charge of inconsistency.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I hate to interrupt my hon. friend, but if I had my way all Canadians who served in Canada and in England in the last war should be entitled to war veterans' allowance. Once you establish that principle, which is a measure of social security, the imperials would be looked after at once.

Mr. MERRITT: I did not want to speak as long as I have spoken. All I can say is that I do not see eye to eye with the minister in any way on this point. If you want a high principle upon which to found benefits for Canadians who have served His Majesty, then you have it in the service which was given to His Majesty in a common cause. You could not have a higher principle than that.

Let me show the house how this domicile and residence principle as the only principle upon which to found this legislation leads the government into strange inconsistencies. I hold in my hand bill 328, respecting veterans of the forces allied with Canada. This bill goes on the principle that if you are domiciled and resident here, no matter what your citizenship may be, no matter what your business in the country may be, you can get Canadian benefits. I find that an alien domiciled, resident and earning his living in Canada before the war can get benefits in so far as they exceed benefits of his own country, not if he served in the forces of His Majesty, but if he served in the forces of any one of the allied nations in the second war.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Only if he was domiciled in Canada before he served.

Mr. MERRITT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is the important principle.

Mr. MERRITT: That is what I said. I am showing how this great principle which the minister adheres to leads him into strange errors. A soldier of His Majesty and a Canadian citizen for twenty-six years cannot get the war veterans' allowance because he was not domiciled and resident in Canada when he enlisted. But an American who joined the forces of his own country, not when we went to war but when the United States went to war; who never served His Majesty but who now returns to Canada; who has not taken and does not intend to take out Canadian citizenship papers, can get the benefits of our legislation while the imperial soldier cannot.

I might go farther in connection with this matter of aliens who benefit under our laws and refer to the principle I have enunciated, that there was service to His Majesty by Canadians in a common cause. Here, however, we have no service to His Majesty, no Canadian citizenship, and it was not even realized by these people who will be benefited that there was a common cause at all until after their own country joined the fight against Germany. Until that time there was not even a recognition of any common cause by these people. I am not arguing the question of bringing these aliens within the provisions of the law; that was all gone over in the committee. From those proceedings, however, it is quite clear that when the government introduced bill No. 328 they were aware of the point I am now raising and they deliberately put it aside, admitting these non-Canadians, while not admitting Canadians who, to my way of thinking, are very much more entitled to the benefit of veterans legislation.

I want to conclude by pointing out how much stronger, if possible, the case I am making is for the admission of imperials to the benefits of the dual service pensions order which is now brought into this act. At the present time a Canadian who was domiciled in Canada and who served in His Majesty's Canadian forces in both world wars comes within the provisions of that order. In addition, a person who was domiciled in Canada and who served during world war I as an imperial, and who became a member of His Majesty's Canadian forces during world war II comes within the provisions of the dual service pensions order. So that we have excluded from the provisions of that order those imperials who had not migrated to Canada before the end of the last war, but who may have been here for twenty-six years, are now Canadians, and who, for the past five or six years, have served in Canada's armed forces. Surely they would have been brought within the provisions of the dual service order if it had not been apparent to the minister that to bring them into that class would necessitate bringing them into the first class as well, and as a result he has excluded them from both.

I shall say no more; I did not want to speak this long, because this case has been argued many times previously. There may have been some justification before the last war for not bringing in these people, some of whom would not have been in Canada for more than nine or ten years before 1939. In the committee I moved that all those imperials who had been resident in Canada on and since September 1, 1930, should be brought within the provisions of this important legislation, but my motion was negatived. That is a suggestion I want to make to the minister even at this late date. I say to him, with all the emphasis at my command, that if he does not bring in these Canadian citizens—these men who have given such great service to His Majesty—it will be a shame which will long blot the history of veterans legislation in this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I want to say just one word to my hon. friend. Naturally he is listened to in this house with great admiration and great esteem in reference to veterans affairs. I have had occasion to reflect upon this question for many years; I must insist upon the position I have recommended to the administration from time to time, that until all our own Canadians are looked after, those who served in Canada and those who served in England and elsewhere, in regard to veterans allowances, we cannot and should not consider the claims of those who came to this country afterwards, no matter how gallantly and how splendidly they served His Majesty; and I am speaking as one who was born in the old land. The first duty of Canadians is to look after the interests of Canadians.

Mr. MERRITT: If the minister will permit me a question, are these men not now Canadians in every sense of the word?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, but the essential principle governing all these bills was domicile in Canada before the first great war.

Mr. GREEN: The essential requirement for war veterans allowance is service under fire.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Service in a theatre of war, plus certain emendations in regard to those entitled to small pensions.

Mr. BROOKS: And England was not a theatre of war in the first great war.

Mr. TUCKER: That is correct.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I wish to speak briefly in reference to one phase of this bill, and I imagine the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) is well aware of the phase to which I shall direct my remarks. As he knows, one of the first struggles in which I joined when I came to this parliament was on behalf of the widows of veterans of the first great war. I am glad to see that our good friend the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) has come into the chamber. Everyone will recall the part he played in this struggle, and no doubt he will have something to say to-day as well. One of the requests made for the past three years by those speaking on behalf of veterans' widows was that the special allowance which has been voted from year to year, and the provisions that have been made by order in council, should be given permanent effect by statute. That has been done in the bill now before the house, and I refer particularly to part II. For that action those concerned will be deeply grateful, but I feel that I must express their disappointment that this is all that has been done. These women, whose representatives are well known to many hon. members, were earnestly hoping that as a result of their appearance before the special committee on veterans affairs, and as a result of the consideration given this matter by that committee, there would be other changes and that some of their other requests would be implemented.

The matter, of course, which is of greatest concern to them has to do with the amount of the allowance, which is still fixed at $365 a year for a widow without child or children, and $730 for a widow with children. I realize that when one expresses disappointment that the amount is not larger, that involves a reference to the amount paid to veterans themselves under another section of the bill. My hope was that both amounts might have been increased. For the moment I speak only with reference to the widows, because I desire particularly to draw attention to their situation.

Speaking particularly of the older women who are widows of veterans of the last war, I insist that it is not good enough to ask them to live on a maximum of $30.41 a month. I know all the arguments offered one way and another, including that which states that one cannot ask that a great deal be done for these women until sufficient has been done for other classes. I have never been impressed by that argument. It seems to me it only strengthens the case for implementing at an early date other measures of social security that are long overdue.

The simple fact is that by this legislation we are asking these widows of men who served in the last war to be satisfied with $30.41 a month. The matter was placed before the committee by the women themselves, and the minister is well aware of their request for an amount of $40 a month. If it were in order I would move such an amendment, but I realize that in doing so I would not be in order. I hope, however, that the government will not regard this bill as the last word on the subject, but that we might soon have an increase in this amount from $365 to at least $480 a year.

These women have made the further request that in the drawing of this measure they be included for hospitalization, and have expressed their disappointment that such a provision has not been made.

Another angle of the matter which affects many of these women is closely related to the observations of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt) concerning the section dealing with a theatre of actual war. As the minister knows, the husbands of many of these widows, although volunteers in the last war, saw service only in England. Upon the death of the husband, without a pension or any other means it is just as difficult for a widow in this class to get along as it would be for those widows whose husbands saw service on the continent of Europe. Here again I express disappointment and urge upon the government that further consideration be given the matter, with the thought that even this year, certainly not later than next, the basis for these payments might be enlarged.

The discussion to which we have just listened respecting imperial veterans has its counterpart in widows in Canada of imperial veterans who have been able to leave no other provision for those widows. Their plight, too, deserves consideration.

There are other matters about which I could speak, such as the application of the means test, but they are more in the nature of details, and I shall not discuss them until we reach sections 7 and 8 of the bill in committee. At this moment, however, when we are discussing the principle of the bill I would express pleasure that we have now moved from the order in council stage to the stage of definite legislation on behalf of these women, but would express keen disappointment that that is the only change proposed by the bill before us.

This group of women is not a large one. They feel, and I share their view, that the fact they are not large makes it difficult for them to receive consideration. Their battle began several years before I came to the house, although I knew of their efforts. The sort of thing they had to do to obtain recognition was pitiful. At long last, three years ago, they were given recognition through an order in council permitting an allowance beginning at $20 a month. I am thinking now particularly of the widows of veterans who served in the last war, but the day will come when these provisions will apply to the widows of those who served in the second war. These groups of widows are small, but their battle is not yet over and I say their rights should have more complete recognition than they have received thus far.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I believe the War Veterans Allowance Act is a good piece of legislation. It has been well administered in the past and, having some knowledge of the confines of the act, I believe the interpretation has been liberal.

We are now making certain amendments to the old act which should make it possible to deal with veterans more adequately in the future than we have done in the past. Had we removed the means test from the Old Age Pensions Act, I have no doubt it would have been possible to have removed it from this one. However, that was not done.

I believe the allowance for a veteran's income is liberal. He is allowed to have an interest in a home up to $4,000, cash in the bank up to $1,500 and an income of $250 plus $125 casual earnings, without any deduction. One criticism I would make is that the government might very well have included the $250 of income with the $125 of casual earnings so that the veteran could have received $375 of income, without any deduction being made. This would involve only a small amount of money, and would save a great deal of confusion in dealing with those two different types of income.

There is no doubt that in the past this act has been a godsend to many veterans, and I have no doubt it will continue to be so in the future, and will help those who are in bad financial circumstances.

Perhaps I might say a word or two respecting imperials. I should like to see war veterans allowances given not only to imperials but to the nationals of all those countries which fought with us in the last war. On the other hand, I believe the matter must be dealt with on a reciprocal basis until, as the minister has said, such time as we can get the war veterans allowances for all Canadians who served both in England and in Canada.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, it is not often a member on the opposite side of the house considers it his duty to say a kindly word to a minister. I am happy on this occasion to do so. In the seventeen years I have been a member, and have known the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), I have always found him to be a fighter for the rights of veterans. Perhaps he has not always got what he wanted; perhaps he has not always given what the opposition asked, but I believe his heart was always in the right place. One such illustration is found in the case mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

I might say, in passing, that in attending committee meetings at various hours of the day we have been worked almost off our feet. My delay in coming to the house this afternoon was occasioned by my attendance before the committee on Indian affairs where, I believe, I am doing good work.

From the very beginning the Minister of Veterans Affairs has favoured giving consideration to the widows of those veterans who were wounded, returned home and made recovery, but who did not receive pensions sufficient to enable the government, on their passing, to grant pensions to their widows. The minister took hold of the matter right away. I found him from the very beginning strong for giving relief by way of pension to the widows of soldiers who died without sufficient pension to warrant their widows receiving pension. While I have not read the bill, I heard the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre say that they are to receive $1 a day, or $365 a year. I am not going to say that that is too much or too little, but I am going to thank the minister on my own personal behalf for his work in that regard, for I, too, from the very beginning have strongly advocated that the widows of these soldiers be taken care of. I am glad to know that, while the minister has done that in the last year or two by regulation or order in council, it is now made statutory. That is a fine step in the right direction.

I heard the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) speak of the veterans of the Northwest rebellion, and I am glad to see that they are included in this bill. I do not know at the moment just what they are to receive, but the fact that they are mentioned in the bill is an evidence that the minister is carrying out his promise to make statutory what heretofore was done more or less by regulation. Again I want to thank him for that. When a veteran of the Northwest rebellion makes application for pension I think considerable latitude should be allowed by those who are to determine whether he is to receive a pension or not. They are all old now, because 1885 was sixty-one years ago and they cannot have long to live. Whatever pension they are to be entitled to will be of material help to them and will be greatly welcomed by them. It will be some recognition of the part they played in that scrap in the northwest which never should have taken place. It was the result of hotheads—

Mr. TUCKER: And inaction at Ottawa.

Mr. MacNICOL: —particularly the Indian leaders. I hope that some day the minister will bring in a measure to compensate some of these poor Indians of the Northwest rebellion who never received anything but wounds and being shot at. What they went through was through no fault of their own, and I hope it will be possible to do something for them too.

Something has been said about the South African veterans. Here again I hope that those who have to do with awarding pension to the South African veterans will be allowed considerable latitude. I had a case up recently of one of these veterans—I shall not mention the name—but he was turned down. They are now all old men. They must have been pretty young men when they enlisted, because the South African campaign took place in the late nineties and the authorities took only the very finest and youngest for that campaign. I myself was turned down. I wanted to go but I was not tall enough. The company in which I wanted to enlist would take only six-footers and I was not six feet tall. It turned out to be a distinguished company and I should have liked to be in it. They were all young men. If they are asking for pensions to-day they must need them, and they deserve them. I want to compliment the minister upon including them.

I should also like to support what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said in favour of hospitalization for the previously non-pensioned widows of deceased pensioners whose pension was not sufficient to entitle them to adequate compensation. They, too, must be getting pretty well on in years. They are the widows of the soldiers of the first great war, and considering what they went through many must require hospitalization. I have wondered if the department could not supply free medicine to them, as was done in Ontario a year or two ago for the old age pensioners. I suggest to the minister that further consideration be given, if possible, to the poor widows of the insufficiently pensioned veterans of the first great war. I am strongly in support of this bill.

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to delay the house for more than a moment; but I am brought closely in touch with a large number of the imperial soldiers, and I should like to say just one word, a word of pleading more than a word of claim or right, for those men who served with the imperial forces in the first great war, and then came out to Canada and enlisted with the Canadian forces during this last war. They served mostly in Canada in the veterans guard in the last war on such duties as guarding vulnerable points. These men all getting up in years and are finding it extremely hard, after having served in two wars, to become reestablished in civilian life at the age of fifty or more. I hope that generosity will be shown to these men. The dual pension, at one time known as the burnt-out pension, was designed, I believe, in recognition of the fact that men who had served in a war aged prematurely, and men who have served in two wars age prematurely. No matter where these men were serving, in Canada or in a theatre of war, when they are reaching middle age they have suffered more than the young man who actually went over and saw all his service perhaps in England or elsewhere. So that I should like to make a special plea for the imperial veteran who served with the imperial forces in the first great war, then came to Canada and has lived in Canada for twenty-five years or more, and who served in Canada during this war and is now finding it difficult to become re-established in civilian life. He is denied certain benefits. If he could receive benefits under this act I believe that in the long run it would not cost this country much more money, because he will have to be looked after since he is handicapped in fitting into the civil life of Canada now.

I should like to underline the remarks which were made in connection with the non-pensionable widows. These people had hoped that they would see an increase in their pension perhaps up to forty dollars a month. They also find it difficult to make both ends meet on the pension which the government now allows them.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Sections 1 to 28 agreed to.

On section 29—Coming into force.

Mr. MacNICOL: Which clause pertains to South African veterans?

Mr. TUCKER: The clause which pertains to South African veterans is in section 2, paragraph (i), subparagraph (ii).

Mr. MACKENZIE: It preserves the rights as we established them before.

Mr. MacNICOL: There is no elaboration of that?

Mr. TUCKER: Well, it says, any person who served in the South African war.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There is no change in the effect of the statute from the order in council.

Mr. BROOKS: It makes them eligible, I take it, for the benefits.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, as evidence of the speed with which this house is moving, I was called out of the house for about five minutes and you have gone a long way in that time.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): If you stayed away we would get through a lot of work.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is about time we did some work here.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I, under section 29, which has to do with the coming into force of this legislation, ask the minister or the parliamentary assistant whether he will comment, at least briefly, on some of these requests of the widows which the government has not granted in this legislation?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I can tell my hon. friend that I am keenly aware in the last three or four years of his assistance and devoted interest in this question, along with the hon. member for Davenport, and that the question will be reviewed from time to time and given sympathetic consideration. I cannot make any definite or positive declaration at the present moment.

Mr. BROOKS: I should like to point out to the minister that practically all the members of the veterans committee wanted to give them sympathetic consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes; I overlooked that.

Mr. BROOKS: It is hardly fair to single out certain members.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask whether the provision made a year or two ago, whereby the expenses of some of these women, in coming to Ottawa to confer with the war veterans allowance committee about these matters, will be retained?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I would say, no; that would be a very bad practice to establish. They were paid expenses the year before last; and upon the motion of, I believe, the hon. member for Vancouver South in committee this year, their expenses were paid. But if this parliament is going to establish a practice of paying the expenses of one veterans' organization, women or men, the thing would be endless; and I think it should be left to the generosity of the committee at the time.

Mr. BROOKS: Was not an allowance made in the estimates to this organization a few years ago?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The year before last.

Mr. BROOKS: And it has not been repeated?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It has not been repeated. This year they were paid their expenses on the motion, I think, of the hon. member for Vancouver South, by the committee as a committee of parliament. But honestly I think it is a practice which should not be continued.

Mrs. STRUM: Has any change been made in the allowance schedules for these non-pensionable widows?

Mr. TUCKER: No, there has been no change.

Mrs. STRUM: You will have them again next year, then?

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is right.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

VETERANS' LAND ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE AUTHORITY FOR SALES OF LAND, BUILDING MATERIALS, ET CETERA

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of bill No. 336, to amend the Veterans Land Act, 1942.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): I should like to offer a few observations on this phase of the new Veterans Charter, bill No. 336.

The Veterans Land Act, as most hon. members realize, came into being in 1942 with the object of settling veterans, who were qualified, on farms. It was divided into two sections, one for the full-time farmer and one for the part-time farmer, or what is now recognized as the occupier of a small holding, which means a house on a half-acre of land. I thought at the time that was a splendid idea, and it is, but we have run into some difficulties on account of the administration. To be fair to the administrative officers, their task has been pretty difficult, with the present housing crisis, in administering the small holdings and in starting a great number of applicants upon land at the present time. Moreover, things have changed greatly in value since 1942; and with a ceiling of $6,000 to settle a veteran on an area of land and provide a house, barn, granaries, live stock and equipment, it is almost impossible to realize this project in any good district to-day. On the other hand, the same ceiling applies in the case of a house and a half acre of land. Everybody knows that building values have skyrocketed. It is impossible now to build the type of house which was intended for a sum of not more than $6,000. I notice in the paper that in Victoria such a house is now costing $7,636, without carrying charges estimated at $1,100 odd, spread over twenty-five years, and in that particular case the veteran, his wife and family agreed that they could not undertake that obligation. Things are going to be difficult in that respect for this administration and for parliament in the near future.

As to the matter of full-time settlement on the land, I want to raise one objection. I wish to be fair to the director. Under order in council P.C. 10472, certain adjustments were made in 1942, I believe, in relation to the old soldier settlers, and since then many have obtained clear title to the land. It may be said in fairness to the director that he has taken all the safeguards possible to protect the new veterans in the purchase of farms to-day, but in some cases the decision of his office works rather unfairly to the new veteran. Let me give one example which will illustrate a good many cases. I have in mind a young veteran who wished to purchase an area of land adjoining his father's farm in one of the best agricultural districts in Manitoba. He qualified as a good settler, made a cash payment, was given his receipts and was told to go ahead with his spring operations. But the administrative officers felt that, because the property was originally owned by a soldier settler of the first great war and this adjustment had been made under the order in council to which I have referred, the purchase could not be effected for this young settler. That is the grievance I have.

I sympathize with the practical difficulties with which the director has to cope, but I still think this is unfair to the new veteran, when one considers that this farm is one of the best obtainable, adjoining land owned by this young man's relatives, where he could borrow necessary equipment and so on. I suggest that everything possible should be done to assist young veterans to make a success of their settlement on the land at the present time, and I hope the administration will relax their regulations a bit in this regard.

Probably no member of the veterans committee has pointed out more consistently than I have done the necessity for taking safeguards to see that there is successful settlement of veterans on the land, but I suggest that in this particular case there has been too much red tape. I repeat, I sympathize with the director and his administrative officers; but where land is so desirable, notwithstanding the fact that adjustments were made with the old settler, it is only fair that everything possible should be done to see that a new veteran is settled under the circumstances I have mentioned. This case that I have brought forward is typical of a good many others, and I hope that something can be done to meet this criticism.

There is another criticism I made, not only in our committee but elsewhere, and that has to do with the question of war assets. I am aware that I cannot go very far in the discussion of that question under this bill, but I have been keen in advocating that priorities be granted veteran settlers. I would urge upon the government the importance of this, even though I may be somewhat out of order in doing so at the moment. I sincerely trust that something will be done to assist these settlers in obtaining priorities. After the discussion we had yesterday morning in this house, there is further evidence that much of that equipment could be made available first of all to the veterans who are settling in Canada.

So far I have been rather critical—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not very bad.

Mr. ROSS (Souris):—and now I wish to say a word in commendation of the government, on the recommendation of the committee, with respect to this amendement allowing the tenant settler to procure equipment. This is something that should prove quite beneficial in future years. It has not been in effect long enough for the results to be apparent this year; but, after pointing out the difficulties that have arisen since 1942 in regard to the purchasing of good land and buildings, with the ceiling prices we have to-day, and with many of our farmers who struggled along through the war years now wishing to retire and lease their farms to good settlers, I hope that these men will be able to procure equipment on a percentage of the assessed value of the farms. This provision is something that is not clearly understood in the country, and perhaps it might be well for me to read it:

Enabling the director to purchase stock and equipment up to the value of $3,000 for veterans leasing farms, or owning their own farms, provided that the amount of the loan in such cases would not exceed 40 per cent of the value of the land and buildings, as determined by the director, and provided further that 20 per cent of the cost of the stock and equipment so purchased was paid by the veteran. The suggested amendment would further provide for a grant of 40 per cent of the value of the loan on the completion of the agreement under conditions similar to those contained in the present act. Should a veteran later wish to purchase land and buildings he would be entitled to assistance, as at present provided, up to the amount of the difference between the amount of his loan and the sum of $5,800.

That should prove of assistance to those young settlers who can lease a farm and then purchase the machinery and equipment on a percentage of the assessed value of the farm; and, as time goes on, they can make arrangements to purchase the farm and become settled in that fashion.

I do not wish to take up any more time. I could spend considerable time in discussing other matters; and minor amendments have been passed, to assist in the administrative set-up of the department, to which I might refer—for instance, bringing the director into closer contact with the deputy minister and the other officials. That should work to the satisfaction of all. At this time, however, I will not do more than express the hope that the minister will be able to carry out the suggestions I have offered in the way of loosening up the administration, in the way I have indicated, in the interests of new veterans.

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): I have just a few words to say and I hope I shall not get into quite as noisy an argument as I did yesterday with the parliamentary assistant and the minister. I can assure them it is not my intention to do so.

I believe that the present bill is a great improvement on the old Soldier Settlement Act which we had after the last war, and there is no reason why it should not be. At that time we were starting something new in this country and we had no experience either of the administration of such an act or in the building up of the necessary organization. It was to be expected, therefore, that we should make some mistakes.

In drafting this bill in 1942, I believe, the government and the committee took into consideration many of those mistakes and tried to draft a bill which would at least, as far as possible, remedy some of the defects. But in doing that we find that probably we created certain other difficulties and made certain other mistakes. Perhaps one of the greatest mistakes in the old Soldier Settlement Act was the fact that it was started in a period of inflation and that there was no write-off in the debt, so that the soldier started with a debt which it was impossible for him to pay under the circumstances which developed later.

In this new bill we decided, in the first place, to see that the soldier had a fair equity in his land. Later, we found, through the increase in the price of land, that, in order to obtain land, we had to reduce that equity, and in my opinion we probably reduced the equity just a little too much at the present time.

In 1941 I made certain suggestions—other hon. members did the same—to the effect that the government should have taken over certain types of land and held them for the veterans at the close of the war—certain lands such as C.P.R., C.N.R., Hudson's Bay and mortgage company lands. That land would have been available to the soldier at a reasonable price, the price which obtained at that time. That was not done and, as a result, much of the land to-day is being sold to our veterans, under the Veterans Land Act, at a considerable increase over the 1941 price.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Does my hon. friend recall that when he was on the committee in 1942 the advice of all practical farmers was to go very slow with the acquisition of land?

Mr. WRIGHT: Yes, with the acquisition of improved land. But at the time I did suggest that a lot of this unimproved land should have been secured, if possible, at prices which obtained at that time, or reserved at these prices for later development by the soldier when he returned. This has resulted in the administration having great difficulty in obtaining land for settlement at prices which they believe to be reasonable. That is one of the greatest difficulties for the returned man who has to buy good land in a reasonably sure crop district at prices which the board can afford to pay. The administration are setting prices at approximately the 1941 or 1942 prices of farm land in Canada. If the soldier wishes to obtain that land he must put up the difference between the price that is being asked to-day and the 1941 or 1942 prices. That is going on in a great many places. The result is that only those returned men who have relatives who can advance or give them money to pay the difference are the ones who are able to obtain land at the present time. It is restricting the numbers who can be settled under the act. I am one of those who were in favour of seeing that high prices were not paid for land on which these soldiers were to be settled; nevertheless I think conditions have changed in Canada. Our whole price structure is on a higher level. Just the other day the government announced that we were to have a stabilized price for wheat over at least the next four years. That price does justify some increase in the value of land in western Canada. The board would be well advised not to stick too strictly to their present policy of paying not more than the 1941 or 1942 prices. In good crop districts the value of this land has advanced to a certain extent and the board should take that into consideration.

There is no doubt that the restricting feature of this bill is the availability of good agricultural land in Canada. There is nothing very much that this government can do about the matter. There is only so much land here. A certain amount of it is under provincial control.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Would my hon. friend not commend what we have done by way of agreements with provincial governments with regard to provincial land?

Mr. WRIGHT: Yes; I am coming to that. Most of our natural resources are under the control of the provincial governments. I believe that the dominion government is making a real effort to come to some agreement with the provinces with respect to land. Nearly all the provinces are prepared to cooperate. Some have already signed agreements.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Four.

Mr. WRIGHT: Yes; and I believe others will sign in the near future. There is one point with respect to these agreements which I should like to bring out. Under the old Soldier Settlement Act we found that a great number of our returned men were sent into districts where they were thirty or forty miles from the railroad. They were settled on new land which in many places was hard to clear. While they were settled in groups, yet we found that within two or three years many of them became discouraged and pulled out, which left those who remained, in scattered settlements where it was impossible to give them the amenities of life, the roads, schools and other things which are necessary and which we should have in Canada to-day. Most of the provincial governments are trying to overcome that. Some of them have devised different schemes of doing so. They are opening up one large tract in Alberta. They have contracted with a United States firm to clear so many thousand acres of land which will be made available to soldiers. I expect that other provinces will have other agreements. I know it is the intention in Saskatchewan to try to avoid some of the errors of the past.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I must say that Alberta has been the most cooperative of all the provinces.

Mr. WRIGHT: I am glad to hear that. I knew it would be one of the western provinces which would be in that class. Probably the reason why the minister did not include Saskatchewan is that he and they do not agree on the methods by which veterans should be settled on provincial land. We believe in that province that, in trying to avoid the pitfalls of the past, we should see that these settlers are placed in groups where we can give them the roads, schools, medical attention and other services to which we believe they are entitled. That province believes that the principle of cooperative farms should be tried out there. I am sorry that the government have not seen fit, when they were amending the act, to include an amendment which would have permitted funds granted by the dominion government to be used for cooperative purposes, not only in the buying of land but in the buying of fishing equipment and equipment for any other work which the various settlers wish to undertake in a cooperative way. There should have been an amendment which would have permitted that.

In Saskatchewan we feel that that would have been the best method, or one of the methods which should have been used in placing settlers there. Probably we shall be able to work out some satisfactory agreement even under the regulations in the act as it stands at present. Under sympathetic cooperation it is still not impossible to do something along these lines, and I hope that the government will give sympathetic consideration to proposals there. I can assure them that it is the desire of the government of Saskatchewan to cooperate in every respect, and, along with the dominion government, to assume responsibility with regard to any losses which might occur when settlers are placed in this way. I would suggest that the government continue to give sympathetic consideration to the suggestions which are coming from that province.

I should also like to comment on the amendment which we now have before us. I believe that it is a good amendment. There is no doubt in my mind that it will assist greatly in settlement in the better districts in western Canada. There are areas where, at present prices, it is difficult to obtain an economic unit of land.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The hon. member is referring to leases.

Mr. WRIGHT: Yes. It is hard to obtain an economic unit under the old act where they have to buy. Under the new amendment they will be able to lease an economic unit and obtain assistance in securing equipment to work it. Later, when they have built up a little capital of their own, they will be able to get further assistance in the purchase either of the rented farm or of a new unit on which they can carry on. So that I commend the government on the amendment being made in this act.

The matter of small holdings has been discussed. I believe that when the bill was introduced originally, in 1942, it was expected that the small holdings would be more or less agricultural undertakings; that certain operations would be carried on there in connection with the production of perhaps, honey, the raising of poultry, the planting of fruit trees, and so on. On account of housing situation, however, this part of the act is becoming more and more a housing scheme to-day. I do not agree with that. I admit that under present circumstances this may be necessary, but I have always felt that housing should be dealt with by another department and the small holdings scheme carried out according to the original intention. It was designed to give at least a partial living to people who might be able to obtain other part-time employment, in factories or elsewhere, not only in the larger cities but in the smaller towns as well, and I think would have served a good purpose in this regard. It still can be made use of in that way, but up to the present it has been concentrated principally around the larger cities and used as a housing scheme.

I hope and believe it is the intention of the government to get away from this system as soon as possible and spread the small holdings in the vicinity of the smaller towns. I feel there is a place for this scheme in all parts of the western provinces. There is no doubt in my mind but that very few towns of more than one thousand population in western Canada could very well afford to have from five to ten of these small holdings in the vicinity; and I hope that as soon as present shortages of building materials are overcome the scheme will be extended and these small holdings established adjacent to the smaller centres in western Canada, at least, because I know, from observation covering many years, there has been a natural growth of these small holdings around our towns, operated by people who obtain part-time employment in the towns and carry on these small operations. So I hope that within the next few years the government will make that part of the act work much better than it is working at the present time.

There are other matters with which I shall deal when the particular sections are reached, but once more I want to urge that the government give sympathetic consideration to amending the act to provide for the cooperative use of the money available under it. The government will have to assume the responsibility for not including that provision in the bill. They will have to assume the responsibility if in certain provinces they do not find it possible to settle as many returned men as they would like, because of this restriction which arises from the fact that no provision is made for the cooperative use of this money.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I am thoroughly in accord with the amendments proposed in the bill, which I think will help bring about the settlement of more men on the land. I say that chiefly because the price of land has gone up in the last few years, and, as a result, many boys are being forced to rent farms. This measure provides for loans and grants to them.

I supported the Veterans' Land Act when it was introduced in 1942, but at that time I pointed to a number of difficulties under which the veterans would labour. Unfortunately those difficulties have increased as a result of increases in the price of land and equipment, together with the great difficulty of obtaining equipment at this time. I pointed out then that it would be quite difficult for a boy with limited resources to go into full-time farming under this act unless he could get the help of his parents. Of course, where a boy's parents live in the vicinity they have machinery which will be available to the boy, but not many are in that happy position. To-day officials under the Veterans' Land Act are turning down many boys purely on the ground that their financial resources are not sufficient to make it possible for them to start off with any chance of success. Many of those turned down are boys who have lived on farms all their lives, and with good records in the army. They are being turned down purely because their financial resources are not sufficient to ensure them a good chance of success. I am not criticizing the officials for this. When we discussed the Veterans' Land Act in this house we were critical of the officials of the old soldier settlement board for settling boys who did not have a real chance to make a go of it. As a result, the officials are being careful to see that the boys settled now will be likely to succeed.

Having that in mind, when we were dealing with these amendments in the committee I suggested that it should be possible for veterans to pool their grants for the purpose of buying equipment. The director stated that he had a proposal under which veterans settling on provincial lands would be able to pool their grants, but I think we should go farther than that and make it possible for a number of veterans settling on privately owned land to pool their grants for this purpose. Then a subcommittee was appointed to consider the advisability of making the Veterans Land Act apply to cooperative farms, and that subcommittee brought in a report urging the government to investigate the question and see whether it would not be possible in future to make the Veterans Land Act apply to some form of cooperative institution. If both these things are done I believe they will help take care of many boys who otherwise will be deprived of the benefits of this act, and who may just have to take jobs. So that I urge the government to follow up these matters and see that provision is made for the pooling of grants to boys who want to settle on privately owned land, and also for the making of grants to those who want to enter upon some type of cooperative farming.

Mr. C. E. STEPHENSON (Durham): I wonder if we could have some statement from the minister as to how farms for veterans are purchased. I understand that there are regional officers and a supervisor for each office; but who actually purchases the land; and is an analysis made of the soil to determine whether or not the property is suitable for farming purposes? I ask this question because I have had several complaints along this line, one in particular concerning a farm which was purchased for a veteran, in connection with which it was stated that a junior farmer had worked the land for about four years and finally had to give it up owing to the poor quality of the soil. In spite of that fact it was purchased, at quite a price, to be sold to veterans under the Veterans' Land Act. I was wondering how this land was purchased, and if an analysis were made of the soil to indicate its suitability for farming. That can be answered later on by the minister.

Then it seems to take considerable time to have these transactions put through. A veteran may decide to purchase a farm for post-war occupation, and will begin proceedings for that purpose. But six or eight months will have elapsed before the papers are finally completed, and he finds he must wait all that time to get on the land.

Then there is the matter of small holdings. Several small holdings have been opened up across the country, but for some reason or another there does not seem to have been any great effort put forth to have them completed. Is it because the prices are so high the veterans do not want to purchase them? The figures indicate that 3,000 of these small holdings have been started, but only about 400 have been completed to the present time. In my own district they seem to be held up for some reason or another. Is it because the veteran feels he cannot afford to purchase at the prices asked? I should like to have the minister answer these questions.

Mr. TUCKER: When we go into committee.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, I thought the minister was going to reply, but since it appears that he is not at this time, I shall just add a few words to what the hon. members for Melfort (Mr. Wright) and Acadia (Mr. Quelch) have said.

I was on the subcommittee which discussed the possibility of cooperative farms being established under the Veterans' Land Act. It was evident in that committee, as it has been made evident by other discussions in the house, that many members of the committee had not the foggiest notion of what a cooperative is. I was surprised to hear them express fear that the venture would not succeed. I could understand people who never had occasion to face danger or risk expressing fear that something would or would not happen. But it was surprising to me to hear veterans of both wars express fear, particularly in view of the fact that everything had been promised by the veterans themselves, to remove that cause of fear.

In the first place, the illustration of Matador, which was used, indicated that the government of Saskatchewan was prepared to give financial support to the point where operations under the Veterans' Land Act would not lose money. They were not prepared to allow a veteran to settle in this way on crown lands unless the veteran expressed the desire to do so. Consequently, there was no possibility, so far as human foresight could be exercised, of any slip-up.

No one wants to make a mistake, no matter what it is. But even though it was explained to the committee that these men were given every opportunity to see all the pitfalls as well as the advantages, and were given the necessary assistance and support, the committee did not see fit to recommend that this be undertaken.

Because of that I am convinced there will be a good many veterans from Saskatchewan who would have liked to re-settle in that province, but who are not going to be able to get the land, even with the useful improvement set out in section 2 of the bill. I should like hon. members to understand the importance of giving that opportunity to these boys. It does not mean that every veteran will accept the opportunity; but it does mean that a section—perhaps a small section—of Saskatchewan veterans will want to do so, and, if they do, they should not be prevented by some regulation which someone is afraid to change.

We talk about venture capital and private enterprise, and there is more talk about those things from other sections of the house than from this one. But there is no more private enterprise in the world than that found in a cooperative. No one goes into it unless he is privately convinced that he wishes to do so. It is purely and strictly a private procedure, just as private as any enterprise can be in this world.

These men were promised certain grants under the Veterans' Land Act, because of their service. To prevent their getting them is not fair. Not only are there crown lands to settle, but in our wheat growing areas we have large mechanized farms, the owners of some of which are willing to sell. But the $6,000 allowed under section 9—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member; but at this stage of proceedings, namely the debate on second reading, hon. members are not supposed to discuss the details of a bill. Only the principle of a bill can be discussed at this point. If the hon. member has representations to make, I suggest that he wait until the house resolves itself into committee.

Mr. BENTLEY: I observe your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and I expect that you are correct. You usually are. I shall not go into greater detail, more than to say that, while in some respects I agree with the principle of the bill, one weakness is that it does not permit cooperative farming under the Veterans' Land Act. I may have more to say later on.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak only briefly, if I may, on the principle of these half-acre and one-acre lots. In the township of Scarboro to-day there are fifty of these properties vacant, and they have been vacant for some months. In the county of Ontario the number has reached 100. They should be occupied. There is something radically wrong with the principle underlying investment by the government in these developments which, in turn, have not been taken up by veterans.

I put this on the record so that the officers of the department may secure occupants for these buildings in the township of Scarboro and the county of Ontario, even if the government has to take a loss on them. If its judgment was wrong in providing for half-acre and one-acre properties, under this $6,000 plan, then take your licking and have the properties occupied. We need the houses.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Appointment and salary of director.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I have here the act itself, chapter 33 of 1942, and by virtue of that act which is to be amended by the bill before us only those can enjoy the benefits of the act who enlisted and went overseas, even though for just a Cook's tour, and those who have served in Canada for a period of twelve months. If any soldier for any reason whatsoever has not been sent overseas or has not served twelve months in Canada he cannot take advantage of the act. I find that that construction is wrong because the purpose of the act is twofold. It is designed to help the veteran who has had some farming experience and has a natural disposition to establish himself on a farm, but it has also the higher purpose of serving the country at large by establishing more good men on the land. Those reasons can be taken together or considered separately. If you take them together I do not see why we should give better treatment to the man who has signed a paper for overseas service than we give to the soldier who has not signed such a paper but has abided by the law. Even if that man has not abided by the law he is entitled to enjoy all the benefits of the act for the superior reason that farmers are essential to this country, not amateur farmers but real farmers who can do well by working on the farm. In a moment I shall move an amendment to that effect.

The famine which some members of parliament predicted at the time we were fighting for the farmer is now showing itself. It is not only on the horizon; but even now in this country which has been so generously endowed by the Almighty, we are finding that the land does not produce enough to satisfy the requirements of the Canadian people. Therefore it is not simply a question of rewarding the veteran who was sent overseas; it is a question of public necessity. How many times have I seen boys with a good agricultural background come into my office desiring to establish themselves on the land, on a farm of their own, perhaps because the old homestead that belonged to their father was not large enough to establish all his sons. They said: We have been in the army and we should be able to take advantage of the legislation that was passed in 1942, four years ago. But nothing could be done for them. At the present time there are many boys, mostly farmers and lumbermen, who could help out this country by cultivating land which is not now being cultivated, or by opening up new land, but those boys find it impossible to help out their country in that way because of the shame that has been attached to them because people have been credulous enough to believe what was said about these boys by those high in authority.

I wonder if the time will ever come when all the members of this parliament will give the farmers of this country the credit that is due to them, and honour them, not with decorations on their breast, because the farmers do not care about ribbons and medals. But they are ready to serve their country.

When we were asking that farmers be exempted from military service it was not because they were a lot of cowards. It was because they had a duty to fulfil to this country, a duty whose importance was minimized down to zero by some people.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. May I remind the hon. member that we are discussing the Veterans' Land Act, and not the question of deferments that were granted during the last war. I would ask the hon. member to relate his remarks to the bill now under consideration.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, as an old soldier you know very well that there is a bombardment before an attack.

The CHAIRMAN: May I remind the hon. member that a bombardment to be effective must be directed on the target.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir, but the attack will be very mild, and it will be in the form of an amendment which I shall move when I am through with my few remarks.

As you know, Mr. Chairman, what is before us is not only this bill but the act of 1942 which it amends; we have to consider the two together as forming a whole, and what is of the utmost importance is to know precisely which of our veterans will be in a position to take advantage of the legislation that is now before the committee. That is my point. As the bill now stands, the only ones who will be in a position to take advantage of the legislation will be those who enlisted and served for any length of time overseas and those who, having enlisted have served for twelve months in the forces in Canada or in some auxiliary service. It may be that all draftees who have been abiding by the law will be deprived of the benefits of this legislation. I am strongly opposed to that kind of legislation. This bill will be no improvement unless those who have had experience in farming and are real farmers have an opportunity to take advantage of the act and cultivate the soil. That is my point.

In order to enlighten the committee on the real purpose of this amendment and the motive behind it, I must recall the errors of the past, when people who were steeped in prejudice gave no chance at all to those who were entitled to the dignity of man. I have the highest regard for the farmers. It was taught to me in my family. I live in a semi-rural district. In my family I have been told since I was a little boy that the farmer is the feeder of the country, the man without whom we could not eat at all, we would die of hunger. Therefore the case I argue now is not only the case of the veteran; it is the case chiefly of the veteran who is a farmer and who was put in the army in spite of the fact that his duty, his national duty, was to stay on the farm at the time. I regret that able young men who were on the farms were compelled to go into the army, and their case was not considered fairly at the time. It was not considered with justice and fairness, because the farmer was regarded merely as a slacker. I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, and I will maintain all the time I have an opportunity to speak, that the farmer who did not enlist during the war, the farmer who claimed exemption because his duty was to be at home. was not a slacker. I regret to say, from my personal knowledge, that a farmer who has reached the age of fifty is not in a position to do all the hard work on the soil. He must rely on the assistance of his young and robust sons to do ploughing, to clean ditches and perform other hard work. The old man suffers, perhaps, from reheumatism, at his age he can do only light work on the farm. I wonder whether the circumstances are similar in the west, where agriculture is mostly mechanized. What I have said is true of my district as well as of Ontario and the maritimes, and perhaps also of British Columbia. The farmer needs his young sons. In how many cases have I met young lads who were ready to enlist but who did not do so because of a sense of duty to their family and their country. Moreover, sir,—

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: I would like those who say "order" to be heard by all the farmers of the country whose cause I defend to-day.

The CHAIRMAN: Some hon. member has called "order", but, as I understand the remarks of the hon. member for Temiscouata, he is contending that those who served on the farms during the war should be included in the bill. If that is his intention he is in order at the present time.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir. But to clear the sky and remove the difficulty, I will take the preamble of the bill, and the committee will notice that those who drafted it knew nothing of the conditions on the farms in this country. I shall certainly be in order to read the preamble, because the preamble precedes clause 1, and besides that it is an illustration of the real purpose of the act. Let us see what it is:

Whereas many men now serving in the active forces of Canada have recorded their desire to settle on land or engage in farming when hostilities cease . . .

"Many men"! It is not true. It is not true because the boys who have left the country to go to the army have been uprooted. Very often when they live in the cities afterwards they do not want to return to the country because the work on the farm is very hard, painstaking. When they live in town and have facilities which ought to be available in the country, these boys are reluctant to go back to the the old homestead; they want to lead an easier life. That is my experience, after dealing with quite a large number of farmers. Therefore, when we find a few who are ready to go back to the farm they must be awarded the greatest advantages possible, precisely because of their intention to return to the painstaking and arduous work which is the lot of the farmer in this country, work which starts at dawn and finishes a long time after dusk. It is not true that many men are ready to go back to the farm after serving in the army. I am sorry to say that this is one of the bills of which the least advantage will be taken, for the very reason I have given, and it is precisely because I want the bill to be just as serviceable as possible to those who want to farm that I speak as I do now.

To continue with the preamble:

. . . and it is desirable that suitably qualified veterans be encouraged to seek rehabilitation in the agricultural industry.

Suitably qualified veterans! Who are the most suitably qualified veterans? It is those who had their training on the land. You cannot make a farmer by inviting a white-collar man to go to the farm and start doing business there. He will be a complete failure. You must go to men of experience. Farming is an art, and very few men can excel in an art without having some experience of it. "Fabricando fit faber." It is by working that one improves his art, his skill, and this is as true of farmers as of anyone else. And the most suitable of all are precisely those who are kept in clink now, more than a year after the war is over, just to satisfy the anti-Canadian and anti-national animus of the brass hats who would lose their jobs if the clinks were closed. I congratulate the hon. member for Portneuf on the strong language he used the other day. He made an able speech; it was time to say it; it should be repeated by all of us, just as though we were singing the national anthem, and it would be the national anthem for the farmer.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member is not now discussing a matter relating to the Veterans' Land Act.

Mr. POULIOT: Therefore, sir, I move that:

Sub-paragraph (d) of section 2 be repealed and replaced by "any man in the army, air force, militia or navy of Canada."

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The committee is now considering section 1, and amendments to sections should be made as we reach the section. The section before the committee is "appointment and salary of director."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: Excuse me; the first section which is referred to in the bill before us is section 3. Therefore section 2 precedes this section 3, and for that reason I am making the amendment. It will take me a minute to write it, and I will send it to you to submit to the will of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN: I understand, then, that the hon. member is amending section 2.

Mr. POULIOT: I wish to amend section 2 of the act, the first act of 1942.

Mr. FLEMING: Section 2 is not affected by the amendment.

Mr. POULIOT: Are we bound by the amendments which are proposed by the minister to the bill?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member, as I understand his remarks, desires to add a new clause to this bill—

Mr. POULIOT: No, sir. I want to change the bill of 1946, the bill that is before us—

Mr. MACKENZIE: What clause?

Mr. POULIOT: I am speaking of bill No. 336, which is before us. The purpose of it is to make some changes in chapter 33 of 1942, and my amendment will be included in bill No. 336 which is now before us, but it will refer to the act of 1942. My contention, sir,—

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member proposes to present an amendment to this bill the amendment must be in writing. I have tried to ascertain which clause of the bill he desires to amend and I have not been able to do so. Therefore there is no amendment before the committee at the present time.

Mr. POULIOT: What I mean is that the committee is not bound by the bill that is now before us in amending the act of 1942. My amendment will not be to the bill of 1946; it will be in the bill of 1946 to amend the act of 1942; and since the first amendment in the bill that is now before us is in regard to section 3 of the act of 1942, and since the amendment that I am going to sponsor relates to the second section of the act of 1942, now is the time to submit it to you, sir, on the first section of the bill. I hope you will take it into consideration as soon as my amendment is presented in writing.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has explained that he desires to amend the present section 2 of the act—

Mr. POULIOT: By repealing paragraph (b).

The CHAIRMAN: Then it will be necessary for him to put his motion in writing—

Mr. POULIOT: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: —and in my opinion it would be a new clause to this bill, amending section 2 of the present act.

Mr. POULIOT: Exactly.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member will put his motion in writing I will consider whether or not it is in order.

Mr. FAIR: Before section 1 passes, I wish again to commend the committee on veterans affairs for the very good work done, but at the same time I wish to remind them of one or two things they have not done which they should have done. I am considering once again the recommendation I made on several occasions, that the committee should see that a clause is written into the veteran's contract, under the Veterans' Land Act, that present prices for farm produce, including grain, live stock and other products, be guaranteed until the loan has been repaid by the veteran. I do this because the veteran is compelled to sign a contract on the basis of to-day's prices for land, live stock and equipment; and because he is compelled to sign that contract I feel that the government, in fairness to the veteran, should be compelled to sign a contract also that prices now prevailing, and on which the prices of land, live stock and equipment are based, should be guaranteed until the loan has been paid by the veteran.

I make this recommendation again to-night because I think something should be written into the bill by the government. I would move an amendment to that effect, but I know I would not be in order in doing so. If that is done, however, it will prevent a repetition of the treatment that has been handed out to the veterans of world war I, who have been neglected by the special committee on veterans affairs.

On many occasions I have brought up the case of these old veterans. On October 1 last we had a discussion on a resolution in my name in which twenty-two or twenty-three members took part and about twenty were in favour of the proposal. The disposal of that resolution was to send it on to the special committee on veterans affairs, and that committee asked a delegation of the soldier settlers association to come to Ottawa once again and present their brief. On the day on which the brief was presented there was not sufficient time for a discussion of it and another day was set aside later on for the purpose. After the motion to grant clear titles was presented, an amendment was introduced—which let a number of government members out of a corner—to the effect that nothing be done in connection with clear title, but that further time be granted in which the veterans could make application for an extension of time and a reduction of their debts. In my opinion, that is not good enough and—

Mr. TUCKER: On a point of order, I do not mind the hon. member debating this question, but he has already discussed it in connection with the soldier settlement bill which has gone through the house this session. Surely, therefore, he has no right to debate it again on an entirely different bill. Some attempt, I submit, should be made to observe the rules of procedure.

The CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. member for Battle River that there is another act dealing with soldier settlers of the first great war, the Soldier Settlement Act, which was considered in this house and in this committee a few weeks ago. It is an entirely different matter and should not be discussed under the Veterans' Land Act.

Mr. FAIR: Mr. Chairman, I am going to suggest to-night that the Department of Public Works see to it that the tacks are all removed from the chair occupied by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), because he does not seem to be able to sit still.

Mr. TUCKER: Very funny.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, it isn't even amusing.

The CHAIRMAN: May I ask the hon. member for Battle River to be good enough to discuss the Veterans Land Act of 1942 and the amendment, bill No. 336, which is now before the committee.

Mr. TUCKER: If your case is bad you abuse the other side.

Mr. FAIR: Surely we are not to be denied the right to bring in matters of this kind in support of our argument.

The CHAIRMAN: It is entirely out of order to discuss at this time another question which has already been disposed of this session by the house and by this committee. I think the hon. member is familiar with the rules.

Mr. FAIR: I fully appreciate, Mr. Chairman, the view you take, but I am using the treatment of the old veterans as an illustration to show what will happen to the new veterans unless some protective clause is included in the act. Surely that is plain to a lawyer like the hon. member for Rosthern. He must remember that in a few days he is going to Saskatchewan—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: That has nothing whatever to do with the Veterans' Land Act, and again I appeal to the hon. member to confine his remarks to the subject before the committee and not to discuss the Soldier Settlement Act.

Mr. POULIOT: Would you deal with my amendment, sir?

Mr. FAIR: I am awfully sorry; I wish to discuss this matter for one minute. I should have been through long ago if I had been allowed to carry on by hon. gentlemen who cannot sit comfortably in their chairs. It is just too bad that this section had not been written into the present act. It is not because it has not been brought to the attention of the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Order.

Mr. FAIR: Perhaps the minister is also getting uncomfortable in his chair. This is one thing that should be done for the protection of these new veterans who are to be settled under the Veterans Land Act. I am simply pointing out that that protection has been needed by the old veterans of world war I. I have pointed out the suffering which they have been compelled to go through because the protective measures were not taken. If we are not allowed to carry on this discussion, then we must thank the Minister of Veterans Affairs and his parliamentary assistant who are both objecting to the discussion. They will have to be responsible for the potential failure of the veterans who are to be settled under the new act.

The CHAIRMAN: The motion of the hon. member for Temiscouata has now been received by me. I shall read it to the committee. Mr. Pouliot moves that:

Paragraph (d) of section 2 be repealed and the following substituted therefor: "veteran" means a person who at any time during world war II has been in the militia, the air force or naval services of the Canadian forces, whether serving voluntarily or in virtue of the National Resources Mobilization Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Have we passed section 1?

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member for Temiscouata's motion is in order it would necessitate a new section being written into the bill which would become section 1, because it amends section 2 of the act. Section 1 of the bill amends section 3 of the act.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman, as I understand it, changes the definition of a veteran to include persons who had less than one year's service and who are not now qualified under the provisions of the act. Therefore it would impose additional taxes upon the revenues of the country and is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: I have reread and studied the amendment of the hon. member. It seems obvious that it would extend the benefits of this act to a large group of men who served during world war II in the way in which he suggests.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not wish to interrupt you, sir, because I have the greatest respect for the Chair and for you personally. The minister has complained that this will mean an increased expenditure because I change the definition of the bill. Whoever heard of such a thing? I do not propose any additional expenditures; I want to change the definition of a veteran; I want the right one.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: If the hon. gentleman would listen to me it would be to his advantage. But, sir, I speak to you with the greatest respect. I will tell you that I put aside all formality, but I abided by one, namely, to put the amendment in writing. My amendment is perfectly regular.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: I ask the minister please to keep quiet. My experience at the bar has been as long as his, if not a little longer.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. May I ask the hon. member for Temiscouata to confine his remarks directly to the point of order and make them as brief as possible.

Mr. POULIOT: That is what I want to do, sir. Of course, law is supposed to be common sense and if a definition is wrong it should be improved. My idea is not to increase the expenditures of this country. By the way, I am not proposing this bill; it is the hon. gentleman who proposes it. I am asking for a change.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I must rise to a point of order. A point of order must be confined definitely to the point of order raised. I say to you, sir, that 100,000 men who had less than twelve months' service are affected under the proposed amendment of the hon. gentleman. I ask you, sir, whether or not it is in order. We are not discussing the merits or demerits of the amendment, but whether or not it is in order.

Mr. POULIOT: I shall confine myself strictly to the point of order. Since I have no other means of communication I shall have to say a few words to do so.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I have heard the hon. member for Temiscouata. He maintains that the amendment would not involve additional expenditures. I do not think there is any doubt that it would involve additional expenditures. The effect of it would bring about additional expenditures, because it would bring in a great number of people who are not affected by the bill at the present time. Motions which involve the expenditure of money must first have the approval of His Excellency the Governor General, and be moved by a minister of the crown. I therefore rule that the amendment of the hon. member for Temiscouata is out of order.

Mr. POULIOT: I appeal to the chair from your ruling, and I shall put it in writing in virtue of the rules. When a question of order is decided by a chairman of the committee of the whole the member concerned has the right to appeal to the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The amendment is out of order. The hon. member says that he appeals, but he must be supported by four other hon. members before I can put the appeal.

Mr. Speaker took the chair and submitted the question to the house in the following terms:

The chairman of the committee of the whole ruled that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Temiscouata is out of order because the effect would be to increase the number of persons entitled to benefit by the bill, and would therefore impose added charges on the people. Such motions can be made only by a minister with the consent of the crown. The motion therefore was ruled out of order.

Whereupon Mr. Pouliot appealed from the ruling of the chairman.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chairman be confirmed? And the ruling was confirmed on the following division:

And the house having resumed in committee:

Mr. FULTON: Mr. Chairman, while we are discussing clause 1 and as has been the custom on clause 1 of the bills, I should like to bring to the attention of the minister the recommendation of the veterans affairs committee which is contained in its final report to the house, to be found on page 548 of Votes and Proceedings of Friday, July 26:

> Your committee has also reported the following recommendations to the house:
> 2. That the government give consideration to the introduction of a bill to amend the Veterans Land Act, 1942, to provide that the total cost of all homes over six thousand dollars presently constructed or in actual process of construction under the small holdings scheme be subsidized twenty-three and one-third per cent.

I appreciate that I cannot move that recommendation as an amendment to the present bill because it would involve the expenditure of public funds, but I would point out that this was a recommendation passed by the majority of the committee. It was based on difficulties which the veterans were experiencing in getting homes under the small holdings scheme and paying for homes which had been allotted to them under that scheme. Would the minister tell the committee whether the government has had this recommendation under consideration, and, if so, whether it proposes to introduce an amendment to the act in accordance with the terms of that recommendation?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The recommendation of the committee was most carefully considered, but the government is not prepared to go any farther than already indicated.

Mr. FULTON: If that is the government's position, and since we are debarred as private members from introducing amendments involving the expenditure of public funds, I realize that there is nothing we can do at this time to have such an amendment introduced. But I would like to outline briefly some of the considerations which induced the committee to make that recommendation in the hope that, by placing them on record and bringing them before the committee and to the attention of the government, we may possibly induce the government to give further consideration to this proposal and to take some action on it.

The committee will recall that the question was raised earlier this session as to the procedure being followed in giving veterans title to homes being built under the small holding scheme under the Veterans' Land Act. There were actual cases in which veterans who had been allotted houses and had made their arrangements to take possession and had given up other tenancies were told, when they came to take possession the homes allotted to them that, owing to the fact that the cost was more than $6,000, they would have to undertake to pay all the excess over $6,000 before they would be granted possession. That matter first came to my attention as a result of two cases which existed in Sherbrooke and which were personally investigated and can be verified. It is known that the same situation prevails throughout other parts of the country where building projects of thirty or forty houses in a group have been proceeded with under the small holdings scheme on a cost-plus basis, and I think the government passed a vote of a million dollars to equalize costs across the dominion.

When the director of the Veterans' Land Act was before the committee he admitted that in most cases the houses cost more than $6,000. So this recommendation was drafted and put to the committee suggesting that inasmuch as the government is prepared to subsidize the cost of a home up to $6,000 to the extent of 23⅓ per cent of its value, they should make the same subsidy available with respect also to that portion of the cost over $6,000. The objection raised to that was that the veteran who was getting a $7,000 home would be able to get it for the same price as the veteran who was getting a $6,000 home. But the objection does not apply because, if you make the same proportion of subsidy available, it means that the same proportion of the total cost would be underwritten by the government. Many veterans have already made their plans and are prepared to take up these homes, and if an amendment is not passed embodying the recommendation of the committee they will either be unable to take up the homes or be unable probably to meet the payments imposed on them to get possession.

I submit that the increase in cost which has resulted in the homes costing more than was expected by the veteran is not the veteran's fault. It is perhaps not quite fair to put all the blame at the door of the government, certainly not at the door of the Veterans' Land Act administration. It is merely one aspect of constantly rising costs, particularly building costs throughout the country. But the government having held out to the veterans the undertaking that they would be able to get these homes at $6,000, it seems to me only fair that the government should make that undertaking good by assuming a fair proportion of the cost of the homes in excess of $6,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE: If my hon. friend will permit an interruption, when I replied to him a moment ago what I meant to convey was that the government did not intend at this session to introduce any amendments along the lines suggested by my hon. friend, but does undertake to give most careful consideration during the recess to the recommendations of the committee.

Mr. FULTON: I am gratified to hear that statement of the minister.

The final point I would make, to bring this thing home to the minister, is that I had a letter to-day which I have not had time to bring to his attention. It is from Montreal and indicates the widespread nature of the difficulties which veterans are encountering, and it was to the effect that this particular veteran had intended to take up a house under the small holdings scheme, but he could not find a contractor anywhere to carry out his plan, cutting it down to the bone as he did, at less than $8,500. The statement he made, which I think reflects the attitude of veterans to this question, is that if the government does not take some steps to meet this difficulty it should in fairness announce publicly that the Veterans' Land Act will be dropped, or at least that the small holdings scheme under the act will be dropped, because so many veterans are encountering such great disappointment that they are coming to the point where they say, "Well, if they are not going to give us the benefit of the act as we understood we could have it they might as well drop the whole thing."

I thank the minister for the assurance he has just given us, but I would urge, certainly on behalf of those of us in the committee who supported this recommendation, if possible not to wait to consider it until the end of the session, but to introduce the thing at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. TUCKER: I am sure the committee would like to have some figures with regard to the small holdings section, because my hon. friend suggested that, unless his suggestion were carried out, the whole act might as well be dropped. To date 4,689—nearly 4,700—small holdings have been established, and 5,493 full-time farms.

Mr. FULTON: How many applications for small holdings have there been?

Mr. TUCKER: These are actual approvals.

Mr. FULTON: But how many applications?

Mr. TUCKER: Applications for qualifications granted have been 19,501.

Mr. FULTON: And 4,700 completed?

Mr. TUCKER: That is, applications for qualifications which have been granted in respect of small holdings. For full-time farms 16,841 qualifications have been granted and 5,493 have been actually approved and roughly settled; and of the 19,501 applications for qualifications under the small holdings scheme, as I have said 4,689 have been actually approved and settled.

Mr. FULTON: Just to clear up that point, I had reference only to the small holdings scheme, and I think these figures bear out my point: 19,000 applications and only 4,700 have gone to fruition now, eighteen months after V-E day and nearly a year after V-J day. I think this figure of a 15,000 backlog speaks for itself in support of the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. TUCKER: To complete the figures, I should state that it has been brought to my attention that, in regard to full-time farming, another 1,894 are pending; that is, are ready to go through; and in regard to small holdings there are another 1,649 pending, bringing the total up to about 6,200. So that, although all those have not been settled that have qualified, over 6,000 have actually been looked after—which I think is worth while.

Mr. FULTON: Worth while, but it leaves 13,000. Has the parliamentary assistant any figures as to the number of those settled in whose cases the total cost exceeded $6,000?

Mr. TUCKER: I am sorry I have not those exact figures, but they can be got and given. In regard to the position of a man who takes land under the Veterans' Land Act, if the cost of the property is $6,000 the down payment, of course, is $600; the contract is $4,000 at 3½ per cent, and that works out at a monthly payment of $20, plus taxes, for a $6,000 proposition. Of course, if the amount runs over $6,000 the amount will increase, but if it reaches $6,500 the total payment is only $25 a month plus taxes, so that is so much better than any other veteran gets under the housing act, and if we were to do even more for those who are under the small holdings part of the Veterans' Land Act I am sure it would cause criticism.

Mr. PROBE: I feel that I must make at this moment a few observations on the small holdings section of the Veterans' Land Act, and particularly, of course, relating it to the district from which I come and the constituency I represent. According to the figures which the parliamentary assistant gave us a moment ago with respect to the number of veterans who have been established either on small holdings or in full-time farming, we have to date a rough percentage of from 1½ to 2 per cent of the persons who were in the armed forces of Canada who are now settled under one or other of these two full-time farming or small holdings sections of the Veterans' Land Act. To my mind the act in principle is the most laudable way in which the Canadian people can assist to rehabilitate those veterans requiring rehabilitation in the form of full-time agriculture, fishing, or homes.

I should like at this stage to pay a compliment to the Minister of Veterans Affairs with respect to what very small assistance has been given in small holdings in my own city. It is not a left-handed compliment; I want to compliment him sincerely, and then I am going to point out certain deficiencies as well in the programme. We have in my city about twenty-five homes completed under the small holdings section of the Veterans' Land Act, with some fifteen more in prospect. I visited those homes last winter, and I have not the same remarks to make with respect to the contractors who worked on the small holdings housing in Regina that were made in connection with Bennett & White of Calgary by some of the Alberta members.

Mr. FULTON: Bennett & White are building the homes in British Columbia, and their costs are excessive there too.

Mr. PROBE: I believe our costs in Regina were reasonable compared with those of small holdings across Canada generally. The construction was excellent. The officials of the land act were courteous enough to allow me to inspect carefully the dwellings which had already been completed, and I had an opportunity to speak to the veterans who were already living in those homes. Without exception the construction, to my lay eye, was good, and the remarks of the veterans were complimentary to the department. But the sad part in connection with all this is that fewer than forty Regina veterans have had an opportunity to be settled under such an excellent plan.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs has repeatedly stated that he is not interested in housing as such. I maintain that the minister and every other hon. member and every citizen of this country should take an interest in housing as such, and particularly with reference to veterans, because it was the veterans' families who were unable to shuttle into houses as they became vacant during the period of the war. Now that they are trying to reestablish their families, as far as the veterans are concerned the war is not yet over. The minister should reconsider the building programme which has been undertaken under the small holdings legislation of the land act, and he should extend the terms under which veterans can take small properties. Holdings should not necessarily be large lots of half an acre, or one acre or larger in extent. Some provision should be made for those persons who are unable to take advantage of the suburban feature of the small holdings settlement.

I do not wish to speak at great length, but I submit that it is our duty as members of the House of Commons to provide buildings for more than a favoured few who will be able to take the homes that have been built by the Department of Veterans Affairs. When we consider that less than two per cent of the veterans of Canada are at present enjoying the generous benefits of this act; when we consider that the rest of them have not had an opportunity to set up housekeeping on their own behalf in homes at the reasonable prices that obtained before the war; when we think of the gratuities which they have received, which, in terms of money may sound excellent but in terms of rent at $50, $60, $70 or $80 a month for very much limited accommodation is another matter, then I maintain that we have not done our duty adequately as citizens of Canada. Under these circumstances, when we speak of gratitude to those who served us in time of need, it is simply so much eyewash. We must extend the conditions, making them more flexible, so that the veterans need not be grouped in colonies on the outskirts of any city or village or town if it is possible to provide them with alternative homes. The minister must reexamine the wishes of the Canadian people in regard to providing homes for these veterans. We must make it our business to see that they are provided with shelter. We must help them to reestablish their families, which in many cases are breaking up because of lack of accommodation, and we can do this in the same way that we equipped the soldiers with tanks, the airmen with aircraft and the seamen with corvettes and submarines. We did it in time of war and in time of peace we owe it to our buddies who wore the uniform to do likewise.

Mr. TUCKER: One thing I would say before section 1 carries. It will be noted that this section has reference to the actual set-up of the department, and the amendment proposed will confer administrative authority on the minister, which is really in line with what the committee thought was the proper application of the principle of responsible government. It is needless for me to say that this amendment does not constitute a reflection on the director personally. He is regarded by our committee—and I am sure the minister will agree with me in this regard—as a man of ability, integrity and devotion to duty, for whom the government and the select committee have the highest respect. This is simply designed to affirm the vital principle of responsible government, the responsibility of the executive to parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I say a word to endorse what the hon. member has said. I know of no public servant in the dominion who has rendered more devoted, sustained and able service to the country than the director.

Mr. KIDD: I think the attention of the minister and of the committee should be brought to the situation of many of our boys in the urban centres. This act makes provision for boys who go out of town one or two or more miles and take up a farm or small holdings. There are boys, however, who have come back to splendid jobs. They have returned from overseas, in many instances with their wives and perhaps one or two children. Some of them have no wish to go outside the city a few miles. They left their families in the city and they would like to have their homes in the city also. Sometimes their parents have given them a piece of land, or they may be able to purchase a lot, and they should be enabled to build right in the city. They have not been able to find homes for themselves. Many of them have had to live in single rooms; many have been living with their parents. This act should be extended so as to include some provision for these young men. If they can find homes in the urban centres they will be near schools, churches and other services of that kind, but if they have to go outside the city you will have to build schools and churches for them. These boys do not want that. If the Minister of Reconstruction were here I would emphasize the importance of this suggestion. These boys should be able to apply for the grant and take the grant and go and build homes for themselves. The Minister of Reconstruction says it cannot be done—I do not say the present minister is of that view—but I claim that it can be done. Like the hon. member for Regina City, I am speaking for young men in an urban area, the Kingston area. Many of these men are to-day employed as skilled mechanics, and all they want is to be allowed to take the grant and get a lot and build. The veteran works eight hours a day, but he has another sixteen hours in the day and he and some of his family and relatives can dig the basement and put up the frame of the house. If the Minister of Reconstruction would grant him a special concession he could go to a housing unit and obtain a keg of nails, a few window sills, two-by-four scantlings, bathtub, electrical fixtures and so on, and in my opinion he would put up a house quite economically. I urge this on behalf of those veterans who are in the urban centres.

Mr. MACKENZIE: With very much of what my hon. friend has said I agree, but there is one basic principle in the Veterans' Land Act which must be considered. It was fundamentally designed for the settlement of farms, and afterwards there developed the small holdings feature which became by far the most popular feature of the act.

Mr. PROBE: Rightly so.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am sorry I was not privileged to listen to the hon. member for Regina City—that was my loss—for the reason that I had another appointment. May I say, however, that if you admit the principle of urban housing under the Veterans' Land Act, then, in my judgment, though I may be wrong, you destroy the fundamental feature of that act, which is farm settlement. In the second place, you offer to those who come under the terms of the Veterans' Land Act advantages which the ordinary veteran under the other housing schemes does not possess or enjoy. You might, if a veteran, have all the advantages of this conditional subsidy, say one hundred yards outside a city limit, and a veteran inside the city limits under the ordinary terms of the various other housing schemes, which is discrimination as between veterans who have rendered equally distinguished service to the country. That is the problem. My personal opinion is that you should keep the Veterans' Land Act for farm settlement as much as possible.

Mr. MUTCH: There are things in the Veterans' Land Act to which I personally take exception. I went into it fully in the veterans committee, and I do not propose at this time to reiterate the arguments that I used there. But I am concerned about the series of regulations which have grown up as a result of the bringing together of the various housing schemes in Canada which include the small holdings under the Veterans' Land Act and the other housing schemes administered by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. I take some exception to the expressed opinion that the small holdings part of the Veterans' Land Act was primarily conceived as rural settlement on small holdings. I do not deny the fact that when the act was conceived in 1942 that was the basic idea; but I suggest that, as a result of conditions which were no one's fault and over which there was perhaps no possible control, the practice in the first two years has been to make it practically an adjunct to urban housing of veterans. That situation has arisen. The minister and others have said in the committe and here that, if recent methods continue there will be discrimination between veterans, the one within the city limits and the one on the outside. I am aware that there may be, but I suggest to the committee that that discrimination already exists, and I fear it will exist in greater degree if we depart sharply from the practice of offering the advantages of suburban homes to urban workers. If we stop that practice which has existed we shall have discrimination, which, to my mind, is equally bad as the discrimination within cities which the minister fears.

In the committee the director first informed us that the cooperation with reconstruction did not involve any amendment of the act or changes in the regulations. But already by agreement it has come about that the practice of extending small holding advantages to veterans who work in the cities has been curtailed by limiting the construction of houses in groups of more than six. With that I take no serious issue, because I am one of those who have always believed that it was not good practice from the point of view of rehabilitation to construct what I and others have sometimes called "veterans villages".

I conceive the proper measure of the rehabilitation of a veteran to be to permit him to come back to communal life in his community with as little to remind him of his military experience as possible and to set him apart from his neighbour as little as may be humanly possible. To me that is complete rehabilitation. I would remind the committee, the minister and all who have had anything to do with this matter, that the veterans department itself, in its literature, the government and most of us as candidates and members during the last two years have held out this idea to the veteran—I am speaking now of the veterans from the cities—that while it was not practicable or desirable for him to go out into the country and become a full-fledged farmer—in many instances he is not capable of doing that, and in practically no instance does he want to do it—we had something for him. It was this: if he had a modest, steady income and if he was prepared to go outside the corporate limits of the city where he was employed and could meet the other qualifications he would be assisted to establish himself in a home on a better standard than he could maintain as a city dweller, at a lower cost, through lower taxation and various other considerations. We reduced the acreage to half an acre in some of these places. It is all right to say that we did that because there was a desperate need, we had to get the houses close together, and had to get contractors who would deal with these housing blocks, and so forth. All these things are true. I think the reduction to half an acre was a recognition that we had made a commitment to these city veterans. We were not able to go, and I do not think we should go, inside the corporate limits of a city of any size, and have veterans houses compete on the same street with war-time houses which are being built for veterans. I do not think we should do that.

Many of these city veterans delayed making their applications for veterans housing on the advice of members of the house and of the committee, and of people like myself. I have done it. I have said, "You have some time to decide; do not jump at it now. Wait until the pressure is off." That man may now find himself in a position, as a result of these agreements, where he cannot get into the scheme, and therefore, in these circumstances, he may not be able to get a house at all.

I have been told—and I accept it—that by this agreement the Department of Reconstruction and Supply are prepared to consider suitable applications of individuals and even of groups of six, even though the property selected falls within an adjacent municipality with a population in excess of 5,000; that is, if there is suitable land available. I am not very happy about that regulation because I have had some experience and I know the intent behind it. I know what has been done. There are areas in the city from which I come where the municipalities of five, six or seven thousand immediately adjacent to the city limits still have vast open areas. If you insisted on a man going outside that municipality he would be twelve or fifteen miles out. I suggest that this is a situation which requires to be closely watched by the minister and by the administration. I realize it is not a direct reflection on this act, or on the administrator, except in so far as it is a matter of agreement with the Minister of Munitions and Supply and his officers.

If the result of this legislation is to make it difficult or impossible for a veteran who works in the city, and who normally lived in the city and who has the other qualifications for a home under the Small Holdings Act, to obtain that home, then I say the agreement will constitute a breach of faith with the veteran. I base that suggestion on the literature of the Department of Veterans Affairs. I base it on the information which has been given by the counsellors to veterans returning from overseas to every district of Canada. I base it on information and advice which I as a member and an employee of the Department of National Defence myself gave when I was in the service. I am concerned that this shall not be the case. I am not urging that we should compete within the city limits with wartime housing or any other housing scheme. Under the Veterans' Land Act I understand it is not practicable to house all the veterans of Canada on small holdings on the fringes of cities. I know that perfectly well, but I am concerned that it shall not happen that a veteran, if he works in a city and is going to get a small holding will only get it in the slums or in the bush, where his house will not be conspicuously better than some other chap has had, because that other veteran insisted on getting an urban house and took a wartime housing one.

What I have been saying is not a criticism; it is a warning, an indication of a danger, of something I think perhaps may indicate a trend. It is a frank warning that if what I fear develops, in my opinion it will be a breach of faith, and as such I shall raise as much ructions as I am capable of raising here and hereafter.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The matter of small holdings has now been brought into this discussion. A short time ago I was talking to the minister about this matter and asked when it could be discussed to the best advantage; and at that time he thought perhaps it should be discussed on his estimates. I am just wondering if the minister has his material at hand now. I saw him leave the chamber a few minutes ago; was he able to get his material?

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I suggest to my hon. friend that if we have a difference of opinion about the situation in Calgary, we might defer it until my estimates come up?

[Mr. Mutch.]

Mr. JOHNSTON: I shall be only too pleased to do so. I have my material here, but I would not for the world take advantage of the minister. I want him to be able to produce all his evidence, and then show him where he is wrong.

Mr. BENTLEY: Before we went into committee of the whole late this afternoon, I was making a few remarks in regard to the failure of the veterans committee to recommend that the Veterans' Land Act be amended to permit the formation of cooperative farms. I got pretty well along with my argument before Mr. Speaker caught up to me and said I was out of order, so I had to stop, and I should now like to conclude my remarks. All other hon. members who have risen to-night have started off by saying it is not their purpose to take up the time of the committee. I am going to be honest and admit that I am going to take a few minutes of the time of the committee, regrettable though that may seem.

I was pointing out the attempts which have been made in my province to assist veterans to form cooperative farms on crown land. Before I was called to order, I had pointed out also that in our province we have a number of large farms the owners of which are now prepared to sell; but the $6,000 allowed under the Veterans' Land Act would not permit a veteran to buy one of these farm units, because they are too big and too expensive. If one of them was bought and broken up it would not make economic farm units, but as a whole it is an economic unit that can be farmed in a big way. If veterans were allowed to pool their loans and grants to form a cooperative farm, those who wished to do so, there would be a possibility of these veterans becoming rehabilitated. We have seen amendments moved here and ruled out of order because they had some effect on the financial arrangements, and we are told that is a prerogative of the minister with permission of the crown. I am going to move an amendment that does not involve the expenditure of a single nickel. I hope I have worded it in such a way that neither you, Mr. Chairman, nor the minister nor his parliamentary assistant can find in it any suggestion of recommending a nickel of increased expenditure on behalf of the veterans. This is the motion, which is seconded by the hon. member for Melfort:

> That the Veterans' Land Act be amended to permit qualified veterans to form or join with cooperative farms, without prejudice to their grants and loans.

I do not believe that involves any increased expenditure, and therefore should be in order.

Mr. TUCKER: Just while the chairman is looking over the amendment proposed by the hon. member, I was under the impression that he concurred in the report of this subcommittee which dealt with this matter, which report was also concurred in by the main committee. I was just wondering if that were the case, because if he did concur in it I find it strange that he should move this amendment. Did he concur in the report of that subcommittee?

Mr. BENTLEY: The hon. member for Rosthern is quite right. Whenever I am hungry and somebody offers me a cup of tea and a sandwich, I take it, though I may want a steak. As soon as I have had the cup of tea and sandwich, however, I immediately try to get the steak; and that is what I am now doing. I concurred in all I could get the subcommittee to agree on, and now I want more; I want a full meal for these veterans. I see nothing inconsistent about that, because I am still hungry.

Mr. TUCKER: I should like to read to the committee the recommendation which was concurred in by the hon. member, as to the course of action recommended to this house; and I find it strange now that he should depart from that to which he agreed. After all, if we are not to abide by our agreements in these things I am afraid it is going to be difficult to get along. Here is what the hon. member recommended as to our course of action:

> The committee, while sympathetic to any suggestion which may contribute to the successful rehabilitation of veterans, was unable to find a solution to the administrative problems inherent in Mr. Sturdie's proposal, and concurred in the sub-committee's recommendation that the facilities offered under existing legislation for land settlement on a cooperative basis be further explored, and that the departmental officers continue negotiations with the province in an endeavour to formulate some mutually satisfactory scheme.

In other words, my hon. friend admitted that, while he was sympathetic to the suggestion he is now making, he was unable to find a solution of the administrative problems involved. Surely, if he admitted at the time this report was made that he could not find a solution of the administrative problems involved in what he is now recommending, he would not ask this committee to adopt a motion which he admits cannot be administratively handled at the present time, until further study is given.

Mr. BENTLEY: Oh, yes; I would and I do. I was there when that meeting took place and I concurred in the report. The subcommittee could not find a solution of these administrative problems; I could not convince them that the solution was there, so that I agreed to go as far as the subcommittee was prepared to go. I am now asking this committee of the whole to go this much farther. The parliamentary assistant and myself can continue to reiterate our positions from now until eleven o'clock, if he wishes. I have stated my position and he has stated his. That is where the matter stands. I agreed then, but I want more.

Mr. TUCKER: Well, my hon. friend sort of challenged me to find any fault with his amendment. I do find fault with it, on the ground that an amendment to a bill must amend a certain section of the bill, and must not express a vague principle. On that ground I suggest it is quite out of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I remind the hon. member for Swift Current what is said in the last few lines of the report of the subcommittee, in which he concurred:

> . . . that the facilities offered under existing legislation for land settlement on a cooperativte basis be further explored, and that the departmental officers continue negotiations with the province in an endeavour to formulate some mutually satisfactory scheme.

Is that not better than what he is now suggesting?

Mr. BENTLEY: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh, yes, it is.

Mr. BENTLEY: Failing to get what I am asking now, I will still accept that; I will still accept sandwiches if I cannot get beefsteak.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Do you want a ruling on this?

Mr. MACKENZIE: No; I think it is withdrawn.

Mr. BENTLEY: No, Mr. Chairman, it is not withdrawn. I have moved the amendment, and it is up to you to accept it or rule it out of order.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I think the hon. member will have to redraft it if he wishes it to be in order, or bring in another amendment entirely. I rule the amendment out of order. Shall section 1 carry?

Mr. FULTON: While this controversy has been going on, I have been doing some figuring on the information supplied by the parliamentary assistant. Using the round figures he gave, of 19,000 applications and 4,700 actually approved and constructed, I find that this means that 75 per cent of the applicants have not yet been settled. If I take the additional 1,600 applications which he said had been approved, but in which construction had not been commenced, that leaves 66 per cent of the applicants in connection with whom no start has been made to have them settled. I point out these figures again as indicating the strongest possible reasons why the minister should pursue this matter with all diligence in order to find some solution.

I should like to say something further, so as to clear up any possible misconception which might result from what the parliamentary assistant has said. He pointed out that veterans under the small holdings scheme were getting more generous treatment than veterans under any other housing scheme could get. The point that is relevant there is that the type of small holding I had reference to was not any small holding project under the act. The type I referred to were those cases where the government was in charge of the building. It made the contracts in most cases on a cost-plus basis, nevertheless it had control over costs; and for various reasons, perhaps beyond the government's control, costs increased. But it was a government housing scheme. Therefore the veteran is in no way responsible for that increase in cost. It might be said that he gets more benefit under it, but I am simply saying that the government scheme cost is more than the government first indicated it would be, and that is the basis of the submission that they should now do something about the matter.

Mr. BROOKS: Although I do not intend to labour the question of small holdings, I should like to say a few words. When the small holdings element was introduced to the bill we never expected it would be as large as it is. My idea of it at first was that it would be for pensioners, in order to give them a little extra land, and something extra to do. It has now become a housing project.

My suggestion, however, was in connection with the administration of the act. I believe there is a bottleneck in many of the districts in connection with the searching of titles and the preparation of different documents. My information is that in certain sections there are one or two lawyers who are trying to do all the work, instead of spreading it over, and giving it to a greater number of lawyers in the smaller districts. I suggest to the minister that the matter be investigated carefully, because I know in the city of Saint John in my own province there are one or two lawyers who are trying to do most of the work for that province. The result is that there are many delays, and transfers of property which perhaps should take two or three days are now taking four or five or six weeks.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. MACKENZIE: I shall look into the suggestion of the hon. member.

Mr. STEPHENSON: Before six o'clock I asked the minister several questions, the first of which had to do with land analysis of farms bought for veterans. Is there any analysis made, under the Veterans' Land Act. I have in mind one instance where a farm was supposed to have been purchased to be sold to veterans, and it was indicated to me that a very good junior farmer had been on the land for four or five years but had to give it up because the soil was not suitable for farming purposes. Yet that land had been bought under the Veterans' Land Act. Is any check made?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I shall take the hon. member's observations into consideration, and if I am fortunate enough to receive the details I shall have the matter looked into at once.

Mr. STEPHENSON: Another point was that it takes a long time to go through the transaction, after the veteran has agreed to purchase the land. In some cases it requires from six to eight months. Possibly local lawyers as suggested by the hon. member for Royal, could be used to speed up the transaction, instead of lawyers in Toronto.

Mr. TUCKER: I would say to the hon. member that in his province of Ontario, where he has not the more advanced system that we have in the west, it sometimes takes a long time to secure title. That is one cause of delay. Of course, when that does happen a veteran may feel aggrieved. Then there are times when there is difficulty to get possession. I assure the hon. member that any complaints along that line have received earnest consideration from the administration in order to eliminate all possible delay.

Mr. STEPHENSON: Then I asked a question about small holdings. I received a return on June 12 to a question in which I had asked how many houses were being built under small holdings in Canada. The answer was that there were about 3,000. Apparently out of that number only about 400 had been completed. It would seem that many of these houses have been under construction for some time, and yet there does not seem to be any great effort made to complete them. Is the reason found in the fact that the prices of the houses are beyond the means of veterans to pay?

In one particular case 100 acres were bought for small holdings, but only four houses have been built. I understand that the remainder of the 100 acres is not to be used for this purpose. Possibly this indicates that the housing is not of the type the veterans want.

Mr. MACKENZIE: My recollection is that 1,200 have been completed under the Veterans' Land Act, and it is the hope of the department that the entire lot will be completed by the middle of next month.

Mr. STEPHENSON: Does the minister say the entire lot will be completed next month?

Mr. TUCKER: The middle of September.

Mr. STEPHENSON: According to this return, tabled on June 12, only 408 had been occupied.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There has been substantial progress since then in the building of houses. I am told by the officials that 1,200 have now been completed, and they expect 4,700 to be completed by the middle of September.

Mr. STEPHENSON: Will the minister say whether he thinks this programme being carried out is really what the veteran wants, in view of the fact that they are not completing houses already there? In this instance, where 100 acres were bought, with the intention of building ninety houses, I am told that four were started, and that now, after many months, the houses are still there, uncompleted. I understand that the remainder of the land is to be sold and not used for small holdings.

Mr. TUCKER: Where is that?

Mr. STEPHENSON: Two miles outside my town of Port Hope, Ontario. This seems to indicate that the plan is not just what the soldiers want. Is it the government's plan to continue this programme?

Mr. TUCKER: This scheme under the Veterans' Land Act administration, under which there is the actual building of houses, was an emergency measure to try to get something done so as to have houses ready for occupancy. But there was no intention of the Department of Veterans Affairs or the Veterans' Land Act administration to continue to build houses on a scale like that. They have not been completed largely because of a lack of some materials.

For example, just before the dinner recess one hon. member referred to fifty houses in the township of Scarboro, and 100 in the county of Ontario. I am told that those houses were held up for lack of flooring. However, it is realized that it is necessary to have these houses finished and have them occupied. This effort has been made, by agreement with the Department of Reconstruction, and it is expected that they will all be completed by the middle of September. I can tell my hon. friend that there are probably twenty applications for every house available under the scheme.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is the whole question. Proof of the success of the whole venture is the demand for tremendous expansion and extension of it throughout Canada.

Mr. STEPHENSON: It indicates to me that that is not so, because, if this is the type of house the veteran needs, why would they dispose of the remainder of the 100 acres purchased for that purpose? According to my information, there has been no application by soldiers for these houses being built there at the present time.

Another case I might mention was one where all that was left to be done was the laying of the hardwood flooring. The flooring was already in the house; it was not a case of there being no flooring. It was in the house, but was not laid. I was told the reason was that the hydro-electric authorities would not hook up the power line, which was only a short distance away. The flooring lay there several months, but the work was not completed. I am now informed by the hydro-electric people that they have been willing to make the hook-up since last February. Yet the reason given for the delay in the housing was that the hydro-electric people did not have the material to do it. There is something wrong somewhere.

Mr. BRACKEN: I am sure the committee has listened with interest to the discussion of these matters during the last hour or so. Arising out of that discussion, particularly the comments made by the parliamentary assistant and by the Minister of Veterans Affairs, I have two or three questions to ask.

The measure before us is one providing for certain amendments to the Veterans' Land Act. The primary purpose of the act was the reestablishment of veterans on farms. But a supplementary section provided for the building of homes on small holdings in the neighbourhood of urban centres. The parliamentary assistant has given some statistics with respect to that and the Minister of Veterans Affairs made one comment, about which I should like to ask him. He pointed out that the homes being built on these small holdings under the Veterans' Land Act are provided to those taking them, under more favourable terms than are the houses which are built under some of the other government schemes, and he intimated that the continuance of this programme would mean further discrimination with respect to the assistance rendered to veterans settling in urban centres and on these small holdings. The question I would ask him is this: How did the government come to get into that position and to bring in one measure which is more favourable to home builders than the others? I presume he has an answer.

The other questions I wish to ask are prompted by the statistics given by the parliamentary assistant. He told us of the number of applicants for farms, the number of applicants for homes on these small holdings, the number of applications that had been approved and the number of veterans who have been settled under both schemes. I gathered from his remarks that the government was discontinuing the policy of making homes available to veterans under this small holdings plan because of what the minister called discrimination. If that is true, since the parliamentary assistant indicated that there were some 19,000 applications and some 4,700 or 4,800 veterans had been settled in homes, I would ask, at what point is the government discontinuing that project?

I have another question. The understanding was that these homes would not cost more than $6,000. The veterans who were assisted in purchasing them understood that they were to cost $6,000 or less, but in actual practice the government finds that many of the houses constructed are costing more than that. How many of these houses will cost $6,000 or less? How many of them will cost $6,000 or more? What is the estimated excess cost of all these houses above the $6,000 originally estimated? I hope I have made my questions clear.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I will answer my hon. friend's question in regard to the Veterans' Land Act and leave some of them to my assistant to answer. Before my hon. friend joined us in our councils here, we had formed a committee which worked hard for eighteen months. On that committee were many practical farmers, some of whom I think my hon. friend knows from Manitoba. After eighteen months' study that committee made some very fine recommendations, the basic feature of which was settlement on farms. At that time, as my hon. friend knows, prices for land were much less than they are to-day. The basic selling price then was $4,800, but we found it necessary about a year afterwards to raise that to $6,000.

Another recommendation which that committee made, which was entirely ancillary, was for small holdings, which was never considered to be a basic feature of the act, but as we went along we found it to be the most popular feature.

[Mr. Bracken.]

Mr. GREEN: Explain what it was for.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The essential principle behind the small holdings plan was that the veteran who had a job in a city or municipality would have a little place outside the city, a home and a patch of land where he could raise vegetables and do gardening after his day's work in the city was done.

Mr. GREEN: He would be partly self-sustaining.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): He could raise poultry and so on.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Absolutely. That was the idea. The committee were agreed about this in 1942, and we thought we were doing a fairly good job, but what happened since then was that this rural settlement feature developed into a housing problem. My hon. friend asked why we gave these special privileges to veterans.

Mr. BRACKEN: I wanted to know why you gave more to one group of settlers than to others.

Mr. MACKENZIE: To be absolutely frank, I think the real answer is that the housing policy of the government in other directions was not developed at that time.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It is not yet.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is coming along and, I hope, will be successful. But the basic idea of all the members of the committee of 1942 was to combine a rural environment with employment for the veteran in the nearby city or municipality. That was done because the other housing features were not then developed, except Wartime Housing Limited. But now we have the three features, Wartime Housing, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and the Veterans' Land Act housing all incorporated in one housing scheme. That is the explanation and the answer to my hon. friend's question.

Mr. BRACKEN: Would the minister or the parliamentary assistant answer my other question with respect to houses under the small holdings scheme?

Mr. TUCKER: Just along the lines of what the leader of the opposition has said, the preamble of the act states.

And whereas part-time farming coupled with other employment is an increasingly important aspect of rural and semi-rural life in Canada; . . . it is the purpose of the dominion government to provide a measure of financial assistance to veterans on their performance of prescribed settlement conditions in order to promote their engaging in agricultural pursuits either as a full-time occupation or as a part-time occupation coupled with some other employment.

That was the preamble to the act. But what happened was that there was such pressure to get houses that some veterans argued: We do not need two acres or three acres; cut down the amount because we do not need all this land. They kept pressing and pressing, and our department, being inclined to be a little too kind-hearted, finally let the amount be cut down to half an acre. The original basis was $2,320 with respect to a full-time farm and up to $1,400 with respect to the small holding to give the veteran an equity in his land as a farmer. But when that was turned into an urban housing scheme the reason for giving the grant was gone. Right away, if you permit it to be expanded into an urban housing scheme, you are going to have the act distorted from the original intention of parliament. So there had to be a courageous facing up to the situation. I will say this, that the parliamentary committee drew forcibly to the government's attention that we were departing from the original intention of this act, and many hon. members suggested that we had better get back to the original intention of leaving urban housing to be dealt with in some other act. That is true.

With regard to the other matter mentioned by the leader of the opposition, I would not want him to think there is any intention of running away from the original intention of this act. Where there is a genuine application for a small holding, there would be no hesitation in authorizing it. The only thing which is being discontinued is the building of houses ahead of time in large blocks for veterans to go into them.

It has been mentioned by the hon. member for Kingston City that if a man were given the chance to build his own house he could make a better job of it. For a house costing up to about $2,500, if a man indicates that he is going to put up a reasonably good structure he is permitted to go ahead and build his own house; if it is over that amount, in order to protect the investment of the veteran and the department, he is supposed to present a contract with some carpenter who may be regarded as likely to put up a reasonably good structure.

In regard to the costs of the houses, as probably is known to the leader of the opposition, at the time this million dollar write-off was authorized a committee was set up, consisting of the deputy minister and the director, to examine each project carefully and make the appropriate write-down to bring the houses into line with what would be a fair cost in the particular community, writing off any unusual costs. To give here all the figures he has asked for in regard to all these houses would be a tremendous job, but they are available and if he would like to have them we will give him charts covering all of them.

Mr. BRACKEN: I did not expect an answer to this question to-night, but I thought it could be given some time before the bill received third reading.

Mr. TUCKER: May I say to the leader of the opposition I hope we shall be fortunate enough to get third reading to-night, and we can give him the information on the estimates. The average cost so far of houses under the small holdings scheme is encouraging—$4,262 for 4,685 small holdings. The information is worked out in an appendix to our veterans affairs proceedings, which will be found by hon. members to be filled with information, starting at page 787. As I say, it contains a tremendous amount of information regarding the monthly rental costs and so on of different houses under the Veterans' Land Act. I shall not take time to go into it unless it is requested; but I would repeat, in case the leader of the opposition was not here when I mentioned it before, that where a house costs $6,000 there is $600 paid down by the veteran, and his monthly payment after that is only $20.20.

Mr. MacNICOL: For how many years?

Mr. TUCKER: For twenty-five years. The payment is $20.20 plus taxes—which I think most hon. members will admit is less than the average rental one would pay for ordinary housing.

Mr. JOHNSTON: What did the minister say was the average cost of the houses?

Mr. TUCKER: $4,262.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is to the veteran. It is not the cost of construction.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Is that the average for the five-roomed house or the six-roomed house?

Mr. TUCKER: Taking all these small holdings, that is the net cost to the veteran after the write-off.

Mr. BRACKEN: If the parliamentary assistant will permit me, that is not the question I asked. I asked, what is the cost of the houses, not the cost to the veteran but to the state? How many of them cost less than $6,000 and how many of them cost more? The parliamentary assistant gave a figure of some $4,200, was it?

Mr. TUCKER: It is $4,262.

Mr. BRACKEN: He said that was the cost to the veteran. I want the net cost to the state.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That will vary in every area in Canada. We had considerable trouble in getting contractors to accept contracts, and in some cases we had to make these contracts on a cost-plus fee basis, the ordinary fee being about $180 to $250 per house. In some parts of Canada, on account of peculiar difficulties, of which my hon. friend probably knows, the cost of the houses was very high. In other places, like the first ones built on Lulu island, in British Columbia, they were most remarkably low. Prices depended on such factors as climate, weather, material, labour, and transportation. For instance, in Quebec there was some trouble which is now under investigation, and there may be other factors in addition to climate. That matter may have to go to the courts.

Mr. BRACKEN: That is readily admitted, but those are not the points I was raising. Just in order to make it clear, what I wanted to know—and I recognize that the minister or his assistant perhaps cannot get the information accurately in a hurry, and I am not asking them to go to a lot of trouble to try to find out—

Mr. MACKENZIE: The houses are not yet completed. We cannot tell.

Mr. BRACKEN: If you cannot answer my questions, you cannot. But here are the questions. How many of these houses is it estimated will cost $6,000 or less?

Mr. MACKENZIE: "Estimated?"

Mr. BRACKEN: That is not to the veteran. The veteran may pay a much smaller amount than it costs. You may use this million dollars to write off some of it, and there is this direct grant to him. But what does it cost you? How many of these houses will cost you less than $6,000? How many will cost you more than $6,000? What do you estimate is the average excess cost of the whole project over $6,000 each?

Mr. TUCKER: I would say to the leader of the opposition that on some of the projects it should be possible to get the cost of the houses and the land and the services and provide them on the estimates, because the committee which I have mentioned have been working on the thing and they have the charts and the full returns; and if he would permit, by the time we come to the estimates we shall have more complete information, because there will be more houses finished. But I promise him that we will give him the fullest possible information on the cost of these projects.

Mr. BRACKEN: That will be satisfactory.

Mr. BRADSHAW: I should like to fight the case of these houses in my riding of Perth which are not making very much progress regardless of the shortage of nails, lumber or any other materials. The houses were started a year ago last May, the land having been bought at some $200 an acre. When the houses were partly erected they were left over the winter, and the cellars filled with water and dirt. The whole matter is related to the problem of sewage disposal. The land was bought outside the city of Stratford; negotiations are going on with the city to provide for the sewage disposal, and there is also the question of educational facilities, since they are about a mile and a half from the centre of the town. These houses are going to cost the veterans very dear. While I am on my feet, I should like to urge that the government expedite the business of settling sales of land to the veterans. We have a case in our township of a veteran who bought land; it was appraised, and I take exception to the statement of the parliamentary assistant that the deeds of title were hard to search. Everything was completed. The veteran has sowed his crop and the owner has not yet received any money for his farm. I would urge some expedition in this matter.

Mr. TUCKER: I should be glad if the hon. gentleman would give us the actual facts of the case. We are anxious to check up whether there has been any improper delay.

Mr. LENNARD: That is another case of one lawyer in the city of Toronto trying to do all the work. He is making all the transfers of property for the province of Ontario.

Mr. JOHNSTON: With regard to eaves troughs, is it the practice when they are available to put them on houses that are occupied rather than on those that are at present under construction and not yet occupied?

Mr. TUCKER: It would depend on the contractor's idea of what was proper, because he is supposed to build according to specifications, and of course we do not take the houses over and clear them until everything is in accordance with the specifications. What the hon. member is asking about, I presume, is something that happens before the contractors turn the houses over to the department.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I will tell the parliamentary assistant exactly what I have reference to. I am still referring to Calgary houses, though I am not going to debate that question. It has been brought to my attention, however, that houses which have been occupied now for some six or seven months have no eaves troughs on them, while right across the street there are houses at present under construction, no one living in them, and no one likely to live in them for two or three months, that are being equipped with eaves troughs. The houses that the veterans are living in, not yet taken over by the government, are not so equipped, and these men are going ahead with landscaping which is being spoiled by the water that is coming down. What I should like to know is this. Where there are houses that are being occupied, which have no eaves troughs, and where these eaves troughs are available, will steps be taken to see that they are put on those houses rather than on houses right across the street which are not yet occupied and will not be for two or three months?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Is my hon. friend commencing to debate the question of houses in Calgary?

Mr. JOHNSTON: No, I am not.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Because I am ready for him.

Mr. JOHNSTON: If you have your material I am ready too.

Mr. GREEN: Not to-night.

Mr. CHURCH: I have read the survey that was made of the soldiers overseas for the purpose of ascertaining what they desired to do on returning to Canada, and I am not surprised at the attitude of many of them. I have seen some of the results of the operation of land settlement after the last war; and I do not think this amendment, repealing section 3 of the act of 1942 and appointing a large staff consisting of a director and others, will meet the requirements. I do not believe that you will get many soldiers to sign agreements under these provisions. Many of the returned soldiers would like to take up market gardening on the outskirts of cities like Toronto and Hamilton, but too many restrictions are imposed upon them. I appreciate the principle of the bill, but I suggest that the minister and the Department of Veterans Affairs should be given the power to deal with these men. Many of the men want to take their gratuities and go in for market gardening. For the purpose they would like to buy a truck or a jeep, but they cannot do so and yet the very things that these men require are being thrown on the scrap heap. When the veterans want jeeps or trucks they are told to go to a dealer and see someone in Montreal in control of real estate. I have been communicating with one of those gentlemen for some time, as to soldiers getting into their homes, but I find that he is on holidays. When the veteran has to go to a dealer to buy a plough or a truck or a jeep he is charged three or four times more. Is it any wonder that these men are not going on the land?

The principle of settling men on the land started after the Fenian raid and it was again carried out after the South-African war. For a radius of sixty miles around our city veterans of the last war went in for dairy farming; they went into the live stock industry; they took up market gardening; and a system of roads, electrical railways, suburban railways, buses and so on was built up. One would naturally expect that with the return of these men's sons from overseas a great many of them would want to engage in these occupations, but I doubt whether you will get anyone to carry out the laborious provisions of section 2 of the new bill. The men are tied down to too many conditions. It would have been better for the act to leave the making of rules and regulations to the minister, instead of their being set out in the act. I do not believe that any soldier would care to sign the contract. The men were complaining. The minister has attempted to make rules and regulations from time to time. If the rules and regulations were improved they would be better than sections 2, 3 and 4.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Would the minister answer my questions?

Mr. TUCKER: Obviously we would have to get the answer from Calgary. We shall get the answer for him, and we shall be able to take it up on the estimates at the same time as we deal with the other matters if he is satisfied to leave it at that.

Mr. GREEN: It would be helpful if the Minister of Veterans Affairs would make a statement as to the present policy with regard to establishing veterans on small holdings. This evening he gave us the history of what has happened. Either he or his parliamentary assistant has intimated that a change of policy was made within the last few weeks. In the course of a speech on housing on July 22, the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply explained his idea of the small holdings policy. I should like to have confirmation of that policy from the minister to-night. Apparently the two departments are concerned. There must be approval by both the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. The remarks of the latter will be found at pages 3681 and 3682 of Hansard. I understood him to say that from now on small holdings will be established only within the boundaries of centres of 5,000 people or less, with this restriction, that if such centre is on the fringe of a metropolitan centre of 15,000, then there would be no small holdings even in that town of under 5,000. He did say that there were certain exceptions; that where there was a city of more than 5,000 isolated in an agricultural area they might establish small holdings in that city. There were also certain other exceptions with regard to the fringe areas of a metropolitan centre. But he also said this—this is where some confusion comes into the picture.

> We are very anxious to see the small holdings provision implemented to the full, provided it is implemented in the manner contemplated by parliament when the legislation was passed. My colleague and I have arrested a trend towards the small holdings section becoming a vehicle for financing veterans' urban housing.

I take it that means that if a veteran has two or three acres, no matter where it may be, he can come under the small holdings provision because originally that was the intention of the act. But in the veterans affairs committee Mr. Murchison told us the other day—unfortunately the proceedings of that day are not yet printed—that there is an arbitrary and definite prohibition established by the two departments against any small holdings going into certain centres. I questioned him about Greater Vancouver which the minister knows well, because we are both from that city, and Mr. Murchison said that there would be no small holdings established in the municipality of Burnaby, no matter whether the man had acreage or not. He said the same thing about North Vancouver and West Vancouver. The minister knows that in these municipalities there is land available for poultry ranches of two or three acres or for small fruits. It is ideal land for a small holding as we intended small holdings to be originally, and yet there is this arbitrary rule that there shall be no small holdings in these areas. I suppose there have been similar arbitrary rules made for other areas. That is contrary to the policy expressed by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. I would ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs to tell us now what the plan is at the present time.

Mr. TUCKER: I shall endeavour to deal at least in part with what the hon. member has said. As I understand it, there are to be no small holdings inside urban municipalities having a population in excess of 5,000 without its being cleared by the committee on which the director of the Veterans' Land Act sits. In other words, it is a matter of clearing it and having coordination of the plans. I do not think there is any suggestion that this committee is to overrule the act or to take an arbitrary attitude. I think that is correct. If a place is obviously fitted for carrying out the terms of the act I do not think the committee will overrule the plain intention of parliament. That is the first thing.

In regard to corporations where there are larger corporate limits, the idea is that single unit holdings will be set up outside larger corporations the same as heretofore without the director of the Veterans' Land Act having to clear it with any coordinating committee, if they are outside, on the fringe areas, and they are single holdings or even holdings up to six in number. As I understand it, it is a matter which the committee is going to try to coordinate. As I understand the attitude in regard to part of the area about which my hon. friend has spoken, it was felt that it would be an unwise move to divide up land, which may be needed badly for urban housing, into half-acre or one-acre plots.

Mr. GREEN: The minister knows that the land is there. I am sure he will agree with me that there is acreage available, and yet there is this prohibition.

Mr. TUCKER: It may be that national housing or the coordinated housing administration may intend to develop that particular area as a part of its development scheme. The only idea of this thing is to coordinate the two, so that we shall not work at cross-purposes. If it is clearly within the terms of the act and it is not intended to use that particular area, then I think I may say that the act will be carried out. I think that is correct.

Mr. McMASTER: I was astounded to find out that any other body of people in the government had anything to do with the Veterans' Land Act. As I recall it, the first time that I knew about it, it was put out in the form of glowing terms. It told what was to take place. The veteran who obtained this piece of land of several acres near a municipality would be able to carry on his occupation and do some farming, and eventually would be able to live off the money which he made off this suburban acre and a half. That has been entirely changed. I raised the question in the first instance when I spoke in the house. I said that certain members of the armed forces would be able to obtain $2,300 of gratuity and that other equally deserving people would not be able to get it simply because certain members of the returned forces would get a parcel of land near the city, probably an acre and a half, and conform to the regulations. Apparently that has been changed. First of all, it was changed so that they could take half an acre, which would not be hard to get near a city. Is that to be the policy in the future? Are they to be prevented from building under the Veterans' Land Act on less than half an acre near a large city or not? If so, will they be given the $2,300?

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I just supplement the reply given by my parliamentary assistant to the hon. member for Vancouver South. Under the coordinated housing policy which has been recently established, the director has been asked practically to double his policy in regard to small holding units. I believe he has been asked for about four thousand units during the coming year. I think this will satisfy my hon. friend that the policy is not being ignored or neglected or abandoned. It is part of an integrated policy as between the Department of Reconstruction and Supply and our own department, without any interference except by way of consultation.

Mr. GREEN: Then there will not be a prohibition against municipalities such as Burnaby or West Vancouver or North Vancouver?

Mr. MACKENZIE: There will be no prohibition within the municipality with a population of five thousand, as explained by the parliamentary assistant. I do not see why we should not develop a policy for places like West Vancouver and North Vancouver according to the ideas advanced by my hon. friend. I see no reason for a prohibition; I think we can develop a policy to meet his suggestions.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister say Burnaby also?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.
