Mr. ROSS (Souris): Based on the answer given to the hon. member for Vancouver South, I wish to ask a question which I have raised in the veterans committee on previous occasions. I realize that the director is an efficient gentleman; but I have pointed out before, as the minister has suggested to-night, that this small holdings policy does get us away from the original intent of the act. If that be so, and since we are having great difficulty in getting qualified applicants settled for full-time farming, I have asked in the committee and I am going to ask the minister now if he will not consider dividing the administration within his department, making one offical responsible for full-time farm settlement and one responsible for the small holdings. He has stated that the policy in connection with small holdings is to be doubled, after making the statement that this policy was getting us away from the original intent of the act. I have heard the director himself say that this matter of house building has been so discouraging that at times he felt like throwing up his hands, and I can quite sympathize with him. The policy in connection with small holdings is now to be doubled, though the department still has many adjustments to make. This afternoon the minister referred to an article concerning the situation in greater Victoria with relation to one unit costing the applicant some $7,600—

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am sorry to interrupt my hon. friend, but that is entirely erroneous. The actual cost to the veteran was $4,260, as my parliamentary assistant said. I believe the headline stated that this house would cost the veteran $7,364, but that is not the case.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That was what the article said, but I might refer to a case about which I know a great deal, that of Charleswood in Manitoba, involving some ninety units, where I believe no adjustments have as yet been completed.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It will be done.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I know it will be done and they are working on it; I am not blaming anybody for the delay, but I say this is an example of what has to be done. These four-room units have cost over $5,900 and the five-room units approximately $7,000, and now adjustments have to be made. I am just pointing out the tremendous amount of work that has to be done, even in making these adjustments. The settlers living in these ninety units are disgruntled because they still do not know what arrangements they must make to purchase their homes. I am just pointing out that with this double policy in connection with small holdings, the minister should consider making one official absolutely responsible for full-time farming and another responsible for the small holdings.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I do not like to keep on interrupting, but we had our greatest trouble in the constituency of the hon. member for Yale, in Kelowna and Vernon. However, I am glad to say all those matters have been adjusted and I received letters of thanks and appreciation only yesterday. They are all satisfied.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Then I have another point; perhaps the parliamentary assistant can answer this, because he referred to the question of titles in the west. Once the board has accepted an appraisal on land they consider suitable for farming, if the vendor has a clear title how long should it take to complete the arrangements and issue the cheque to the seller? I have had some complaints in that connection.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Thirty days, I am told.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): From the date of acknowledgment?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I should like to say a word on this section. We have often heard it said that this act is primarily intended to assist veterans to establish or reestablish themselves in farming, to encourage them to farm or to resume their occupation if they were farming before going into the armed forces. In the areas of Canada suitable for farming, undoutedly this act will be of great assistance to veterans of that class. The director may acquire land and buildings, and may sell or agree to sell them to the veterans. He may even acquire land from the provinces or from the Minister of Mines and Resources; but representing Yukon here in this parliament I am chiefly concerned with the assistance required by veterans in that part of Canada. We have veterans in Yukon with records as good as those of veterans in any other part of Canada; and their services in the war warrant them in asking and receiving assistance in reestablishment.

It is not practical to farm in Yukon on any extensive scale. They can produce farm products; they can keep dairy herds and so on. It is not a matter of the climate or the soil; it is the lack of any market. The market is too small to make farming worth while. Yukon depends entirely upon mining for its population. Successful mining means the success of that territory; unsuccessful mining means that the people move out. For the most part, the veterans in Yukon are miners returning to the mining territory to establish homes for themselves and their dependents. Those who are charged with the duty of administering this act seem to be doubtful whether under it assistance is possible for these veterans. First, in regard to the provision under which land may be acquired from the Minister of Mines and Resources, it has been established that the minister has no land in Yukon suitable to be taken up under this act; it has been all disposed of. I know the matter has received careful consideration by the minister and his staff. Apparently the physical and geographical conditions concerning Yukon have brought them to the opinion that this act cannot be applied to veterans there, but I think a careful reading of the act will show quite plainly that it is applicable and can be applied. How much broader could any statute be than the wording of section 7 of this act, which states:

> The director may, for the purposes of this act,
> (a) purchase by agreement, at prices which to him shall seem reasonable, or
> (b) in any other manner acquire by consent or agreement from His Majesty in the right of Canada or from any province or municipal authority, or from any person, firm or corporation, such lands and buildings situate in any part of Canada and such other property including building materials, live stock, farm equipment and commercial fishing equipment as the director may deem necessary.

I am sure the officials administering the act, and also the minister, know that Yukon is part of Canada. Of course people who have not been west of Toronto do not realize that British Columbia, even, is in Canada. But here is this wide section 7 which refers to lands and buildings situate in any part of Canada. And they are purchased from whom? It is not from the province, not from the territory, not from the Minister of Mines and Resources, but "from any person, firm or corporation". Any individual owning property there may sell it to the director, under the terms of section 7 of the act.

But to remove any doubt as to the application of the act to Yukon, and the settlements in Yukon, I wish to move an amendment, the effect of which will not be to broaden the scope of the act or to entail public expenditure beyond that now contemplated and authorized by the act, but which will apply explicitly to Yukon as part of Canada, and extend these benefits to Yukon veterans, giving them the assistance to which they are entitled.

I believe this is the appropriate time for this procedure, and I therefore move:

> That there be added to section 35 the following:
> "The director with the approval of the minister may acquire, convey, transfer, agree to acquire, convey, transfer land in Yukon territory including land within Dawson, Whitehorse and Mayo and subject to the provisions of this act and regulations made under this act may grant to veterans residing in Yukon amounts not exceeding the amount stated in subsection 3 of section 35 of this act, such grants to be used only for the purposes enumerated in subsection 4 of section 35 of this act."

I think that will set at rest any doubts which the administrators of the act, and perhaps the minister, may have.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I thank the hon. member for Yukon for his customary courteous presentation of his argument. He was kind enough to send me notice of his amendment late this afternoon. It is quite true that the department has been giving extensive study to the situation in Yukon. I think, however, it is only fair to the administration that my colleagues should have an opportunity for further study of the situation. I promise the hon. member that if he will be kind enough not to press the amendment to-night we will go most carefully into the situation which he has so clearly and, to my mind, convincingly presented. It does mean, though, a departure in principle from the Veterans' Land Act. It means that the grant of $2,320 is made available for urban housing in Yukon where, as my hon. friend and I know, there are not extensive tracts of land available for settlement.

I wonder if the hon. member, after having presented his case clearly and convincingly, would be good enough not to press the amendment, with my assurance that I shall be glad to consult with my colleagues as to what can be done to meet the suggestion he has made.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Does the minister mean that the amendment will not be completed to-night, that it will be allowed to stand until to-morrow or later in the session?

Mr. MACKENZIE: If the house is so minded, we had hoped to get third reading of the bill to-night. I would give my hon. friend and his constituents through him the assurance that the suggestion he has made to-night will be given most careful consideration during the recess.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Under the circumstances I hesitate to press the amendment. To my mind, section 7 is broad enough, in that it gives the director the right to purchase land from any person, firm or corporation—and not only the land, but the land and buildings situate in any part of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have not had an opportunity of consulting with my colleagues in regard to the matter. I would urge that the amendment be not now pressed, and I give the assurance that it will be carefully considered.

Mr. GREEN: Could the situation be met by regulation, under the act?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It might be; that is something to look into.

Amendment withdrawn.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane) moved that the second report of the standing committee on external affairs, presented to the house on July 31, be concurred in.

Mr. D. M. FLEMING (Eglinton): The concurrence of the house in this report, I take it, will carry with it the adoption of the estimates in full of the Department of External Affairs?

Mr. BRADETTE: No.

Mr. FLEMING: Because there was a recommendation in that report for approval of those estimates. If that is not so I think there should be a clear understanding in the matter, because it was the feeling of members of the external affairs committee that there should be an opportunity for general discussion of the items and general discussion of policy in reference to external affairs when the estimates of that department should come before the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is quite right.

Mr. FLEMING: Is it the assurance of the government—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes; definitely yes.

Mr. FLEMING: —that the estimates are not adopted?

Mr. MacINNIS: No. It is part of the report. Read the report.

Mr. ABBOTT: Read Hansard.

PRICES AND TRADE BOARD

HANDLING OF RATION COUPONS BY BANKS—BANQUE PROVINCIALE DU CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, is the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance now in a position to give an answer to a question I asked about the continuance of the right of the Banque Provinciale du Canada to handle ration coupons? Also I should like to know whether the Acting Minister of Finance is in a position to indicate what prosecutions, if any, have so far been instituted as a result of the ration coupon racket which was revealed, and whether prosecutions are contemplated under the criminal code.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): The answer to my hon. friend's question is no, because the bank has not yet provided satisfactory assurance that the coupon ration system will be operated in accordance with the board's regulations. So far as prosecutions are concerned, I am afraid I shall have to leave that to the Minister of Justice.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): The hon. member may be assured that these prosecutions are being dealt with as expeditiously as is compatible with proper care. Instructions have been issued for the prosecutions of twenty-seven persons in three groups, and of six in another group; and I have been trying by long distance telephone to find out what is the state of the proceedings. There have been some pleas of guilty, and some pleas of not guilty with remands for trials fixed at different dates. The matter is being handled by competent counsel who are giving it diligent attention with the idea of bringing it to results as quickly as possible. Certain investigations are still proceeding, one clue leading to another, and though there are others against whom sufficient information might be available to justify the institution of proceedings, on the advice of the investigators proceedings against them are being delayed until the other clues are followed up to see if further evidence will not be developed which will implicate additional persons.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask a supplementary question? Does not the right hon. gentleman think that when banks are given permission to act in this capacity it should be seen to that the employees receive sufficient remuneration to remove them from temptation?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Though the banks are chartered by the dominion parliament, the administration of their affairs is under the control of their respective boards of directors, and it would be difficult for any department of the federal government to undertake to see that all those employed by organizations which derive their charter powers from parliament are properly remunerated.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not quite mean that. I meant that before they are given the right to do this the government should be sure that the people who will handle it are not just subject to temptation. That was the point.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Even Adam and Eve in their terrestrial paradise were subject to temptation.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

PRIVILEGE

MR. GRANT—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON AUGUST 1

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. V. GRANT (Kings, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The day before yesterday, while the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) was speaking, he was making light of the explanation which had just been made by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance to the effect that we had arranged to trade machinery with the United States—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GRANT: —and at that point—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member to be good enough to state the question of privilege.

Mr. GRANT: I am coming to it now.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to be as brief as possible.

Mr. GRANT: I interjected, "No truck or trade with the Yankees". Everyone in the chamber heard my remarks, and the reporter looked over at me—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

Mr. GRANT:—while the member for Lake Centre blushed to the ears. But my interjection did not appear in Hansard of that date. It should have appeared at page 4121 of July 31.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, I rise only to say this. I have no objection to my hon. friend getting a place in Hansard, but when he says that I spoke lightly of trade, that statement is incorrect.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He said you blushed.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: On a question of privilege, if there is any suggestion that I had anything to do with removing it from Hansard—is there any such suggestion?

Mr. GRANT: I will reply when you are through.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If there is any suggestion that I had anything to do with removing it, I want that suggestion withdrawn, because I never noticed it in Hansard, and apparently the reporter has no better ears than I have, because I did not hear it either.

Mr. GRANT: I am not insinuating that my hon. friend used the blue pencil, but—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member knows very well that I cannot permit a debate on a question of privilege.

Mr. GRANT: You should not have allowed him to debate it.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

31. That the deductions from tax allowed to a corporation whose principal business is the production, refining or marketing of petroleum or petroleum products in respect of drilling and exploration costs be extended to oil wells spudded in during the year 1947 and the deepening of oil wells which is commenced in 1947 but that in respect of such wells the deductions be reduced from 26⅔ per cent and 40 per cent of the cost to 20 per cent and 30 per cent respectively.

Mr. HARKNESS: The last time this matter was under discussion the minister intimated that he would make a statement in connection with the oil industry.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Acting Minister of Finance): I thought I had made my usual brief preliminary statement, and I was under the impression that the hon. member was going to make a few observations on these sections. However, I am prepared to repeat what I stated. These five resolutions, 31, 32, 33, 34 and 35, in effect continue the tax credits granted petroleum, natural gas and mining industries in respect of exploration expenditures for another year with proper adjustment for reduction of the flat rate tax on corporation income from 40 to 30 per cent. Also, under 31, the existing tax credit granted for expenditures incurred in any new oil well is extended to include expenditures incurred in deepening an existing well.

Mr. HARKNESS: Just before we adjourned the other night I had drawn to the minister's attention some five suggestions which I had made earlier in the speech on the budget in regard to changes in the tax structure which would aid the oil industry, and I understood that the minister would make some comment thereon.

Mr. ABBOTT: I apologize to my hon. friend. He is quite right; I had intended to give some consideration to the five suggestions he made. I understood the first to relate to the deepening of existing wells. That is being taken care of under the ordinary tax concession and not under the special 50 per cent arrangement. He asked in the second place that the tax concessions be extended to the drilling of shallow wells. That cannot be done. Third he asked that the 33⅓ per cent be increased to 50 per cent, and there again we felt the request could not be granted. Fourth he asked that tax credits be made permanent. Here once more it is felt that we cannot accede. It must be made on the annual basis. The fifth suggestion related to the removal of the subsidy on imported oil. As my hon. friend will appreciate, that is not a tax matter. I shall be glad to discuss it when we reach the estimates of the wartime prices and trade board, where these subsidy items are provided for.

Mr. HARKNESS: In connection with the request for extension of the fifty per cent tax drawback to completing wells, will the minister say whether the resolution means that the drawback will now apply to abandoned exploratory wells on which redrilling is started?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that the twenty per cent tax credit does, but not the fifty per cent.

Mr. HARKNESS: Can the minister give any reason why this fifty per cent tax drawback will not apply to abandoned exploratory wells which people may now be willing to drill down to the oil-bearing strata? At the present time a considerable number of wells have been drilled in the foothills to considerable depths, but owing to the company's running out of money, or for other reasons, the wells were abandoned before they actually struck the oil-bearing lime. If this fifty per cent drawback were made available for these wells a considerable number of them would be completed.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Before the minister answers may I ask what is in one sense a supplementary question and in another a broader question? In dealing with this question is it the policy of the government to consider it from the point of view of maximum development of the industry? Is that the government's aim? If it is, I would hesitate to argue that any exemption be made permanent; nevertheless in making it merely annual it would seem to me to work against what one would expect to be the full encouragement of the industry. I am not as familiar with this matter as the hon. member for Calgary East, but I should be enlightened if the minister would tell us in much broader terms what is the principle on which the government is acting.

Mr. ABBOTT: As my hon. friend is probably aware, this has been discussed at considerable length to my knowledge in at least three sessions of parliament. I have done a good deal of discussing of it myself. It is incentive legislation. It was introduced first during the war in order to encourage the production of oil in Canada. I must say that the concessions are appreciable, particularly the fifty per cent one which we are now discussing. It was felt that it should be granted on a year to year basis. In other words, a year in advance a prospective oil driller knows that if during the year he drills a certain type of well, conducts a certain type of exploration operations, he will be allowed a certain tax concession.

Answering my hon. friend's question as to what good reason there is for not making this apply to a well which has been abandoned and then started up again, may I say that subsection 10 of section 8, under which this concession is provided, sets out the conditions. In the first place the enterprise must be one which is approved by the governor in council. The concession is granted only if in the opinion of the governor in council—and I quote from the section:

(a) Drilling the oil well is desirable in order to extend the petroluem resources of Canada; and

(b) The taxpayer could not reasonably be expected to drill the oil well unless permitted to deduct at least fifty per centum of the expenditures in connection therewith from tax.

What that means, of course, is that if the well is successful, half the cost is paid by the people of Canada, and that is a substantial concession. The government felt that, offered once, it should not be extended to renewing operations in the same well. I should correct my statement and say that if the well is successful the taxpayer does bear the cost, but if it is a loss the taxpayers of Canada do bear half the cost of the drilling expenses.

Mr. HARKNESS: In my opinion the reasons which the minister has just read are the very ones which should cause this tax concession to be extended to abandoned exploratory wells. As he said, the sole idea of the tax concession is to encourage drilling, and if possible to develop new fields. In many instances these abandoned exploratory wells are the very ones which we might expect to bring in new fields. I can see no reason in the world why these wells should be cut off from this concession.

Mr. ABBOTT: Obviously it is a matter on which opinions may differ. The purpose is to encourage the drilling of new wells. The incentive should not be greater than what is believed to be necessary to accomplish that purpose. It is felt that the cost of deepening an existing well is not as great as the cost of starting and drilling one down to a certain depth. These wells must be deep test wells, and not the ordinary shallow well. I speak on this with some diffidence in reply to my hon. friend, because I know he is much more familiar with the practical details of oil mining operations than I am, but he also knows that under the subsection the enterprise is one which must be approved by the Minister of Mines and Resources. These are special cases.

Mr. HARKNESS: So far as the Department of Finance is concerned the chief difficulty is that there is no real understanding of the oil business and what is necessary to encourage an increased oil production. The only way in which you can get people to put money in as risky a business as drilling for oil is to make it reasonably possible that they will get some sort of return. Unless some form of tax concession is made we are going to have the situation continue which prevails in Alberta at the present time, with the majority of the drilling rigs sitting idle and nothing going on. It is time that the Department of Finance realized that the present tax structure is stifling oil exploration.

I was particularly disappointed to hear the minister say that no further tax concessions were in prospect in view of the concessions which were made to the mining industry. The very least that might be done is to increase the depletion allowance from 33⅓ per cent to 50 per cent, which would bring it in line with the depletion allowance allowed in the United States, and would bring it partly in line with the concessions now made to mining enterprises.

So far as the subsidies are concerned, there are one or two other things I should like to say—

Mr. ABBOTT: If my hon. friend will permit me, I pointed out that subsidies do not come under this resolution. Under this resolution we are not granting subsidies. They come under another item in the estimates.

Mr. HARKNESS: While the minister says that the matter of subsidies does not come under this resolution, in effect the subsidy which is paid is a tax, an extraordinarily high tax, on the oil producer in Alberta. That is one of the chief difficulties which the government does not seem to appreciate. If my information is correct it is a tax to the extent of 75 cents a barrel—that is the subsidy which is paid on oil imported into western Canada. Seventy-five cents a barrel subsidy means that the price of the Turner valley oil is held down to that extent below the price which otherwise the Turner valley producer would get—in other words, the true economic price. This means, of course, that last year the oil producers in Alberta were taxed approximately $7,000,000, by a hidden form of tax, through this subsidy. In previous years the thing was worse—

Mr. ABBOTT: I really do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but I am not prepared to deal with the question of subsidies to the oil industry to-day. I have not the information with me; I am not in a position to answer my hon. friend now, and I do urge that he raise this matter at the proper time, when I shall be very glad to discuss it. Then I will have the necessary data either to agree with or to differ from him, but I have not the information and am not in a position to discuss it to-day. I have no doubt the statements he is making are correct, but I feel they should be made when I can answer them and give an explanation.

The CHAIRMAN: Since the matter of subsidies comes under a different item I think it should be discussed when that item is reached.

Mr. HARKNESS: While it may come under a different item, the point is that it is actually oil taxation, and it is so closely related to this item that it seemed to me this was the proper time to say something about it. However, that is the situation. It is a form of hidden taxation on the oil industry, and having made the point I shall leave it at that.

As far as section 31 itself is concerned, I wonder if the minister could state in simple words what the thing means, because as I read it, it appears that the oil industry is going to be worse off than before. My understanding having been in touch with the officials of the department, is that the industry is going to be in exactly the same position as in previous years. I should like a little clarification as to exactly what this section means and how it will work out in a specific case.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall do the best I can, Mr. Chairman. The only change from the law as it exists at present and as it has existed for several years is that the percentage rate is reduced from 26⅔ per cent to 20 per cent and from 40 per cent to 30 per cent; and those changes are merely consequential upon the reduction in the rate of corporation income tax which is being made and which has to be made by reason of the undertaking to the provinces under the tax agreements. I am advised the effect is a one hundred per cent write-off. I do not know whether that is clear to my hon. friend.

Mr. HARKNESS: No; what the minister means by a one hundred per cent write-off is not clear at all. My understanding from what he has said and the information I obtained before is that the oil industry has had no tax relief, that it is in exactly the same position as before the budget was brought down. An ordinary corporation has had a reduction in the corporation tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: It shares in the general tax reduction, along with everybody else.

Mr. HARKNESS: As I read the thing I cannot see how that works out, because the deductions which are allowed from the tax, according to this amendment, have been reduced from 26⅔ per cent to 20 per cent and from 40 per cent to 30 per cent.

Mr. ABBOTT: They are reduced in the same proportion; he gets the same reduction he had before. As expressed in terms of percentages it is lower, but that is because the tax rates are lower; and, as I said a moment ago, this is equivalent to a one hundred per cent write-off. If my hon. friend will take my assurance on that point, I am relying upon the assurance of my officials, who I know are thoroughly familiar with the circumstances. The hon. member might care to study this when we have the bill before us. When he sees the specific terms of the amendment, if he is still in doubt I shall be glad to elaborate what I am saying now, but I do give him the assurance that the position is exactly the same, that the percentage rate of tax reduction is merely consequential upon the reduction in the tax rate, and that the effect is a one hundred per cent write-off.

Mr. HARKNESS: Could I put the thing in this way, then? Take an oil company which paid taxes of $50,000 last year. What tax are they going to pay this year, if their business is the same? What reduction is there, if any?

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, from my hon. friend's hypothetical question I assume that the $50,000 represented 40 per cent of a certain taxable income. This year they will pay 30 per cent of that taxable income. I cannot make the calculation at once, but it is merely an arithmetical problem. They will pay 30 per cent of that same taxable income.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I confess I am not quite clear yet as to what the minister meant by saying it was equivalent to a one hundred per cent write-off; and while

I am on my feet I want to ask another question. The minister said plainly and categorically that this was incentive legislation. By that I understand that it is an inducement, that it is to induce people to take certain action, in this case to produce oil. Then I want to ask the minister if he accepts the statement made by the hon. member for Calgary East that the majority of the rigs are idle. If that is so, and the statement was not questioned, does it not make it appear that the incentive is not working, and does not that raise the question whether or not the government do in fact want these rigs to be operating? If they do, should they not consider whether, as I say, in fact the incentive is sufficient?

Mr. ABBOTT: If I have understood my hon. friend's question correctly, he puts it on this basis, that because there are idle rigs the incentive perhaps is not adequate.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The statement made by my hon. friend was that a majority of the rigs are idle. I speak in ignorance of the facts.

Mr. ABBOTT: So do I; I do not know whether they are or not.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Nevertheless we have here a witness who I submit for this purpose is an expert, whose evidence has not been challenged; and he says—

Mr. ABBOTT: Let us call him an advocate as well as a witness.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): All right; I will not quarrel with that. At any rate this statement has not been questioned; I accept it, and I imagine the minister accepts it also. If that is correct, and the majority of the rigs are idle, is it not fair to ask the minister whether his incentive is working, whether some explanation is not required to make this clause appear reasonable?

Mr. ABBOTT: All I can say is that the government has no desire to go into the oil business. The rigs may be idle from a variety of causes. I do not know whether my hon. friend's statement is a complete picture or not, but I repeat what I have said previously. This is incentive legislation. These special concessions to the oil industry are matters which have been threshed out, worked out and discussed in this house year after year. There has been no change for the last two or three years. It may be that there should be greater incentive given, I do not know; that is a matter of opinion, but the government has come to the conclusion that this is not the year to do so. My own view is that further incentive is not needed; that is my personal opinion.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The reason we are taking up your time this morning is that we hope to convince you that you are wrong, however faint that hope may be. The minister said the government did not want to get into the oil business. I did not understand that remark at all, because it did not seem to me to be relevant to the very strong statement the minister made before, that this was incentive legislation. I still submit the minister has left the question entirely unanswered, because if this is incentive legislation, I understand that to mean the government has decided that it does want oil produced in Alberta.

Mr. ABBOTT: By the other fellow, and not at too great a price.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Wait a moment. If I understand incentive legislation it is intended to produce certain results, and again I submit that we have the minister's statement that this legislation is intended to produce results; we have the statement of the hon. member for Calgary East that it is not producing results, so I submit with deference that it is up to the government to reconsider the discussions which have taken place in the last few years, because after all some very important people were not present here during those discussions.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is quite true.

Mr. HARKNESS: I do not think there can be any question that wells are not being drilled to the extent that they might be. True, a certain number are being drilled, but there is no full drilling programme in operation, or a programme anything like there should be. As a matter of fact when I came to Ottawa to attend the sitting of parliament, twenty-eight out of thirty-two large drilling rigs in the Turner valley were sitting idle, and I am informed that condition still prevails. Most people who own probable drilling sites, and a large number who have money enough to go ahead with the drilling of wells, cannot see sufficient possibility of a return, under the present tax structure, and particularly in view of the subsidy which operates as an artificial depression of price to the extent of 75 cents a barrel, to go ahead with drilling.

This morning I was talking to a man who has an intimate knowledge of the oil business. The company with which he is connected has fifteen possible drilling sites. Those sites will at some time be drilled in the Turner valley, but they are not going to drill any of them until we get rid of the subsidy, or the tax situation is much improved so they can get a reasonable return from the oil for their shareholders. They believe it is much better to leave it in the ground than to take it out at the present time, because by taking it out they would simply be depleting their assets. It will be understood that once oil is taken from the ground, the well is exhausted. Under the present circumstances they are much happier to leave the oil in the ground than to go into production. This is true of most of the oil companies.

Mr, ZAPLITNY: I admit at once that I am no more an oil expert than is the minister, but I must say I am at a loss to understand what the hon. member for Calgary East is advocating. It seems to me he is admitting that no drilling is taking place, even though certain companies have sites, money and drilling equipment, simply because the return they believe they could expect will not be as great as they should like to have it. He also advocates removal of the subsidy and an increase in the price. I cannot see the logic in that, because it seems to me the whole reason for the subsidy has been to keep the price down in the west. We had an example of that earlier this year—

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Chairman, I objected to the hon. member for Calgary East discussing subsidies, and I feel I must do the same when the hon. member for Dauphin proceeds to do so.

The CHAIRMAN: I would call the attention of the hon. member for Dauphin to the fact that an arrangement was made under which subsidies would not be discussed at this time. That comes under another item.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: My only reason for bringing it up was that it had already been brought into the discussion. However, if it is the wish of the committee, I shall desist. I would say this, however, that a while ago the minister pointed out that the government did not wish to go into the oil business. If what the hon. member for Calgary East says is true—and I have no reason to doubt it—I am quite sure the government eventually will have to get into the oil business, to produce oil. It is admitted that certain of these companies have sites, money and equipment, but they will not drill for oil unless they are assured of a certain return. That is not private enterprise. Certainly it is not true private enterprise.

Mr. HARKNESS: Apparently the hon. member for Dauphin does not understand the situation at all.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: You explain it, then.

Mr. HARKNESS: I do not believe he or anybody else would put money into an enterprise the resources of which were being exhausted, unless he could see some reasonable return on his capital, let alone to make any profit. That is essentially the situation. Under ordinary circumstances any enterprise is capable of operating at a loss for only a relatively short time before it goes broke. That is what has happened to many of the oil companies. Those which are still in operation and have drilling sites see no reason in the world why they should drill, spend a lot of money, and perhaps not even get a well, unless they have a reasonable return. But if they do get a well, they do not receive sufficient return to recoup themselves for the money they put into it.

Mr. JACKMAN: I believe the hon. member for Calgary East has made a strong case for greater consideration of these companies which endeavour to bring more oil to the surface, so that we shall have a better supply of domestic oil for use in the west. The oil we buy from the United States requires payment of a 75-cent subsidy to get it here. One would conclude, therefore, that the Canadian price is 75 cents below the world or United States price, or the price which is considered necessary to get oil from the well-developed fields just across the border from our western provinces. It would therefore seem clear, even to one without great experience in this field, that the price in Canada is not sufficient to encourage drilling, or to encourage the supply of domestic oil. I should think that, with the government's other measures to protect our supply of United States exchange, it would do everything in its power to bring more Canadian oil to the surface, so that we should not have to buy in the United States, much less pay the 75-cent subsidy above the Canadian price in order to bring the oil here.

Undoubtedly the industry is a particularly hazardous one. I believe the present allowances do not go as far as they might to encourage production. Those allowances should be increased. While I do not wish to mention the subsidy again, yet it is so germane to the subject matter that it must be apparent to all hon. members that our oil producers are in a much more hazardous field than are the producers in the United States field across the border. Yet they do not get the price those producers get. At the same time we are not giving our producers as fair an increase in the depletion allowance as we should, in order to encourage them, especially when they have to work under a price level substantially lower than that which applies in the United States. Therefore I stand behind the suggestion made by the hon. member for Calgary East, in the hope that the government will give consideration to the fact that our price is so much lower than that of imported oil. If some relief can be given, through increased depletion allowance and tax drawback on the wells which are drilled, as well as the deep test wells, we shall greatly improve the Canadian economy and save United States exchange.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am sorry to be so persistent when the minister is so gracious; nevertheless I still think we are in a very unsatisfactory position, and I hope the minister will have another look at it.

I wish to make one comment on what the hon. member for Dauphin has said. He pointed out that people who were in this business wanted to be assured of a return. I think we ought to try to speak accurately—and I think the hon. member does try. I believe if he will study the situation he will find that there is enough money lost to satisfy either him or anybody else who feels that those who are in private enterprise should make losses. I think he will find that there are plenty of losses.

Coming back to the minister, I repeat what has already been pointed out, that twenty-eight out of thirty-two rigs stand idle. It does not seem to me to add up if in one breath the minister says this is incentive legislation and in the next he takes no cognizance of the fact that apparently it is failing to act as an incentive. Either the government wishes to have oil produced, or it does not. Again I suggest to the minister that if that is a fair and full statement of the situation, that great numbers of developed rigs are being shut down, further consideration of the matter is called for.

Mr. ABBOTT: The position with respect to tax concessions to the oil industry can be summarized in this way. In the first place, the treasury bears 50 per cent of the cost of drilling unsuccessful deep test wells. Second, every oil company is allowed to write off the capital cost against profit and loss.

Mr. JACKMAN: If it makes a profit.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is a 100 per cent write-off of the capital cost against profit and loss account; if it makes a profit it can write off a hundred per cent of the capital cost against profit and loss account.

[Mr. Jackman.]

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If there is any profit.

Mr. ABBOTT: The proposal of the government goes further than that, so far as incentive legislation is concerned. We will pay up to 50 per cent of the cost of drilling an unsuccessful deep test well. If the well is successful I assume that the operator would get back one hundred per cent of his cost. That is as far as the government felt it could properly go in the line of incentive legislation. That judgment may be mistaken, but there are other reasons which result in failure to drill wells. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance has pointed out that he helped to finance the first successful oil well in the Turner valley. One of the greatest incentives to further drilling is the bringing in of a new well. The hon. member for Calgary East knows that as well as I. As I have said, the government feels that the present incentives are all that it can afford to offer under existing conditions.

Mr. HARKNESS: I think the minister is under a misapprehension when he states that the treasury bears fifty per cent of the cost of an unsuccessful deep test well. If a new company starts out in the oil drilling business and drills a deep test well, it gets nothing whatever from the treasury. The only case in which the treasury bears fifty per cent of the cost is where a well is drilled by a company having sufficient revenue. I think I can make my point clear by a simple example. If it costs, say $400,000, to drill a deep test well, and it proves to be a dry hole, a small company with an income of $100,000 per year from producing wells would get a tax concession of $19,000 on their $400,000 loss. In other words, they would have a loss in connection with drilling that well of $381,000. If the well was drilled by a large company with an income of $1,000,000 from producing wells, the tax concession on that particular well would be $190,000. In other words it would cost that company $210,000 to drill the well. As you can readily see, the effect of this will be to discourage new capital. There is no incentive in this resolution for new capital to go into the oil business. There are several small companies in Calgary which have drilling rigs and the necessary money, but they know that if they spend from $300,000 to $600,000 on a deep test well they will get no help from the government under this resolution. They would lose their money and would be out of business. Considering the return that they would get if they did bring in a producing well, they decide not to drill at all.

The only people that this legislation really helps are the large companies. One of my objections to it is that it does not encourage the small operator who is chiefly responsible for bringing in new oil fields. Once a field has been discovered the large companies come in and buy up the various leases and drill wells, but in most cases the new wells which have been discovered on this continent were discovered by the wild-catter who puts down a well at times in places where the geologists say there would be no use in putting one down. That is how the great oil development has taken place throughout this country. This legislation does not help the small man.

Mr. IRVINE: From the point of view of capitalism I think the hon. member who has just taken his seat has made a good point. Undoubtedly the smaller men are at a disadvantage, but if the government is going to bonus this industry I suggest it should bonus itself and take either the loss or the gain, as the case may be, and not just go out to bonus every Tom, Dick, and Harry who may want to go into the oil business.

Mr. HARKNESS: There is no question of the government bonusing the industry. What the industry is asking for is a fair deal in the matter of taxes. It is asking for an increase in the depletion allowance to bring it into line with its competitors in the United States, and to bring it into line with the concessions now made to the mining industry. That is the only sort of concession that will help the small operator. Then it is asking for an extension of this fifty per cent provision on deep test wells to wells which are drilled in the plains area. I do not know why the government will not put that into effect, because an oil well that goes down two or three thousand feet is just as valuable to the country as one that goes down 10,000 feet. As far as present exploration goes it looks as though there might be a better chance, in the next two or three years, of developing oil wells in the plains than in the foothills area. They can drill three or four wells there in less time than it would take to drill one in the foothills area.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): We have had placed before us figures which I submit show the virtual failure of the present legislation as incentive legislation. I should like to ask whether the government in considering the adequacy of this legislation had before it those or similar figures. In other words, did the government consider the present situation as described by the hon. member for Calgary East in reaching this decision? If they did not, would it not be reasonable to ask the minister to allow this resolution to stand so that they could take another look at it? After all, we are trying—at least most of us, with the exception of the gentlemen immediately to my left—to arrive at a situation which would give a chance to the smaller man.

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot say that we know the number of drilling rigs which were actually idle, but the whole situation with respect to oil exploration in western Canada has been thoroughly considered. The hon. member for Calgary East knows that there has not been a single successful deep test well as yet. This legislation has resulted in substantial write-offs by I think seventeen concerns who have availed themselves of the fifty per cent privilege. As I said a moment ago, the government feels that this is as far as it can go to-day. Answering the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario directly, I would say that the government has had under continuous review the position of the oil industry in western Canada and the exploration that is being carried on.

Mr. HACKETT: The tendency of legislation arising from resolutions of this kind is to give legislative effect to the programme of the gentlemen who sit to our immediate left. Their enthusiasm for these resolutions and for the legislation which will follow is easily understood.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: One of your members alleges that we are helping the large companies.

Mr. HACKETT: This legislation discourages private initiative. Hon. gentlemen to my left talk about the government bearing this and that part of the cost of developing these natural resources, but there are other natural resources. The lumber and mining industries are suffering because of similar misconceived legislation. The result is that if we fail to develop, or permit private corporations to develop, our natural resources—coal, lumber, oil—

Mr. MacNICOL: Minerals.

Mr. HACKETT: Minerals of all kinds—

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. gentleman should confine his remarks to the development of oil.

Mr. HACKETT: Perhaps the chairman would like me to read the resolution three or four times and consider that an argument. I am making an argument, and I submit with great deference that it is well within the compass of the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN: I have read the resolution several times; it refers to oil, and I think that all discussion should be directly relevant to oil wells. The house rules governing the procedure of committees definitely provide that when we are in committee all discussion must be directly relevant to the clause under consideration.

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Chairman, I realize all the difficulties and annoyances pertaining to the very difficult post which you hold, and I must repress the inclination to question your desire to see some advance in the work; but I submit with great deference that as long as I am making a point which is relevant to the measure under consideration I am not to be circumscribed in the illustrations which I bring forth to elucidate the point at issue.

The CHAIRMAN: Let me assure my hon. friend that I do not want to circumscribe him, but I would ask him, if we are to make the progress we wish to make, to confine his remarks to the oil industry. I realize he may feel that he should mention other industries, but I do hope that he will stay close to oil.

Mr. HACKETT: The point I am endeavouring to make is that a resolution which discourages private enterprise from developing these mines and these oil wells, and which imposes heavy taxation upon exploitation of mines before there has been any chance to recover any substantial portion of that which has gone into their development, tends to throw the development of our national resources into the awaiting arms of the government.

Mr. MacNICOL: The government, every time.

Mr. HACKETT: The government seems to be willing to undertake anything these days, forgetting its normal function. I point out to the minister—and I am not going far, Mr. Chairman—that there are several resolutions with which he has entertained the house during the last few days which point very clearly to the adoption by the government of the programme of hon. gentlemen to the left.

Mr. ADAMSON: I merely want to point out to the minister, and particularly to the officials in his department, that the bringing in of an oil field is no small matter. It takes extremely large sums of money. I have been told that the development of the Bahrein island oil fields by, I think, the Standard group, cost, before they had a successful field, about $50 million. I mention this to show that we have to think in round figures when we are going to develop an oil field, and this legislation only goes half way. There should be complete exemption for all drillings. That is the rule elsewhere; it has proved a successful rule all over the world.

If we are to develop an oil field in Canada—and, with all due deference, we have not done so yet—we shall have to consider an expenditure of money in possibly the hundreds of millions, and unless constant and considerate encouragment is given, no oil field will be developed. We may not have an oil field: that we do not know, but if it is to be developed at all we have to raise our sights as to the amount of money which will have to be invested before we know definitely whether we have one or not. I want to bring that to the attention of the minister's helpers.

Mr. ABBOTT: May I reply briefly to my hon. friend? In respect of the seventeen drillers, companies or otherwise, that have availed themselves of this fifty per cent concession, there has been a total payment from the treasury by way of tax credit of something over $2 million already, with no successful wells as yet.

Mr. HARKNESS: The minister made a statement a minute ago on which I should like to comment briefly, that the oil situation had been fully canvassed and investigated by the government, and that in view of this investigation, or whatever you may call it, it was decided not to make any further tax concessions. I should be interested to know what sort of investigation or canvass of the situation was made. One of the chief complaints of oil men in western Canada is that there is apparently no one in the Department of Finance or in the government who understands the oil business and its implications, and as a result any decisions which are made, are made, at any rate frequently, on false premises. If this question of the tax situation affecting oil wells is ever to be straightened out in a reasonable way and to the satisfaction of the people concerned, any investigation which is made should be made with them, and evidence should be heard from them. I do not believe the people in the government here understand the oil business or the oil situation, and they are therefore not in a position to make decisions in this matter.

Mr. ABBOTT: I can only answer my hon. friend by saying that we have what I believe to be a very capable Department of Mines and Resources, and some capable geologists; while we have no oil industry experts in the Department of Finance we have some people who know a good deal about the oil industry, and we rely for our technical advice on officials in the Department of Mines and Resources. That, I suggest, is perfectly proper, normal government procedure. We cannot rely exclusively upon representations made to us by the oil industry. We are glad to hear them, we have heard lots of them, but we must also take other opinions.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister, though unintentionally, may have left some misapprehension by his statement with regard to the seventeen companies and the $2 million paid out by the government.

Mr. ABBOTT: I should correct that. It was seventeen wells. I do not know how many companies there are.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That is not exactly my point. The minister should make a complete statement, not only as to concessions the government has made in respect of those wells, but what other transactions have taken place, what taxes were received from those companies, and so on. We ought to have a full statement as to how the public came out of that, and not merely the statement that an allowance was made.

Mr. ABBOTT: Let me take the case of one oil company in Canada which drilled a deep test well. I will not mention any names, but I know that company and so does the hon. member for York West. The company has spent a substantial amount of money in western Canada in deep test drilling, and it has not been successful in finding oil. The concession, if I may call it that, meant that fifty per cent of the costs expended in that deep test programme could be written off against the taxes which the company otherwise would have paid on its sales of gasoline. In other words it was a straight tax credit. It was just the same as if it had paid its taxes and the government had issued a cheque for half a million or whatever it might be.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is exactly the same.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am sure the minister meant it that way, but from the point of view of the ordinary member of the public reading this, it is a very different transaction indeed, and that is why I asked to have it restated.

Mr. ABBOTT: If that is so, I am glad my hon. friend made the point. Perhaps I have been unable to bring it out. However, it has taken the form of a tax credit and that is what is intended. If the concern had no tax bill, there would be no credit. We do not issue a cheque from the consolidated revenue fund to pay half the cost of unsuccessful deep test wells, but we relieve the taxpayer of the obligation to pay money to the treasury to the extent of fifty per cent of the cost.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Provided he is in the fortunate position of having made enough money elsewhere, so that he owes you money of which you can forgive him half.

Mr. ABBOTT: Precisely. But unless someone is in a position to pay taxes, the services of the country cannot be carried on.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Quite so, but that is a different picture, and in my opinion the moral of it is also very different. The moral still is that, as the minister has stated, the unsuccessful fellows are left to carry their own load, as they must. That is part of the game. Nevertheless, I submit, and I will not repeat this indefinitely, that we have had no evidence whatever—this is not particularly a criticism of anyone—that the present situation has been taken into consideration by the government in reaching its conclusion. I still wish the minister would allow this to stand so that he can have another look at it.

Mr. ABBOTT: One cannot make tax concessions to people who pay no taxes, and this method of assistance has always taken the form of a tax concession and not a straight subsidy. It has never been suggested, so far as I know, that there should be a straight subsidy. I do not wish to allow the section to stand. It is the continuation of a policy which, as I said before, has been in force for several years.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Unsuccessfully.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not prepared to concede that it has been unsuccessful. If companies have been encouraged to spend presumably over $4,000,000 on deep test wells, it has been a fairly successful policy. We cannot go to the extent of paying the cost of all development, and my hon. friend would be the last to suggest that. I can only make the assertion, and it is a matter of opinion, that we believe this legislation to be proper incentive legislation, and we do not believe the government is justified in going further at this time. While I should be glad to allow the section to stand if my hon. friend insisted, I know, from the discussions I have had in the past on the question, that there is no reasonable probability of there being any change this year. I really cannot say more than that.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I will not ask that it stand unless the minister can say he thinks there may be factors which have not been taken into account. I will not ask to have it stand merely for the sake of holding it over.

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot honestly say what my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. ADAMSON: While I realize that there is no likelihood of the change being made now, I suggest that consideration be given to allowing the entire cost of exploratory, deep test wells, or of any exploratory drilling in Canada by any company. I say this because in my opinion the economy of the country is desperately in need of an oil field.

Mr. HACKETT: You would save the bonus on imported oil.

Mr. ADAMSON: Not only that, but we need it in order to round out our fuel economy, and, indeed, our whole national economy. If the government said that they actually would bonus people going into the oil business to drill for oil—and I am not interested in the oil business; I do not know much about it—I suggest that we could develop an oil field of decent size, comparable with the oil fields of Oklahoma, Texas, California, Peru, Colombia and Venezuela; and if we could do that, the entire national economy of Canada would be altered tremendously. The benefit would be such that not only the Canadian economy but the entire economy of the British commonwealth of nations would be vastly improved. A great deal would be done for our national defence if we had an oil field. There is enormous advantage in having an oil field and I suggest that next year this should be one hundred per cent. I would even go so far as to say that if the government could help in the way of geological surveys and other activities of the kind, even if it were out of pocket for a few years, to see whether we could develop an oil field, it would be an advantageous expenditure of public money.

Mr. IRVINE: Having received from the hon. member who has taken his seat a more clarified view of what hon. gentlemen to my right are trying to press upon the committee, I feel prepared to refer now to the charge made by the hon. member for Stanstead. His sense of humour is heavy, and when he suggests that the policy of the present government is the policy of the group to which I belong, his humour is at its highest and I appreciate it. But I see now that the point is this. The hon. member would have no objection to taking money out of the public treasury for surveying, and even to assist in digging wells, in order that private corporations may get all the benefits that may accrue and the public sustain all the losses that may ensue. That is their policy, and I am opposed to it. If the government is going to do further investigating in connection with oil, and assist in any way in capital expenditures necessary to bring the oil to the surface, and if public money is to be expended and the public is to take the risk, then I suggest that the public should get the income. If my hon. friends to my right will go that far, they will be on our side.

Mr. ADAMSON: But they get the income from the taxes.

Mr. HARKNESS: The hon. gentleman could not have stated our policy in a way more contrary to the truth than he has done. He does not appear to understand what we have been trying to get at, nor does he seem to understand anything about the oil business.

Mr. IRVINE: It is castor oil you are talking about.

Mr. HARKNESS: The minister appears to think that a great deal has been done for the oil industry because $2,000,000 in tax drawbacks have been allowed for deep test drilling. As I have already pointed out, that benefited only a few large companies. They are the only ones that could take advantage of it.

Mr. ABBOTT: They spent fifty per cent of their own money and did not get any back.

Mr. HARKNESS: That is quite correct. I am not objecting to the fifty per cent drawback; I want it extended to other fields. The point I am making is that this so-called incentive legislation which the government has brought in is not operating as an incentive. I am requesting that changes be made in it so that it will act as an incentive, or a much greater incentive than it has done so far.

I should like to see the government increase the depletion allowance. They have improved the depletion allowance for the mines; why do they take such an adamant stand against improving the depletion allowance for oil wells? An increase in the depletion allowance from 33⅓ to 50 per cent, and a provision similar to the one they have in the United States to enable it to be moved backward or forward as required, would do a great deal to help the small driller. That is one thing that the government could readily do, in view of what they have done for the mines. The minister owes an explanation to the country, and to the oil drilling people particularly, as to why the government is not prepared to extend the same tax concession on depletion allowance to the oil business as they have extended to the mining business.

Mr. JAQUES: The policy of the three groups other than this one is much the same in respect to the matter under discussion. But each group is trying to hide that fact from the other groups. There seems to be no lack of finance capital, if we look at the amount of deposits in the Canadian banks and the amount of bonds which are held by the Canadian people. If we are to maintain private industry, if we are to continue with the system of private initiative and private industry, then we have to block what I call funk holes for capital which are provided by government guaranteed bonds by which a man can be guaranteed safe and profitable investment for his money.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I have asked other hon. members to confine their remarks strictly to the resolution under consideration, which is 31, production, refining and marketing of petroleum and deepening of oil wells.

Mr. JAQUES: The point I am trying to make, Mr. Chairman, is that apparently these different parties want the government to do what private enterprise should be willing to do for itself. Oil and mining are, and must be, most highly speculative enterprise. But, where there are great risks of loss, then there must be chances of great profits, otherwise people will not assume the risks. Capital seems now to prefer the safety of bonds, the safe usury of bonds, to the ventures of investment for profit or loss. It seems to me that if finance capital continues to go the way it is going, it can lead to only one thing, namely, the socialization of our economy. As I have said so often in this house, it is a proof of the partnership between Shylock and Marx.

Mr. BRACKEN: Before we proceed further, Mr. Chairman, I should like to raise one point. In the early discussions this morning I gathered from the minister's remarks that the Canadian people are making great—

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member for Wetaskiwin has any questions to ask, I know the other hon. member will be glad to answer them, but he must not ask questions without rising.

Mr. JAQUES: I beg your pardon, Mr. Chairman; perhaps I was a little excited.

The CHAIRMAN: Probably it was my mistake; doubtless I misunderstood.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Just a private fight.

Mr. BRACKEN: In the earlier discussion this morning I gathered from the minister's remarks that the oil industry is a considerable charge upon the Canadian people, that in some manner the Canadian people are being asked to aid this industry; in other words, that the industry is a burden upon the Canadian people.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not suggest that.

Mr. BRACKEN: I did not say that the minister deliberately did it, but that is the impression I got. There was talk about subsidies, about aids, about incentives, about a hundred per cent write-off, and about $2,000,000 paid to the oil companies, and it was suggested that the government could not bear all the cost of certain of these projects. I rose only for one purpose. We all want the truth to be known. Aside from the cost of geological surveys and other basic development work which the government does in some of its departments, is the oil industry to-day, or has it been, a burden upon the Canadian people? Have other taxpayers in Canada contributed to the cost of this development, or is the government doing anything more than relieving it of some taxation in order to encourage its development? The impression which was left was that the industry was a burden upon other taxpayers. I gather the minister did not mean to leave that impression.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, I meant to leave no such impression, of course. In a general way I am fairly familiar with the oil industry as it operates in eastern Canada, and it certainly is no burden on the Canadian people. All that the government legislation has done or attempts to do is to provide to this industry certain reasonable and proper incentives to explore for new oil fields in Canada. We believe they are reasonable. It has been suggested this morning that they are not adequate. That, of course, is a matter of opinion. All that we have said to the oil industry, as to the mining industry, is that we will not ask them to pay taxes and at the same time assume capital losses. Under certain circumstances we will allow them to get back their capital and a certain proportion of their capital losses out of moneys which they would otherwise pay in taxes. We believe that is reasonable and proper, but I do not want anyone in this house or elsewhere to get the impression that we believe the oil industry is any burden on the people of Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: I believe I can touch an aspect of this question which as yet has not been referred to. In my opinion every dollar the government puts into the development of oil, by relieving those engaged in the oil business of a certain proportion of their costs in drilling wells, is money well spent and in the long run does not cost the country a dollar. I want to congratulate this government and every other government, provincial and otherwise, that has supported the development of the oil industry and the mining industry. My life has been spent in manufacturing, but in connection with oil I know that in huge plants in Hamilton, Toronto, Belleville, Stratford, Montreal, Sherbrooke and all across Canada, including your own fine city of Brantford, Mr. Chairman, thousands of men are engaged in manufacturing materials used by the oil companies. At Turner Valley, which presents a real object lesson as to the amount of money invested in getting oil out of the ground and processing it, one can envisage vast works, tanks, pipes and equipment made in plants all over the country. All that equipment, which enables oil men and mining men to take these materials out of the ground, gives a great return to the government through taxes of one kind and another—corporation taxes, sales taxes and so on all along the line. So instead of costing the country anything, this whole business returns great amounts of money to the country in addition to the employment it gives to thousands of men. I cannot understand the attitude of hon. members to my left. The more I think of their philosophy the less I understand how they can persistently oppose development.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is the dark before the dawn.

Mr. MacNICOL: I really get fed up with this talk about those who promote industry. There would be little employment in the country but for industry. I was in it for a long time, and I know. No wheels turn unless somebody puts up money to start them turning, and every wheel that turns means employment. I shall not get into that, or you will rule me out of order, Mr. Chairman, but some day I will get so fed up on this talk against industry that I shall explode. It takes the Scots a long time to get angry, and I do not want to get angry to-day.

Coming back to where I left off, I say I congratulate this and every other government on every dollar that has been invested in finding oil and minerals and having them brought out of the ground. They do no good in the ground; it is only when they come out of the ground that they give any return to the country. Instead of costing the country anything, these industries give vast returns by way of employment, and that is the thing I am interested in more than anything else. Our people want jobs, and they cannot get jobs unless somebody employs them. No other industry creates more employment and provides the number of jobs provided by the oil and mining industries. That is what we want. I say to the government, go ahead; assist in every possible way in the opening up of new oil and mineral fields. You only have to go to the Yellowknife, where I was not so long ago—well, they do not produce oil there. Go to Norman Wells; perhaps the chairman will let me talk about that for a moment. That is possibly a thousand miles north of Edmonton. There you see tank after tank and works for perhaps a mile. Most of that steel was made in Hamilton, perhaps by some of these fine fellows who are here to-day. The equipment you see up in that great oil field was made in hundreds of towns and cities down through Ontario and Quebec and elsewhere in the east. I would say there were perhaps a thousand men and women engaged there; that is an arbitrary figure, but it does a person's heart good to see all these people employed at good salaries. Who would have put money into Norman Wells if it had not been for the oil people themselves and the prospectors who went ahead of them? The prospectors do not come under this item. I should like to say a word to compliment them, but that would be out of order. I say to the minister, go ahead; support the oil people in every way to find new wells. Support the mining people in every way to find new mines, because it is all for the good of Canada.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I want to ask the minister a question. I almost promised the last time that it would be my last, but perhaps this really will be the last one. First I want to refer to something said by the hon. member for Davenport. He congratulated the government. I want to explain that away by just saying it shows the boundless generosity of a real Scotsman. I am only a partly genuine Scot; therefore you will get no generosity from me. I want to refer also to the hon. member for Cariboo. My first acquaintance with the hon. member came through reading a delightful book he had written, in which among other things he gave an account of the party system. I recommend it to all hon. members. Since then I have always regarded the hon. member for Cariboo as preeminently a humorist, among his other qualities. You know, they say of Stephen Leacock that he used to mix up his humour and his economics, and I should like to think that occasionally the hon. member for Cariboo does the same thing. However, he and I find ourselves in agreement on many subjects, such as the party system.

Mr. POULIOT: You are both artists.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): But not in the same class with the hon. member for Temiscouata. I want to ask the minister this question. What is the rate of oil production at present, and how does it compare with what we have had in the past? I am still sticking, like the puppy to the rag, to my feeling that this incentive has been a bit of a dud.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall have to get that information for my hon. friend, but as he probably knows, speaking generally oil production in Canada is dropping.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Then may I again ask if that in itself may not be a warrant for having another look at this section?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, I agree that it is certainly a warrant for having another look.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: While the minister is getting that information, perhaps he could also get figures to show the comparative prices for oil produced in the United States and oil produced at Turney Valley, say.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think I shall have to adhere to the stand I have taken. Which is that these matters should be discussed when we are discussing the subsidy on imported oil, when I shall have that information.

Mr. HACKETT: Why not keep the whole subject together and discuss these matters at the same time?

Mr. BRACKEN: While the minister is getting the data with respect to production, I wonder if he would try to get a little further information. I am concerned with seeing that the Canadian people have a correct view with respect to the oil industry in Canada, and not a wrong view. If other taxpayers in Canada are not bonusing this industry, it is time we knew it, and time we knew that any other impression is not correct. The minister has said—and we accept his statement—that the oil industry has not been a burden upon the people, except to the extent that general surveys and work of that type along basic lines has been done. In addition to its not being any burden on the taxpayers of Canada, this industry has been of some advantage in providing employment and revenue from taxation to carry on the ordinary activities of government. All hon. members will have access to the ordinary statistics of employment, but perhaps the minister could give us some idea of what the oil industry has contributed by way of taxation to the Canadian people.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think perhaps I can get information on that which would be of interest. Of course my hon. friend will appreciate that the oil industry, like a great many other industries, is divided into a number of compartments. There are marketing companies, companies which operate here in the east, some of which have nothing whatever to do with the production of oil. They have the crude oil refined and distributed as gasoline and lubricating oils. Others do not even do that; they simply buy gasoline and sell it. They are nothing more or less than retailers.

I take it my hon. friend's question relates principally to the industry so far as it engages in the production of oil in Canada. If that is correct I shall see what figures I can get and give them to the committee at another time. Perhaps the appropriate time would be when we are in committee on second reading of the bill. However I shall get what I can.

Mr. HARKNESS: In order to keep the record straight, not only have the oil producers of Canada not been a burden on the taxpayers, but they have saved the taxpayers between $5 million and $10 million a year in the past several years in subsidies which would otherwise have been paid. I am not returning to the matter of subsidies, but I am simply pointing out the way in which that amount of money was saved to the Canadian taxpayer.

Mr. MacNICOL: And on exchange in respect of oil coming into Canada.

Mr. HARKNESS: Yes, as the hon. member for Davenport says, on exchange. In addition, the oil producers for some time have bonused consumers of gasoline and oil products in western Canada to a greater extent than that. The bonus to consumers in western Canada last year was about $8 million. It is impossible for me to say definitely how much the oil producers saved the country, or how much they bonused the oil consumer, because the government has seen fit to withhold from me any information as to subsidies paid. However, through private sources I have found out that the subsidy was about 75 cents a barrel —indeed in some cases it amounted to 80 cents.

Mr. ABBOTT: We are right back on subsidies again.

Mr. HARKNESS: That would be a rough estimate of the amount of money the taxpayers have been saved by the oil producers, and the extent to which the oil producers have bonused the consumer.

Mr. WRIGHT: If the minister is going to produce figures to show the position of producing oil companies, and if he wishes to paint a fair picture, he should also produce the figures for the closely allied handling companies. Their directorates in some instances are interlocking. To paint a fair picture of the oil industry he would have to show not only the profits made by the producing companies, but also those made by the handling, distributing and pipeline companies.

Mr. ABBOTT: I pointed out to the leader of the opposition that he had given a fairly big order, but I promised to do the best I could. I shall consider the hon. member's request. It will be recognized, though, that to make a complete and analytical survey of the oil industry in all its ramifications—although a good deal of the information may be available in the bureau of statistics—would be a large order, I might be able to get it before September or October when the house rises.

Mr. ROWE: I have followed carefully the remarks of my leader, of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario and of other hon. members of this party. I believe the committee recognizes that there are few industries more indigenous to Canada than the oil industry. I observe with interest and some concern the fall of our oil production.

In reply to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario the minister said he thought this condition was worth another look. Before that he had indicated that there was very little probability of the government changing its mind.

Mr. ABBOTT: This year.

Mr. ROWE: Yes, this year. Of course governments often change their minds, even when front-rank members of the cabinet are in doubt. Sometimes I have seen cabinet ministers change their minds when other cabinet ministers did not know they were changing. Recently the Prime Minister changed his mind when none of the cabinet knew he was changing it. So I still think there may be hope. I suggest the minister carry out his undertaking to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario and let the section stand in order that he may have another look at it.

Mr. ABBOTT: If the committee insists that it stand I shall have to comply, but I do ask that it be permitted to pass. There will be another opportunity for discussion when the bill is presented. I hesitate to interject a personal note, but I have a heavy programme to place before the house. I indicated earlier that I thought there was no reasonable possibility of our making any substantial change in the oil tax programme this year. Of course if the committee insists I shall have to allow the resolution to stand. But there is no change this year, and I think I ought to ask the committee to permit it to pass. I could consider it between now and the time the bill is presented.

Mr. ROWE: I understood the minister to say he thought it was unfair that he should take another look at the situation, and I thought his answer indicated there might be a slight chance. However, in view of what the minister has said I shall not insist that any change be made. I do express my regret that the government has not seen fit to leave the incentive as it has been.

Mr. ABBOTT: We are leaving it exactly as it it; there is no change.

Mr. ROWE: I mean that I regret there has been no increase in the incentive.

Mr. ABBOTT: We are just continuing for another year provisions which have been in force for three years.

Mr. ROWE: The government could very well have given consideration to increasing the incentive, and I regret that the only incentive given is that which can be taken out of profits already earned. There is no incentive offered to companies which might not have any profit. The government would be well-advised in my opinion—if it is in power in another year—to increase the incentive, because I know of nothing more important at the present time than the oil industry. It is regrettable to think that production has fallen.

Mr. MacNICOL: I shall give one brief example to encourage the minister to stick to any programme which would develop the oil industry. The development of that industry in the area around Norman Wells in the far north has resulted in a brand new business down here in this part of the country. It has been found that the burning of the fuel oil produced in that country encourages people in the far north to invest money in the building of houses which, because of the high price of coal up there, would not otherwise be built. There is no wood available for fuel purposes up there. The development of oil at Norman Wells has been a mighty fine thing, because it has brought about a new industry to manufacture stoves and furnaces to burn oil for use in the north country. This is just one small example of the benefits brought about in increased employment created by investments by this and other governments in promoting the production of oil. Still further examples might be created and more employment created. I am told it is possible that thousands of these oil stoves will be required. I should like my hon. friends to my left, for whom I have a high regard, to try to get that point of view and realize the results that can be obtained by the country making these investments in prospecting. I am not making any comment upon whether it is or is not enough; I am simply grateful for anything the government can do to develop our resources and provide employment, not only in the west but in the plants of Ontario and Quebec.

Resolution agreed to.

32. That the deduction from tax allowed to a corporation, association, syndicate or exploration partnership formed for the purpose of exploring and drilling for oil in respect of exploration and drilling expenses be extended to expenditures incurred during the year 1947 but that in respect of expenditures in that year the deductions be reduced from 26⅔ per cent to 20 per cent thereof.

Mr. HARKNESS: What is the essential difference between resolution 32 and resolution 31?

Mr. ABBOTT: Resolution 32 is for the benefit of new companies which do not have an income. It will enable them to carry exploration expenses forward and deduct them if and when they do have an income. It is the same as the law now stands.

Mr. HARKNESS: I thought the clause was to apply to new companies, particularly syndicates and partnerships which might be set up for the purpose of drilling for oil. I would assume that this resolution 32 applies particularly to what you would term the small man; that it was meant to apply to him.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not necessarily.

Mr. HARKNESS: It applies more to him than to the large corporation.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that I would agree with that.

Mr. HARKNESS: Why is the clause which appears in 31 "the deepening of oil wells which is completed in 1947" left out of 32?

Mr. ABBOTT: This is to cover an exploration enterprise, not a deep test well. The provisions covering deep test wells are to be found in another resolution. They must be approved by the Department of Mines and Resources and be authorized by the governor in council. This relates to the ordinary company exploring for oil, and it enables a new company which has no income to carry its expenses forward.

Mr. HARKNESS: I am not suggesting that either of these resolutions has to do with deep test wells. I was simply asking the essential difference between 32 and 31. The minister told me that the only essential difference was that 32 was designed to look after new companies and things of that sort. I then asked why that did not contain the clause, "the deepening of oil wells which is completed in 1947" which is included in 31.

Mr. ABBOTT: This and other resolutions are drafted in broad general terms, and when my hon. friend looks at the legislation I think he will find that it covers the point he has in mind.

Mr. HARKNESS: Resolution 31 provides for a reduction in deductions from 26⅔ per cent and 40 per cent to 20 per cent and 30 per cent respectively, whereas 32 only allows for a reduction from 26⅔ per cent to 20 per cent. Why is not the 40 per cent and 30 per cent included in the resolution?

Mr. ABBOTT: Presumably the new company which was formed would not be an oil marketing company. There are two types of companies, as my friend knows, the oil marketing company and the purely producing company. The rates are different, depending upon whether it is an oil marketing company or a producing company, or there might be a combination of both.

Mr. HARKNESS: Is the minister suggesting that the oil marketing company should have a greater allowance than the straight oil producing or searching company? That would seem to be the effect of what he is saying.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that in both cases there is a complete one hundred per cent write-off provided under the present law. The only change is to bring the percentages into line with the reduced rates. These rates were reduced by an undertaking made under the dominion-provincial tax agreements.

Mr. HACKETT: What type of company would be affected if resolution 32 were dropped?

Mr. ABBOTT: A new enterprise formed for the purpose of exploring for oil.

Mr. HACKETT: They would not be covered by 31?

Mr. ABBOTT: They are not really covered by 31. As I explained a moment ago, 32 allows an accumulation of exploration expenses to be used in a subsequent year when there may be profits. Under 31 the already operating company has profits and can take its write-off in the year in which it incurs the expenses. There is no change except for the percentages. I thought the oil industry were quite familiar with what this is doing. Perhaps I am not the best person in the world to explain it, because it is rather complicated. I have the section of the act before me and I assure my hon. friend, as I have before, that there is no change in the existing law.

Resolution agreed to.

33. That the deduction from tax allowed to a corporation, association, syndicate or exploration partnership formed for the purpose of exploring and drilling for natural gas be extended to expenses incurred in the year 1947 but that in respect of such expenditures the deduction be reduced from 30 per cent to 22½ per cent.

Resolution agreed to.

35. That the deduction from tax allowed to a corporation, association, syndicate or exploration partnership whose principal business is production, refining, or marketing of petroleum or exploration or drilling for petroleum in respect of expenditures made in connection with a deep-test oil well, be extended to expenditures made in connection with deep-test oil wells spudded in during the year 1947.

Resolution agreed to.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

34. That the deduction from tax allowed to a corporation, whose chief business is that of mining or exploration of minerals in respect of prospecting, exploration and development expenses incurred in searching for minerals be extended to expenses incurred in the year 1947 but that in respect of the expenses incurred in that year the deduction be reduced from 26⅔ per cent to 20 per cent.

Mr. ADAMSON: This resolution is, I take it, similar to the one passed last year, in effect, because it grades down the 26⅔ per cent deduction last year to a 20 per cent deduction this year, but still grants complete exemption to the mines.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is exactly the same, because 26⅔ is two-thirds of 40, and 20 is two-thirds of 30.

Mr. ADAMSON: And in fact it will be exactly the same as the resolution of last year.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is right.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. ADAMSON: The minister and I have an assignation together in another place this afternoon, and I have a lengthy statement to make with respect to his statement the other evening, so I would ask if he would allow me to make it on resolution 10, or would he prefer that I make it on the bill itself?

Mr. ABBOTT: It might facilitate progress, if it were equally convenient to my hon. friend, to make it on the bill. I do not want to be unduly optimistic, but I hope to press ahead with the resolutions this afternoon in order to get them advanced to the point where we can complete the preparation of the bill over the week-end. I would appreciate it, therefore, if my hon. friend could make his statement with equal effectiveness on the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON: Then so far as I am concerned I have no objection to item 34 carrying. Will the minister, after this is carried, proceed with resolutions 10 and 11?

Mr. ABBOTT: At once, yes.

Mr. ADAMSON: I have an amendment.

Resolution agreed to.

10. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years, a corporation other than a corporation whose income is primarily obtained from mining or logging operations shall not be allowed to deduct from income any corporation tax as defined in the existing wartime tax agreements paid to the government of a province.

Mr. ABBOTT: Resolutions 10 and 11 arise out of the dominion offer to provincial governments regarding tax fields. Resolution 10 states generally that provincial corporation taxes will not be allowed as a deduction in computing profits for purposes of the dominion corporation income tax. The exception to this general rule is the taxes levied on corporations whose income is primarily obtained from mining or logging operations. Resolution 11 makes positive provision for the deduction of taxes on profits levied by provincial governments on income from mining or logging operations. As the committee is aware, taxes on profits are not ordinarily regarded as an expense of doing business, and accordingly in the absence of any specific provision such taxes would not be deductible. Under this provision however the effect will be that the dominion corporation income tax will apply to the profit remaining after provincial governments have levied their taxes on profits from mining and logging operations.

I should correct, I think, at this time a misunderstanding of the purpose of resolutions 10 and 11 which appears to have arisen. In the budget debate on July 8 the hon. member for Nanaimo implied that under the dominion-provincial proposals these industries were being singled out for double taxation. It should be clear now, I think, to the hon. member that the purpose of these resolutions is to give relief from double taxation where it exists in the mining and logging fields. If special taxes are levied on these industries by provincial governments, as is the case in one province at least, relief will be obtainable under resolution 11 now to be proposed.

Mr. PEARKES: But they still can be taxed both by the dominion government and by a provincial or municipal government if a provincial or municipal government so desires.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct, but, contrary to the general rule, in the case of these companies the dominion government will allow as a deduction from income the tax, if any, paid to a provincial government—which has never been done in the past.

Mr. ADAMSON: Are we on resolution 10?

Mr. ABBOTT: We are on No. 10. I dealt with 10 and 11 together because they are closely allied.

Resolution agreed to.

11. That there be allowed as a deduction from income earned after January 1, 1947, of a corporation whose income is primarily obtained from mining or logging operations taxes paid by it to the government of any province including income tax on income earned after January 1, 1947.

Mr. ADAMSON: I have an amendment. I will read the amendment first.

That there be allowed as a deduction from income earned after January 1, 1947, of a corporation whose income or on that part of such income which is primarily obtained from mining or logging operations taxes paid by it to the government of any province including income tax on income earned after January 1, 1947.

The new words are "or on that part of such income." I suggest that for this reason, that there are companies whose primary business may not be logging or mining but whose interests contain a mine—particularly I am thinking of a mine. We will take a steel company operating a mine: the primary business of that corporation would be the manufacture of steel—at least we hope it is going to be the manufacture of steel, shortly—but because its primary function is the manufacture of steel it would not come in under and get the benefit of this clause. Nevertheless it is operating a mine. There are one or two corporations in that class, and I have suggested that the seven words be added to the resolution to cover such cases. It does not alter the resolution at all, but merely allows companies of the kind I have mentioned to come under the clause.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would be ready to accept the amendment. The intention is that the tax on that particular kind of income will be treated as a deduction, regardless of what type of company it is, and that will be made clear in the legislation. But if my hon. friend feels that the words he has suggested in his amendment make it clearer in the resolution, I am quite prepared to accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment would enlarge the class of those who would obtain benefits.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think not, Mr. Chairman. I indicated that it was really our intention to include incomes such as my hon. friend has suggested. I believe myself that the resolution is probably wide enough to cover what he has in mind, but to make it perfectly clear I am ready to allow those words to be inserted. I do not take the stand that it enlarges the purpose of the resolution. I believe the resolution covers the point now. However, I accept the amendment in order to satisfy the committee. The legislation will unquestionably make the point perfectly clear, and if my hon. friend is prepared to take that assurance it will meet the situation. It is on the record now. The legislation will include the provision, but if he prefers to have the resolution in the form he has suggested I have no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON: If it is all the same to the minister, I am speaking of matters such as royalties paid on a fee basis to the province.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am satisfied that the amendment does not enlarge the purpose of the resolution, but is for the purpose of clarification, and therefore I accept it.

Mr. ADAMSON: Thank you very much.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Before the clause as amended is carried I would like to read to the minister portions of a letter from a mining company in my constituency showing the seriousness of the loss incurred by mining companies as a result of putting the Canadian dollar on a parity with that of the United States. I quote:

The proposal of the government to allow a depletion of $2 an ounce as an alternative to the 33½ per cent of profits is of no relief whatever to this company, along with most other established operators.

The loss of $3.50 an ounce caused by bringing our dollar to parity with that of the States is a very serious one to us. Labour and other costs have gone up greatly, and are going higher. Unless some relief is found, either by way of an increase in the price of gold, reduced taxation, or increase of the depletion allowance on profits to a very substantial degree, our marginal operations such as that on Bonanza Creek will have to be shut down, and our proposed development programme will halt.

I hope the minister will find some way of remedying that situation in regard to mining companies, gold mining companies particularly, which provide such a large amount of employment for men in Canada, and which spend so much in the purchase of supplies and equipment. Their plight is not a pleasant one.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend was kind enough to send me a copy of the letter to which he has referred, and I appreciate that the change in the exchange value has had important consequences for every gold mining company. The statement I made in the house last Friday evening, I believe it was, sets out the utmost the government feels it can do under existing circumstances to help to correct that situation to some extent.

Resolution as amended agreed to.

17. That a farmer or fisherman be permitted for the 1948 and subsequent taxation years, at his option, to compute his liability to pay tax on the average of his income for the taxation year and the two preceding taxation years.

Mr. ABBOTT: This resolution relates to the three-year averaging for farmers and fishermen. The resolution, after being considered by the committee on Thursday, July 25, was allowed to stand, and I undertook to give further consideration to the representations made by various hon. members in connection with it. The main point urged at that time was that for averaging on a five-year rather than on a three-year basis. In the meantime I have considered carefully the arguments put forward by hon. members, and at the same time have considered other aspects of the proposal. I think the committee will agree that the proposal for a moving three-year average meets to a large extent the claims for a longer period of averaging. This aspect of the proposal was, I believe, emphasized fully the other day.

The second point, which I think was not perhaps fully appreciated in the previous discussion of the item, was that if a five-year rather than a three-year average is taken, farmers and fishermen would obtain no benefit from the provision until five years hence. This seems to be an important consideration in favour of the three-year rather than the five-year period. In the discussion of the item the other afternoon it was pointed out several times that the administration of income tax with respect to farmers is not easy because of accounting difficulties and lack of adequate records. To those advocating the five-year averaging, I must point out the difficult requirements imposed on farmers in keeping adequate records. The introduction of this principle of averaging is a completely new departure in the income tax system, and is proposed here for one group of income taxpayers. I regard the three-year average as substantially meeting the requests of industry, and for the reasons stated above I have concluded that the original proposal for a three-year moving average is, on balance, a practicable method and represents a satisfactory alleviating measure.

Resolution agreed to.

18. That for the 1946 and subsequent taxation years, the service pay and allowances, other than travelling allowances or separation allowances in place of travelling allowances, of a member of the permanent Canadian naval, military or air forces paid at the new rates of pay and allowances established for the said permanent forces be taxable income of a member irrespective of

(a) whether he is serving within or outside of Canada; or

(b) whether he receives the pay and allowances during the first six months after his return to Canada.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is related to the question of service pay and allowances. I believe the main part of the discussion had reference to the income tax treatment of certain special income tax groups, including particularly the fire-fighters.

Mr. GREEN: And auxiliary services.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. I have given careful consideration to the representations which were made by various members in the course of the discussion. As I pointed out at the time, it was not a new subject to me, but one which I had been in fairly close touch with for at least three years. I stated the general principle on which the government had proceeded in connection with income tax exemptions for these groups, namely that it had never been considered desirable or appropriate to grant complete income tax exemption to any civilian group. The question of certain special benefits for the fire fighters and auxiliary services, I believe, is the subject of legislation which was considered by the veterans affairs committee and which will be before the house in a few days. On the question of income tax exemption, the question so far as the auxiliary services is concerned was settled some time ago by order in council, and I believe the members of the committee are familiar with the basis on which that matter was disposed of. When I spoke the other day I indicated that I thought special provision had been made, or was being made, for the fire fighters. At the time I spoke I was not aware that an order in council had been passed dealing with that question as well. The position under the order in council is that the fire fighters are being treated substantially on the same basis as the auxiliary services. I am advised that remission of taxes payable for 1942 in respect of pay and allowances, including dependents' allowances, while serving outside the western hemisphere, has been granted on the ground that no deductions were made and that they were not aware that they were taxable. For subsequent years the basis of the remission of taxes is granted in respect of one-fifth of service pay and allowances, including dependents' allowances for 1943, 1944, and 1945 during which they served outside the western hemisphere. There is also remission of the refundable portion of the tax calculated for all the years from 1942 to 1945 inclusive. I am informed that that is comparable to the bases on which the auxiliary services were treated. I do not know that there is anything more I can add, except to say that after consideration by myself and my colleagues we feel that complete exemption cannot be granted.

I am getting figures which were asked for by some hon. members as to how many are involved. Apparently 422 persons were involved in all, of whom twenty-nine were officers and 393 other ranks. I refer now to the fire fighters. The first of such personnel went overseas in May, 1942. The whole corps was overseas by December, 1942, and they returned to Canada in 1945. As to whether any have paid taxes, the information is not available, but it is anticipated that across Canada some may have done so. Since the T-4 information as a check was not available, it has not been possible to say as yet how many have been assessed. There was no deduction of taxes at the source for these individuals, the table of tax deductions not having been sent outside of Canada. It is probably fair to say that as a result of the remissions to which I have referred the vast majority of these persons would not come within the tax category.

Mr. GREEN: The fire fighters?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. The deputy minister advises me that in effect the provision which has been made here will result in complete tax exemption for over ninety per cent of those involved. As to the auxiliary services, I have not any estimate as to that. I should think they might be on a somewhat different basis.

Mr. GREEN: The contention of those of us who pressed for the complete exemption was that all these men were in effect the same as men in the armed forces.

Mr. ABBOTT: I appreciate that.

Mr. GREEN: And should be treated in the same way. I have no intention to-day of repeating the arguments, but that is what we believe, and we certainly are not satisfied with the statement the minister has just made.

Mr. ABBOTT: I appreciate the fact that that was the position my hon. friend took. In the previous discussion he made that clear, including the reasons which led him to put forward that view. I say with regret that we have not been able to accept it.

Mr. PROBE: What is the position of the civilian employees of the Canadian Legion Educational Services so far as tax remission for the war years is concerned?

Mr. ABBOTT: If serving overseas they are considered as forming part of this auxiliary service to which I have referred, and they were granted a tax exemption with respect to one-fifth of their pay, dependents' allowances, subsistence allowances and the like, and the refundable portion of their tax was remitted along the same lines as I indicated a moment ago with respect to these fire fighters.

Mr. PROBE: That is now final.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is final so far as anything is final in this world.

Mr. LENNARD: The other evening I asked the minister why the fire fighters had not been taxed at the source. A few moments ago he indicated that the tables had not been sent out of Canada, or something to that effect. They were not taxed at the source, but I understood that the supervisors were; therefore the tax tables of the supervisors must have left Canada.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend may be right. The supervisors were in a somewhat different position from the fire fighters. As my hon. friend knows, the joint service organization in Ottawa had headquarters here. They were in close touch with army headquarters all the time, and it may be that there was a little better liaison with that group than with some others, but I would not be prepared to say that the hon. member is not correct in what he has just said.

Mr. PROBE: In cases where the tax of these auxiliary groups was not paid while they were overseas, what steps are customarily taken to secure the tax in arrears? It is going to be a little bit of a blow on quite a few pocketbooks.

Mr. ABBOTT: The procedure is the ordinary collection of accounts method. As the hon. member for Regina City says, it may come as an expensive surprise. I do not know that I can elaborate on the answer.

Mr. PROBE: The department has the collection machinery.

Mr. ABBOTT: The deputy minister assures me that in the Department of National Revenue he has an efficient collection machine.

Mr. LENNARD: I presume there will be no penalties because this tax has not been paid.

Mr. ABBOTT: There will certainly be no penalties for late filing of the returns. I was about to say that I am sure the administration will treat these cases in a sympathetic way.

Resolution agreed to.

19. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years the pay and allowances of a member of the non-permanent Canadian naval, military or air forces other than the pay and allowances received by a member serving outside of the western hemisphere or within six months of his return thereto be taxable income of the said member and that the provisions for

(a) a tax credit in respect of pay and allowances exceeding $1,600 as provided by rule 2, of section 3 of paragraph A of the first schedule; and for

(b) taxation of a member serving outside of Canada in the western hemisphere at one-half the effective rate of tax applicable to his total income

Mr. PEARKES: Is the minister going to explain?

Mr. ABBOTT: This resolution has already been discussed at length. It is one of the three resolutions which refer to the armed services and the merchant marine. The only questions we were discussing were in relation to the auxiliary services, the fire fighters and the like. I do not think there is anything further, unless my hon. friend has some point he should like to raise. I thought we had pretty well covered the general discussion and were concentrating on the question of these special groups.

Mr. PEARKES: That is not my recollection of the discussion which took place.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is all right.

Mr. PEARKES: We had not got any farther than a discussion on resolution 18. There are still some points which I should like to raise in connection with resolution 19, which deals with an entirely different class of people, namely, citizens, soldiers, sailors and airmen who gave up their spare time in order to prepare themselves for the defence of their country. I can understand the reasoning as applied to the regular soldier, sailor and airman, that the income which he derives from his pay and allowances is his main source of income. Soldiering or his work in the service is his life profession, but those gentlemen who are in the non-permanent militia are giving up their spare time. Any pay and allowances which they draw cannot be regarded as their regular source of income. These men of all ranks in the past have drawn on an average, I should say, about fifteen days' pay in a year. I believe the law limits the amount they can draw to thirty days' pay. Out of that pay it has been the custom in the past, and I do not suppose there is any radical change now, for officers, non-commissioned officers and men to contribute varying amounts to their regimental funds. In fact I do not think it is an exaggeration to say that in the long years between the first world war and the second world war, if it had not been for the contributions which were made by the personnel of the non-permanent militia we never would have been able to mobilize in the time we did when the second war broke out. I think credit for that speedy mobilization must be given to those citizens who devoted their time to this cause. It was not only their time; they devoted a large proportion of their pay and allowances as well. It was customary for officers of many units to contribute the whole of their pay. I will not say that was the universal practice, but it was done in a great many units. Sergeants contributed a large share of their pay, and the men of almost every unit made some contribution as well. It might have been only one day's pay of the fifteen; in some units the whole pay was put into the regimental fund, and these regimental funds enabled the units concerned to maintain their existence during the years between the wars, and to mobilize in 1939. Now these men are to be taxed on the amount of pay and allowances they receive. I should think it would be possible to make some exceptions. You might say that personnel who spend the whole summer in camp, serving on the staff, thereby drawing pay for perhaps two or three months as some of them have done in the past; personnel who take extended cruises on board ship; personnel who take courses lasting for two or three months, might reasonably be expected to pay income tax upon the amounts they draw. I do say, however, it is stretching the point too far to tax the civilian personnel on that fifteen days' pay, when a large portion of it is handed back.

In the first place I would ask the minister to reconsider this matter and see if he could not except the ordinary day's pay and allowances for the ordinary training. If he will not go that far, will he not allow as a deduction such pay and allowances as are contributed to the regimental funds?

I should like to mention one other point. It must be remembered that many of the personnel have to buy uniforms and part of their equipment. The men you are now trying to encourage to go into the three services are young men just starting out in life. Many of them have not a great deal of money; and if they find themselves raised to a higher bracket for this reason it might be a deterrent, because after all the service is none too popular. The wives do not like to see these young men spending all their holidays in camp and going out evening after evening to train. As an encouragement to them I would ask the minister to consider first of all whether he cannot relieve them of the tax entirely on pay and allowances for normal training or, if not, at least allow contributions made to regimental funds as a deduction.

Mr. ABBOTT: First I thank my hon. and gallant friend for what he has said with respect to the work of the reserve army, with which I am in complete agreement. On this question of tax exemption, I think he was here the other night and probably heard my views in that regard. I am against tax exemptions. I do not think there should be any. If we were granting them to any civilian group under circumstances such as the hon. member has outlined, probably the members of our reserve army who serve, as he has said, for a portion of their spare time during the year and perhaps go to camp for two or three weeks, would be a deserving case; but I do not think we can grant complete exemption to any class.

On the other point, I am advised that contributions by members of the reserve army to regimental funds are properly deductible from income for tax purposes. That does not include contributions to the officers' mess, of course, or for special comforts for one group, but donations made by anyone to regimental funds, particularly in the case—as I know it is the case—of officers and men who turn their pay in to the regimental funds, can be claimed as a deduction from income for purposes of taxation, of course up to ten per cent of a man's income, which I think would be adequate in most cases.

Mr. PEARKES: That would be ten per cent of his total income, not ten per cent of the pay and allowances?

Mr. ABBOTT: Quite so. If a man had an income of $10,000 he could make donations up to $1,000.

Mr. BROOKS: I do not feel that I can add anything to what has been said so eloquently and logically by the hon. member for Nanaimo, but I should like to just second his remarks. I have had some experience with the militia; the Acting Minister of Finance is also Minister of National Defence, and I have no doubt his sympathies are entirely with what the hon. member has just stated.

Mr. ABBOTT: I tried to make that clear.

Mr. BROOKS: I can assure the minister that he is going to have considerable trouble organizing the militia throughout this country if he puts handicaps such as this in the way. I know that before the war the officers did contribute practically all their pay either to the regimental fund or to the officers' mess. For many years they contributed part of their pay in order to help pay the men coming in. We were allowed only a skeleton company, and in order to increase the numbers the officers contributed part of their pay so that more men would be encouraged to go to camp. I must say I think it is a very short-sighted policy on the part of the government, when they are trying to build up the militia of this country, to impose upon themselves a handicap like this. I suggest that the minister carefully consider the recommendation which has been made by the hon. member for Nanaimo. I believe it would be beneficial indeed to the militia if it could be given favourable consideration.

Mr. HARKNESS: I should like to support the suggestions advanced by the hon. member for Nanaimo and the hon. member for Royal. It is well understood by everyone who has had any experience with the non-permanent militia that the money received in the form of pay and allowances is not real income. In most cases I believe the recipient of the pay and allowances is actually out of pocket at the end of the year as a result of his membership in the militia. In view of that fact I can hardly accept the minister's view that no exemptions or exceptions should be made. In many forms of business, money received which does not constitute real income, from the point of view of making the company any better off, is exempt; and it seems to me this is a proper case where an exemption should be made. As to the discouragement which the imposition of this tax causes among members of the militia and prospective members, I can give personal testimony. I know of two men in Calgary who served in the militia for many years, before the war and during the war, one of whom was overseas. Both were complaining bitterly about the fact that the pay and allowances they had received last year had worked in such a way as to bring their income a certain level, so they had a heavier tax imposed upon them. They not only spent the money which they had received as a result of being in the militia, but they were out the extra amount of money collected from them in taxes. I suggest that serious consideration be given the abolition of this tax.

Resolution agreed to.

20. That the exemption of amounts received by members of the merchant marine as war risk bonuses in respect of service in a war risk zone and of the value of board and lodging received on shipboard, while performing service in respect of which such bonuses are payable be repealed for 1947 and subsequent taxation years.

Mr. GREEN: I should like to refer to the manner in which merchant seamen who were interned have been treated. They have had to pay income tax for all the time they were interned. Apparently their money was held there by the government. A certain portion of it was used to help their dependents. The balance was retained, and some of it is still retained. Out of that balance these men are being assessed for income tax during the time they were in captivity. I suggest that is not a fair procedure. This matter was brought up in the veterans affairs committee, and the following unanimous recommendation was made in the report of that committee:

That income tax be remitted in respect of detention allowances payable to merchant seamen under the provisions of order in council P.C. 12/4209 dated June 12, 1941, as amended by P.C. 87/5204 dated July 16, 1941.

It may be that resolution No. 20 is wide enough to enable the government to make the necessary provision in the bill. But if it is not, I would ask that the minister extend the terms of the resolution so that these men need not pay taxes for the time they were interned.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that the matter is under sympathetic consideration. I do not know that I can make the positive statement at this time that it is being given favourable consideration. I am informed it is the type of special case which may be handled by remission under the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, and I think that is the proper way to handle a special case of this kind on compassionate grounds. It is done in other cases, and I should think that this could be handled in that way. I am glad my hon. friend has called my attention to it, and he can rest assured that it will receive sympathetic consideration.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister make a statement on the point when the bills are brought in?

Mr. ABBOTT: I should hope I would have a chance to discuss it with the departmental officials before that time.

Mr. GREEN: The discussion will be found at page 1472 of the proceedings of the veterans affairs committee.

Resolution agreed to.

EXCISE ACT

Mr. ABBOTT: I suggest that we take at this time the resolutions respecting the Excise Act, and then all resolutions can be reported at one time. We could take resolutions 1 and 2 together.

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Act and to provide:—

1. That the excise duty of $3 per thousand on cigars be reduced to $1 per thousand.
2. That any enactment founded on this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the twenty-eighth day of June, one thousand nine hundred and forty-six.

Mr. ABBOTT: Under resolution 1 there is a reduction in the excise duty on cigars from $3 to $1 per thousand. This reduction may be considered along with the proposed amendment under the Special War Revenue Act, which I hope will be considered in a few minutes, and which repeals the present graduated specific tax on cigars, replacing it with a straight 25 per cent ad valorem tax. It is believed that the new arrangement will be regarded as a fairer system than that which has been in effect. It will remove one of the awkward features of the existing system which repeatedly caused trouble. Under the present graduated tax an increase in selling price above certain points resulted in bringing on an additional tax far in excess of the increase in gross receipts resulting from the price increase. Under the straight ad valorem tax this so-called "notch problem" is eliminated. On balance the new arrangement with respect to taxes on cigars will produce slightly more revenue, possibly $160,000 or more a year.

Since the announcement in the budget of this tax change, various cigar manufacturers have requested that the new rate be only twenty per cent instead of the twenty-five per cent proposed. I have carefully considered these representations, but having regard to the relative level of the taxes on cigars as compared with other forms of tobacco I do not consider that the twenty-five per cent tax is unreasonable. Accordingly I am not recommending that any change be made in the budget resolution.

In the latest fiscal year the revenue from cigars under the Special War Revenue Act and the Excise Act combined amounted to $2,240,000.

Mr. BENTLEY: When these resolutions were prepared, was serious and sympathetic consideration given to the removal of the tax of two cents a bottle on soft drinks? It seems to me that this is important, because it would help to give the young people of the country a greater opportunity of having small social gatherings—more than by reducing the tax on cigars.

Mr. ABBOTT: We hope that this will produce an additional revenue of $160,000 a year.

Mr. REID: They are only drugs, anyway.

Mr. ABBOTT: The tax to which my hon. friend refers comes under the Special War Revenue Act, which we will consider in a moment or two. He can ask his question at that time.

Mr. LENNARD: I believe this has been the cause of the elimination of the five-cent cigar. We now have to pay from fifteen to eighteen cents for two, or something of the kind.

Mr. JACKMAN: How much does the minister expect to get in the way of revenue, as against the $2,240,000?

Mr. ABBOTT: As I indicated, we expect to get slightly more revenue, possibly as much as $160,000 a year.

Mr. JACKMAN: Although this question may not fall directly under the resolutions before us, I would ask why it is that cigars went up in price. The six-cent cigar is now being sold at two for fifteen cents.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that cigar manufacturers' costs, along with some other costs, have increased, and that they have, coincidentally with the change in taxes, adjusted their prices. As the committee knows, there is no ceiling on cigar prices.

Mr. PROBE: Will the minister give a clearer explanation as to how much of the cost of a cigar is taken up in one or other of the two tax forms the minister has mentioned? With the tax being reduced from $3 to $1 per thousand I am confused when I am told that about $160,000 more will be received in revenue each year, when it is combined with the ad valorem duty.

Mr. ABBOTT: Because we are increasing the ad valorem tax.

Mr. PROBE: What is the tax on a cigar which sells wholesale at ten cents or fifteen cents? Cigar prices seem to have gone up twenty per cent, and while I believe this is a good place for a tax—I am all for it—the tax will increase the revenue by only about eight per cent, according to the estimate given by the departmental officials. I should like to understand it a little better.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that I can give a definite answer. However, this is what it amounts to: the tax is $1 per thousand. My hon. friend is a better mathematician than I, and he can figure how much that would come to. Then there is 25 per cent of the selling price, which varies. I suppose the cigar manufacturer too pays his share of income tax.

Mr. PROBE: The tax is now 25 per cent?

Mr. ABBOTT: Twenty-five per cent ad valorem and $1 per thousand excise.

Resolution agreed to.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Special War Revenue Act and to provide:

1. That the securities transfer tax be extended to apply to rights to receive shares of stock.

Mr. ABBOTT: This resolution relates to the securities transfer tax. Under the present provisions of the stock transfer tax, transfers of rights to receive shares of stock have not been taxable. The present resolution is that they shall be taxable in future. Hon. members who are familiar with matters in financial markets will know at once what is meant by dealing in rights. In a company reorganization or rearrangement of the capital set-up existing shareholders are sometimes offered an opportunity to buy additional shares at a price below the market. Accordingly these rights are valuable. They are transferable, and it seems only reasonable that if there is a tax on the transfer of ownership of shares, the tax should likewise apply to transfers of rights to receive shares. This is what is proposed under resolution 1. Revenue from stock transfer tax for the latest fiscal year was about $1,000,000.

Mr. JACKMAN: The government is doing something which more or less takes away from what the shareholders had to begin with. The government says, "We will put a little extra tax on this." I see no reason why you should want to tax these rights. It is not a heavy tax, but it adds up to a substantial amount over a period. Will the minister agree that giving rights cannot possibly give a shareholder more than he had before? It merely prejudices him if he does not take up his rights.

Mr. ABBOTT: I want to answer my hon. friend by saying that I am not trying to argue that his statement is a completely accurate statement of law. The granting of rights to a shareholder does not give him any greater interest in the company than he had before. But if he does not take up his rights but sells them, in effect he is selling a portion of his proportionate part of that company's business.

Mr. JACKMAN: I will concede the fairness of a tax on the selling of the rights, but not on the exercise of the rights.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no tax on the exercise of the rights; it is just a tax on the transfer or sale.

Mr. JACKMAN: All right; that is fair.

Mr. GREEN: These are the resolutions having to do with the Special War Revenue Act. Will the minister make a statement on the tax on soft drinks? There has been a good deal of concern about this tax; representations have been received from many young people, from church leaders, from leaders in the Boy Scout movement and other community leaders who have to do with our young people. They are all much concerned about this tax and I believe something should be done to reduce it. I should like to read a letter which I received from Reverend Joseph I. Monaghan, director of the Catholic youth organization, Immaculate Conception parish, Vancouver. It is as follows:

For almost twenty years I have had the high privilege of close association with and direct control of young people; and I believe my experience—in the classrooms of four provinces, as director of athletics at two colleges, and as moderator of young people's organizations—qualifies me to speak with authority on the attitude and tastes of youth.

Virtue has no more deadly enemy than strong drink. And plain, factual report should convince any honest citizen of our country that the "drink evil" is on the increase among our young people. Youth does not need any artificial stimulant for its social life and every effort should be made to have alcoholic drinks written off its beverage list. But we cannot ask our boys and girls to silence the natural clamour they all feel for the kind of beverage proper to their age. Whenever young people get together they drink. That is as common to them as eating potatoes. It is therefore the duty of every right-minded Canadian man and woman, and particularly of the Canadian government, to see that our boys and girls confine their drinking to beverages that give pleasure or quench thirst, without becoming habit forming as alcoholic stimulants do. Any step taken by the Canadian government to make soft drinks more easily available to young Canadians is a step in the right direction.

[Mr. Jackman.]

The special war excise tax levied on temperate beverages found our youth uncomplaining, and they gladly bore the expense and inconvenience of seven cents a bottle "pop." The war over, Canadian youth rightly believes this tax should be removed. In peace time it irritates them. They feel they should be granted again the right to buy their favourite beverage at the convenient pre-war price. Surely the government can meet the financial exigencies of the post-war period in some other way than by continuing a tax that young Canadians now strongly object to and which, if not removed immediately, will soon cause a loss of bountiful good will that by no means can be compensated by the moneys acquired from a now unfair tax.

We leaders of youth in Canada have reason to believe that our government fully realizes and sincerely appreciates the contribution we are steadily making to our country by moulding the character of Canada's youthful citizens. That being so, may I respectfully beg you to assist us in our work by removing the cause of persistent annoyance felt by those under our charge.

I confidently assure you that compliance with this request will pay magnificent dividends.

Yours very truly,

(Rev.) Joseph I. Monaghan, S.J.,
Director, C.Y.O., Immaculate Conception Parish.

I do not pretend to be an expert on youth, although I have boys of my own, but I think Father Monaghan has placed his finger on the real significance of the effect of this tax. I suggest to the government that they would be wise to change it. I am not going to add to the submissions made in this letter, because they cover the case.

Mr. REID: Like my hon. friend, I have received many letters of the kind, but I have taken exception to those letters. I have written back to priests and ministers and clubs pointing out that I was writing to the Minister of National Health and Welfare asking him to examine this whole soft drink question. To my mind it constitutes nothing more or less than a drug forming habit which is having its effect upon the lives of our people. I have had some experience in athletics, and I think any one who has had similar experience will agree that you would not ask an athlete to take soft drinks. There is nothing better than cold water when he is thirsty. I appeal to the minister of health to investigate this whole soft drink matter. I have not had an answer from any priest, minister or layman to my request that he make a statement in reply to my letter.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the hon. member consider that the drinking of cold water has made him the excellent bagpipe player that he is?

Mr. GREEN: It has added a great deal to the strength of the playing.

Mr. MUTCH: I did not rise to discuss the merits of various beverages from the athletic point of view, because I am no athlete. Like other hon. members I have received the usual, or in this case the almost unusual, number of letters advocating the removal of this tax. I have answered in every case that as far as I am aware there is no financial argument to be advanced in favour of removing tax at this particular time. I have confessed to those who wrote to me, and I declare now in this house that I am impressed by the argument that there is a moral side to the question which in my opinion transcends the importance of the tax value at the present time. I can have no idea what the situation would be in the way of increased distribution of these beverages without knowing the facts as to the future distribution of glucose and sugar, which are the primary ingredients used by the manufacturers. I am not impressed by the suggestion made in some letters of possible political repercussions on the younger generation to be created by the removal of this tax.

I am sorry if my good friend the hon. member for New Westminster thinks me a sentimentalist. Perhaps I have not become as hardened as he professes to be to sentimental appeals, having received them over a smaller number of years than he has, but I am impressed by the appeals. I have had some experience and have knowledge of the nature of the social gatherings of young people. While we may not be able to establish as a temperance argument that seven cents for a soft drink is too close to the ten cents for a beer, still there is a social question involved in the taxation. I have seen the benefits of youths' organizations. A considerable part of their social activities is associated with the availability of these soft drinks, and I would urge, together with others who have succumbed to these appeals, that the minister, even at this time, be less statistical and less concerned with the economic side of this matter, and review it again seriously, bearing in mind its social implications.

Mr. BURTON: When I tried to get the floor a moment ago I had hopes that I could take a middle course between the views of the hon. member for Vancouver South and those of the hon. member for New Westminster. I believe there is a good deal of truth in what both of them have said. Like other hon. members I have received quite a number of communications regarding this tax. While agreeing with what the hon. member for New Westminster said, that some check-up should be made as to the ingredients in some of these soft drinks, I feel that it is not the duty of the Minister of Finance to deal with that; no doubt it comes under another department.

Mr. REID: I said so.

Mr. BURTON: I would say to the Acting Minister of Finance that I do not hesitate to tell those who write to me that in my opinion the two per cent tax is excessive.

Mr. JACKMAN: Forty per cent.

Mr. BURTON: It is altogether out of reason. During the time these letters have been arriving in the offices of members of parliament, the number in my mail dealing with this matter has run from twelve to fifteen or more per day. Many dozens of communications have been received by me from people in my constituency who are concerned about this tax. What I told my people back home when I had an opportunity to speak to them on a number of occasions was this, that while I agreed that the tax was excessive, and that as the budget had not been brought down at that time we would have to wait and see what the Minister of Finance would do, I was disappointed in the attitude of our people when I got dozens of letters with regard to this tax on "pop" and did not get one single letter protesting the removal of the two cent subsidy on milk. It gives you some insight into the line of reasoning and thought in the minds of some people. When the two cent subsidy on milk was removed nobody was concerned, so far as my mail would indicate.

Mr. JACKMAN: Come down to Toronto.

Mr. BURTON: But when it came to "pop"—

Mr. IRVINE: "Pop goes the weasel."

Mr. BURTON: It went! With the hon. member for Vancouver South and others who have brought it to his attention, I would urge upon the minister that something be done to remove or reduce this excessive taxation, and at the same time that he advise his colleague in whatever department is concerned that in the opinion of many of us there should be some check-up of the ingredients in these soft drinks.

Mr. McKAY: I should like to say a word in support of what the hon. member for Vancouver South has just said. I am not in agreement with the hon. member for New Westminster when he says this whole matter needs investigation. As a matter of fact, medical authorities in the United States have investigated these drinks again and again, and I have yet to see a report which is derogatory.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh, yes; we had one, when I was minister of health.

Mr. McKAY: I have yet to see one. It seems to me that this is a matter of comparative values. Young people are drinking these soft drinks, and they are being sold at booths at every picnic throughout the country.

Mr. GREEN: And right here in the house.

Mr. McKAY: And right here in the house. People will drink these beverages. At the present time the tax on a bottle of pop amounts to 40 per cent. In the cafeteria we pay seven cents a bottle. So far as I am concerned I do not care if the use of these beverages is abolished entirely—I mean as far as the soft drinks are concerned.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKAY: But in these days, Mr. Chairman, when there is a considerable effort on the part of organizations throughout the country to combat juvenile delinquency occasioned by the consumption of hard liquor, I think we should at least pave the way to providing them with beverages which are not as harmful.

Mr. REID: That may be the start of it.

Mr. McKAY: To meet the minister half way, I say "as harmful". I admit that the consumption of soft drinks has increased, but so has our population increased, and it is natural that with the increase of population the demand will increase. Also there is more money for people to buy drinks which otherwise might be considered as luxuries. Young people are consuming too much hard liquor; that is freely admitted; and if we can get them off the desire to use hard liquor by drinking a beverage which is not quite as harmful—if you like to put it that way, and I will grant the argument of the Minister of Veterans Affairs that probably it is harmful where it is not bottled under proper health regulations.

Mr. GREEN: He does not know anything about it.

Mr. McKAY: But that is not the argument. Every effort should be made to provide young people with these beverages at as low a cost as possible.

I am not concerned entirely with that, Mr. Chairman. It seems to me that there is another tax which we should have removed, and that is the tax on chocolate bars.

Mr. ABBOTT: May I interrupt my hon. friend a moment? I agreed a little earlier when a question was asked that it might be appropriate to have some discussion of the soft drink tax, because I know it is one concerning which hon. members have received a great many letters. There has been a very carefully organized campaign.

[Mr. Mackenzie.]

Mr. GREEN: Don't put it on that basis.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not suggest that the letters are not sincere, but I know something of the background of the thing. However, we have had a very fair discussion, and I must insist that we do not go beyond this soft drink tax. I have a few observations to make on it, which will be brief, when the various members who wish to express their views have done so. But I do ask you, Mr. Chairman, to restrict the discussion. We are on a section dealing with the stock transfer tax, and we are talking about the soft drinks tax.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do not put a tax on the beverage of the hon. member for New Westminster—cold water.

The CHAIRMAN: I understood that there would be a limited discussion of the soft drinks tax. There has been quite a considerable discussion. Is it now the wish of the committee to hear the minister?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: As one of the younger members of the house I wish to lodge a protest against all this talk about juvenile delinquency and the drinking of hard liquor. Listening to the discussion to-day one would think it was only the young people who do the drinking in this country. I believe that the greater proportion of drinking is done after the age of twenty-one. I have no objection to removal of the tax—it might be an advantage—but I would ask the minister, who has probably had some representations from the various bottling companies, whether he has had any assurance that if the two-cent tax is taken off the drinks will be sold at five cents as before. In the correspondence that I have had I have not been able so far to get that assurance, and it is an important question. If it is only a matter of removing the tax and keeping the price where it is, or reducing it one cent, there is not a strong case, but if it means a nickel drink, that is a recommendation for it.

Mr. ABBOTT: On the last point, the Coca Cola people would give such an assurance, but there are a great many other bottlers and I do not know whether it is possible or feasible to get an assurance from them. Even if the tax were removed this year, however, it would not result in an added supply of soft drinks, because that is something that is controlled by the amount of sugar, which is in short supply, and every soft drink manufactured on the sugar quota is snapped up as fast as it gets into the hands of the vendors. There will be no added supplies available for soft drinks. The second point is this. Representations were made by the bottling companies—strong representations, I may say—and it was felt that the tax should not be removed this year. Consequently there is no resolution providing for it.

Mr. SHAW: There is one matter to which I should like to call the attention of the minister, but first I may say that I have not received a great many communications with respect to the tax on soft drinks. In the city of Red Deer we have an establishment owned by an individual and engaged in the manufacture of soft drinks. I have visited his establishment within recent months. I have looked into his books. I find he has an investment of approximately $20,000. At the outbreak of the war he employed nine persons, and during the early years of the war a number of his employees enlisted. To-day, primarily because of the sugar quota, three persons working part time are able to manufacture all that the sugar quota will permit. But the argument is this. He has a tremendous overhead as a consequence of capital invested in his establishment. Even at the present retail price he cannot secure sufficient from what he manufactures and sells to meet the cost of maintaining his establishment. I have checked his books with an accountant, and we find that there is a possibility of his having to close the establishment. He started from nothing, one might say. He built up his little enterprise, and goodness knows we have so few of these manufacturing establishments in the west that it is most unfair. I do not know whether the minister has considered the matter from this point of view, but even manufacturing all he can with his sugar quota, and paying the tax, there is a danger of another small industry having to close its doors.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): This has been a notable debate and I wish to make a short addition to it. It is a remarkable thing to have heard two Scotsmen united in praising the drinking of water.

Mr. GREEN: They didn't mean it.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): In the second place, without labouring the point, it seems to me that when the matter is being considered at another time, if the tax could be reduced from the present high level it might be a good thing.

Mr. HARKNESS: The hon. member for New Westminster comes from a race that waxed great through the plentiful supply of Scotch whisky, and I can understand his contempt for the "pop" drinker, which I may say I share. The fact remains however that in this country drinking in one form or another is a social custom, whether it be tea or coffee or soft or hard drinks. It is a confirmed habit which all sorts of people, people of all ages, take part in. This being so, the tax of two cents a bottle on soft drinks imposes an altogether undue hardship on the younger generation, who are the chief consumers of soft drinks. If it is in any way possible, I should like to see the government modify or remove the tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: I can assure all members of the committee that I am conscious of the problem involved in this tax on soft drinks.

Mr. WRIGHT: I do not intend to pursue the question of soft drinks, but there is another matter I should like to discuss.

Mr. ABBOTT: I allowed soft drinks to come under security transfer taxes, but surely we should stop there.

Mr. WRIGHT: The question I wish to raise is one in regard to which I have had a great many letters and objections. I refer to the two-cent tax on gasoline.

Mr. ABBOTT: We cannot allow that.

Mr. WRIGHT: It is much more important from the point of view of the country's economy than the question of soft drinks.

Mr. JACKMAN: Getting back to the subject matter of the resolution, does this tax also apply to American securities?

Mr. ABBOTT: If transferred here. If the change of ownership takes place in Canada, yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: Is the minister sure it would not apply if the order were placed in Canada and executed in another country?

Mr. ABBOTT: There would be a legal question involved there, and I do not know that I am prepared to answer offhand. The test is whether the change of ownership took place here. My hon. friend's solicitor would be able to advise him.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is cheaper sometimes to get an opinion for the taxpaying public here than elsewhere. However, may I ask the minister this question. I understand there are two sets of tax inspectors, one for the dominion and one for the province. Has any consideration been given to endeavouring to have an arrangement to simplify that procedure? Am I correct in my original premise that there are two sets?

Mr. ABBOTT: I understand there is no definite arrangement worked out. There has been some difficulty getting cooperation with the province on some matters, and I cannot say definitely.

Mr. JACKMAN: There would be a substantial saving to some taxpayers.

Mr. ABBOTT: The question has been discussed.

Mr. JACKMAN: I hope the minister will do all he can to bring about coordination and the saving of costs.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will do that.

Mr. WRIGHT: I understand, Mr. Chairman, it is not your wish that I should pursue at this stage the question which I raised, but I would ask the minister to tell me at what stage in the budget resolutions, or under the bills, we may be permitted to discuss that matter. It is an important one.

Mr. ABBOTT: I know of no opportunity under the budget resolutions which would be afforded the hon. gentleman. The appropriate time at which to discuss general matters is in the budget debate. When we get into committee we are supposed to consider the specific matters in the resolutions that are being discussed. There are two or three opportunities afforded in the course of the session to discuss matters of that kind—one on the address, one in the budget debate, and still another on one of the supply items. My hon. friend can discuss it on the estimates of the wartime prices and trade board, which I shall have the unfortunate duty of trying to guide through the house. At any rate, the question is not one that can be discussed on this resolution.

Mr. WRIGHT: So long as we have the assurance that we can discuss in on the estimates, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. member cannot discuss it here.

Resolution agreed to.

2. That the present graduated excise tax on cigars be changed to an ad valorem tax of 25 per cent;

Mr. ABBOTT: This is a comparable tax. It deals with the tax on cigars, and was explained when I was dealing with the resolution under the Excise Act.

Resolution agreed to.

3. That any enactments founded in resolutions Nos. 1 and 2 shall be deemed to have come into force on June 28, 1946, and to have applied on all goods imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on or after that day and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day;

Resolution agreed to.

4. That the rate of premium tax payable by mutual insurance companies other than life insurance companies and companies carrying on business under the premium deposit plan be reduced from 3 per cent to 2 per cent, and in the case of exchanges from 4 per cent to 2 per cent in respect of premiums received after December 31, 1946;

5. That the rate of premium tax payable by insurance companies carrying on business under the premium deposit plan be reduced from 4 per cent to 3 per cent in respect of premiums received after December 31, 1946; and

Mr. ABBOTT: I have a brief explanation to give here, and in a moment I shall ask one of my colleagues to move an amendment. These resolutions are related to resolution fourteen under the Income War Tax Act, under which it is proposed to withdraw the exemption from income tax at present applying to mutual insurance companies other than life insurance companies. The removal of this exemption from income tax is in accordance with the recommendations of the McDougall commission. In view of the fact that these mutual insurance companies will no longer be completely exempt from tax, a reduction is being proposed in the premium taxes under the Special War Revenue Act applying to these companies.

The amendments to resolutions 4 and 5 which I shall ask one of my colleagues to move are the result of further consideration of premium taxes since the budget was introduced. I had a large number of representations on this point, including representations from the hon. member for Stanstead who is unable to be here this afternoon. What is being proposed now can be summed up in three statements. First, the base on which premium taxes will be levied in future will be uniform for all classes of insurers, and the basis will be net premiums as distinct from gross premiums. Second, there will be a uniform rate of two per cent applying to all classes of insurers with two exceptions; third, the two exceptions are insurers under Lloyds and reciprocal insurers otherwise known as exchanges. These two classes, it is believed, will not be subject to corporation income tax in Canada, and because of this fact the premium tax in their case will be three per cent in place of the general two per cent. I will ask my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, to move an amendment to resolutions 4 and 5.

Mr. McCANN: I so move.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment is as follows:

Resolved that resolutions Nos. 4 and 5 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

4. That the base to which premium taxes apply in respect of premiums received after December 31, 1946, shall be as follows:

(a) In the case of a company transacting life insurance the gross premiums received by the company other than the consideration received for annuities, less premiums returned and less the cash value of dividends paid or credited to policyholders, and

(b) In the case of any other insurer the gross premiums received or receivable by the insurer or paid or payable by the insured, less dividends, rebates and return premiums paid on the cancellation of policies;

5. That the rate of premium tax payable by all insurers (other than an association of persons formed on the plan known as Lloyds and an exchange) shall be 2 per cent on premiums received after December 31, 1946; and in the case of an association of persons formed on the plan known as Lloyds and of an exchange the rate of premium tax shall be three per cent on premiums received after December 31, 1946.

Amendments agreed to.

Resolutions as amended agreed to.

6. That a deduction be allowed to insurance companies from the premium taxes payable under the Act of the taxes on premiums, paid to the Government of any province in respect of premiums received after December 31, 1946.

Resolution agreed to.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Mr. ABBOTT: We shall now deal with the tariff items. The budget resolutions contain thirty-five items amending schedule A to the customs tariff. Twelve of the thirty-five items permanently continue tariff reductions already established under order in council. Fourteen of the thirty-five items were in the budget resolutions of October 12, 1945, which were withdrawn on November 12, 1945. The remaining nine consist of new items or amended existing items. These resolutions also delete from the Customs Tariff Amendment Act the sections which provide for additional duties on tea and coffee. Orders in council passed under the War Measures Act suspended the additional duty on tea on March 20, 1942, and on coffee on December 8, 1942. These additional duties were eliminated in order to reduce subsidy payments on imported tea and coffee. None of the items in these budget resolutions is of any worth-while bargaining value for trade agreement negotiation purposes, and a number of these changes facilitate administration and eliminate existing tariff anomalies.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the minister make a further statement with regard to these items, which I understood him to say were in the proposed changes of last October, were then withdrawn and are now reintroduced? In particular will he inform the committee more fully with regard to these, and indicate whether they have been reviewed by the tariff board and come here on their recommendation?

Mr. ABBOTT: The items which were in the budget resolutions of October 12, 1945, are as follows: Item 72e, bent grass seed; 90e, frozen vegetables, 197d, stencil paper; 208, boracic acid, et cetera; 219e, Chloropicrin, et cetera; 272b, paraffin wax; 326e, glass tops; 438b, motor vehicle parts; 438c, motor vehicle parts; 438d, motor vehicle parts; 462a, camera parts; 616, latex; 653, brushes; 703, travellers' baggage. I am advised that these all involve reductions or minor amendments to clarify for administrative purposes.

Mr. IRVINE: No increase?

Mr. ABBOTT: No. These have not been considered by the tariff board. As my hon. friend knows, it has not been functioning actively since the first year of the war.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister has enumerated the ones which are reintroduced, but he has not told us what I should like him to tell us, namely, why they were taken off last autumn and why they are on now. What has affected the situation? I should also like him to tell us why the tariff board is not functioning. I had the idea that we had one of the most expert chairmen in existence, and I should like to know why we have not the benefit of his judgment on these items.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that regular tariff changes are not referred to the tariff board, but only special cases. The other question my hon. friend asked was why the changes were withdrawn last October and brought in again now. He may recall the circumstances. The Minister of Finance had one item in his tariff proposals which aroused some controversy. He withdrew that, and at the same time withdrew all the items. That one, I think involved some tariff increase, so that at the time he thought he would look at the whole thing again and he withdrew the tariff increase as well as these adjustments and reductions.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If I may say so, the minister has stated some facts, which I am sure are correct, but I still suggest he has not answered my question. I do remember that the facts were as he stated; but in respect to the one matter in doubt last autumn, as to which there was some disagreement, that is all we were allowed to know last autumn. I think it would be of interest if we could know why the tariff board has not been consulted, since apparently that was not done. This is such a world of experts now I thought we did everything on the advice of experts, but apparently this is where the amateurs have stepped in. Personally I believe in amateurs; I do not like to be wholly handed over to experts, though I like the experts too. I should like to know why they have been dispensed with in these important matters.

Mr. ABBOTT: There are a number of experts; I have one tariff expert in front of me at the moment.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I again suggest, with all the deference due from an ordinary member to a minister, that my question has not been answered.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps my hon. friend would repeat his question. I am at a loss as to just what it was.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I think the reason the minister is lost—

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. gentleman wants to know why this was not submitted to the tariff board?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Yes.

Mr. ABBOTT: To answer shortly, because the tariff board has not been functioning since the first year of the war, except on appeals.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): But that is not an answer as to why these changes are made.

Mr. ABBOTT: I answered that before by saying I am told that in any event only special cases were submitted to the tariff board. Ordinary tariff changes were not submitted.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister did answer that part of my question, but he has not given as yet any explanation at all as to any of these items. I am not going to weary the committee by going through them in detail but I suggest the minister might take some spot items here and there.

Mr. ABBOTT: I can do that. It is a lengthy list, but I have a book here containing complete explanations of all items. Take tariff item No. 4, which relates to horses. This happens to be a new item. This item formerly provided for "horses, over one year old, valued at $100 or less per head" and carried rates of $10 per head under the British preferential tariff, $12.50 per head under the intermediate tariff, and $25 per head under the general tariff. The new item eliminates the words "over one year old, valued at $100 or less per head" and substitutes therefor the abbreviation "n.o.p."

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Item 1 provides for duty free entry from all countries of pure bred horses for the improvement of stock. Item 4 covered horses over one year old valued at $100 or less per head and all other horses were included under item 5(c), the item covering living animals, n.o.p., duty free under the British preferential tariff, with a rate of 20 per cent under the intermediate tariff and 25 per cent under the general tariff. Under the present amendment all horses, except pure bred horses for the improvement of stock, are dutiable at rates of $10—$12.50—$25 each.

This amendment facilitates the administration of the revised warehousing regulations issued by the Department of National Revenue on April 1, 1946. Under the former regulations it had been the practice of the Department of National Revenue to grant a racing bond for a period of ninety days to United States horses racing in Canada. This bond could be renewed when the horse moved from one track to another. At the end of the racing season the horses could be transferred to a feed and pasture bond which was good for twelve months. When the next racing season came along they could be transferred back to a racing bond, and so on indefinitely. The new regulations which went into effect on April 1, 1946, reduce the privileges enjoyed by race horse owners. If a horse leaves Canada to take part in a race in the United States it has to remain out of this country for three months before it may be reentered and bonded. It is permissible under the new regulations to transfer a horse racing in Canada from a racing bond to a feed and pasture bond, but it is not permissible to transfer from a feed and pasture bond to a racing bond without an intervening period of three months. A horse may remain under a feed and pasture bond for a period of not longer than nine months. When a horse is on a racing bond it must be transferred to a feed and pasture bond or returned to the United States where it must remain for a period of three months before reentering Canada.

Many of the horses which were in Canada on April 1, 1946, were United States horses owned by Canadians and were on a racing bond or a feed and pasture bond. When the bond expired these horses had to leave Canada or the owners had to clear them through customs by paying a duty of twenty per cent ad valorem, as in practically all cases they were over one year old and valued at over $100 each. Under the new item they may become Canadian horses by the payment of a duty of $12.50 each. It is probable that most race horse owners will discontinue the bonding of horses and pay the customs duty at the time of their first entry into Canada.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I thought that a very interesting explanation indeed, and I should be still more interested if the minister would say a further word as to just how much longer the tariff board is to be out of action, and when we are again going to have the services of the people we ordinarily consider to be our tariff experts.

Mr. ABBOTT: I should like to answer that, Mr. Chairman, but I cannot do so at the moment.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I do not know whether I am in order in asking this question, but the hon. member for Medicine Hat and I have been consulting this schedule and we are about as much in the dark now as when we started. I come from a constituency which produces large quantities of cedar and fir poles, and pit props for use in mines, both of which are in great demand at the present time. A machine has been invented to peel these poles and props, which I believe costs between eight and ten thousand dollars. I understand it is not produced in Canada and has to be imported from the United States, and that involves the payment of considerable duty. This machine speeds up production tremendously, and I should like to ask the minister the reason for charging such duty on this type of machine, which can be procured only in the United States and which is of such great assistance in this industry. In my constituency I have a number of producers who would like to purchase these machines, but when you consider that they cost from eight to ten thousand dollars, plus the duty, that is a very heavy investment for a small operator to make; in my opinion they should be duty free. Could the minister give me any information on this matter?

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no item in these resolutions, of course, which covers any article such as my hon. friend has referred to. Frankly I confess that I am a long way from being a tariff expert, and I do not know that I am in a position to answer his question very informatively. I am advised that no representations have been made to the department with respect to the particular case to which the hon. member refers.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I have made representations.

Mr. ABBOTT: I appreciate that. I meant that prior to my hon. friend making this statement in the committee, no representations have been made to the department.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I made representations in writing to the Department of National Revenue some months ago.

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, they have not been passed on to this department. However, my hon. friend has raised the matter and I will see that it is looked into at once. As I understand my hon. friend's question, he is suggesting that there should be no tariff on an item of that kind under the circumstances. I can only say in reply that as it stands at present the law is that on machinery of a class and kind not made in Canada there is a ten per cent duty.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I suggest that these tariff items be called one at a time? Most of them require no discussion, and I think we will get through very much quicker.

Mr. ABBOTT: I agree; I think that is about the only way we can hope to make headway. The first item is the one I have already discussed.

Customs tariff—4. Horses, n.o.p., each: British preferential tariff, $10; intermediate tariff, $12.50; general tariff, $25.

Mr. JACKMAN: When we have no representations from our constituents we sometimes do not give as careful attention as we might to these matters, because we believe no problems have arisen. In this connection, however, after what the minister said I was wondering whether or not it was the desire of the owners of race horses in Canada to keep them under United States registry, so that in due time they might perhaps sell them in the United States and thus avoid heavy import duties into that country, particularly if they were United States horses to begin with. Have any representations been made that the present change will not work satisfactorily?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that this does not affect their position in that respect. It simply permits them to move horses freely back and forth between Canada and the United States. There is really an optional procedure available to them. They can either go through this elaborate bonding procedure, or pay this $12.50 per head.

Mr. HARKNESS: It gives the horses dual citizenship.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is one way of putting it.

Mr. McLURE: Does it affect standard bred racing horses? I understand that they come in from New York and Massachusetts to race in Canada. They can go back, without any payment of duty, within a week.

Mr. ABBOTT: If they are bonded they can do that. They have been able to do so in the past; there is no change now.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—72e. Bent grass seed, not to include red-top grass seed: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: Where does bent grass come from?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that most of it comes from the west coast in the United States.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—90e. Vegetables, frozen: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. JACKMAN: Where the items show that the present rates are the same as the contemplated rates, after the change, what is the purpose of putting that in?

Mr. ABBOTT: I would point out that in connection with item 72e, for instance, the words "not to include red-top grass seed" have been added to the item. In many instances the description of the item is changed, although there may be no changes in the rates of duty.

Mr. JACKMAN: In connection with this item, I am wondering why the minister would wish to lower the rates on frozen vegetables. The frozen vegetable business is now growing extensively in Canada. It runs into hundreds of millions of dollars in the United States, and is now beginning to take hold in this country. Despite that fact, we find a lowering in the tariff. It is not as though frozen vegetables consisted only of early varieties. Vegetables once frozen will keep indefinitely, and I am wondering why the tariff should be lowered.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend will be relieved to know that this is a manufacturers' item, and that it is satisfactory both to importers of frozen vegetables and to freezers of vegetables in Canada. There are at least three firms engaged in freezing vegetables in Canada, and it is on their suggestion and with their approval that the item appears.

Item agreed to.

Items 143, 168 and 168a agreed to.

Customs tariff—180e. Engineers' plans, drawings or blue-prints of machines and plant equipment, plant layouts, foundations for machinery and other plant equipment, structural supports and towers and similar outside structures, dams, spillways and other hydro construction, wiring, piping, platforms, ladders, stairs, etc., not to include office or other buildings: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

[Mr. McLure.]

Mr. MacNICOL: Perhaps it would be wise in many instances to permit these blue-prints and drawings to come in free. But what safeguards have our own engineers and draughtsmen in connection with the drawing up of plans on plants, and the like? Our own universities and schools are turning out large numbers of draughtsmen.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that our engineers need protection in this respect. I believe it was really only an added cost on production, and it would seem that this would be a satisfactory item to have on the free list.

Mr. MacNICOL: These items, according to this schedule, are to come in free.

Mr. ABBOTT: They are to come in free under this schedule, although they were not before. The old rates were 12½ per cent, 22½ per cent and 22½ per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: What protection do our own draughtsmen have?

Mr. ABBOTT: They will have none, after this item is passed. It is felt they will not need protection for this type of article.

Mr. MacNICOL: If I wish to build a plant in Canada, but fancy the lay-out of a plant in the United States I might inquire from the plant owner as to whom he had purchased his plans from. He would probably give me the name of the architect who had drawn up the plans for his factory. If I ask that architect to draw me a duplicate set of plans and specifications am I permitted to bring them in free.

Mr. ABBOTT: This does not apply to architects' plans for buildings. It applies to engineers' plans, drawings or blue-prints of machines, and so on.

Mr. MacNICOL: It refers to plant layouts.

Mr. ABBOTT: They will be free.

Mr. MacNICOL: I can bring in a plant layout free?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, free.

Mr. MacNICOL: Have the Canadian architects approved that?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is not a matter for architects, but rather one for engineers.

Mr. MacNICOL: Plant architects and engineers are often the same. Evidently they do not know about it, or they would be up in arms.

Item agreed to.

Items 192f, 197d, 199i and 208 agreed to.

Customs tariff—219e. Chloropicrin, ethylene oxide, methyl bromide, methyl formate, cyanides, carbon bisulphide, acrylonitrile, or mixtures containing any of these, for use in combating destructive insects and pests: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I note that under the column showing the present rate there are two rates indicated. What does that mean?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told there have been some new items added in this general item, some of which had tariff rates under the tariff as it now stands. They are being included in this item respecting chloropicrin, and all are being put on the free list.

Item agreed to.

Items 272b, 272c and 326e agreed to.

Customs tariff—326k. High thermal shock resisting glass parts when imported by manufacturers of high thermal shock resisting glassware, for use exclusively in the manufacture or in the repair of such articles, in their own factories: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have an amendment which I shall ask my colleague to move.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I move:

That schedule A to the Customs Tariff as amended by resolution No. 1 of June 27, 1946, be further amended by striking thereout tariff item 326k and by inserting in lieu thereof the following item, enumerations and rates of duty:

"High thermal shock resisting glass parts when imported by manufacturers of high thermal shock resisting glassware for use exclusively in the manufacture or in the repair of such articles: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, 25 per cent."

The only change made by this amendment is the deletion of the words "in their own factories".

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—434c. Trucks of welded design with tubular frame, cast steel cross members, rubber mountings and rubber inserted wheels, of a class or kind not made in Canada, and body shells of welded sheet steel, for use in the construction of street railway cars, not to include electric motors or magnetic truck brakes; complete parts of the foregoing: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. CAMPBELL: What is this thirty-five per cent for? Is it for protection or revenue? What revenue has the department obtained from this item?

Mr. ABBOTT: This refers to trucks for street-cars. There is a reduction in the intermediate tariff from thirty per cent to ten per cent.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The minister has not answered the question. I wanted to know if this item was put in for the purpose of getting revenue or for protection. If it is put in for revenue purposes, how much was received last year?

Mr. ABBOTT: To the extent that there will be a 10 per cent duty, I suppose there would be a protective feature, but at that low rate it is primarily for revenue purposes. I do not suppose we import them very often, so that there would not be much revenue.

Mr. MacNICOL: It would only be city street-car companies that would buy them?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—438b. Bearings, clutch release; bearings, graphite; bearings, steel or bronze backed, with non-ferrous metal lining; bushings, graphited or oil impregnated; ceramic insulator spark plug cores, not further manufactured than burned and glazed, printed or decorated or not, without fittings; compressors, air; commutator copper segments; commutator insulating and rings; tapered discs of hot rolled steel, with or without centre hole, for disc wheels; distributor rotors and cam assemblies; door bumper shoes; electric wiring terminals, sockets, fittings and connectors and parts thereof, not to include battery terminals; gaskets of any material except cork or felt, composite or not; ignition contact points, keys for shafting; auxiliary driving control kits, designed for attachment to motor vehicles to facilitate their operation by physically disabled persons, and parts thereof; lenses of glass for head, tail, dome, signal and cowl or parking lamps, and for light reflectors; lock washers; piston ring castings in the rough, with or without gates and fins removed; rails of lock seam section, corners, locks and catches, unplated ventilators and parts thereof, the foregoing being of metal other than aluminum, for the manufacture of window sashes for bus bodies; steel bolts, or studs, capped with stainless steel; switches for lamps, heaters and defrosters and parts thereof; vacuum control assemblies; vulcanized fibre in sheets, rods, strips and tubing; all of the foregoing when of a class or kind not made in Canada and for use in the manufacture or the repair of the goods enumerated in tariff items 424 and 438a, or for use in the manufacture of parts therefor: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. WRIGHT: What is the dollar value of the imports under this item? I just want to know what this means to the companies.

Mr. ABBOTT: This item adds certain items to the class covered. I am advised that there is no information as to the value of goods that will be imported under the additions to 438b, but they probably would not exceed $50,000 annually.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—438c. Ammeters; arm rests and wheel housing lining of indurated fibre, pressed to shape; axle housings, one piece welded, machined or not; carburetors and parts thereof; chassis frames and steel shapes for the manufacture thereof; cigar and cigarette lighters, whether in combination with a cigarette holder or not, including base, and parts thereof; control ventilator gear box; cylinder lock barrels, with or without sleeves and keys thereof; dash heat indicators and parts thereof; electric gear shift switches and parts thereof; engine speed governor units and parts thereof; fluid couplings, with or without drive plate assemblies, and parts thereof; front axle cross channel king pin support section assembly of steel, in the rough; fuel pumps, vacuum pumps and combinations thereof and parts therefor; gasoline gauges and parts thereof; hinges and parts thereof, finished or not, for bodies; horns and parts thereof; instrument bezel assemblies and parts thereof; instrument board lamps; locks, electric ignition, steering gear, transmission, or combinations of such locks, and parts thereof; mouldings of metal, with nails set in position, lead filled or not; oil filters and parts thereof; oil gauges and parts thereof; pipe lines of tubing, rigid or flexible, covered or not, with or without fittings, and tubing therefor, for oil, fuel, air or liquid for actuating hydraulic brakes; purifiers for air, and parts thereof; purifiers for oil or gasoline, parts thereof and brackets and fittings therefor; radiator, hood and other grills, assembled or not, and parts thereof, but not polished nor plated, and not to include finish or decorative moulding; radiator ornaments, and hood lift lock ornaments, unplated, and parts thereof; radiator shutter assemblies, automatic radiator water gauges; radiator shells and parts thereof, not plated nor metal finished in any degree; shackles, bearing spring, and parts thereof; speedometers and parts thereof; spring covers of metal and closing strips or shapes therefor; stampings, body, cowl, hood, fender and instrument board, of metal in the rough, trimmed or not, but not metal finished in any degree; starter switch assembly and parts thereof; steering wheels, rims and spiders therefor; sun visor blanks of gypsum weatherboard; thermostats and parts thereof; throttle, spark and choke assemblies, including buttons therefor, and parts thereof; tire clamping rings of steel, plated or not; universal joint ball assemblies; voltage control regulators; wind-shield wipers and parts thereof; all of the foregoing when of a class or kind not made in Canada and for use in the manufacture or the repair of the goods enumerated in tariff items 424 and 438a, or for use in the manufacture of parts therefor: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

(1) Provided, that if the above articles are imported for use as original equipment by a manufacturer of automobiles, motor vehicles, electric trackless trolley buses or chassis enumerated in tariff items 438a and 424 whose total factory output during the year in which importation is sought does not exceed ten thousand complete automobiles, motor vehicles, electric trackless trolley buses or chassis, and provided that not less than forty per centum of the factory cost of production of such automobiles, motor vehicles, electric trackless trolley buses or chassis, not to include duties and taxes, is incurred in the British empire, the rates of duty under this item shall be: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, 25 per cent.

(2) Provided, that if the above articles are imported for use as original equipment by a manufacturer of automobiles, motor vehicles, electric trackless trolley buses or chassis enumerated in tariff items 438a and 424 whose total factory output during the year in which importation is sought exceeds ten thousand automobiles, motor vehicles, electric trackless trolley buses or chassis, and provided that not less than sixty-five per centum of the factory cost of production of such automobiles, motor vehicles, electric trackless trolley buses or chassis, not to include duties and taxes, is incurred in the British empire, the rates of duty under this item shall be: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, 25 per cent.

(3) Provided that the governor in council may make such regulations, if any, as are deemed necessary for carrying out the provisions of this item.

Mr. WRIGHT: Could I have the same information on this item?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is only an estimate, but the comparable figure would be not to exceed $30,000 annually.

Customs tariff—438d. Front and rear axles; brakes; clutches; internal combustion engines; steering gears; magnetos; rims for pneumatic tires larger than thirty inches by five inches; transmission assemblies; hydraulic or fluid couplings and torque converters; drive shafts; universal joints; steel road wheels; and parts of the foregoing, when of a class or kind not made in Canada, and imported by manufacturers of the goods enumerated in tariff items 424 and 438a for use only in the manufacture of motor trucks, motor buses and electric trackless trolley buses, or for the manufacture of chassis for the same: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

(1) Provided that if the above articles are imported for use as original equipment for motor trucks, motor buses and electric trackless trolley buses, or for chassis for the same, by a manufacturer of the goods enumerated in tariff items 424 and 438a, and provided also that during the year during which importation is sought, not less than forty per centum of the factory cost of production of such motor vehicles and chassis therefor, not to include duties and taxes, is incurred in the British empire, the rates of duty under this item shall be: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 7½ per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

(2) Provided that the governor general in council may make such regulations, if any, as are deemed necessary for carrying out the provisions of this item.

Mr. WRIGHT: Could I have the figure with respect to this item?

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I might give just a word of explanation here. The only change in regard to this item is the insertion of the words, "hydraulic or fluid couplings and torque convertors" after the word "assemblies" in the fourth line. These hydraulic or fluid couplings and torque convertors are used on very large trucks and they cost almost $1,500 a unit. They were formerly dutiable under tariff item 438e, which item was duty free under the British preferential tariff and carried a rate of twenty-five per cent under the intermediate tariff and forty per cent under the general tariff. It is almost impossible to form any estimate as to the value of annual imports of this special truck equipment.

Item agreed to.

Items 438i and 442 agreed to.

Customs tariff—445j. Electric dry shaving machines for use in removing human hair, and parts thereof: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are any of these made in Canada?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told that there is at least one company making them.

Mr. MacNICOL: Have they made any representations?

Mr. ABBOTT: They have made no representations against the proposed item; in fact I understand that they asked for it.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—446h. Bathtub stampings of metal: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is this the ordinary bathtub stamping?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are they not made in Canada?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told not to any extent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—462a. Photographic cameras and equipment, and complete parts of the foregoing, for use by professional photographers and commercial photo-finishers in their own business, as follows:

Cameras for professional purposes, for making negatives 4¾ inches by 6½ inches and larger, and the following accessories for use with such cameras: lenses, shutters, exposure meters, range finders, film and plate holders, lens hoods, lens boards, ground glass carriages, reducing backs, reversible adapter backs, lantern slide attachments, film sheaths, combination paper and plate holders, kits, carrying cases, camera stands, camera tripods, camera tripod tops, vignetters, diffusion disks, diffusion disk holders, colour filters, colour filter holders, polarizing screens, polarizing screen holders and backgrounds.

Printers, enlargers, heaters, dryers, mounting presses, print washers, automatic film processers printing frames and tanks for developing, fixing and washing: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. ABBOTT: The only change in this item is the addition of the words "and complete parts of the foregoing" after the words "photographic cameras and equipment" in the first line. This was one of the items in the budget resolutions of October 12, 1945.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—475e. Matrices of non-advertising news pictures for reproduction in newspapers and periodical publications enjoying second-class mailing privileges: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. LENNARD: Does this apply to actual photographs?

Mr. ABBOTT: It does not apply to actual photographs, only what is described as the mat.

Mr. LENNARD: Mats of photographs?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. LENNARD: If this is some of the trash that comes in it should not be allowed at all.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—569d. Woven fabrics, not exceeding two inches in width, made with unserrated selvages, generally known as single, double or four shot corded ribbon, imported by the manufacturers of mens' hats for use exclusively in their own factories in making the bands for, or in binding the edges of, men's hats only: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are these made in Canada?

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: They are imported only by hat manufacturers?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, for making bands or for banding the edges of men's hats.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—616. (iii) Latex, being crude rubber in liquid form, not compounded beyond the addition of preservatives: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. MacNICOL: Shall we be able to ship latex into the United States free of duty?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know the provisions of the United States tariff in connection with this item or whether we would ship rubber to the United States.

Mr. MacNICOL: We are making it now at Sarnia.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told that this is one of those tariff anomalies. The imports during the calendar year 1945 amounted to 215,889 pounds valued at $71,467.

Mr. MacNICOL: We are making it ourselves, but I want to know, if we find it necessary to export in order to keep this new factory at Sarnia in operation, shall we be able to ship into the United States free of duty?

Mr. ABBOTT: If my hon. friend can tell me what the United States tariff policy is going to be, perhaps I could answer him. I do not think this item is on the United States free list now. Whether or not it will be in the future, I could not say.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—653. Brushes of all kinds, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 40 per cent.

Mr. LENNARD: Why is this item included? There does not seem to be any change.

Mr. ABBOTT: We have added "n.o.p."

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—703. (a) Travellers' baggage, under regulations, prescribed by the minister: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

(b) Goods valued at not more than one hundred dollars included in the baggage accompanying residents of Canada returning from abroad after an absence from Canada of not less than forty-eight hours and acquired by them for personal or household use or as souvenirs or gifts, but not bought on commission or as an accommodation for other persons or for sale, under regulations prescribed by the minister: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Provided that a resident of Canada shall not be entitled to the exemption herein granted within a period of four months from the date of the last exemption allowed, nor shall the exemption be allowed on alcoholic beverages in excess of one quart, or on tobacco in excess of fifty cigars, two hundred cigarettes and two pounds of manufactured tobacco.

Provided further that goods entitled to entry under this item shall be exempt from all imposts, notwithstanding the provisions of this act, The Customs Tariff Amendment Act, 1939, or any other act.

Mr. STIRLING: What is the change here?

Mr. ABBOTT: This is the item under which residents of Canada returning from abroad after an absence from Canada of not less than 48 hours may bring back duty free goods valued at not more than $100, which goods have been acquired by them for personal or household use or as souvenirs or gifts. The only change is the addition of the last proviso which reads:

Provided further that goods entitled to entry under this item shall be exempt from all imposts, notwithstanding the provisions of this act, the Customs Tariff Amendment Act, 1939, or any other act.

Since the $100 exemption proviso was inserted in the tariff to implement the Canada-United States trade agreement which went into effect on January 1, 1936, new duties and taxes have been imposed, the most important being the additional duties provided by the customs tariff amendments of 1939 on tea, coffee, tobacco and alcoholic beverages. This proviso definitely exempts goods entitled to entry under the $100 exemption from all customs duties and taxes.

Mr. STIRLING: Do I understand that it refers to the contents of a traveller's baggage but not to the baggage itself?

Mr. ABBOTT: A traveller could bring in a piece of luggage, provided that he kept it within the permissible $100 exemption.

Mr. STIRLING: He could buy a suitcase?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Items 709 and 786 agreed to.

Customs tariff—826a. Dies in the rough, not being complete parts of machinery, for use in the manufacture of bolts, nuts, nails, screws, rivets and tacks: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are these forging dies now being made in Canada?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told that in some cases there are, but I am also informed that this is what might be colloquially described as a manufacturer's item.

Mr. MacNICOL: I thought as much. It should materially help our die manufacturers, of whom we have quite a number in this country.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. MacNICOL: The chairman is well versed in the qualities of good dies.

Mr. ABBOTT: So I understand.

Item agreed to.

Item 836 agreed to.

Customs tariff—847. Distillers' solubles obtained from the liquid residue remaining after the alcohol has been removed in the process of distilling grain or molasses mash, whether or not subjected to a fermentation process, when imported without admixture except that necessary for the said fermentation process, for use exclusively in the manufacture of feeds for livestock, poultry or fur-bearing animals, under such regulations as the minister may prescribe: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I notice that the words "under such regulations as the minister may prescribe" are introduced. Is there some special reason why this should be specially protected?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told that the minister is given power to make regulations in order to ensure that this material is pure and suitable for feed purposes. It is imported for feed purposes. It contains vitamins, or whatever this riboflavin contains, that are supposed to be very good for cattle.

Item agreed to.

That Schedule A to the customs tariff be further amended by deleting from the Customs Tariff Amendment Act, 1939, as amended, the following enumerations of goods and rates of additional duties of customs:

Tea, when the value for duty thereof under the provisions of the Customs Act:

(a) is less than 22½ cents per pound—5 cents per pound;

(b) is 22½ cents or more but less than 30 cents per pound—7½ cents per pound;

(c) is 30 cents or more per pound—10 cents per pound;

All goods specified in customs tariff item 25a—10 cents per pound;

All goods specified in customs tariff item 26, except coffee, roasted or ground—10 cents per pound;

Coffee, green, and coffee roasted or ground—10 cents per pound.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain this resolution?

Mr. ABBOTT: This amendment permanently deletes from the Customs Tariff Amendment Act, 1939, the provision therein providing for the imposition of additional duties on imported tea and coffee.

Mr. GREEN: Is that not a pretty good argument for removing the tax on soft drinks?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that there is necessarily any connection.

Mr. GREEN: What is the difference?

Mr. MacNICOL: Everybody drinks tea.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know. Speaking personally, I like tea and coffee; I do not care for soft drinks; but that is probably not a very good reason.

Mr. GREEN: I think that is just the trouble. We are a lot of old fogies who drink tea and coffee, and some take drinks a little stronger.

Mr. ABBOTT: They do, eh?

Mr. GREEN: But these soft drinks are drunk by the youth of the country; and I suggest to the minister that he keep that in mind when he brings down the next budget.

Mr. ABBOTT: As my hon. friend will appreciate, the purpose of this remission is to reduce the cost of certain imported articles which are in everyday use and form part of the cost of living, in an endeavour to maintain the price ceiling.

Mr. MacNICOL: We cannot let off the hon. member for Vancouver South with that. All of us are in favour of youth getting soft drinks cheaper. We are not old fogies just because we drink tea and coffee.

Mr. LENNARD: I am not letting off the hon. member for Vancouver South either. He is making an appeal to those who use soft drinks, but he did not include us who may at times enjoy something a bit stronger.

Mr. GREEN: Talk for yourself.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I want to know if this reduction will be reflected in the price of coffee to the consumer, and, if not, why not?

Mr. ABBOTT: I would not think so. This has actually been off for two years. It is merely putting in statutory form what was done by order in council under the War Measures Act, and if we do not include it in a tariff item now, with the lapse of the Emergency Transitional Powers Act, the remission would fall. There was no change in the price as a result of the order in council, but it prevented an increase in price.

Resolution agreed to.

3. That any enactment founded upon the foregoing resolutions to amend the customs tariff or schedules thereto shall be deemed to have come into force on the twenty-eighth day of June, one thousand nine hundred and forty-six, and to have applied to all goods mentioned in the foregoing resolutions imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that date, and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that date.

Judges Act

CONSOLIDATION AND AMENDMENT—SALARIES, ETC.

The house resumed from Monday, July 29, consideration in committee of bill No. 250, respecting judges of dominion and provincial courts—Mr. St. Laurent—Mr. Golding in the chair.

Sections 4 and 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Salaries of district judges in admiralty of exchequer court.

Mr. McLURE: There is an item of $800 for the district judge of the admiralty district of Prince Edward Island. Is that amount the same as before?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Yes. There is no change being made in those additional payments to judges for special duties.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Salaries of judges of Supreme Court of Ontario.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The legislature of Ontario adopted a bill providing for an increase of two in the number of judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario on the trial division, the amendment to come into force on proclamation. It has been represented to us, and we have found that the representations were justified by an examination of the facts, that in order to take care of the increasing volume of business in the trial division of the Ontario court it was necessary to increase the number of judges, because undue delays were occurring in the trial of cases in the high court. On the other hand, we represented to the authorities of Ontario that there might be some possibility of reducing below sixty-two the number of county court and district court judges in that province, and the attorney-general with his officials agreed to go carefully into an examination of that situation in an endeavour to bring down from sixty-two to fifty-two gradually, as vacancies would occur, the number of district and county court judges. I can assure the committee that the cooperation between the Department of Justice and the department of the attorney general in that regard has been harmonious, and that on both sides there has been an expressed and sincere desire to arrange the matter of the number of judges there so as to be of the greatest convenience to the public without increasing the expenditure to the country. It is felt that the work which has now to be handled by the county or district court judges could be handled by fewer judges if there were a better distribution of their time and services. Of course it will not be possible to remove judges for the purpose of decreasing the number; but, as vacancies occur, it is the hope that the number of judges of that court may ultimately be brought down from sixty-two to about fifty-two, and I undertook, in my negotiations with the attorney general of Ontario, to ask one of my colleagues to move an amendment to this section 7 which would allow, when the Ontario government has proclaimed its act, the appointment of two additional judges for the trial side of the supreme court of that province. Accordingly I would ask my colleague to move that paragraph (d) of clause 7 be amended by striking out the word "twelve" and substituting therefor the word "fourteen".

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McKAY: Will the minister indicate the number of judges in both provincial and dominion courts that will be affected by the act?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have not counted, but my understanding is that there are about 275 judges who are appointed and paid by the federal government.

Mr. McKAY: Will the minister also indicate what the total cost to the treasury will be as a result of this increase in judges' salaries.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: My estimate is between $600,000 and $700,000.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I wish to ask the minister a question regarding a matter I brought up on a previous occasion. Now that the salaries of judges are to be materially increased, what is the attitude of the government to be in regard to the whole question of judges serving on commissions, which in the past has meant in many cases substantial additions to the amounts received by judges.

I have raised the point before and I will not labour it on this occasion. I realize that the answer might very well be that they receive no salary in addition to their indemnity as judges. But amounts are paid of $15, $20 and even $25 a day while judges are serving on commissions. I consider it only proper for me to say at this time that the difficulties incident to royal commissions, in which there is any question of political considerations, however remotely they might be connected, have an effect on the judiciary which we, who serve before the judiciary, feel should be guarded against.

I am not going to go into the espionage commission at this moment, but it made a declaration in section 11, I believe, in regard to the powers of commissions, to which I will refer on a later occasion.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Has the hon. member noticed that there is a special clause, 38, which deals with this? If there is to be a protracted discussion on the point, it might be better to have it on clause 38.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I agree absolutely with my right hon. friend, and I mention it again only because I feel that our purpose must be to secure the best men for the bench. While there are those who say that the best men can be obtained at present rates of indemnity, I join with the Minister of Justice in saying that I know men, leaders of the bar, who, within the last year or so in western Canada, never noted for great fees made by its counsel, have refused an offer to go to the bench, and in more than one instance have refused an offer to come to the Supreme Court of Canada.

I realize that we must secure the best men, and when the minister asks for an increase in Ontario to fourteen members on the bench, I would suggest that even then the members of the high court of justice in this province will be overworked. In large measure they are overworked to-day as a result of the tremendous volume of divorce litigation that is before the courts. Only the other day someone told me that in the city of Toronto alone there are 1,200 cases awaiting trial, and the same condition prevails everywhere across the dominion. I have no hesitation whatever in repeating what I said in this house two or three years ago, that some measure along this line ought to be introduced. I am sure I speak for the bar of this dominion when I say that the Minister of Justice has earned not only their gratitude but the gratitude of the people of Canada as a whole for introducing this measure. It may be subject to some criticism because other types of pension are not being raised at this time. I hear that argument advanced. For instance, there is the question of old age pensions. I should like to see old age pensions increased. But this measure is distinct and apart from that question.

This measure is one that strikes at the future of Canada, for, without a bench that is free from the suggestion of any possibility of taint, the administration of justice in this country cannot maintain in the minds of the people the high plane it now occupies. For years objections have been made by the bar association, and I say that one of the striking commendations of this bill is the fact that, without exception to my knowledge, the press of the dominion, realizing that there cannot be a free press unless the courts are untrammelled and are of the highest merit, have given unqualified support to this legislation.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 8 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

On section 14—Salaries of judges of Supreme Court of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. McLURE: The other day I asked the Minister of Justice a question with regard to the appeal court. I did not have all the information with reference to the matter. I have an item here which, with the Chairman's permission, I should like to read. It is from the Charlottetown Guardian of July 27, and reads as follows:

> Under the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, certain duties and obligations are imposed upon the province; others upon the dominion. It is the duty of the province, for instance, to declare what courts shall be constituted. This is done in the form of a provincial statute. It then becomes the duty of the dominion government to make appointments to the judiciary so constituted.
> Such a statute was passed by the Prince Edward Island legislature in 1922. Chapter 6 of the statutes of that year enacted that "the bench of the said supreme court shall be composed of a chief justice and three other judges". That act was enacted in May, 1922, and was well within the legislative authority of the provincial legislature, under section 92 (14) of the British North America Act, 1867. Section 92 (14) declares that "in each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the class of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say: (14) The administration of justice in the province, including the constitution, maintenance and organization of provincial courts."

The question I asked the Minister of Justice the other day was how could they constitute a real court of appeal there.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: When I joined the Canadian government I had the advantage of having as one of my colleagues, a brilliant lawyer representing one of the constituencies of Prince Edward Island and one who was much better informed of the situation in that province and of the needs in respect to the administration of justice there than I could be. We made serious efforts over a long period to find some system which would be acceptable to Prince Edward Island in respect of its judiciary appointed by the federal government. It was not found possible to do that unless we added an additional high court judge to the judiciary of that province. It was not felt that it would be proper to do that in view of the fact that there were already three high court judges and three county court judges there, and that the population was of numbers that are sufficiently provided for elsewhere by at most two judges. As I said to the hon. gentleman the other day, not knowing Prince Edward Island, but knowing the situation which prevails elsewhere, it seems to me that it would be in the interest of the people of that province if they had, rather than three high court judges and three county court judges, four high court judges and two county court judges. I am still hopeful that something along these lines can be worked out, because I appreciate that it would be more satisfactory if a three-man court could sit in appeal from the judgment of a court presided over by one high court judge. On the other hand, I would hesitate to recommend that there be an additional judge appointed for the judicial business to be transacted in that province. I assure the hon. gentleman that the question was considered sympathetically, and that my colleague of those days, Hon. Mr. Ralston, did give it serious consideration and did try to devise some system which would not unduly increase the expenditure and which would be satisfactory to the people of my hon. friend's province. I still hope that that will be arrived at. It may be that this increase in salary will be helpful in that regard. I would not hesitate to recommend that there be four judges paid the increased salaries, provided that there were only two paid at the rate which prevails for county court judges.

Mr. McLURE: I want to thank the minister for that good explanation. While I am not a lawyer, I still think one judge of the county court should be able to sit with the two supreme court judges in the court of appeal, two of them having an increase in salary.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If that were acceptable to the people of Prince Edward Island they could provide for it themselves by an amendment to their own provincial act. In my province judges of the trial division can be called upon by the chief justice of the court of appeal to sit with the members of the court of appeal to hear appeals. The legislature of Prince Edward Island could provide—if they so choose—that the chief justice of the court of appeal would be entitled to call upon one of the county court judges to sit in his court to hear appeals in the province.

Mr. McLURE: That is the answer to their question, is it not? They ought to be satisfied with that.

Section agreed to.

Sections 16 and 17 agreed to.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

On section 18—Salaries of judges of county and district courts.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask a question on this section. I rise not to oppose anything, because I am strongly in favour of the judges receiving more remuneration. I am convinced that we have the best judiciary, perhaps I should not say in the world, but as good as the best in the world, and there is no judiciary better than the one we have in Canada. Why has Ontario sixty-two judges and Nova Scotia only 7; New Brunswick only 6; British Columbia, only 14; Prince Edward Island, only 3; Saskatchewan, only 18; Alberta, only 12, and Manitoba, only 10? In Ontario, where so few people get into trouble, perhaps we do not require so many judges. Why is it that Ontario has so many in comparison with the other provinces?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: A few moments ago I explained that in increasing the number of judges of the high court from twelve to fourteen I had—I will not call it a definite commitment—negotiations with the attorney general of Ontario and his department looking to a gradual reduction of about ten in the number of county court judges. The department of the attorney general feels that it will be possible so to arrange the distribution of the work of the county court judges gradually to bring the number down by about ten.

Mr. MacNICOL: On a basis of population and in comparison with the other provinces he could go still lower, could he not?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Well, it will be quite a substantial start. The old act provided salaries for seventy-five and we are now down to sixty-two. I hope that, before the act comes before parliament again, we shall be down to about fifty-two. There is a keen desire not to have the courts overmanned, because it is not good for a judge not to have enough to do.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister is absolutely right.

Mr. McKAY: The minister has suggested a reduction in the number of district or county judges, and I think that suggestion is very good; but is he taking into consideration certain territorial considerations? For instance, some of our provinces have a concentration of population; I have in mind Ontario and perhaps Quebec. It seems to me that when you have a province with a more scattered population it may take more judges to administer the area than where you have a concentrated population. Certainly it would require more travelling on the part of district and county judges. Is the minister taking that into consideration?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes. Of course we take no initiative in determining the number of judges. We merely discuss the matter with the provincial authorities, because we feel they know better than we do the requirements of their respective localities. I wish to pay tribute to the good will and earnest endeavours I have met with everywhere in discussing a proper set-up for the administration of justice.

Section agreed to.

On section 19—Salaries of judges of circuit court of district of Montreal.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Apparently there is to be no increase in the amount allowed these two judges in the city of Montreal. My information is that the reason given is that the jurisdiction of the circuit court has been transferred to the superior court.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: To a magistrate's court set up and manned by the province.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is it altogether fair —and I ask this advisedly—that in regard to two judges in the whole dominion a different rule should apply from that which applies to all the others?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It does conform to the view I have undertaken to place before the house. I felt I should come before the house and say that this was not something being done for persons, that it was something done because I felt it was necessary or advisable in the interests of the public. I could not say that with respect to these two honourable gentlemen, most of whose work has been taken away from them and attributed to magistrates. They still have some cases within their jurisdiction, but there is very little for them to do and at the present time they cannot retire. When they reach the stage where they can retire they will get an annuity equal to the full salary attributed to their office at the time they were appointed.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How long have they been on the bench?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think one of them has been there for about fourteen years and the other for about six or seven years. I felt, of course, that I could not ask parliament to take any right away from them, but that I would not be justified in asking parliament to give them, really as a retirement allowance, more than the salaries attributed to their offices at the time they were appointed, because they have practically retired from the exercise of actual judicial functions, though they still conserve the judicial offices.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Has the minister given consideration to transferring these men to some position where, instead of waiting for the effluxion of time to bring them a pension, they would be able to give service for what they are receiving?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I shall be glad to give consideration to that suggestion. I do not know of any office here which could be made attractive to them at this time.

Section agreed to.

On section 20—Travelling allowances.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would ask my colleague to be good enough to move an amendment to this section. In drafting section 20 for the bill we did not give sufficient attention to the fact that certain county court judges are appointed for more than one county. The intention was not to deprive them of their allowance when they had to travel out of the county in which they reside. The intention of the clause was that they would not get travelling allowances for performing their judicial duties at the chief place of the county in which they reside, but it was not intended to deprive them of their right to travelling allowance when they had to go to another county where they had to perform judicial functions. I would, therefore, ask that subsection 4 of section 20 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

(4) No judge of a county court is entitled to be paid travelling allowance for attending in court or chambers at the county town of the county within which he resides or at the judicial centre or district town of the judicial district for which he is appointed.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move accordingly.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the meaning of that?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The meaning is that there must be one town at which the judge has to perform his judicial duties without being entitled to travelling allowances to go to that town. If he has more than one town where he has judicial duties to perform he shall be entitled to travelling allowances for the other towns within which his commission normally requires him to operate. As the section was drawn previously it might have meant that he would not get a travelling allowance for attending at any of the court towns where under his commission he was required to perform his judicial duties. We wish to make it clear that it is only with respect to the court town of the county in which he resides that he is not entitled to charge travelling expenses.

Mr. HAZEN: Will there have to be an amendment to subsection 5, or does this cover it?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think any amendment is required there. He is not allowed travelling allowance for travel that is not necessary. If it is travel that is necessary, of course he makes the charge and receives the travelling allowance.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McKAY: May I ask the minister just how transportation expenses are calculated? I notice that later in the section there is an allowance for each day while away from home; we have just been discussing that. Does this transportation expense just cover his railway fare, or so much per mile for car operation if he uses an automobile? Does it include anything more?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It does not include anything beyond transportation and the specified allowance fixed by the statute.

Mr. HAZEN: I have not followed this very closely, but might I ask whether, when a county court judge who has more than one county under his jurisdiction goes to another county, he is allowed travelling expenses.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: He is allowed travelling expenses.

Mr. HAZEN: But as I read subsection 5 it does not say so. It says:

> No judge of a county court is entitled to be paid travelling allowance for attending in court or chambers at a place not within the county—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is to take care of cases, which are quite frequent, where a judge goes into a county or district not normally within his jurisdiction to assist a brother judge or to replace a brother judge. In those cases there must be a certificate of the attorney general that the holding of court at that place was approved. But subsection 4 as now amended provides that the judge does not receive travelling allowances for attending at the county town of the county in which he resides. When he is appointed for more than one county, he receives travelling allowances for going elsewhere than to the court town of the county in which he resides.

Mr. HAZEN: Where does it say that?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In the subsection as amended.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. HAZEN: Do we presume that he is to be paid if he goes to another town?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: Is that only a presumption, or is it so stated?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is stated in section 20 (1), in these words:

> Subject as in this section provided, a judge of a superior or county court or a district judge in admiralty of the exchequer court who attends as such judge in court or chambers at any place other than that at which or in the immediate vicinity of which he is by law obliged to reside is entitled to be paid as a travelling allowance—

And so on.

Mr. McKAY: It seems to me that this expense account of $10 a day is excessive. Officers of the armed services had to go into cities and towns, and all they were allowed was $6 a day. It seems to me that is enough? I can see no reason for differentiation between a city and a town, because members of the armed services moved in and out of cities and towns, and they were allowed only $6. I believe that is sufficient.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have seen accounts which indicate that it costs judges in Ottawa, Toronto, Quebec and Montreal more than the allowance provides. Representations were made that it should be increased. I said that I was not going to ask parliament to do more than to increase the salaries. It happens that they pay a little more than is allowed, but I did not want to ask parliament to make an increase in that allowance. However, I did see hotel bills, and I know that judges who travel almost every month from Montreal to Quebec and who stay at the Chateau Frontenac, and judges from Quebec who stay at the Windsor hotel in Montreal have expenses in excess of $10 a day.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 21 to 24 inclusive agreed to.

On section 25—Compulsory retirement of judges of county court and circuit court of district of Montreal.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I note that under section 22, which deals with annuity on resignation, such annuity is not to be less than two-thirds of the salary. Under that provision, what would be the largest annuity, on retirement?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The largest annuity on retirement under this bill will be that to which the chief justice of the supreme court will be entitled. No change is being made there. His retirement allowance will be equal to the salary of the office at the time he was appointed. That is because he was appointed prior to there being a retiring age fixed. It was felt that having a life tenure of office, and parliament having made the disposition that he could retire at the age of seventy-five, he should not be deprived of the emoluments of office. But in that respect no increase is being made. It was felt that that was a contractual right that it would not be proper to change, but that we were not required to extend it when an increase was being made in annual salaries.

County or district court judges are also required to retire at the age of seventy-five. Under the former act they retired with an annuity equal to full salary. That number of dollars is not being increased. We say we will increase their salaries, but we do not recognize any obligation to increase the retiring allowance to which they were entitled under the present act.

Then the hon. member asked what would be the largest retiring allowance in respect of the other judges. The next largest would be for the puisne judges of the supreme court, who would receive two-thirds of $16,000. All the other retiring allowances are two-thirds of the stated salary.

Mr. McKAY: Has a fund been set up to provide these annuities, and have the judges contributed to such fund, as do civil servants?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, there never has been any fund provided for retiring allowances. It has never been on a contributory basis. Our system was borrowed from the British system, and I think it antedates the establishment of superannuation funds for civil servants. It is something we inherited when we inherited the system, and it has been conserved since.

Mr. BENTLEY: I hope it is in order to make the remark I am going to make. I was thinking that the non-pensionable war widows are going to love this.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: When we suggest that annuities should be paid in other cases, the argument in advanced to us that it detracts from a person's self-respect to draw from an annuity to which he has not contributed. But apparently on this level it does not affect them in any way.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Recently Mr. Justice Plaxton retired because of illness. Would he come within the provisions of section 22? What would his retirement allowance be?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: His retirement allowance was $4,000, because he had exercised the option provided in the 1944 statute. As the hon. member has noted, there is no attempt here to increase the retiring allowance of those who retired hitherto.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I appreciate that.

Mr. McKAY: Is there any retroactive measure with regard to pensions?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No.

Mr. McKAY: Either for the wife or the judge?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. There is nothing being done with respect to judges who have retired hitherto, because it was felt that their annuities were not payable to them under the terms of the statute, but because they had received letters patent granting them stated annuities. The Judges Act, so far as they were concerned, had been exhausted. They had been given what the Judges Act empowered the government to give them, namely letters patent providing a stated annuity. But it was not felt that the process of amending the Judges Act could or should have any effect upon what had been done in the past.

Mr. JAQUES: If a judge retires before the retiring age would that affect his pension?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I may have to qualify my answer. There is a retiring age only for federal court judges and district and county court judges. The federal court judge is required to retire at seventy-five years. There is no provision for these judges retiring before that time unless they become incapacitated. If they become incapacitated they can be retired and receive a pension equal to two-thirds of the salary attached to their office. A county court judge can retire with pension—this has not been changed—after thirty years of service, payable at the same rate as would be paid if he retired at the age of seventy-five years; that is, a pension of $5,000. After twenty-five years service he can retire, if the lieutenant governor states in the acceptance of the resignation that it is in the public interest that he should retire, with a pension of two-thirds the salary.

Section agreed to.

Section 26 agreed to.

On section 27—Annuity provision in respect to judge taking public office.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Perhaps the minister could answer the question which I asked a week or so ago with respect to Mr. Justice Davis, a judge of the court of appeals of Saskatchewan, who since his first appointment has served, first, on the board administering the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act; second, as deputy minister of national war services and, latterly, as minister to Australia. There have been a number of references in the press to the fact that he is to leave the bench to enter the diplomatic service, either in Washington or in London. I would appreciate if the minister would outline exactly what his position would be with regard to pension and the extent to which the period that he had been a judge although not actively serving as a judge would count in the payment of an annuity.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: With respect to Mr. Justice Davis this section will provide, as it has already been provided with respect to the chief commissioner of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, that when he retires from the public service he will be in the same position as if he were retiring from the bench. If he were dismissed from the public service before serving fifteen years from the time of his first appointment to the bench, under the terms of the act he would not be entitled to receive a pension.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: To be concrete in the matter, Mr. Justice Davis has been eight years as a member of the bench although not actually serving on the bench. If he retires in order to enter the diplomatic service, what will be his pension for the time he was actually appointed to the bench?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No pension while in the public service and no pension if dismissed from the public service before fifteen years from the time of his original appointment to the bench. But if he retires from the public service at a time when the governor in council might certify that his retirement from the bench was in the public interest he will then receive a pension equal to two-thirds of the salary attached to the office of judge.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am trying to follow that. I presume that if he is appointed to a diplomatic post he will not continue as a member of the bench in Saskatchewan; I presume also that the governor in council will grant him permission to retire as judge. As my right hon. friend knows, if there is one thing more necessary than another it is that a judge serve on the bench to which he has been appointed. In Saskatchewan the court of appeal is made up of five members who necessarily have to deal with abstruse points of law, There should be an odd member on the bench in order to guard against dismissals of appeal because of an equal distribution of opinion on the bench. If Mr. Justice Davis receives a diplomatic appointment, will he then be permitted to retire and what will be his pension? I am asking this question of the right hon. gentleman both in his capacity as Minister of Justice and as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: He would receive no pension upon being appointed to the service of external affairs and he would receive no pension while in office with external affairs. Upon retirement from external affairs he would be entitled to be granted the same pension as if at the moment he were retiring from the bench.

Mr. IRVINE: In other words, he gets a judge's pension?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: He would get his judge's pension when retiring from the public service if he served another seven years.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I think this is an unusual proceeding. It means that we are going to place our judges on the bench where, once appointed, one believes they will serve so long as they have the capacity. We are going to place our judges in the position where they will accept appointments to the bench as a temporary expedient and then, after a few years on the bench, take some other appointment, possibly some semi-political appointment. Then, having served in that capacity for a period of years and finally terminating their services they are able to count not only the period they served as judges but also the period in the public service.

I should like to know the extent to which there has been a demand for this change in the law. I am fearful of the prospect that the separation of judiciary and executive will not be as complete as it should be should parliament give approval to a plan such as this. I would not object if a judge retired from the bench with the consent of the government and then received a pension at the conclusion of his public service for the period that he had actually served on the bench. That would be going a long way, but this is going a long way farther. I should like to know whether it is to cover an ad hoc case, or is it anticipated by the minister that there will be a number of cases such as this where judges retire from the bench after a few years to take up other types of public service where no pension is payable and then, having taken up that other type of public service, be rewarded with a pension as though they had already served on the bench?

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

PRIVATE BILLS

JOSEPH ALPHONSE CHRISTEN

Mr. D. A. CROLL (Spadina) (for Mr. Maybank) moved the second reading of bill No. 311, for the relief of Joseph Alphonse Christen.

Mr. J. W. BURTON (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) is in his seat at the present time I should like to ask him whether he has given any further consideration to the suggestion he himself made in this house some time ago as to providing other facilities for dealing with these bills.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I should not like the hon. member to be under the impression that I had made a suggestion of another procedure for dealing with these bills. If I had any suggestion to make it would be that parliament refuse to consider them. But since I did not feel that after so many years it would be probable that parliament would take that course, I did say it appeared to me that an alternative course might be for parliament to say that it would not deal with applications for divorce unless there had been, before the application was launched, a judgment of a court of justice establishing, in proceedings for judicial separation as to bed and board, the fact that an offence of adultery had been committed. I did not intend to suggest that I was going to promote proceedings of that kind, but I had discussed that as being an alternative form, a method which would not involve any recognition that divorce was a thing to which one was entitled as a matter of right, but a convenient way of ridding parliament of the onerous duty of hearing witnesses and inquiring into facts.

Mr. BURTON: Who, then, should take the initiative in this?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Well, so far the other place has been the place where divorce applications originated and where investigations into the facts are conducted. If the hon. members of the other place declined to investigate and declared that they would not do that themselves and would not give favourable consideration to petitions unless they were founded upon the judgment of a court of justice finding that, as a matter of fact, adultery had been committed, and that became known, it would be notice to applicants that it was useless to come there unless they had a judicial finding to support the petition. It seems to me that if the hon. members of the other place were to make it known that was going to be their attitude, and then followed it up by in fact refusing to consider petitions unless there was that kind of documentary evidence to support them, this procedure of investigation would come to an end.

Mr. REID: They have never complained.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That was the suggestion I made, not as a procedure which I was going to promote, but as one which would appear to me to afford a method—

Mr. BURTON: It would seem very reasonable to me.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: —of ridding parliament of the onerous and disagreeable task of investigating facts in connection with these petitions.

Mr. IRVINE: May I ask the minister—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: May I remind the house that it is not in committee and that it is unusual to ask questions at this stage. The usual procedure is to give these bills second reading and then refer them to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, after which they come back to the house and go to committee of the whole.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): May I add a word or two. I think, in all fairness to the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), it must be said that he has stated correctly the circumstances and the way in which he made the proposal for a change some time ago. To be perfectly fair, he did not make it as a proposal, but he discussed it with us in committee as a possible alternative to the present procedure. I think the reason the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton) and others of us rise to speak at such a time as this is that we were conscious of the fact that the minister's suggestion met with pretty general approval, if I am any judge at all, amongst members of the house. It is not a suggestion which goes to the root of the question; some of us might like to see a more complete overhauling of our divorce laws; but it is a suggestion which, without disturbing the general basis which is already accepted, at least would take away the farce that some of us now feel it to be, in this parliament.

Mr. REID: It is no farce. All the cases are investigated. The idea of spreading abroad that this is a farce!

Mr. KNOWLES: The word is on the record and it stands.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. It is improper to reflect on the proceedings of this house by calling any proceedings in the house a farce.

Mr. KNOWLES: Well, Mr. Speaker, if the way I used that word can be construed as a reflection on the proceedings of the house I should be glad to withdraw it; but, of course, I have heard hon. members when making a withdrawal sometimes have something else to say along the same line. And so I would say that most of us here, even those who are objecting to my use of that word, do not like the procedure we now have. Our purpose in taking a few moments to speak about it now is to express the hope that the suggestion made by the Minister of Justice, since it is at least some improvement on present procedure, will receive further consideration in the hope that something may be done about it without too much delay.

JUDGES ACT

CONSOLIDATION AND AMENDMENTS OF ACT—SALARIES, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of bill No. 250, respecting judges of dominion and provincial courts—Mr. St. Laurent—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee is considering section 27.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I return once more to this section to make a few observations. The reason the judiciary enjoys the high reputation it does lies in the fact that when a person is appointed to the bench it is generally conceived that in that situation he gives no further consideration to any question of participation in public affairs. If there is one thing more than another that should be kept in mind it is that, once a judge is appointed to the bench, unless he chooses to retire, to divest himself of the position and of any emoluments pertaining thereto, there should be no suggestion that he might be open to consider the acceptance of a position paying more than does the judiciary. And after he has had an opportunity of serving in a more highly paid position for a period of years, to suggest that at the conclusion of his term he should receive a pension such as a judge receives, is a dangerous principle.

I realize a somewhat similar principle was partly in effect previously to cover the position of chief commissioner or assistant chief commissioner of the board of railway commissioners, both those positions being pseudo-judicial, or semi-judicial positions ordinarily to be filled by outstanding jurists or men learned in the law. But to extend this principle so that a judge, after serving a few years on the bench, may retire therefrom and then accept some position in the public service, and at the end of his term in the public service reap the advantages that were his by reason of the sacrifice he made in his income in going on the bench, if he is a leading member of the bar, seems to me to be a dangerous principle to adopt.

I would ask the minister to inform the committee how many judges he has in mind who are about to retire, or is this an ad hoc proposition to meet one specific case? I should like to know what representations have been made to this end by the Canadian Bar association. I believe I speak with knowledge and certainty when I say that in Great Britain, where our entire judicial system was born and nurtured, there is no equivalent to this proposition.

I do not wish to raise smoke-screens, but I feel that when we place our judges in a position of inviolability on the bench, when we guarantee them the increased salaries that they will now receive under this bill, when we guarantee them, after years of service, a substantial and reasonable retirement allowance and pension, there should not be admitted the principle of dangling before judges the opportunity of accepting positions in the public service paying more, accepting such positions for a period of years and then at the end of that term asking the country to give them a pension not only for the years they served on the bench but also for the period of years they served in the public service additionally.

The committee, I suggest, deserves a fuller and more complete explanation of the section. It is a novel departure, one that is easily passed and in which there may lie implications which at the moment we can only contemplate. If there is one thing more than another we must do, so far as the judiciary is concerned, it is to keep it above the suggestion of political considerations. If we place our judges in a position where, having once established the right to a pension on going on the bench, they may retire therefrom and accept positions in the public service, reaping the advantage of the pensions that are paid to those who enter the judiciary, then the door is open to situations which at the moment I do not care to suggest to the committee but which I believe everyone here can appreciate.

Has this section been submitted to the Canadian Bar association? Where is the demand for the change in the law which is proposed in this section, and what particular case or cases is it contemplated will come within the ambit of this provision at an early day?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In Canadian history I know of only two cases which it was intended to have covered by this legislation and by its prototype which was adopted in 1931 under a former administration. At that time it was desired to have the services of a gentleman who, if I mistake not, was on the bench in the province of Manitoba, become chief railway commissioner, because it was felt that he was the proper person to fill the office. It would appear that, having a life tenure on the bench, with the advantages that come from the pension provisions, he would not agree to the change without a provision such as this being made, and it was made by legislation in 1931.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is that not a semi-judicial appointment?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have described it. The hon. member knows as I do what functions are performed by the board of railway commissioners. It was found at that time by the former administration that legislation of this kind, to enable the country to obtain the services of that gentleman in that capacity, was desirable. Now, more recently, it was found that another justice who had performed valuable services to the country during the war period had shown special qualifications for the diplomatic service. It was also found that that gentleman felt, as did the judge of the Manitoba court in 1931, felt that it was not proper to ask him to abandon the life tenure which was his by virtue of his appointment, and since it was desired to have his services in a diplomatic capacity it was felt that the provision which had been made in 1931 might, by a slight change in phraseology, be made to apply in this case. That is the only reason this section was drawn in the form in which it is presented to the committee. I know of no other prospective case.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Who is the Manitoba judge?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Judge Fullerton. I know of no other case, and I know of very few posts in the public service which would come under the description of "more lucrative" used by the hon. gentleman when this bill will have become law. I do not know of many posts in the public service which will prove to be more attractive in the way of remuneration and security of tenure than what we are providing for the judges. I think that is as it should be. I think these high judicial posts should be among the things to which lawyers would aspire as being the best that they can achieve. I would not anticipate that there could be very many cases where this clause would operate. From 1931 to 1946 it operated only once, and from now on I have in mind this special case where I think the result would appear to be compatible with public interest. I think the gentleman in question has shown remarkable ability in the discharge of diplomatic duties, and I think it might be of advantage to the state if these exceptional qualities which he has displayed remained available to the state in that capacity; but at this time that will require that he resign from the bench.

During the war it was possible to ask brother judges to do more than under normal conditions, but I think it would be intolerable to leave, during normal times which I hope we are getting to or will get to pretty soon, actual vacancies that could not be filled in the judicial set-up which is required for the proper administration of justice. I think one must be one thing or the other, and that it is necessary now to have a solution of this situation which could be tolerated during the war period, but should not be allowed to continue indefinitely.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am wondering whether there is any definite term during which a judge would have to be on the bench before this provision became operative. May a judge serve on the bench for a year and then be transferred to a public office, and when he leaves that public office become entitled to pension rights as if he remained on the bench for ten years or more, and in the event of his death his widow be entitled to her pension rights? It seems to me that this is an amazing provision, and if there is anything more amazing it is the arguments with which the Minister of Justice supported it.

A week ago when we last discussed this bill I was given to understand that there was great difficulty in securing good men to take positions on the bench because the remuneration of the office was not adequate. But here we have a provision which was partly in the old act; at least it applied to one position at a time when the salaries were not as large as they will be when this bill becomes law, where it was not considered proper to ask a judge to leave the security of his position to take another position where the salary was a good one. Either the salaries and the other emoluments which go with the office of a judgeship are good or they are not. In my opinion, in relation to other salaries in Canada they are very good indeed. As I pointed out the other day, under the present provision the judges come in the highest ten per cent of income tax payers. I do not think this is a proper section. We should have pensions and retirement allowances, or whatever you may wish to call them, in other positions as we have for judges. Suppose a man who comes under this provision retires from the second office; he may take another public position; he may become active in political life; and just because he was one year a judge he will draw the pension which goes with a judgeship as if he had continued to serve for his full term or for the term which he has to serve in order to be eligible for a pension. As I understand it, it is not a very long time anyway. He may retire in ten years if he so wishes. I may be wrong but I should be glad to have the minister correct me.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; it is now provided that except on a certificate of physical or mental inability to fulfil the function he cannot retire with a pension before having served for fifteen years.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is not ten years now.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Even then he cannot be allowed to retire unless the government takes the responsibility of saying that it is in the public interest that he should do so. There had been cases when a gentleman had served for a certain number of years on the bench and had retired while he was still capable of performing the same or other services, and in order to prevent that from continuing there was inserted in the act a provision that in future no resignations which would make way for a retirement with a pension could be accepted unless the governor in council certified that it was in the public interest that the retirement take place.

Mr. BOUCHER: I am glad to support the point made by the hon. member for Lake Centre in opposition to section 27 of this bill. As I see it, it is important, in order that we may have an efficient judiciary, that judges be well indemnified so that they may be free of financial worries, to the extent that we may reasonably do so. I believe that is the fundamental principle behind the intention of the government to increase the salaries of judges. Under the salaries in effect up to the present time, I believe that men who otherwise might accept judicial appointments have not done so because of the much greater remuneration they would receive in private practice. This section, however, deals with a man who has held high public office, with great responsibility. It has been argued that the same reasons which support increasing the salaries of judges to give them greater security and immunity from worry would also support the same action in regard to those holding public office; but why should we confuse the two? Why should we say that a man who has held high office in the public service, with great responsibility and, of course, reasonably good remuneration, should have to rely upon the fact that previously he had been a member of the judiciary in order to get what is given to him under this section? In other words, take two men, one accepting public office not having been a judge, the other accepting public office after having been on the bench. There may be a vast difference in what these men are entitled to under this provision. If high remuneration must be offered to encourage men to accept high political office, it should be put upon that basis only, and not on the basis that a man was a member of the bench prior to accepting public office.

There is another reason for providing pensions for judges and persons holding high public office, and for their widows and families; that is the reason of necessity. Surely a man who leaves the judiciary to accept high public office should not be considered as in such necessitous circumstances as to require this provision. Surely it would be a disgrace and an indictment against our country if we should go to a member of the judiciary and say, "You are the only man who can do this job; come with us," and then say that after he has served the country with his high qualities we shall treat him as though he needed a pension, or his widow and family needed it. When the minister said in reply to the hon. member for Lake Centre that he knew of no appointments more lucrative or more secure than judgeships he uttered a strong indictment against the very principle of the bill which I approve. I believe it is a fact that the men who have accepted judgeships have not been given the highly lucrative positions and the security it is necessary to offer in order to get the right men in the right places, administering their duties in the right way. If that is the fundamental principle behind this bill the answer of the minister was a great disappointment to me and, I am sure, to other hon. members, because I do not think that is a point which should be taken. I do not believe it is a matter of necessity. I believe it is a matter of wanting to get the best men available both for the judiciary and for high public office. I would not say which were needed most; but I should say that in appointments which carry with them the trust of the government, reliance should be placed upon the compensation, the security, the immunities and so on that the office itself merits, without having to rely upon the previous occupation of one who is appointed.

Therefore I think it would be a mistake to pass section 27 as it stands and create discrimination among those holding high public office, as between those who once were judges and those who were not. Then, too, in my opinion the qualities that should be possessed by those on the bench and those in high office should remove both from political partisanship. They should be able to hold and express an independent, free, open, frank and sincere viewpoint without fear of necessitous circumstances; without fear of their master ill-treating them by not providing security both during and after their tenure of office. One of the things we in Canada are very proud of is the ability of Canadians who have assumed high public or judicial office to cast off any feelings of political, racial, religious or sectional partisanship that they may have held prior to appointment. I think we should be very proud of that. In my opinion the difficulty in the past has been that the low salaries did not attract the right men for these jobs. Therefore I do not oppose section 27 because it gives a little more security to a man in high office; I say we should not need this section to provide the security required. I believe we shall experience difficulty if we pass it, because, after all, the minister has said he has only two cases in mind where this is required. Surely in this day of strain and stress this parliament has much more important things to consider, affecting a much greater section of the Canadian people, than a select and exclusive provision in a statute which will affect only two persons. To me the very fact that the minister has in mind only two people is the greatest indictment of section 27.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is unfortunate that hon. members on the opposite side did not profess those views in 1931, because I will state quite frankly that if I had not found this section in the act it might not have occurred to me to draft one to take care of this other case. It is because it was there and had been put there, as everyone knows, for this kind of case that I thought it might be used in respect of the other one. Probably it is well known that a system of superannuation for those in external affairs, and for those appointed to various commissions and so on has been under consideration for quite a long time. As yet time has not been found to work out the kind of act it would be considered proper to recommend to parliament for consideration. This case is one that has to be dealt with now. I found that a similar case had been dealt with in the manner indicated by this language in 1931. I do not know if those sitting on that side of the house at that time raised the kind of objections that are being raised to-night; I was not here, and perhaps the hon. gentlemen who have spoken to-night were not here either, but I found it in the act. There was an urgent situation to be met, and though I do confess I would prefer a judges act that did not have a section of this kind, I felt it could be met in this way. The clause was there, and it had to be dealt with, reenacted or modified. By being modified it did happen to fit an urgent present case at a time when we were not ready to recommend to parliament the kind of superannuation act which would take care of such cases.

Hon. gentlemen have read the report of the Gordon commission. They have found recommendations there which will have to be given consideration and which at some time will be brought to the attention of the house in the form of a bill to make such provisions as should be made. That is the explanation. I am not submitting it as an argument. One hon. member said he was surprised at the argument I had made. I was not trying to make an argument, but was just trying to state frankly to the committee what were the facts, so that hon. members could draw their own conclusions.

Mr. BOUCHER: Surely the Minister of Justice would not attempt to justify a new wrong by saying that a previous wrong had been committed.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No.

Mr. BOUCHER: Because obviously, as my right hon. friend knows, they are not parallel to the present case at all.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; one belonged to one party and another belonged to the other before appointment.

Mr. BOUCHER: The right hon. gentleman may say that transferring from one judiciary appointment to another is the equivalent of transferring from a judicial appointment to a political appointment. If that is his case, then I am sure there are many hon. members who will not agree with it. I think it is a distinct wrong. But I can see his argument. He puts section 27 in and would lead us to believe that he did not approve it in 1931 when done by one government, but that he does approve it in 1936 when done by his government. I do not think the argument holds good, and I do not like to see the right hon. gentleman bringing in, under section 27, an argument to exalt high office, based upon political expediency, wherein he says one party did it and it was wrong when they did it. So when they did it, and it was wrong, he can commit another wrong.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have been impressed by the arguments advanced by my learned friends the hon. members for Lake Centre and Carleton. I think the minister has indicated that this is the type of section which should not appear in a bill. The people of Canada have set high standards for the Canadian judiciary, and I believe this sort of section places the entire judiciary, and particularly Mr. Justice Davis, in a compromising position. Mr. Justice Davis was very active politically before his appointment to the bench. I believe everyone who knew him and who had been familiar with his work felt that he put his political past behind him when he took his appointment on the bench. He performed a service for his country during the war, and I believe most people felt that he was doing what was in the best interests of the people. For some time he has had a political post.

It would now appear that we are passing special legislation to guarantee him a pension of $8,000 a year for life—provided that the present government stays in office for another seven years. I understand that Mr. Justice Davis is slated for an important post, which is a political one. It has always been the tradition for governments to have in Washington and London commissioners and ambassadors who are in complete agreement with government policy. Once a judge accepts that sort of role, it appears to me that he is no longer in the category of an impartial citizen belonging to the judiciary.

It is a serious reflection upon our judicial system to have legislation at this stage which provides a pension of $8,000 a year for life for Mr. Justice Davis, on the assumption that he holds the post for another seven years. In view of the fact that he has not performed any service on the bench since his selection, I feel that the minister should not ask the committee to pass legislation of this sort to provide security for one person. I am sure Mr. Justice Davis would object to having legislation passed for his own personal accommodation—as this legislation apparently is.

Mr. FLEMING: I observed that when the Minister of Justice spoke he did not take issue with the principle laid down by the hon. member for Lake Centre. What the Minister of Justice said, if I followed his argument, was that he justified the section, first, because of the precedent of 1931 and, second, because of the merits of the particular case now in mind.

I should like to observe, in the first place, that the precedent of 1931 does not extend to anything like the length the Minister of Justice is proposing to stretch it in support of section 27. In 1931 apparently a particular case existed, and a measure in limited terms was introduced by way of amendment to the Judges Act to provide for that particular case only.

I submit that is not a precedent for a section in broad terms such as section 27 now before the committee. It is in unlimited terms. I say that what was done in 1931 in connection with the enactment of section 27(2) is not a precedent for the type of section we are now asked to enact in the form of section 27 of the bill.

On the second point made by the Minister of Justice, namely that there is merit in the particular case he has in mind, I should say that, if there is, then let us deal with that particular case. I do not believe it is doing any kindness to the person involved if we seek to cover up his individual case by a section in general language, as we find it in section 27 of the bill.

No particular case could ever justify language of the breadth of that in the section. If there is merit in the case the minister has in mind, then I say it ought to be dealt with on its merits, without having the matter confused by language as broad as this. I contend that no case has been made out for section 27 in the bill which we are now asked to approve.

Mr. LOW: Is there a contributory pension fund for judges, or are the retirement allowances non-contributory?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member was attending some other duties when that question was asked earlier today. There is no pension fund, and there are no contributions. We inherited from British institutions this system of providing retirement allowances. It had become anchored there before the superannuation fund for civil servants had been established.

Mr. LOW: That brings me to what I want to say. I find myself substantially in agreement with the hon. members for Lake Centre and Carleton, and other hon. members who have spoken on this subject. The reason for my being in substantial agreement with them and for my being opposed to section 27 is that I believe it violates one of the most fundamental principles of retirement allowances. In the case of a contributory system where a person is given leave of absence for a specified period of time from his regular duty in the profession or occupation which would give him his retirement allowance upon retirement, the period for which he is granted leave of absence is based on his term of service. If he goes back to his original profession or service he then would be granted the pension upon reaching the age of retirement, just as if he had not been granted leave of absence. With that principle I am thoroughly in agreement. But in this case there is no desire or intention to adhere to that principle. If the principle is sound for contributory systems, then it must be more than sound for non-contributory systems. Rather than to press for section 27 I would suggest to the minister that he give consideration to adopting the principle of a specific period leave of absence. After the termination of that specific period, the judge could return to his judicial duties and serve out his time. Then, when he was ready to retire under the regular term of judges' retirement, give him his pension. That procedure would be in strict conformity with the best practices of retirement allowances. I find myself quite opposed to the suggestion as it is to-day.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I could not as Minister of Justice take the responsibility of following out the suggestion made by the hon. member. I think, if one retires from the bench, he should do so definitely and permanently. It would not be possible to have it in the form of a leave of absence, for two reasons. First, it would be unfair to the public of the province of which he is a judge and, second, I think it would imply the possibility of grave dangers. As has been pointed out, one who occupies a diplomatic post is exercising a function which may appear to participate of party politics. It would not be proper to allow a judge to go from the bench for a time to engage in something which could be regarded as political and then return to the bench. That is something which I as Minister of Justice could not take the responsibility of recommending to the house or to the governor in council.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am in agreement with what the minister has said about diplomatic posts being matters of party politics, and I am also in agreement with his view that it would be unreasonable to extend a judges leave of absence beyond eight years. Mr. Justice Davis was appointed in 1939. He then became chairman in Saskatchewan under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. Subsequently he was deputy minister of national war services and latterly he served in Australia. It is for the reason given by the minister, among other things, that I am opposed to a pension being paid in the indirect way that is being followed in this case.

The minister endeavoured to compare this case with what occurred in 1931, but there is a great difference. The chief commissioner or the assistant chief commissioner of the board of transport commissioners exercises no political function; they exercise judicial or semi-judicial functions. The minister has stated quite frankly that anyone going into the diplomatic service would be exercising a political function. How can there be any justification for granting to a person exercising a political function a pension under the terms of the Judges Act?

The minister has stated that there could not be many positions which would be lucrative enough to induce a judge to leave the bench. Possibly the best way to clear up that matter would be to ask the minister in his capacity of Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs what salary and allowances Mr. Justice Davis will get if he goes to Washington, and what salary and allowances he will get if he goes to London?

Mr. NICHOLSON: How much in Australia?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: He is not going to Australia. I do not want to be unfair, but this is one of the few cases where parliament is being asked to pass a specific section for the relief of a specific person. We have these relief bills that come down from the senate, but this is a relief section for an individual case. If there is to be a reward for diplomatic service, bring it in under the appropriate legislation and make available to men who go into the diplomatic service security and certainty after having given years of service to their country. With that I would have no disagreement, but what I do disagree with is the taking of a backdoor method by section 27 to do what the government apparently is not prepared to do for the vast body of men and women who serve in the diplomatic service and who should be assured of security after having given years of service to this country.

As the hon. member for Eglinton has pointed out, we have it on the word of the minister that this is to cover one case, and yet it provides that any person after this date who has been a member of the bench and who is appointed to public office shall be able to take advantage of this section. I think the minister is doubtful as to the propriety of this section. He admitted frankly that he would have found it impossible to put in section 27 if it had not been that fifteen years ago a similar course was taken covering a semi-judicial position. Even at this late stage I suggest to the minister that he withdraw this section. It has no place in the Judges Act. The Judges Act is to assure security for judges, not for those who may take temporary appointments to the bench and then, when a more lucrative position offers, leave the bench and, after a period of years, have all the advantages they would have if they had remained on the bench.

I do not want to repeat the arguments, but I think this should be considered having regard to the attitude that has been taken in this house toward the whole question of judges' salaries. Some of my hon. friends spoke in opposition to increasing those salaries, although they did not vote against the increase. They must have become convinced of the necessity of increasing these salaries. They did not adopt the only way there is to show their opposition; that is by voting against the increase. High tributes have been paid to the bench, but I ask the minister if he will not consider withdrawing this one section that is objected to, a section which he admits himself has no place in the Judges Act.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: According to the minister, section 27 has been included to cover a particular case or two, and I think therein lies the greatest danger. This will create a precedent and I am opposing this section because of its possible effect. It seems to me that the minister would be the first one to admit that respect for our courts and respect for the law is one of the foundations of democratic operations in any country. The present practice of making political appointments to the bench perhaps cannot be helped, and that is one of the weakest points in our present set-up. This cannot help but lower the respect of the Canadian people for law. I believe that appointments of this kind, moving a man to a position on the bench and then carrying over his pension benefits into another position, are apt to lead to a whole strata of personnel standing in specially privileged positions. That cannot be good, and that is why I am opposing it. If we want our courts to remain high above public reproach we must discourage, not encourage, this kind of thing, and I am astonished that the present Minister of Justice would bring in legislation which he must know cannot but have that effect in the end. The principle of carrying a pension for one position over into another and maintaining the benefits of one pension while the individual is operating in another position constitutes a privilege which cannot be applicable throughout our system to-day. In this case I agree with the hon. member for Lake Centre that the minister would be well advised to withdraw section 27 at this time. In doing that, he would have the support of this committee, and, would, I think, reflect credit on the position he holds.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I cannot admit all that has been said. This is not an essential part of the Judges Act. I might suggest that it stand, that we deal with the other sections, and that we might take it up again later. If hon. gentlemen will reflect upon it I think they will come to the conclusion that more has been said to-night than the facts justify. This is not something which is being done for someone who has chosen this career, and I should not like my silence to mean that the Department of External Affairs was responsible for or agreed with these rumours of such and such a post being intended for the gentleman in question. There should not be taken from my attitude any affirmation or denial, because it is not a matter to which any degree of consideration has been given up to the present time. Further, I am not in a position to say more as to what are the allowances and remunerations of ambassadors than appears from the estimates which are before the house. The highest item there is $10,000, and there are certain living or entertainment allowances in addition, but I am not in a position to say what they are.

One hon. gentleman has said that this carrying of pension rights from one position to another is something which is most unusual. I must disagree. It is something that is most usual. There is being considered at the present time by the governments of the united nations certain provisions whereby those who were attracted from their national public services to the service of the united nations may have their acquired pension rights transferred; and we ourselves are considering with the provinces a system whereby a transfer of civil servants from a province to the federal field, or vice versa, can be done without prejudicing the pension rights that would then be in existence. Therefore I must disagree with much that has been said. But I concede at once that this is not an essential part of the bill; and if it were the pleasure of the committee to allow it to stand, proceed with the other sections, report progress, and then come back to it after I have had time to confer with my colleagues, that might be advisable.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Do I understand that the minister is going to let this section stand for consideration?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I was going to ask permission to allow this section to stand, to go on with the rest of the bill, to report progress, giving me an opportunity to confer with my colleagues before we take the section up again.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): And it will be dealt with at a later stage?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think this section is a very bad precedent. I have not been impressed at all with the argument of the minister that this is like a case which happened in 1931, because the chairmanship of the railway commission has always been a judicial appointment, one which has been recognized to require some legal training. It would seem that the government are not prepared to bring in legislation which will grant pensions to their diplomatic servants. As has been pointed out, this should not be done by back-door methods. It is not a matter of personalities; a principle is at stake; and I had in mind to move that the section be deleted, until the minister's suggestion to have it stand over and that he is going to discuss it with his colleagues. Upon that understanding, I will not move at this time that it be deleted. That is what I understood the minister said would be done.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is the suggestion I am putting before the committee if the committee will agree to it.

Section stands.

Sections 28 and 29 agreed to.

On section 30—Judge found incapacitated or disabled.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would the minister state what has been the experience regarding the retirement of pensioners, how many judges are now employed who are over seventy-five years of age, and how many have been removed for any reason in, say the past twenty years? Do judges on reaching seventy-five decide that they have served long enough and offer their resignations, or what procedure is followed when they arrive at that age in deciding whether or not they should continue for a longer period?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The judges of the superior courts cannot be removed. The judges of the county or district courts retire at the age of seventy-five.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Automatically?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The judges of the federal courts have been, since 1927, retired at the age of seventy-five. As to the judges of the high courts of the provinces, the establishment of a retiring age provision would require an amendment to the constitution, and with respect to that I have been corresponding for a long time with the provincial attorneys general. The last attempt was a letter written on my behalf by the deputy minister just before I left for the London meeting of the united nations, asking the attorneys general to give the matter consideration and be prepared to discuss it when they came back for some meeting of the dominion-provincial conference. When they did come back, at least one of them told me not to raise the question, because he would oppose the proposal and the discussion we would have on it might prejudice other discussions we were having. So the position at the present time is that there is no immediate prospect of an amendment to the constitution being obtained under which judges could be retired on reaching a stated age.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Where there is a judge of a superior court who deliberately, and in the face of a number of contrary decisions of the court of appeal or of other superior courts, continues to hand down judgments adverse to the decisions of the superior courts, what course does the minister follow with a view to bringing to that judge's attention his failures and his refusal to carry out the law?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The Minister of Justice minds his own business. Since the administration of justice is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the province, and since he has only the recommendation of appointments, he takes it for granted that the judges who are appointed and paid by the federal authority are performing their duties in a manner which is satisfactory to the attorney general of the province until that attorney general makes some representations to him. In fact it has come to my notice that in fact certain judges were not fulfilling the duties for which they had been appointed. I have had correspondence asking to have that confirmed to me by proper authority and I have not had it confirmed. I have a section in this bill by which, if it is passed, parliament will make it my duty to take some action.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the section?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Section 35. With respect to the quality of judgments rendered, the Minister of Justice can exercise no action beyond proposing an impeachment to the houses of parliament. That is the only way in which judges can be removed. If there is, in the remarks of the hon. gentleman, as I suspect there is, the implication that it is a judge of the province of Quebec who is not conforming with jurispudence set by higher courts, I would point out to him that the principle of stare decisis does not apply in the province of Quebec and that the judges are not bound in theory by the decisions of higher courts. It is no part of the judge's legal duty to comply with a decision of a higher court if he honestly believes it to be wrong. Decisions of higher courts do not make the law in the province of Quebec.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. STIRLING: On how many occasions has action had to be taken by a minister of justice over the last few years under the powers contained in this clause? I see that the clause contains no change in substance from the act at present in existence.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The only action I know of is that of pointing out to a judge that it might be necessary, if he did not agree that his condition was such that he should not continue on the bench, to have a commission appointed to inquire. I will not venture to say on how many occasions; there are not very many, but on a few occasions that has been done and has resulted in the judge saying that he did not contest the suggestion that it would be desirable for him to retire, and tendering his resignation.

Section agreed to.

Section 30 agreed to.

On section 31—County court judge or circuit court judge removal for misbehaviour, incapacity or inability.

Mr. McKAY: This has to do with the removal of county or circuit court judges for misbehaviour or for inability and incapacity. Would the minister make a statement as to what he considers to be misbehaviour on the part of a judge of a county or circuit court?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would not. I think that is a matter upon which the good sense and judgment of individuals can differ, and I have not had called to my attention, in the years I have been in the office of Minister of Justice, conduct which would amount to misbehaviour requiring removal.

Mr. McKAY: In other words, the minister does not interpret misbehaviour here as we would in a normal court of law. I believe the suggestion was made that it is misbehaviour in so far as the administration of law is concerned.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, the kind of misbehaviour which would make it improper for the gentleman to continue in the exercise of judicial functions.

Section agreed to.

Sections 32 to 34 inclusive agreed to.

On section 35—Leave of absence from judicial duties.

Mr. GREEN: I understood the minister to say that this section places some responsibility on the minister in certain cases. It does not appear to do so. What was the section to which the minister referred?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would interpret it as placing a responsibility on the minister. Appointments are made by the federal authority. Payment is made for services that are supposed to be rendered, and cases have come to my notice, not officially but in fact as an individual, where judges, without obtaining leave of absence, have not been performing their judicial duties for a certain length of time and nevertheless have been in receipt of their judicial salaries. Representations have been made by lawyers to that effect, and I have told them that the representations should come to me through the attorneys general. At least in one instance I have transmitted to the attorney general the representations that have been made and asked him whether in his view the facts represented required any intervention by the Minister of Justice, and I have received no statement that they did. This clause is as follows:

No judge of a superior or county court shall be granted leave of absence from his judicial duties for a period in excess of thirty days except with the approval of the governor in council, and whenever such leave of absence is granted, the Minister of Justice shall forthwith notify the chief justice, if any, of the court and the attorney general of the province accordingly. If it appears to the chief justice of a superior court of a province that a judge of his court is absent from his judicial duties for a period in excess of thirty days, without leave of the governor in council, he shall report such absence to the Minister of Justice.

If there is leave he will receive notice from the Minister of Justice that leave has been granted. If he has not received notice and finds that one of his judges is in fact absent for more than thirty days, he shall notify the Minister of Justice; and whenever a judge of a superior or county court is absent for a period in excess of thirty days he shall report such absence and the reasons therefor to the Minister of Justice. If information of this kind comes in this way to the Minister of Justice, I shall feel while I am Minister of Justice, that it is my duty to notify the department which makes the monthly payments that the judge is absent without leave.

Mr. GREEN: A.W.O.L.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Well, I know of cases where for many months, without having obtained leave of absence, members of the bench have not been performing their judicial functions. I do not think it is proper that that should continue.

Mr. MacNICOL: It certainly is not.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not wish to be looked upon as meddlesome, but if there is some kind of procedure whereby that becomes officially known to the Minister of Justice, I think he should take some action.

Mr. GREEN: I understood the minister to say a few moments ago that if a judge was not performing his duties properly the minister was given some power to intervene by this section 35. Obviously that is not correct, because this section refers only to absences.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: The heading is "Absence from judicial duties", and the marginal notes for each subsection refer also to absences; therefore the Minister of Justice has absolutely no power except in the case of absence from duty.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think it would be constitutional for this parliament to give the Minister of Justice authority over the administration of justice by the provincial judges. The administration of justice is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities, but because we appoint the judges and pay them we are certainly entitled to refuse to pay them if they are not on the job.

Mr. GREEN: The minister will remember that he made his statement in response to a question from the hon. member for Lake Centre who intimated that some judge had not been performing his duties in the manner in which they should have been performed. I take it now that the minister did not mean to go that far.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. With respect to that, I do not think this parliament could give me jurisdiction unless the situation became such that it was proper to propose an address to both houses of parliament praying for the removal of the judge from the bench.

Mr. BROOKS: Does the minister know of any cases where judges' salaries have been refused for absence without leave?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, I do not, but I think that with this it will be my duty to notify the treasury officials that a gentleman is absent without having obtained leave of the governor in council.

Mr. BROOKS: I entirely agree that the salary should not be paid if he is absent without leave.

Mr. STIRLING: This section does not include the statement that the minister's actions shall be that of referring that matter to the treasury. For instance, take the third section of the bill. The question occurs to me, what happens if the judge of a superior or a county court refrains from giving that notice, takes no notice of these sections?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If there is a chief justice we put a duty upon him. I do not think we can put a duty upon the attorney general of the province. I think all we can do is to provide the attorney general of a province with information, but I do not think this parliament could say that the attorney general of a province shall do such and so. He is not subject to our jurisdiction. If there is a chief justice I think we can say to him that he shall give us notice of things which come to his knowledge. All we can do with respect to the judges who have no chief justice is to impose that duty upon them. If they do not carry it out and flout the duty put upon them by parliament the thing may become grave enough to justify an address for removal or it may, in the case of a county or a district court judge, amount to the kind of misbehaviour which would call for the application of section 31.

Mr. STIRLING: What I mean is: if under subsection 3 the judge in question refrains from applying for permission to be absent, just goes away, does the minister expect that a common informer will inform him of the fact that the judge is absent, or does he wait until it is brought to his attention perhaps weeks, or a month after?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would not say it would be a common informer, but these things do become known. I tried to put something in here which would take care of what appeared to me to be an abuse. That was as far as I felt I could go at this time. I think the clause does indicate, if it is passed by parliament, that parliament wants the Minister of Justice to see to it that gentlemen who are absent without leave are not paid. If it is passed I am going to try and carry out that intention.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the section also give the minister power to do something about the pension rights of judges who are absent without leave?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The pension is not a matter of right; under this act the pension is something which may be granted, but there is no obligation imposed upon the governor in council to grant it.

Mr. KNOWLES: It may be denied in such cases.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In a case which would be such that a minister of justice would feel that he would have the support of the House of Commons in so doing, he might recommend that the pension be denied. I think whoever is in the office of minister of justice will wish to carry out the responsibility of his office in a manner which will satisfy the public that he is doing it. I have been concerned, and I did not feel that there was in the former act that which authorized me to do anything until I received a complaint from a provincial authority. If there is this section I can feel that parliament wants me to try to see if there are or are not any of the judges paid out of moneys appropriated under our statute who are absent without having obtained leave of absence.

Mr. BROOKS: What official jurisdiction, if any, has the chief justice of a province over the county court judges?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think he has any.

Mr. BROOKS: If he reported a county court judge for being absent without leave, would he not be considered as not minding his own business?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is only with respect to his court that he is required to report absences.

Mr. BROOKS: I beg your pardon; I thought section 35 included county court judges as well.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; it is only the judges of his court.

Mr. GREEN: Does this section mean that whenever a judge in Canada wants to be absent from his duties for over thirty days he must apply to the Minister of Justice for leave of absence?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It does.

Mr. GREEN: This section does not make it clear that he must apply to the Minister of Justice.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; but he must obtain leave of absence from the governor in council. He may address his application through the Minister of Justice or address it to the clerk of the privy council. He may take whatever procedure he wishes, but he cannot be absent for more than thirty days without having obtained leave. These applications for leave usually come through the Department of Justice, and the Minister of Justice communicates with the attorney general of the province and usually also with the chief justice of the court of which the gentleman making the application is a judge if he belongs to a court of which there is a chief justice.

Mr. GREEN: Is it necessary that each application for leave of absence must come before the governor in council? Surely that is unnecessary. Could the Minister of Justice not make the decision himself? What about the summer vacations? The way this section is worded the judge might have to get leave of absence every summer. The courts are closed for two months in the summer?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If he is going to be absent from judicial duties, which he has to perform, for a period of more than thirty days I think he should have leave of absence, and I think it is of sufficient importance to require the formality of an order in council. Where a judge has no judicial duties to perform during a period of thirty days I would not imagine that if he does not perform any he is absent from his judicial duties. I do not know the system in other provinces, but I know there are judges in attendance in my province every week during the long vacation and a list is drawn up by the chief justice of the court as to who shall attend on certain dates.

Mr. GREEN: What is the practice now with regard to obtaining leave of absence?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The practice is that the judge writes the Department of Justice applying for leave, and stating for what reasons the application is made. The department communicates with the attorney general and the chief justice to ascertain if the application can be granted without interfering unduly with the administration of Justice. If it can be granted and there appear to be proper reasons, a recommendation is made to the governor in council; an order in council is passed, and the applicant is notified of its passage.

Mr. BOUCHER: Following the minister's explanation, I can see the point in connection with high court judges; but take the position of a county court judge who is not responsible to the chief justice, who sits alone in his county or has perhaps one or possibly two judges to assist him. I believe it is the custom for such judges, during long vacation, to set one certain day a week, or every two weeks as the case may be, when they will hear applications in chambers and that sort of thing. But I can see that it would be a departure from the present practice to require a county or district court judge to have an order in council passed granting him permission to stay away from his court for more than thirty days, because it may or may not be possible to make arrangements for a judge to take his place during that time. If he had a deputy, of course, particular circumstances may arise which would cause him to be away for more than thirty days, and he could make provision accordingly. I wonder if the minister feels that this section of the act is practical in its application to county or district court judges as well as high court judges.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I feel that it is; but if parliament will refuse to pass this section I shall be relieved, because then I shall feel that until I get some official complaint from a provincial authority, parliament does not intend me to have any responsibility. That is the situation. I think I should have some responsibility, but if parliament feels otherwise I shall be relieved.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have not said anything about this section, but as a matter of fact I think it is necessary, and I do not think it applies to any one province more than any other. Personally I think consideration should be given to the exception of the period of vacation, because as it is worded at the present time, I feel that as far as a county court judge is concerned, during the period of vacation—

Mr. NICHOLSON: How long is the vacation?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It begins around July 1 or July 6, normally, and ends about September 6.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): September 2 in Montreal.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, about September 1. As the section is worded now, it would appear to prevent that sort of thing, but I am sure that even if the minister had power under this section, it would not be exercised during the period of vacation, because the judicial duties to be performed would be of such a nature as would not require the presence of the average county court judge.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I discussed the matter of the judicial vacation with the law officers when the section was being drawn, and they told me that with this language they were satisfied one was not absent from his judicial duties if no judicial duties were being left unfulfilled during the time of the absence; that in order to be absent from his judicial duties it had to be neglecting the accomplishment of things that arose for accomplishment.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): There is nothing geographical in it; I agree entirely.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; it is being absent from his judicial duties, and I think that expression implies being away and neglecting things that should be done.

Section agreed to.

On section 36—Judge to devote himself exclusively to judicial duties.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I wonder if in the drafting of this section some inquiry was made as to whether or not it barred a judge from being a shareholder in a company. You will notice these words:

No judge shall, either directly or indirectly, as director or manager of any corporation, company or firm, or in any other manner whatever . . .

I was wondering if consideration had been given to whether a man simply holding shares in a company might not be held to be engaged in business.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It has never been so construed. There is a special provision with respect to members of parliament holding shares in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. That does not disqualify one from being a member of parliament, though the C.P.R. may be contracting with the dominion government several times a day. I think this also is a clause the language of which has been fixed by the experience of a good many years and that the gentlemen who go on the bench realize what it means and what it prevents them from continuing to do.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It is active engagement.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 37—Not to act as commissioner or arbitrator without consent of governor in council.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to say a few words with regard to sections 37 and 38. This has to do with judges acting on royal commissions. I am not going to repeat any of the contentions I have advanced on previous occasions with respect to this question. Over and over again I have stated that in my opinion one of the most necessary qualifications for members of the bench is that they be free from any suggestion, by reason of being on a royal commission, of participation in politics or anything connected therewith. Over and over again it has been emphasized, and in reading the evidence of the judges who appeared in 1928 before a committee of parliament with regard to salaries of judges I see the contention is advanced that there is no salary paid in connection with this work, and that is perfectly true. But in recent years royal commissions have been appointed in increasing numbers and at very considerable cost to this country. Let me mention a few of the royal commissions that have operated since the beginning of the war in 1939. There was the royal commission on cooperatives, which cost $137,659; the royal commission on the taxation of annuities, which cost $26,700; the Hong Kong inquiry, costing $27,400; the Halifax inquiry, costing $10,100; the Kellock-Taschereau commission, which up to June 12 had cost $5,011. Then other royal commissions in the Department of Labour cost some $85,000. The royal commission on coal up to June 15 cost $189,000, and besides these commissions there have been several others of lesser importance.

Some objection was taken on the last occasion I referred to this matter when I said that payments of large living allowances to judges is not in keeping with the maintenance of the independence of the bench. My other reason for opposing the appointment of judges to royal commissions into which political considerations enter are exemplified in the Hong Kong inquiry, which was presided over by the former chief justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, Sir Lyman Duff. As a result of his decisions in that matter, and the conclusions to which he came, strong criticisms were made in the house which, however great his reputation was, in the minds of certain people did detract from the great contribution he has made to this country.

Only within the last few months we have had in this country the Kellock-Taschereau commission. I am not going to go into any of the decisions made by that commission, or the report it presented. But I say that never before in the history of this country did a royal commission spend the time this royal commission did, as set forth in section XI, in answering criticisms made in and outside parliament regarding the methods adopted by this particular commission.

This, to me, is a most unusual report—and I am referring only to section XI. Because of that criticism, the eminent judges who composed the commission have set out in a matter of forty pages an explanation of the course they followed, enunciating the law on the subject, and more or less advancing their defence to the criticism raised. I say this places the judges in an impossible position.

Here we have two judges, eminent members of the supreme court, presiding over a commission. I am not at this time entering into the findings of the commission; but I must point out that these judges found it necessary, when reporting on what they ascertained as a result of their investigation, to include forty or fifty pages in which they set out what they did, upheld what they did, and in which they say to parliament and to the people as a whole that what they did they had a right to do, and were above anybody in this land.

I point out only one page in that connection, where one finds a most striking phrase. This is a most striking page—I refer to page 683,—where it sets out the status of the commission. These are the words used:

In this section we have dealt with various matters with respect to which there would appear to have been misunderstanding on the part of some.

In other words, here we have our judges defending themselves for what they did as members of a royal commission, and thereby to that extent answering criticisms which have been made. I think that is a dangerous position for our judiciary to be placed in.

What do they finally conclude? Having regard to the criticism that has taken place in parliament, these judges as commissioners take it upon themselves to explain the law. They point out that they took hearsay evidence, and that they took secondary evidence in the investigation. They said that such things could not have been done in a court of law, but that they were supreme as a royal commission. They went on to say this:

In the first place such a commission is a primary institution, though of a temporary kind, and is upon a formal equality with the other institutions of the state, such as the courts, houses of parliament and privy council. Reference may be made to Clokie & Robinson "Royal Commissions of Inquiry" (1937) pp. 150, 151.

In other words, they set forth there the view that a royal commission is the equal of any other institution in this country. And if it is the equal, it is above criticism. In support of their stand they quote Clokie & Robinson, the book I have mentioned. If one accepts that authority, then it is interesting to turn over a few pages, to pages 171 and 172, where one finds support for the stand which we on this side of the house have taken regarding the whole matter of secrecy. It says this:

The most unusual procedure has been that of the "secret" commission. Only two of these were established in the nineteenth century, and both were concerned essentially with the same subject, the conduct of the Princess of Wales in the first years of the century. The reasons for secrecy can easily be understood, though it might be admitted that this was a bad procedure.

Then it goes on to point out that secrecy in royal commissions and in the hearing of royal commissions is a dangerous proceeding, and has never been followed in the courts since the days of Princess Caroline between 1807 and 1820. I mention this in passing, because this book has been cited as an authority.

Now I point out this doctrine, as it is set out in the report:

While it is sitting, and until its existence terminates, it is not subordinate to any body. It is independent in every sense. It is not subject to, or under the control of the courts. Its function is to conduct the investigation committed to it and to make its report to the governor in council.

That comes dangerously close to a commission of judges placing themselves in a position where, that doctrine not being accepted, their position as judges is inconsistent with their position as commissioners. Then it goes on to say this:

The commission's findings are as authoritative as those of any court, and, as it is the sole judge of its own procedure—

And so on.

In other words, "whoever would criticize has no right to criticize, whatever procedure we may have adopted." Then it says this:

—and may receive evidence of any kind in its discretion, it is sometimes in a better position than a court subject to strict rules as to the admissibility of evidence, to ascertain facts.

Then finally, because, in the Doctor Shugar case the courts of the land found that there was no evidence against him, the royal commission were prepared to accept that finding, and they end up their report in this way:

There is, however, one power a commission does not possess. That is the power to enforce its findings. If it makes findings upon which the proper authorities conclude that certain persons should be punished, those authorities must resort to the courts or tribunals which alone possess the power to punish. Whatever the view there taken——the findings of the commission arrived at under its own procedure, and on the evidence before it, are not affected and remain valid.

In other words, whatever view is taken in the courts.

That is an unusual viewpoint for a royal commission to express. In other words, they go on to set out the Shugar case. After the courts had found that this man had not committed any offence, the royal commission comes along and says that he did in fact commit the offence of which the courts said he was innocent.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Oh, no.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not bring this up for the purpose of dealing with the findings of the commission because they will be dealt with before this session is over. I bring it up for the purpose of using these pages, and I could quote any number of them—they state that, while there has been criticism of the interrogations, they followed the system they had in mind to follow—to show that a royal commission will set up as its defence its responsibility to no body, its equality with parliament and every other institution in the state. Such procedure is bound to bring the judiciary into a position where their conduct will be discussed in the press of this country and in parliament itself.

I know of no better example in support of my contention than to say that, except in regard to those matters which have no political import, judges ought not to sit on royal commissions. There have been examples in my own province where royal commissions have been set up for the purpose of investigating political charges; and before the commission had made its report some were saying that the commission was biased on one side, while others were saying that it was biased on the other. The result was an inference of the violability of the judiciary.

I plead with the minister to reconsider this matter, and I find myself quoting Clokie & Robinson which is resorted to as an authority. In that book it says that royal commissions in Britain have gradually been reduced to a minimum, the reason being the very fact I have endeavoured to place before the committee this evening.

All of us have regard for the integrity of the bench, for their inviolability, for their entire detachment from any considerations that separate us on one side or the other side of the house. But I suggest when, as in the case of the present commission report to which I have referred, judges find it necessary to devote forty pages to explaining what they did and then finally to avow their independence of all regular procedure, that very fact admits the possibility of attacks on the judiciary which should never be possible in our country.

I remember quite well when my right hon. friend was president of the Canadian Bar association. With his distinguished record as a lawyer, he came before the bar association and in one speech dealt with the question of the independence of the judiciary, the necessity of maintaining that independence and the necessity of maintaining the support of public opinion in the integrity and independence of the judiciary. I ask him to give consideration once more to removing any suggestion that the bench should participate in any way in royal commissions other than those dealing with economic matters not in dispute and not subject to political considerations.

I am not going to refer to the amounts paid to various judges because I have referred to that on another occasion. We have now made the judges of this country independent financially. We have assured them of a fair and reasonable return in order to mobilize the best brains available for the bench, men of integrity and ability, men who have given leadership before the bar. We have assured them that, after their service to the state, they and their widows who survive them will be protected and will be able to live in security.

I suggest that now is the time to do away with the continuance of a system that has not been restricted to any one political party; both parties have utilized the royal commission system and now is the time to take this step. The bench has been made financially independent, and I suggest that it should now be made independent in every way from any consideration other than a purely judicial function.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I hope it may not often be necessary to resort to judges for royal commissions, but there are certain situations where unfortunately it is necessary to do so. When a situation such as that which developed at the beginning of this year overtakes a country I think it calls for a commission of exceptionally high repute. The only regret I have in connection with the Taschereau-Kellock commission is that the circumstances made it necessary.

I appreciate my hon. friend's viewpoint and I have said many of the things that he has said to-night. I think we are all in agreement that, when it can be avoided, it should be avoided. But this instance was one of grave consequence to the country. Opinions may differ as to whether the course adopted by the government was the wise one, but I remain of the opinion that it was the proper thing to do.

These honoured judges agreed reluctantly to assume this most onerous task. I say that they did that without any remuneration. They performed that task in Ottawa where they were both residing, and there has not been paid even five cents in expenses to them to perform a task which unfortunately had to be performed. But they did perform it and, I think, rendered a genuine service to the people of this country.

I think all lawyers share the views of the hon. member for Lake Centre as to the desirability of having judges do nothing but attend to their ordinary judicial duties. Because of special conditions during the war, it became necessary to ask them to take on duties which would not normally fall to their lot. There will still be occasions when commissions will be necessary, and this was one of the reasons I gave to the house when asking for an additional judge in the exchequer court. With four judges in that court, I hope that in more cases than heretofore it will be possible to go to that court rather than to take from their ordinary duties judges of the provincial courts.

We have to face facts, and the fact is that we have not yet in this country another class of citizen which can be called upon to head these commissions and leave with the public the belief that they are being handled in the best possible manner in which they could be handled by anyone in the state. That may not always remain the situation. There are gentlemen now in universities and in other walks of life who are sufficiently known to their fellow citizens to have their situation in life give that guarantee, which is necessary when one of these important public duties has to be fulfilled, that it is being fulfilled by the best men available for the purpose. I hope we are getting away from the extraordinary conditions of that period and that it will become ever less necessary to ask judges to perform those tasks. I can assure hon. members that they do not seek them. It is with reluctance that they agree to take on those duties. But we have been going through extraordinary times, which call for measures that are not ordinary.

With respect to the things which have been said about the royal commission, I do not want to have a debate here. If there is responsibility it is the responsibility of the government. The government asked these gentlemen to do this, and to do it as a service to the state. If it was wrong for them to do it, we, the members of the government, are the ones who should be held responsible. As far as they individually are concerned, I think they are entitled to both respect and thanks for the service they rendered.

Mr. MacINNIS: Perhaps only men learned in the law should take part in this discussion. But I do not believe that it is altogether a matter of the government's wish when a judge is put on a royal commission or on any other kind of commission. I understand that when the hon. member for Lake Centre was speaking he mentioned only royal commissions: he dealt with section 38 instead of section 37. I think we are being a little unrealistic when we mentally raise judges to a level a little more than human. I believe judges try to be impartial and that in the main they succeed in being impartial. But to expect us to believe that a man, who was in the thick of the conflicts of life to-day and is made a judge to-morrow, is going to drop all his prejudices and biases and never think of them again, is asking too much of human nature. He will certainly have prejudices and biases no matter what he does. The point I was going to make, however, is that a judge has a certain position in our society not only with lawyers and those who have to do with the courts, but with the public; and when the public wants a royal commission, generally, I think, it feels more satisfied that an impartial report will be made if a judge is at the head of that commission. You can make your other appointments as you like, and those appointees will be supposed to represent different factions or sections or classes, as the case may be, but if you do not put a judge as chairman of such commission you may have very great difficulty in finding another person who will be satisfactory to all concerned.

The hon. member for Lake Centre said that we should appoint judges on commissions only when there were no political factors involved. I do not know what my hon. friend means by "political factors". It would be pretty difficult, in my opinion, to think of any subject which has not political implications. A person's politics is the sum total of his ideas on life, and that takes in everything. He may express his politics by labelling himself a Progressive Conservative, a Liberal, a Social Crediter or a C.C.F.'er, but his political viewpoint expresses his attitude—if you will—toward life.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): His way of thinking.

Mr. MacINNIS: Correct, his way of thinking, his whole way of thinking. I think we should leave this section as it is. The Minister of Justice says he hopes that judges will not be required for royal commissions; but if the people of the country demand that they be put in these positions I think they have the right to require such appointments.

As I said, I hesitated to take a part in this particular phase of the discussion, but I believe that the people have a confidence in the impartiality of judges which they would not readily place in anyone else.

Section agreed to.

On section 38—No extra remuneration.

Mr. PROBE: I have been listening now for time to various learned lawyers, including the hon. member for Vancouver East—

Mr. MacNICOL: He would have made a good one.

Mr. PROBE: —discuss the various sections of this bill. As is fairly well known to the committee, the members of the C.C.F. are opposed to the increase of one-third in the judges' salaries at the present time, in view of the fact that we have these very same learned gentlemen acting in a capacity giving them the authority to refuse comparable remuneration to people in lesser walks of life. Of course we are given to understand that in the case of those lesser persons, when salaries go up we have inflation, but when judges' salaries go up we have a necessary adjustment to get the best possible brains of the country to act in our behalf.

We now have before the committee a section headed "extra remuneration". The purpose of this section as I see it—I refer in particular to subsection 3—is to make it possible by order in council for a judge, when acting in other than his usual capacity, as for example when he is sitting on a commission or acting as an arbitrator, to get certain extra remuneration, allowances and expenses which are not normally contained in this bill. We find, for instance, in this bill that under certain conditions judges get $10 a day living allowance and in certain others they get $6 a day, and I am quite sure that is ample. But our judiciary, and I believe the government, have been a little bit careless of their high reputations, in accepting expense allowances in excess of those which are normal and legitimate. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the auditor general's report for 1945. It seems to me that the situation which is outlined on page 41 of that report in connection with the public accounts for 1945 is one that is not conducive to holding either the judiciary or the government in a very favourable light in the eyes of considered public opinion. I wish to refer to this famous, or infamous, situation that is mentioned by the auditor general. I quote from page 41:

Mr. Justice G. B. O'Connor of Edmonton is chairman of the wartime labour relations board, and Mr. Justice M. B. Archibald of Halifax is chairman of the national war labour board. Ottawa is headquarters of the boards. Order in council P.C. 80/5000 of June 29, 1944, accepts the following submission by the Minister of Labour:

"The undersigned has the honour to refer to orders in council P.C. 1895 and 1896 of March 16, 1944, appointing Mr. Justice G. B. O'Connor, chairman of the wartime labour relations board and to P.C. 1986 and 1987 appointing Mr. Justice M. B. Archibald, chairman of the national war labour board; and to report that while authority has been granted to pay the travelling and living expenses of the chairmen above referred to while absent from their places of residence, the undersigned—

That is the Minister of Labour, who is involved in some of these industrial disputes.

—arranged with Messrs. Justice O'Connor and Archibald that Mrs. O'Connor and Mrs. Archibald's necessary living and travelling expenses while absent from their places of residence, while accompanying their husbands in the discharge of their duties, would be paid by the department. The undersigned, therefore, begs to recommend that authority be granted to pay the necessary living and travelling expenses of Mrs. O'Connor and Mrs. Archibald while away from their homes accompanying their husbands while they are discharging their duties as chairmen of the boards to which they have been appointed."

That is the end of the submission by the Minister of Labour. The auditor general goes on:

The order in council is silent as to the authority relied on for the making. Attention is drawn to the provision for payment of expenses of Mesdames O'Connor and Archibald, as it is an exception from practice. In the fiscal year—

Listen to the amounts.

—$8,658.33 was paid to Judge O'Connor and $6,150.51 to Judge Archibald—

An hon. MEMBER: What is the one cent for?

Mr. PROBE: That is likely an excise stamp.

—by way of travelling and living expenses. These sums include claims paid with respect to travelling and living expenses of Mrs. O'Connor and Mrs. Archibald when travelling from home to Ottawa, at Ottawa, and when travelling with their husbands to various points in Canada.

That is the end of the auditor general's report. If there has ever been an instance in which the integrity of the judiciary of this land as well as the integrity of the government has been in question, I submit it is to be found right there in the auditor general's report, because in the first place it appears that the governor in council, by four separate orders in council, made provision for the living and travelling expenses of these two justices in connection with their duties, but that, following that arrangement, the Minister of Labour made private arrangements, for which he had to secure the sanction of the governor in council, in other words the cabinet, to guarantee the travelling and living expenses of the wives of the two judges named.

I am no lawyer, and sometimes I thank heaven that I do not know anything about legal phraseology; but I know what justice is, and I do not hesitate to say here that these justices compromised themselves by accepting pay on behalf of their wives while they were working during war time for the people of Canada. I have nothing further to say. I am utterly and totally opposed to this Judges Act coming into operation at the end of this year, or being passed by this House of Commons, and I have here given one sufficient reason why I am opposed to the measure.

Mr. HAZEN: 1927, rather.

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

348. General administration, $266,379.

Mr. GREEN: There is one question I should like to ask the minister. Last year I asked him whether or not there was any provision for a retired member of the forces to receive treatment in the hospitals of the Department of Veterans Affairs. His answer was that no such arrangement had been made, but that he would look into the possibility of some provision of that sort being arranged.

Another question had to do with some form of recognition for the men who served in the security guards under the mounted police. Apparently they had no badge or other recognition of that kind. The minister also promised that he would see what could be done along that line. Will he tell the committee to-night just what the position is with regard to these matters?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): There has been nothing done about that. The retired members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have their pensions but no other provisions are made for them than the payment of the pensions under the Pension Act.

The matter of providing badges for those who served as special constables was put before the commissioner. I did not get any recommendation for action in that regard.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister take the matter up again with the commissioner? He will find the questions on pages 3477 and 3478 of last year's Hansard. On December 13 he said:

> They get a certificate of service, and consideration will be given to the suggestion that they be given some form of decoration which they can wear on their tunics or coats.

Subsequent to that, on February 20, 1946, the Royal Northwest Mounted Police Veterans' association passed a resolution in Calgary asking for the provision of a suitable badge or decoration for those men who served as security guards during the war under the control of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I think the request is a reasonable one, and I hope that the minister can arrange to have steps taken to meet it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I shall bring it again to the attention of the commissioner.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wish to say a few words on a subject about which it may be too late to do anything this year. During the hot weather it seems to me that the dress of the policemen on duty around the parliament buildings is about the hottest thing that a person could wear. Not only is it about the hottest thing that a person could wear, but these men have to wear it in about the hottest place that I know of, namely, the pavements around the parliament buildings. Has the department ever given any consideration to providing summer uniforms of some lighter and cooler material than those which the men now wear? In the winter time we provide them with heavy coats to protect them from the rigours of winter weather, but we do not provide light uniforms for summer when it is uncomfortable in any dress. If any one of us had to stand around these buildings on June 29, 30 and July 1 we would surely ask that something be done about it. I suggest to the minister that he draw this to the attention of the commissioner of the mounted police and perhaps something can be done about it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I may say to the hon. member that I have discussed it with the commissioner of the mounted police. There are eight men who wear this traditional uniform of the mounties. The information I received was that they were on duty for only two hours at a time. I got the impression that it would be with keen regret that a decision to do away with this picturesque uniform of the mounted police would be arrived at. The answer that was given to me was that there were three shifts with eight men in each shift and that they were required to be on duty for only two hours at a time. I felt that there would be reluctance at doing away with that uniform which I believe is probably one of the most famous in the world. If it is not one of the most famous in the world it is certainly the most famous on this continent.

Mr. ADAMSON: The Eastman Kodak company would certainly protest.

Mr. HARKNESS: When this item was up for discussion some few weeks ago there was a certain amount of attention given to the rate of remuneration of the mounted police.

I am sorry to say I was not here at the time, but there are a few questions which I should like to ask. I became interested in this matter as a result of representations which I received during the past year from a considerable number of people who are interested in the welfare of the mounted police and the reputation which it has gained in the past and in maintaining that reputation. Whether rightly or wrongly they were of the opinion that the rate of remuneration received by these men was not such as was likely to maintain the high standards which the force has set in the past. I looked into the matter and I found the rates provided are as follows. I am not going to bother with the rates paid to officers and non-commissioned officers. I am going to talk chiefly about constables. So far as the rate of pay the officers receive is concerned, the deputy commissioner receives $4,500; the assistant commissioners, $3,600 each, the superintendent, $2,720 on appointment, rising to $3,120, and inspectors, $2,140, rising to $2,540.

Mr. MacNICOL: How much do the officers get?

Mr. HARKNESS: These are officers. The sub-inspectors come below that at $2,000 a piece. It seems to me that the responsibilities of the officers of the mounted police are considerably greater and contribute a great deal more to the welfare of this country than the officers of a considerable number of crown companies which have been formed in recent years, who receive a great deal more money. The officers of the mounted police are underpaid in comparison with people who are working for the crown in crown companies. However, the people about whom I wish to speak are the constables. A constable receives from $2.50 to $2.75 a day; a second-class constable, $2.25 a day; a third-class constable, $2 a day.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member said that he was not here when the matter came up before. He is referring to the basic pay which is about only half of what they actually get.

Mr. HARKNESS: I have the whole thing here, and I shall presently put it on the record. Sub-constables and trumpeters receive $1.25 on probation and $1.75 thereafter. All these constables of various grades receive seventy-five cents a day as war duties pay, which brings them up to $2 for sub-constables and trumpeters to $3.50 for constables. They receive an allowance in lieu of quarters and rations, fuel, light, et cetera of $1.50 a day, which brings them up to rate of pay ranging from $3.50 a day to $4.75 for the highest.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Single men.

Mr. HARKNESS: These are single men, yes. The return which I received on this matter did not say what married men receive, except a ration allowance when occupying government quarters, but not in receipt of rations in kind. However, the questions I had to ask in that connection were these. First, how many sub-constables and trumpeters are there who receive this pay, and approximately how many are still on probation and therefore receiving $1.25 a day?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There are none.

Mr. HARKNESS: When men are taken into the force, how long do they remain on probation?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They are third-class constables the first year, second-class constables the second year and first-class constables the third year.

Mr. HARKNESS: You mean that no one is taken in as a sub-constable now, that this class does not actually exist?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The deputy commissioner informs me that they do not take them in now in that class.

Mr. HARKNESS: Then my next question is, how many constables are there in each class, and what is the average length of time a man remains in each grade? I understand the minister to say they stay in each grade for one year until they become first-class constables?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. HARKNESS: I wonder if we could get the information as to the number of constables in each of these grades.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: First-class constables, 1,299; second-class constables, 51; third-class constables, 134. That is as of May 31, 1946.

Mr. HARKNESS: Are all personnel in receipt of war duties pay?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The answer is yes.

Mr. HARKNESS: How much longer is this to be continued? Is there any idea that it will come to an end with the end of the present extension of the War Measures Act; is it to be incorporated into the regular rates of pay, or is it to cease altogether?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It has been extended to March 31, 1947, when some decision will have to be made as to the future.

Mr. HARKNESS: I should like to suggest that the war duties pay, or a fairly large proportion of it, should be included in the basic rate of pay for the force, since that basic rate, at any rate for certain members of the force, is now less than the basic rate of pay for privates or the equivalent in the three services, taking into consideration that both are provided with quarters, uniforms and so on. As a result, I believe it is necessary to increase the basic rate of pay. I should like to make it clear that I am not finding any particular fault with the rate of pay received by first-class constables, when you include the war duties pay, the allowance in lieu of rations, and so forth. If that were not included; if there had been any large number of people in the grades of second and third-class constables, and particularly sub-constables, I think a fair amount of criticism would have been justified.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The numbers may, of course, increase. Recruiting has been difficult during the whole war period and since the end of the war. After two years of satisfactory service, one automatically becomes a first-class constable, and that explains why practically all the constables at this time are in that grade. However, the hon. member is saying something I shall be glad to have on record, because it would be intolerable to remove the war duties supplement at the present time and go back to nothing better than the basic pay.

Mr. HARKNESS: Yes.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Just to complete the answer, the living allowance for a single constable is $1.50 a day, for a married constable, $2.25.

Mr. HARKNESS: Since I understand from the minister that men are advanced fairly rapidly from third-class constables to second-class constable and on to first-class constable, I think it is fairly satisfactory.

There is another matter I should like to mention in connection with the mounted police, however, and that is the position of men who joined the services but did not join the first Canadian provost corps. The situation is that a considerable number of men, several of whom I knew, had the expiration of their term of enlistment occur during the course of the war. Instead of rejoining the mounted police or joining the provost corps, they joined the army, the navy or the air force. In many cases they got commissions, and quite a number of them did very well. These men have now returned and in at least some instances they have not been taken back into the mounted police, or if they have been taken back the time they spent in the service is not counted toward their pension, nor is it counted as far as seniority is concerned.

As I say, some of these men were refused readmittance to the mounted police. In this country we have what is called a Reemployment in Civil Life Act, or something along that line, which requires a civilian employer whose employees joined the services to reengage those men on terms which do not place them at a disadvantage from the point of view of seniority or pay as compared with men who did not join the services. In this police force of the dominion government that rule is being flagrantly broken. Men are not being granted their pension rights or their seniority rights, and in some cases they are being refused reemployment. I think it is high time the government made an announcement that they would reemploy any man who served in the mounted police, who is still fit and wishes to be reemployed. The minister has said they are experiencing difficulty in engaging men. I have some letters here from men who are in this position. They were refused reentry into the mounted police because they refused to reenlist but preferred to join the services, and did not join the provost corps. Only last night I was talking to a man who was my second in command overseas. His brother was a sergeant in the mounted police. He served in the artillery overseas and rose to be a major. He has come back and has reenlisted with the mounted police. At present he is a corporal, and does not really know—it has never been made plain to him—his situation in regard to pension, seniority rights or anything else. A little while ago I noticed the minister shake his head when I mentioned these things, but I know these cases exist. I have been in touch with men, and had communication with them. I think it is time that the whole matter was clarified and these men knew where they stood, and particularly that they should get as good a deal as our legislation provides that civilian employers must give men who left their service to join the armed forces.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: These men to whom the hon. member refers are not men who left the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to join the armed forces. They are men who left the police force at the expiry of their term of engagement. Their connection with the police force was completely severed. When they come back, if it is possible to take them on, the officers of the force are always sympathetic. The force would not have the reputation it enjoys if its officers did not treat the men in a proper manner, or did not treat them in a manner which would win the men's confidence, devotion and affection. The same treatment is being afforded all those who were with the force and wish to return to it.

There are some cases where men who left had not shown themselves to be the kind who would be apt to get promotion. It has been promotion in the service that has been its lifeblood. The commissioner and his officers want to have in the service the kind of men who will have reasonable hope of continually going up to a higher rank.

I have always been reluctant to say or to do anything to interfere with the administration of the force, because I have had the impression that it was being administered in a firm and kindly manner, and that the commissioner and his officers know how to handle it better than I did. From time to time I receive representations with respect to this person or that person who is a member of the force, and I bring it to the attention of the commissioner. But I always make it clear to him that I am not trying to run his force and that I still have confidence in the way that he is doing it. I think that attitude on the part of the responsible ministers has for a period of years proved to be a right one. I believe that if the hon. member will bring these individual cases to my attention so that I may pass them on to the commissioner, they will receive serious consideration by the officers, who try to do the right thing by all the members of the force.

Mr. HARKNESS: I quite appreciate what the minister has said as to having confidence in the officers of the force. I should like to assure him that I, too, have the utmost confidence in them. The point, however, as it is stated in this letter from Commissioner Wood in answer to a query, is:

> Up to the present, no amendment has been made to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, authorizing all service in the second great war to count for pension, but members of the force who were granted leave of absence to serve with the first provost company overseas, are permitted to count their service in the second great war for pension purposes. The same is true of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police marine section, and of the former aviation section.

This letter is dated March 29, 1946, and, to my knowledge, there has been no change in the law since that time. In other words, the situation is that any mounted policeman who joined the service police force under the aegis, as it were, of the mounted police, may count his time in the armed forces for pension. But any mounted policeman who did not join the police force of one of the services does not count his service for pension.

I should like to see an amendment to the mounted police pension act to correct what I consider to be an injustice in that regard, so that any mounted policeman who served will be able to count his time for pension. It is manifestly unjust that a man who served in the provost corps should be permitted to count his time in the army for pension, whereas a man who served in the infantry and who probably, on the average, would experience ten times the amount of risk and ten times the hardship of the man in the provost corps, cannot count his time for pension. The whole thing to me is just ridiculous, and it is high time that an amendment was passed. It is not a matter of any distrust of officers, or anything of that kind. It is a matter of changing the law so that this injustice will be corrected.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: With respect to changing the law, had there not been the necessity this year of dealing with the militia pension act I would have had a bill of my own. But I preferred to let that one be disposed of before bringing my bill along. There are reasons why there should be some differences, and I would prefer not to have the two before the house at the same time.

Mr. HARKNESS: I take it that the minister is, practically speaking, giving the committee the assurance that this matter will be corrected in the near future.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It will certainly be brought before the house for consideration. The hon. member knows that service in the last war does count for pension purposes.

Mr. HARKNESS: Yes, which is another reason I suggest that service in this war should count.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I cannot say what parliament will do, but it is my intention to have the matter before parliament for consideration. The hon. member knows what was done about it the last time it was up for consideration.

Mr. HARKNESS: Thank you. There is only one other point: What about the case of a man who was a sergeant in the mounted police before the war and who, after some five years of service in the army, during which time he rose to a senior rank, now finds himself in the position of constable?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There must be some special reason there, which I cannot describe in a general way. That is not what usually happens. If that has happened—and I do not doubt it, if the hon. member says so—there must be some special reason which would require further examination.

Mr. HARKNESS: That is not the general policy.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, it is not.

Mr. SHAW: Two of the matters I had hoped to discuss have already been touched upon by the hon. member for Calgary East. I agree with what he says, and I was extremely pleased to hear the minister say that they do not contemplate discontinuing the payment of the special allowance war bonus—at least in the near future. I would have regarded it as a tragedy, had they contemplated such action. I would hope that when March of next year arrives the appropriate authorities may look with favour upon making this special bonus a part of the regular salaries.

I, too, have become aware of a number of cases where members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police joining the armed services were not permitted reinstatement in the force. In a number of cases they were offered the opportunity, so I am told, of joining the provost corps. But not desiring to do that, they waited until their long period of service had expired and then joined the unit of their choice. Upon discharge, they endeavoured to get back into the force. Not only were they denied the privilege of rejoining the force, but I have been told that obstacles were placed in their way. I am told also that some sergeants and corporals were taken on as constables. I cannot see any justification for this treatment of these men who had a number of years of excellent service.

There is a third matter to which I should like to refer and which is of a different nature. I agree fully with the observations which have been made this evening and which were made on July 5 about the great traditions of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I agree also with the minister when he refers to the picturesque uniforms which they wear. Members of the force are to be found in front of our parliament buildings. That is a fine thing and I do not complain about it at all. I look upon it as being a splendid tourist attraction. I realize also that having the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in their scarlet tunics around certain other buildings in Ottawa may be a fine thing, but I have a complaint to make.

There are a number of government buildings in Ottawa where the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are, I cannot say guarding because I do not think that is what they are doing. I have heard the expression used that they are glorified janitors or glorified messenger boys for the civil service. Those expressions were actually used to me. These men are just about as far removed from police work as they possibly could be and they do not like the set-up at all. These men must run upstairs at midnight to make sure that all the windows are closed or the taps turned off, and that is not the proper thing to ask men to do who have been associated with this great force. It does not enhance the prestige of the force.

We should have another body of persons doing this type of work. I want it understood that I am not complaining about having our mounted police in front of this building and in one or two other places, but I implore the minister to give consideration to the removal of these men from many of these government buildings where they are nothing but caretakers. If a man joined the force for the purpose of doing a job like that and knew he was going to have to do it, I would not complain, but I have been told that men who have had years of experience with detachments in western Canada and in other parts of the country have been brought to A division and been placed at the door of some building to tell people where John Jones, in charge of a certain branch of government, happens to have his office.

I do not think there could be anything more soul-destroying than for a mounted policeman to be taken off a detachment where he is performing police service and put into a position of that kind. Some may say that such a man may not be a good policeman. If he is not a good policeman, let him go. You would be doing him a justice rather than keeping him in that position. It has been said also, and I believe this is the case, that when a member of the force incurs the displeasure of some officer he is sent here for a period. If I may be pardoned for using the term, someone said one time that it is considered to be a sort of purgatory. They are kept here for a while and then they may be sent back to the point whence they came. I am told that a mounted policeman out on detachment, when jokingly told that he is going to be moved to A division, will develop an expression on his face something like that on the face of a front-seat patron of a theatre during the showing of a Boris Karloff film.

I cannot think of a worse thing happening than a man who has been on police work being sent here and being removed entirely from the type of work he has been doing. Has consideration been given to taking these men off these jobs where they give the appearance of being just glorified caretakers?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think most of those men to whom the hon. member refers as being glorified caretakers are special constables; that is, with the exception of the men on parliament hill and perhaps in one or two other places. Within the last three or four weeks negotiations have been carried on looking to a contract with the corps commissionaires to have them take over the guarding of a large number of public buildings in Ottawa. I am not in a position to say whether a final agreement has been signed, but the recommendations to treasury board for the number of hours that will be involved has been passed. If the agreement has not yet been completed, it is about to be completed and the corps of commissionaires will take over that work. As the hon. member knows, that corps is made up of old soldiers who do the work under the direction of a welfare organization which contracts for a certain number of hours at a certain rate per hour.

Mr. SHAW: I would not want it to be thought that I was calling these men glorified messengers or glorified caretakers. That expression was used by other people in discussing the matter with me. I am extremely happy to know that action is being taken to have the corps of commissionaires take over this work. I am sure that many members of the R.C.M.P. will smile when they hear that this action is contemplated.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

The house met at eleven o'clock.

CIVIL AVIATION

CANADA-NEWFOUNDLAND AIR TRANSPORT AGREEMENT

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): I wish to table copies of an agreement between Canada and Newfoundland, on air transport between Canada and Newfoundland, signed at St. John's on July 29, 1946.

Hitherto the air service between Canada and Newfoundland and the use of Newfoundland fields in transatlantic civil aviation have rested on temporary arrangements made during the war. The present agreement places air traffic rights for both services on a permanent basis subject to cancellation by either party on twelve months' notice. The agreement also provides for the use of Goose Bay as a regular field in transatlantic aviation by the designated Canadian airlines; for the use of Torbay as the terminus of the Canada-Newfoundland service; for the use of Goose Bay, Buchans and Torbay as bad-weather alternates in civil air operations over Newfoundland; and for the use by Canada on most-favoured-nations terms of other airfields in Newfoundland made available for civil use.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does that include Gander?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No.

JAPANESE IN CANADA

REPATRIATION TO JAPAN—THIRD SAILING

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I should like to announce to the house that a group of voluntary repatriates to Japan, totalling 1,377 in number, left Vancouver on August 2 en route to the port of Yokohama, Japan. This is the third sailing of voluntary repatriate groups, the earlier sailings having taken place at the end of May. The numbers of persons so repatriated to date total 3,151. Steps are being taken to secure transportation for several hundred additional repatriates who wish to proceed to Japan as soon as possible.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CITADEL HILL, HALIFAX

Mr. ISNOR:

1. Has the Department of Defence discontinued the use of citadel hill, Halifax (a) as accommodations for troops; (b) as offices; (c) as storage space?
2. Has it been declared surplus?
3. Has the R.C.M.P. made application for use of same for (a) accommodation for members of the force; (b) for offices; (c) for storage?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. (a) No. (b) Yes. (c) No.
2. One H-hut has been turned over to the city of Halifax. It is expected that the entire citadel hill, including the temporary buildings, will be evacuated by the end of August. The fortress in the citadel itself will then be returned to the Department of Mines and Resources and the temporary buildings declared surplus to War Assets.
3. (a), (b) and (c). No application has been received by the Department of National Defence.

IMMIGRATION OFFICES IN CANADA

Mr. THATCHER:

1. At what points throughout Canada are immigration offices located?
2. At what point throughout Canada are district offices maintained by the Department of Immigration?
3. What is the relationship between the immigration offices and the district offices?

4. Have any forms been issued for the making of applications under order in council No. 2071?

5. What guarantees of housing work, and wages are applicants under order in council No. 2071 required to lodge, and with whom, and for what period do such guarantees extend (a) in the case of married immigrants; (b) in the case of single immigrants; (c) in the case of child immigrants?

6. What instructions have been issued to the immigration offices and the district offices (a) as to recording the worth of such guarantees; (b) as to disposing of the applications?

Mr. GLEN:

1. Immigration offices are located at ocean and international boundary ports of entry and at the following: Calgary, Edmonton, Regina. Saskatoon, Winnipeg, Hamilton, Toronto.

2. Vancouver, Winnipeg and Ottawa.

3. For immigration purposes Canada is divided into four districts with district headquarters located at points mentioned in answer to No. 2 above. All ports and offices in each district operate under the direction of district headquarters.

4. Yes.

5. Each application is investigated to establish:—

(a) the status of the applicant,

(b) the applicant's ability to receive, house and maintain the proposed immigrant until he is established in Canada.

Each applicant is required to file a written undertaking to provide such housing and maintenance, and guarantee that the immigrant will not become a public charge in Canada.

6. (a) Answered by No. 5.

(b) Completed cases are held on file until travel and inspectional facilities are available.

EXPORTS OF ALUMINIUM

Mr. GARIEPY:

1. Is aluminium being exported to Great Britain and Europe from plants in the province of Quebec?
2. If so, from which plants and in what quantity?
3. Is it in the form of ingots or laminated sheets?
4. If so, what is the respective quantity of each that has been exported during each month of the current year?

Mr. MacKINNON:

1. Exports by province of origin not available.

2. Information not available.

3 and 4. Exports from Canada to Great Britain and Europe.

PRICE OF FLAXSEED

Mr. MENARY:

1. Has the government set a price on flax seed for this year?
2. If so, what is the price?
3. Will this price apply to the province of Ontario?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. Yes.

2. $3.25 per bushel to the producer basis No. 1 C.W. flax seed in store Port Arthur/Fort William and Vancouver, effective August 1, 1946.

3. Yes.

SALES OF BUTTER TO UNRRA

Mr. FRASER:

1. Has Canada sold butter to UNRRA during the period January 1, 1946 to July 1, 1946?
2. If so, what quantity and to what ports have shipments been made?
3. What quantity has been shipped to each port?

Mr. MacKINNON: Canada has not sold butter to UNRRA during the period mentioned.

EXPORTS OF BUTTER

Mr. FRASER:

1. Has butter been exported from Canada during the period from January 1, 1946 to July 1, 1946?
2. If so (a) to what countries? (b) what quantity to each country?

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PENSIONS AND FAMILY ALLOWANCES

Mr. McCUAIG:

What is the number of persons in Canada receiving (a) civilian and service pensions of all classes; (b) family allowance?

NOVA SCOTIA FISHERIES—DESTRUCTION OF TRAWL GEAR ON QUERO BANK

Mr. WINTERS:

1. Has the Department of Fisheries, or any other government department, received sworn statements from captains of Nova Scotian fishing schooners to the effect that their trawl gear is being destroyed by draggers of foreign registry on Quero bank?
2. If so, has the country of registry of the foreign trawlers been established?
3. Is Quero bank being patrolled by Canadian craft in the interests of Nova Scotian fishermen?
4. If not, what steps are being taken to establish adequate protection?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

GULF OF GEORGIA—SEINE AREA NO. 17

Mr. REID:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents forwarded to the hon. Minister of Fisheries and any of his officials, in regard to the enlarging or opening up of seine area No. 17, in the gulf of Georgia for the operation of seine fishing during the fishing season of 1946?

DOCTOR DAVID SHUGAR

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

For a copy of all letters written by Doctor David Shugar between February 28 and March 12, 1946, to the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister of Canada, regarding any matter connected with his detention, and a copy of the replies thereto, if any.

FLOUR

SHIPMENTS TO ECUADOR—QUESTION OF RESTRICTIONS ON EXPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have not had an opportunity to give him notice but I am sure he will have the answer; if not, he may take it as notice. My question arises out of a recent dispatch in the Lethbridge Herald; it is brief and therefore I think I may read it. The heading is: "Lethbridge Flour Goes South", and the body of the article is as follows:

Lethbridge-made flour in the post-war era is finding entirely new markets.

Ellison Milling and Elevator Company of Lethbridge on Wednesday shipped its first car of flour to Ecuador. It was a private deal with a South American firm.

[Mr. MacKinnon.]

Four more cars to the same firm will be loaded and dispatched this week.

But that's not all. Six cars of flour will be shipped immediately to the Dutch East Indies. This also is a privately arranged business deal.

Ellison flour has never before gone to these distant points.

In view of the fact that flour is now rationed to bakers in Canada who are anxious to feed United Kingdom and devastated countries, what restrictions are there on exports of flour to places like Ecuador where they are not in need of food?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I should like to give some consideration to the hon. member's question and answer it later.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Very well.

TORONTO HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS

POWER TO PURCHASE CERTAIN LANDS AND TO BORROW PURCHASE MONEYS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of bill No. 299, respecting the Toronto Harbour Commissioners.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Perhaps I should say a word or two in introducing this bill, which in effect is a simple matter. I have no doubt that it will commend itself to the committee, and particularly to the members representing Toronto constituencies. The Toronto harbour commissioners are the owners of land north of Fleet street in the city of Toronto. This land is bounded on the west by the Fort York armouries and on the east by lands leased to Rogers Majestic Limited. The lands owned by the Toronto harbour commissioners comprise about six acres, but they have leased a portion of their lands at the eastern extremity to an important local firm, and have obtained demands from a United States industry interested in locating itself in Toronto for additional lands north of that which is already owned by them on the north side of Fleet street. The land they own has a frontage of approximately 1,321 feet along Fleet street, and there is a parcel north of theirs having an acreage of 3·4 acres. The Toronto harbour commissioners have negotiated with the owners thereof, namely, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, for the purchase of these lands.

The commissioners are of the opinion that not only in its own interests but also in the interests of the city of Toronto it is a wise thing to purchase these 3·4 acres of land from the Canadian Pacific Railway company. The powers of the commissioners as constituted at present under statute are not sufficient to enable them to purchase the land. The object of the bill is to give them these supplemental powers, which in the opinion of the solicitors of the Toronto harbour commissioners as well as the solicitor of the city of Toronto are required to warrant the purchase of this additional land and the use thereof for the purpose set out.

The bill is a simple one; it has but two clauses: one, authorizing the purchase, and two, authorizing the issue and raising of debentures for the purpose of purchasing these lands.

Mr. MacNICOL: I rise to support the bill. I know the area well. The site mentioned by the minister has been described by him and therefore it is not necessary for me to make any extended reference to it. I merely wish to say that the Toronto harbour commission has done an excellent job for the city in that it has brought a large number of industries to the city in the area along the waterfront which has been under their control. These industries have given a great number of jobs, and have meant much to the industrial and commercial life of the city. Their proposal is to purchase 3·47 acres now belonging to the Canadian Pacific Railway company which that railway is anxious to sell. That parcel, together with the parcel which the Toronto harbour commissioners themselves own between the Rogers Majestic plant and the 14th Infantry brigade armouries, will permit them to sell the combined area to a large concern which will employ a large number of men. In my opinion it is all to the best interests of the city. The board is to be commended for bringing about the construction of this plant in that part of the city of Toronto. As the minister pointed out, probably they could do this without any opposition whatever, but the act does not seem to be clear enough to permit them to buy the land from the Canadian Pacific Railway company, and this bill is merely enabling legislation.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right.

Mr. MacNICOL: I desire to render what assistance I can in bringing this about.

Mr. HAZEN: Has any price been agreed upon?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. I am told it is $112,000.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Mr. CHEVRIER moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. HAZEN: Can the minister tell us the assessed value of the land which is being sold?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am sorry I cannot give that information to the hon. gentleman.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CONSTRUCTION OF LINE FROM BARRAUTE TO KIASK FALLS, QUEBEC

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill conferring authority upon the governor in council to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to construct a line of railway from Barraute to Kiask falls on the Bell river, in the province of Quebec, a distance of approximately 55 miles at an estimated expenditure of $4,125,000 and an average expenditure of $75,000 per mile. The bill will make provision for the issue by the company of securities, which may be guaranteed by the government in respect of the cost of construction. To enable the company to proceed with construction forthwith temporary loans may be made to the company out of the consolidated revenue fund, upon terms and conditions prescribed by the governor in council and secured by company securities.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is to obtain authority from parliament to construct a branch line from Barraute, a point on the National Transcontinental railway, to Kiask falls on the Bell river. The projected line would be 55 miles in length, and it is situated in the Abitibi country about 400 miles north and west of the city of Quebec.

When branch lines of this kind are built the Canadian National Railways have a practice of considering the economic factors. In this, as in other cases, it looks first at the natural resources which exist in the territory to be served or to be tapped; second, at the cost of construction of the line, and third, at the traffic likely to be derived from the projected line. The railway has done that in this case, and has come to the conclusion that the construction of this line would be profitable from the three angles I have just mentioned. I should like to deal with the three in a general way, but before doing so I want to make the statement that the cost of this line will be $4,125,000, which figure is arrived at taking the rate of $75,000 per mile.

Dealing with the development of natural resources in the area, the Canadian National Railways have obtained a survey, which was projected from an aerial photograph using the modern method of stereoptic vision, which enables the country to be seen in relief. This survey disclosed a number of very important features. It disclosed, first of all, the agricultural possibilities of that area. The territory to be traversed by this line lies in the clay belt area, and there is a very substantial area north of the Transcontinental railway in the valley of the Bell river suitable for agricultural purposes. The area west of the Bell river slopes gently to the north, and is heavily wooded; later I shall deal with the question of timber. The area to the east of the Bell river is rugged and rough, and is not suitable for agricultural purposes. The line would be capable of developing some 275,000 acres of arable land, and it would support an agricultural population of approximately 15,000 people, who would be engaged in farming and lumbering. In addition some 600 people would be engaged in other activities. According to the survey made at the request of the Canadian National Railways it would take some ten years before the full agricultural development would be completed.

This area has great colonization potentialities. The province of Quebec is planning an extensive colonization programme for the district, and a study has been prepared at the request of the minister of colonization of the province of Quebec by a committee set up by him, which has issued a report entitled "La Colonisation dans la Province de Québec." This study was made by Mr. E. Minville, director of the school of higher commercial studies, Montreal, and contains some interesting conclusions which I do not want to go into fully, but perhaps I could summarize them by saying that the area to be served by this projected line has a double feature. First of all, it is the only one properly agricultural which has a bright future in the province of Quebec. Next, it is the only one which, even already partly populated, may be treated as a country to be built up.

Dealing next with the forest products of the area to be served, the line would tap huge pulpwood resources. In fact there are 700 square miles west of Bell river which contain some 4,700,000 cords of timber, and 240 square miles east of the Bell river which contain 1,500,000 cords of timber, in terms of pulpwood. Seven hundred square miles of this timber has been granted by the Quebec government to the Canada Paper Company, and it has been granted to the company because of the fact that the timber resources in the eastern townships of Quebec have become practically exhausted. Unless the Canada Paper Company is able to obtain resources elsewhere there is a strong possibility of its mills at Windsor Mills and elsewhere having to close down.

The total estimated timber in the 700 square miles which have been granted by the province to the Canada Paper Company is 4,480,000 cords, and the timber within the economic reach of the 43·7 miles of the line is 6,200,000 cords. The area to be traversed has, as well, mineral possibilities. The line traverses the main mineralized belt between Noranda on the west and the Chibougamau country on the east. The possibilities there are for gold, copper and zinc. In fact in that area are mines which have been prospected which in the opinion of those who have prepared the survey have possibilities.

Mr. MacNICOL: What kind of minerals?

Mr. ADAMSON: Who prepared the survey?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The survey was prepared at the request of the Canadian National Railways. I am talking now about the economic survey, but I shall deal with the other in a minute.

The traffic possibilities in the area, in the minds of those responsible for the survey, are substantial. In fact a large portion of the revenue of the railways in the earlier years must depend largely upon the transporation of pulpwood. In order to ensure sufficient traffic to meet operating expenses and the interest on the cost of construction in the first six years the Canada Paper Company have given a guarantee to the Canadian National Railways, such guarantee covering an aggregate traffic of 330,000 cords of pulpwood to be taken out of the area at the rate of 40,000 cords for the first year and 45,000 cords for succeeding years. In the event that the pulpwood shipped from the area is under 330,000 cords in six years, the Canada Paper Company will pay the Canadian National Railways $3 per cord for any deficiency between the actual amount transported and the 330,000 cords. The guarantee extends only to the 43·7 miles of the line, namely from Barraute to a point at the southeast extremity of the township of Laas. The estimated cost of the 43·7 miles is $3,300,000.

Dealing with the cost of the line, the estimated cumulative operating results for the first six years, including the guaranteed traffic by the Canada Paper Company, based upon the operation of the line from Barraute to Laas township, is as follows: Gross operating revenue, $3,007,000; out of pocket expenses, $2,316,000; net revenue before interest, $691,000. Deducting from that sum interest at three per cent on capital cost of $3,300,000 or $99,000 per annum for a period of six years, makes a sum of $594,000. This leaves an estimated surplus at the end of the first six-year guarantee period of $97,000.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What did the minister say about gross operating income?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Gross operating revenue as compiled by the railway's chief engineer is $3,007,000.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): For what period?

Mr. CHEVRIER: For the first six years.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Is there a breakdown of that?

Mr. CHEVRIER: If necessary I can place one on Hansard, although I have not a breakdown with me. I can get it for the hon. member.

Dealing with possible extensions, I would point out that the line at the present time is projected to the southeast corner of Laas township, a distance of 43.7 miles. The bill seeks authority for an additional 11.3 miles in order to bring it to Kiask falls. It is not the intention of the Canadian National Railways to project the line to Kiask falls at the present time, but it is hoped that with the timber and pulpwood development it would be possible to establish a pulp mill at Kiask falls. Therefore the railway officials seek to obtain authority from parliament for an additional 11.3 miles.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the minister any estimate of the possible amount of power which might later be developed at Kiask falls?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No, I have not. The survey I have before me deals only with the three matters I mentioned a moment ago, namely costs, natural resources and traffic. I know there is extensive potential power development at Kiask falls, but I am not in a position to tell the hon. member what the horse-power would be.

Mr. BROOKS: Has the minister or the Canadian National Railways any guarantee that the pulp and paper people will build a mill at Kiask falls?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No, there is no such guarantee.

Mr. BROOKS: Does not the minister think there should be a guarantee before the railway is constructed?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not think it would be reasonable to ask the Canada Paper Company to build a paper mill at that point. They have already guaranteed the financial aspect of the line at the rate of $3 per cord in the event of any deficiency. It is hard to ascertain before the line has been projected some distance just what the future possibilities will be, so far as the construction of a mill is concerned.

Mr. BROOKS: My point is that we have seen areas of that kind stripped of pulpwood and lumber, the railway becoming just a national expense. I should think that as a guarantee of good faith the pulp and paper company should at least guarantee to build a pulp mill at that point. This would be a guarantee that the place would not be stripped and all the paying facilities of the area taken away.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Referring to further extensions, there would of course be a possibility of extension to the east, around the Chibougamau country. This would depend a great deal upon development in the area. The Canadian National Railways will build now the 43.7 miles only, if it is authorized by parliament to do so. This is nothing more or less than an industrial spur, and could be compared to a spur running from the main line of a railway in to an industry. The costs of this line in the earlier years are guaranteed. The line is being built in an agricultural area, in a mineralized area, and also in a timber area. Further, it will be built with second-hand material, material obtained from line abandonments or from replacements of main line rails; no new material or no new rolling stock will be required.

Mr. BROOKS: It will still cost $75,000 a mile?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. The policy of the railway, as I outlined in the beginning, is one which thoroughly investigates each branch line project. It investigates it as to the natural resources which will be opened up, as to the cost of the construction of the line, and as to the probable traffic which will result. Inasmuch as the total costs arising from the line are charged to the Canadian National Railways, including interest on the cost of construction as well as maintenance and operating expenses, the amount of new traffic which will be created from the development of additional natural resources has to reach a considerable figure to meet those costs. It has been the experience of the railway that when it can obtain a guarantee for the construction of the line in the earlier years, then the line is likely to be a paying project.

The Canadian National Railways has studied this project very carefully. It has prepared a survey, and it has obtained also from the records of the federal government, of the provincial government and from consultation of data in the hands of the Canada Paper, details of the natural resources in the country. It has convinced itself that this branch line would be in the interests of the railway as well as in the interests of the country. The board of directors have considered it carefully and after having given it the consideration which they give to all these lines have recommended in favour of it. The government seeks the approval of parliament for the construction of the branch line.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to make a few observations and ask one or two questions. In the first place let me say, although it is not necessary to say, that I have the very greatest respect for the operations of the Canadian National Railways. I think what the minister has said as to the care with which they enter into obligations is perfectly warranted, but I do feel that it is our duty in this house to try to understand fully anything that is put before us. I feel also that it is our duty to be careful and critical about things which come from the Canadian National Railways, because there is always a chance that a government owned enterprise may be subject to certain pressures which I think realistic people will always recognize and, therefore, it is I believe in friendship to the Canadian National Railways to try to understand and perhaps even to be a little persistent in making inquiry.

With that introduction I should like to make one or two observations. I was disappointed in one or two of the figures given by the minister. I was disappointed, first of all, at the very small amount of population which he indicated as likely to be the result of this line. I suppose we are all used to the idea of pioneering lines, that is lines really built in advance of population, and we must to some extent expect that, but I was surprised at the smallness of the line. I was also surprised, although I was not quite sure that I caught the minister correctly, when he said, according to my understanding, that this was the only new colonization project area in Quebec which had a bright future. If I understood him correctly, it strikes me that that is covering a lot of territory.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is the only properly agricultural area which has a bright future according to the report made by the committee set up by the minister of colonization of the province of Quebec.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What he said about working with the colonization department of the province of Quebec seemed to me an argument which is very fair and permissible and worthy and one which we should receive sympathetically; nevertheless we should seek to understand it fully. That brings me again to the very small population he indicated, and it was a surprise to me to know that that population, even with the assistance of the power company, would be sufficient to give what the minister called a guarantee of the operating cost and a return over the first few years.

That brings me to ask this particular question. I did not understand fully what the minister said as to the obligations of the paper company. If I understood him correctly he said that in the event of the minimum cordage which was indicated, and which I think was about 50,000 cords a year—

Mr. CHEVRIER: 330,000 cords over the six year period.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That is about 50,000 cords a year. He said again, if I understood him correctly, that in the event of the shipment of a cordage less than that, the company would make up or would guarantee $3 per cord for the cords not shipped. I did not hear the minister say what would be the total income to the railway from the cords actually shipped. In other words, suppose 50,000 cords are shipped, what would be the gross revenue to the railway? If no cords were shipped at all I take it the railway would get paid only at the rate of $3 per cord. In other words, its total income from the paper company in the event of cords not being shipped in any year would be in the neighbourhood of $150,000.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not think there is any danger of no cords being shipped.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I do not think so either. Can the minister give us the total figure if the cords are shipped?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I told the hon. gentleman that I would try to get that and put it on the record for him.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister gave us the gross receipts, I think at the rate of about $500,000 a year—I think he said $3,000,000 over the six years. I regard it as of considerable importance in understanding this to know just where that operating revenue comes from. I do not know what is paid to ship a cord of wood fifty or seventy-five miles, but it would seem to me that the cost of that shipment would have to be quite high. I take it it will be practically the only revenue in the first year.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There would be other revenue.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It would be trivial, I should think, at the outset.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. McMASTER: The suggestion is that there would be a revenue of $10 per cord from the pulpwood. Is that the cost of drawing it over this line, or is that the total cost of making the longer haul to the paper mills of the Canada Paper Company, wherever they are located?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The paper mills are located in several areas in the province of Quebec. The timber would be hauled from an area east and west of Bell river down the branch line to Barraute, and from there into Quebec, and from Quebec into Windsor Mills or any other area where Canada Paper had mills.

Mr. HAZEN: I think a matter of this kind involving an expenditure of well over $4,000,000 might very well be referred to the railways and shipping committee for consideration and investigation. The minister tells us that the Canadian National Railways have studied the project carefully, but it seems to me that the committee should also study it carefully and call the officials of the Canadian National Railways to find out what their studies have been and to question them on the different aspects of the road dealt with in the report referred to by the minister. What strikes me about building this railway, or any other railway, is that at the present time they have to compete with motor vehicle transportation, and I think the committee should know how many roads there are in this area at the present time and what motor vehicle competition this railway will have. The minister says that the railway will support an agricultural population of 15,000 people, but most of those people are going to use motor vehicles, and not the railway, for transportation purposes. To-day all through the country, as you go about, you see that motor trucks, not branch railways, are hauling pulp to the main line, sometimes a distance of a good many miles, and it has not been found necessary to build a railway to take the place of the trucks.

So far as mining is concerned, I think that should be looked into also, because the reports we have received from mine owners and people interested in mining in Quebec is that since the Canadian dollar has been put on a par with the United States dollar a great many of these Quebec mines will go out of production. These questions should be looked into before this expenditure is made.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not think the house would wish to approve this expenditure without the bill being considered by a committee. It has been the practice in the past to refer proposed branch lines of railway, not to the committee on railways and shipping, but to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and when this bill has been given its second reading I intend to move that it be referred to that committee for thorough study. The officials of the Canadian National Railways will be on hand, together with others, to give the committee all relevant information with respect not only to the financial aspect of this line but to the natural resources of the area.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am happy to hear the minister say that, because I was under a complete misapprehension; I thought this had already been before the committee. I am thoroughly in accord with what the hon. member for St. John-Albert has said, and if the minister is going to move to refer the bill to the committee I think the questions we are asking now might well be asked before that committee.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I did not want to interrupt the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. This is not the bill stage, only the resolution stage, and I think the time for questions is at the bill stage or in committee.

Mr. GRAYDON: Any time is the time for questions, I suppose.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I suppose.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Chevrier thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 345, respecting the construction of a line of railway by Canadian National Railway company from Barraute to Kiask falls on the Bell river, in the province of Quebec.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. CHEVRIER moved second reading of the bill.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Speaker, the bill is not before us. How can it be read a second time now?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed that the bill is on the members' files, but if there is any objection I shall not insist. I had hoped we might be able to give the bill second reading and refer it to the committee to-day.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

MERCHANT SEAMEN

PROVISION FOR PAYMENT OF WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION BENEFITS

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of bill No. 302, respecting compensation for merchant seamen.

Mr. GREEN: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The principle contained in this bill is the same as that which has been recognized in the Government Employees Compensation Act. The Government Employees Compensation Act, as the house knows, provides compensation for employees of the government who are killed or injured in the course of their employment, and that principle is one which has been recognized over the years and to which some extensions have been granted. During the war years there was granted an extension of that principle which provided compensation in the case of death or injuries to munition workers, and by extending the same principle to merchant seamen compensation is now being granted to those men where compensation is not already granted under the provincial statute.

The principle of workmen's compensation, which protects workmen and their dependents from loss of earning power due to accidents in their employment, is now generally recognized as the cornerstone of industrial welfare. During the war it was considered advisable by the government to bring in a measure providing for payment of workmen's compensation to seamen on Canadian ships who were not covered under the different provincial compensation acts. This was done under the merchant seamen compensation regulations, 1945, which were made under the War Measures Act and became effective on August 1, 1945.

The government, by virtue of this bill, now proposes to give statutory authority to these regulations. The bill provides, among a number of things, for the establishment of a workmen's compensation board consisting of three members, and it covers first of all seamen engaged on ships registered in Canada or chartered by demise to persons registered in Canada when the ships are engaged on foreign or home-trade voyages. Second, if ordered by the governor in council, coverage may be extended to seamen engaged in Canada and employed in ships registered outside Canada and operated by persons resident in Canada or having their principal place of business in Canada, when the ships are engaged on foreign or home-trade voyages. Third, "seamen" includes all members of the crew but does not include pilots, apprenticed pilots or fishermen; and fourth, the bill does not cover seamen who are entitled to claim compensation under the Government Employees Compensation Act or any provincial act, nor does it cover seamen entitled to claim compensation under order in council P.C. 104/3546 of April 30, 1942, which provides protection for seamen suffering disability or death as a result of enemy action or counteraction taken against the same.

Mr. GREEN: That is, pension.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. Compensation is payable where there is personal injury. I am sorry I told the hon. gentleman "yes". I think this order in council has to do with enemy action only and does not cover the point he mentioned.

Mr. GREEN: I meant pension similar to pension given men in the armed forces.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. I believe it would cover that. Compensation is payable where there is personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of employment. The only exceptions are: (1) Where the disability lasts less than seven days, and (2) Where the accident is attributable solely to the serious and wilful misconduct of the seaman and does not result in death or serious disability.

The question of negligence or absence of negligence of employer or seaman does not affect the matter, and the old legal defence of common employment and voluntary assumption of risk are no longer applicable. No agreement to forgo benefits of the act is valid and no contribution towards the benefits provided is to be collected from seamen. Compensation cannot be assigned, charged or attached without the approval of the board. The benefits provided are in lieu of right of action for damages against the employer.

Where the accident results in death, the widow or invalid husband is entitled to receive payment of $45 a month during widowhood, and if the seaman leaves children, she is also entitled to receive $10 a month for each child under eighteen, the children's allowance, in case of the death of the widow, being increased to $20, but the total monthly payment is not to exceed two-thirds of the seaman's average earnings, except that minimum compensation for the widow and one or more children is $55 a month. The widow is also to receive a lump sum of $100.

Where there is no widow or invalid husband, each child is entitled to $20 a month while under eighteen, but the total monthly payment is not in any case to exceed two-thirds of the seaman's average earnings. Where there is no widow or invalid husband or child, but there are other dependents, they are to be entitled to a sum reasonably proportionate to the pecuniary loss occasioned them by the seaman's death, but not in any case to exceed two-thirds of the seaman's average earnings. Where there are children but no widow and it seems desirable to continue the existing household, and an aunt, sister or other suitable person acts as foster mother in keeping up the household, the same payments may be made as if she were the widow.

There is special provision for invalid children over eighteen and for adopted children. Where the widow marries again, her own monthly payments cease on marriage, but she is entitled to a lump sum equal to two years' payments, and the children's payments continue as before. Necessary burial expenses not exceeding $125 are to be paid by the employer, and in addition transportation expenses of the body, from place of death to place of interment, not exceeding $125, are payable.

Credit is given for any payments made under the relative provisions of the Canada Shipping Act, 1934. In case of non-fatal accidents, a seaman who is totally disabled is entitled to receive two-thirds of his average earnings, disregarding any excess above $2,500 a year, but he is not in any case to receive less than $12.50 a week unless his average earnings are less than this amount, in which case he is to receive the full amount of his earnings. Compensation dates from the commencement of disability, but there is no compensation if the disability lasts less than seven days.

If the seaman is only partly disabled he is entitled to receive the same fraction of total disability allowance as his impairment is of his full earning capacity. The awards for all permanent disability, partial as well as total, are in the form of monthly pension for life, except where impairment does not exceed ten per cent of total earning capacity, in which case payment may be ordered by the board in a lump sum.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How many seamen in 1946, to date, have received compensation under the order in council?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I think I can give that figure as we go along. The compensation is on the basis of the seaman's average earnings but not including war service bonus paid under P.C. 149/2705.

The settling of the compensation is done in the following manner: All questions as to right to compensation and the amount of it are determined by the board and its officers, the procedure and methods adopted being as simple, speedy and inexpensive as possible. The board deals directly with the parties, and legal assistance is not necessary. The forms are furnished by the board.

With regard to medical aid, every seaman entitled to compensation is also entitled to medical, surgical and dental aid, and hospital and skilled nursing services, and is also entitled to prosthetic applicances. Any seaman receiving medical aid under the Canada Shipping Act, 1934, is not entitled to medical aid under the Merchant Seaman Compensation Act during the period and to the extent that he is receiving medical aid under the Canada Shipping Act.

Insurance provision: The scheme of the act is to require compulsory insurance to be taken out by employers to afford the necessary coverage. The cost to employers is thereby reduced to fixed amounts payable as insurance premiums. In the operation of the regulations the board has found that ship owners, with few exceptions, have been most cooperative and anxious to comply with the insurance requirements. The cost of administration will be charged to the employers on a basis to be determined by the board. The expenses of the board, which now consists of government officials serving without additional remuneration, are small.

The outstanding features of the bill are the simplicity of its provisions and procedure, the elimination of litigation and expense, wide protection for seamen and their dependents, immunity of the employer from individual liability, and the liberality of the benefits provided. I think the house will find generally that the regulations as covered by this bill are pretty much the same as those existing in the various provincial enactments. We have attempted to put in this bill the best that could be found in the provincial enactments. I am sure the bill will commend itself to the house.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am sure there will be no disagreement with the general purposes of the bill. During the war we freely paid tribute to the services of the armed service personnel, but the men of the merchant seamen who served on the seven seas also deserve high commendation from the parliament and the people of Canada. In 1945 an order in council was passed providing for compensation for seamen who had been injured and for the dependents of the seamen who had lost their lives. As a matter of fact this party would naturally give support to legislation such as this, because in 1942—and it was the first occasion on which the matter had received support from any political party—we went on record at the Winnipeg convention as follows:

> The hazardous occupation of those serving in the merchant navy should be fully recognized and their interests protected by extending to them and their dependents protection in accordance with the principles expressed in these resolutions. The benefits of the Pensions Act as now applied to seafaring men by order in council should be confirmed by statute.

There are some provisions of the bill with respect to which I wish to ask the minister for further information. The first is the matter of transportation on the great lakes. Will this legislation be within the power of the dominion parliament? I express no opinion on it; I simply ask whether or not the question has been submitted to the law officers of the crown for determination.

The second point I wish to raise has to do with the multiplication of boards which parliament is asked to set up. During the war, when under the regulations and under order in council claims must have been much larger than they will be in the days of peace, it was not found necessary to set up another administrative body. It has not become necessary to set up an administrative body to administer the act providing for compensation to government employees. At a time when the people want us to reduce taxation, again and again provision is being made for the setting up of boards and the appointment of persons at large salaries—at least it generally turns out that large salaries are paid. Having regard to the small number of cases to which this act will apply, I suggest there is no necessity of providing for a merchant seaman compensation board to consist of three members to be appointed by the governor in council. The number of cases to be dealt with will be so relatively small that within the department itself a temporary board could be set up to deal with them.

I now come to the sections dealing with the powers of the board. It is true that under the workmen's compensation acts of the various provinces the decisions of the board is final, but there has been a body of jurisprudence built up. I take strong exception to sections 17 and 18 which give to an administrative board, without regard to the justice of the case, the finality of deciding whether or not justice has or has not been done. Consideration should be given to the establishment of principles to govern the board. Until these principles are established there should be the right of appeal to the courts. This would not apply to every case, but the principle should be followed in the building of a jurisprudence or a set of principles to guide the board so that arbitrary and tyrannical rules once made may not become the basis of future decisions.

Finally, sir, I take strenuous objection to section 41, which is what I call snooper legislation. It provides that where it is found by the board, and mind you its decision is final—> —that the widow to whom compensation has been awarded is a common prostitute or is openly living with any man in the relation of man and wife without being married to him, the compensation to such widow may be discontinued or suspended . . .

That type of paternalistic legislation indicates what I would term the snooper mentality. We had examples of it frequently during the period of the war when the recipients of allowances had investigations made from time to time with regard to alleged wrongdoing. I think this is the first time this sort of thing has been incorporated in a statute, however.

Mr. CHEVRIER: No, it is not. I would remind the hon. gentleman that it is in the Ontario act.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The Ontario compensation act?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, that is the first time hon. gentlemen opposite have ever quoted with approval anything that has been done in Ontario.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is certainly not the first time I have quoted with approval things done in Ontario. I am quite satisfied with the Ontario act as it is now.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My hon. friend has been a distinguished exception to the rule usually followed in that regard on the other side of the house; but whether or not it is the Ontario act, I submit that this sort of provision together with the power given the board in another section to determine these matters, finally are the sort of thing to which we should not give approval.

As to the general provisions, I and others on this side will deal with some of the specific sections as we come to them. Generally speaking our attitude is this. We approve the principle; we disapprove the necessity of setting up another board, establishing positions to be filled by the governor in council, at a time when the greatest economy should be practised. There is no need for a special board, having in mind the limited degree to which compensation will be claimed, and having regard to the experience of the war years. Finally, as far as the board is concerned, if set up, until a jurisprudence or general principles have been established, there should be a right of appeal.

Mr. HAZEN: I did not see this bill until this morning—

Mr. CHEVRIER: It has been on the order paper for at least two weeks.

Mr. HAZEN: I acknowledge that it is my own fault; but I might point out to the committee that the governing words of this bill, following the acts we have in the statute books of the various provinces, are that the employee, the seaman injured by accident, may obtain compensation, if it is an injury by accident.

Mr. CHEVRIER: To what section is my hon. friend referring?

Mr. HAZEN: Section 7. It is injury by accident that entitled a man to compensation; those are the words you find in every act having to do with workmen's compensation. There has been a tremendous amount of litigation as to the meaning of the words "injury by accident." In all the courts of our provinces and in the English courts, right up to the privy council and the House of Lords, there are decisions as to the meaning of that expression, and as to when a workman is entitled to compensation under the wording of the act. We have this vast amount of legal precedent, if I might call it that, defining these words; and it is of the greatest value. But in this bill, as the hon. member for Lake Centre has pointed out, section 17 provides that the decision of the board shall be upon the real merits and justice of the case, and it is not bound to follow strict legal precedent. There is a vast body of legal precedent in the different provinces and in the British courts, and it seems to me that should be followed. For that reason section 17 is most objectionable. Then section 18 states:

> The decisions and findings of the board upon all questions of law or fact are final and conclusive.

In other words there is no appeal from the finding of the board if a seaman thinks he has suffered injustice. If any man thinks he has not received the compensation to which he is entitled, this section prevents him from appealing to anyone, and I say that is wrong. I want to give an instance of how this legislation has been carried out in some of our courts, how those words have been interpreted when there is not a section allowing an appeal from the board.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I wonder if we should deal with these sections as we come to them.

Mr. HAZEN: I am dealing with the principle of the bill, Mr. Chairman. I want to give an illustration of the arbitrary way in which boards have acted when they were not governed by legal principles; and I am going to refer to the workmen's compensation board of New Brunswick. In that province the words in the act are, "injury by accident". If a man receives an injury by accident he is entitled to compensation; but what does the board say? The board has ruled that for a man to obtain compensation he must suffer an accident, in the first place, and by reason of that accident he must suffer an injury. Let us say a longshoreman is lifting heavy boxes, or doing other heavy work, and suffers a rupture. He has suffered an injury, but the board says he is not entitled to compensation because there was no accident. There was not an accident, though he did have an injury. So for a longshoreman or any other workman to obtain compensation in such a case, he has to lie about the whole thing and say he turned his ankle, or fell; that he had an accident, and as a result suffered an injury. When they come before the board, in order to get the compensation to which they are entitled they have to lie about it; and they all understand that. This board may place a similar interpretation upon those words, and there is no opportunity for a seaman, as there is no opportunity for a workman in New Brunswick, to appeal. That opportunity did exist previously in New Brunswick, where the act provided that a man could appeal on a question of law but not on a question of fact. When the courts of the land, following the English decisions, held that the words "injury by accident" should be interpreted as they were in the English courts, the board had the act amended to provide that it should be the sole judge of questions of law as well as questions of fact. I submit that is altogether wrong, that a seaman as well as a workman should have the right to appeal if he feels the board is not treating him justly, and that right is taken away from him by this provision. It is my submission that a seaman, if he believes that the board has not treated him justly, should have the right of appeal. These boards are not infallible. I would ask the minister to give further consideration to amending that section.

I wish to refer also to section 29, which deals with insurance, subsection 1 of which states:

> Every employer shall cover by insurance or other means satisfactory to the board, the risks of compensation arising under this act.

Does the board propose to insure these men, or do the ship owners insure their seamen with a private company?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is the latter. They insure with a private company.

Mr. HAZEN: If they fail to do so, where is the penal provision?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Subsection 2 of section 29, where it states:

> The board may give notice in writing to a collector or other chief officer of customs that the provisions of this section have not been complied with to the satisfaction of the board in respect of seamen employed on any ship, and thereupon the collector or other chief officer of customs shall detain that ship until he receives notice from the board that he may release the ship.

Mr. HAZEN: But suppose notice is not received in time, with the result that the ship sails and an injury follows: Where does the seaman come in?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The employer is none the less liable.

Mr. HAZEN: Under the act?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, section 7. The hon. member for Lake Centre asked what number of seamen had received compensation. The total is 177, in 1945. The 1946 figures are not yet compiled.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the figure from September to December, 1945, after the war?

Mr. CHEVRIER: These figures are from August, the time the regulations came into force under the War Measures Act, until July 23.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: August of 1945 to July of this year.

[Mr. Hazen.]

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right. Then the hon. member asked about transportation on the great lakes, and whether parliament had power to pass legislation of this kind, or whether the Department of Justice had ruled in the matter. This has been submitted to the Department of Justice, and that department is of the opinion that the federal parliament has authority to enact legislation of this kind.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would the minister read the opinion into the record?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have not the opinion with me, but I shall be glad to get it. Then although the hon. member does not object to the principle contained in the bill, he objects to a multiplicity of boards being set up by parliament. All I can say in answer is that this board, as it has administered regulations under the War Measures Act, is composed of employees of the Department of Transport who get no additional remuneration. The members of the board are the chief counsel of the Department of Transport, Mr. Matthews; the director of merchant seamen, Captain Johnson, and one of the members of the national harbours board, Mr. Roberts. None of these men gets any additional remuneration. It is the intention that the board shall be composed of these men, who are familiar with the regulations and who, I believe, will have no difficulty in coming to decisions in cases as they arise.

The hon. member also objects to sections 17 and 18, and suggests that this gives the board altogether too much power. My answer is that those sections are to a great extent taken from provincial enactments. Unless there is authority of this kind there would be a large amount of litigation which, as my hon. friend knows, means additional costs to the seamen. I believe it was Sir William Meredith who laid down the principle in the Ontario act, which was followed many years later in the Quebec act, that it was far better to give to a board this power to determine and to decide cases at issue rather than to allow them to go to courts where, very often, huge costs accumulate.

The hon. member for St. John-Albert has referred to a case in New Brunswick which has been drawn to his attention, and in that connection complains about section 7 which deals with injury by accident. An accident, as defined—

Mr. HAZEN: I do not complain about section 7, but rather about the interpretation of that section by the board.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I believe the hon. member was dealing with section 7 in conjunction with sections 17 and 18. He referred particularly to the case of a rupture resulting from an accident to a stevedore who had lifted some heavy piece of equipment. Section 2(a) defines an "accident" as a wilful and an intentional act, not being the act of the seaman, and a fortuitous event occasioned by a physical or natural cause. I can only say to the hon. member, as I said to the hon. member for Lake Centre in connection with sections 17 and 18, that I am informed by one of the board members, who is here, that now and again cases of rupture arise from accidents, and in those cases which thus far have come before the board under the regulations the claims have been paid.

Mr. HAZEN: It would be well if we had a definition of "injury by accident" in the definition section, following the interpretation placed upon those words by the English courts.

Mr. CHEVRIER: We already have it in section 2(a).

Mr. HAZEN: That is an interpretation of "accident", not "injury by accident".

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. member for Lake Centre takes strong objection to section 41. I can only point out to him that that section is taken from the Ontario act. I am informed by those who are responsible for administration of the regulations that it has worked out well and has caused hardship to no one. I have the section before me; it is section 47 of the Ontario workmen's compensation act, which is chapter 204 of the Ontario statutes. I need not read it, but it is substantially the same wording as section 41 of our act.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How many cases have been turned down under that section since July, 1945?

Mr. CHEVRIER: There have been none.

Mr. IRVINE: Section 2 (i) defines seamen as excluding fishermen—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I believe we shall make better progress if we deal with each section as we come to it. We are now on section 1, and it would be in order to deal with the principle and terms of the bill itself. I hope hon. members will cooperate in this regard.

Mr. GREEN: This bill is of great importance to the coastal portions of Canada. I refer particularly to the maritime provinces, to the ports of Quebec and Montreal and to the Pacific coast. I think it meets a great need. In past years Canadian seamen have sailed on deep sea ships, as distinct from coastal ships, but they have not then been covered by any type of compensation, and I take it that the main purpose of this bill is to meet that need. The minister will correct me if I am wrong in that statement. Canada is trying to become a maritime nation and build up a merchant navy. I suggest it would be well for the minister to have this bill referred to one of the committees for careful consideration section by section. Probably it could go to the marine and fisheries committee, in view of the fact that the industrial relations committee is busy trying to settle strikes. For the first time in their lives thousands of young Canadians have become interested in our merchant navy, and many of them want to make following the sea their career. Young men from the prairies particularly took an interest in the sea during the last war. We should try to get away to a good start, and this is the time to put this bill in proper form. It cannot be considered carefully in this house. We are in the dying days of the session, there are not very many members here to-day and we shall have no opportunity to scrutinize the bill carefully. I suggest to the minister that he refer the bill to one of the committees. He could get a report back in the course of a few days and we would then be sure that the bill is in the best possible form. I am not saying that it is not in the right form now, but we are not in position to be sure of that. The bill is of such importance that it should be carefully scrutinized before being placed on the statute book.

Mr. IRVINE: Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, you will permit me to say by way of general observation what you would not permit me to say a moment ago because I referred to a particular part of the bill. I want to know if fishermen have been excluded from the bill because they are taken care of by the provincial compensation acts, or was it done for some other reason?

Mr. CHEVRIER: All I can tell the hon. gentleman is that fishermen are excluded. I do not know what the position is with reference to fishermen in the provinces, but I am informed that some, although not all, are covered by provincial legislation.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Will the provisions of this bill apply to seamen who operate between provincial ports, say between Vancouver and Prince Rupert? They seem to refer only to men engaged in interprovincial trade. We are anxious to see them extended to cover seamen sailing from one port in a province to another port in the same province.

Mr. CHEVRIER: British Columbia has a provincial statute covering the case referred to by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. GREEN: This is meant primarily to cover deep sea shipping?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, and also for those who are not covered by provincial statutes.

Mr. GREEN: Who are they?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Home trade and foreign-going vessels are not all covered.

Mr. IRVINE: I think we should make sure that all fishermen are covered by the laws of the various provinces where deep sea fishing takes place. There are large fishing concerns who operate drifters, and accidents occur on those ships just as they do on merchant ships.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The bill now covers only merchant seamen. If fishermen were to be covered I should think that that would be a matter for the provinces, because they leave a port in the province to fish and they come back to that port with their produce. That is clearly a matter for provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are there any diseases from which seamen might suffer and which eventually might take their lives that are not covered by the act? Generally speaking our compensation acts have given excellent results. Years ago I had some small part in helping to promote the Ontario workmen's compensation act, and I think in the main it has been found to give fair protection and compensation to the ordinary workman. However, in some cases a workman contracted a disease, possibly tuberculosis due to poor ventilation in a factory, for which he has been unable to obtain compensation. I must say in all fairness to the boards with which I have had dealings that their decisions have been based upon the advice of their medical advisers and they have always maintained that they carry out the full intent of the act.

I do not know whether tuberculosis is contracted at sea, but there may be some peculiar diseases from which seamen might suffer. I hope when the act is put into operation and a seaman cannot prove that his disability is caused by service on a ship the board will consider the question whether or not the disease might have had some connection with the service on the ship. Otherwise I presume the act takes care of all such cases as broken legs, broken arms, loss of eyesight, and other injuries that are obvious.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have found from long experience with workmen that often they have not been given fair compensation because they have not been able to prove to the satisfaction of the board that their trouble arose through their employment. Of course the board could see at once if a man's leg was off, or his arm, or if he had lost an eye.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Under the provincial acts they have to prove that the industrial disease is directly related to their employment. But I have this to say to my hon. friend, that industrial diseases are not covered by this act. There are few if any cases of industrial diseases arising in ships. The only one that has come to the attention of the officers of the department is pneumonia, and that of course is not covered by the act.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would it not be possible for them to contract some illness from working in the hold of a ship, or from coming in contact with bales from all sorts of places where there might have been disease?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I think that is a matter which might well be explored as experience is gained in the operation of the act, but thus far I am informed by my officers that few cases of industrial disease have arisen.

Mr. MacNICOL: I hope the board will be a little generous with seamen who have contracted diseases in such a manner as I have mentioned. A blind man can almost tell whether a man's leg or arm is off, but from long experience with workmen I have found that the workman does not always get the compensation he is entitled to. I have been unable to prove in various cases that the injury or illness arose through the man's employment.

Mr. HAZEN: Is pneumonia not "a fortuitous event occasioned by a natural cause"? If you will examine the cases that have come before the courts in Great Britain which have to do with compensation and which have had to interpret the words "injury by accident", you will find that in their decisions they include all kinds of diseases as injuries by accident, and you will find that one decision has led to another and that the interpretation of those words has been broadened to an extraordinary extent. Certainly you would call pneumonia a fortuitous event due to a natural cause, would you not?

If the minister will examine section 2, paragraph (a), he will find those words in it. The trouble with these boards is that they have set themselves up as judges of law and of fact, and there is no appeal from their decisions. If they make a ruling that pneumonia is not an injury due to an accident and that the man is entitled to no compensation there is no appeal from that decision to any court in which the man could get justice if they have interpreted the act wrongly. That is what I object to about section 18.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am afraid I cannot agree with my hon. friend's opinion, if it is an opinion. By no stretch of the imagination can pneumonia be considered an accident, and for that reason, while a person suffering from pneumonia could put in a claim, the claim would not be accepted under section 2(a) because pneumonia is not an accident.

Mr. HAZEN: Unfortunately I have not the British decisions here, but I could refer the minister to case after case decided by the British courts which would make him change his opinion.

Mr. IRVINE: I think the hon. member for St. John-Albert has made a very good point. A man who is working in the hold of a ship may get overheated and then step out into the open air and get chilled and catch pneumonia. That is just as much an accident as breaking a leg.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I point out that there is a misprint in section 2(a). The word "seamen" should be "seaman".

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain the last part of the definition of seaman? Apparently the act is intended to cover a seaman who is engaged on a ship that is registered in Canada or that is under charter to a Canadian. But there is also this further provision that "seaman" includes:

> a seaman engaged in Canada and employed on a ship that is registered outside of Canada and operated by a person resident in Canada.

Just what type of case is that meant to cover?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Is my hon. friend reading from (i)(ii).

Mr. GREEN: I was reading from the end of paragraph (ii).

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is to enable the governor in council to include a seaman engaged in Canada and employed on a ship registered outside of Canada but operated by a person resident in Canada or having his principal place of business here when the ship is so engaged. The Minister of Justice brings to my mind, for instance, a C.P.R. boat operating out of Liverpool. This would enable the governor in council to cover such a case as that.

Mr. BENTLEY: Following up the question raised by two other hon. gentlemen, I wonder if the Minister of Justice would care to give an opinion of the words in the definition section 2(a), which says "and a fortuitous event occasioned by a physical or natural cause".

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have not given special consideration to the terms of the definition. But so far workmen's compensation acts have not provided for health insurance. They have provided for insurance against accidents, but not health insurance. That is a matter to be determined not by boards or by courts but by the lawmaker. Before 1908 there was no workmen's compensation in my own province unless there was negligence attributable to the employer. The legislature thought that there were risks incidental to industry which should be borne by industry, whether there was negligence or not, and enacted legislation to that effect. It may be that we shall come to the point where the employer will insure the health of his employees or be made to insure their health, but the legislature has not gone that far yet.

Mr. GREEN: They do with respect to certain industrial diseases, such as silicosis.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There are industrial diseases which are classified as being an incidence of the industry and in consequence as being a proper cost of the industry. The ordinary ailments, to which a man employed in industry is no more exposed than his fellow man who for instance is a member of parliament, have not yet been covered by employer's liability, and that is something which will require to be dealt with by the law maker, if it is to be done.

Section agreed to.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

On section 2—Interpretation.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is a misprint in line 9, section 2, subsection (i) of the bill. The word "trace" should read "trade".

Mr. HAZEN: Before the committee rose for lunch there was some discussion as to whether or not a seaman who suffered from a disease could claim compensation under this bill. If I understood him correctly, the Minister of Transport said that a seaman who developed pneumonia could not obtain compensation; that under the bill it was not an injury by accident. He said that the board had taken that view of it when they ruled under the order in council. The Minister of Justice said—I think he used the words "industrial disease"—that if a seaman suffered from a disease he could not claim compensation under this bill because it was not injury by accident. I submit that the British courts have given a broad interpretation to the words "injury by accident"; and if under all circumstances the board which has been set up has ruled in the past that a seaman who contracts pneumonia is not entitled to compensation, the board is wrong. I say that the cases have gone far in that regard. I have not had time to go through the indices and examine all the cases, but I shall refer to one which was decided by one of the British courts which defined injury by accident. It is the case of Raeburn v. Lochgelly Iron and Coal Company Limited, which was decided in the year 1926. I propose to read first the headlines.

Mr. CHEVRIER: What is the citation?

Mr. HAZEN: I am reading from volume 20, Butterworths' Workmen's Compensation Cases, at page 637. I do not wish to take up too much of the time of the committee, but I am citing this case for the benefit of the board which will be set up, because it seems to me that the board may have misdirected itself if in the past it has held in all cases pneumonia cannot be an injury by accident. The head note of the case reads as follows:

> A workman was employed for some years before his death as a fireman in a particular section of a pit in his employer's colliery. He became ill on March 3, 1925, while in charge of men removing plant from that section, and died on March 12 following. The cause of death was a form of infective jaundice, known as spirochaetosis icterohaemorrhagica.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It certainly would be a horrible accident to became afflicted with all that.

Mr. HAZEN: I continue:

> It was proved in evidence, on a claim by his widow for compensation, that this form of infection is hardly known to occur in this country except in coal-workings, that it is then due to infected rats in the workings, and that micro-organisms causing the disease were found in rats caught after the workman's death in the section in which he had been working. From these facts the Sheriff-Substitute drew the inference that, although the manner in which the micro-organisms were transferred was not capable of proof, they were transferred to the workman from infected rats in the colliery. He therefore held that the workman died as a result of injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, the infection not being incidental to his employment, and awarded compensation.

The employers appealed from that decision, but it was held that the arbitrator was entitled to hold that the infection which produced the disease was an accident and that the disease itself was an injury by accident, within the meaning of the act. I cite that case to show how far the courts have gone in interpreting the words "injury by accident". In dealing with the facts in his judgment on appeal the Lord President said:

> The real difficulty lies behind: Was the infectious disease which culminated in the workman's death an "injury by accident" within the meaning of the act? It is no longer possible to dispose of this question in the negative on the ground (in itself unanswerable) that, in the ordinary use of language, nobody would describe a fatal disease—whether infectious or not—as an "injury by accident," or even as an "accident" at all. The situation must be accepted that, by a series of decisions, in which the turning-point was definitely reached by the decision of the House of Lords in Brintons, Ltd. v. Turvey (1905) A.C. 230; 7 W.C.C.I., an infectious disease (not classed as an "industrial disease") may be "an injury by accident" within the meaning of the act.

If in the past under the order in council constituting the board it has ruled that a seaman who suffers from pneumonia cannot get compensation under the order in council which is now embodied in the bill, they may have made a wrong ruling. It must all depend on the facts of the case. Hon. members will find other decisions in the English courts; I have not had time to look them all up. When a man working in a pit, for instance, gets overheated and afterwards contracts a disease and dies from it, I think he is entitled to compensation, because that disease was injury by accident. I could go on and cite other cases but I do not propose to do so. I cite this one merely because I believe that the board may have misdirected itself if it held that in the case of pneumonia a seaman was not entitled to compensation. If it has misdirected itself I hope it will not do so in the future.

That raises another point. The board is supposed to get all the facts and decide the question on the facts, but when it comes to a question of law what experience have they to decide questions of law? They may decide them rightly or wrongly. In the case of a question of law I say that a seaman should have the right to appeal from the board's decision; if he feels that he is aggrieved he should have the right of appeal to one of the courts of the land.

Mr. MacINNIS: I was not here this morning because I was engaged in other work and therefore I have not had an opportunity to say anything on this important bill. Merchant seamen for too long have been unprotected against injury. Some little time ago I had occasion to call to the attention of the minister the case of a young man of perfect physique who was injured in an accident upon a ship, in which he completely lost the use of his lower limbs. Though both the department of pensions and national health, as it was at that time, and the Department of Transport were very sympathetic in considering the representations I made, they were unable to obtain any permanent compensation in this case. So if only it will provide for cases of that kind I welcome this bill.

The point raised by the hon. member for St. John-Albert is important, but I doubt if it would be of any great value to the seamen if the employer has the same opportunity of taking the case to court when he is not satisfied. Then it would become a question, as I think it was before we had compensation acts, as to who has the longest purse. I believe representatives of labour and trade unionists generally have over the years, to my own knowledge as far as British Columbia is concerned, objected to having compensation cases reviewed by the courts. Even though they might be dissatisfied with board decisions, they would much rather have the cases dealt with by a board than have the act provide that they might be referred to the courts. But of course a great deal will depend upon how the board is constituted. In the provinces I believe one member represents the employers, another represents labour and the third member is the chairman, who is supposed to be impartial. We have not yet reached the section setting up the board—it is the next section—but as I read it no provision is made for setting up a board of that kind. Of course what I am saying now is being said under the handicap of not having been here when the Minister of Transport spoke on the bill, but I would much rather have a board constituted as provincial boards are than have the seamen making appeals to the courts. I think what we should aim to do in this matter is to get a square deal for those concerned by keeping these cases out of court, and we should give that very serious consideration.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 3—Merchant seamen compensation board.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This is the section to which I made reference, which provides for the setting up of a compensation board. The total number of cases in the year 1945-46 was some 177, and the minister pointed out that up to date the board had not been an expensive body because it was composed of officials of the various departments, together with a representative of the seamen. But that does not answer this question at all. This is a comprehensive section. Looking over the order in council I see that parliament is being asked to copy it almost in its entirety. I say "almost in its entirety"; the bill is a photographic copy, with the exception of section 3. At present the board which has been looking after these duties under this order in council is set up in this way:

—shall be a board to be known as the merchant seamen compensation board consisting of three members, namely, a chairman, a vice-chairman and a third member who shall be appointed by the minister, and who shall hold office during pleasure and serve without remuneration.

That is the wording of the order in council now. My hon. friend endeavoured to answer my objection to the setting up of another board by saying: Well, we are going to follow the same method that we have followed heretofore under the order in council. That is not what parliament is being asked to do. Parliament is being asked to pass section 3, subsection 4 of which reads:

A member of the board holds office during pleasure and shall be paid such salary as the governor in council may fix.

Now that is has been pointed out to the minister I am sure he will see the force of the argument, because here we are being asked to give the governor in council power to set up just another board. The governor in council can fix the salary at whatever they wish, and the person appointed holds office during pleasure. As a matter of fact, in regard to the setting up of boards and making the crown all powerful in this way I was reading something not long ago that makes it seem that history does repeat itself. I find that in the first thirty years of the reign of George III a resolution was introduced into the British House of Commons reading:

The power of the crown has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished.

That was about 1790. It was the famous resolution introduced by Dunning, of which I am sure the minister has heard. The only change necessary now would be to substitute "the executive" for "the crown" and that resolution could be introduced in this house; and with the support it would receive on the other side, being assured of the support of this side of the house, certainly that resolution would be passed to-day by this parliament. In view of the fact that it is not intended to set up a board to provide cushy jobs paying handsome salaries; since it is the intention to follow the procedure now being followed under the order in council, I suggest that subsection 4 of section 3 might be changed. I do not see why there should be this departure from an otherwise photographic copy of the order in council. It might be made to read: "A member of the board holds office during pleasure and shall serve without remuneration." Having regard to the fact that these three men were willing to serve last year, and that apparently they have expressed their willingness for the future, so there is no possibility of this act being used to bring about the appointment of a full board, I hope the minister will accept my suggestion. If he does not, I intend to have something more to say on it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am sorry I cannot accept the suggestion made by the hon. member for Lake Centre, and that for more than one reason. In the first place, while it is true that the board has been functioning without remuneration since the order in council has been in effect, and while I feel the board will operate for some time without remuneration, there may come a time when it will be necessary to expand the operations of the board, and appoint as members persons outside the government service. When that time should come—if it comes—I do not believe the house would expect anyone outside the government service to act as a member of the board without remuneration. That is the reason why subsection 3(4) as it stands to-day is inserted. Again, if my hon. friend's suggestion were accepted, his amendment would restrict membership on the board to government officials only.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister has certainly answered the arguments he used in answer to me this morning. I am emphasizing what I said this morning, that we are being asked to give the governor in council power to appoint another board, with the payment of high salaries. The minister said this morning that it was intended this board should be composed of officials, together with a member from the seamen's organization, and that it was not intended that large salaries would be paid. The minister now says that is the intention for the time being, but within a year or so the government may decide that two or three persons need a job. By this measure we shall have created the machinery permitting their appointment, at whatever salary the governor in council may determine. In view of the fact that it handles no more than one case every other day I see no reason why we should make the provision here suggested. I have no desire to prevent the calling in of anyone under an arrangement whereby he shall receive a fair allowance for his time. But there is a great difference between that and the payment of a salary. I can see no reason why there should not be a per diem allowance to cover the operations of this board. I therefore move:

That all the words after the word "shall" in line 27 be deleted, and the words "serve without salary" be substituted therefor.

Mr. McMASTER: It seems to me that in view of the small number of cases involved, this is merely a departmental matter and could be done by one or two stenographers who would write letters to Vancouver, Halifax or some other point. It will be simply a matter of carrying out the terms of the act, and I suggest that those terms should be so clear that anyone might become entitled to the benefits simply by proving an injury in the course of his duties. Only rarely would anyone's time be taken up in deciding intricate points of law or fact. The act might be better administered regionally. Sailors living in British Columbia and sailing from British Columbia ports could deal through a provincial board at Vancouver, and those operating from Ontario, on the great lakes, could come under the Ontario compensation act. I believe that under that act sailors from Ontario who travel on steamships are covered, although I do not know to what extent it has been used. In Quebec and the maritime provinces, the same procedure could be followed, utilizing the compensation acts of each of the provinces. I believe that at the most one departmental head would be sufficient, and that three are unnecessary. If there are three, they should serve without remuneration.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I should like to deal with the objections raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre, and with his amendment. If his amendment were accepted, section 3 (4) would read:

A member of the board holds office during pleasure and shall serve without salary.

The effect of the amendment, if accepted, would be the very thing I am sure my hon. friend would not wish to have. It would restrict membership on the board to men already in the government service, and would prevent the government or the department from giving representation to labour or to other groups of society if at some time in the future it should be decided to extend the operations of the board. I believe I must give my hon. friend the benefit of the doubt by stating that I do not think he had that in mind when he offered his amendment.

My hon. friend has complained about expenditures by the government, but if he will look at section 49 of the bill he will see that all necessary costs of administration of the act, including salaries, expenses, fees and commissions, are chargeable against the various employers, apportioned on a basis to be determined by the board. If in future the government decides to pay salaries to the members of this board, that cost will be apportioned among the employers in the same way as other costs are. It strikes me that for this reason it would not be advisable to accept the hon. member's amendment.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not greatly concerned with saving the country the expense that would be involved in the payment of salaries to the members of this board, because I have come to the conclusion, from my experience in this house, that it is a matter of no concern. I could tell the hon. member for Lake Centre how the salaries of the members of this board could be paid without any additional expense to the country, but I do not think he would agree with my proposal.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is it, if I may ask?

Mr. MacINNIS: The other night my hon. friend supported a substantial increase in the remuneration of persons who are already getting quite high salaries, and I cannot believe that in that matter he was concerned with saving expenditures to the country—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Did my hon. friend or any member of his group vote against those increases?

Mr. MacINNIS: That is all right; the bill has not passed yet. I spoke against it, and when I speak against a measure I have the courage to vote against it. I do not know whether my hon. friend does that or not. I understand that the board as contemplated does not include a representative of the seamen.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The director of merchant seamen is already a member of this board.

Mr. MacINNIS: The director of merchant seamen is not a seaman.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Oh, yes; Captain Johnson is a seaman.

Mr. MacINNIS: Captain Johnson is the man who orders the seamen around. I know Captain Johnson, and I do not think any seaman would say that he necessarily can represent the seamen. If they had an opportunity of saying that they were satisfied to have Captain Johnson represent them, it would be all right. Subsection 1 reads:

There shall be a board to be known as the merchant seamen compensation board—

I understand that there is not to be a merchant seaman on that board. I submit that there should be a representative of the merchant seamen, a representative of the employers and then a third representative to be appointed by the government, although the government really makes all the appointments. I do not believe the administration of this act will be satisfactory to those who are to receive compensation under it unless they feel assured that each case will be considered sympathetically in view of all the factors involved. If the proposal of the hon. member for High Park were feasible it might be a better way of administering the act, but I doubt if it can be done in that way and I am not advocating it. In order to give satisfaction to the merchant seamen they should be represented on the board.

Mr. MacNICOL: I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver East, because if this board which is to be set up to deal with injuries or accidents to merchant seamen is to work properly there should be a practical merchant seaman on the board. One of the members of the provincial workmen's compensation board is a practical working man, and that has been the case since the board was first set up.

Amendment (Mr. Diefenbaker) negatived.

Mr. HAZEN: How many people are employed by the present board?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Apart from members of the government employees compensation division of the Department of Transport there is one man employed now in connection with the seamen's regulations.

Mr. MacNICOL: If a board is set up later will it have the right to select its own personnel?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not in favour of that at all. I do not believe in allowing boards to name their employees and fix the remuneration.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is covered by subsection 9.

Mr. MacNICOL: I know this is going to pass, but I am opposed to it.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—When compensation not payable.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have a slight amendment to propose to section 4, as follows:

Amend clause 4, paragraph (b), page 3, by striking out the words "or any other order in council that provides similar benefits" in lines 9 and 10, and substituting therefor the following "or any statute or law that provides similar benefits."

I will ask the Secretary of State to move this amendment.

Mr. MARTIN: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MacNICOL: Paragraph (a) reads:

(a) where a seaman or his dependents are entitled to claim compensation under the Government Employees Compensation Act or under any provincial workmen's compensation law;

I should like to know where this dual control comes in under the provincial and federal laws.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is no dual control. If a seaman is entitled to claim compensation under the laws of, say, British Columbia, Nova Scotia or Quebec, for an accident happening in a province, he could not claim under this act. If an accident happened within the province, he must claim under provincial enactments, but he cannot claim under both.

Mr. MacNICOL: I understand that, but where would the accident have to occur to give him the right to claim under the provincial or the dominion act?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It might occur on a ship sailing from Vancouver to Victoria, or from Halifax to Saint John.

Mr. MacNICOL: If a seaman met with an accident on a ship going from Vancouver to Victoria I should think that the federal law would apply; but if the accident occurred ashore, say on the dock in the performance of his duties, the provincial law would apply.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is the other way round. The seaman would be entitled to compensation under the British Columbia Act if the injury occurred while on the ship going from Vancouver to Victoria.

Mr. BROOKS: Suppose there were a difference between the provincial rates and the rates under this act?

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the accident occurs under provincial jurisdiction he comes under the provincial act. He has no choice.

Mr. HAZEN: Would a ship owner have to contribute to the provincial board and also take out insurance to cover himself under this act? Are there any provinces which already provide workmen's compensation for seamen?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The answer to the first question is yes, there may be cases where an employer would have to take out insurance under both acts. In reply to the second question, there are provinces which already provide under workmen's compensation acts for compensation in case of accidents to seamen. British Columbia is one, Nova Scotia is another, Ontario and Quebec are still others.

Mr. HAZEN: What seamen are entitled to claim compensation under the government employees compensation act?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Those are employees of various departments, such as the departments of Transport and Public Works.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not think the seaman has the choice of which act he comes under. The Ontario act, as I recall it, does not provide for contributions from the steamship companies, but the compensation board fixes the amount which the steamship company has to pay. If the seaman had the right of choice, he would not know which jurisdiction would treat him best. My experience with the Ontario workmen's compensation board is that a workman does not know just what he is going to get. He may get so much a month, or he may be given a lump sum. Under this clause he has to come under the Ontario workmen's compensation board.

Mr. CHEVRIER: My hon. friend is right. If the accident occurs within the jurisdiction of the province he has no choice. The application must be made to the workmen's compensation board of the province. But when the accident occurs in foreign waters or in jurisdiction outside that of the province, application is made to the board sought to be set up under this act.

Mr. GRAYDON: Extra-provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Right.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: How many seamen will come under the provisions of this act?

Mr. CHEVRIER: At the peak of war operations the number of seamen amounted to about 10,000. I should think that number is down considerably now. If my memory serves me, the last figure I saw was in the neighbourhood of 6,500.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—If compensation may be claimed under law of foreign country.

Mr. REID: In line 16 should not "if such election is not made and notice given" read "if such election is not made and no notice given"?

Mr. McMASTER: Can the minister conceive of any set of circumstances in which an election would have to be made?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, if the seaman is working on a ship where compensation is payable under the laws of any foreign country.

Mr. McMASTER: Would he be entitled to come under this act if working for a foreign employer?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, and he would have to give notice of election. In reply to the hon. member for New Westminster, perhaps he is right. I cannot say offhand. I shall have to look into it.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Application of act.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: A moment ago the minister said that this act would not apply in any case in which the workmen's compensation act of the province applied. But this section says:

This act applies to accidents happening within or without Canada.

The hon. member for High Park referred to the fact that steamship companies do in fact come under the provisions of the workmen's compensation act of the province. There may be an explanation of the apparent overlapping of two jurisdictions. Perhaps the minister will also say whether he is in a position now to give the committee the opinion of the solicitors of the Department of Justice as to whether it is within the power of the dominion parliament to pass this measure.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am getting the opinion from the justice department and hope to table it, with the consent of the house, before the bill is read a second time. With reference to the exact meaning of section 6, which says:

This act applies to accidents happening within or without Canada—

—we cover cases under this act which the province does not cover. In other words if they are not covered by provincial jurisdiction, we cover them under this act.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Compensation, how paid.

Mr. MacNICOL: Paragraph (a) reads:

(a) does not disable the seaman for a period of at least seven days—

I have known of accidents that disabled a workman for four or five days, and then the workman would return to work so that his employer would not have an opportunity to complain. Some time later the disability would return and disable him. In a case of the kind what redress would the seaman have if he had returned to work within five or six days after the accident? Would he be debarred from applying for compensation because he had returned to work after five or six days?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I believe there is a section covering the point and I will try to find it.

Mr. McMASTER: I was impressed by what was said by the hon. member for St. John-Albert with reference to the use of the word "accident". Cases have come before the courts in which two automobiles have been in collision, and the courts have decided that neither party is liable because it was an accident. "Accident" has two meanings. If the word "injury" were used instead of "accident", or if you used the two words, it would overcome any objection taken by any body constituted under this act, or by anyone else, that it is only an injury and not an accident. I realize that if this section is amended, many other sections will have to be amended also. An accident is something that no one can help, and perhaps we are insuring everyone regardless of whether injury is sustained through the individual's fault or otherwise. I have often thought that the word "accident" is a dangerous one. I suggest it should be injury. The question should be whether the man suffered injury. If that were the provision, the question of a man being injured by something that was not in the nature of external force would leave the matter open to be decided by the board. If he could prove conclusively that although he had not been struck by an external force he had acquired some disease as a direct result of his work, the position would be made clear. I can understand it would open the door to a man maintaining that any disease had been caused by his work when in point of fact it might not have been. I suggest that injury would be a better word, even if it has to be used in conjunction with the word accident.

Section agreed to.

Sections 8 to 17 inclusive agreed to.

On section 18—Decisions final.

Mr. HAZEN: I feel strongly that under this act if a seaman has not the right to appeal to a court on a question of law there will be cases in which he will not get justice. I have in mind certain cases under the workmen's compensation act. I am thinking particularly of a girl who worked a machine by means of a lever. In the course of her work she injured her back. Perhaps some other girl working that lever would not have been injured, but this girl was, and it was necessary for her to have a surgical operation. The board said: "Yes; it is true she injured her back, but she is not entitled to compensation because there was no accident". Under the wording of the act there must be injury by accident. These people said: "We admit you had an injury and hurt your back, but you did not suffer an accident and therefore you are not entitled to compensation". If there were no appeal under this act—there happened to be an appeal in the case I referred to—so far as any question of law was concerned, the person who suffered might not have obtained justice. In the case I have mentioned, that girl could have obtained no compensation, and undoubtedly there will be cases under this act in which the board may make wrong legal decisions. This morning it was suggested that if a seaman got pneumonia he could not be entitled to compensation under this act. I submit there are cases under certain circumstances in which, if the word "injury" were used, the person affected would be entitled to compensation; and yet, if the board holds that he is not entitled to compensation, he can obtain none and he has no appeal. I feel strongly that he should have an appeal on questions of law, and therefore I am going to move that the words "law or" in the second line of section 18 be deleted, so that the section will read:

The decisions and findings of the board upon all questions of fact are final and conclusive.

Mr. MacNICOL: I concur in what the hon. member for St. John-Albert has said. I have had experience of quite a number of cases that would come under section 18. Not so long ago someone came to see me, as many workmen do in Toronto. This person was working in a shell factory which was turning out small shells, perhaps a foot long and three inches in diameter. I do not know how much they would weigh, but one of these shells fell on the worker's foot from the height of the lathe. The chairman knows how high that would be. It injured the foot and the worker was incapacitated for a long time. The doctors of the board, after the board had given this workman compensation for two or three months, turned the claim down flat. I have had in mind for some time bringing this matter to the attention of the public through some action that I propose through the medium of the Department of Labour. I have been seriously thinking of proposing that an act be passed enabling a workman to appeal from a decision of the board. There is no appeal to-day, so that when the board issues an order it is final and the workman has no more chance. I have come across several cases which have caused me to feel strongly on this point, because I feel that the workman should be given an opportunity to appeal from the decision of the board. I do not know to what body he would appeal—I am not a lawyer—but I suggest that, not the board, but a court should have the final say in case of a dispute. I want to back up what the hon. member for St. John-Albert has said.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: If the amendment is adopted does it leave it open to the employer as well as the employee to appeal?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Of course it does, and that is why I object to the amendment proposed by the member for St. John-Albert.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I am opposed to this amendment. I was in the legislature of British Columbia and had occasion to deal with hundreds of compensation cases in the lumbering industry, and I have heard a similar proposal discussed by labour organizations and by many individuals, some even who had received unfavourable decisions from boards. I must say, Mr. Chairman, my experience has shown me that there is general opposition from organized labour and from working people themselves to the principles enunciated in the amendment. In my opinion we would be wise to follow the practice of provincial boards.

Mr. McMASTER: I believe that wherever possible there should be one appeal, and that appeal should be to a court which would be reasonably accessible in each province. In Ontario in many cases the workmen's compensation board have given inadequate compensation. I shall give one example. Some years ago a man who had come from Nova Scotia and was working in a mine lost the partial use of one hand. The compensation board paid him $800, and he had to return to Nova Scotia. He could no longer be a miner; he had to return to the place whence he had come, with the opportunity of earning the money which he had previously earned absolutely gone. The sum of $800 would not go very far in repaying him for the loss of the use of his hand, as he had to make his living out of labour.

I should like to mention something which I overlooked. Suppose a man who is working on a ship which fishes for tuna in the southern Pacific leaves Vancouver on the ship, would he be a fisherman or a sailor? If he was a fisherman and was injured—and he would have good opportunity of getting injured on one of these ships—he would be entirely outside the act. I overlooked that example when the proper section was under discussion. I believe there should be one appeal, and I am quite willing to admit that it should be the appeal of the workman.

In Ontario the workmen's compensation board have a large fund. I would hate to tell how much has been gathered together. It is true that the employers are interested only in keeping down the claims so that they will not have a bigger assessment made against them. It is a sort of indirect way of protecting themselves. For some reason or other the board has not been particularly liberal with the workers. For that reason there should be one appeal.

Mr. CHEVRIER: A moment ago the hon. member for Davenport asked a question arising out of a portion of section 7, the disability section. The answer to that question is to be found in subsection 4 of section 24. I believe the hon. member for High Park is in favour of an appeal to a higher court, as is the hon. member for St. John-Albert, who moved the amendment. The answer to the questions can well be found in those who have had experience over the years in handling compensation cases. Both hon. gentlemen, who are lawyers, will agree with me that Ontario, more particularly, has gained a wide field of experience in that regard. The legislature of that province has seen fit not to include in the act a section giving the workmen, or for that matter the employer, the right of appeal. I have the workmen's compensation act of Ontario before me, and the language is as strong as, if not stronger than, the language used in the bill now before the committee. I think we would be well advised to take advantage of the experience gained by that province. In British Columbia there is no appeal from the findings of the board; there is no appeal in Quebec. So far as the question of fact is concerned there is no appeal in New Brunswick. I am not too sure whether I understood my hon. friend aright this morning, but perhaps he did say that that had been amended and that there was now no appeal in his own province of New Brunswick, either on a question of law or on a question of fact. I think we would be well advised to follow the practice in these provinces, because in some instances, at least under the Government Employees' Compensation Act, we have to work through the provinces. I can think of some cases in which under that act the applications are made directly to the provincial boards and through the Department of Transport, handled by us but using the provincial board as an agency for the adjudication of these cases. I think we would be ill advised to change the section, particularly in view of the experience and practice over the years as I have indicated.

Mr. HAZEN: No people have had greater experience in workmen's compensation matters than the people of the United Kingdom, and there they have the right to appeal. I should like to cite another British case. A man who was working sorting wool in a factory contracted a disease in the eye which blinded him. The wording of the act is "injury by accident." The board held that he was blinded while he was working in the plant, but they said that it was not injury by accident. The argument was that a bacillus which is found in wool had entered his eye and blinded him. The board said that that might be so, but it was not an injury by accident, and they so ruled. Under the British laws the workman had an opportunity to appeal and he did so. The case went to the House of Lords, they found that the man had suffered an injury by accident and was entitled to compensation. When you set up boards of this kind you gave them arbitrary powers and you take away from the people the right to appeal to the courts where justice is administered. If you do that you are doing a great disservice to them, and it does not make any difference to me whether the recommendation comes from a labour union or anybody else. The courts are set up to do justice, and if a man feels that he has not had justice done to him he should have the right to appeal to the courts.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am well aware that labour unions are opposed to an appeal in the case of an injury to a workman. The same is true of industry, but I am thinking of the man who gets nothing. Where is he to get his chance? I have a case in mind, but I will not state in which province it happened because I am not in conflict with any workmen's compensation board. The man of whom I am thinking worked in a foundry, under pitched windows with nothing between him and the windows. It was a very cold room, and he caught what turned out to be the cause of his death. He could not prove it. I went to see him just before he died. The board turned him down flat. In my judgment his death was the direct result of the conditions under which he had to work. He had no appeal. I am not finding any fault with any board. I quite agree that it would never do to allow workmen to have to face high-priced lawyers interested in the employers. If there was some place else to which they could go I do believe the workmen should have the right to go there. If this man of whom I speak had had a chance he might have obtained redress because the workmen's compensation board turned him down flat. When that is done a workman has no further chance.

Mr. McMASTER: I should like the minister to believe that what I am giving is the experience in Ontario. The people of whom I am thinking are the workmen, not the employers. This matter has not been lying dormant, by any means. It has been brought up in the legislature of Ontario, and very strong protests have been made in regard to it. It just happens they have not got around to amending the act, though I do not know why. There are many acts which need amendment, and this is one of them. I suggest that for the benefit of the worker one appeal should be allowed, and that to some judge, because I suggest that a judge would have a greater sense of his responsibilities than would most of the men who might be appointed to workmen's compensation boards, and we can trust a judge to do the right thing. There may not be many appeals, but there would be enough to satisfy the people, and perhaps redress some of the injustices.

Mr. WARREN: Who is going to pay the costs of the appeal?

Mr. McMASTER: That would be left to the judge. If the workman should win, the compensation board would pay the costs. If the workman lost, he would pay them. I would not suggest that every case should be appealed, but only the bad ones. If an appellant had a good case and was willing to risk the money it would cost him, he should be allowed to go to a high court judge.

Mr. WARREN: I suggest that many labourers would lose a large part of their benefits if they were in a position to appeal their cases. I have no doubt it would be beneficial to the legal profession, but I doubt whether in the long run it would be of much benefit to the labouring man. I think in perhaps ninety-nine per cent of the cases the judgments of the compensation board are fair and just, and I do not think a labouring man would benefit by being permitted to appeal to the courts.

Mr. HAZEN: May I say just a word on the question of costs? It may cost something, though I have never found that a lawyer who had a workman as a client charged him a great deal.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HAZEN: But that is not the point I am making, whether it would cost much or little. I want to refer to the case of Brintons Limited v. Turvey, which was decided in the British House of Lords in 1905. It must have cost something to take that case to the House of Lords, but it entirely changed the law as to the rights of workmen under the compensation act. If it had not been for that case and the decision of the House of Lords at that time, the workmen never would have obtained what they now receive under the workmen's compensation acts in Great Britain, and many other parts of the empire. That was the governing case, decided in 1905, and as a result for the last forty years workmen have been getting what they never got before. I should like to read the brief note on that case, to give hon. members a better idea of what it was about. It is taken from The English and Empire Digest, and reads:

> While a workman was employed sorting wool in a factory a bacillus, according to the medical evidence, passed from the wool to the eye of the workman, and infected him with anthrax of which he died: Held: this was a case of "injury by accident" within the meaning of Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

That changed the whole law. From that time on a workman was able to get compensation if in the course of his employment he contracted a disease through a bacillus. Surely if it did cost something to establish that principle, it was well worth it. If it had not been for that particular case; if there had not been the right of appeal, that board would be still holding that if a workman contracted a disease while at work he would not be entitled to any compensation at all.

Mr. MacNICOL: I quite agree with the statement that in the very great majority of cases the workmen's compensation boards give complete satisfaction. I do not agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for Renfrew North that satisfaction is given in ninety-nine per cent of the cases. I have come in contact with the odd one, like the case I mentioned of the workman who had the misfortune to have a shell fall on his foot, and he did not get satisfaction. I am not finding fault with the boards; in the main they have done an eminently satisfactory job, but I cannot get clear in my mind where the poor fellow who is entitled to compensation and is turned down can appeal in order to get satisfaction. I think that is a matter worthy of consideration.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: This section provides that decisions and findings are to be conclusive as well as final. Does that mean any case which has been turned down by the board cannot be resubmitted and new evidence given, and is there any limit to the number of times that may be done?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No, there is not. I intended to say something on that when I replied to one other hon. gentleman. While the bill as now framed does not cover the question of an appeal, still the case can be reviewed many times. I know that in Ontario I personally have had cases reviewed as often as four and five times, when I was able to show additional circumstances surrounding a case.

Mr. GRANT: Did you charge them much?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Too little. I believe this board will take the same view.

Mr. McMASTER: Did the workmen's compensation board hear you as a solicitor?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Oh, no; the workmen's compensation board did not hear me as a solicitor, but I made representations in writing, by affidavit and using medical evidence that I was able to submit, and I was always accorded a hearing.

Mr. McMASTER: You did not put your name on the documents as a solicitor, did you? That used to be considered a detriment to a claimant's chances.

Mr. HAZEN: How could you put in a claim other than as a solicitor? Not as a politician!

Mr. WARREN: I think that answers the hon. member for Davenport; there is a form of appeal. If a man feels he has not obtained justice he can go to his minister or his doctor or a friendly lawyer acting outside of his professional capacity, and have the case reviewed. I have no doubt the hon. member for Davenport has often had these matters reviewed and adjusted. I know I have, both as a member of the Ontario legislature and as a member of this parliament. I believe the workmen's compensation board is always ready to give consideration to any letter written on behalf of any client, when it is written in a friendly spirit, giving them all particulars. They are always ready to review a matter and see that justice is done.

Amendment (Mr. Hazen) negatived on division.

Section 19 agreed to.

On section 20—Order enforced as a judgment of the court.

Mr. McMASTER: As I see it, this section is one of the weaknesses of the bill. I understand this board will have no funds of its own, but will merely make an order that the employer pay the money.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. McMASTER: I should think that substantial numbers of workers covered by the Ontario compensation act would be working for the railway companies and possibly the steamship companies, and there would be certain numbers of seamen working either with small companies or for individuals with no great financial backing. The only protection for a seaman who was injured while working for one of these smaller employers would be through the bond, to which the minister has referred. If a bond were not given and a seaman were injured I assume that he would have a valid claim for the protection this measure affords. Since no funds are in the hands of the board, where would a workman receive his protection if he were working for a financially unstable employer? We must face the fact that the widow of a disabled seaman might live for some considerable time, and under conditions which would not disentitle her because of the conditions set out in the bill.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the employer refuses to insure, then under one of the sections mentioned a minute ago the ship is stopped by the customs officer.

Mr. McMASTER: Let us suppose it is not stopped. Could it not easily happen that a ship would sail without the bond being given, and an employee suffer injury in the course of his duties.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I suppose it could happen.

Mr. McMASTER: It is more likely to happen in that event than in the other cases where insurance has been placed.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I should not think so, because the experience of the board thus far has been that there are few if any cases of that kind. The moment these regulations were put into force by order in council, employers were advised and were referred particularly to the clauses which stated that insurance had to be taken out. I know of no case in which an employer has refused to take out insurance.

Mr. McMASTER: If it happens, what will be the protection for the seaman who has been injured?

Mr. CHEVRIER: He may still take action against the employer, the owner of the ship.

Mr. McMASTER: Can he come under this measure as it is framed? I thought that the protection of taking action by the employer was taken away a minute ago by a previous section of the bill.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed the board would issue a judgment under the act. It would be registered and then executed against the employer.

Sections 21, 22 and 23 agreed to.

On section 24—When compensation not payable.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: In paragraph (a) it is stated that notice of the accident is given as soon as practicable. How would that be construed?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I think the hon. member need have no worry about the construction which might be placed upon the word "practicable", because of what is contained in subsection 4, where it is set out that failure to give the prescribed notice or to make such claim or any defect or inaccuracy in a notice shall not bar the right to compensation.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Then the same paragraph states it must be given before the seaman has voluntarily left the employment in which he was injured. If an employee were seriously injured to-day, and if to-morrow his organization went on strike, would it be construed that he had voluntarily left employment, with the result that his case would be prejudiced?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not think it would be construed in that way.

Section agreed to.

On section 25—Employer to give notice.

Mr. MacNICOL: This section provides that:

> Every employer shall, unless relieved by order of the board, within sixty days after the happening of an accident to a seaman in his employment by which the seaman is disabled from performing his duties or which necessitates medical aid, notify the board in writing—

And so on. In a case of the kind I mentioned a minute ago, where the workman would be off for only about six days, would not the employer have to notify the board? I think the employer should give notification of all accidents, whether or not compensation is claimed.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed that under the board's order the employer would not be required to notify the board if there has been injury necessitating a lay-off for anything less than seven days.

Mr. MacNICOL: There is no point in moving an amendment, but I believe every employer should be compelled to give notice, even if the employee is laid off for only three or four days.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. member realizes of course that if the employee is out of work because of injury or accident for more than seven days, even though that lay-off is for only eight days, the employee would recover for the full eight days.

Section agreed to.

Sections 26 to 43 inclusive agreed to.

On section 44—Seaman entitled to medical aid, etc.

Mr. FRASER: Would this include dentures?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, that is stipulated.

Section agreed to.

Sections 45 and 46 agreed to.

On section 47—Board may make rules, orders and by-laws.

Mr. GREEN: Should there not be a provision in this section for laying regulations before parliament?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed it is not done in other cases, although I would have no objection to doing so. I do not think however that any hon. member has ever had difficulty in obtaining them from time to time. There is also involved the question of placing on the table of the house orders for payments of compensation.

Mr. GREEN: Why?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Because it is done by virtue of the section. That is a matter of personal or private nature, and I do not think the hon. member would want that information.

Mr. GREEN: No one would want that. But the board is given power to make rules which, I presume, are the same as the regulations to which most acts refer. All I am suggesting is that rules made by the board which would be of general interest to those of us who have seamen in our constituencies should be made available by having them laid on the table. Otherwise one would not know what the rules are. It seems to me that is a safe plan to follow in measures of this type. Regulations should be laid on the table of the house.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. member would have no difficulty in getting them from us. There might be a time when parliament would not be sitting and when regulations would be passed, in which case the hon. member would get them more quickly than he would if they were laid on the table of the house.

Mr. GREEN: If the minister will check the other acts, such as the veterans allowances act and the Veterans Land Act, he will find that provision is made for laying the regulations on the table within a certain time after the house sits, if it does not happen to be sitting at the time the regulations are passed.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I shall be glad to do that.

Section agreed to.

Section 48 agreed to.

On section 49—Costs chargeable against employers.

Mr. MacNICOL: These costs might be very heavy on an individual employer, but if he were insured the insurance company would have to pay them?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will they all be insured?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

On the title.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I told the hon. member for Lake Centre that I would put on Hansard the opinion of the Department of Justice with reference to the jurisdiction of the federal parliament to enact legislation of this kind. It is a fairly lengthy document, and if the house will consent I will put it on Hansard without reading it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

I have to refer to your letter of March 18 enclosing for my opinion a copy of the merchant seamen compensation regulations. Your questions together with my answers thereto are as follows:

1. Question: Whether it is within the competence of the parliament of Canada to enact legislation incorporating the provisions of the merchant seamen compensation regulations, 1945?

Answer: Yes.

2. Question: If your answer to question 1 is in the affirmative, whether it is within the competence of parliament to enact legislation extending the provisions of the said regulations to cover the whole field of workmen's compensation for seamen employed on ships registered in Canada or operated by persons resident or having their principal place of business in Canada?

Answer: Yes.

3. Question: Whether it is within the competence of parliament to enact legislation extending the provisions of the said regulations to cover seamen employed on ships registered in Canada or operated by persons resident or having their principal place of business in Canada when such ships are engaged in voyages between any of the provinces of Canada or extending beyond the limits of any such province?

Answer: Yes.

4. Question: Whether the legislatures of the provinces have power to enact legislation covering the subject matter of the said regulations in whole or in respect of seamen who are residents of the province and are engaged within the province to serve on a ship registered in Canada or operated by persons resident in Canada or having their principal place of business in Canada when such ship is employed in voyages between any of the provinces or extending beyond the limits of any such province?

Answer: The privy council has held that provincial legislation relating to workmen's compensation and applicable to seamen who are residents of the province is valid. As I read the decision, it was not restricted to operations within the province, nor to ships operated by persons resident or carrying on business in Canada. The legislation, however, was general in character applicable in the case of workmen generally.

5. Question: In the event of a conflict between dominion legislation and provincial legislation covering the same subject matter as outlined in the above questions, which legislation would be inoperatitve?

Answer: Dominion legislation would prevail.

The Deputy Minister, Department of Transport Ottawa. F. P. Varcoe, Deputy Minister

Mr. CHEVRIER: I should like to revert to the question raised by the hon. member for New Westminster in connection with section 5. I think he was in order in making the suggestion which he did, and I shall ask the Minister of Justice to move:

That clause 5, subsection (1), line 16, be amended by inserting the word "not" after the word "notice."

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McMASTER: What about these tuna fishermen? Are they considered as fishermen or as seamen?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I thought I had answered that by saying that they are not covered by this bill.

Mr. McMASTER: I did not know this matter had been raised before. Why would they not be covered?

Mr. CHEVRIER: They would come under the class of fishermen and not seamen.

Mr. McMASTER: How are the fishermen covered?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I answered that this morning at some length in reply to the hon. member for Cariboo. It is a matter for provincial legislation.

Mr. McMASTER: Suppose a man who lived in Alberta joined a ship in Vancouver and sailed to the tuna fishing ground, what would be his status?

Mr. CHEVRIER: He would be covered by the British Columbia act, if it includes fishermen.

Mr. GREEN: What is the present position with regard to setting up a maritime commission in Canada? There was some discussion in the house last year about this matter, and it was intimated that a maritime commission would probably be set up. I believe this has been requested both by the seamen and by the ship owners. What is the position at the present time?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is hardly a matter for discussion on a bill to provide compensation for seamen. The matter of a maritime commission is a broad question and it could not be decided without very careful study. The matter has been and is being given careful consideration.

Mr. GREEN: Has the minister any idea when a decision will be reached?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am sorry I have not.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to issue securities not exceeding $22,550,000 in principal amount to provide the moneys necessary to meet capital expenditures made or capital indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1946; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal, and interest of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the making of temporary loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $22,550,000 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and indebtedness; with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the said national system.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. MAYHEW: Probably it will expedite the passing of the bill which will follow if I made a brief explanation at this time. It is not intended to ask for any more than the approval of the resolution to-day. The bill will be before the house in the morning and probably we can complete it then. The bill to be founded upon this resolution is for the purpose of providing authority for the financing of capital expenditures of the railway system and the retirement of miscellaneous maturing obligations, either by way of loan from the dominion or by the issue of securities of the company to the public and guaranteed by the dominion government. The total amount to be provided for this purpose is limited to $22,550,000, made up as follows:

Additions and betterments (less retirements)	$14,000,000
New equipment	8,863,000
Acquisition of Manitoba railway	7,000,000
Acquisition of securities	410,000
Retirement of maturing capital obligations, including sinking fund and equipment principal payments	9,777,000
	$40,050,000
Less: Available from reserves for depreciation and debt discount amortization	17,550,000
Total	$22,550,000

The capital budget as set out above was approved by the standing committee on railways. While total loans, if all expenditures are made, will aggregate $22,550,000, there will be a net increase in the debt of the railway company of $12,773,000, because $9,777,000 will be used to retire obligations presently outstanding.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the parliamentary assistant to clarify one point? I think he indicated that the budget of the railway had been approved by the appropriate standing committee; is that so?

Mr. MAYHEW: That is right.

Mr. GRAYDON: Since I was not a member of that committee, perhaps I may be allowed to deal with some elementary matters. Were all the details of the expenditures which the railway proposes to make in connection with the resolution now before us gone into by the committee?

Mr. CHEVRIER: As the hon. member knows, the committee deals with the budget in detail and hears the evidence of officers of the Canadian National Railways such as the president, the executive vice-president, the comptroller and others, some five or six in all. A report was made to the house by the committee approving the budget as it now stands.

Mr. GRAYDON: According to the parliamentary assistant's statement, some of this money is to provide new equipment, I believe something like $9,000,000.

Mr. MAYHEW: That is right.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to make one observation and it is not to be taken as necessarily approving the terms of this resolution. I think one of the things that has struck the ordinary layman who has observed the work of the railways during the war was how the railways were able to carry on throughout the entire war period with so few accidents as actually occurred with the equipment they had. I was very much struck by the report which was made by the department not so long ago and which was in the hands of all hon. members, indicating that during the war period the ratio of accidents on the Canadian railways was actually less per person travelling than in the years prior to the war. That is a clear indication of what a grand job the railways did while the war was on, and that is no reflection, of course, on their work in time of peace.

On a previous occasion in this house I and other members have paid some tribute, as best we could in our humble way, to the work of the railway employees on the civilian front during the war. There was a great expansion in railway business during the war. That is on the records of this parliament in two or three sessions and I need not reiterate the details. I mention it only to point out that additional precautions must have been observed by the railways to do what they did with so few accidents. Indeed, on the civilian front there were not many, if any better jobs done that that done by the railway workers in Canada, particularly when we bear in mind that there was not the time or the opportunity or the materials for them to repair and overhaul their rolling stock as they would have done in the more leisurely peacetime period. I am not surprised that both the major railway companies in Canada are now taking steps to put their rolling stock in shape and pick up the slack which inevitably occurred during the war.

I take it that this $9,000,000 is required not only for new equipment but for the repair and overhauling of the old equipment. I am told also that some of the roadbed throughout the country is badly in need of ballast to bring it up to its normal peacetime condition. It was not possible to do that during the war because of the shortage of manpower and materials. In making these observations, I believe that I am expressing the reaction which most laymen feel to the railway situation as they understand it. I do not pose as an expert on railway matters; far from it, but I did wish to pay this tribute to the railway companies and to the railway workers who made it possible for the railways to carry such a tremendous load during the war with such speed and dispatch and with so few accidents. I do not suppose any of our railway workers, had you asked them in 1938 or 1939 if the railways could carry the increased number of passengers and increased freight tonnage which they did carry during the war, would have thought that it would be possible for the railways to do it, with such efficiency and with so few accidents.

Mr. BROOKS: I agree with what the hon. member for Peel has said, that the railways did a splendid job during the war. We all know that they had very little man-power to keep up their roadbeds during the war, and we observe that considerable work along that line is now being done. I would ask the minister if during good years the railway sets aside a reserve for repairs and maintenance. The war years were good years for the railway because they had surpluses instead of deficits, and I am wondering if such a reserve was set aside.

Mr. MAYHEW: Yes, there is a reserve for deferred maintenance. I can give the figures when the bill is before us.

Mr. BROOKS: If the railway had such a reserve fund, why are they asking now for this amount from consolidated revenue?

Mr. MAYHEW: This amount is not for repairs and renewals but for additions, with the exception of the amount for the purchasing of the Manitoba railway and the $410,000 for the retirement of certain securities. Everything else is for new equipment. The item of $17,500,000 has already been spent in road maintenance. In addition, there is a deferred amount.

Mr. BROOKS: I was basing my remarks on the supposition that new equipment was being bought to replace the worn-out equipment.

Mr. MAYHEW: A lot of this is for new equipment. The repair of old equipment would come out of ordinary repairs and renewals currently carried on by the railway company, the details of which will be given when we come to the bill. The expenditure can only be given by regions. We will also give the type of equipment that is being purchased.

I am sure that every member of the committee will agree with the statement made by the hon. member for Peel that this country as a whole is most grateful to both the railways for the service they have given to Canada during the war, grateful not only to the management but to the men in all branches of both railways. They have carried on and given this country a service the like of which we have never known and never thought was possible. Probably no one had a better opportunity of realizing the handicaps under which they carried on this work than one who has spent the greater part of a month each year in travelling between Victoria and Ottawa and finding out what the men have to do. When you see a workman on his back under a car fixing up the steamline when the temperature is 40 degrees below zero, and he finally gets you away on time in such weather, you have an appreciation of what the men on the Canadian railways have done for the people of Canada during the past six years, and I am sure they will appreciate very much the references that have been made to them by the hon. member for Peel.

Mr. FULTON: I should like to ask the minister some questions, and if the information is not now available, perhaps it might be given when the bill is before us. What prompts me to ask these questions is that in normal times the Canadian National Railways shows a deficit. It has been suggested that one of the reasons for that is its heavy capitalization and its large bonded indebtedness. It carries such a load in that respect that never except in war years can it show figures in the black; they are generally in the red. I wondered whether it would be feasible to write down the indebtedness of the Canadian National Railways in so far as it is held by the government, because it seems to me that we are fooling ourselves. If the Canadian National pays all its surplus into the government anyway, so that the country gets the benefit of any surplus earnings, simply because those earnings do not cover the amount of the bonded indebtedness we show the system in the red. If that is the case a change could easily be effected and it would not do us any harm, whereas it would have a salutary effect on the morale of the railway, both employees and management. That was what I had in mind and what prompts me to put certain questions, the answers to which I shall be glad to get if it is at all possible for the minister to give them to-day. If he cannot let me have them now he can do so at a later time. The questions are these. How much of the outstanding liability of the Canadian National is held by the government, and how much in the hands of individual bondholders? The second question is this: How much did the Canadian National Railways actually pay into the government during the war years, in the form of surplus earnings as profit? What profit did it show and pay to the government or into the consolidated revenue fund in the years of the war? Third, was any of those profits used to pay off bonded indebtedness, or was it all absorbed in reducing previous deficits which had been charged up, or what was the final disposition of it?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. gentleman has referred to the question of fixed charges of the Canadian National Railways. That matter has received the attention of the committee on railways and shipping, but the report has not yet been completed. It will be tabled, I presume, in the ordinary course of the business of the house. I would not care to comment on that aspect of the matter until I myself have seen the report, but I can tell the hon. gentleman that the question of fixed charges is being given careful consideration by the Canadian National itself, by the committee which was set up to study the subject, and also by the government. With reference to the other questions which he has asked, if he will look at the annual report of the Canadian National Railways he will find there most of the answers to his questions, in fact all. If he has not already got the report I shall be glad to see that it is sent to him.

Mr. FULTON: Does that cover the question of the holding of bonded indebtedness—those who hold it?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Chevrier thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 346, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures made and capital indebtedness incurred by the Canadian National railways system during the calendar year 1946, and to authorize the guarantee by His Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE ACT

ENLARGEMENT OF PURPOSES FOR WHICH CREDITS MAY BE USED—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendment made by the senate to bill No. 126, to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act.

Mr. FRASER: Will the minister explain the amendments?

Mr. MacKINNON: The only amendment suggested is in section 11, amending section 22A, paragraph (a). The words in the bill as it passed the house were "to pay or guarantee the payment." The amendment is "to pay its guarantee of payment." That is the only change and we are prepared to accept it.

Mr. FRASER: Why is the change being made?

Mr. MacKINNON: I believe it was the opinion of those who suggested the amendment that, as the act read, the government might guarantee the guarantee of the other government; but they wish to go farther and make the government actually responsible for the payment of the guarantee of the other government.

Mr. FRASER: So that this government will absolutely guarantee the payment of it.

Mr. MacKINNON: That is correct.

Mr. FRASER: What exports have been covered by this act in the last year? In the monthly review it says $12·9 million. Has there been more than that?

Mr. MacKINNON: I have no information in addition to what I gave when the bill was before the house. I could get it.

Mr. FRASER: Members would like to know, because this legislation set up $750,000,000. At the time they thought they would use all that, but evidently they are using only a few millions.

Mr. MacKINNON: I am sure I am right in saying that no additional moneys have been used since the bill was before the house.

Mr. FRASER: What procedure does the exporter follow in coming to the department for the guarantee?

Mr. MacKINNON: The exporter comes in the same way as he would go to any insurance company to take out a policy on his goods.

Mr. FRASER: And after that the department issues an export permit for him?

Mr. MacKINNON: We issue a policy.

Mr. FRASER: Yes, I know; but you might not issue him an export permit. That, too, is up to the department?

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes. We satisfy ourselves that he has an export permit.

Motion agreed to, amendment read the second time and concurred in.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL CORPORATION

ASSISTANCE IN DEVELOPMENT OF TRADE WITH OTHER COUNTRIES

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of bill No. 251, to establish the Canadian Commercial corporation.

Mr. FRASER: Will the minister make a statement on this?

Mr. MacKINNON: I gave a complete statement and I did not anticipate the necessity of going over the same material again.

Mr. DAVID A. CROLL (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I intend to take the opportunity of saying a few words on this particular bill because it deals with the matter of trade, and particularly foreign trade. To-day Canada is faced with the greatest opportunity for obtaining foreign trade that it ever had. Hon. members know that there is a world-wide hunger for all kinds of goods, manufactured as well as raw materials, and that two important exporting nations, Japan and Germany, have been put out of business, probably for our generation. In addition to that, all the European countries, once the source of much of the world's low-cost consumer goods, have had their manufacturing plants either impaired or dislocated by the war. Not only have we the traditional consumer countries like South America starving for goods, but even producer countries which have not been able to get their war-stalled industries running are crying as never before for goods, and looking to the remaining industrial countries such as Canada to provide them. At the same time I point a note of warning that already some of the European countries are in the export market. Holland is already in the market in the West Indies. Some of them are recovering even more quickly than we expected. Belgium is having a quick recovery. At the present time Canada stands in a unique position. Here we have an industrial plant untouched by the ravages of war and expanded to the point where we are one of the foremost industrial nations of the world. We have not only pre-war industries; but we have stepped up tremendously our new industries, new processes, and we have increased our productivity more than the most optimistic person would imagine possible. Added to this, we have the good will of the entire world. The world knows that it can trust us and do business with us.

I think I understand Canada's present foreign trade policy. It is as follows, and I think I can best bring it to the attention of the house under four points. The first is to meet our commitments abroad; the second, to police exports of certain goods, for example, aeroplanes and uranium; third, in the case of goods which have a bearing on our internal economy, for example, those on which there are domestic subsidies, to see to it that the subsidies are repaid before the goods are sent overseas; and fourth, to maintain adequate civilian supplies for Canadians. I do not think I go too far when I say that the policies of this department will determine to a large extent whether we prosper or stagnate economically during the years immediately ahead. It is a department with enormous responsibilities, but also one which is indeed very well run. For a number of reasons it is a department which must find it difficult to plot its actions too far ahead. It has to find markets for Canadian goods, and if conditions in those markets change suddenly because of foreign competition, it must be in a position to meet that competition and secure the markets for Canada. What we can agree on is that we, as a nation, must export more goods than we ever did before or else we stagnate economically. We have just experienced a period of full employment because of the war. We know that Canada's industrial capacity has been tremendously expanded. None of us suggests that our present population can consume the products of our enlarged industry. There are those of us who advocate increased immigration, but we who favour that policy are not so naive as to believe that the results we seek can be immediately achieved. In the interim we have to sell abroad the products and the surplus that we have in our domestic market; and I suggest, in addition to the goods which are surplus to our domestic consumption, some of the products which are in domestic demand at the present time.

We have always relied in this country upon exports to give our people jobs and profits and a reasonably good sort of living. In the past twenty years exports have meant $10 a month to every man, woman and child in the country; or to put it another way, $650 to every farm in Canada. These figures come from the current letter of the Royal Bank of Canada, which I commend to the attention of hon. members. This is an approach to the problem from the long-range, or twenty-year aspect. That was not so serious a problem so long as our economy was based on the production of foodstuffs which the world must have in order to eat and to live. But the war has brought a fundamental change to Canada and I doubt whether we can regard ourselves any longer as primarily an agricultural country. In making ourselves what we like to boast of as the arsenal of democracy, we built up a problem for the future, the problem of distributing the output of our greatly expanded industrial plant. The same factories which built the vehicles, the weapons and all sorts of military incidentals for half a dozen nations besides our own obviously were too big in peace time for merely domestic production. Therefore we cannot accept as our present needs either the quantity or the composition of our pre-war exports. We have to become major suppliers of manufactured goods as well as of foodstuffs and minerals. We have to do so if we are to maintain production and employment and satisfied stomachs and well clothed backs. We can no longer simply strive to continue that $10 per person a month that the Royal bank reports as the twenty-year average; we can no longer accept the one-third of our dollar which the department advertises as the surprising fraction of our individual income which derives from export trade. At least one of our best known economists sets the figures at 40 per cent rather than at 33⅓ per cent. That it has to be high is unquestioned except by those of the most unconventional economic views. Most of my C.C.F. friends will agree, I imagine, with their British socialist colleagues who have given the expansion of exports No. 1 place on their economy programme. Admitting then, as most of us do, that exports must be increased we can surely proceed to the further admission that it must be done in a hurry. International competition is not such that it will wait a gradual and painless adjustment of the Canadian economy to the drastically new set of conditions. Rather the adjustment must not only be abrupt but may be even a little painful if it is to achieve its purpose.

What must we do then to get our share of the world's markets which we so urgently require? I think the house will agree when I say we must first produce. Then I call attention to the fact that there is no production from an idle factory; there is no production for export in the midst of an industrial struggle as bitter as Canada has ever known. There is no production for export when labour and management are locked in the throes of a long-term battle for and against upward revisions of wages and consolidation of contractual agreements and working conditions. There is no production for any purpose when a plant is closed tight by a strike, and we may as well face the fact that the strikes we have to-day are perhaps but preliminary to a wave of walk-outs, against which neither the government nor management has advanced any effective, constructive policy.

There are three parties to production: management, labour and the investor. I find myself unable to criticize those who provide the funds for industry. The banks and trust companies, to say nothing of the well-heeled private investor, are eager to give their support to ventures in foreign trade. The institutions I have just mentioned have devoted a great deal of their advertising and publicity to an endeavour to create export-mindedness among Canadian manufacturers, but as far as the other parties to industry are concerned there is an attitude which I may be permitted to call unenlightened self-interest. They are shutting their eyes to the fact that by suspending production to-day they are eliminating opportunities for export to-morrow. Management has not been too greatly concerned with strikes in its plants when, in that appallingly significant phrase it likes to use, "it has been working for Ilsley". You hear this often, and I challenge anyone to suggest a more complete confession of the absence of social responsibility.

Labour, on the other hand, has failed to appreciate that the picket line at the closed plant to-day may well be the forerunner of a jobless to-morrow. Anyone who has looked objectively at the industrial picture in Canada over the past six years would know that of necessity there would be an adjustment of wages, hours and working conditions after the war. Grievances piled up during the period when most unions were being faithful to their no-strike pledge. Living costs have risen in spite of the government's commendable effort; and there is reason in the personal experience of all of us to believe that advance has been greater than the percentage indicated by the indices maintained by the Department of Labour. Wages have to be increased; improved working conditions have to formalized by contract. Surely, with an appreciation of this fact, so apparent to anyone who is not a party to either side of industry, the transition should have been achieved without the serious stoppages we have undergone in the past year and which we have not yet settled. Management started out by offering nothing in response to the workers' demands, by obeying only the letter of our improved labour laws, or by skirting those laws entirely. They challenged labour to do its work and, labour having done so, they capitulated but passed on none of their new-found wisdom to their colleagues in industry. So strike has followed strike; defeat has followed defeat for management. Nevertheless each industry faced with the problem continues to act as though its own were the very first strike to be faced by any member of the Canadian Manufacturers Association. The thinking of management in reference to labour has been in a vacuum. If management approached business deals with as little know-how as it approaches labour problems, management would soon be retailing the apples which the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) so actively promotes in this house. On the labour side the picture is also disheartening.

Mr. WRIGHT: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, while the hon. gentleman is delivering a very good speech, certainly it is not on the Canadian Commercial corporation. The hon. gentleman is dealing with labour problems. I should like your ruling as to whether we are all to be permitted to speak on labour problems while discussing this bill.

Mr. CROLL: I am dealing with the matter of the production of goods for export, and that is what this bill deals with.

Mr. WRIGHT: I am not objecting, just as long as we are all going to be allowed the same privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would direct the attention of the hon. member to the fact that on second reading of a bill it is the practice to discuss only the principle. The debate of course should be relevant to the bill and to the principle of the bill.

Mr. CROLL: May I point out that under section 5 of the bill the corporation may be importing goods or commodities into Canada or exporting goods and commodities from Canada. I am talking about the production of goods, and I am getting on to the policy. I started out by dealing with the policy of the Department of Trade and Commerce under four points, and I am dealing with them. The first was production, and I am going on to deal with the other points in detail. This is the only opportunity I have to do so. On third reading I would not be able to go over the various sections, so that I submit I am quite in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is always disagreeable to have to interrupt any hon. member, but it is a well known practice that an hon. gentleman should not discuss particular sections of a bill during the debate on second reading. So that I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the principle of the bill.

Mr. CROLL: I am not discussing a section of the bill; I am dealing with the Canadian Commercial corporation, which has to do with matters of export and import, and I think my remarks are in order.

On the labour side the picture is also disheartening. There is no question but that the majority of our strikes have been justified, but today we have what we might call the strike bug nibbling at the intelligence of some of our labour leaders, and in some cases a strike for a strike's sake. Returning to the point from which I started out, that we either step up our production and put an end to strikes or God help us, I would hazard the guess—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am very sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I had to intervene in the past and I feel obliged tc intervene again. The hon. gentleman is discussing labour conditions and production. The bill before the house is to establish the Canadian Commercial corporation to deal with exportation and importation. I believe the discussion should be relevant to the bill under consideration, and I am afraid the hon. member goes a little too far afield.

Mr. CROLL: Very well, Mr. Speaker. I started out by speaking about production. My suggestion is that a greater proportion of production be earmarked for export. In Great Britain one-third of all production is earmarked for export.

Mr. JAQUES: That is why they are starving.

Mr. CROLL: My hon. friend says they are starving.

Mr. JAQUES: I suppose we shall starve too.

Mr. CROLL: I doubt that very much. I was over there for four years, under pretty difficult conditions. They were not starving, and they put up a pretty good show in the end. We know markets are waiting for us, but at the present time not only are exports being hampered by the policy—and more power to it—of supplying necessities to the war-torn countries of Europe, but our efforts are being nullified by a deep concern for the demands of the domestic consumer. This is stated to be one of the major considerations for dictating a continuance of the law requiring that any man who exports must, in the majority of cases, obtain an export permit from the government. My suggestion is that we earmark a certain percentage of all our productivity for export, so that when permits are withheld the suggestion will not be well founded that they are unreasonably withheld.

We still in this country, a land of plenty, respond with outraged screams to any suggestion that we might do with the second best for a while, if we have to sacrifice at the present time. I merely point to some of the newspaper comment, even in to-day's newspaper, where people in this country become extremely hot under the collar when they find out that some of our shirts are in both Jamaica and Trinidad. To many of us a natural contrast occurs. We might think of the well-to-do Englishman in his shabby suit, and perhaps in his frayed collar. We think of his satisfaction at the news that the best materials in the world, goods that he manufactures, are selling well overseas, although, of course, he is unable to obtain them. To him austerity has become a temporary way of life from which he expects to get dividends in better living at some time in the future, whereas to us austerity is just another word to look up in the dictionary.

We think of how pleased the ordinary Englishman must be to know that his ruined country was able to lift those exports from 33 per cent of the 1938 average last year to 95 per cent by quantity of that average in the first quarter of 1946. The goal is 75 per cent above the 1938 average. And, having trebled the total of exports in one year, he is well on his way to trebling them again in the next twelve months. He can do that only by forgoing the thing he would like to eat, that he would like to drink, that he would like to wear. My guess is that he will do it. I point out to the house that it is much easier to buy an English-made suit on King street in Toronto than it is on Saville row in London; and it is several times easier to buy a drink of "Scotch" on St. Catherines street, Montreal than on Princess street, Edinburgh. So I suggest that in our present crisis our government might well demand greater sacrifice from the people of Canada by way of a willingness to forgo luxuries in favour of future prosperity. If it is adequately explained to them I do not think we would any longer find Canadians outraged when the minister reports that shirts they have a hard time in buying can be bought in Jamaica or Trinidad.

Our government might well lift export restrictions on goods urgently desired in countries willing to embark upon long-range trade agreements with Canada. Inevitably they will enter into such agreements with our competitors, if we cannot immediately undertake delivery.

I believe the house will agree that we must take our markets where we find them. While before the war three-quarters of Canada's exports went to Great Britain and the United States, only about ten per cent found their way to the far east. By confining ourselves to those two countries, we neglected Australia, New Zealand, India and China with a combined population of well over half a billion people, a most fertile field for trade development. As a result, this area, much of which comes within the scope of empire preference, was left to others to exploit. For example, the United States was able to secure much of the foreign trade which otherwise would have been diverted easily to Canada. With the disappearance of Japan from this field, a great share of the foreign trade becomes vacant, so to speak, and our goal in post-war trade expansion must be to fill that vacancy with Canadian goods.

The Latin-American market, about which much has been said lately, has many characteristics such as are typical of present-day conditions. There are great opportunities for trade in those countries. Yet we must not deceive ourselves into thinking that huge profits are there for the taking, or firm markets a certainty. To consider Latin-America as an export field, the position is that almost every country, in marked contrast to the pre-war condition, has a good deal of spare cash on hand. With the closing of the German and Japanese sources, there is a great demand for almost every type of goods. But many South American countries are controlling this demand by restricting rigidly the volume and type of imports. There is no intention of squandering on luxuries their wartime accumulation of foreign exchange. In view of the very low standard of living in South America, many standard articles in Canada are considered luxuries to nine-tenths of the people in South America.

I began by saying that, first of all, we need production. Then, as suggested, we need a diversion of a larger share of that production to export trade. The third recommendation is that, as Canadians, we learn a little more about world trading. We have not been very good at it in the past. We still labour under the delusion that if a line of goods is not saleable at home, it might as well be dumped on the world market and be sold there.

Mr. GREEN: That is not true of many types of business.

Mr. CROLL: I am told it has been a general rule, although those on the west coast, and also on the east, are possibly somewhat more foreign trademinded than are those of us in the rest of Canada.

Over the week-end I had a discussion with a few important manufacturers in Toronto, and discussed exports with them. Their view was that they were in no hurry about making any excursion into foreign markets, that in due time Canadian producers, having met domestic demands, would step in, cut prices a few cents, and capture whatever market appealed to them. I am sure the house agrees with me that that is a childish view. Does anyone think that without a knowledge of the taste, opinions, prejudices, and a thousand-and-one local factors in any given overseas market, anyone can step in and snatch it away from world traders who have been studying that market in detail for perhaps a hundred years?

It is a matter of record in the department that not long ago a Canadian manufacturer, taking advantage of a new entree into a west Indian market, took a chance on ignoring detailed instructions and shipped a cargo of materials in styles and colours which, from what he had read, he was sure would appeal to the negro inhabitants of the island. It so happened that these negroes traditionally abhorred the colours and styles of that shipment. Naturally it did not sell.

I ask the house this question: Where does Canada stand in respect of future sales on that island? Canadian firms have lost overseas business because they refused to appreciate that their treasured trade mark was a bad-luck symbol in the countries to which they were shipping goods. One exporter from Canada insisted upon having on his carton a tiger with a short moustache, when he had been told that a tiger must have long whiskers. As it turns out, a tiger with a short moustache in many parts of the east is considered a bad-luck omen. The result was that his goods did not sell until he met the specifications.

It is also a matter of record that another Canadian manufacturer allowed $2 million of business to go to British and Swedish companies because he could not understand why people of that particular country preferred his product with a hole for a handle rather than with a fitted handle. Of course the answer was that they liked it that way. It is our business to meet their wishes.

The real basis of foreign trade, in addition to meeting style and other requirements, is to deliver the goods. Before we can do that we must produce. The world has to be told what kind of goods we manufacture and what kind we can deliver. At the moment they do not know, and perhaps there are even some hon. members who are not fully acquainted with the goods we are able to manufacture and export. Many countries are unable to think of Canada except in terms of bacon, cheese and wheat. The world generally does not know that we can sell anything from tooth brushes to aeroplanes, that we have to offer a large range of commodities which includes such diversified products as oilcloth, machinery, chemicals, earthenware, sporting goods, whisky and locomotives. The world must be told of these things, not only through booklets which at best have a limited appeal, but through extensive advertising in newspapers and magazines. Here I should like to commend the department upon the able advertising that they have carried out, not only in Canada but in other countries. I think that advertising should be extended. When the estimates come up we should take the opportunity to give the minister all the money he needs in order that he may sell Canadian products abroad and let people in other countries know that we can produce goods and deliver them.

I said a few minutes ago—one hon. member did not agree with me—that education is required at home about the importance of foreign trade and the possibilities of venturing in futurities. Most people are paying attention to domestic markets. It is natural to want to do business with people whom you know and with whom you live. A great demand exists in the domestic markets; there are profits to be made here, so they say, "What is the use of looking elsewhere?" But the domestic market, as we have seen, cannot absorb more than two-thirds of our production. If we mean to maintain peak production—and that is the only way our standard of living will remain as it is or go higher—then we must sell our surplus products. As the present time this may be difficult because some commodities are badly needed right here at home. However, we can fill these home needs little by little without losing any business in the long run, whereas foreign markets which lie open to us to-day will be gone in a year unless we are prepared to make a strong bid for them now. If some goods are in short supply in this country, a token shipment will at least keep our foot in the door, but we must act quickly.

We owe our present standard of living to the fact that our exports in 1945 were valued at $3,125 million, or more than a third of our national income for that year. Unless we maintain peak production and peak distribution of goods we cannot hope to go on improving our standard of living. I know that people in Canada are hungry for goods, but there must be some sense of proportion in the matter. The policy of all for us and nothing for other countries will give us a very short-lived prosperity indeed. In a year or two our domestic needs will be met and then, when we look abroad in order to sell our surpluses—by the simple arithmetic of population we can see that there will be surpluses before long—we shall find the markets of the world spoken for by others and we shall be frozen out.

In dealing with this particular bill our course is clear. We have to produce as we have never produced before. We have to go short on some things for a while and, most important of all, we have to stop bickering and get down to producing. Canada to-day has a tremendous opportunity, the opportunity of a lifetime, an opportunity which will never be here again, and we must seize that opportunity now.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) said that our industries were untouched by the ravages of war. That may be true; but during the war, because of shortages and a lack of labour, our industries lost many of their foreign markets. I am afraid that in some cases they have lost them forever. Many of those foreign countries, when they found that they could not secure the goods that we had been exporting, subsidized their own industries to manufacture what we used to export to them in peace time. Therefore it is necessary that the Department of Trade and Commerce find new markets for those exports which we have lost. I know the minister is quite familiar with the situation, and I am hoping that he will take the proper steps to try to find markets for these goods. In checking over this bill, I find that it has not a time limit and I think it should have one of not more than two years.

When the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) was speaking on one of the items standing in his name he mentioned that one of the branches of his department, the Canadian information service, would advertise Canadian goods overseas. The hon. member for Spadina referred to advertising and said that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) should be given all the money he wanted for the purpose of advertising Canadian goods. I do not know about giving the minister all the money he wants, but I think he should be given sufficient to do this advertising, and the Department of Trade and Commerce should do the advertising, not the Canadian information service. I have absolutely no faith in the Canadian information service and very few people in Canada have.

Not long ago the minister paid a visit to the South and Central American countries. During these last few months, we have reaped the benefits of his trip. By going to those South and Central American countries he created a better feeling among the people there. I believe, if the minister would visit other countries from which he thinks we could get trade, it would create prestige for this country and help Canadian manufacturers to increase their exports. I noticed an item in the Commercial Intelligence Journal of August 3, 1946, under the title "Foreign trade service", which reads:

> The foreign trade service, whose function is the maintenance and promotion of trade between Canada and other countries, consists of seven divisions as follows:

And further down:

> Export division: Consists of a group of commodity specialists, in direct contact with Canadian industry, who supply information and render assistance with respect to the particular commodities or groups of commodities for which they are responsible. It includes the export permit branch in order to ensure the coordination of its work with the issuance of export permits so long as these wartime controls remain.

When we are in committee I should like the minister to tell us how that division will fit in with the Canadian Commercial Corporation; also how the import division functions. Personally I feel that the Canadian Commercial Corporation should emphasize exports and forget imports for the time being, because the wartime prices and trade board lifted prices on exports and the exports that are going into other countries from Canada are often not goods needed by them but are luxury goods. What we need now is what the people want to wear and what they need to carry on their everyday business. I have a lot of questions to ask when we get into committee.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, we have heard a lot about exports from the hon member for Spadina (Mr. Croll). I should like to have heard something about imports at the same time, because surely foreign trade means trading, not merely exports. If we are not going to receive imports in exchange for our exports we are simply giving our goods away. I never could see the point in trying to force our goods into a country which can very well make those same goods for themselves. Unless we are prepared to receive back goods for the goods we export, it seems to me that we cannot raise our standard of living. We may work harder, but at the same time we shall have to tighten our belts. I do not think there can be any argument against that.

The case for Great Britain is different. In the first place, they are dependent very largely on foreign countries for the raw materials they need. In the second place, Great Britain has incurred tremendous debt owing to the war, and she needs credits in order to obtain the raw materials which she can process and export as finished goods. But those conditions are not Canadian at all. Ours are the reverse. We have plenty of raw materials, and we have no external debt to speak of.

It seemed to me, as I listened to the hon. member for Spadina, that what he really has in mind, the real export he was thinking of, is unemployment. Let me say this, that no country wants to import unemployment, and that is why tariffs are raised against imports. We say that it is fundamental to the social credit way of thinking that a country should export only what it cannot consume, in exchange for those things which it cannot produce. That is trade in the real sense of the word.

We do have certain things in Canada that we produce largely in excess of our needs, and of course wheat is one. On the other hand, there are things which we cannot produce and never will be able to produce commercially—all tropical fruits, for instance. These things we never can produce in Canada, by commercial means anyway. But we do have plenty of basic products which we produce in excess of our needs and which we can export in exchange for the articles which we can neither grow nor produce for ourselves.

There is one point with regard to our trade relations with South America. I understand that the attitude adopted at the San Francisco conference, where the people of the Argentine were told bluntly that they were not wanted, has not improved their relations with either the United States or with us. I understand that that was done to please Soviet Russia. In the meantime, as one might have supposed,

Soviet Russia has slipped in and established a full-time ambassador in the Argentine and has largely gained the trade which was formerly enjoyed by those countries which told the Argentine that she was not wanted. It is just another example that we would do well, with regard to all countries, to mind our own business and let other countries mind theirs. That works well in any community. As long as people mind their own business there is peace, but as soon as they start to mind other people's business there is likely to be trouble and it is pretty soon coming.

I should like to hear some of the speakers who follow me say a few words about imports in exchange for our exports, because the idea that we can raise our standard of living in Canada by exporting our goods on long-term credits is not true. One reason for that is that if the goods are exported and are not traded for a corresponding amount of imports, and the wages stay in this country, then there is inflation, and that has to be taken care of by increased taxation. So, as Major Douglas said years ago, the only thing that the working man will get out of a favourable balance of foreign trade is a longer work day. We shall have to work harder, tighten our belts, and pay higher taxes for the privilege of doing it.

Mr. J. W. BURTON (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I shall take only a few moments. In fact, I had not intended to say anything on this bill until the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) opened up in the way he did. I have always considered that a country like Canada, with the nature of our production, should have a vigorous export policy, but I have always contended that the first charge upon the production of any country is a decent standard of living for those who make that production possible. The first charge on the production of any nation is the opportunity for the people who make that production possible to use that production to give them a decent standard of living. As the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques) has pointed out, very little if anything was said about import business. My associates and I have at all times contended that, while we must have export markets for surplus products, we should in turn have a policy of vigorous import business in exchange for those surpluses, so that our people can round out a full standard of living by having the use of things they cannot economically produce or manufacture in this country. In other words, you can have a vigorous export market, and continue to have it and have your people happy at home only, if you make your international trade a two-way street. The hon. member for Spadina spent altogether too much time on the edge of that street, going one way and not giving any thought to the other side of the street.

When the hon. member suggested that a certain portion of our production should be earmarked for export I was absolutely astounded. I was astounded to hear it coming from that part of the house. I could have understood it if he had put it a little differently. I am prepared, and I am sure the majority of the Canadian people are prepared, to have belts tightened, to do without some of the things we ordinarily have and should have, so long as they go to those parts of the world that are urgently in need of them. But that is, we hope, only a temporary condition. That is a matter which needs to be dealt with only on some occasions. But when you are speaking of international trade and suggest that we should earmark a certain proportion of our production for export, regardless of whether or not our own people have enough of the things so produced—well, simply to be polite and to have my words remain parliamentary, I will say it is just so much hooey.

When I first looked over the bill I thought it was a fairly good one. I thought it was making some provision whereby we could foster both our export and our import business. But after listening to the hon. member for Spadina I am beginning to have my doubts. I am wondering whether his speech this afternoon is an indication of what the government intends to do with this bill, and I suggest that during the dinner recess we consider that question seriously before supporting the bill. If that is Liberal policy; if it is what the Liberal government intends to do with this piece of legislation, I for one will give it serious thought during the dinner recess.

Before I sit down, may I say this. Let no one go from this chamber and say that I am opposed, or that my associates are opposed, to sending as much as possible of our goods to countries that are at present in dire need of them. Let me, however, also say this. I simply cannot understand the attitude of a government which at one time throws out the call for the people of this country to give all they can in order to prevent starvation in some countries, and then at the same time allows machines to be shipped to other countries, which possibly cannot use those machines at the present time, in order to help relieve the situation in Europe, while in our own country we have a crop standing there in need of machines to take it off. Even when they turn some of these machines over to UNRRA, I would point out that the people in need of food cannot eat agricultural implements. They need the food that we could harvest with those implements, and that food would tide them over their present plight. This export business can be something that is absolutely idiotic at times, something that is beyond all reason when carried to extremes.

So far as Latin America is concerned, I have no love for the Argentine, any more than for others, and as the hon. member for Wetaskiwin suggested, possibly they have thrown their business somewhere else. But I would say to him and to other hon. members that there was a time, not so very long ago, when the Argentine was found wanting, when much more was at stake than a little bit of export business. In spite of what the hon. member for Spadina said, I still do not think his speech was an indication of Liberal policy.

THE ARGENTINE NATION

GREETINGS TO MEMBERS OF HOUSE OF COMMONS AND PEOPLE OF CANADA

Mr. SPEAKER: I have received a telegram from the president of the Chamber of Deputies of the Argentine nation and, since it is in Spanish, I will read translations in English and French:

The Hon. the Speaker of the House of Commons of Canada, Ottawa.

Upon the resumption of its sittings, the Chamber of Deputies of the Argentine nation transmits to the House of Commons of Canada its wishes for peace and reciprocal friendship, with cordial greetings to every member and, through your intermediary, to the people of Canada, for whose prosperity we express our most sincere wishes. Pleace accept, Mr. Speaker, the assurance of my highest consideration.

Ricardo C. Guardo, President of the Chamber of Deputies of the Argentine Nation.

L. Zavalla Carbo, Clerk.

Monsieur le Président de la
Chambre des communes du Canada, Ottawa.

A l'occasion de la reprise de ses délibérations, la Chambre des Députés de la Nation Argentine prie la Chambre des communes du Canada d'accepter ses meilleurs vœux de paix et d'amitié réciproque et transmet ses salutions cordiales à ses membres, et, par votre intermédiaire, au peuple canadien, pour la prospérité duquel nous formulons les vœux les plus sincères. Je vous prie, monsieur le Président, d'agréer l'expression de ma plus haute considération.

Ricardo C. Guardo, Président de la Chambre des Députés de la Nation Argentine, L. Zavalla Carbo, Greffier.

I have prepared the following answer, which I hope will meet with the approval of the house:

The members of the Canadian House of Commons wish to express their sincere thanks to the Chamber of Deputies of the Argentine nation for their wishes for peace, reciprocal friendship and prosperity extended to them and through them to the Canadian people, in a message addressed on the second day of August by Mr. Ricardo C. Guardo, President of the Chamber of Deputies.

The Canadian House of Commons, in return beg to convey to the parliament of the Argentine and its people most sincere wishes for peace, security and prosperity.

Please accept, Mr. President, the assurance of my best sentiments.

Gaspard Fauteux,
Speaker of the House of Commons,
Canada.

Ottawa, August 5, 1946.

Les membres de la Chambre des communes du Canada désirent transmettre leurs remerciements à la Chambre des Députés de la Nation Argentine pour les bons vœux de paix, d'amitié réciproque et de prospérité, et pour les salutations cordiales exprimés à ses membres et, par leur intermédiaire, au peuple canadien, dans un massage adressé le 2 août par monsieur Ricardo C. Guardo, Président de la Chambre des Députés.

La Chambre des communes du Canada, en retour, par mon entremise, désire assurer le parlement et la population de l'Argentine de ses vœux les plus sincères pour la paix, la sécurité et la prospérité de leur pays.

Veuillez agréer, monsieur le Président, l'expression de mes sentiments les meilleurs.

Gaspard Fauteux,
Président de la Chambre des communes du Canada.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL CORPORATION

ASSISTANCE IN DEVELOPMENT OF TRADE WITH OTHER COUNTRIES

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Trade and Commerce) for the second reading of bill No. 251, to establish the Canadian Commercial corporation.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to delay the house for more than a few minutes. We want, however, to put our reasons for supporting the principle of the bill on record as clearly as we can. We supported the principle of the bill when it was before us in the resolution stage, and although I have not had an opportunity of checking it over section by section as carefully as I should like, from the study that I have given it I see no reason why we should withdraw our support now.

We support the bill, first, because in our opinion it is an attempt not only to expand our trade but also to bring about orderly marketing. No matter how reluctantly we may approach this question, I am convinced that circumstances will push us forward and that this may well be the first step toward setting up export and import boards. We should not be afraid of that because it has been done before.

When I spoke on the budget I said in reply to the statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) that the government was basing its hope for a return to prosperity on export trade. At that time I pointed out that the only necessity for a country to export was in order to import, and I am glad to note that the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques) has read my speech, as was indicated in what he said just before recess. I say that, not boastfully but because I had never heard the case put in this house in the way in which I put it in my budget speech and in the way the hon. member for Wetaskiwin put it this afternoon.

This country, of course, is interested in exports. But if we are to export for long we must also be interested in imports. There are many things which our people need which we cannot produce here. Some of the commodities that we produce here are better produced in other places. I like to look at good workmanship and good materials because it is pleasing to the eye. I think a good piece of workmanship is akin to art, even when it is a useful article such as clothing, china and things of that kind. I am quite satisfied that there are many people in Canada who would like to buy some of the beautiful woollen goods produced in Great Britain, perhaps better than in any other country in the world. Unfortunately they cannot often purchase them, but they would like them just because almost every one likes good quality. I know that people in Canada would like to buy some of the beautiful china which Britain also makes. There are many things which are beautiful to look at, a joy to handle, and pleasing to have about. There is no reason why we should not have more of these things. I believe men and women are better men and women if they have beautiful things about them to look at. These are some of the reasons why we should be interested in trade, in buying and selling, exchanging the things we have in abundance for the things that we have not at all. If we can do that, our standard of living will be raised.

This afternoon some hon. member mentioned the matter of the loans we have made since the end of the war. I am not disturbed about these loans even if we never get value for them, because we came through the war in good shape, and most of the people, or perhaps all of the people, to whom we made these loans suffered greatly. But there is another reason, namely, that the quicker we restore the economy of these countries, the better off we shall be ourselves. Therefore, so far as I am concerned I shall support measures of this kind for some time to come. I hope we shall get a return some day, and I hope we shall be able to accept that return in goods which our people can use. We should not ask for it until the people to whom we lent the money or perhaps our goods can pay for them without hurting themselves.

I am quite aware of the fact that in the sort of economy in which we live, a capitalist economy, export trade is a necessity even at times when the masses of the people who produce the goods are in need of them. In such instances goods must be exported because of the maldistribution of the income which went into circulation in the production of those goods. That, however, will have to be taken care of in some other way, so that our own people will not be in want, while the things they could use must be exported because the people who could buy them can not consume them. For these reasons, while the house may be as critical as it likes of sections of the bill, in its general principle I think we can support it as a measure that helps to meet the needs of to-day. Perhaps a few years from now conditions will have changed and we shall require something else; but at the moment, if this is as far as the government feels it can go, I see no reason why the bill should not have our support.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. FRASER: I asked the minister a few questions before recess. I wonder if he would answer them now.

Mr. MacKINNON: To begin with, I want to thank the hon. member for Peterborough West for his comment on the bill and on the work of the department generally. One specific question the hon. member asked was the relationship of the Canadian Commercial corporation to our foreign trade service. In asking that question, I believe the hon. member was particularly anxious that there should be no overlapping or conflict in the work of the two organizations. The foreign trade service of the department continues its promotional activities, continues its search for new markets, making connections and so on. It has, however, no capacity to consummate actual transactions which are desirable but which cannot be handled by private traders. The normal follow-through on its promotional activities is and should be carried on by private traders. The Canadian Commercial corporation will not initiate new trade, but is available as a necessary piece of machinery to carry out certain types of transactions. It is purely of assistance to private trade, not in any way a competitor.

Mr. FRASER: Will the minister comment on the suggestion I made with regard to a time limit?

Mr. MacKINNON: The corporation is being established to fill a definite need created by war conditions and the special problem of transition to more normal trading relations. That need exists to-day and will probably continue for some time. The future of the corporation will depend in large part upon the degree of freedom in private trade accorded to the nationals of ex-enemy countries. The corporation will be continued in existence as long as necessary to assist private traders.

Mr. FRASER: Has the minister any idea how long that will be?

Mr. MacKINNON: It depends on so many things. For instance, it depends on how long Japan might be occupied by the victorious allies, or how long Germany might be occupied. It is impossible to state any actual time limit, but this organization is being set up as an aid to business and will be continued just as long as, and not longer than, it will continue to be a necessary aid to business.

Mr. FRASER: As long as it is useful?

Mr. MacKINNON: As long as its usefulness lasts. It has not been established to subsidize exports or imports, or to replace private traders in any way.

Mr. FRASER: Will the minister say what extra staff he has to take on to handle this work, and also whether this new corporation is taking on men or women for advertising or publicity work?

Mr. MacKINNON: The Canadian Commercial corporation has taken over the staff of the Canadian export board, the organization that carried on this work during the war. It has taken over that staff in its entirety, as I understand it, and in addition it has engaged four men who have had unusual experience in work of this kind. The staff has all been recruited through the civil service commission, according to my information, with the exception of these senior officials. The intention is to continue that practice. The four experts I just mentioned, the senior officers of the organization, were recruited through the Canadian export board. They are men who had formerly been with munitions and supply, the wartime prices and trade board and possibly other departments.

Mr. FRASER: What is the total staff at the present time? What is the staff in Canada and what will it be in foreign countries? I imagine you will have agents in foreign countries, or do the trade commissioners act in that capacity?

Mr. MacKINNON: At the present time there is a staff of approximately 115. At the moment it is not intended to appoint any agents in foreign countries. In some cases use is being made of existing trade commissioner services in those countries.

Mr. FRASER: They should be able to handle this work in those foreign countries, should they not? You should not need to send any extra help there for that purpose.

Mr. MacKINNON: It depends entirely upon the nature and volume of work that may arise, but it is not our intention to set up any organization in addition to what we now have unless we find it necessary to do so. In reply to the question concerning advertising, I may say there are no arrangements or plans at all for any advertising in connection with this corporation.

Mr. GREEN: What part does the Canadian Commercial Corporation take in deciding what goods are to be exported from Canada? For example, we learn that Canadian shirts are being exported to the United States. Is the Canadian Commercial Corporation involved in that offence, or just what is its position?

Mr. MacKINNON: The Canadian Commercial Corporation will clear with the appropriate administrator or controller as to whether or not merchandise can be properly exported.

Mr. GREEN: Which one of these governmental bodies decides at the present time whether shirts are to be exported from Canada?

Mr. MacKINNON: That is the result of conversations between the men in charge of supply in Canada and the officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. GREEN: Who are the culprits? Who are the controllers who reached that decision?

Which branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce is involved in the decision? Is it the Canadian Commercial corporation or some other branch of the department?

Mr. MacKINNON: The Canadian Commercial corporation has nothing whatsoever to do with it. I do not wish to start a long discussion on the point, but—

Mr. GREEN: Shirts are hard to get.

Mr. MacKINNON: In response to a question to-day by the hon. member for Eglinton I tabled a return showing the number of shirts and other wearing apparel produced in Canada, and the number exported. The number exported is only a small fraction of the production.

Mr. MacNICOL: Where are the shirts, then?

Mr. MacKINNON: The great shortage in Canada is in the kind of shirts the hon. member for Davenport wears.

Mr. MacNICOL: I cannot get one at all.

Mr. MacKINNON: I have the same difficulty the hon. member has. That is something he will have to ask the producers.

Mr. JOHNSTON: What fraction is exported?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Keep your shirt on.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I haven't got one. They export them all, whether we have any or not.

Mr. MacKINNON: This matter has nothing whatsoever to do with the corporation under discussion. But the hon. member for Bow River will have a proper answer if he calls for the return I laid on the table to-day in answer to a question by the hon. member for Eglinton.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Could the minister give the fraction?

Mr. MacKINNON: I believe it is a fraction of one per cent.

Mr. GREEN: I understand that the Canadian Commercial corporation has nothing to do with the decision as to what goods are to be exported?

Mr. MacKINNON: That is correct.

Mr. GREEN: When the resolution preceding the bill was in committee we asked the minister why it had not been possible for the Canadian export board to carry on, instead of a new crown company being set up. He promised to make an answer when the bill was in committee. Will he do so now?

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. MacKINNON: I am glad to do that. The government was urged to match the facilities afforded British and American traders by the United Kingdom Commercial corporation and the United States Commercial company. A government board which has to act in the name of His Majesty is not a practical medium through which to carry out foreign trade transactions, such as buying or selling a particular parcel of goods. Further, it was the experience of the Canadian export board that many firms preferred to do business with a company which could sue and be sued, rather than with a department of government.

Mr. THATCHER: I am not clear as to what functions this company can perform that our trade commissioners cannot perform. Is there not likely to be some duplication?

Mr. MacKINNON: There is a mistaken idea that the trade commissioners representing Canada abroad are commercial travellers, and that they actually sell goods. That is not their function at all.

Mr. THATCHER: Do they not solicit trade?

Mr. MacKINNON: They seek out buyers in foreign countries—not so much individuals, although they would do it in that way—for merchandise in excess production in Canada. They do not sell a bill of goods, at all. They merely bring the buyer in a foreign country in touch with the vendor in Canada.

Mr. McKAY: What is the relationship between a trade commissioner and the Canadian Commercial corporation? Will these commissioners operate independently, or will they be servants of this organization?

Mr. MacKINNON: Actually there is no connection at all between our Canadian trade commissioners service abroad and this organization. As I said earlier, it may be that we may use their services to a slight extent in some foreign countries. But there is no duplication of service there; there is no conflict of service. It is not our intention to have any overlapping.

Mr. McKAY: Earlier in the evening the minister said that we were going to use certain of these trade commissioners to carry on the work of the corporation.

Mr. MacKINNON: I referred to the statement I had made earlier in the evening when I said it was possible that we may make use of our trade commissioners abroad in connection with this. But that has not yet been decided.

Mr. FAIR: How will the staff of the corporation be disposed of when its work is completed?

Mr. MacKINNON: The staff at present have the status of temporary civil servants only. I imagine, when the time comes, they will likely be absorbed in other branches of government, or in private industry.

Mr. BRYCE: Is the corporation going to do any advertising to sell goods?

Mr. MacKINNON: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the corporation not being set up to seek to deal in a big way, not in the direct sale of surplus goods, but between one government and another, or between one large buyer and a large vendor?

Mr. MacKINNON: The corporation is being and will be used in the manner suggested by the hon. member. At the present time, for instance, we are marketing fish through the facilities of this corporation.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the meat produced from the horses on the prairies around Swift Current not be sold through this corporation?

Mr. MacKINNON: That transaction would be handled through the Department of Agriculture.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. FRASER: Will the corporation be set up in the present offices of the export board?

Mr. MacKINNON: In the same place, yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Corporation established.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I should like to ask a question in connection with subsection 4. I notice that as directors there are a representative of the Department of National Revenue, customs and excise branch, a representative from industry and one from fishing. However, I see no director representing agriculture. Why is there no representative of agriculture on the directorate?

Mr. MacKINNON: Agriculture has its own facilities for handling this sort of thing; the meat board, for instance.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): The deputy minister of fisheries is mentioned.

Mr. HERRIDGE: What about British Columbia apples?

Mr. MacKINNON: They are not marketed through a government agency. In answer to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, the deputy minister of fisheries was shown when the bill was drafted because he was an employee at that time. However, he will have to be replaced.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Purposes.

Mr. SKEY: I notice in paragraph (b) (ii) it is provided that the corporation is established to dispose of goods and commodities that are available for export from Canada. I think I am correct in saying that there are very few manufactured products now available for export; they are mostly natural products; am I correct?

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes, I think that is correct.

Mr. SKEY: I think there are many manufactured products that might be made available for export now in small quantities. I realize that there are tremendous demands for manufactured products in Canada and that there are many export companies able to sell these products in foreign countries, but they are prohibited from doing so at the present time because of the shortages that exist here. I am going to advocate that some of our manufactured products be made available for export in small quantities so that new markets can be opened up. There are plenty of markets all over the world crying for consumer goods and, if we will do in a very small way what Great Britain is doing in a large way and deny ourselves just a little bit more, we shall open up channels of communication for the export of manufactured articles to many countries to which we have never sold before. I am going to advocate that, despite the shortages which exist, the Department of Trade and Commerce should follow a truly liberal policy in the granting of export permits in order to develop new markets. I think such a policy would return large dividends to this country in the future.

There is one other thing I should like to bring to the attention of the committee and the minister. UNRRA has been buying in bulk from Canada, so I am told, and is taking the whole of our production in certain lines, which leaves nothing available with which to open up new markets. I am told also that other countries with which UNRRA is dealing are selling only a part of their production, which leaves some available for export. I have not this information on good authority, but I think it is something we should guard against. If we are to continue to sell to UNRRA in order to help the people of Europe, I do not think we should sacrifice the whole of our export surplus. We should not be asked to do more than other countries are doing in this connection. We should still leave ourselves some surplus for export. Are the markets of the British empire being opened up to Canadian goods? Is there any conflict with the mother country, or are we able to compete with the mother country on an equal basis?

Mr. MacKINNON: In concluding his remarks, the hon. member has asked a most difficult question. The United Kingdom is doing everything in her power to establish an export trade, and in seeking export markets we are naturally in competition with the United Kingdom as we are with the other great trading nations. I do not think the United Kingdom is making it any easier for us than is any other country.

On section 5—Powers.

Mr. FRASER: Paragraph (c) refers to the storing and processing of goods or commodities, either as principal or agent. Storing is all right, but I object to the processing of goods by this corporation and I think that should be deleted.

Mr. MacKINNON: There is no intention to go into the processing or manufacturing at all. In some cases merchandise might have to be repacked and it is to give sufficient power to do so, that this section is included.

Mr. FRASER: If you want to put in "repack", all right, but I do not think you should provide for processing because it is too broad. This is an agency of the people; it is not a manufacturing firm.

Mr. MacKINNON: I mentioned a few minutes ago that one of the commodities that we are handling is fish. It is necessary to do a certain amount of processing of the fish in order to keep them in a proper frozen state.

Mr. GREEN: In what way?

Mr. MacKINNON: Freezing them and keeping them frozen.

Mr. GREEN: Do you not buy them frozen from the fish companies?

Mr. MacKINNON: I expect we do, but in the ordinary storage of the fish steps will have to be taken to see that that frozen state is maintained. I am quite familiar with the handling of fish in the part of Canada from which I come, in this country north of Edmonton. Large quantities of fish are exported in a semi-frozen state. I can quite conceive where that state would have to be maintained in any intermediate storage plant.

Mr. GREEN: Would not "storing" be broad enough to cover that?

Mr. MacKINNON: I do not think so, no.

Mr. FRASER: "Storing and packing" would be all right. I think the minister should change it because it is too broad.

Mr. MacKINNON: I can assure my hon. friend that there is no intention whatever of invading any manufacturing field.

Mr. MacNICOL: Russia is in the market for machinery for heavy industrial plants, and I know a company in Toronto that makes just the kind of machinery they are after. Would it be part of the business of this corporation to bring buyers in Russia or the government in Russia in contact with the producer of such machinery in Canada?

Mr. MacKINNON: Not necessarily to bring them together. If they were together and needed this kind of machinery to complete the deal, it would be available.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Would the minister expand a little more about this freezing of Edmonton fish because I did not quite understand it?

Mr. MacKINNON: The fish that I have in mind from the lakes north of Edmonton are shipped in a semi-frozen condition to the markets in Chicago and New York. They are shipped in great volume, and it was the maintenance of a proper state of freezing to which I was referring.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am very happy to have that from the minister because I thought he was speaking about people.

Mr. WINTERS: Will all exports arising out of foreign loans be handled through this corporation?

Mr. MacKINNON: Not necessarily.

Mr. WINTERS: Would the minister say what the machinery is and what the financial arrangements will be between foreign countries and the corporation?

Mr. MacKINNON: The corporation acts for the purchaser in the foreign country in placing the order and it gets cash from the purchaser in the foreign country.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Section 5 says that the corporation may carry on the business of importing goods or commodities into Canada and exporting goods or commodities from Canada. A little while ago the minister said it was not the function of this corporation to carry on business on its own. Would he enlarge on that and show just exactly what are the functions of the corporation because, if this wording of section 5 means what it says, it appears that the corporation will have power to carry on an importing and exporting business. If it is not going to do it on its own, on whose behalf will the corporation be acting?

Mr. MacKINNON: The corporation may technically be acting in its own right, but actually it will be acting as agent for the foreign government.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I do not understand that. It will act as agent for what body in Canada? It will be the agent between a foreign government or an importer in a foreign country and what body in Canada? Between what two bargaining bodies will the corporation act as agent?

Mr. MacKINNON: The corporation will act on behalf of the foreign government and the Canadian supplier. In another case it might be acting for the Canadian purchaser, where the supplier was a temporary government in occupied enemy territory.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Will the functions and activities of the corporation be confined to that type of business? For example, will the corporation act as agent between a private exporter in Canada and a private importer in another country, and vice versa, or will it deal only with foreign governments and private importers or exporters?

Mr. MacKINNON: I want the hon. member to remember that this corporation will not in any way invade the field of private business. It is the intention of the corporation to participate only in transactions which are unavailable to private trade at the present time.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I want to follow this up so that I can get a clear picture of the functions of the corporation. Do I understand from the minister that this corporation will in no way act as an export-import board? It will have no power to decide how much and what shall be exported or imported, but will merely act as a commercial agent between buyers and sellers in other countries and Canada?

Mr. MacKINNON: The position is essentially as the hon. member has just stated it.

Mr. LENNARD: How will this corporation get along with the wartime prices and trade board, which controls certain commodities and says how much shall be shipped into this country and really controls the distribution of certain commodities? Will there be a conflict or cooperation between these two bodies? How will that be worked out?

Mr. MacKINNON: This corporation will not be dealing in commodities in which the wartime prices and trade board deals, such as sugar, tea, and so forth.

Mr. McLURE: Will the Canadian Commercial Corporation become the purchaser for UNRRA, or will they be the export agent?

Mr. MacKINNON: The Canadian Commercial Corporation is now the procurement agent for UNRRA.

Mr. FRASER: I want to ask the minister how the corporation carries on. Are there any fees charged for its services? There is packaging and processing to do.

Mr. MacKINNON: It is intended that the corporation shall be self-sustaining. The intention of the corporation is to charge a handling fee of one-half of one per cent, which it is believed will cover expenses.

Mr. FRASER: One-half of one per cent of the Canadian price or the laid down price?

Mr. MacKINNON: One-half of one per cent of the purchase price.

Mr. WRIGHT: Will this corporation take over the functions of the bacon board?

Mr. MacKINNON: No.

Mr. BENTLEY: I still am not clear on the answers given by the minister a moment ago to the hon. member for Dauphin as to the corporation acting as agent or liaison officer. Section 5 says that the corporation will actually have the power to import goods. It says that it may carry on the business of:

(a) importing goods or commodities into Canada,

(b) exporting goods or commodities from Canada, and

(c) storing and processing goods or commodities, either as principal or as agent, in such manner and to such extent as it deems advisable to achieve the said purposes.

That gives the corporation power to act as principal or as agent, and if the corporation were to invoke that power would it be able to make a margin of profit on its operations? Or would the goods or commodities be handed over to the receiving party at cost? How would the transaction be carried on?

Mr. MacKINNON: I am not sure that I heard the hon. member's question fully. The corporation may, on occasion, have to act as principal. Take the case of something being required from Japan, from the military government of Japan. The purchaser in Canada would not be able to deal with an individual in that country, but this corporation could act on behalf of the purchaser in Canada.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Can the minister name the commodities in which this corporation will be dealing? I am trying to get some sort of picture of the set-up. It looks to me as if the minister is removing all possible functions from the corporation and making it impossible to tell what this $10,000,000 is to be used for, and then, having done so, he conveys the impression that it will be an important factor in our trade, I wish he would take some particular commodity and tell us exactly how the corporation will handle it. Will the corporation take money from the $10,000,000 which will be available to it and buy a particular commodity? Suppose the commodity were wheat in Canada. Would it buy the wheat and retain possession of it until it arrived in Japan and then take back goods from Japan? In short, how would it work?

Mr. MacKINNON: Let us take such a commodity as fish, which has been referred to.

Mr. GREEN: Alberta fish.

Mr. MacKINNON: In the first place, the $10,000,000 capital is to furnish a revolving fund for the operations of the corporation.

Mr. BLACKMORE: With some of which the corporation would actually buy produce?

Mr. MacKINNON: With some of which the corporation would actually buy fish, say for UNRRA, at the request of UNRRA. We would buy that fish with the corporation's funds at a price set by the Department of Fisheries and would accumulate a large shipment and deliver it to UNRRA in compliance with the request that we had already received.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And would the corporation buy a quantity of goods from Germany, Italy or Japan?

Mr. MacKINNON: The intention is to get cash from the Canadian purchaser and pay for the goods in the foreign country with that cash. It is not a profit-making corporation. One-half of one per cent is charged on the business done by the corporation and it is estimated that that will take care of expenses.

Mr. JOHNSTON: If you supply goods to UNRRA where will you get the commission?

[Mr. MacKinnon.]

Mr. MacKINNON: We would be paid by UNRRA after we had delivered the goods, and included in our price would be commission.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The minister said that it was not intended to go into manufacturing of any kind, and yet I see in paragraph (c) of subsection 1 the words "storing and processing goods or commodities". I can understand that goods might be handled in storage and still the corporation would not be engaged in the manufacturing business. But what would be required in the way of processing? Take fish. Would there be any processing?

Mr. MacNICOL: They would put more ice on them.

Mr. MacKINNON: The hon. gentleman should have been here when we were discussing this point. As far as processing is concerned, it is largely a matter of possible repacking.

Mr. JOHNSTON: It would not be carried beyond the point of repacking for shipment?

Mr. MacKINNON: That has all been dealt with earlier.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I know it has been dealt with, but the minister said the corporation was not going to go into the business of manufacturing. If this section is interpreted, however, as it is at present worded the corporation might very well go into business. It is all very well to say that processing does not mean what it says, but when it comes to the application of the act you cannot take the interpretation of any individual here. The corporation will carry on business in accordance with the terms of the act as worded, and in the act reference is definitely made to processing. The minister says that the only processing done will be something in the form of repacking, and I want to know whether that will be limited to repacking for purposes of shipment.

Mr. MacKINNON: I can assure my hon. friend that the government will not go into the business of manufacturing.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Employment of officers, and servants, R.S. c. 22.

Mr. GREEN: This is the clause that gives the corporation power to hire employees and incidentally gives them that power quite apart from the Civil Service Act, so that the employees will not be under the civil service commission. What are the salaries of the executive officers to be. I asked the minister that question on July 5, and he promised at that time to give the information when his officers were in the house. He has them here to-night.

Mr. MacKINNON: The managing director is W. D. Low, whose services have been lent to the government since July, 1939, by the Canadian National Railways. Prior to joining my department, he was executive assistant to the deputy minister of munitions. His salary is $9,500. The other executive officers are: T. F. Aspden, assistant manager of the corporation, formerly director general of the purchasing branch of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, salary $6,000; J. D. McCarthy, secretary of the corporation, formerly assistant secretary of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, salary $5,000; G. F. Wevill, comptroller, formerly comptroller of the inspection board of the United Kingdom and Canada, salary $6,000.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Head office branches.

Mr. KNIGHT: This section declares that the corporation shall establish its head office in Ottawa. I also notice that the directorate board is made up for the most part of deputy ministers. I do not know why in particular. The minister mentioned trade commissioners some time ago. We who live in the country which is tributary to Hudson bay have sometimes thought the Canadian trade commissioners showed something of a lack of enthusiasm for that route, and I should like to ask the minister whether there could not be placed on the board someone who would have interest in the west instead of having all the business centred in the east.

Mr. MacKINNON: Is my hon. friend suggesting that the trade commissioners may not be looking after the interests of western Canada as well?

Mr. KNIGHT: I am not suggesting anything; I am asking a question.

Mr. MacKINNON: Do I understand that the hon. member has already asked the question?

Mr. KNIGHT: I will ask it again.

Mr. MacKINNON: Please.

Mr. KNIGHT: The question is whether the minister would include on the directorate board someone who is known to be interested in the particular project I have mentioned, namely, the facilities of the Hudson bay route.

Mr. MacKINNON: I shall be glad to give it consideration.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister himself is from western Canada.

Mr. THATCHER: Is it contemplated setting up branch offices in western Canada?

Mr. MacKINNON: There are as yet no plans for branch offices. May I make this one remark with reference to trade commissioners? They are recruited from all parts of Canada. I say to hon. members from western Canada that some of the brightest of new blood taken into our trade commissioners' service are from the prairie provinces and British Columbia.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Are there any from Calgary?

Mr. BENTLEY: There are no bright ones from anywhere else.

Mr. THATCHER: I agree with what the minister has said, but he has not said whether or not any branch offices are likely to be set up in western Canada. That is the answer I should like to get from him.

Mr. MacKINNON: It is quite improbable that there will be any branch offices in Canada, but that is something on which we cannot speak with any authority.

Mr. THATCHER: Anywhere in Canada?

Mr. MacKINNON: We are establishing warehouses.

Mr. KNIGHT: Subsection 1 of section 7 distinctly says:

> The corporation shall establish its head office in Ottawa and may establish such branch offices, either inside or outside Canada . . .

Mr. MacKINNON: "As it deems necessary."

Mr. KNIGHT: The minister is not trying to tell me that the words mean that they are to be established either inside or outside Canada? It is quite evident that the language means both inside and outside Canada. My colleague's question was quite proper. He asked whether any branches were to be established in western Canada, and it seems to me to be a natural question.

Mr. MacKINNON: I have been trying to answer the question by saying "no," that it is improbable that there will be any branch offices established in western or eastern Canada or outside Canada.

Mr. KNIGHT: May we delete it from the subsection?

Mr. MacKINNON: We have the authority if it is necessary.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Grants and advances to corporation.

Mr. GREEN: There is one provision in section 8 which should be explained. I refer to paragraph (b) of subsection 1 which gives power to make any other advances or grants to the corporation that are otherwise—

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the hon. member speak louder? There is so much noise around me that I cannot hear.

Mr. GREEN: Paragraph (a) of subsection 1 of section 8 provides for grants and advances to the corporation to the extent of $10,000,000 out of the unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund. In addition to that, further power is taken in paragraph (b) covering any other advances or grants to the corporation that are otherwise authorized to be made from the consolidated revenue fund. I do not remember ever having seen a provision of that kind in a bill before. I should like to know what it is meant to cover.

Mr. MacKINNON: If it is necessary to enlarge the working capital, which we do not look forward to, this will give us the necessary authority. We do not expect that there will be an increase in it.

Mr. GREEN: I certainly object to blanket power of that kind being taken. Paragraph (a) provides as follows:

> An amount or amounts not exceeding in the aggregate $10,000,000.

We are led to believe that we are committed to an expenditure of $10,000,000. Then, to be on the safe side, after having $10,000,000 to play with, we get paragraph (b) which reads as follows:

> Any other advances or grants to the corporation that are otherwise authorized to be made from the consolidated revenue fund.

An hon. MEMBER: Any amount.

Mr. GREEN: Unlimited. I submit that paragraph (b) should be deleted from the bill. If you want $15,000,000 now say so and we shall know what we are doing. This business of asking for $10,000,000 now and any additional amounts which may be required is not right.

Mr. MacKINNON: I do not think it is in keeping with the hon. member to suggest that there is any attempt to do something which the bill does not provide for here.

Mr. GREEN: The bill does provide for it; that is the trouble.

[Mr. MacKinnon.]

Mr. MacKINNON: The bill provides for:

> An amount or amounts not exceeding in the aggregate ten million dollars to be paid out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund.

The only way in which that can be done is by this parliament; the company itself cannot do it.

Mr. GREEN: Why do you take the second power?

Mr. MacKINNON: And any other—

Mr. GREEN: It reads "any other advances".

Mr. MacKINNON: "Any other advances or grants to the corporation that are otherwise authorized to be made from the consolidated revenue fund." That is it exactly. Should it be found necessary to do that in the future, they will have to come back to parliament for it; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. GREEN: It does not say that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: "Otherwise authorized" is the expression which is giving the trouble. Authorized by whom?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This is a bill which sets up the corporation. The corporation has to have enabling powers. With respect to moneys, they have to be authorized by parliament. The reason for paragraph (b) is to give enabling power to the corporation to receive other grants which might be made by parliament if it were found necessary to make them. If there were some special thing being contemplated for which a grant was felt to be in order the grant could be made by the estimates without amending the enabling powers of the corporation. This is merely to provide that in this act there will be the right to the receiver general to make advances up to $10,000,000, but if something special were authorized by another act of parliament it would not interfere or cut down the provision made by paragraph (a).

Mr. GREEN: Yes, but that would be covered by the other act of parliament when it is found that, say another $5,000,000 is required for some special purpose; that has to be approved by act of parliament and the same act of parliament could give to the corporation whatever powers are necessary.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It could.

Mr. GREEN: I submit that that is the way in which it should be done rather than taking blanket authority at this time. It says "otherwise authorized." What we may get would be a vote in the ordinary estimates, and we may find that this corporation is getting $5,000,000 in that way. I suggest that is not the proper way to do it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think there would be any objection to that. I do not think there would be any objection to there being an additional grant authorized by a vote in the estimates without its being necessary to amend the charter of the corporation.

Mr. GREEN: These moneys are not being administered by the department. It would be different if they were being administered by the department and the minister would have to come into the house, stand up and take his medicine if the expenditures were not properly made. These expenditures are to be made by another one of these crown companies, and by the time parliament catches up with the expenditures which are made by crown companies we shall all be in the Senate. I suggest that the minister delete paragraph (b) from the bill.

Mr. BOUCHER: Would that paragraph permit a further advance to be made to the corporation by order in council without special reference to parliament at all, or by an item in the estimates not specially designated? As I understand it, the bill empowers the receiver general to advance $10,000,000 out of the unappropriated moneys. Paragraph (b) would also authorize advances of more money on occasions.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Not unless additional advances were specially authorized by parliament.

Mr. BOUCHER: But if special authority is given; why cannot we have special authority to appropriate the funds and not have this paragraph give the authority of parliament to some other concern to advance $10,000,000 out of the unappropriated funds?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would it clarify the paragraph to any extent if the minister would put in additional words after the words "authorized" and make it read "otherwise authorized by parliament." Would there be any objection to adding these two words?

Mr. MacKINNON: That is the intention, and I should be quite satisfied to accept that suggestion.

Mr. BRACKEN: Will the minister say what it is proposed to use this $10,000,000 for? Is that for current expenditures in the operation of this concern, or is it an advance that will be repayable to the government later on?

Mr. MacKINNON: It is a revolving fund, as I explained a little earlier this evening, using as an example the item of fish. We would use this money to purchase fish to fill an order we had received from UNRRA. We would sell the fish to UNRRA and get payment for it, and that money would go back into the revolving fund. The price at which the sale would be made would be set by the Department of Fisheries.

Mr. BRACKEN: Then it is anticipated that there will be no loss on those operations and that when this board ceases to function, if it ever does, this $10,000,000 will be returnable to the consolidated revenue fund?

Mr. MacKINNON: That is the intention. Earlier I also explained that we are charging a commission of one-half of one per cent, which we anticipate will cover our yearly expenses.

Mr. BRACKEN: The minister expects that the treasury will be reimbursed to the extent of $10,000,000 if this amount is advanced to the corporation?

Mr. MacKINNON: I do.

Mr. BOUCHER: May I ask if the Government Companies Operation Act is not sufficient as it now stands to permit the government to issue more than $10,000,000 to the Canadian Commercial Corporation without further reference to parliament? It is my opinion that under this act the treasury advances $10,000,000, but that the Government Companies Operation Act could be brought in under paragraph (b) to advance further sums with no reference at all to parliament, and no appropriation by parliament. I wonder if the minister could explain that.

Mr. MacKINNON: I am informed that the act referred to by my hon. friend does not apply to this corporation at all. It applies only to companies organized under the dominion Companies Act.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Mr. Blackmore has moved an amendment inserting the words "by parliament," so that paragraph (b) would read:

—any other advances or grants to the corporation that are otherwise authorized by parliament to be made from the consolidated revenue fund.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BRACKEN: Does this item of $10,000,000 appear in the estimates of the minister's department for this year?

Mr. MacKINNON: This $10,000,000 will not appear in my departmental estimates this year. We do not intend to use anything like this amount immediately, and at the present time we are financing on moneys advanced to the Canadian export board, the predecessor of this company.

Mr. GREEN: How much money did you get from them?

Mr. MacKINNON: About $4,000,000.

Mr. BRACKEN: Some of this money will be used this year, will it not?

Mr. MacKINNON: We are using the $4,000,000 now as capital, the money we have on hand at the present time.

Mr. BRACKEN: But you are asking for $10,000,000 in this bill.

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: Will not some part of that be used this year?

Mr. MacKINNON: Section 8 provides.

> The Minister of Finance shall, on the request of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, from time to time deposit to the credit of the corporation . . .

We are not asking for all this money at the present time.

Mr. BRACKEN: Then this is the situation confronting us. We have had the budget of the Minister of Finance, with the estimated expenditures for the year on current items amounting to some $2,700 million. Now we have in this form another appropriation bill providing for the advance or expenditure of $10,000,000 which does not appear in the statement of expenditures given by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech. The point I am making is that this measure is in itself an appropriation bill. It says this money may be advanced out of "unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund." I have spoken of this on various occasions previously. The consolidated revenue fund is the total of all the revenues received by this government. All the money goes into one pot. The appropriated revenues are those passed by this house in the estimates we consider from time to time. The unappropriated moneys are any balance there may be over what the government has been authorized to spend. By this bill we are adding to the expenditures the government has so far brought before us. In other words, we have another appropriation bill.

Mr. GREEN: The minister said they were taking over $4,000,000 from the Canadian export board, which was set up by order in council. Is that in addition to the $10,000,000 provided in this bill?

Mr. MacKINNON: No.

[Mr. MacKinnon.]

Mr. GREEN: It is included in the $10,000,000?

Mr. MacKINNON: It is included in the $10,000,000.

Mr. FRASER: This section provides that the accounts of the corporation shall be audited by the auditor general. Is it the intention of the minister that a statement will be sent to each member of the house, or how will we get those accounts? That will not appear in the auditor general's report, will it?

Mr. MacKINNON: The matter raised by the hon. member for Peterborough West is dealt with in section 13, which we have not as yet reached.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister say whether the $4,000,000 he already has in hand is to be returned from the $10,000,000 he may receive under section 8(a), or is he to retain the $4,000,000 he now has and have authority to obtain the $10,000,000 provided by this section?

Mr. MacKINNON: The $10,000,000 asked for is the total. It includes the $4,000,000.

Mr. HACKETT: But will the minister say what will happen to the $4,000,000 he has on hand at the present time?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think the hon. member will find that point covered by section 16, which provides:

> The Canadian Commercial Corporation order (P.C. 1218) made by the governor in council on the twenty-ninth day of March, nineteen hundred and forty-six, under the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, is revoked and anything at any time done by or pursuant to that order shall be deemed to have been done at that time by or pursuant to this act.

So that the $4,000,000 becomes part of the $10,000,000 the Minister of Finance is authorized to advance.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 9 and 10 agreed to.

On section 11—By-laws.

Mr. GREEN: I wish the minister would explain the latter part of this section, which provides:

> The corporation may, subject to the approval of the governor in council, make such by-laws as it may deem necessary,
> (a) to carry out this act, or—

I should think that would have been enough, but they go on:

> (b) to authorize the president, executive officers or employees of the corporation to exercise powers vested in the corporation, and any such by-law, if it is not inconsistent with this act, shall be valid notwithstanding that it is inconsistent with any statute or other law applicable to the civil service or the conduct of public business.

I should like to know, first of all, why you have that power to authorize employees of the corporation to exercise powers that parliament is giving the corporation itself, and then why the last provision is put in under which those bylaws can override any statute or other law applicable to the civil service or to the conduct of public business.

Mr. MacKINNON: I shall endeavour to give a layman's explanation, from information given to me. I believe this additional authority is required to enable the officers of the company to engage and to dismiss staff; and further, they are given the power to purchase other than by tender, which may not be according to legislation governing government purchases.

Mr. GREEN: If that is what is wanted, why not say so?

Mr. MacKINNON: This is legal phraseology.

Mr. GREEN: No, it is not; that is the trouble. This is bureaucratic phraseology giving officers of the company powers which are far too wide. I suggest that the requirement would be met if the section stopped after the word "act" at the end of paragraph (a).

Mr. MacKINNON: I am advised that that would not be sufficient.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Shall section 11 carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. FULTON: Before that is done, I should like to ask a question respecting section 11. By whom has the minister been advised? Is that a ruling from the Department of Justice?

Mr. MacKINNON: The measure has been approved in detail by the Department of Justice.

Mr. FULTON: Was this specific point raised in consultation with the department?

Mr. MacKINNON: I cannot say at the present time.

Mr. HACKETT: Does that mean that all the employees of this corporation might be taken into its service or dismissed without regard to the Civil Service Act, or as to whether they have served overseas?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. We are on section 12.

Mr. HACKETT: We are on section 11.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): No; section 11 was carried.

Mr. GREEN: No, it was not.

Mr. HACKETT: No; section 11 was not carried. We have been discussing it, and I should like to know if it means that all the employees who may enter the service of the corporation may be engaged without reference to the Civil Service Act.

Mr. MacKINNON: The staff being set up by this legislation does not come under the control of the civil service commission. However, we have recruited the present staff through the civil service commission, and they have the standing equivalent to temporary employees. It is our intention to continue to recruit staff through the civil service commission, following the same principle.

Mr. HACKETT: Then, if that is the minister's intention, why is he enacting legislation to free himself from that obligation? If the provision is interpreted as the minister interprets it, the returned man would be deprived of his preference. Is it a matter of policy to set aside a returned man in connection with the engaging of employees for this commercial corporation?

Mr. MacKINNON: In that respect this corporation is just the same as any other crown company. There is a greater percentage of returned men on its staff than in any government department. It is over fifty per cent war veterans.

Mr. HACKETT: If the corporation has observed all the statutes governing the employment of servants taken into any government agency, what is the purpose of seeking to escape from the statute which makes it obligatory to refer to the civil service commission when employees are required? Is it because the corporation may wish to pay higher salaries than are authorized by the civil service commission, or is it because it may wish to take persons who are older than those who would be taken in by the commission? What is the reason for seeking to escape from the ordinary rules controlling the employment of servants by the government?

Mr. MacKINNON: Earlier this evening I gave information respecting salaries.

Mr. HACKETT: If the question was answered before, then I do not wish to have it answered again.

Mr. MacKINNON: It was only partly answered. The staff might be a highly fluctuating one. A great deal depends on just how much business we may be doing at a certain time. It might be necessary to cut down or to enlarge the staff quickly.

Mr. HACKETT: But the Civil Service Act provides for all that. Hundreds of employees are taken into the post office service at Christmas time, and other employees are taken in at harvest time. The Civil Service Act provides for all that. I am trying to find a reason for placing this corporation outside the act.

Mr. MacKINNON: I would point out to the hon. member for Stanstead that in the very nature of things this is temporary legislation. Earlier this evening I was pressed to state the maximum number of years that this corporation would continue to function, and I explained that it was impossible to do that but that it was not the intention of the government to carry on this organization any longer than was necessary. Even in the review of the civil service by the royal commission it was not suggested that this corporation should come under the civil service commission more directly than is proposed by this bill.

Mr. MacINNIS: Even with the statement which the minister made just as I came in, I find it difficult to understand, equally as difficult as the hon. member for Stanstead, why the staff of this corporation should be excluded from the civil service. I believe the minister stated that all the staff that had been taken on was taken on through the civil service commission and that it was the intention of the corporation to take on whatever additional staff might be required through the civil service commission.

Mr. MacKINNON: May I make a correction? If I made that statement, I made it in error. I intended to say that this corporation was following the same principle of engagement, veterans' preference and so forth, as the civil service commission.

Mr. MacINNIS: Why not go all the way and have them full-fledged civil servants with all the rights, privileges and obligations of civil servants? I do not think the temporary nature of the corporation should be a consideration. After all, a corporation, the life of which you do not know, is not necessarily a temporary one; it may continue forever. So far, no good reason has been given why these employees should be excluded from the civil service.

Mr. FRASER: Are these employees covered by the superannuation act or anything of that kind?

[Mr. MacKinnon.]

Mr. MacKINNON: No; they are not subject to superannuation.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I am a little concerned about the last paragraph which provides that these by-laws shall be valid, notwithstanding that it is inconsistent with any statute or other law applicable to the civil service or the conduct of public business. It seems to me that you are taking in a great deal of territory by having these by-laws override any statute that has to do with the conduct of public business.

Mr. MacKINNON: One of the things that comes to mind is the procedure in connection with tendering and entering into of contracts.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: If this is intended to apply only to particular instances I do not see the necessity of making it so sweeping. The provision is that these by-laws will override any statute that has to do with the conduct of public business. I believe we should strike out practically everything in paragraph (b).

Mr. HACKETT: The minister mentioned two occasions on which he thought the bill should grant more latitude to the corporation than it otherwise would have. The second occasion he mentioned was the making of purchases not by tender. What is the objection to proceeding in the ordinary way and calling for tenders from suppliers of material or performers of work?

Mr. MacKINNON: I should like the hon. member to conceive of how you would buy something in Japan by the ordinary method of calling for tenders. Wider powers must be given.

Mr. HACKETT: I should like to call to the attention of the minister a fact with which I am sure he is fully acquainted. Governments have found it necessary to adopt cumbersome methods of doing business. The forcing of governments to call for tenders is the result of experience. It is done to protect the taxpayer and to protect the ministers who represent the taxpayers in government administration. As a result of long experience, it has been found that tenders publicly called for and publicly opened are the only safeguards that the people and their governments have against dishonesty. I like to think that our government is honest and that everybody who deals with it is honest, but, after all, we have had the experience of eighty years and this provision has been in all our statutes. I think some serious reason should be advanced for setting it aside.

Mr. MacKINNON: The corporation has followed the habit of purchasing by tender in Canada or wherever else it is practical to do so, but, as I mentioned a moment ago, there are certain circumstances where it would be absolutely impracticable to buy by the tender method. The corporation will have to use other methods. It will be acting as agent for a private purchaser whom it has to satisfy. This whole matter has been carefully considered by the officers of the department and checked by the Department of Justice, and these special powers are being given to the corporation because we have found by actual practice that it is necessary that they have them.

Mr. GREEN: I cannot see any wisdom in giving crown companies such extensive powers. I do not wonder at the officers of the corporation wanting to get them, but that is no excuse for parliament giving them such powers. I should like to move:

That all the words in section 11 of Bill No. 251 after the word "necessary" in line 7 on page 4 be deleted and the following substituted therefor: "to carry out this act."

That would give the corporation power to make by-laws to carry out the act. It would then read that the corporation may, subject to the approval of the governor in council, make such by-laws as it may deem necessary to carry out this act. I would urge the minister to accept that amendment because it gives the power to make regulations to carry out the act.

Mr. MacKINNON: Take the matter of tendering. Does the hon. member suggest that his amendment would enable the corporation to purchase other than by tender?

Mr. GREEN: I do not know that, but the corporation has power to carry on its business and this would give it power to make by-laws. I think it goes too far to give power to make by-laws that override our statutory law.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: May I point out that the amendment would give the board power to carry out the terms of the act. To go back to section 5:

The corporation may do such things as it deems expedient for, or conducive to, the attainment of the purposes set forth in section 4 of this act.

The amendment does not seem to me to tie the hands of the corporation, because by section 5 it may still do what it considers necessary. Another objectionable feature of section 11(b) is that executive officers or employees of the corporation may exercise the powers vested in the corporation. That seems extraordinary, to say the least.

Mr. MacKINNON: The officers of the corporation considered that this language was necessary, but I am willing to accept the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver South and try it out.

Mr. GREEN: Thank you.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. HACKETT: The minister has referred to the temporary nature of the act. Is there any provision which says that the act is to last for only one or two years?

Mr. MacKINNON: That has all been covered.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 12—Corporation to act by resolution of the board.

Mr. MacNICOL: Subsection 4 says:

A director may authorize a delegate to act on his behalf as director and the delegate while so acting shall be deemed to be a director.

The directors themselves are appointed by the governor in council. Why should the governor in council not also appoint the delegate? Further, why should a director have power to appoint a delegate who may be anybody at all, a man of no capacity, so far as the wording of this subsection goes. I do not like the term "delegate".

Mr. MacKINNON: We are trying to tie in the operations of this corporation with the department and have departmental representatives as much as possible. In cases where the senior officer is absent his deputy or assistant can act for him.

Mr. MacNICOL: I would see no objection to that if it said that, but a delegate may be anybody, a man off the street or from anywhere else—a friend of the director.

Mr. GREEN: This, again, is peculiar legislation. If you want to have the assistant of the man who is named as a director appointed, for example, the assistant of our very good deputy minister of customs and excise, David Sim.

Mr. MacKINNON: Take Mr. H. B. McKinnon.

Mr. GREEN: You provide for a small quorum anyway. Is that not sufficient? But this gives any director the right to name anybody as his delegate to sit in on that board. All these directors are residents of Ottawa. It is not as if they were scattered across the country and could not get a quorum together very easily. Surely this is not good legislation.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why not strike out subsection 4?

Mr. MacKINNON: These senior civil servants do quite a bit of travelling and the use of the word "delegate" was carefully thought out.

Mr. GREEN: It sounds like a political convention.

Mr. MacKINNON: At one time we thought of using the word "deputy", but Mr. Hector McKinnon has no deputy. The word "delegate" was used to enable the directors to appoint a high ranking civil servant from the department to act in the event of one of them being absent.

Mr. GREEN: Why not say, may appoint someone in his department? Mr. McKinnon is the only one who would not have anyone in his department, is he not?

Mr. MacKINNON: I can give another case. Take Mr. Saint-Amour of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. GREEN: Someone else from the Bank of Canada could represent him.

Mr. MacKINNON: These men are the very senior government officials, and it is presumed that we have sufficient confidence in them to trust them to select a proper deputy or delegate in the event of a director being absent.

Mr. HACKETT: Is it not well for the protection of the government, if for no other reason, that the directors should be known? If it be necessary to increase the number, very well; but it is a complete departure from the law that governs corporations to have a board of directors on a sliding scale. There is no identity then, and there would be no responsibility. The board, I assume, is responsible for the business of the corporation, and it is going to have what seems to many of us substantial sums of money at its disposal. It will have grave responsibility as well. I suggest most respectfully to the minister that he increase the number of his board if he believes that is necessary, but I suggest also that the identity of the board should be definite and final. He may wish to consult a specialist in this or that aspect of his business, and there is nothing to prevent him from inviting such a person to the board meeting or from consulting. I must submit, however, with great deference that a board that slithers and slides about at the whim of anyone who wishes to go fishing is hardly good enough for a corporation of this importance, and I therefore suggest that the number of directors be fixed and their names known so that we know with whom we are dealing at all times.

Mr. GRAYDON: Another point which the minister might consider is this. This may be a small affair to the minister, but these small affairs have a habit of creeping up until they become precedents, as in the many crown companies which this parliament has already exercised its powers to create. Let me point this out in simple terms. We are stretching the chain of responsibility too far so that we are getting all the time farther away from the people who pay the shot. The first link in that chain is the taxpayer; then you have parliament; then you have the government; then the next link in the chain is the corporation under consideration; the next link the director; and now we are going to add still another link, namely, the right of the director to appoint another director in his stead. In other words, there are six links from the time you leave the man who pays the taxes until you reach the man who is spending the money, and I suggest that that is stretching the chain too far. There must be a halt somewhere. As far as responsibility is concerned, if this is to be a precedent for the future, the chain should be shortened rather than lengthened.

Mr. MacINNIS: What is the sense of designating the board of directors in section 3 and then putting in a provision in section 12 that each director may appoint a delegate whom nobody knows?

Mr. MacNICOL: Or where he comes from.

Mr. MacINNIS: He can pick up a delegate anywhere and say that he is a responsible person. But, after all, you cannot draw up legislation on the assumption that everyone who is to be associated with it is a responsible person.

Mr. GRAYDON: You would not need legislation.

Mr. MacINNIS: No. If you could do that you would not need legislation at all. Here we have a board of directors each one of whom may appoint a director to act in his behalf when, I presume, he is unable to be present. In my opinion that is certainly not consistent legislation.

Mr. MacKINNON: It may be that we have sought to be meticulous, be careful, in anticipating all possibilities and have made provision where it is unnecessary. If the dropping of this provision is satisfactory I am prepared to have it deleted.

Mr. MacNICOL: I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), that clause 4 of section 12 be deleted.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): That has already been suggested and moved by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is a difference between a suggestion and an amendment. We are just saving the government work.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The minister has indicated that he is prepared to have the Minister of Justice move an amendment to that effect. Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. HACKETT: Does the minister feel that the number of directors is sufficient? He has seven directors and five is a quorum.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Section 3 provides for a president and a board of not more than nine or less than five directors.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 14 to 16 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUCCESSION DUTIES

AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED KINGDOM—AVOIDANCE OF DOUBLE TAXATION

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister) moved the second reading of bill No. 301, respecting a succession duty agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom, signed at London, in England, on the 5th day of June, 1946.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not sure whether the minister has made a comprehensive statement with reference to the subject matter of this bill, but if he has not done so either on the resolution or at some other stage, I suggest that before second reading is given he ought to make that statement.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I understand that a comprehensive statement was made by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) at the resolution stage, and I had hoped it would be sufficient to state at this time that the bill is to give legal effect to an arrangement entered into between the government of the United Kingdom and the government of Canada to avoid, if possible, duplication of succession duties. There are quite a large number of provisions in the agreement, all designed to avoid payment of succession duties both in Canada and in the United Kingdom on the same property, and that required agreement of the contracting parties to determine a great many questions respecting which decisions had not been the same in the two countries.

The situation which gives rise to a possibility of double taxation is where the decedent resides in one country and dies leaving property in the other. When it is tangible property there is not too much difficulty, though there may be double taxation; but even when there is a desire to avoid double taxation, if you do not follow the same principles for the purpose of determining where is the legal situs of the property you do not achieve the result. Therefore it was necessary to examine carefully the whole situation and agree upon rules which would apply in both jurisdictions to determine the situs of property and to determine in what jurisdiction it could be taxed and what credit would be given in the other jurisdiction when the tax was paid.

I think all hon. members would agree with the desirability of an arrangement of that kind. As hon. members know, there is a similar arrangement between Canada and the United States which was sanctioned by legislation passed by this parliament in 1944. In the general desire to facilitate trade and to eliminate obstacles which prevent that freedom of choice in setting up commercial establishments or branches thereof it is desirable to avoid this doubling of taxation. It is serious enough to have to pay them once, and I think all will agree that it is desirable, in order that these tax laws may not prevent the interchange of investment, to strive toward a goal of avoiding double taxation. This agreement was entered into for that purpose, and the legislation which is submitted to parliament is for the purpose of giving it legislative sanction; because, of course, there has to be legislative sanction to avoid the application of the taxes imposed by statutes in the two countries.

The bill gives legislative sanction to the agreement and if it is desired explanations can be given in committee as to the various clauses of the agreement and the reason for each one of them. I would hope on the principle that we would all agree that we were striving toward a desirable goal, and that the only criticism could be upon the effectiveness of the clauses to reach that goal. That could be more conveniently considered or explained at the committee stage.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister say whether this bill is restricted to duty levied by the dominion? I do not assume that it has any bearing upon duty which may be levied by any of the provinces. Are there any provisions which enable the provinces to avail themselves of this understanding?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; this is an agreement between the government of the United Kingdom and the government of Canada. The duties which are the subject of the agreement are in the United Kingdom, the estate duty imposed by the United Kingdom, and in Canada the succession duty imposed by Canada. It was well realized by the government of the United Kingdom that there were also succession duties imposed by provincial governments to which this would not in terms apply; but there was the hope that it would be a good example which the provinces might find it to their advantage and to the advantage of their respective citizens to follow.

Mr. HACKETT: Are there not agreements already existing between the United Kingdom and some of the provinces?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am informed that there are agreements existing between Quebec, Nova Scotia and British Columbia on the one part and the United Kingdom on the other.

Mr. GRAYDON: Have the agreements which are made between Nova Scotia and the United Kingdom been confirmed by legislation of the two parties involved?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not sure that there has been confirming legislation; I am under the impression that in the Quebec succession duties act there is authority given to the lieutenant governor in council to enter into reciprocal arrangements for the purpose of avoiding double taxation. I think it is the same in British Columbia. I believe there is empowering legislation under which the executive government may make an arrangement, and when it is made it operates by virtue of the empowering legislation. I am informed that even with respect to this agreement there will not have to be special legislation in the United Kingdom; that the finance statutes of the United Kingdom authorize the chancellor of the exchequer to make agreements of this kind, and that they can be made effective under order in council without further enactment by the United Kingdom parliament. But here there was no special enabling legislation. My experience over the last few years has been that it was preferable to come to parliament and say just what one wanted to have confirmed rather than to ask parliament to give one blanket authority in advance.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister has been an excellent scholar.

Mr. HACKETT: Does the minister think it would be the better plan to go through the agreement before considering the legislation?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That would make it much easier to understand what would be the effect of the legislation. Of course the various clauses of the agreement will not be carried or defeated, but they can be called and passed and then we can go back to the legislation.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister mentioned similar legislation with respect to the United States government which was entered into in 1944. Are there any other countries with which Canada has made a similar agreement at any time with respect to succession duties?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, not up to the present time.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are there not other countries in connection with which this situation would apply in similar measure; and, if so, what provision is being made, or what negotiations are in progress with respect to those other countries?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I understand there is a pretty general feeling, among the united nations at least, that arrangements of this kind are desirable. So far, Canada has not had any active negotiations with other governments. It is known that we have an arrangement with the United States of America. It is known that we have an arrangement with the government of the United Kingdom and are submitting it to parliament, and there have been conversations with representatives of the French government, but as yet they have not reached the point where any drafts have been prepared.

Mr. GRAYDON: No other part of the commonwealth?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; I am informed there is not as yet any other part of the commonwealth. This agreement provides that it can be extended to all the colonies and dependencies of the United Kingdom, and that the extension can be acquiesced in or refused by us without affecting the main agreement between ourselves and the United Kingdom, which is to last for a minimum period of three years and then to continue after that time unless denounced.

Mr. McMASTER: I always understood there was a difference in the interpretation of the situs of personal property as between the rules followed by the succession duties office and the rules followed generally in other cases. Would the minister care to say which rule has been adopted in making this agreement?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The common law rule has been adopted expressly in a great many instances, and in other instances it would be questionable whether the agreement reached is the common law rule or not; there is doubt as to what is the common law rule. For certainly the special cases were envisaged and a decision was made as to what the parties would regard as the rule applicable in both jurisdictions. The deputy minister for taxation tells me that in some cases what was regarded as the common law rule was definitely departed from as not being appropriate to present-day conditions.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The Chair called section 1. Now it has been suggested that we deal with the agreement itself before we go on with the sections of the bill. If that is agreeable to the committee we will call article I of the agreement, on page 2 of the bill.

On article I:

Mr. IRVINE: I imagine I can ask my question on this article. I notice that in the definition of the United Kingdom it is shown to be composed of England, Wales, Scotland and so forth. There is no such corresponding definition of Canada, which I presume would mean mentioning the nine provinces. What I am worrying about is whether some provinces may retain their right to levy succession duty taxes. In that case this agreement would not be an agreement at all, would it?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It will operate if the provinces continue to levy succession duty taxes, because the dominion government levies a substantial succession duty itself. The proposal contained in the budget resolutions is that in such provinces as may continue to levy succession duties themselves there will be a credit on the federal tax of roughly the amount of the provincial duty. This agreement is between the federal government and the government of the United Kingdom, and applies to the federal government's tax and the tax imposed by the United Kingdom. It may not at once have the effect of eliminating all duplication of taxes, because the rules as to situs may not be accepted by one or more province that will continue to levy succession duties, but it will be a substantial improvement on what has existed heretofore.

Mr. McMASTER: Would the minister say whether the words "estate duty" are wide enough? As I recollect it, they have estate duties, inheritance taxes and possibly succession duties; that is, there are different imposts. It would not be enough for us to get rid of the estate duty unless we also got rid of the inheritance tax, unless the act in the United Kingdom has been consolidated in the last year.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: My information is that the estate duty is the heavy tax, and that is the only one with respect to which the United Kingdom authorities were willing to make an agreement. They were not willing to include in the agreement the lesser taxes such as legacy duty or inheritance tax. We got an agreement with them as far as they were willing to go.

On article II:

Mr. FULTON: There is a very small point here. Would the minister just tell us why the Isle of Man is omitted? I ask that question because I have personal knowledge of the case of a Canadian who has interests on the Isle of Man. Is it because the United Kingdom has no legislative jurisdiction over the Isle of Man?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The Isle of Man may come in as a sovereign jurisdiction under article VIII of the agreement, but the government of the United Kingdom was not willing to include it without obtaining the prior consent of the proper authorities of the island.

Article agreed to.

On article III:

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This is an important article, which determines many of these disputed questions of situs.

Mr. HACKETT: Have they been all determined according to the rules that obtain in Great Britain, or have they adopted some of our rules? For instance, I notice in paragraph (f) this provision:

> Shares, stock . . . shall be deemed to be situated at the place where the company was incorporated . . .

That is quite a departure, is it not, from the rule we have observed up to date? I am just wondering what is going to happen to our transfer offices in Great Britain. We went to some expense to open them up over there, and

I suppose the minister knows what that situation is. Perhaps he might be good enough to tell us?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It might be helpful if I were to give hon. members this statement which has been prepared respecting article III. Clauses (a), (d), (h), (i), (j), (k), (l), (m) and (n) are thought to be a repetition of the common law rule.

Clause (b) deals with the situs of negotiable bills of exchange and negotiable promissory notes, and with the situs of property in transitu.

It has been held in England that bills of exchange and promissory notes do not alter the nature of simple contract debts, and these debts are situate in England if the debtor is resident there. On the other hand, the Supreme Court of Canada has recently decided that negotiable instruments are subject to duty if found in Canada. Clause (b) now makes a uniform rule applicable in the determination of the situs of all negotiable instruments, namely, that they are to be regarded as situated where they are found at the time of the owner's death.

Mr. HACKETT: Is that a special rule?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, that is a rule which has been agreed upon in deference to the decision of our supreme court, though it is contrary to what was held previously in the United Kingdom in respect of several of these instruments.

With regard to property in transitu the rule in England has been that where property is in transit to that country at the time of the owner's death it is situated there. In a recent Ontario case, however, this principle was not applied in the case of property in transit from Ontario to the United States. Clause (b) now makes a uniform rule applicable to the situs of this class of property.

Clause (c) provides that all debts, whether secured or unsecured, shall be deemed to be situated at the place where the debtor was resident.

Mr. HACKETT: What does that mean? Shares are not included as debts.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Debts secured or unsecured, and whether under seal or not. It does away with the distinction between specialties and simple contract debts. That is for the purpose of having a uniform rule. The hon. member knows that simple debts were deemed to be situate where the debtor resided, but that a debt evidenced by an instrument under seal was deemed to be situate where the instrument was found. The agreement provides that that distinction will not exist. A debt, whether under seal or not, shall be deemed to be situate at the residence of the debtor.

Mr. HACKETT: Then this agreement may give some strange results in taxation. We are going to have a set of rules which are the result of agreement between the dominion and Great Britain. There is another set of rules in effect between Great Britain and Quebec. The rules which obtain there as to shares would be entirely different from the ones in effect here. I do not know that the dominion will be influenced in any way by previous agreements which exist between Great Britain and the provinces, but it may result in great hardship, I should think, because you are going to have a property taxed in Great Britain under one set of rules and in Canada under another. Unless arrangements are made for set-offs and reciprocals, it seems to me that there may be entanglements. Of course the minister may say that is an argument in favour of making over succession duties to the provinces.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think this will remove, to the extent to which the jurisdiction of parliament can go, the payment of double taxes. It may be that something which will not be regarded as situated in Canada for the purpose of the federal tax would be regarded by, let us say Quebec, as situated in that part of Canada—that is Quebec—for the Quebec tax. But that would be so, whether we had this agreement or not. And having the agreement, the tax payable under the federal legislation will be avoided. The duplication which might result from the federal legislation will be avoided, and it will be that much easier for the taxpayer than if the agreement did not exist.

On article IV:

Mr. FULTON: Could the minister give us an illustration of the working of the proviso at the end of clause 2 where it states:

> Provided that this paragraph shall not apply as respects duty imposed in Great Britain in the case of property passing under a disposition governed by the law of Great Britain.

Can the minister say how this proviso works, and why it was inserted?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This provides for quite substantial possible reduction in taxation. The value of the exemptions in each jurisdiction will be calculated separately, and the rate of tax will not be upon the aggregate of the estate, but upon the amounts found in each jurisdiction. Whilst heretofore, though there might be only a small part of the estate in Canada, if it were a very large estate in the United Kingdom, the rate on that part in Canada would be fixed in relation to the aggregate value of the whole estate.

Mr. FULTON: The rate would be fixed.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, the rate would be fixed in relation to the aggregate value of the whole estate. It was felt that, having this arrangement, it would be fair to treat the assets in each jurisdiction as separate assets, and tax them in accordance with the rate they would separately bear.

Mr. FULTON: That, I believe, is the general purpose of the clause. However, it was the proviso I was wondering about. It seems to me to provide that if property is passing under a will which is governed by the law in England, then no matter where the property is situated it will be used in reckoning the total amount of the estate, and, therefore, the rate of tax.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The proviso in article III is difficult to understand if one is not familiar with English estate duties.

Mr. FULTON: I was talking about the proviso in article IV.

Mr. McMASTER: I had a question to ask on article III.

Mr. HACKETT: Would the minister go on with article III?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. Article III was carried, and we called article IV. If it is the wish of the committee to revert to article III we will do so.

Mr. HACKETT: Has the minister finished his explanation of article III?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): If the committee wishes to revert to article III, which was carried, we will do so.

Mr. HACKETT: The minister had not finished reading his explanatory paper.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): If it is the wish of the committee to revert to article III, it is all right, but we carried article III and called article IV.

Mr. HACKETT: I suggest that we shall make more progress if you do not call the articles before they are dealt with.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I suggest to the hon. member that when an article is called and carried he should not revert to that article unless he has the permission of the committee to do so.

Mr. HACKETT: The minister was in the midst of reading an explanatory note.

Mr. WEIR: Not in order.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): He was not in order because that article has been carried. I want to be fair to all hon. members.

Mr. HACKETT: I should like to know if the minister had finished reading the explanatory note on three?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): He had finished.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is the same explanation. In England an estate duty is imposed on the death of the life tenant of the property, notwithstanding that such life tenant was not the settler or disposer of the property. In Canada no such duty is imposed. The object of the proviso is to enable England still to continue to tax this type of transmission, because otherwise it would not be taxed at all. It is a passing of property governed by the law of England which would not be taxed here at all and in which we have no interest.

Mr. FULTON: I think I see the purpose, but I am just wondering if I really understand it. The purpose of the proviso is that if a deceased person is left a life estate in England the British authorities shall be permitted to impose their normal estate tax?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: On the extinction of the life tenant's interest.

Mr. FULTON: I am wondering if that would not enable Great Britain to apply a tax in respect of some kind of property situated in Canada and whether the proviso is actually accomplishing what it seeks to accomplish?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If it is something that passes under the laws of the United Kingdom and the passing is the result of the extinction of a life tenancy and England can reach the taxpayer, they want to be able to do so. It is not a tax that we impose. It does not conflict with any tax imposed under the Canadian statutes, so that we say to them, "If you can get that tax, it is no concern of ours." It does not conflict with any tax we want to collect.

Mr. McMASTER: I should like to ask the minister to elucidate one other case that would come under the first paragraph of article III. This reads in part:

. . . but in cases not within such rules the situs of such rights or interests shall be determined for these purposes in accordance with the laws in force in the territory of the other contracting government.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Anything that has not been covered by express agreement. The British authorities will have to recognize our rule and we shall have to recognize their rule if it is something that is within their territory.

Mr. McMASTER: There will be no agreement as to that?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: We say, "You will take our rule if it is in Canada, and if it is in the United Kingdom we will submit to your rule." We will give credit in any event.

Article agreed to.

On article V.

Mr. FULTON: The first paragraph of this article raises the question of whether it will affect separate agreements made between the United Kingdom and three of the provinces. The last part of the provision reads:

. . . equal to so much of the duty imposed in the territory of the other contracting government as is attributable to such property.

Inasmuch as British Columbia, Quebec and Nova Scotia are territories in Canada, it might be ruled that if those provinces imposed duties, then the government of the United Kingdom would have to take them into consideration under the terms of this section.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The duties subject to the present agreement are, under article I, in Canada the succession duties imposed by Canada. We do not attempt to contract or legislate with respect to the rights of British Columbia or the rights of Quebec or the rights of Nova Scotia, but we do attempt to agree to and to legislate with respect to liabilities resulting from our own tax statute.

Mr. McMASTER: Would the minister give an example as to how this would be applicable?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Paragraph 1 deals with a particular piece of property in respect of which one country imposes a duty by reason of the domicile of the deceased and the other country by reason of the situs of the property. This paragraph applies whether the property devolves under a will or upon intestacy or under an inter vivos settlement. The country of domicile is to allow against its own duty on the property a credit for the duty imposed by the country of situs. Thus, if a man domiciled in Canada, leaves personal estate of $25,000 situated in England, assuming that the Canadian duty on the $25,000 was $2,500 and the British duty $1,500, the Canadian taxing authorities will allow a credit of $1,500 against the Canadian duty of $2,500.

Mr. FULTON: What is the position where one province makes an agreement with the dominion government with respect to succession duties and agrees not to levy them? Is the dominion allowed to take into consideration the rate the province would have exercised because the dominion is going to pay the province for giving up the tax?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The dominion proposals under the present budget are to double the rates that were in existence last year and to give credit to the taxpayer for anything he pays in his province if his province imposes succession duties. If his province does not impose succession duties, then the whole new duty comes under this agreement with the United Kingdom authorities.

Mr. McMASTER: Otherwise it will be just half?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. FULTON: I will be frank in saying that I do not understand the operation of paragraph 4 and I would be obliged if the minister will explain how it is going to work.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The object of paragraph 4 is to ensure that the duty of each contracting government is calculated after taking account of any relief, remission, et cetera, of duty for which the taxation code of either makes provision, but before taking account of any credit given under this article. The effect of paragraph (4) in a case involving taxation of personal property by three countries, including Great Britain and Canada, is illustrated by the following examples. In each of them it is assumed that duty is imposed by Great Britain on the ground that the property is included in a British settlement and by Canada on the ground of domicile, and that the property was situated in the third country. In the first example the property is taken to be situated in a country, Eire, with which Great Britain has, but Canada has not, a double taxation agreement; in the second example the situation is taken to be in Northern Ireland, with which both Great Britain and Canada will have a double taxation agreement if the present proposals are approved. In both examples the figures represent rates of duty. I have a table here which, with the consent of all hon. members, I should be glad to put on Hansard, so that they will have before them a concrete example of how the thing is expected to work.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Has the minister unanimous consent to put the table on Hansard?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The table follows:

Example I	Great Britain	Canada	Eire
Gross charge	25	15	5
Credit allowed in accordance with article V(4)	5	..	..
Net charge	20	15	5
Apportioned under article V(3) $\frac{15}{20+15}$ = 3/7ths	$8\frac{4}{7}$	$6\frac{3}{7}$	..
	$11\frac{3}{7}$	$8\frac{4}{7}$	5

Example II	Great Britain	Canada	Northern Ireland
Gross charge	35	25	5
Credit allowed in accordance with article V(4)	5	5	..
Net charge	30	20	5
Apportioned under article V(3) $\frac{20}{30+20}$ =2/5ths	12	8	..
	18	12	5

In both of the examples the sum of the three net rates is equal to the highest of the three gross rates.

Mr. FULTON: The credit allowance for relief; is that the relief which will result from the adoption of this agreement?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, for whatever relief comes from something other than this agreement.

Mr. FULTON: Possibly, when we read the minister's explanation it will be clear, but I do not quite get the effect of it. What credit allowance is referred to, because it says "otherwise than in respect of duty payable in the territory of the other contracting government." That is the point.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The purpose here is to avoid having to give credit to the taxpayer for something that he does not really have to pay. If his tax in the United Kingdom were £20 but, because of an agreement that exists between the United Kingdom and Eire, he has to pay only £10, we do not want to have to allow him £20.

Mr. FULTON: I see.

INCOME TAX

AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED KINGDOM—AVOIDANCE OF DOUBLE TAXATION

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister) moved the second reading of bill No. 300, respecting an income tax agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom, signed at London, in England, on the fifth day of June, 1946.

He said: Mr. Speaker, a statement was made on this bill by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) at the resolution stage. The aim of this bill, like that of the one we have just passed, is to avoid duplication of taxation on the same income. I think the only way to get a clear idea of how the two governments have hoped that they might achieve that object is by going through the agreement itself article by article. I think it would be more convenient to have that done at the committee stage than for me to give any lengthy explanation on the second reading.

Motion agreed to, bill read a second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Might I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we turn to the agreement itself before taking up the sections of the bill?

Mr. FULTON: Before that is done, Mr. Chairman, would the minister give an opportunity for a general question which cannot be raised on any of the articles of the agreement. One presumes that some consideration must have been given to the possibility of the provinces reimposing income tax, how that would affect this measure and what modifications might be made on the part of the dominion government in order to take care of that possibility.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The negotiations were between the government of the United Kingdom and the government of Canada, and no special consideration was given to the fact that there might be provinces that would reimpose personal income or corporation income taxes. But even if that were so, the rates of the taxes imposed by the federal authority are sufficiently high as compared with anything that was imposed before the wartime tax agreements with the provinces or that is apt to be imposed on top of the federal rates by the provinces after the wartime tax agreements expire to make this agreement worth while.

Mr. FULTON: That is true. I was wondering whether the federal government contemplated any move by which relief could be given the individual taxpayer who resides in a province which does not make such agreement with the dominion. He would be put in a worse position than any other taxpayer.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is nothing that parliament can do about the matter beyond what is offered by the proposals made available under the budget resolutions. The hon. member knows that if a province does impose taxes certain credits on the taxpayer's liability to the federal government will be allowed, and that is as far as our jurisdiction will allow us to go. The United Kingdom made with us an agreement very similar to the one it made with the United States where the same difficulties present themselves.

Mr. FULTON: This is modeled after that?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is very similar. Of course, there were certain special features that entered into the agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom, but it is very similar to the agreement made between the United Kingdom and the United States, for the same purpose, to try to bring about a greater possibility of free exchanges between the United Kingdom and the United States and ourselves.

Mr. HACKETT: Do they apply the rule of domicile or nationality?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Domicile plays no part. It is income tax, and it is ordinary residence or carrying on business that are the deciding features.

Articles I and II agreed to.

On article III.

Mr. FULTON: Section 2 of article III has this proviso:

> Provided that nothing in this paragraph shall affect any provisions of the law of the United Kingdom regarding the imposition of excess profits tax and national defence contribution in the case of interconnected companies.

Is there any similar protection for Canada?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The explanation is that paragraphs 1 and 2 are reciprocal. Industrial and commercial profits arising from a permanent establishment shall be subject to taxation by the country in which the permanent establishment exists. But in paragraph 2, Canada, by the proviso, recognizes the right of the United Kingdom to continue to impose its present law on its own companies by sweeping in profits not only of the permanent establishment in Canada, as would be the case normally, but also profits in Canada of companies in Canada which are controlled by United Kingdom companies.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. FULTON: That seems to change the effect of the other provision which says that where an enterprise makes a profit in Canada, although it may be owned in the United Kingdom, it shall be taxable in Canada and treated as though it were a Canadian company. Is that not double taxation?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That was not something that was taxed here. It was a form of excess profits tax which was imposed in the United Kingdom on their own company there.

Mr. FULTON: On account of profits made here?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes. There they were taxing more heavily or in another way than we would tax our people, but since the tax was to be collected from a company there, we felt it was their business to see how far they should go.

Mr. FULTON: There is no double taxation at the moment?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is no double taxation because we have no parallel situation and it is payable by a company there.

SUGAR

ANNOUNCEMENT OF INCREASE IN RATION

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Acting Minister of Finance): I should like to make a brief announcement concerning the sugar ration. Although world sugar supplies remain below requirements, the worst appears to be over and a gradual improvement in the future is to be expected. The improvement to date has made it possible for the wartime prices and trade board to make an increase in rations to household consumers of three pounds of sugar per person during the remainder of the year, effective in September and November, and to increase quotas to industrial users and public caterers of all kinds by a roughly proportionate amount.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

CANADA-MEXICO—CANADA-COLOMBIA—
APPROVAL OF AGREEMENTS

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament, do approve the trade agreement between Canada and Mexico signed at the city of Mexico on February 8, 1946, and that this house do approve the same.

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the trade agreement between Canada and Colombia signed at Bogota on February 20, 1946, and that this house do approve the same.

He said: Perhaps the house will give unanimous consent to dealing with both these notices of motion at the same time, because they are both of the same nature and can probably be conveniently dealt with in that way.

Mr. GRAYDON: They are entirely different trade treaties, and because of that we might make just as much progress by dealing with them separately. I have no definite views on the matter, but perhaps the minister would indicate his reasons for suggesting that they both be dealt with at the same time.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: My particular reason is that in 1942 there were three motions of the same kind which were dealt with at the same time; but if there is the slightest objection I do not mind going on with the first one and then dealing by reference with the other motion.

Mr. GRAYDON: So far as I am concerned I have no objection to going on with the two of them at the same time if it will expedite the matter.

Mr. CHURCH: Will the agreements be followed by a treaty?

Mr. MacINNIS: Is it customary to debate notices of motion? As I understand it, this is merely notice, and that it will go to the appropriate section of the order paper and then come up in due course. I did not think it is customary to debate resolutions which appear as notices of motion.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member is suggesting that motions should not be dealt with at this time? I know of no such rule. The standing orders provide a special place for government notices of motion, and the requirement is that there be forty-eight hours' notice. The notice was put in the Votes and Proceedings of last Friday, and I mentioned it last evening as a matter to be taken up this morning. I do not want to thwart the wishes of any of the hon. members, but it had been felt that these motions could be dealt with to-day.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not opposing it. Perhaps the procedure in regard to notices of this kind is different from the procedure on a notice preceding a bill.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: Money resolutions.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I take it, then, I have the unanimous consent of the house to have both resolutions considered at the same time, so that they both may be dealt with in the same remarks.

Although these trade agreements are negotiated and signed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I understand that it has been the practice of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to move in the house the resolutions for approval of such agreements. In 1942 the Prime Minister explained that that practice had been adopted because the formalities for ratification and notification to the other contracting parties were handled through the Department of External Affairs.

These agreements are of the nature of agreements affording most favoured nation treatment between the countries which enter into them. They are similar to other trade agreements of which there have been several in recent years; as a matter of fact there were seven from 1937 to 1942. In 1937 there was a similar agreement between Canada and Uruguay, which was approved at the session of 1937. In 1938 two were approved, one with Guatemala and the other with Haiti. In 1940 the house gave approval to a similar agreement between Canada and the Dominican republic, and in 1942 the house approved of three similar agreements entered into between Canada and Chile, Canada and Brazil, and Canada and Argentina.

The two agreements now before the house are one more indication of the growing spirit of cordiality between Canada and the Latin republics. They will serve to strengthen the bonds of friendship which unite Canada and the two countries, and to facilitate further and to develop the commercial relations already existing, on a mutually profitable basis. Both trade agreements provide in general for most favoured nation treatment, and are similar to the trade agreements with the other Latin American nations. The trade agreement with Mexico was signed on February 8, at Mexico City and came into provisional effect on the same day. The trade agreement with Colombia was signed at Bogota on February 20 and will come into effect thirty days after the exchange of ratifications. Both agreements are to remain in force for a period of two years, and to continue thereafter subject to termination on six months' notice. The trade agreement with Mexico provides for the exchange of most favoured nation treatment between the two countries in matters concerning duties and subsidiary charges, as well as in respect of rules and formalities connected with importation and of laws and regulations affecting the taxation, sale, distribution or use of imported goods. This means in a general way that the products of each country, on importation into the other, will not be subject to customs duties or other charges greater than those applicable to similar imports from a third country. Similarly any reductions which either Canada or Mexico may grant in future to a third country will automatically be extended to the other. Thus imports into Canada from Mexico will in future, instead of being subject to the general tariff as heretofore, be accorded the intermediate tariff, and any lower rates than the intermediate tariff granted by Canada to other foreign countries, with the exception of course of the imperial preferences. There is a special reservation in both treaties providing that arrangements between Canada and other dominions or colonies subject to the British crown are not affected. The tariff treatment now granted by Canada to other British countries is expressly excluded from the operation of the agreement.

No immediate reduction in customs duties is made by Mexico for goods of Canadian origin, as it has been Mexican policy not to limit the application of conventional duties to countries with which she has trade agreements. In other words, Mexico has a single column of duties applicable equally to imports from all countries, and any tariff reductions she has made in favour of a particular country, as for example those contained in the Mexico-United States trade agreement concluded in 1942, already in practice have been extended to Canada.

An important provision of the agreement is that quantitative restrictions which may be imposed upon imports into either country from the other are subject to consultation. The agreement provides also that if either country sets up government agencies with exclusive privileges for exportation or importation of goods, such agencies will be influenced solely by consideration of price, quality, transportation and terms of purchase or sale which would ordinarily be taken into account by a private commercial enterprise.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Subject to certain specified exceptions, the new agreement provides that imports into either country from the other will be exempt from all internal taxes, fees, or charges other or higher than those payable on articles of national origin within the taxing country or of any other foreign origin. That is, there is to be no tax discrimination in this country on goods imported from Mexico, and vice versa. This provision will result in a reduction in the Mexican registration fees established by the Mexican department of health. Hitherto the fee for registration of packaged food products and beverages has been 50 pesos per product, and for pharmaceutical specialties and toilet preparations, 200 pesos per product, when imported from any country except the United States. That special charge is eliminated by virtue of this most favoured nation agreement. The fee for goods of both these categories of Mexican domestic origin or when imported from the United States is 20 pesos per product, and will now be the same for like products imported into Mexico from Canada. Under the new agreement, Canadian goods of these classes will also be entitled to the lower fee when submitted for registration in Mexico.

The trade agreement also provides that each country will grant the other an opportunity for consultation if either adopts any measure which is considered by the government of the other country as tending to nullify or impair any of the objects of the agreement. The operation of customs regulations, control of foreign exchange, quantitative restrictions and their administration, the observance of customs formalities and the application of sanitary laws and regulations all come within the scope of this provision of the agreement. If a satisfactory adjustment is not arrived at after consultation, the agreement may be terminated in whole or in part upon giving thirty days' notice.

The trade agreement, which is the first ever concluded between Canada and Mexico, came into force provisionally on February 8, the date of its signature. The provisional application may be terminated on three months' notice by either party. Thirty days after exchange of the instruments of ratification at Ottawa the trade agreement is to go into force definitely for two years. Its duration is automatically continued thereafter for one year periods, subject to termination on six months' notice by either party to the agreement.

It may perhaps be of some interest to hon. members to have an indication of the volume of trade between Canada and Mexico in recent years. For instance, in 1940 Canadian exports to Mexico amounted to $4,328,406 and our imports were only $733,797.

Mr. BROOKS: Could the minister give us any idea what the chief exports were from Canada to Mexico?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes. I shall give the amounts and then give the hon. member an indication of what the principal exports were. In 1942 our exports were $5,583,644 and our imports had risen to $4,970,432. In 1945 our exports totalled $8,165,058 and our imports $13,508,164. In the first six months of 1946 our exports were $4,718,662 and our imports $9,491,005. I have a tabulation showing our exports to Mexico and our imports from that country for 1945:

The trade agreement with Colombia is similar in substance to the Mexican agreement. It is also the first agreement concluded between the two countries directly. Previously Canada's commercial relations with Colombia had been treated as being governed by a treaty between that country and the United Kingdom, which was looked upon as extending to Canada. This is the first direct treaty between Canada and Colombia.

Mr. BROOKS: What were the exports of potatoes and fish to those two countries? These exports affect the maritime provinces.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have placed upon Hansard in respect of Mexico, and shall in respect of Colombia, the tabulations obtained from the Department of Trade and Commerce. Apparently in 1945 the exports of either item did not amount to as much as $250,000. The table showing Canada's trade with Colombia for the calendar year 1945 is as follows:

Canada's Trade with Colombia
Calendar Year—1945

Principal Exports to Colombia

Total Exports	$ 5,010,701
Principal Items:

It is apparent that our trade with these Latin countries of America is expanding. I must say it was gratifying to me, as I am sure it must have been to other hon. members who were at San Francisco, to note how cordial all the representatives of these Latin republics were to the Canadian delegation. Innumerable statements were made to us, statements which were pleasing and some most gratifying, respecting the possibilities of increasing trade with them. I remember asking one gentleman what it was that seemed to stimulate that desire to trade with us. His reply was, "Well, you know, we buy on sample from you, and when we receive delivery of the goods, those goods are equal to the samples." I thought that was a most satisfactory feeling to have exist among our customers, and I am pleased to have this opportunity to pay tribute to the Canadian business men who have made for Canada that reputation. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that on your several visits to those parts you have found a similar desire to improve trade relations between our country and theirs.

I hope these trade agreements will be the forerunner of the objects for which the international trade conference is being convened at some early day, and that these trade agreements and the good will which grows from them will not only serve the financial interests of those who engage in them, but will lay the foundation for that better understanding among men which can be the only real foundation of peace and security.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I believe these two agreements have helped Canada considerably. As the minister said, they have been in operation for some time, and have worked out satisfactorily. They constitute a step in the right direction, because Canada has lost some of her European market, with the result that we must look to other countries for the sale of our products, to keep the wheels of industry turning.

Checking the two agreements reveals that the wording is about the same in each. I can see no objection to their being accepted.

Mr. McIVOR: This is a tribute to our steady, thorough and progressive Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Motions agreed to.

WORLD HEALTH ORGANIZATION

APPROVAL OF CONSTITUTION SIGNED AT NEW YORK, JULY 22, 1946.

Right Hon. L. S. St. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the constitution of the world health organization signed at New York on July 22, 1946, and that this house do approve the same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen would no doubt wish to have a few words, which will not be new to them but which will summarize the steps which led up to the formation of this world health organization.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would it be possible to have a copy of the document?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The constitution was published as an appendix to Votes and Proceedings of July 24.

The steps leading up to the signature of the constitution of the world health organization in New York on July 22 were initiated at the united nations conference at San Francisco when the word "health" was inserted in the charter upon the proposal of the delegation from Brazil. Following this action the states represented on the appropriate committee unanimously approved the following declaration of Brazil and China, on the calling of an international conference for the purpose of establishing an international health organization.

The resolution thus unanimously approved was in the following terms:

The delegations of Brazil and China recommend that a general conference be convened within the next few months for the purpose of establishing an international health organization.

They intend to consult further with the representatives of other delegations with a view to the early convening of such a general conference to which each of the governments here represented will be invited to send representatives.

They recommend that in the preparation of a plan for the international health organization full consideration be given to the relationship of such an organization, and methods of associating it with other institutions, national as well as international, which already exist or which may hereafter be established in the field of health.

They recommend that the proposed international health organization be brought into relationship with the economic and social council.

Although the governments of Brazil and China followed up the declaration by suggesting that a conference be held before the end of 1945, the resolution relating to this proposal was not adopted by the economic and social council until February 15, 1946. In accordance with the terms of paragraph 3 of this resolution, the economic and social council established the technical preparatory committee and directed that it should meet in Paris not later than March 15, 1946, to prepare a draft annotated agenda and proposals for the consideration of the conference to be held not later than June 20, 1946.

At this point it might be useful to note what the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) said at the economic and social council of June 29, 1946. These were the words he used:

In the establishment of the economic and social council, in the setting up of its commissions, in the negotiation of relationships with the special purpose, agencies established by intergovernmental agreement, we are opening up a new chapter in the long struggle of mankind to master his environment, to the end that the material and economic resources of the world are used for the enrichment and not the destruction of humanity. Our task is not an easy one. We shall have to overcome not only the internal forces in various countries which resist change, but also the skepticism that we shall encounter in many parts of the world regarding the possibility of sucess in a cooperative effort of this sort.

I may say that these views, expressed thus by our Secretary of State at the international meeting, appeared to meet with the unanimous approval of those to whom they were addressed.

At the international health conference which met at the Henry Hudson hotel in New York city on June 19, 1946, the rapporteur of the technical preparatory committee, Major General G. B. Chisholm, presented a report which included proposals for the constitution of the world health organization. These proposals had been carefully worked out in Paris by this technical preparatory committee of experts, and they proved to be most useful documents.

The constitution of the world health organization will be found on page 9 of the addendum to the Votes and Proceedings of July 24.

Hon. members will note in chapter 3 of the constitution that membership in the organization is open to all states. Conditions of admission, however, are governed by articles 4, 5 and 6 of the constitution. Fifty-one united nations attended the conference, and in addition the governments of Albania, Austria, Bulgaria, Eire, Finland, Hungary, Iceland, Italy, Portugal, Siam, Sweden, Switzerland and Trans-Jordan were represented by observers. The governments of the following states had also been invited to send observers but were not represented. Afghanistan, Roumania, Yeman. The Allied control authorities in Germany, Japan and Korea were represented by observers but without the right to vote. So were ten other international organizations.

Hon. members will note that article 19 deals with the powers of the health assembly to adopt conventions or agreements with respect to any matter within the competence of the organization, and article 20 imposes the obligation upon member states to take action relative to the acceptance or rejection of conventions or agreements proposed by the health assembly within eighteen months after the adoption of a convention or agreement.

A member is not bound to acquiesce in the convention or agreement, but if he does not accept the convention within the time limit he is required to furnish a statement of his reasons for non-acceptance to the director-general.

Article 21 gives the health assembly the authority to adopt regulations concerning five matters. It is stipulated in article 22 that such regulations shall come into force for all members after due notice has been given of their adoption by the health assembly, except for such members as may notify the director-general of ratification or reservation within the period stated in the notice.

With respect to article 21, A, B, D, and E, these refer to matters which were dealt with before by international agreement and sanitary conventions and by national legislation such as our food and drugs act. "A" refers to sanitary and quarantine requirements and other provisions designed to prevent the international spread of disease. "B" contains the nomenclatures with respect to diseases, causes of death and public health practices so that statistics supplied by the nations, members of the organization, may be comparable. "C" relates to standards with respect to diagnostic procedures for international use, and is perhaps more of professional and scientific than of general interest. "D" relates to standards with respect to the safety, purity and potency of biological, pharmaceutical and similar products moving in international commerce, and of course it is very important for the health of the world that such biological and pharmaceutical products which are distributed internationally be of standard quality and purity. "E" deals with advertising and labelling of biological, pharmaceutical and similar products moving in international commerce.

With respect to article 21C, that is to say, standards for diagnostic procedures for international use, this is a new departure, but it is felt that it can be beneficial to world understanding. From the Canadian viewpoint we have high standards of requirements for the safety and potency of pharmaceutical and biological products. The adoption of standards of requirements concerning them will not adversely affect us. If in the future some regulation should prove unacceptable to the government of Canada, the government can at any time contract out by giving notice, within eighteen months, of its desire to do so and of its reasons for so doing. It is felt that this will be one of the useful agencies of the international organization, and it is in line with the general purposes and aims of us all to strive for peace among men by making men realize what help they can receive from each other and to what extent it is beneficial to them all to be dependent upon one another.

Mr. W. G. BLAIR (Lanark): The constitution of the international health conference, which has been placed before the house by the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), is one of the most important documents that have ever been considered by the Canadian Parliament. If the nations of the world agree to establish a world health organization, then there is every hope for agreement in other matters.

The constitution, objective and functions as described in chapter I comprise a momentous decision on the part of the nations of the world. Never before in the history of the world have all the nations mutually agreed on a common plan for the betterment of the health conditions of humanity. It is only by united effort that the world may be cleansed and healed of the scourge of disease so prevalent in its past history, causing untold agonies and distress which to a great degree could have been avoided if such understanding among the nations of the world had been in effect decades ago.

The world is suffering from a malignant disease which causes loss of economic, social and spiritual values. We can effect a cure only by cultivating a spirit of cooperation among all peoples. This can best be done by banishing preventable disease, poverty, cold and hunger. We believe that in civilized society no man should be allowed to suffer or die from such causes, but it will be necessary to build a new world on the ruins of the old. Human rights must be restored and new confidence and tolerance must be established. The preservation of health must be international in scope, and science will aid in the upbuilding of the new world. More than ever before we must prevent and control disease and concern ourselves with the care of the handicapped and crippled, maternal and child care, the construction of hospitals, maintenance of health centres, the removal of the causes which predispose such large numbers of cases of mental illness, medical service to the poor, and other aspects of social security.

To provide health services for the people a government should give financial support, leadership and direction. In order to safeguard the state, its people must be as physically and mentally fit as it is possible to make them. There should be no economic or geographic boundaries in equality of opportunity for medical care. The aims of the science of healing should be international and the same over all the world. Canada must take her place along with similar organizations in other nations in preventing wars and giving adequate health services to all people. The present is an opportune time to form an intenational organization whose first object is to give better health and medical services to all people. Millions of the people of the world are suffering physically and mentally as a result of the war. A united nations health organization would provide much toward the welfare and future happiness of mankind. Now that military victory in Europe has been achieved, peace will bring many difficult problems for solution. We can best solve these problems and reach a better understanding by the relief of suffering.

The pages of the history of our own country, when studied from the aspect of health, show many occasions on which disease itself controlled the destiny of a young and growing nation. Few are aware that it played a major role in the mastery of the North American continent, in the wars between France and England. Repeatedly it decimated the population and seriously retarded the development of the country. A person who has not taken full account of the diseases which afflicted this country and of the efforts to stay their ravages does not know the full history of Canada. Had it not been for disease that plagued the French settlers from the time of their arrival in the country, it is doubtful whether Canada would have become a British possession. Contagious diseases were rapidly introduced by shipping from the earliest days and recurred in epidemic form at frequent intervals. We look upon influenza as a disease of modern civilization, yet there were many outbreaks in Canada in the early days. It appeared at regular intervals and there are many records of it. In 1918 it eclipsed all previous records, causing 30,000 deaths in Canada. Like many other diseases it was introduced by shipping and spread throughout the whole country, at least one-sixth of the population being affected. If disease can control the destiny of Canada, it may well control the world.

We in Canada have failed to learn our lesson from the past. In the examination of recruits for the war just ended thirty-five to forty per cent of our young men were found unfit for service. A high percentage of these defects for which they were rejected could have been eliminated by early and proper treatment. The infant mortality in our own country is fifty-four per thousand live births. In this regard I give the following statistics of infant mortality in other countries, all of which have a lower rate than we have in Canada:

Sweden	29
New Zealand	31
Iceland	36
Australia	36
Norway	37
Switzerland	40
Netherlands	40
United States	40
Denmark	45
England and Wales	48
South Africa	52

A review of the causes of death in all groups shows the following as of 1943:

Typhoid	116
Scarlet fever	100
Whooping cough	416
Diphtheria	287
Tuberculosis	6,168
Cancer	14,135

There were 798 maternal deaths in Canada in 1943. I call attention to the large number of deaths from tuberculosis and cancer within our dominion. The elimination of venereal disease stands as a challenge to all Canadians working in the field of public health. The high death rate from cancer should call for all means to be used in research for cure. Death and disease do not wait for a gradual extension of science. Death and suffering of the people, while life is within reach, is a human cruelty and an affront to mankind's conscience. The fights against maternal mortality, against the maiming and death caused by infantile paralysis, against tuberculosis and venereal disease, are fights for the whole Canadian nation. Science is a factor in the battle against maternal mortality and in the prevention of infantile paralysis with its terrible crippling effects. Modern research has made, and is now making, tremendous progress in every major disease, but these methods are not being used in the cure of disease for all of the population. If money can be obtained to wipe out such disease which it costs us millions to maintain, then within a generation there will no longer be this drain upon the wealth of our nation. This is one way to ease our tax burden. The insulin research of Banting and the workers associated with him cost less than $10,000. The Rockefeller Foundation gave Howard Florry $1,280 for apparatus which helped solve problems in the production of penicillin. If one per cent of the annual cost of disease were given to trained researchers, much could be done to improve health in this country and save the colossal sums spent annually on disease.

The cost of prevention of disease, now possible, thanks to modern medicine, is nothing compared to the terrific present cost of supporting people through long years of unproductive sickness. It costs more to let them be disabled than it would cost to keep them in good health and let them earn their own living.

Of the twenty-two clauses of functions in the draft of the united nations health organization, there is not one open to debate or criticism. It would be impossible to discuss all of them in the time allotted. I shall refer to one or two items:

Clause A states:

> The health assembly shall have authority to adopt regulations concerning sanitary and quarantine requirements and other procedures designed to prevent the international spread of disease.

This is most important to the protection of our own country. Owing to modern methods of travel and the shortness of time required to make a journey, persons suffering from contagious disease might land in this country during the incubation stage before the disease was apparent.

The promotion of research and interchange of scientific data will lead to important discoveries being made by the scientists of the world. It may well be that a bacteriologist in far off Australia may discover a cure or treatment for infantile paralysis, and that as a result of his efforts little children in Canada will not be crippled.

A scientist in his laboratory in Europe may discover a treatment for cancer and thus save suffering and death from a disease which kills one person in eight of the population of Canada.

The extent of cooperation outlined in the resolution is of such magnitude that it is difficult to believe. But one fact is outstanding, that in the present troubled state of the peoples of the world more will be accomplished by the world health organization to promote peace and good will than by any other agency in the power of the nations. Ignorance and prejudices will be broken down by healing the sufferings of humanity. During the war we glibly talked of the new world to be built after victory. Let us build that new world by a combined effort to eliminate disease and misery. I appeal to the members of the Canadian parliament to support this resolution unanimously.

Mrs. GLADYS STRUM (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all hon. members will be glad to support this motion and that we are all agreed on the objective as set out in article 1:

> The objective of the world health organization shall be the attainment by all peoples of the highest possible level of health.

I think the definitions are very well set out, too, under the constitution. I particularly like the second paragraph, which says:

> The enjoyment of the highest attainable standard of health is one of the fundamental rights of every human being without distinction of race, religion, political belief, economic or social condition.

Much careful thought has gone into the drawing up of this very fine constitution, and I only hope that we shall live up to the expectations of those who drafted it. I am reminded of the tragedy of the labour convention at Geneva where twenty-six years ago Canada endorsed the eight-hour day, and in Canada we are still striking to attain it. I hope we do not do that with our health commitments; otherwise a lot of people are going to die in the meantime.

As I see it, Canada has two sets of responsibilities: first, to support this organization and take full part in it, to see that we have full representation and that we share the financial obligation, and to ensure that nothing is left undone in the sharing of research, and second, to clean up Canada. Canada has made some splendid contributions to the attack on disease. When we think of Sir Frederick Banting and his gift of insulin; when we think of the record we have set in the matter of the onslaught on tuberculosis, which a few years ago was one of the great scourges from which mankind suffered, I believe it will be agreed that we too have helped to write medical history. I am reminded of the history of our attack on tuberculosis, and in the province from which I come we have established, I believe, a world record. We found there that there were social factors which made it possible to do this, and the most important of all was the controlled environment of the patient. When we began to treat tuberculosis we did not only look after the medical end of it; we looked after housing and nutrition. The patient in a tuberculosis sanatorium gets the very finest of food—unlimited quantities of fruit and meat and milk, the best of housing, of heating, of sanitation and everything else that contributes to healthful surroundings. There, I think, we have one of the keys of the attack on disease—the controlled environment of the individual. But so long as we in Canada have slums, overcrowding, obsolete and unsanitary buildings, ignorance and poverty, we shall sustain these losses from disease, preventable losses which we can avoid by attacking the living conditions of our people. So I hope not only that we shall sign this covenant and pledge ourselves to international health, but that we shall not rest until every Canadian family has healthful, sanitary home surroundings.

I see here that we have had seven different conventions on sanitation. I wish I had the figures to show how many families in this country still do not have sanitary conveniences. There is a great field of activity open to us, if we are interested in sanitation, in seeing to it that every family has plumbing and running water, a clean water supply, sufficient space, good beds, good clothing, and laundry facilities. These are the very essence of cleanliness and health, and in this direction we can make a really worth while contribution.

I believe we are very fortunate in our minister of health and that he is doing excellent work. However, this parliament should extend to the provinces grants under the provisions which were suggested in the original proposals, to allow the provinces through their departments of health to make an attack on the various aspects of public health—the mental diseases, the venereal diseases, tuberculosis—and to establish a special division of child and maternal welfare. I hope that very soon the Minister of Finance will see fit to extend to the provinces that are going to sign these agreements individually the same assistance which the original proposals contain, because we all know that health is a provincial matter, that it must be paid for in cold dollars and cents, and that it is for sale; that there are millions of people to-day suffering from disease, and thousands in this country doomed to die because they have not the price of medical attention. For them health is unavailable, and until we make health services free, thousands of people are doomed to die of cancer, for instance, because they cannot afford expensive surgery. Only one province that I know of has completely eliminated personal cost from the treatment of cancer. When we have made it possible for the provinces to carry out their programmes of health we can begin to feel that we in Canada have done our part towards realization of the dream of the great men who drew up this charter.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the motion of the acting Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) is a most laudable one, but I say to him that this interim agreement, followed by a constitution of a world health organization establishing certain definite principles, should not be treated as Canada dealt with the public health convention of 1927, the international sanitary convention which is referred to in this schedule and was concluded on June 21, 1926. I remember being in the house at that time, and I was of opinion that Canada should take an active part regarding the health of the world, and for the reasons expressed in this constitution:

> Health is a state of complete physical, mental and social well-being and not merely the absence of disease or infirmity
> The enjoyment of the highest attainable standard of health is one of the fundamental rights of every human being without distinction of race, religion, political belief, economic or social condition.
> The health of all peoples is fundamental to the attainment of peace and security and is dependent upon the fullest cooperation of individuals and states.
> The achievement of any state in the promotion and protection of health is of value to all.
> Unequal development in different countries in the promotion of health and control of disease, especially communicable disease, is a common danger.

The convention goes on to describe many branches of public health. But what has Canada since 1926? As a nation we have merely given lip service to these ideals. We spent only half a million dollars, and the promotion of public health in Canada has been left largely to hospitals, public and private, to the universities and the municipalities. Since 1926 in some municipalities we have had to mark up from $1 to $2.50 a day for per diem patients. It was about the time of the 1926 convention that Doctor Banting wanted to go to the United States to practice —he had started practice in London—and to carry on the researches which led to his great discovery of the treatment of diabetes. The night before last I was looking at his grave in Mount Pleasant cemetery, marked only by a small tombstone. When one thinks of what this one invention and discovery in medicine and science did for the soldiers of the war from which we have just emerged, it is a revelation and a promise of what scientific research can do.

There have been many long discussions on the minister's health estimates in this house concerning public health. Long ago I urged here a forward national health policy. One of the mistakes made at confederation was the failure to foresee the need for a national health policy along the lines set out, first in the convention of 1926, and now in the interim convention which was only adopted on July 22 of this year. It is to be hoped that we shall now go into the matter in a practical way; in 1926 we only paid lip service to it. Let us do something practical now with the $14,000,000 voted here for public health. As I said in the debate on the estimates, the first duty of the government is to look after the health, peace, happiness and prosperity of its people. When I go around the country and see some of the conditions and the lack of aid to health departments I am surprised. When the municipal people ask for something, nothing is given.

National public health is looked after only by the municipalities, and the municipalities have to establish at great cost their own health departments without federal aid. It is the most important national work we have. If we are to join all these world organizations we shall be roaming all over America. We are on the seven seas in the first two resolutions. If this resolution carries we are bound by everything in it and the new constitution and all that happens in this world society, so the estimates on public health may run into millions of dollars. It is all done by resolution. I contend that that is not right. I often look up the rules of the house. The two motions we have passed dealt with pan-American matters of trade, and they will interfere with British preferences.

There is to be a convention meeting next year on world trade. I ask hon. members to be very careful before they go into these things. More estimates and votes will be needed in the countries which made this agreement on July 22. Hon. members will well remember a picture contained in the Ottawa Journal which I held up in the house one night, showing the delegates to the New York health meeting. We had about fifteen or twenty people from Canada at this health convention, but there was nobody representing the provinces. The minister was accompanied by what I describe as a small choir, but the health officers of the provinces were not there. They should have been there because they will have to carry out the terms of the text of the interim constitution. The great universities of the country which have made such rapid strides, in peace and war alike, in medicine, science, physics and chemistry and everything else, should have been consulted. I read a copy of the proceedings of this New York meeting which appeared in the New York Times and I find no reference to the universities or to provincial health officers.

While I support the principle of the policy I believe that Canada should stop giving lip loyalty to all these things which will necessitate our voting large sums of money to be used by these bodies. When I first came to the house the problem with regard to agriculture was, where shall the hired man wash his feet. I have never known a minister of agriculture to solve that problem. Now we are going into the tremendous field of international health and medicine and all these things covered by communicable diseases and the other matters set out in the interim constitution. All this is being done in Canada at a time when not one cent is given to the support of hospitals or to the universities as scholarships so that men of science such as we have in the universities of Toronto, McGill, Queen's, Western and the great university in British Columbia, the great university down by the sea and the other universities of the country, could continue their studies. There is where the mistake was made at confederation. The British North America Act should have made health and education concurrent jurisdiction. We are giving only lip loyalty to these health matters federally. The department is only a skeleton department. If we are to go into this matter let us adopt some new national policy. When we pass this resolution we shall not know what it is going to cost. We had a similar resolution before us in 1926, and we do not know what Canada has done because she left national public health to the hospitals, the universities, municipalities, the medical profession, the dental profession and all these other bodies without a vote or any help from the department here.

As I say for several weeks we were represented at this New York convention by the minister, and he had fourteen or fifteen with him, a regular choir. Their task was to represent the department. I do hope that we shall have something practical done for the health of the country by the provision of more hospitals, nurses and doctors. Two floors have been closed in the Toronto general hospital because of the lack of nurses. All this is going on, but Canada does nothing. Let us improve national health in this country. I am not opposed to the resolution; I supported it in 1926. The principles of federal aid which guided Doctor Hastings, Toronto's great health officer, are the principles which I express now. He was a leader and a pioneer on health matters at these international conventions which met in the states, after the last war and all over the world.

The British medical association, the body which did more than any other agency for science along the terms of this new constitution, and the various medical associations of the dominions and of the United States, have done great work along these lines. I hope that the time has come—it has to come next year according to the terms of this constitution—for us to be up and doing. It will cost $5 million a year. I ask hon. members to be careful of how they tie us up because the money must be voted by the committee of supply if we adopt the constitution. The money could be far better spent in Canada where it is badly needed in many ways.

They talk in this agreement about a pure water supply, and all that kind of thing. Impure water is the basis of typhoid, diphtheria, and many other communicable diseases. I remember that Vancouver had a little trouble about sanitation and filtration. We have had in our city a pure water supply for twenty-five years. We set it up by building a large water filtration system, and since then there have been practically no cases of typhoid and only five or six of diphtheria. At one time in Toronto, owing to the collapse of an intake, they were drinking water from the bay.

One of the most important clauses in the constitution will run into hundreds of millions of dollars because it deals with communicable diseases and many new diseases, and new drugs, the use of which is killing some people. We shall have to be careful about the constitution. Where are the provinces in this convention? I think it is important to see that the provinces are consulted and also the larger municipalities. Toronto city spends five or six times more than this department of health. The federal department here went from $200,000 to $500,000 before the war, and in the estimates we passed the other day the amount was $14,000,000.

In his budget speech the Minister of Finance said that we want all these things, but let us remember that they cost money. Let us go into it with our eyes open. We are simply giving lip service by passing all these resolutions in one morning without knowing how they interfere with the plans of the provinces and the municipalities. Every one of the diseases mentioned in the meeting in New York dealt with by the universities and the health officers of Canada many years ago. They were pioneers in this work. Canada was a pioneer, following the principles of the mother country, the United States and the dominions.

This particular agreement was lying on the desk of the Minister of National Health and Welfare on his estimates the night he left. I took part in the debate myself, along with many other hon. members. This agreement should have been considered at that time and all the details given.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Before the resolution carries I wish to point out what I believe to be the justifiable and commendable trend in national and international affairs exhibited in the adoption by this nation and several others of the constitution of the health conference. This trend, now becoming accelerated, portends the making of a better world for which all of us have been striving during these years, and points to our giant objective. It is the placing of a broader emphasis and value upon human needs in relation to material affairs. If ever there was a time when it was possible to see clearly the movement in world affairs I think it is to-day, when I believe we are finally coming to the point of relegating the strictly material things, such as property values, to a position of importance second to human rights, human values and humanity in general. I welcome a move of this kind as another step in the right direction; that is, to a more progressive position in our world relationships.

This is a great test of international cooperation. I had the privilege of listening to Senator Warren Austin, the new voice of the United States of America on the security council, before he took his place on that council, when he addressed the New York branch of the foreign policy association. Significantly enough, it was the anniversary of the signing of the San Francisco charter. I think perhaps one of the most vital and compelling things he said was that nations still have a long way to go to find a formula by which they can get along, but that health is one of the universal things which may well be used as a testing ground, something in which people of all nations have a common interest and a common objective. I find myself, and I am quite sure this house finds itself, largely in agreement with that point of view. Let us work on those things upon which the nations of the world can more readily agree. Let us work on those first, in a comprehensive way, in order to find, if possible, a formula for dealing with the more difficult problems that lie ahead. This is a testing ground, because health knows no boundaries, health knows no creed, health knows no nationality or limitation. It is a great human relationship which brings the world together from time to time.

It was my privilege to attend for a short period the world conference in New York which has been mentioned already in this debate, and to see arriving for those deliberations great and eminent surgeons and physicians from the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, from the United States of America, from the United Kingdom, from France and from the smaller nations of the world. There I saw a young plastic surgeon, twenty-five years of age, already with great experience; and to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum) I would say she was one of the prominent lady surgeons and physicians who came from all over the world to play a prominent part at the conference. There we had a great pooling of brains in matters affecting surgery, medicine and public health. To me it was a great and practical example of how the world may finally discover that much sought after formula for a means of living together as good neighbours the world over.

I believe this movement for a world health organization can be pretty well expressed in this sort of phraseology. Those of us who come from the rural parts of Canada realize that no matter how clean you keep your own farm, no matter what measures you take for weed prevention, that is not enough unless your neighbour keeps his farm clean as well. The world health organization represents an effort to see that the weeds all over the world, on our neighbour's land as well as our own, are cleaned up in the interests of all. Without putting it on the lower level of our own selfish interest, it is important that the disease-infested swamps of the world be drained and cleaned up, in our own interests as well as the interests of those in whose lands the swamps are to be found. I know most of us are interested in the success of the united nations health organization, because success in an endeavour like this goes far in preparing the way for international cooperation on all fronts. Of course the united nations organization has given us cause for some disappointment as well as some optimism; but in the final analysis, like any other organization or any individual, the united nations organization and its various component parts must deliver the goods; and when they have delivered the goods they will have world support. That is why I think we are fortunate in Canada to be one of the first nations to make a move to adopt a constitution such as this. It is a forward step toward a better world, a better humanity. It lays greater emphasis upon the right things of life which in the end will be the deciding points as between peace or war, content or suffering, joy or sorrow in the days to come.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): It has been interesting to listen to the debate thus far, Mr. Speaker. I have been impressed by the fact that most of those who have participated up to the present time have given reasons why we in Canada should pay much more attention to our health problems, but no reasons why we should join an international organization to accomplish that objective. Apart from such things as quarantine regulations, you might say, it is difficult to see how joining an international organization is going to help us solve the problems which are vital in dealing with our health situation. I greatly enjoyed the remarks of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair), but in them there was hardly anything to indicate why we should join this international organization, or that to do so would necessarily advance our interests in respect to health. I hope after a while in the house and in the country we may begin to be a little more realistic than we have shown ourselves to be in the last year or so. There seems to be abroad in the land an idea that any problem under the sun can be solved if you can get it far enough away from yourself and into the hands of a big enough international organization. I am really a bit surprised that no one has suggested sending a delegation to Mars, one to Jupiter, one to the moon, and delegations to three or four other planets, to see if we cannot set up an interplanetary organization to solve the problems of the world. That would seem a logical proposal, and I am somewhat disappointed that it has not been brought forward up to the present time.

This sort of thing simply tends to take our minds off the real difficulties that confront us. Problems of health in a large measure have to do with the standard of living. Whether joining this international organization for health will enable us to improve our standard of living in Canada, no one has taken pains to explain. Yet it is obvious from what has been said by everyone who has participated in the debate that the real cause of most of our ill health is a poor standard of living in Canada. Will anyone who is so ardently enthusiastic about this organization explain to me how signing the agreement will help us to raise our standard of living in Canada? That is what I want to know.

As I have already pointed out to the house on one or two earlier occasions, in the year preceding June 2, 1941, in Canada 32·9 per cent of our wage earners received less than $450 a year. Until we can change that situation we are simply making ourselves ridiculous, when we spend our time signing international organization agreements to promote health. In that same year another 28·7 per cent of our wage earners were receiving between $450 and $949 a year. A large percentage of the people earning those incomes were heads of families.

I am informed the Toronto welfare council has recently told the people of Canada that for a family to live under conditions of standard health and decency it will require in the neighbourhood of $2,000 a year. What I fear is that hon. members are getting their minds off the essentials that are right nearby. It is a common failing among human beings everywhere, and among organizations of human beings, to dream about the big things to be done by and by, while they neglect the little things around their feet which they might do something about.

There is no doubt that Canada can give to every person in Canada enough of the world's goods to supply a reasonable standard of health and decency. Judging from our national income and the production of our nation there is no reason for our being unable to have a doctor come to visit regularly; there is no reason why we should not have a dentist attending the children regularly; there is no reason why every Canadian citizen should not have all the food he needs, well-balanced and well-prepared. There is no reason why they should not have the clothing and shelter they need.

As I recall it, in his report of 1946 Mr. Graham Towers told us that in 1944 we in Canada produced 11·8 billion dollars worth of goods and services, and in 1945 we produced 11·4 billion. This was at a time when we had 1,500,000 of our very best potential producers engaged in war. If we take that amount of goods and services and divide it among 12 million people we find that we get in the neighbourhood of $916 per man, woman and child in Canada. Will anyone tell me why we have such a low standard of living among our people? Will anyone tell me how in the world by joining any number of international organizations like this one we can overcome that difficulty? If he will, I shall be interested immediately.

I have no desire to delay the house in a discussion of this matter. But I do hope we shall not get our eye off the ball by chasing rainbows or soap bubbles. By way of diversion I would draw the attention of hon. members for a moment to the dismal disappointment we have had as a result of joining the united nations organization. A year ago one might have thought that by doing so we would go right into the millennium. Anyone who said we should not join it was held out as a public enemy. Yet, what have we got out of it?

Let us be realistic. Let us face the facts as they are and see if we cannot get down to earth. Let us begin walking on terra firma—on the rocks, the dirt and the mud—so that we shall have a sense of reality in these matters.

The group with which I am associated has no particular objection to joining this international health organization. But we warn that the more of our national affairs we allow either directly or indirectly to be influenced by bodies of people outside our country, the more difficult our situation is going to become. What we must learn is to manage our own country, to run our own business, to clean our own back yard. As soon as we learn how to do that, there will be plenty of people looking over our boundaries to find out how we have done it. We shall not need to go hunting people to teach; they will find us, and come to learn.

I have gone through the agreement, so far as I have had time to do so in conjunction with the many burdens placed upon me—as they are, of course, upon all other hon. members. I do not see in this constitution anything indicating a dangerous amount of control over our national affairs which could be exercised directly or indirectly by the government of this organization. If I could see any evidence that such a possibility was implicit in the organization I would oppose it with all the power at my command, and would call on all hon. members to do the same. As it is, I think it amounts almost to another bubble, another rainbow to go chasing after, and by which to be deluded.

Our group will not oppose this resolution; we will allow it to slide through. But let me repeat that it is time we got down to earth and began to find out the real cause of the troubles from which we suffer. Let us find out why in a country like Canada, which has produced goods valued at 11·8 billions of dollars, 32·9 per cent of our wage earners receive less than $450 a year, thus making it utterly impossible for them, and for any of those connected with them, to have health. If I might bring in another illustration which comes to mind, I would mention that I am now engaged in the industrial relations committee. Why in the world is it that we in Canada are risking the whole economic welfare of the country by resisting the desire of a group of men to make $1,750 a year as a minimum?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his remarks are not relevant to the motion before the house.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have all the deference for you and your opinion, Mr. Speaker, but not a single word of what I have uttered could possibly be said to be irrelevant to the matter of health in this country. Nor can it be irrelevant to the health of the world—not one word. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is the position in which your ruling puts the whole situation in this country.

I refrain from saying any more.

Motion agreed to.

UNITED NATIONS

APPROVAL OF CONSTITUTION OF EDUCATIONAL, SCIENTIFIC AND CULTURAL ORGANIZATION

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the constitution of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization signed at London, on November 16, 1945, and that this house do approve the same.

He said: I do not think I could say anything more effective in support of this motion than to put on Hansard the preamble to the constitution of the united nations educational, scientific and cultural organization:

The governments of the states parties to this organization on behalf of their peoples declare:

That since wars begin in the minds of men, it is in the minds of men that the defences of peace must be constructed; that ignorance of each other's way and lives has been a common cause, throughout the history of mankind, of that suspicion and mistrust between the peoples of the world through which their differences have all too often broken into war; that the great and terrible war which has now ended was a war made possible by the denial of the democratic principles of the dignity, equality and mutual respect of men, and by the propagation, in their place, through ignorance and prejudice, of the doctrine of the inequality of men and races; that the wide diffusion of culture, and the education of humanity for justice and liberty and peace are indispensable to the dignity of man and constitute a sacred duty which all the nations must fulfil in a spirit of mutual assistance and concern; that a peace based exclusively upon the political and economic arrangements of governments would not be a peace which could secure the unanimous, lasting and sincere support of the peoples of the world, and that the peace must therefore be founded, if it is not to fail, upon the intellectual and moral solidarity of mankind.

For these reasons, the states parties to this constitution, believing in full and equal opportunities for education for all, in the unrestricted pursuit of objective truth, and in the free exchange of ideas and knowledge, are agreed and determined to develop and to increase the means of communication between their peoples and to employ these means for the purposes of mutual understanding and a truer and more perfect knowledge of each other's lives. In consequence whereof they do hereby create the united nations educational, scientific and cultural organization for the purpose of advancing, through the educational, scientific and cultural relations of the peoples of the world, the objectives of international peace and of the common welfare of mankind for which the united nations organization was established and which its charter proclaims.

It is the organization having these aims, and set up for that purpose that this resolution invites this house of parliament to approve and in which it authorizes participation.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before the minister resumes his seat may I ask a question?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I shall have no objection to answering any questions I can when I have concluded.

The constitution was drafted by representatives of forty-four states meeting at an educational and cultural conference in London in November, 1945. At this meeting Canada was represented by a delegation consisting of the Right Hon. Vincent Massey, Principal R. C. Wallace of Queen's university and Mr. Edmond Turcotte, then editor of the Montreal newspaper Le Canada. The delegation's advisers were drawn from the Department of External Affairs, the education branch of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and the National Research Council.

The London meeting was the culmination of years of study and thought by various international bodies seeking to promote the international and moral solidarity of mankind, believing, in the words of the preamble to the constitution, that "since wars begin in the minds of men it is in the minds of men that the defences of peace must be constructed."

After the last war the importance of intellectual cooperation was appreciated and resulted in the creation of the international institute of intellectual cooperation which, through the generosity of the French government, was given headquarters in Paris. The international bureau of education in Geneva, also established in this period, likewise reflected the recognition of the need for some international cooperation through education. More and more international societies of scholars, scientists and artists began to meet at regular intervals to profit by friendly exchanges of ideas, but the development of totalitarian philosophies certainly impeded the growth and much of what was hoped from that development.

The second world war intensified the feeling that international intellectual cooperation was essential, and as early as September, 1941, Viscount Cecil took the lead in forming the London international assembly. A year later the first conference was held of the allied ministers of education which began to plan for the educational and cultural reconstruction of occupied countries. As this conference studied the problems of educational reconstruction in the occupied countries, it realized that it was necessary to go even further in promoting international cooperation in educational and cultural matters. The same need was realized in the United States where an unofficial education assembly in 1943 drew up plans for an international organization for educational and cultural development. In 1944 the United States proposals were discussed at the conference of allied ministers of education and a draft constitution was produced.

The British government then agreed to invite the allied governments to a conference to discuss this constitution in November, 1945. At the San Francisco meeting general endorsement was given of the resolution presented by France on cultural cooperation, and in the charter of the united nations, article I, section 3, full endorsement was given to the principle of promoting international, cultural and educational cooperation.

The nations at San Francisco, under the charter, also pledged themselves to take joint and separate action for the achievement of this purpose. The approval of the constitution of UNESCO, drafted in London in the fall of 1945, has already been given by seventeen countries. These include the United States of America and the members of the British commonwealth of nations—with the exception so far of Canada—Brazil, China, Denmark, the Dominican republic, France, Iran, Mexico, Norway, Saudi-Arabia, Syria and Turkey. It is fully expected that the required number of twenty nations will have ratified the constitution before the first formal meeting of UNESCO takes place in Paris in November of this year. In the interval, since the drafting of the constitution, plans for its organization have been developed under the auspices of the executive committee on which Canada has been represented, and by the preparatory commission.

A distinguished British scientist, Doctor Julian Huxley, has been appointed as secretary of UNESCO. The agreement defining the relations of UNESCO with the economic and social council of the united nations has been drawn up and will be considered at the meeting of the united nations in September of this year.

The organization has been given functions which I will not take time to read to the house, but which if I might have the consent of hon. members I would put on Hansard in order to give continuity to my remarks on this resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. minister unanimous consent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The following functions have been given to the organization:

(a) to collaborate in the work of advancing the mutual knowledge and understanding of peoples, through all means of mass communication and to that end recommend such international agreements as may be necessary to promote the free flow of ideas by word and image;

(b) to give fresh impulse to popular education and to the spread of culture; by collaboration with members, at their request, in the development of educational activities; by instituting collaboration among the nations to advance the ideal of equality of educational opportunity without regard to race, sex, or any distinctions, economic or social; by suggesting educational methods best suited to prepare the children of the world for responsibilities of freedom.

(c) to maintain, increase and diffuse knowledge; by assuring the conservation and protection of the world's inheritance of books, works of art and monuments of history and science, and recommending to the nations concerned the necessary international conventions; by encouraging cooperation among the nations in all branches of intellectual activity, including the international exchange of persons active in fields of education, science and culture and the exchange of publications, objects of artistic and scientific interest and other materials of information; by initiating methods of international cooperation calculated to give the people of all countries access to the printed and published materials produced by any of them.

In carrying out these functions, UNESCO, must not interfere within the domestic jurisdiction of its members.

These purposes are safeguarded by section 3 of article 1, which is in the following terms:

> With a view to preserving the independence, integrity and fruitful diversity of the cultures and educational systems of the states members of this organization, the organization is prohibited from intervening in matters which are essentially within their domestic jurisdiction.

The organization includes a general conference, an executive board and a secretariat. The general conference consists of not more than five delegates from each member state and will meet annually to determine the policy of the organization. From the conference may come recommendations and international conventions for the consideration of the member states. Each member state is under obligation to submit such recommendations and conventions to its competent authorities within one year, but is under no obligation whatsoever to acquiesce if it does not think it is wise to do so. The executive board consists of eighteen members elected by the general conference for terms of three years. Members may serve not more than two consecutive terms. It is the duty of the executive board to carry out the programme laid down by the conference and, for this purpose, it is to meet at least twice a year. The elected members of the board are to be drawn from "persons competent in the arts, the humanities, the sciences, education and the diffusion of ideas, and qualified by their experience and capacity to fulfil the administrative and executive duties of the board." The election should also take into account the diversities of cultures and a balanced geographical distribution. The secretariat consists of a director general and such staff as may be required.

Each member state is required to make arrangements in accordance with its particular conditions for linking up principal bodies interested in educational, scientific and cultural matters with the work of the organization. It is suggested that this preferably be done by forming a national commission which would be broadly representative of the government and such bodies. The national commission or some such body is intended to act in an advisory capacity to the government and to delegations to the general conference. It is also intended to be a liaison between various educational and cultural organizations and the government.

Here in Canada we have not yet determined what form of action we will take to bring the bodies interested in educational, scientific and cultural advancement into relationship with this international organization. In the United States before the adjournment of congress a bill was adopted and signed by the president providing for the setting up in the United States of a national commission comprising one hundred members. Of course we would not have in contemplation anything as elaborate as that, but because of the jurisdiction of the provinces in matters of education we wish to confer with them as well as with the private organizations that exist for the promotion of educational, scientific and cultural development. It is desired to have some Canadian body that will be widely representative of the Canadian public and that will be entirely divorced from any partisan political influence, to make this a matter in which all those in Canada interested in educational, scientific and cultural development will feel that they have a part.

The precise financial relationship between the budget of UNESCO and the budget of the united nations has yet to be defined. A supplementary agreement is to be negotiated for that purpose between the two organizations. The view of the Canadian government is that the united nations should exercise a general supervision over UNESCO budgetary arrangements. It is also its view that caution should be taken in outlining financial commitments until UNESCO has had some experience in securing the cooperation of existing international organizations and societies in the educational, scientific and cultural fields. UNESCO is authorized with the approval of the executive board to receive gifts, bequests and subventions directly from governments, public and private institutions, associations and private persons.

The economic and social council is the liaison agent for the united nations with UNESCO. As mentioned previously, a draft agreement outlining this relationship was signed on June 4, in New York, subject to the action of the united nations in September and to that of the general conference of UNESCO in November. UNESCO will also consult and cooperate with other international organizations which presumably might include the atomic energy commission, the security council, though this is less likely, and the international labour organization.

It is one of those organizations designed to bring into cooperative relations those who are interested all over the world in educational, scientific and cultural development and, like the world health organization. It is hoped that this rapprochement between those who are, to paraphrase the words used by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), convinced that it is important for the progress, development, peace and security of the world to regard human values as more important than mere material things, will enable them to work together to bring about that state of mind where there will be less inquiring "who is my neighbour?" and more of a recognition that all men are of all men each other's neighbours.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, the minister promised to permit me a question before he resumed his seat, when Your Honour was not in the chair.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would suggest that the hon. member wait his turn.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker, I think it is really a matter of courtesy to permit the question. It is not very much that the hon. member is asking—leave to ask one question, not to make a speech. It is the usual custom to permit it, and I do not think he should be denied that courtesy.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may put his question.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Can the minister now find in the constitution and read to the house the passage or passages in which is set forth the technique through which the beautiful objectives already set forth are proposed to be achieved through the organization which Canada is now being asked to join?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is just what I have been explaining. There are various organs set up by the organization to endeavour through cooperation to further and achieve the objectives which have been indicated.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the minister if all the member nations of the united nations organization have taken part in the setting up of this united nations educational, scientific and cultural organization?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. If the hon. member will refer to Canada treaty series of 1945, No. 18, he will find on page 32, indicated by the letter X, opposite the names of the countries, those who have signed the final act and those who have signed the constitution of the organization; and unfortunately the representatives of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics have not so far indicated any intention of becoming members of the organization.

Mr. GREEN: The Soviet is taking no part whatever in this organization?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: So far it has not been taking part in this organization.

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, in the terms of the present resolution this house is asked to approve the constitution of the united nations educational, scientific and cultural organization signed at London on November 16, 1945. I for one trust that the resolution will have the unanimous endorsement of the house.

May I first deal with the point which was raised by the last question. Actually in the paper to which the Minister of Justice and Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) has just referred, treaty series 1945, No. 18, there are three documents. The first is the final act of the conference which met at London in November last; the second is the constitution of the organization commonly called UNESCO, and the third is the instrument establishing the preparatory commission looking forward to launching the new organization and putting it in running order. All that the house is asked to approve, as I understand it, in this present resolution is the second of these documents, namely the constitution of the organization.

I should like to point out that forty-four nations participated in the conference at London. Russia, as has been mentioned, along with the two Soviet republics which are granted separate international representation—the Ukraine republic and the Byelo-Russian republic—were not represented. Of the forty-four nations which attended the conference, forty-three signed the final act. Only El Salvador refrained from signing the final act. As for the constitution of the organization, thirty-nine nations signed. Those which did not sign were: El Salvador, Australia, France, New Zealand and the United States of America. As for the third document, the instrument establishing the preparatory commission, forty-one nations signed; the three abstainers were El Salvador, Australia and France. It is a matter of general regret that this conference was not attended by any representatives of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics or the two other Soviet republics to which I have referred, and that there has been no indication from the Soviet union of any intention as yet of participating in this UNESCO organization.

I think that at the outset we should see this organization in its true perspective. It is established, as has been indicated, as one of those specialized agencies which were contemplated when the economic and social council of the united nations organization was brought into being; and it is in measures such as this, the setting up of specialized agencies of this kind, with the aim of ensuring peace by eliminating the ultimate causes of war, that much of the hope of the world for the future lies.

It is to be seen that in the approach to this agencies of this kind, with the aim of ensuring that peace must be constructed on a broad basis, that there must be the broadest possible approach to the problem of establishing sure and permanent peace.

Examining the organization itself, one must, I think, readily assent to the view that the form of the organization in the field assigned to it is or promises to be satisfactory. It is modelled on a form which has been given to other international organizations established within the past year. It has a general conference, which corresponds to the assembly in the case of the united nations organization, and it has an executive board of eighteen and a permanent secretariat. There is a feature in connection with the organization which I think is worthy of mention. It will come into existence when twenty signatory nations ratify the constitution. The admission of members is put on this basis, that members of the united nations organization are automatically entitled to membership in UNESCO; and as to other nations which are not members of the united nations organization, they may be admitted by a two-thirds majority vote of the general conference. That will take care of any nations which are not yet signatories of the charter of the united nations organization.

As to the executive board, it is worthy of note that whereas membership in the general conference is on the basis of nations, when the selection is made of the eighteen members to constitute the general conference, they are selected as persons. There is one qualification in the agreement, to this effect, that no nation may have more than one representative on the executive board except in the case of the nation from which the president of the board is drawn.

The form of the organization promises, I believe, to be satisfactory. What shall we say of the purposes which have been assigned to it? On reading the purposes which have motivated the forty-four nations to sit down together and write this charter, one can say only that they have conceived the purpose of UNESCO in the loftiest terms. They have gone to some of the ultimate causes of war. They have opened with the challenging statement that, "since wars begin in the minds of men, it is in the minds of men that the defences of peace must be constructed"; and in the succeeding statements in reference to the purposes there are certain expressions which ought to be set beside one another by way of contrast. On the one hand we have reference to suspicion and mistrust, the doctrine of the inequality of men and races, as being sources or breeders of war and the spirit of war. On the other hand we have offered, as antidotes, the democratic principles of the dignity, equality and mutual respect of men, the wide diffusion of culture, the education of humanity for justice and liberty and peace, and finally, the intellectual and moral solidarity of mankind.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. FLEMING: Prior to the one o'clock adjournment I had touched on two of what I conceive to be three important matters affecting the resolution now before the house The first was the form of organization of the united nations educational, scientific, and cultural organization. The second had to do with its purposes. I should like to read one further passage from the provisions setting forth the general objectives:—

> For these reasons, the states parties to this constitution, believing in full and equal opportunities for education for all, in the unrestricted pursuit of objective truth, and in the free exchange of ideas and knowledge, are agreed and determined to develop and to increase the means of communication between their peoples and to employ these means for the purposes of mutual understanding and a truer and more perfect knowledge of each other's lives.

If I may interject there, that statement may appear to be a stumbling block to Russian participation in the UNESCO as constituted at present, because undoubtedly we have no evidence of a free exchange of ideas and knowledge being permitted by the Russian government with people in other parts of the world, or any willingness to increase the means of communication between their people and the other peoples of the world. If the time comes when that barrier is broken down and an exchange of information, ideas and understandings is permitted between the peoples of that country and the peoples of the rest of the world, then indeed we shall have achieved a greater measure of assurance of lasting peace.

Article I of this constitution has this to say:

> The purpose of the organization is to contribute to peace and security by promoting among the nations through education, science and culture in order to further universal respect of justice, for the rule of law and for the human rights and fundamental freedoms which are affirmed for the peoples of the world, without distinction of race, sex, language or religion, by the Charter of the United Nations.

There we have a lofty statement of the purposes of this organization, a statement which must have the willing and enthusiastic adherence of all enlightened peoples the world over. But, Mr. Speaker, we can have the most perfect form of organization, we can have the loftiest form of statement of the purposes of the organization, and yet see it waste, atrophy and fail. There is one factor which must be added to these two if this organization is to achieve for humanity the objects which it has set before it. That third factor is the will on the part of the governments of the states concerned, yes, and, beyond them, of the peoples in those states, to make this organization really effective for the achievement of the purposes set forth in the constitution. Unless that is made the real purpose on the part of the peoples of the world, and through them of their governments, this constitution will become but a musty document in the Canadian archives. It is a duty which rests on parliament, it is a duty which rests on the people in public life in this country and in other lands, to bring home to the people the fact that this organization is not far removed from contact with reality, that it is not something far removed from their experiences, but something which is vital to them in their hopes for lasting peace and an opportunity to live their lives in security.

What we need is a happy blend of idealism and realism. There will be some who will ask what immediate advantage this offers to Canada, and who will judge Canada's or this parliament's duty of adherence to this organization by the answer to that question. I do not believe any one of us can pretend that this organization offers some immediate special advantage to Canada. If we are to measure our efforts to build lasting peace simply by their immediate fruits, then I am afraid our measures are going to appear very ineffective indeed. We must take a long-range view and measure our progress in relation to long-range objectives.

I affirm with confidence that there is no nation, the world over, which has a greater stake in the peace of the world than has Canada. All of us are well aware of and conscious of the danger that if there should be another world war Canada may well be the battleground. We know that if we are to have hope of progressing and developing this land with all its great natural resources we must have peace and settled international relations. We know all too well the threat to national unity in this country which war has always brought. Therefore I say that this nation has as great a stake in international peace as any nation in the world.

There are some who will say, let us mind our own affairs, the education of our own people, and let other people look after their own affairs. Are there any who say that in the light of the experience of the world in recent years? If there are, let them cast their minds back to what happened in Germany when Hitler came to power. Almost the first things he did were to abolish trade unions and to seize control of education. What happened? Hon. members well know the way that the educational system of that country was made to serve the purposes of the nazi ideology. Hon. members will recall the way in which the universities were closed, the libraries burnt, the university professors and teachers who were not prepared to inculcate the nazi ideology sent to the concentration camps, and the educational system bent to serve the purposes of the nazis. You remember, Mr. Speaker, that it was not a generation which was uneducated which burst forth upon the world in 1939, but a generation which was educated according to Nazi standards, a generation which like its fathers in 1914 thought that it was carrying a superior brand of culture to inferior peoples elsewhere in Europe and abroad. Yes, Mr. Speaker, you will recall the tramp, tramp of these booted nazi youths marching through Nuremburg in torchlight processions in the early days of the nazi regime shouting out, "Deutschland erwache"! Germany awake! And Germany awoke.

You remember also what happened to the educational institutions in the lands which were subjugated by the nazis. They were among the first things of which the invaders seized control. They closed the educational institutions or used them to serve the nazi purposes. Anyone who dares to say that the education of the youth of other lands is no concern of Canada while we are training our youth for peace has closed his eyes to what has taken place. While we are training our youth for peace dare we shut our eyes if other nations are training their youth for war? I say, no.

Consider the need in Europe to-day. The need is simply appalling. How can we expect any reconstruction of Europe, any return of Europe to peaceful objectives, unless there is a return of the educational and cultural institutions of that continent? It is good, Mr. Speaker, that the preparatory commission should have set this out as one of its first objectives. It will be found in article 6 of the instrument establishing the commission, as follows:

> The commission shall appoint a special technical subcommittee to examine the problems relating to the educational, scientific and cultural needs of the countries devastated by the war, having regard to the information already collected and the work being done by other international organizations, and to prepare as complete a conspectus as possible of the extent and nature of the problems for the information of the Organization at the First Session of the Conference.

We Canadians pride ourselves, and rightly, Mr. Speaker, on the contribution this country made to the winning of the war and to humanity through other media such as UNRRA and international loans. What we need to do now is to match that contribution with our contribution to mankind in the educational, scientific and cultural realm. In the educational realm no land in the world attaches greater importance to education than this country; in no land the world over, I suggest, is there a firmer conviction that the opportunities of education must be open to all on an equal footing, and in no country in the world is there a more determined attempt constantly to improve the methods of education. Furthermore, we have happily developed in this country a large number of educationists, leaders in that field, who with this widened opportunity are now capable of making a valued contribution in this realm to other lands as well.

In the field of science this country already possesses a formidable roll of great Canadians who have made vast contributions—and this is a matter of which I think Canadians should be especially proud—on the constructive side of science. Look at the list of the great Canadian scientists, and with very few exceptions you will see that their contribution has been to the welfare of humanity rather than to developing means of destroying humanity.

In the third place, in regard to the cultural realm, I contend that this country is in a position to make a unique contribution. We have two great cultures in this country, to which have been added the cultures brought to this country by those whom we call new Canadians. We have flourishing here not only the art, literature, music and humanities imported from other lands; we are also developing original accomplishments in these fields. This nation can measure its greatness and its accomplishments not simply in material things, but also in these things of the spirit.

Yes; we can contribute much to and we can receive much from this organization. It is worthy of note that already UNESCO has received the approbation of distinguished Canadians who are particularly concerned in this field. I quote only one such expression, contained in a newspaper interview given by Doctor Sidney Smith, president of the University of Toronto, appearing in the Globe and Mail of November 23 last. Speaking of UNESCO he said:

> This new organ is as essential a prop to world security as any other agency in the united nations organization, economic, political or military.

Then he went on to observe, and I think this is worthy of note, that there was no comparable organization under the old league of nations.

Mr. MARTIN: Merely intellectual cooperation.

Mr. FLEMING: The Secretary of State is quite right in referring to the organization for intellectual cooperation, but I suggest to the house that the aims of that organization were never carried to the length that has been outlined in the charter of the organization now before us.

Let us not forget that we are not doing something light here to-day in approving this charter. Let us remember that we are assuming obligations. It is obvious that in the first place we have assumed an obligation in the field of education, science and culture, to try to mould our national objectives so they will be in harmony with those set forth in the constitution of UNESCO. That should not be difficult, because our aims in these fields are and always have been peaceful. But we must bear in mind also that there is a further step to be taken in the way of organization. In article VII of the charter we have this provision:

> Each member state shall make such arrangements as suit its particular conditions for the purpose of associating its principal bodies interested in educational, scientific and cultural matters with the work of the organization, preferably by the formation of a national commission broadly representative of the government and such bodies.

I do not need to say more than a word on the subject of a national commission for Canada, in view of the remarks made this morning by the acting Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent), but I do offer two observations by way of caution. In the first place, if we are to have a national commission, as I hope we shall, it must be broad and representative in its composition—representative of the best Canadian thought and culture in these kindred fields of education, science and culture. In the second place, we must be very careful that we do not in any way interfere with or trespass upon the autonomy of the provinces in the matter of education. I am sure the house welcomed the assurance given this morning by the acting Secretary of State for External Affairs that no move will be made in this direction without full consultation with the provinces.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that Canada's place is definitely in this organization, and that Canada must take a prominent, yes, a leading part in the functioning of the organization. We have in this country men of the calibre required to make the executive board of UNESCO a useful and outstanding organization. We have in this country men capable of making a great contribution to the deliberations of the general conference. Because of the part Canada played in the drafting of those provisions in the united nations charter which govern the powers, functions and purposes of the economic and social council, we shall wish to see to it that in UNESCO, so closely related in its objects to the economic and social council, the work is carried forward in complete loyalty to its stated objectives.

It would be a brave man indeed, perhaps only a foolhardy one, who would prophesy success for this organization. It may be difficult for many to see an assurance of success for it until Russia participates and cooperates fully. But the possibility of Russia still standing aside and declining to cooperate or participate, in my humble submission, still is not the greatest danger to the success of the organization. The greatest danger will be the indifference and apathy of governments, of parliaments and of peoples, the feeling that this sort of organization is altogether too remote from them. The greatest danger will be that parliaments, perhaps this one this afternoon, will say, "When we have ratified this charter we have done all that is expected of us." In ratifying this charter, as I trust parliament will ratify it, we are not fulfilling our obligation. We are rather assuming and acknowledging an obligation which must be fulfilled over the years to come. It is needful for us to realize that to-day we are simply taking the first step, that we are accepting an obligation. Its fulfilment in the years to come will be a high privilege and a great responsibility for all men in public life in this country.

Mr. R. R. KNIGHT (Saskatoon City): You may be sure, Mr. Speaker, that I listened with great interest to the address of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). You may be sure that I am very much interested in the resolution, such as it is, presented by the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) this morning, and a little later I shall try to explain what I mean by "such as it is." I was interested in hearing the preamble read; I believe it included some such words as "it is in the minds of men that wars begin. It is in the minds of men that understanding must be created." Whether or not the first part of that paragraph is true, I shall not discuss here. I could debate it, I think, at some length. But I do certainly believe it is in the minds of men that understanding must be created.

May I say I was somewhat disappointed in the comments made this morning by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), because I felt he was expressing a narrow nationalist point of view. I believe we should share in common with all the people of the world, whether it be in health matters or matters of education, all such knowledge as we have been fortunate enough to get into our possession.

I should like to congratulate the minister upon bringing in this resolution. Many of us have been waiting for it, and for more, for a long time. All the educational bodies in this country have been waiting for it, and in that I include the Canadian Teachers' Federation, the Newfoundland Educational Association, the Association for Adult Education, and the like. It will be welcomed throughout the whole country by those who are interested in education.

It will be noticed that while this is a threefold measure, I am emphasizing the educational feature of it. At this point I might quote from a letter I received from an interested friend, who says:

> In view of the activities of the preparatory committee which has been meeting in London recently, and in view of the way their action may easily affect Canada, we are very anxious that the Canadian parliament should ratify the UNESCO charter and should set up the enabling bodies which would act with the commissioners, or representatives, who would represent Canada on the UNESCO council. Indeed, a great many of us have been urging this upon the government for a long while.

This resolution is the result of the recommendation of the preparatory conference. The minister read that recommendation this morning. I would draw to his attention the fact that it consisted of two parts, but that in the resolution there is no mention of the second part. That was why I said in the first place that I welcome the resolution, such as it was.

Article VII, to which the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) referred, is as follows:

> 1. Each member state shall make such arrangements as suit its particular conditions for the purpose of associating its principal bodies interested in educational, scientific and cultural matters with the work of the organization, preferably by the formation of a national commission broadly representative of the government and such bodies.
> 2. National commissions or national cooperating bodies, where they exist, shall act in an advisory capacity to their respective delegations to the general conference and to their governments in matters relating to the organization and shall function as agencies of liaison in all matters of interest to it.

3. The organization may, on the request of a member state, delegate, either temporarily or permanently, a member of its secretariat to serve on the national commission of that state, in order to assist in the development of its work.

In the budget debate I had urged that upon the minister, when I said:

I urge upon the government some immediate action by way of a beginning. In this field there is no minister, no government department to give a lead; some leadership should be arranged forthwith.

When I said that I was referring of course to Canadian leadership.

The national commission should be set up at once as a consultative and advisory body.

As I said, the resolution submitted this morning does not mean much to me, other than a resolution, because it is barren unless it can be persuaded to give birth to such organization as is visualized in article VII—that is, an enabling body, a national body, through which a government can keep in touch with and be advised by those directly interested in education, in science and in culture.

This body fills an absolute need. As I pointed out, there is no minister, and no department. How can such a body be made up? Well, in my opinion, since there are three matters to be dealt with it should be set up in panel form. I believe there is good reason for that, on the basis of arts, science and culture. The first reason is this, that I think predominant among the three is the question of education. The demands of the provinces for representation as such might make that element too large, and they might crowd out the others. I think, too, that the members of each panel, if it were set up in that way, would be specialists in their own particular subjects, and so would be well informed in the subjects about which they were talking, whereas the whole body collectively might not be skilled in one of these particular phases.

The matter of education is that in which for the moment I am most deeply interested. As I see it, this body should have representation from all the major educational organizations in the country, and certainly from the Canadian Teachers' Federation and the C.N.E.A. I would urge that the government consult with those bodies before setting up such a commission.

Again, I think the commission should have wide representation geographically across the country; each province would probably wish to be represented as such. I wonder whether the question of autonomy in provincial education, which seems to concern so many minds, had anything to do with the minister's not completing the set-up at this particular time. At this point I should like to quote a paragraph from a letter from an interested friend on the subject:

We are rather concerned that the discussion on the UNESCO charter should not be sidetracked by too much emphasis being placed upon the fact that education in Canada is a prerogative of the provincial governments. It is true that formal education is in the hands of the provincial governments, and probably quite rightly, but there is a very great deal of education being carried on informally in Canada by a very great many bodies that are national in scope. Indeed it seems to be quite likely that those features of the educational movement with which UNESCO will be mostly concerned will be the work of these informal bodies.

I shall not attempt to add anything to that argument, but shall simply say that I am in hearty support of the resolution. Again I qualify that statement by adding the words, for what it is worth. It is at least friendly and benevolent, and I urge the minister to take the steps necessary to give it force and practical value.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about the constitution of this organization. As hon. members know, it was the United States which proposed the San Francisco conference. Russia was against it; Churchill was against it. However it was the idea of the late president of the United States, who did so much for civilization. What happened? The big powers were unrepresented except by members of the cabinet; the leaders were not there. They inserted in the charter of the united nations a veto clause for the big four. Here you have Russia, the United States and Great Britain, and now they have added China and France. They divided the world into large powers, the big five; middle powers and smaller nations. As you know, the whole proceeding down there at San Francisco for security has collapsed, after Moscow, Potsdam, Yalta and Paris. There is no such thing in the world to-day as collective security. When you read over this document, treaty series No. 18, final act, you find on page 32 a list of the big four, the middle powers and the smaller nations. You find also that to-day almost every one of them is violating the world's charter which was drawn up at San Francisco. It has turned out to be nothing but a scrap of paper. If we are to have all this internationalism we will lead the countries to another war. Let us start our internationalism with the British empire first. I should like to read two or three quotations from the constitution, the first being:

—that since wars begin in the minds of men, it is in the minds of men that the defences of peace must be constructed.

Those are not original words; they are copied from the theory of Abbé de St. Pierre, who first set these words out in his "Theory (1713) of Collective Security". The main object of this new organization is to change the hearts of men. As I pointed out, a great historian, Professor S. R. Gardiner, commenting on the treaty of Utrecht of 1713, said:

The truth is that states combine readily through fear and very seldom through a desire for the common good, and when Louis XIV ceased to be formidable, each state thought exclusively of its own interests.

That is what each of the smaller and middle states are doing to-day, and the larger powers too. What happened last November when this organization was meeting in London? The big powers had a conference at Moscow and at Yalta. What happened over there? Mr. Attlee was there, Mr. Bevin was there, Mr. Byrnes and Mr. Stalin were there at Moscow. What did they do? They carved up Europe and the result is that the twenty-one nations who met at San Francisco, now at Paris, have no more to do than the man in the moon with the peace division of Europe, because one of the large powers can veto everything they do. The whole organization at San Francisco fell to the ground by this absurd veto insertion, because any one of the big powers can veto all the acts of the others.

What about this change in the hearts of men? No one sees it as yet after 150 years since Abbé de St. Pierre's days. I quote from page 10 of the final act, treaty series 1945, No. 18 united nations conference to establish security, as follows:

—that ignorance of each other's ways and lives has been a common cause, throughout the history of mankind, of that suspicion and mistrust between the peoples of the world through which their differences have all too often broken into war; that the great and terrible war which has now ended was a war made possible by the denial of the democratic principles of the dignity, equality and mutual respect of men, and by the propagation, in their place, through ignorance and prejudice, of the doctrine of the inequality of men and races.

What has been the result of all that? They simply copied the language which was used after the battle of Waterloo in the Concert of Europe when there was talk again about changing the hearts of men. In 1713 the great learned French scholar, Abbé de St. Pierre, first set out the theory of collective security in France. He went to a very able cardinal of France, Cardinal Fleury, and asked him to consider the scheme. The cardinal replied, "Have you sent out missionaries to turn the hearts of men?" That is what should have been done down in San Francisco. Instead of sending delegates from Canada and the other countries we should have sent missionaries down there to change the hearts of men. Until the hearts of men are changed there will be war as long as time lasts. Nearly seventy-five or eighty years ago Ruskin, one of the greatest authors of his day, and a man of peace, spoken of war; he said exactly what the cardinal said in "His Crown of Olives," to show the folly of all this new form of pacifism.

They had the Concert of Europe after the war of 1815 which was set up along the same lines as this organization, to change the hearts of men for scientific and educational purposes and for the good of humanity. The very same language was used then when they set up the Concert of Europe, composed of Austria, Prussia and Russia, after the battle of Waterloo. Nothing more was heard of collective security until by this new pact made in 1815 Emperor Alexander I of Russia proposed what is known as the Holy Alliance, or the Concert of Europe. Between whom? Between Austria, Prussia and Russia. They were to meet every few years, the contracting parties, to look over the face of Europe and see how peace and security was. What did it lead to? It led to the great prime minister of Great Britain, George Canning, urging that Britain should get out of Europe and seek a new alliance for a while; and it led by provocation to the United States adopting the Monroe doctrine in 1823. As Lord Castlereagh, the great British foreign minister, wrote to Lord Liverpool in 1815 at the Quai d'Orsay, "It was not without difficulty that we went through the interview with becoming gravity." It was the spiritual force between the Concert of Europe of which Russia, Austria and Prussia were the protagonists. They were the high contracting parties. It lasted eight years, its most notable achievement being that it provoked the United States into establishing the Monroe doctrine in 1823.

Then followed over a century or more, more security pacts in Dumbarton Oaks and the San Francisco conference. But what does it lead to? The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) seems to have great faith in this new pacifist organization, but I have none at all. As has been said, Russia has a treaty with Great Britain for ten years, and France and Britain must have a treaty or understanding immediately if they are to preserve any security for the world on the western front in the future. Unless we can continue the cooperation that existed during the war between Russia and the United States and Great Britain, then all collective security will be at an end.

What nations were represented at London on November 16, 1945? I will name just two, Greece and Turkey. Greece was against us in the first world war, and so was Turkey. What are they doing to-day? In view of Great Britain abandoning the Suez canal they were said to be trying actively to get an arrangement with Russia behind the scenes. So are several of the other nations seeking alliances, defensive and offensive. The great and small nations are seeking alliances with each other because they feel that only by having alliances can they keep the peace and security part of this organization. Without that, the educational, cultural and scientific parts of it will come to an end.

There is nothing said in this pact about cooperation and coordination in connection with the atomic bomb. The only league of nations that ever was a success to carry out educational, scientific and cultural work was the British empire. That is the only successful league of nations we have ever had.

On page 4 of the final act it states:

> The following international organizations were also represented by observers:
> International labour organization.

That has very little to do with this organization's function, as it is simply done for labour by another organization for labour. Talk about the league of nations and security—it was the league of nations that caused the second world war. It was nothing but pure sham and humbug of the league that led to the second world war. It was the league of nations that led Britain and the United States to disarm. It led Britain to throw away the finest navy, the finest army and the finest air force the world had ever seen, and allowed Hitler to rearm and scrap the Versailles treaty. It led to the second world war. And now they are at it again, these pacifist leagues! They have formed a new league organization with a new name and are appearing before even our own external affairs committee. I see represented at London last November the Pan-American union. We are a member of the British empire. The greatest league of nations that the world ever knew was the British empire; Great Britain and the commonwealth and the dominions, all united together are the hope for peace and for the defence of the world. Britain and the commonwealth had to go it alone in the early years of the war. Russia at that time had a treaty and an alliance with Germany, and for two years she stayed on Germany's side. Then Russia violated her treaty and came over to us. Russia might have lost the war but for Britain and the commonwealth alone for two years fighting Germany.

I say that this sort of organization has been tried before and it has failed for over two centuries. So far as science goes, there may be something in that. I referred to science and the part it has played when the minister's estimates were up last year. I said:

> Take modern medicine alone, the child of science, the most promising and brightest-eyed of her family. If it has not mastered, it has so diminished as to rob bodily pain of its terrors.

That is true. But science does not need the help of any pacifist paper organization like this. We have seen what happened about the atomic bomb. Science can get very little help from a paper organization like this, which will lead only to war instead of bringing about peace and security.

Bishop Rennison in one of his articles referred to the tower of Babel and said that we have another tower of Babel in San Francisco, Yalta and others of these pacts which are being made among the nations of the world to-day. He said that they mean nothing unless first there is a change in the hearts of men and we go back to the principles of the original Christian church. Next to the Christian church the British empire has done most for peace and security. I have very little faith in these international bodies. We saw the result of their work in the first world war and between the two wars.

Some of the countries that are listed as members of this organization were on the side of Germany in the last war—Argentine and others listed now. Some of these pacifist organizations have caused disunity within the empire and the abandonment of the Suez canal, which is the jugular vein of the British empire. India is also listed at the back of the book. It is the lifeline of the British empire, just as preferential trade is the bloodstream of the British empire. Some of these countries here did nothing for us in the war at all, and here they are signing their names to the final act, to a paper pact that means nothing. If Canada joins this organization it will be just like the other league. Canada will pay just like she did before, while many of the twenty-one member countries never paid a cent of their allotted contributions to the old league. I would like to see this session closed at the end of next week, but I object to these matters being dealt with in this manner. It is impossible to discuss them properly at the resolution stage, and without their being referred to a committee.

I saw the first great war coming, and I was a lone voice in this house in urging preparations for it. I urged rearmament all along the line, and trade, defence and migration within the empire. I can tell you this, that a lot of these organizations are not worth a snap of the finger so far as scientific or educational results are concerned for peace or security or anything else. Education is exclusively a provincial matter. In 1937 and 1938 and 1939 I told the pacifists in this house that war was coming and that we should rearm, but I was not heeded. Then the war came, and after the first world war the league of nations was established, and then we had a second world war, and we are heading into a third world war if we depend on pacifist organizations like this. While I am a strong supporter of science and education, I have very little faith in any of these organizations. The San Francisco conference took place eight months before a presidential election, and resulted in nothing but more chaos and confusion, and caused friction with Russia. What has Russia done? She has taken over Persia and captured the Balkans and Roumania. She has gone in there and established a system of communism in all the Balkan countries. She has got control of eastern and central Europe. I for one have no faith in organizations like this, or the new league of the same old source. I have read the debates in the British house on this proposal and I believe that men of science or educational authorities will have very little to do with this organization. I believe it will do nothing at all for education or science or to prevent war. Talk about pacifism —there are one or two organizations represented in this building to-day—labour and steel strike organizations. How are you going to pacify the world if you cannot pacify labour now in our building? How are you going to change the hearts of men? I was in Hamilton on Sunday and it is like an armed camp at the steel plant. Better start in at Ottawa changing the hearts of men in a domestic strike first. Then you may get somewhere. But these international paper organizations are nothing but a waste of public money.

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I consider this one of the most important resolutions to come before the house. It is far-reaching and has great possibilities. I do not think everything that is written into this treaty or into the resolution can be accomplished immediately, but I am inclined to have a little more faith in the possibilities than some of the speakers from whom we have heard so far. If I were asked to summarize the purport of the whole thing in a slogan I would call it "Peace through education." The opening sentence of the preamble sums it up very well. The acting Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has referred to it already. It says that the defences of peace must be constructed in the minds of men.

I cannot agree with the whole sentence, because it says first of all that wars begin in the minds of men. That is only relatively true. If we were to give it a very wide and general interpretation we might be able to say that that is true; but it fails, it seems to me, to take into consideration certain other causes which are far more important than the mere mental condition of the people. I have too much faith in humanity to believe that people declare war on each other or fight each other merely because they dislike each other. It is quite true that people who do fight must first dislike each other, but it seems to me that the root causes of war go much deeper than mere dislikes or hatreds that are the immediate point from which people begin to fight. I am inclined to think that there are certain considerations such as the following which have not been faced up to in this declaration.

For example, they do not seem to take into consideration the clash of economic interests. We must be realistic as well as idealistic,—to paraphrase what the hon. member to my right (Mr. Fleming) said—and realize that so long as we talk in terms of international competition—and we had an example of that yesterday, listening to one of the speeches on export trade, about competing with our neighbour nations for the markets or the resources of the world—we are going in the direction of conflict. I think we must approach it from the point of view of co-operating with other nations in sharing the wealth of the world, realizing that we have now reached the point where it can be said definitely that there is enough for all. That may not have been true a hundred years ago. It certainly can be said to-day that, with the power of production which the world possesses, there is enough for all if it is shared in co-operation; but if it is put on the basis of competing for it, we shall do what we have done before, we shall waste and destroy it, and everyone will be hungry in the end.

Again, there is the consideration of the economic exploitation of man by man. This is a realistic consideration, and one which we must face. A moment ago the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) brought up that point in a different way when he remarked that one of the cities in this country has reached a condition where it is practically an armed camp. Why? Is it because there is not enough food, clothing and shelter in this country to go round? Is it that they are fighting over something which all cannot have? It is not that, but because there are in our economic system people—whom I do not blame individually, because they are the product of the system which has been built up—who have more economic power and have concentrated more wealth in their hands than they are willing to allow their fellow men to possess. That exploitation causes men to envy and hate each other and in the long run leads to conflict.

Then there is the contraction of the world community. We have good examples of that all around us. Every time we see the news on the screen we are struck by the fact that the world seems to be continually getting smaller. To-day distance does not count for what it did years ago; and the bringing together, sometimes the sudden bringing together, of the peoples of the world by our modern means of communication creates certain types of friction which must be overcome before we can say that "war begins in the minds of men."

Perhaps the greatest of all is the failure of nations so far to make adjustments in their social and economic philosophies and systems to keep up with the advance of science and with technological development. I do not think anyone will disagree when I say that socially and economically we have not kept up with the times. We have found it possible through scientific skill to develop certain processes and inventions and certain ways of doing things which were not dreamed of a century ago, but in our economic and social thinking we have not advanced at the same rate.

With that introduction I want to say that I do have faith and hope that this organization will amount to something more than is possible at the present time. In article I, under the heading "Purposes and functions", we find something which it seems to me could have been more properly divided into three parts, because it sets out the purpose of the organization, the reason for those purposes, and also the method. For example, the purpose is, "to contribute to peace and security". There is no quarrel as to the desirability of that. The reason, it goes on to say, is "to further universal respect of justice, for the rule of law and for the human rights and fundamental freedoms which are affirmed for the peoples of the world, without distinction of race, sex, language or religion, by the charter of the united nations." Also very desirable, very elevated. We come to the third part, the method by which this is to be attained, namely, "by promoting collaboration among the nations through education, science and culture." It is this part of article I which I want to question. I am not altogether sure that this constitution provides, or at any rate adequately provides, for that method, because if we turn to the third paragraph of article I we find this clause:

> The organization is prohibited from intervening in matters which are essentially within their domestic jurisdiction.

I do not want it to appear as though I was in favour of interfering with anyone's domestic matters, whether provincial or national, but I do say that if we are to have education for peace, and if it is to be effective, it must be universal. I join with the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) in his deep regret that the Soviet union and the republics associated with it have not seen fit so far to become participants in this organization, because I believe that both the Soviet union and the countries which are now in the organization would gain much and lose nothing by standing together and working out ideas on world affairs. If education for peace is to be effective, it must be universal; it cannot be limited. We shall have to work towards that objective, because if we do not, I am afraid that what the hon. member for Broadview said will be only too true, that it will be a paper organization and nothing more.

What do I mean by "universal"? I do not mean that through the united nations organization full power and jurisdiction will be had over education in every school of the world, but that through that organization there must be power to present at least a minimum programme. It would be by its nature very limited in scope, because it would have to be the most that all could agree upon, and that would be precious little at this time. But if we can find even a modicum of education for peace on which all nations can agree, and then give the united nations organization the power to see that this type of education is available in every school in the world, we shall have made a step towards peace. If we do not do that, I fear we shall not have accomplished anything.

Those who fear that this interference with the domestic education of nations will be a serious contravention of our sovereignty will find, if they turn to the powers given to the security council, that that council under the united nations organization is empowered to interfere physically in the affairs of nations when there is a threat of war. Surely, by the same logic and reasoning, if it is necessary to give powers to the security council to interfere physically in the affairs of nations in order to avoid the threat of war, it is just as reasonable to say that we should give to UNESCO or the united nations enough power to lay the foundations of peace in the first place, in order that it may not be necessary for the security council to interfere with physical force in order to put down aggression when it has already raised its head. I think that is fundamental; and if we are going to get into this we might as well get into it and be serious about it. I would have no hesitation in giving UNESCO sufficient power to enable it to present a minimum programme of education for peace in every school room of the world. A great deal more could be said about it, but most of these considerations have been pointed out by other hon. members.

Listening to the hon. member from Lethbridge I could not help but agree with him to this extent, that if this organization is to be successful it must be practical and it must begin at home. Sometimes I am a little surprised at how quick and ready we are to sign our names to and endorse great and high sounding objectives provided it is something that we shall not have to do. It is not so long since I had the honour of introducing a resolution to provide for equality of education in Canada. I mention that merely because these very words are used in one of the objectives of this organization; not for Canada only but for all the people of the world. Although my resolution received some sympathetic consideration on this side of the house, it was given none on the other side. I am a little concerned as to how we, who are not willing to extend equality of opportunity and education to our own citizens, are to undertake to do it for all the peoples of the world. I hope that we shall begin at home. But I do not agree with the hon. member for Lethbridge when he says that our philosophy has to be one of minding our own business. I have no objection to anyone minding his own business provided that we as a nation could mind our business within the borders of our own country. If that were possible I should be glad to follow his advice, but in our has to be one of minding our own business. seems to be scattered all over the world. The world seems to have arrived at the stage where you cannot draw a boundary line and say, up to here is indeed my business and from here on it is not. It simply does not work that way. We shall have to make up our minds whether we are going to cooperate with other nations in taking part in organizations of this kind, in the hope that through collective action we may preserve peace, or whether we are going to hide our heads in the sand in the hope that when the avalanche comes it will be outside our own particular area.

[Mr. Zaplitny.]

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): I shall not take more than just a few minutes of the time of the house. I really want to register my objection to certain phases of the agreement now before us.

Let me say at the outset that I am in hearty agreement with every move which will bring the nations together in cooperation to do anything which is necessary to be done for human good. I agree that a great deal may be accomplished by cooperation in the way of extending education, good will, science and so forth. To that extent I am in favour of the proposal now before us. But I think it is unfortunate that such good objectives should have been postulated on what is to me an absurdity and an error, an error biologically, historically, scientifically or in any way you wish to take it. And that error is the one upon which most hon. members who have supported this agreement have pinned their faith, namely, that since wars begin in the minds of men it is in the minds of men that the defence of peace must be constructed. I say that that is simply a false philosophy; it is an assertion for the truth of which there is no evidence in history or in science. Apparently it is only because we can swallow that error that this parliament and this nation and others can proceed with policies which are fast developing the next war, while we indulge in verbal effusions of this kind about trying to prevent it.

So long as struggle is the means by which men and nations exist, nations will fight. The human family had been fighting for millions of years before it had any mind at all—some of them have not very much yet—and to assume that it was their minds which made them fight is nothing but an absurdity. I think it is just hypocritical for us to hold to lofty verbal peace objectives, as we are doing here if we subscribe to this agreement, while we have already committed this nation to the conflict method of existence. To-day this nation stands for free private enterprise, which is the conflict system, the tooth and claw method, the struggle for existence, the mere animalism and junglism of history.

Mr. MUTCH: Get out of the jungle.

Mr. IRVINE: My hon. friend has not got out of it yet. We have committed ourselves to that. That is what this nation stands for, and if every other nation stands for it there is going to be conflict. I do not care what kind of minds people have, nor do I care what is in them, if there is a scarcity of anything in any nation in a world of conflict, where only by conflict they can exist, then war will most certainly come. Therefore the very basis of any hope of the future peace of the world must be in so arranging the essentials of our human life on a cooperative basis that man will be able to live without killing somebody else in order to do it. No amount of education, whatever that education may be, will remove the facts. You may educate this nation, if that be possible, to believe that the stars began in the human mind, that the moon is merely the creation of the human mind, and then say if you could abolish that idea in the human mind you would abolish the moon and the stars; but you will not. It may be possible to induce the human mind to think it is just man's mind that wants to fight and make war. No doubt the desire to fight can be stimulated by education when the cause for war is already operating, but if the real cause is not there, then man will not fight.

The only alternative to a conflict economy is a cooperative economy, and that is the thing which is lacking. It has been deplored that Russia has not joined this organization. There is enough nonsense in the first sentence to prevent Russia from joining, and it should prevent us from joining if it was taken seriously, which I hope we shall not do.

If we are to further education and science in the international field, we must do more than merely pass resolutions. I have already pointed out what is to me a hypocritical position when we further an economy which makes war inevitable and pass or endorse agreements which stand for the abolition of it. Education, scientific research and so forth have values, great values and they, as I said at the outset, may be furthered by international action. To the extent that they may be furthered I am for this agreement. But there is no use in passing this even for that purpose unless the government will commit itself to carry out its share of the bargain. That means it has to set up the machinery necessary to further education and science on the international plane. So far as I can recall, in his remarks the minister did not commit the government to the immediate carrying out of articles 4 and 8 of the agreement, for instance, as we have them here. Unless that is done, nothing will be done. Article 4 provides:

> The general conference shall consist of the representatives of the states members of the organization. The government of each member state shall appoint not more than five delegates, who shall be selected after consultation with the national commission, if established, or with educational, scientific, and cultural bodies.

I should like to press the minister to give this parliament the assurance that on the endorsation of this document the government will take the necessary steps immediately to fulfil its obligations as contained in article 4, and carry them out according to articles 7 and 8.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I was very much interested in the references to the preamble of the constitution, by the last two speakers in particular, who took some exception to it. They devoted considerable time—and perhaps they are right—in, an endeavour to refute the argument that "since wars begin in the minds of men, it is in the minds of men that the defences of peace must be constructed". I was a little surprised to find that some of the arguments against the inclusion of that language, to which I think one hon. gentleman referred as nonsense, came from a speech of the socialist Prime Minister of Great Britain, who in the course of his remarks at the plenary session of the united nations educational, scientific and cultural organization used exactly those words: "Wars begin in the minds of men." Apparently the influence of the Prime Minister of Great Britain was felt so strongly at the meeting which finally drew up the constitution that those words were placed in the very beginning of the preamble to which hon. gentlemen to my left have taken exception. I am not in a position particularly to discuss that aspect of it, but I thought perhaps this should be put on the record to show there are divergent views with respect to the matter.

I want to point out just one or two things in connection with the constitution that is before us, and one thing that strikes me as being perhaps the weak link in the whole UNESCO structure. That is the fact that three very important and powerful members of the united nations not only did not participate in the final signing of the constitution, as hon. gentlemen on both sides of the house have pointed out, but as far as my information goes did not even accept the invitation to attend the meetings of the united nations conference for the establishment of an educational, scientific and cultural organization. Those three nations are the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the Ukraine and Byelo-Russia.

Whatever may be said with respect to the necessity for organizations of this kind, I do not rise this afternoon for the purpose of throwing cold water upon any plan which in the final analysis may make some contribution to world peace and international security. I take the view that as a Canadian parliament we cannot put ourselves in the position of placing obstacles in the way of better international understanding. It may be that many of these organizations have their weaknesses. I believe they have, and I think that is so right fom the top international organization down to and including some of its lesser component parts. Nevertheless we have to consider international problems from a much wider viewpoint. I have always felt, and I think it is the opinion of this house, that San Francisco, the general assembly, the security council, the economic and social council and the other organizations connected with UNO at least go this far; at least they provide a table under which the nations of the world may put their fact and talk things over instead of shouldering rifles and going to war to fight it out. Surely that is a factor we must not overlook in deciding whether to play our part in the various organizations set up for the purpose of achieving the objective of international peace and security. While this organization itself has obvious weaknesses, nevertheless I think we can still say it is a step in the right direction, even if it is but a halting step; and we must take that halting step in the interests of world peace.

One of the problems the nations of the world face to-day is that of seeing that the major powers, particularly, find some basis for collaboration. It is not enough to bring together dozens of little powers throughout the world and have them collaborate. They all have their rights, and no one would be more anxious to champion those rights than I. But when one appreciates that something over eighty-five per cent of the war potential of the world, the power to wage war, rests in the hands of three nations, then I think one gets the picture in proper perspective and sees what we have to do in order to achieve a system of world security for the days that lie ahead. The weakness of this organization will be admitted, I am sure, even by those who are its greatest proponents and advocates. When one of those three great powers is out of the organization, together with two republics which are within its geographical boundary, we start this race with only one leg, and we have something less than a proper launching of an organization of the kind. I think the weakness of the old league of nations arose from a similar situation, because one of the great powers was unable to see its way clear to play the full part it normally would play in any great association of powers. But in any of these organizations where one of the major powers decides to stay out, and not only does not sign but does not attend and does not subscribe to the purposes and objectives of the organization, it will be seen at once where the weakness of such organizations must lie.

One of the great means of education in the world to-day is the press. Whatever weaknesses some people may think it has, let me say that without a free press throughout the world it is difficult to have democracy functioning as it should. If we were to take the free press from Canada, inside of six months we would not have an effective democratic system functioning. Those avenues for the dissemination of information, the press and the radio, and other means of communication, are the means of keeping together the thoughts of the people of our nation, and of correlating their efforts with those who sit in parliaments or on other representative bodies. I think there is little use at the moment in holding out more than the laudable objective of world government. I am one who hopes it may come. But I believe the basis of it must be laid on the foundation of a free and untrammelled press and radio throughout the world. These are the important components in the success of any kind of government; surely we cannot afford to ignore them in the formation of a world government.

In UNESCO we find a move to correlate, even to form a clearing house for and to advance and promote where we can, the educational, scientific and cultural talents of various nations. It is an effort to make a world in which we can live as good neighbours, and a medium through which we can impart to our neighbours any influence we may have or contribution we can make in these fields, while at the same time receiving from them the advantage of types of education and other knowledge more familiar to them.

The weakness of the organization in my view—and I am sure the minister will be the first to agree with me—is that for some reason, whatever it may be, a great and major power in the world has seen fit not to endorse the principle of or to participate in the UNESCO organization.

In our approach to international problems I believe our people ought to understand that we should not place these new organizations and new movements on a pedestal so high that, once these agreements are on paper, the people may think that peace has been achieved once and for all. The objectives of peace are not achieved simply by what is written on paper. The answer to this is found in what the great powers will do in relation to this subject. The answer to peace or war depends largely, if not altogether, not necessarily upon the education of the world at large, but rather upon the ability and capacity and willingness —this last being the most important—of the three major powers to get along together in peace and harmony in the days which lie ahead. That, in a nutshell, is the problem of world peace. It seems to me we can put it boldly and concisely by saying that if the big powers stick together we shall have peace and, conversely, if they do not, anything may happen.

This is why I have risen this afternoon to say a word about this organization which does not embrace all of the three powers to which I have referred. I support the position taken by the government in asking parliament to accept the constitution. I believe it is a step in the right direction, but at the same time I am pointing out the definite weaknesses inherent in that constitution.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended saying anything, but I am moved to do so from what I have heard in the last half-hour I have been in the house.

This resolution deals with the establishment of an educational, scientific and cultural organization. I ask myself this question: to what example of the past are we to look for future educational, scientific and cultural standards? Are we to take the so-called education which in fact has been pure propaganda not only in this country but in Great Britain and the United States? Is the propaganda which has poured from the United States in the last several years to be the basis of the world's cultural education?

Who is to say what the world is to be taught? In this connection I would refer to a man whose name has been mentioned recently in the house. I refer to Doctor Chisholm, who has publicly denied the existence of right and wrong, who has openly sneered at Christianity and particularly at our Christmas. Having done that he is considered a great man and has been given one of the leading positions in a world organization. I wonder if he had sneered at a religious festival such as the Passover whether he would have been given that world job. I rather think not. There would have been no reward for him then. Evidently, however, he knew that a passport to one of these world jobs is to sneer at Christianity. That seems to be the fashion these days, and if one does not do it one is either a fascist or anti-Semitic.

In the matter of bringing peace through the united nations, only yesterday I referred to the treatment of Argentina at San Francisco. Was that the way to promote peace in the world? I was glad to hear the Speaker read out a message of felicitation from the Argentine parliament a few minutes after I made that protest, and we replied to it in like manner.

Then there is Spain. The very people who are behind all this international stuff are those who are demanding another civil war in Spain. For what purpose? To tear down one dictator in order to set up another. There is no suggestion that the Spanish people should be allowed to choose their own government. The whole agitation behind this promotion of another war in Spain is communistic, and nothing else.

Who are these people who presume to teach the world what its moral and cultural behaviour in the future should be? What is their record? What have they ever said or done to justify our putting trust in them for the future cultural progress of the world? Who are these self-styled educationalists? I have in my hand a copy of the report of the committee of congress on un-American activities, issued by the United States government printing office, Washington, in 1946. Let me give the house a sample of this cultural education. I should like to quote from a document which was issued by the war department of the United States during the war for the education of the armed forces. The report reads:

> Some elements in the war department erred seriously when they tried to force down the throats of American soldiers Army Talk—Orientation Fact Sheet No. 64, War Department, Washington, D.C., March 24, 1945, "Restricted." This document was circulated to instructors and was not intended for direct reading by the enlisted men.

I shall not read all of it, but I want to make a few points. It continues:

> There is a long discussion concerning the question, "How can we identify native American fascists at work." To summarize this discussion it is sufficient to say that the war department sought to teach that any person who claimed to be any one or all of the following was a fascist, or was likely to become a fascist very shortly: "100 per cent American, anti-Jew, anti-negro, anti-labour, anti-foreign born, anti-Catholic."

Then it goes on to say:

> One of the most astonishing themes in this eight-page document of Red poison is the suggestion that any native-born person who claims to be 100 per cent American is either a fascist or is likely to become one very shortly. In the entire discussion, occupying eight closely printed pages, there is not one word against communism or Soviet military dictatorship. On the contrary, the last two pages are filled with material designed to transmit propaganda favourable to communism and military dictatorship.

This so-called indoctrination course was, and will remain as, one of the dirtiest blots on the history of the war department. We cannot overlook the fact that certain persons of authority, and even at the very top, knew that such an educational programme was in progress, and very little was done to correct the situation.

Is that the sort of teaching that is considered suitable for the cultural advancement of the world? So far as I have been able to learn, all these internationalists are totalitarians at heart, and it is they who are behind this concentration of the control of health, education and everything else.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Hear, hear!

Mr. JAQUES: "Hear, hear", says somebody. Who is that internationalist? I have a pretty good idea. Who does the hon. member think constitutes this international authority? We are not in Moscow or Jerusalem. I would advise the hon. member that Jerusalem would be a good place for him to go. In my opinion all this centralization of control, first of all in the dominion and then in the world, is the greatest threat that the world faces to-day. We did not fight the war to bring about a world dictatorship or a world government. As I understood it, we fought the war to destroy the man who had that very idea. If that is what we wanted to do then I cannot see why we wasted all the blood and treasure we did in putting down one dictatorship only to set up another.

I know very well that anything I say will not stop the government. As I said the other day, there is no question about the working partnership between the C.C.F. group and the Liberal party and also with the communist party and the Labour Progressive party. They are all going the same way. All the experts of the Liberal government were trained in the socialist London school of economics.

I cannot endorse this idea at all. Not that it will have much effect, but it will give me some satisfaction to register the strongest possible objection to this and all such schemes. If every country would mind its own business then there would be some hope of peace in the world. People say that war is born in the minds of the people; if so, it is born in the minds of those who preach that there is no such thing as right or wrong. I do not know what is going to come out of these schemes but more evil, leading to more bloodshed and more war.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Jaques.]

FLOUR

SHIPMENTS TO ECUADOR—QUESTION OF RESTRICTIONS ON EXPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yesterday the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) asked me a question with regard to the export of flour from Lethbridge, Alberta, to Ecuador, and I told him I would give him an answer later.

Canada has a number of flour markets which she has traditionally served. Ecuador is one. In 1935 we shipped 12,773 barrels; in 1936, 17,511 barrels, and in 1937, 10,431 barrels. In keeping with the general policy of sending as much foodstuffs as possible to the United Kingdom, UNRRA, and the distressed areas, shipments to other markets have been drastically reduced. Thus, in 1945 we shipped only 5,597 barrels to Ecuador and shipments so far this year have been at approximately the same rate. The aggregate of shipments to South and Central America is insignificant in relation to the total wheat and flour production; but distribution to a few old customers and some new ones, it is hoped, will make possible the holding of existing markets and gaining a small foothold in some new ones that will be of inestimable value to the whole of Canada in the future. Furthermore, if we were to stop shipments altogether, the people of Ecuador would simply be driven to other sources of supply—it would not increase the world supply—and Canada would simply be taking on a larger share of relief shipments, while other countries took the commercial business that has future prospects.

Personally I welcome the information that Alberta mills are getting into this new export field.

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN DOMESTIC QUOTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance. Since shipping space for flour is very much limited at the present time and the future not too bright, and since this year's wheat harvest is now moving and the flour mills in Canada are operating at full capacity, will the government consider increasing the present domestic flour quota so that Canadian bakers can take care of the present bread shortage and the flour mills be kept going to normal capacity?

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): The present quota on flour restricts only the sale of flour for domestic consumption. It does not curtail the millers' production and sale of flour. There is a demand abroad for all the flour that Canadian mills can possibly produce. I will bring my hon. friend's question to the attention of the minister. To carry out his suggestion would involve a change in government policy. I am sure that the people in Canada would regret any action taken that would restore to last year's consumption the ten per cent by which it was reduced some time ago, particularly in these days when Great Britain has had to ration still further bread in that country.

Mr. FRASER: The reason I asked the question was that there is not sufficient shipping space available at the present time and the flour mills have had their shipping permits cancelled.

RURAL MAIL

INQUIRY AS TO SITUATION WITH RESPECT TO WAR BONUS TO CARRIERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. WHITE (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. In view of notices being forwarded to rural mail carriers in Middlesex county that the wartime bonus will be discontinued on February 15, 1947, will the minister inform the house of the position of these and other carriers with respect to bonus? Second, will this action not result, in the final analysis, in higher costs to the Post Office Department? We all realize that the rural mail carriers are underpaid.

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was good enough to send me notice of his question. Of course everybody knows that the war bonus can last only so long as there is a law giving us authority to pay it. The war bonus was supposed to terminate on December 31 next. I think it is well understood that if as and when the emergency bill is passed the government will pay the bonus for sixty days only after the commencement of the next session. We have asked our officials to cancel these notices because we want to continue the war bonus until the end of the sixty days after the commencement of the next session. In the meantime we are trying to find a way to correct the situation and renew these contracts so that the carriers will receive what they are now receiving, including the bonus.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of bill No. 346, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures made and capital indebtedness incurred by the Canadian National Railways system during the calendar year 1946, and to authorized the guarantee by His Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. JACKMAN: One of the items included in this budget of the Canadian National Railways is $7,000,000 for the acquisition of the railway under lease at the present time to the Canadian National Railways in Manitoba. While it might appear on the surface that there is a net gain to the Canadian National Railways and, therefore, to the government in taking over that railway, I should like to ask the minister about a certain aspect of it.

It appears that the annual rental of this property is $300,000 and that the lease continues for the unexpired portion of 999 years. If this deal is made by the payment of $7,000,000 to the lessor company there would be an outlay at three per cent, which would be a fair rate, of $210,000, making an apparent saving of $90,000 per annum to the Canadian National railway system. But may I suggest to the minister that if the lessor railway which receives the $300,000 from the Canadian National Railways is subject to tax at the ordinary corporation rate of forty per cent, the tax would be $120,000, and while the Canadian National Railways would not get that money, the government would, which for the purposes of the argument is the same thing. That would mean a net out-of-pocket expense to the people of Canada of $300,000, less $120,000, or $180,000, which would be considerably less than the $210,000, which represents the service charge at three per cent on the proposed cost or outlay of $7,000,000. Would the minister be good enough to answer that question? May I also say at the same time that the leader of the C.C.F. party, who is not very well versed in financial matters, judging from—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is only a matter of opinion.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am very glad to have the hon. member suggest that it is a matter of opinion, because I think the facts which I shall put before the committee will clarify the statement I made. As I suggested, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is not very well versed in some of these matters. He suggested that payment of rental for a property over a period of 999 years would amount to some $85 or $86 million, and that this very nearly insulted the intelligence of parliament. I was not so much surprised at that, but I was a little surprised and shocked when I heard the Minister of Transport corroborate those remarks and say it was quite true that the capitalization of these rental payments over the long unexpired period of the lease, to quote his words, "almost insults the intelligence of parliament." If he feels that money is barren and, therefore, cannot breed, which was the theory held by some economists five or six centuries ago, I would suggest to him that something should be done, or why is he not doing something, about the perpetual bonds which still exist on the Canadian National system? I would direct his attention to page 21 of the annual report of the Canadian National Railways, where the funded debt is set out in detail, and we find that some $8·3 million of securities of the system are guaranteed by the dominion government and are perpetual. Then on page 22 there is another $5·7 million of funded debt of the system which has no maturity and is perpetual. If the theory of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and of the minister, who concurs in it so readily, is true, that it is a colossal mistake to pay an annual service charge rather than to pay an out-of-pocket expense, the interest charges on which, I may say, will have to be met annually until the principal is repaid, how does he justify the continuance of these perpetual securities on the Canadian National system?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am sorry that the hon. member for Rosedale was not in the house when the bill having to do with the purchase of the Manitoba railway was discussed, because if he had been here he could then have given us the benefit of his remarks and, perhaps, have had it out with the leader of the C.C.F. party. The acquisition of the Manitoba railway by the Canadian National railways is, I submit to the committee, as I did before, an excellent thing from the financial point of view. The hon. member who has just spoken is a member also of the committee on railways and shipping. He therefore had an opportunity of examining the president of the Canadian National Railways on this very subject. He has, as is his right, the opportunity now of asking questions on it. One has only to go back to the discussion which took place when the bill was being considered to realize that there is a saving not only to the Canadian National Railways but to this country of $90,000 by the acquisition of that road. I think the only matter which seems to have bothered the hon. gentleman, both in committee and here, is the question of taxation, as to whether the country would stand to lose from the fact that this revenue of $300,000 a year by way of rental was taxable to the federal government. I told the hon. gentleman in committee that I would obtain from the Minister of National Revenue a statement on it. When the bill with reference to the purchase of the Manitoba railway was discussed in committee I had the statement. I have not it now before me, but the gist of it is that there is no loss to the Department of National Revenue and to the country from the point of view of taxation. The reasons given were outlined in that letter, and I would be glad to show it to the hon. gentleman at any time he cares to see it.

The hon. member refers to the question of perpetual bonds as it is set out on page 21 of the annual report of the Canadian National Railways, and asks why it is that the minister does not do something about it. All I can tell him is this, that the bonds are perpetual and secured, and he, being a financier of great experience, will realize, I am sure, that there is not a great deal that the house or the minister can do about that.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am not asking the minister why he does not do something about it from the point of view of bettering the position of the railway or the country. But I find at page 2818 of Hansard where the minister said as follows:

> The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar raised a pertinent point when he said that this almost insults the intelligence of parliament.

Namely, paying out an annual rental which, if you multiply it over the period of 999 years, amounts to a colossal sum.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. It is not in order to refer to what took place in a previous debate this session.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am through referring to it, sir, and I only did so to be accurate in my statement; I would not care to misquote the minister. If the country is very much worse off because a lease is for 999 years and it must pay the annual rental, how much worse off must the country be if there is no maturity whatever, if it is ad infinitum as being an uncallable security of the kind I have mentioned? I am merely pointing this out as a fallacy in the argument of the leader of the C.C.F. which was endorsed by the minister himself.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have to interrupt the hon. gentleman on that point. As the chairman says, this is not in order, but the hon. member has placed a statement on record, and I am sure I cannot allow him to put into my mouth words which were not stated or at least are not in point having regard to the context. The discussion at the time which was had between myself and the leader of the C.C.F. party had to do with the improvidence of 999 year leases; and I repeat now what I said then, that leases of that kind are improvident to a degree, and that I do not think leases for 999 years would be entered into to-day. I was asked the question whether I had drawn any myself or whether, again, it had been the practice of lawyers to enter into them on behalf of clients, and I said that I knew of some but that there were none that I had drawn up. That discussion had to do with the agreements and not with the financial aspect of the bill that was under consideration.

Mr. JACKMAN: All I am suggesting—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I hope the hon. member will not refer to speeches which have already been made in this house. It is entirely out of order. It only repeats what has taken place before, and prevents progress being made.

Mr. JACKMAN: Mr. Chairman, the opinion expressed by the minister then was that it was improvident to make a lease for 999 years. What I am suggesting is that in the capital structure of the Canadian National Railway system, for which we are now appropriating money, it is a fact that the system is losing money, which is tantamount to property, not for 999 years but in perpetuity. If there were arguments against leasing for the lesser period, surely there are equally strong, if not stronger, arguments against leasing without any maturity whatsoever.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is agreed.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If my hon. friend will look at page 21 of the annual report he will see that the debentures to which he refers were issued in 1858, 1876 and 1883. Certainly they are not for 999 years.

Mr. JACKMAN: I cannot allow the minister to refute my argument as unsound. I do not care when these perpetuals were issued; they are issued in perpetuity; but if the minister believes that his argument or the argument of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is sound, then he can buy in these perpetuals because people are quite willing to sell them at a fairly reasonable premium over the par value. I am suggesting that the argument put forward is unsound, and I contend that it is unsound.

Mr. CHURCH: As a real public ownership man the bill is a surprise to me in some ways. The Canadian National railway organization represents a consolidation of a number of systems, subsidiaries and other agencies on land, on the sea and in the air, and the hotel system. Many other subsidiaries were consolidated. In reality the system was not a real public ownership organization. It was founded on the mistakes made all over the country by private ownership in a financial way and the road was taken over by the government. There was a survey made and a report on railways brought forward in 1917 by the Drayton-Acworth report—regarding a method of financing the system, and as to guarantees which have become fabulous and a heavy drain on the country in the way of federal subsidies. The survey was made in 1917, and the Drayton-Acworth report issued on over capitalization of 40,000 miles of single track roads of this system and also 42,000 miles of single track roads of the other efficient privately owned system. The heavy overcapitalization laid a severe debt for the Canadian National on this country. Then the former separate Canadian National parts came to the provinces with this method of financing of capital and asked for guarantees from the provinces. Sections 1 and 2 should be taken together since they are both the same thing.

I wish to point out that some of these old securities go back to 1931. The marginal notes and headlines are part of the bill. You have to read the marginal notes as well as the headlines and sections of the bill. The second section of the bill refers to $7,000,000 for acquisition of the Manitoba railway. That road is as old as the hills. Then there is a section which gives the Minister of Finance power to make temporary loans, such as notes, bonds, loans, debentures, for capital expenditures, in regard to current indebtedness. In my opinion, such finance has been attacked severely in the report to which I refer. The present company has done well during the war. It gave good service, but the employees are not treated in the way that they should be. You and I, Mr. Chairman, travel on the system, and we know that some of these old, reliable employees have to work sixteen, seventeen and eighteen hours a day, moving from Halifax the forces returning home from Europe. They should receive a bonus or some allowance for war work. It is not ownership such as the provincial hydro and the municipal hydro systems which treat their employees in a fair way for overtime and give them better labour conditions, such as train crews should have in demobilization.

This bill should have been considered by the select committee on railway and shipping or by some other committee on finances. It is a legal bill as well. Bill No. 346 consolidates the method of financing and it refers to $22,000,000. This amount should have been paid out of earnings. In a system like this, some provision should be made for paying out of earnings a lot of this for operating renewals on terminals, equipment, overhauling of cars and things of that kind, of a temporary and permanent nature not suitable for capital charges. That might have been provided out of earnings. The trouble with the system is that we have a lot of directors who do not direct, and some of them have no knowledge of railways or their operation. They are selected as directors for geographical and political reasons and not for public ownership reasons. There is no public ownership man I know of, connected with the road. I have supported this principle for many, many years. First of all, they moved their offices to Montreal. Ontario was the public ownership province. That is where the consolidated road made most of its earnings. We have very little to say in it at all. Then there is an additional amount asked for additions and betterments, retirement of maturing capital obligations and so forth. There is an item of $8,000,000 for new equipment. Very little of that comes to Canada. The United States affiliations are getting it, or most of it. A curious thing is that the United States affiliations and subsidiaries of this system are phenomenal for new equipment and betterments; they are almost equal to the system in the empire state express trains. During the war they did not get much out of the old chair system of better cars by day, all reserved for a small charge. You could travel on the American railway system thus during the war. If so, in Canada, you could have travelled on the three or four o'clock train for Montreal or Ottawa where they used to run chair cars, but they did not have any in war time, with the result that the trains were crowded.

There are many other matters that I should like to discuss, but I have just about finished. In my opinion the method of financing is all wrong. More should be paid for out of income. The auditor general, and not just a private auditor, should have some control over the system. I have no doubt that better work would be thus done by the auditor general. All kinds of commissions are appointed, but during the session we have no control over them. Then, references are made to the committee and nobody can ask any questions about it. In the dying days of parliament we get this bill or a report of a committee on this great national system on which this country has spent hundreds of millions of dollars, on land and sea, in the air, and the hotel system at large, and we have no control over it. In my opinion we need a revision of our rules. I have read the reports of the railways and shipping committee. They smoke good cigars there, no doubt, and ask many questions, but it is no proper review of such a vast enterprise. The very first thing is a proper examination of the budget of hundreds of millions of dollars of this system and all its branches. No department or business would think of doing business with only a cursory examination by a select committee. I compliment the young minister because he has shown a great deal of zeal, and courtesy to private members and others, and he is always willing to answer letters or questions and give any information he can; but I wish to point out to him that Ontario, where they are making most of the revenue, is not getting its fair share of the betterments, equipment and the other matters regarding refinancing. Section 2 refers to $17,500,000 available from reserves for depreciation and debt discount amortization. Then there is $7,000,000 for the acquisition of the Manitoba railway. You will find, refunding bonds on a dollar parity, will cause trouble, and you will experience a lot of difficulty in that connection. This is not a very good time to go into the United States market. I believe if we had some other system of financing and more betterments out of revenue the people would get better value for their money. I travel on the trains and I tell the committee that the rolling stock and equipment in Ontario could be improved.

We want a real public ownership system for that public ownership province. I believe that the minister has been giving public ownership a fair trial since he has been in the department. I do say that more money should be paid out of earnings for all these minor repairs and maintenance charges. A lot of it could be paid out of earnings instead of its being charged up to capital, making vast refunding necessary.

Mr. FULTON: Yesterday afternoon I asked the minister certain questions and he said the answers were all to be found in the annual report of last year's operation. I did not have the annual report before me at the time, although I could not recall seeing the answers in it. I have since obtained a copy, and I find that all the answers are not contained in the annual report, particularly the answer as to how much the Canadian National Railways have paid into the consolidated revenue fund during the war years by way of surplus. That information is probably not avaliable at the moment, because it goes back over several years, but I should appreciate an answer to that question.

The reason I ask it is this. Yesterday I made the general suggestion that it seemed to me that, instead of being used to write down deficits piled up in previous years from interest on bond issues, these surpluses should be used to redeem the bond issues, so that the capital indebtedness of the company could be reduced and it might have a better chance of showing a profit. On page 8 of the report for last year it is stated as a general proposition, under the heading of finance, that during the year the funded debt was reduced by $56,273,-908. Then, if you look for the details under the heading of "funded debt retirements", you find that two issues, one for $20,500,000 and one for $30,000,000, were retired. If you look down under "new government loans", however, you find that the company had to borrow $51,000,000 from the government to retire these issues, so that in effect the indebtedness of the railway has not been reduced at all by that transaction. Further, they go on to point out that there was a net reduction in funded debt of just over $27,000,000. I have been trying to find out where that money came from, because if you look at the first page of the consolidated income account for 1945 it would appear that the surplus available was $24,000,000. I should have thought that surplus would be used to pay off some of the bonds, but I see they say there has been a net reduction in the funded debt of $27,000,000. Admittedly I am not an expert, and unfortunately I am not a member of the railway committee, so that I would appreciate it if someone would show me how to find my way around this statement. I should like also to be told what happens to the surpluses which are paid into the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. MAYHEW: The hon. member for Kamloops asked three questions yesterday, to which the minister replied that the answers could be found in the annual report of the Canadian National Railways. The first question was as to the amount of bonds owned by the public and the amount owned by the government.

Mr. FULTON: That is in here; I found it.

Mr. MAYHEW: I shall give it to the committee anyway. The amount owned by the public is $573,179,988, and the amount owned by the government is $674,201,603. The surplus earned by the railway from 1941 to 1945 inclusive was $112,000,000, and that surplus was used for the reduction of government loans.

WAR CRIMES

REENACTMENT OF REGULATIONS MADE BY ORDER IN COUNCIL

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister) moved the second reading of bill No. 309, respecting war crimes.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I am not familiar with the discussion that took place previously with respect to this bill, nor am I aware whether any detailed explanation has been given as to its purposes, objects and so on. At this stage, however, perhaps the minister might give a comprehensive review of the circumstances that led up to the necessity of having this measure brought in, and also what the measure proposes to do.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This matter was fully gone into by the committee on external affairs. The statement made there, which I shall briefly repeat here, was along the following lines.

It was felt that His Excellency the Governor General, as commander in chief of the Canadian armies, has the right to take such measures for the conduct of war, when Canada is engaged in war, as the circumstances may require. It was also felt that it was part of his rights and responsibilities to delegate his powers as commander in chief to persons selected by him on the advice of his ministers; and that the commander of the Canadian army would have the right to take such measures as might be proper to deal with those who rendered themselves guilty of breaches of the usages of war. Persons had been apprehended who were charged with having committed war crimes against members of the Canadian forces, and the question arose as to how they would be dealt with.

A similar question arose in the United Kingdom. There, by royal warrant under the sign manual of the sovereign, a war crimes court was set up to deal with offenders against members of the forces of the United Kingdom. This royal warrant seems to have been issued by His Majesty on the advice of one of his ministers. When the question arose here, the practice of royal warrants never having been adopted in this country, an order in council was passed to set up an authority to deal with those who had been apprehended and charged with offences contrary to the usages of war, committed against personnel belonging to the Canadian forces; and the order in council determined, much along the lines of the regulations approved by the royal warrant, the procedure to be followed.

In drafting the order in council reference was made to the War Measures Act. Shortly after it had been passed, a question was submitted to the Department of Justice for opinion, as to whether regulations made by this order in council were sufficient to enable penalties exceeding five years' imprisonment to be imposed. The officials of the Department of Justice went into the matter carefully and came to the conclusion that it was quite unnecessary and a surplusage to have had a reference to the War Measures Act in the order in council, and that even it would have been preferable, if it were mentioned at all, to mention it only as one of the statutory sources from which authority to make the regulations was derived; and that without any reference to the War Measures Act the regulations could be properly made by the governor general on the advice, perhaps of even only one minister, but certainly on the advice of council.

There have been imposed sentences exceeding five years, and one of those sentences is being served now in a Canadian penitentiary by a German officer who had been apprehended, tried and convicted. There appeared, moreover, that there might be occasion to use these regulations beyond the time when the War Measures Act would operate. For that reason, and also to remove any possibility of doubt as to the validity, and continuing validity, of the sentences imposed, it was felt that it would be advisable to have the regulations which were made under the order in council reenacted by parliament. This bill is for the purpose of reenacting those regulations, although not necessarily as permanent legislation because, in spite of the gloomy picture international affairs sometimes present, it is not the policy of the government at this time to envisage the necessity of maintaining legislation of this kind as permanent legislation.

It was, however, felt that it would be difficult to assign any specific date when it would be proper for the regulations to come to an end. So that the bill was drawn with the proviso that, if passed, it would continue in force until a day fixed by proclamation of the governor in council, and that from and after that date it would be deemed to be repealed. The reason for using the language "be deemed to be repealed" is that that brings into play the Interpretation Act, which provides that whenever a statute is repealed, whatever has been done under it, if properly done, remains valid as a proper application of the act while it was in force.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I consider this bill one of unusual importance in that for the first time, so far as the parliament of Canada is concerned, it is actually giving to a court the power to take judicial notice of the laws and usages of war, which provisions are incorporated in section 10 (6).

While the minister says this is to be only a temporary measure, having regard to the inclusion of the principles and usages of war this measure is a really important step on the part of Canada in the evolution and development of international law, and the recognition by parliament of international law.

The circumstances under which this matter was first brought up were these: Someone drafted the war crimes regulations. Certainly no one in the Department of Justice did it. They made specific reference to the fact that the power being exercised by the governor in council was on the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, concurred in by the Minister of Justice and the Minister of National Defence, and under the authority of the War Measures Act.

In other words, while now the minister takes the view that these regulations were drafted as part and parcel of international law, or under the powers of His Majesty under royal warrant, the regulations provided that they were drafted entirely under the War Measures Act with the result—at least so I contended—that in view of the fact that penalties under the War Measures Act were restricted to five years or a fine of $2,000, no statute could grant to a subsidiary measure by way of order in council passed thereunder the power to impose a heavier penalty. Among others, Kurt Meyer, a prisoner in Dorchester penitentiary, might have made an application to the courts for the purpose of determining that his imprisonment was illegal and, as a result, the doors of that penitentiary might have been opened, should the court find that an illegal sentence, beyond that provided for under the War Measures Act, had been imposed.

While the minister has said there was an opinion from the Department of Justice that such a possibility was not a probability. I would point out that in giving evidence on the matter before the committee on external affairs the deputy minister of justice said he had no doubt that a forceful argument could be made in support of the contention that I advanced to the contrary.

I think this is an important measure for two reasons: First, it will close the doors to the possibility of any war criminal, and Kurt Meyer in particular, being able to raise a defence now or hereafter that an illegal sentence has been imposed upon him; and, secondly, it represents I believe the first time a parliament in any country has taken upon itself the power to impose a penalty for the commission of an offence beyond the confines and territorial jurisdiction of that country. It is a new and unusual step, and one which I believe will be adopted generally in the enforecemnt of international law in years to come by other countries. In my opinion one of the reasons for the developments that led to the second war was the fact that those who committed aggression crimes and offences against the laws and usages of war during the first world war remained unpunished. In some quarters objection is being taken to the fact that war criminals were being proceeded against, this objection being based upon the ground that international law is not written law and that, that law not having been formally established, procedure against war criminals is in the nature of revenge. In order to keep the record clear in that regard, I should like to point out that on August 21, 1942, President Roosevelt, on behalf of the government of the United States, advised the enemy countries at that time that any military commanders or other leaders who committed criminal offences would be subject to punishment. His statement was approved on September 8, 1942, by Mr. Churchill on behalf of the British government when he said.

> I wish most particularly to identify the British government and the House of Commons with the solemn words which have been lately used by the President of the United States, namely, that those who are guilty of the nazi crimes will have to stand up before tribunals in every land where their atrocities have been committed in order that an indelible warning may be given to future ages and that successive generations of men may say, "So perish all who do the like again."

In this bill this house is taking a definite step forward in the development of international law which must be based upon international conscience, and founded upon the epitome of the idealism of all the peoples of the world possessed of an aroused conscience and appreciation of justice. The war trials do in the international field what has been accepted in the national field for many generations and assure that crimes committed by the great or their lieutenants in international wrongdoing shall be subject to punishment by the conscience and collective national will of states that have been offended against.

Usually I am opposed to retroactive legislation. However, I am sure that members on all sides of the house will accept this measure which ratifies what has been done and which assures that international wrongdoing shall not go unpunished. This measure maintains the rule of law in the international sphere. It assures that henceforth, as far as Canada is concerned, we inform the world that wrongdoing internationally will be subject to punishment when the nationals of this country are mistreated or are interfered with in their rights under international law.

The opening address of Mr. Justice Jackson of the United States in the case against the nazi war criminals may be of interest in this connection. He summarized the purpose of this bill in so far as the Canadian parliament is concerned when he used these words:

> Civilization asks whether law is so laggard as to be utterly helpless to deal with crimes of this magnitude by criminals of this order of importance. It does not expect that you can make war impossible. It does expect that your juridical action will put the forces of international law, its precepts, its prohibitions and, most of all, its sanctions, on the side of peace, so that men and women of good will in all countries may have "leave to live by no man's leave, underneath the law."

In introducing this measure, the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) has done much to assure that Canada will give not only lip adherence to the principles of international law but that this parliament is prepared by its passage to announce to the nations all over the world that Canada accepts the great principles of international law, founded on justice, on conscience and on the abiding principles that activate man in his national relationships in civil life.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, read the third time and passed.

FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION

PROVISION FOR ADDITIONAL COMMISSIONERS, TRANSFER OF CERTAIN JURISDICTION, AND GRANTING OF MONEY

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Federal District Commission Act, 1927, to provide for the appointment of fifteen commissioners (in lieu of ten), also for the transfer to the president of the privy council of certain jurisdiction over the commission and to provide further for the granting of moneys, by the payment of grants or otherwise, for the purposes of the commission.

Mr. FULTON: Is it the intention of the minister to make a statement and, if so, would he prefer to make it now or when we are in committee?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would prefer to make it in committee so that there will be an opportunity to ask questions.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: As hon. members are aware, the government has taken action to have plans begun for the development of the national capital area as a national war memorial. A large part of the work to be carried out in this connection will devolve upon the federal district commission. In addition, the commission will in the immediate future have a considerable increase in the work which it normally carries on in the capital area owing to the fact that much has had to be deferred during the war. The purpose of the proposed bill is to amend the Federal District Commission Act so as to enable the commission to discharge effectively the increased work which it will have to perform.

The bill provides for the appointment of five new members of the commission, bringing the total to fifteen rather than ten as at present. The joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons which examined problems relating to the national capital in 1944 and 1945, recommended such an increase in membership. It also recommended that the new members be residents of parts of Canada other than the vicinity of Ottawa and Hull. The reason for this is to ensure a national outlook in the work of the commission. This suggestion is embodied in the bill which will follow the adoption of this resolution.

Other terms of the bill provide for an adjustment of the grants to the commission and involve changes incidental to the transfer to the president of the privy council of jurisdiction over the federal district commission.

Under the act "minister" was defined to be the Minister of Public Works. It is now proposed that the commission shall operate under the president of the privy council, who at the present time happens to be also the Prime Minister. It is felt that the federal district commission, made up as it will be, if the bill carries, not only of representatives of the vicinity of Ottawa and Hull but of additional members from all over Canada, should be under the president of the privy council, who with the members of council represents the nation at large.

The provisions of the bill can be more conveniently studied after it has been distributed, and my suggestion would be that hon. members allow the resolution to be adopted and the bill given first reading. It has been printed and will be immediately available for distribution. The details provided for in the bill can be more conveniently discussed when hon. members have the proposed text before them.

Mr. THATCHER: Could the minister indicate roughly what amount the commission is likely to ask for during the current year?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The bill will provide that the grant to the federal district commission, instead of $200,000 as heretofore, will be $300,000.

Mr. THATCHER: Is the main purpose of this legislation mainly to beautify Ottawa as was suggested in the throne speech either last session or this?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This is not the whole project. The whole project has not yet been planned. Plans are now being prepared by and under the direction of Mr. Greber and are being discussed by him and his associates with the members of the federal district commission. The federal district commission has been in existence for a great many years and already has control and maintenance of the driveways and parks and many of the open spaces in the capital city. This is to provide a grant of $300,000 per annum instead of $200,000 for the furtherance of the work which has heretofore been carried on by the federal district commission and which will continue to be carried on if the bill passes and be proceeded with more extensively than in the past.

Mr. THATCHER: This legislation does not mean the moving of factories and other buildings such as has been suggested by the newspapers? Nothing as extensive as that is proposed by the bill?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. The federal district commission has been from time to time acquiring property which it was felt would be required for the development of the driveways and parks system in Ottawa, but the bill does not provide for any grandiose scheme at this time.

Mr. REID: As one who has taken some interest in the federal district commission ever since I was appointed a member of the committee which was set up to investigate it, I have one suggestion to make to the minister. I am not sure whether it is contained in the bill.

A short time ago I wrote to the Prime Minister suggesting a scheme which I believe would result in a greater interest being taken in the federal district of Ottawa and in the national capital, and that was that each provincial government be asked to take a part in the beautification of Ottawa and have on the board a representative from each province. My own province, for instance, could beautify a certain portion of parliament hill or of Mackenzie avenue, and other provinces could do likewise. Most members when they first come here have a narrow viewpoint of Ottawa, being inclined to look upon it simply as Ottawa and not as the national capital. My membership on the committee certainly broadened my views, and since then I have looked at Ottawa from the national point of view. I have often asked myself how we could arouse a greater interest throughout the country in the development of Ottawa as the national capital, and I think one way would be to have the provinces improve and develop the grounds around the parliament buildings. My suggestion to the Prime Minister and to the Acting Prime Minister is that the scope of the bill be broadened so that each province may have a representative on the board. They would not need to meet more than about once a year.

I think everybody's attention was attracted this year by the grand display of tulips on the grounds in front of the parliament buildings. While it was stated that the tulip bulbs were a gift of good will by the people of Holland, the cold fact was that it was one of the best business displays that Holland ever made. I remember asking where the bulbs came from, and I was told that they were a gift from the people of Holland because they were so thankful for what Canada had done in the war. I investigated and found that Eire had received as many bulbs from Holland as we had, and I asked myself what help Eire had given to Holland during the war. The answer was nil. I later discovered that some twenty good salesmen had left Holland and had come to the North American continent and that eight countries had been given great quantities of these beautiful bulbs. In British Columbia we have an excellent bulb which for many years has been finding a market in Ottawa, and now we find ourselves faced with competition with bulbs grown more cheaply in Holland, which have been displayed here under the guise of a contribution of thankfulness from the people of Holland. The cold fact was that it was a straight business deal by salesmen from Holland. I am not finding fault with the salesmen for that, because everyone must admit that the tulips were beautiful, but I had a sinking feeling when I thought of our bulb growers in British Columbia and what they would be up against from that competition. So I suggest to the Acting Prime Minister that each province be represented on the commission to stimulate a national interest in the capital city. I know there are men in British Columbia who are prepared now to take a spot on the parliament building grounds and plant rose bushes and bulbs there, a display that would be known as British Columbia's, and similarly with the other provinces. I think the suggestion has a great deal of merit and would arouse an interest in all the provinces in the beautification of Ottawa and in making it a real national capital. Unless we bring the provinces in, in some way, by giving them direct representation on the federal commission and by encouraging our growers in the various provinces to see what they can do and take pride in the work, I doubt very much whether the scheme will expand as fast as the Prime Minister has in mind. Those are all the remarks I have to make at this stage. I would ask that consideration be given to the suggestions I have just outlined.

Mr. BRACKEN: The resolution before us anticipates a measure to amend the Federal District Commission Act. This act provides for the appropriation of money by the state for the improvement of certain sections of Ottawa and its environment. The amendment proposed anticipates on the part of the parliament of Canada the provision of increased amounts of money for the purpose of changing in some degree the original conception; it is for the purpose of making this vicinity a national war memorial. I am rising now to ask the minister if, when we go into committee to deal with the bill itself, he will give us a brief statement as to what has been done by the state in connection with this project, when it was started, roughly what has been done, the expenditures from year to year from the beginning, in tabulated form, and what the national war memorial aspects of this proposal are likely to mean in the way of increased cost to the state. The minister has indicated that the annual appropriation in recent years has been $200,000 and that when the bill which follows this resolution passes it will be $300,000, or an increase of fifty per cent. One question he might answer now is this: is the appropriation for just one year, or is this another of those appropriation bills which tie us to an expenditure for an indefinite number of years? I rather gather that it is the latter. Perhaps the minister will answer that before six o'clock. But when we are dealing with this matter later I would ask him to let us know—and I am not raising the question in any critical way but only in order that members of parliament and the public may know—what the government has done, what it is doing, and what this proposal will require it to do in future in the way of expenditures. At this time perhaps he will mention whether the appropriation is to be for one year or whether it will tie us indefinitely to the enlarged grant of $300,000 a year, with, no doubt, the prospect of other increases later on.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The bill will provide for an increase in the annual payment from $200,000 to $300,000 for a period not exceeding fifteen years from the 1st day of April, 1947.

Mr. THATCHER: With the principle of this bill I certainly agree. We do need a beautiful Ottawa. But I am glad that the bill is not contemplating at the present time the grandiose expenditures which the press has been talking about. Perhaps some time we shall have such a bill. I hope that if the government is planning to beautify Ottawa to the extent the newspapers are suggesting it will first look after irrigation in western Canada, because something like that is more necessary in this country than the beautification of Ottawa.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. THATCHER: As far as I am concerned, before I vote for any large expenditures to beautify one city I want to see my own city get some water and western Canadian farmers receive a little protection from drought.

[Mr. Bracken.]

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. St. Laurent thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 357, to amend the Federal District Commission Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

259. Departmental administration, $1,175,465.

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): I just wish to make a few brief remarks about the department. During the past year, notwithstanding the anticipated decrease in the volume of mail for overseas on account of the return of our men to their homes, the revenue of the department continued on the upward trend resulting in a further increase between the fiscal years 1944-45 and 1945-46 of over $4,000,000, bringing the revenue of the department to an all-time high of $83,763,000.

The greater part of the increase in revenue is due to additional postal business within Canada itself. The loss on account of the falling off in the number of parcels and letters sent to our troops overseas has been offset to some extent by the food and relief parcels which are now going forward to European countries in considerable quantity and on which, incidentally, the department makes no profit whatever, and also to increased trade with other countries.

During the war years, letter carriers in residentials districts were required to make only one delivery and staffs were adjusted accordingly. The two-trip service in these districts, however, has now been almost entirely resumed.

The larger revenue is a definite indication of an increased volume of mail to be handled and the handling of the larger quantity naturally requires more men.

I desire to assure the committee that the postal service is being operated economically and efficiently, but with due consideration for the standard of service which the public has a right to expect.

I have a tabulation of the twenty-four different items of revenue and expenditures, and to give a fair idea of the operations I must say that there is an increase in eighteen items and a decrease in six. Most of the increases are in revenue. I do not know whether hon. members would like to have certain details or not. I have spoken about the increase in foreign mail. As an example, the postage on parcels from other countries has increased $251,744, which is 59·4 per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the minister give the air mail?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We are not on that item, but if the hon. member wants it I shall give it to him. Air mail has decreased by $1,600,000; that is owing to the fact that this year the post office entered into a contract with Trans-Canada Air Lines and the rates have been changed. In other years we were paying so much a mile. It came down to forty cents a mile after having started at around sixty cents in 1937, which meant that we were paying for every mile that the plane flew. It was a good thing at the inception of a new line; but when we came to adjust the contract between the post office and Trans-Canada Air Lines, in virtue of which we pay per pound mile, we pay when there is mail and at so much per pound mile. Our contract is one and one-half mills per pound mile for this year; it is on a decreasing scale. In 1949 it will be nine-tenths of a mill per pound mile. Air mail has also decreased to a certain extent because we are not sending as many letters by air mail as we did during the war, but we expect an increase because we found that the big companies which wish to publicize their business are using the air mails to a great extent.

Mr. GRAYDON: In recent times have there been any changes in the high ranking men in the Post Office Department?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We are reorganizing the department. We used to have eight branches, but we found it necessary to reduce them to four because we wanted a better hold on the operation of the department. Of course we are asking for an increase for the higher officials. I must say also—perhaps the hon. member has that in his mind—that recently there has been an increase in the operation branch. The treasury board was generous enough to let us increase the salaries of our employees from $120 to $180 according to their grades.

Mr. GRAYDON: I rose for the purpose of giving the minister the opportunity of putting the name of his new deputy minister on the record. He has been behind the scenes for a good deal of the time and I thought perhaps the minister might wish to put his name on the record.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): He was here last year and generally is well known around the premises, and has been for many years. Besides that, he is a man who comes from the post office.

Mr. REID: During the past number of years thousands and thousands of gift parcels have been sent by the people of Canada to the people of the old country. Considerable criticism has reached me, and the question they ask is, why is it that anyone sending parcels from Canada to Great Britain is charged twenty-eight cents a pound, while people in the United States can send parcels to Great Britain for fourteen cents a pound, just half what we pay in this country. Could the minister make a statement as to why we should pay twice as much to send a parcel practically the same distance?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): On all these gift parcels we are sending to Europe we have a rate which includes the charge we make ourselves, an amount to pay for the transit of those parcels, a certain amount which England asks when they pass through that country, and, in addition the charge made by the receiving nation. I had occasion this session to give the details of some of these rates. We are charging a very reasonable rate ourselves, and if it were not for the transit charges, plus the charges made by the receiving nations, our rate would be about equal that of the United States, which has a direct line of communication with most of the European countries and so does not have to pay these transit charges.

Mr. REID: I am speaking about parcels going direct to Great Britain, for people in Great Britain. I am not speaking of parcels that go to Great Britain first and then on to the continent. I understand that our rate on parcels going to Britain is twice the United States rate.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I do not remember exactly what we are charging, but I know our charge for taking a parcel from anywhere in Canada and sending it to England is less than England is charging to receive that parcel. I gave the figures earlier this session. I do not know exactly why the United States would charge less, but those are the facts.

Mr. HACKETT: They might have a better rate in England than we have.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I do not know exactly; I would have to inquire.

Mr. MacNICOL: When these estimates were up last session the question of the salaries of the postal staff at the branch post offices came up. At that time I believe the minister intimated that the salaries of the letter carriers would be increased, and I presume that has been done?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes, it has.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like the minister to tell us by how much they have been increased, because if there is one part of the whole public service that deserves a little extra consideration I believe it is the postal staff. Their duties are very heavy, and in a place like Toronto those duties are increasing all the time. I see them on my street; even the postie from the branch office is loaded down almost beyond his capacity. It seems they are now delivering magazines for every conceivable publisher, and as far as I can see they are very much overworked. I should like the minister to tell us by how much their salaries have been increased. Last session I also asked about the foremen in the branch post offices. I am advised their salaries have not been increased, and I should like to know why that has not been done. Their duties are very responsible, and they are having more and more work to do all the time.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I just said that the salaries of all employees have been increased, with the exception of the top officials and the district directors. The minimum increase is $120. The order in council has not been made public as yet; it was passed only last week. The minimum increase is $120 a year and the maximum is $180.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does that include the postal foremen?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): My hon. friend means the supervisors, and that includes them.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes; I mean the man who looks after the routes, who sees they are properly taken care of.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes, he gets $180, and I hope it will be retroactive to April 1, 1946.

Mr. MacNICOL: It starts at $120?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes, for the lower grades, going up to $180 for the higher grades. That was done only last week. The men know about it, but the general public do not.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then the minister said the deliveries had been increased to two daily?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is that the case in my end of the city of Toronto? I do not know about it. It may be so. Are there two deliveries on Saturday, or just one?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Only one on Saturday.

Mr. MacNICOL: If I mail a letter here in Ottawa on Friday afternoon, addressed to my own home, they do not get it until Monday afternoon. I could walk that far with a letter in that time. What is the reason for that?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I should like to know if that is the case since the second daily delivery has been in operation. Of course, when we had only one delivery in the residential districts, in certain places that delivery was made in the afternoon, while in others it was made in the forenoon, because the men were working all day. I should be surprised if a letter posted here on Friday did not reach the hon. member's residence until Monday afternoon. It should get there Monday forenoon.

Mr. MacNICOL: It should, but it does not appear to. If I post a letter here in the House of Commons on Friday it does not go out until eleven o'clock at night, and there would be no delivery Saturday afternoon.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The first delivery after that would be Monday morning.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is quite a long time too, is it not?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): But we do not deliver on Sunday.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do you deliver on Saturday afternoon?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): No, unless it is a special delivery letter. Our employees work a 44-hour week.

Mr. HERRIDGE: While I realize that the Post Office Department is giving preference to veterans, and while I understand that quite a large number of rural postmasters are veterans, I want to suggest that this department has an opportunity to provide employment for a very much larger number of veterans without doing anyone any harm or doing anyone out of a job he requires. I am speaking now on behalf of the large number of veterans who were wounded and who are not able to go into the ordinary labour stream. In going through the country and going into post offices, you very often find a rural post office in a store. I know of cases where the income from the post office may be $1,500, $2,000 or $3,000. At the same time the owner of the store has a good business, out of which he gets a good living. I know of rural postmasters who run the post office as a separate institution from which they receive $2,500 or $2,700 a year, while at the same time they carry on other businesses from which they receive a net revenue of thousands of dollars. I suggest that that here is an opportunity to do something for disabled veterans, a large number of whom have to be provided for by this country, and who have a claim for every consideration which can be given by parliament. I would suggest that the Post Office Department should conduct a survey of the situation in connection with rural post offices, so as to find those places which would be likely to provide opportunities for disabled veteran pensioners who would not be able to enter into the ordinary labour stream. Such post offices should be advertised, and opportunities given to veterans. I am sure, if that were done, it would provide employment for thousands of veterans who otherwise will find it difficult to secure employment in years to come.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): That is exactly what we are doing. We are giving a 100 per cent preference to returned men in connection with any new jobs.

Mr. HERRIDGE: The minister possibly did not understand my remarks. That is not what the post office is doing. I say I know of people who are earning a good living, and to whom the post office is just an adjunct, a sideline. Those people can do without post offices. I say the Post Office Department should consider giving those to veterans. In some instances the income is as low as $500, but that would enable many men with a pension to get along comfortably.

Mr. BRYCE: Has the Postmaster General had any word from the government in the old country regarding a conference concerning these rates? The rates at the present time are twenty-four cents for the first pound, and eighteen cents for every additional pound. I asked the Postmaster General about that, and he told me that the outcome depended upon the old country government's entering into a conference with this government. Has there been any action in that connection?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): On an eleven-pound parcel shipped to England we charge $2.25. Out of that we pay the steamship company $1.25 and we pay England sixty cents, leaving for ourselves only forty cents. Some of our officials were overseas. Mr. Germain was overseas not long ago and visited countries to which we ship these parcels. We find we cannot get a better rate than we are getting. We have to collect whatever we pay back to England or to any other country. To countries on the continent we have to pay more because most of these parcels go in transit via England, and we have to pay for transit. So that if on a parcel weighing eleven pounds we in Canada collect only forty cents for taking that parcel from anywhere in Canada to the port of departure from Canada, I do not think we are charging too much.

Mr. BRYCE: There has been no conference yet, has there?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes, there has been a conference in which the officials of my department have taken part. The result has been that no reduction has been brought about. The British government has been approached particularly and their reply is that for the time being they cannot reduce these rates.

Mr. LENNARD: Is it the custom to discuss everything connected with the Post Office Department when the first item is called? I notice that almost every subject is being discussed, and if that is permitted there is one I should like to bring to the attention of the minister.

The CHAIRMAN: It is customary to have a general discussion on the first item. But if hon. members have questions on any particular items I would suggest that they be reserved until the items are called.

Mr. LENNARD: I have a matter I shall place before the minister. His officials can consider it during the next few minutes, so that when the item is called it may be answered. I have before me a circular letter under date of July 20 sent out last month by the Toronto postal district service, in which they intimate that the five per cent cost of operation bonus is to be discontinued on February 15 next.

Further on in the letter, it states that it is necessary for the Post Office Department to have information as to whether a man wishes to continue on a lower rate, and they ask whether a lower rate would be accepted, or if the person in question would rather be relieved of his contract.

On the surface this seems unfair because, if the bonus was given for good cause during the war, most certainly the cost of living has not gone down, nor have operating costs in the past several years. I should like to know why this is being discontinued. Surely these rural delivery men are under greater expense to-day than they were even during the war.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I shall answer that question immediately, because one might expect other questions along the same line. Only this afternoon a somewhat similar question was asked. Hon. members will realize, of course, that we have legal contracts with rural mail carriers and that we pay the bonus by virtue of order in council. These bonuses were supposed to be terminated on December 31, and we have asked to continue them until February 15. There is now before parliament a bill which would give the government an extension of sixty days instead of fifteen.

Some of the officials notified contractors that after the expiration of these contracts the bonuses could not be paid any longer because, unless we received authority from the House of Commons to do so, we would not have authority to continue the bonuses. Some of the officials gave this notification because they did not want to take any of the contractors by surprise. But after due consideration we are cancelling all these notices. We are sending a letter to every contractor who has received the notice telling him that we are hoping to continue the bonus until sixty days after the opening of the next session.

Then we shall have to readjust the contract either by asking for new tenders or by presenting a bill to parliament which would give the Postmaster General authority to renew these contracts at the rate set out therein, plus bonus. I do not want to plead the case before it comes up next session, but in order to prepare the hon. member I may say that every time we cancel a contract on account of the death of a contractor or to his sickness and inability to fulfil his contract, we ask for tenders. At this time the tenders are always higher than the original contract plus bonus.

Mr. LOCKHART: I believe that in connection with rural mail delivery there is a basis of so much per mile, where a satisfactory service cannot be obtained otherwise. I understand that the department sometimes gives a mileage allowance. Is that basis higher to-day than it was three years ago; or is it on the same basis, plus the bonus being discussed?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The same basis, plus this bonus. Every time we ask for tenders it varies. I must admit that at certain times tenders are put in which are too low, but the law forces us to accept the tender of a man who has the facilities to fulfil his contract. The Post Office Act permits a postmaster to award a contract for $200 or less without asking for tenders. This provision goes back to 1867. If we had had time this session I would have brought in amendments to the Post Office Act to increase this amount from $200 to $500, because I admit that to-day $500 is worth no more than $200 was in 1867.

Mr. LOCKHART: In a case where a tender was too high and the department refused to accept it and then said that they had a mile rate which they thought was fair, the mile rate was the same as before the war. The department still insisted that it was quite fair and I am wondering why there was not some adjustment.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): There is no fixed rate. We are obliged to take the lowest tender, but we are not obliged to take the highest. We have adjusted certain contracts on account of increased expenses caused by the war, but there is no fixed rate per mile. It would be impossible to fix a rate because so many factors enter into the contracts. In some places horses and sleighs must be used in the winter time and automobiles in the summer, while in other places aeroplanes are used and so on.

Mr. GRANT: I should like to support the argument advanced by the hon. member for Kootenay West in connection with putting post offices in stores. When you ask the department to give this job to a returned soldier in a case where the storekeeper may be quite prosperous they write and tell you that you must get two people to give a sworn affidavit that the man is not operating the post office in the right way. That is not the point. The man is making money in his store and he is handling all the old age pension cheques and the children's allowance cheques. He knows where every cheque is going and when people come in for their cheques they are asked to pay their bills. This matter should be straightened out right now and every hon. member should support it. These people who keep stores should not be allowed to keep post offices, especially since the old age pensions and children's allowances have come into effect. I think every hon. member knows of cases, because there are thousands of them in Canada where the man running the store is keeping the post office. I think every hon. member in this committee should ask the Postmaster General to change the regulations whereby people running stores are allowed to keep post offices.

Mr. REID: I hope the minister will not take that advice seriously.

Mr. GRANT: If the hon. member for Vancouver wants to put up an argument against another member in his own party—

Mr. REID: Do not confuse me with Vancouver; it is New Westminster; please get it right.

Mr. GRANT: I suppose he will vote against it because he always votes against his party.

Mr. REID: I will say in a kindly way that I pity the hon. member and I ask the minister in all seriousness—

Mr. GRANT: Somebody ought to pity you.

Mr. REID: I do not care about that. I still say to the minister that I hope he does not take too seriously this suggestion. If it is followed many small places will not have post offices.

Mr. CHURCH: On page 11 of his report the Postmaster General reports a surplus of $11,442,000. The Toronto post offices contribute about thirty-one per cent of the gross revenue, since the statement on page 106 shows that the Toronto post offices contributed $12,290,055. During the war, the postmen on the routes had to serve twice as large a district as had been served during peace time. This placed a heavy strain upon the men, especially during the winter weather. A large number were laid off when the routes were doubled. This department has provided an excellent public service both in peace and in war. Along with the police and fire departments it is the other public utility giving most excellent service.

A large mail order post office building was built on Bay street, but the armed forces took it over during the war. I accompanied the predecessor of the present minister and the Postmaster General, along with the present Minister of Public Works, through terminal "A" post office building at Bay and Front streets, and we were both astonished at the conditions under which the staff had to work during rush times at Christmas and Easter. I understand that the department has now got part of this new mail order building back, and soon will have it all, so that a better building will give greatly needed space.

There used to be three deliveries each day in the business section and two in the residential section, and I should like to see this service restored. In some parts of the city they are getting only one residential delivery a day. Three years ago I complained about the punishment that was meted out to the one-tenth of one per cent of the men who got into trouble for stealing a few cents in letters. If a man took a few cents out of a letter the penalty imposed was three years. I brought this matter up for eight or nine years, and the act was finally amended making the punishment one year and giving the magistrate the option of reducing it to a lesser offence, with a penalty of one month, now the law. I think that is in the public interest and I am glad to see it is being carried out.

I should like to make a suggestion with regard to Toronto, and this may apply to other cities as well. We should have a system of drop letters at a one cent rate. There is no reason why that could not be done because there is a surplus of $11,442,000. I do not think the time is far distant when the rate will have to be reduced from three to two cents for letters going outside the city. Many complaints are being made about the cost of mailing parcels. The other day I sent the minister a letter which I had received from a prominent lady who is head of a patriotic organization. She sends about thirty or forty parcels a week to the old country and out of $4 or $5 she gets back only three or four cents change on maling only three of these. Probably the rates are fixed at the other end by the British government, but the minister should look into this matter.

I hope the department will recover possession of the building on Bay street. I should like to say a word about branch post offices. There are a great many of them located in the twelve constituencies in Toronto. From 1869 to 1901 the department had deficits, but with few exceptions from then on it has always shown a surplus. There was a series of deficits in the depression years from 1927 to 1931, but the surpluses started again in 1932 when there was a surplus of $657,000. In 1933 this went up to $1,164,000, and in 1935 there was a surplus of $2,274,000. The surplus in 1938 was $3,249,000. During the war there were large surpluses. Last year the surplus was $12,585,000, and this year it is $11,442,000.

I believe the time has come for the Post Office Department to provide better working conditions for the rank and file of the staff. Perhaps that comes under the civil service commission. In any event, something should be done to improve the working conditions because they are deplorable. In the summer time the men wear heavy uniforms, almost as heavy as those of the mounted police. Suitable summer uniforms prevail in municipalities.

I believe that the Post Office Department, which has given such fine service both in peace and in war, should expand. It was about ready to expand when the war started. The post office in Great Britain and in France has made great improvements. Our post office should be extended, as in England, to other uses and functions, as a public utility and in that way the public would get more service. I hope that the minister will look into these matters, about which I wrote a memorandum to his predecessor, who said that he would certainly consider it. Certainly something should be done to provide better working conditions for the working classes who are engaged on this work. A large number of women and men also are now employed in sorting letters and doing other work inside, and their working conditions and space and health conditions are not at all what they should be. I was really surprised to see what those conditions were. You could not get away with them in a factory, but at terminal "A" in Toronto women are working by night and by day with insufficient lighting and lack of ordinary laws of public hygiene. I hope to see some modern improvements made in their working conditions.

In Toronto we have no main post office. We did once have a head post office on Toronto street, but we have no head post office in our city to-day. The department is leasing terminal "A", which is at the corner of Bay and Front street and is a part of the Union station. With a revenue of $13,000,000 from the Toronto post office, the city is certainly entitled to a modern post office building. Other public utilities have these new public buildings there; and it is not only a convenience but adds to the revenue as well.

I find some of the costly sub-post offices costing $20,000 to $30,000 or $40,000 with only about twenty per cent revenues therefrom. The department should be run on a commercial basis. I understand that the sub-post offices are granted and located on a party patronage basis, and not from a commercial aspect. Three hundred people applied for a new sub-post office on Carlaw avenue. They could not walk all the way from Gerrard street right up to Danforth, about a mile and a quarter, in bad weather, and they could not get a sub-post office on Carlaw avenue. I understand that the staff in sub-post offices is appointed on a party patronage basis. I have had a lot of complaints from returned men as to getting on terminal "A". I have had twenty or thirty letters from returned soldiers this year who were trying to get temporary or permanent employment at terminal "A". They could not apply there for work but had to go up to 465 Bay street, a mile farther away, to see somebody in the civil service commission. They would go in there and be kept waiting for half an hour or an hour and then be told to come back the next day, and they got no satisfaction. That should not be done to returned men, but I have seen it. There should be some more direct method of engaging these men. I do not believe altogether in the civil service commission. It has made mistakes. I believe that the superintendent of the post office, Mr. Gibson, an able, efficient and popular director of Toronto, whose office brings in a revenue of $13,000,000 a year and who gets a small and insignificant salary for the work he does, should have power as head of the branch to choose his own staff. I venture to say that if he did, the returned men would get a better chance.

Mr. GRAYDON: I cannot find any other item in the estimates on which to raise this important point, and so I take this opportunity of raising it on the administration item. I understand from outside sources that the Post Office Department is about to issue new postage stamps, and I am told that that there are seven new designs to be issued.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I made a statement in the house about the matter last week.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is what I was coming to. Before the minister made his statement in the house and before the members had an opportunity of seeing these exhibits of beauty, a storm was brewing over the new designs, and I want to get the minister's point of view because it is essential that we should have both sides. One of the designs I understand shows a ploughman with his furrow being turned on the wrong side of the plough. I have not seen the stamp myself. I think the members of the house should have been given a preview of these new designs.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): A left-handed plough.

Mr. GRAYDON: If the minister ever attempted to plough he would certainly take the wrong side of whatever he was doing. Perhaps he would be a left-handed ploughman.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Cincinnatus.

Mr. GRAYDON: Another stamp depicts a logging scene. I am not prepared to express an expert opinion on this. No doubt my good friend the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and others will be able to do that. But the way we hear it is that this new stamp shows two loggers turning their backs upon a falling tree, which from the expert's point of view indicates that these two men are in great danger of their lives. Other criticisms as well have been made of the new stamps that are being issued. I should like the minister to indicate who was responsible for these stamps, who were the designers, and would he also indicate whether any changes are to be made? Perhaps in the end these stamps will provide additional money for the department. I certainly am not going to object to that. One paragraph that I read in the newspapers indicates that these new stamps will incidentally make money for the department. I quote one paragraph:

> In all this, whatever the technical criticism, there is profit and enjoyment.

Mr. MITCHELL: What paper is my hon. friend quoting from?

Mr. GRAYDON: It is the paper that always supports my hon. friend, the Toronto Globe and Mail. It goes on:

> Canadian stamps enjoy a world-wide reputation for their quality and a new issue almost always pays for itself three times over due to the demand of collectors, philatelists—

I may have the pronunciation wrong.

> —are a peculiar brew who draw unbounded satisfaction from such things as inverted centres, over-impressions and double transfers. To them a left-handed plowman or a foolish woodsman is a thing of beauty and a joy forever.

I would ask the minister to enlighten the committee about these new objects of beauty which are shortly to adorn our letters.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): As everyone knows, I am almost new in the office of Postmaster General. I never thought there were so many philatelists in the world, but long before this issue came out we received hundreds of letters asking us to reserve a certain number of postage stamps for the writers. We have here a fourteen cent stamp representing a hydro-electric plant on the St. Maurice river. It happens to be La Gabelle, one of the best known plants belonging to the Shawinigan Water and Power Company, and I have received telegrams from the company asking for a large number of these stamps to send as gifts, presumably to clients and friends of the company.

About the farmer in eastern Ontario, it is true that the gentleman who is ploughing the field there does it on the left. My attention has been drawn to that, but I am told that there are reversible ploughs; if somebody has to plough on the down hill he ploughs in such a way that the fallow falls downhill, not uphill.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does that mean that the government is going downhill?

Mr. MACKENZIE: All the Tories are going downhill.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It is that way on this eight-cent stamp. I did ploughing myself when I was much younger, but I do not remember whether I was ploughing on the left or the right. However, according to the philatelists, the picture of this plough turning on the left is more valuable than if it were on the right side. There is no error; it is a very fine and well designed stamp.

Now about the fifty cent stamps; this issue shows lumberjacks working on fir and pine in British Columbia. I do not think there is any danger for these two men, because one is behind a tree—the tree is falling on the right and the man is behind it—and the other gentleman is cutting a tree which seems to be at least 150 feet on the right. The tree is falling to the rear, so that there is no danger at all. I do not think that stamp will have the value of the one which shows the plough working on the left.

Mr. KNIGHT: I have two or three questions to ask the minister. They are not interrelated in themselves, but they have relation to other questions which have been asked on this administration item, so I assume that I may present them. I was interested in hearing the minister say that the pay of the post office employees had been raised, and in that connection I want to mention the matter of overtime, the work performed on Sundays and on statutory holidays. I shall ask the minister this question, and invite him to reserve his answer while I go into another matter which has relation to it. My question is, do the post office employees now or can they hope shortly to draw overtime for work performed on Sundays or on statutory holidays—and I want to say this, and I want these words noted—in cash? One would wonder, if an employee is not paid in cash, what is the coinage in which he receives his remuneration. In looking into this matter I have unearthed something which surprises me tremendously. I find that certain employees of the post office have agreements in that time worked on statutory holidays—note this—"may at the present time be liquidated by time off", and they urge that such liquidation be confined to the month in which the overtime is worked instead of spread over the month in which it is worked and the following month. That needs a little explaining to anyone like myself who is not familiar with that peculiar system. I imagine it is pretty cold comfort to the letter carrier who works overtime the night before Christmas to know that in the following February he shall get a Monday off for the service so rendered.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): He is paid in cash at Christmas time.

Mr. KNIGHT: But only at Christmas time? However, perhaps I should let the minister answer my question: is there any provision now for overtime payment in cash for Sundays and statutory holidays? Would the minister at the same time comment upon this peculiar and, in my opinion, wrong system of paying a man by allowing time to be "liquidated"—a peculiar term which is apparently characteristic of the particular thing of which I am speaking? I should like the privilege of asking a further question when the minister has answered this one.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): At all times, or at all events for some time, extra work done during the Christmas season has been paid for in cash.

Mr. KNIGHT: Overtime?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Overtime.

Mr. KNIGHT: Counting as time and a half?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): At pro rata.

Mr. KNIGHT: Not time and a half?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): No. During the other periods of the year we were paying him in time off. I must tell the hon. gentleman that this question is being studied very carefully at present both by the department and by the treasury board. I cannot to-day give the decision at which we are going to arrive, but we are reviewing this matter after having reviewed the salaries.

Mr. KNIGHT: The employees are desirous that this overtime or this "liquidation" of time should be paid in the month in which it is earned and not scattered over that month and the month which follows:

My other question has relation to the matter of parcel post. Someone brought up the subject to-night. I should like to refer to the sending of parcels by post to Germany. I know that ordinary letter mail to Germany was opened some time ago, and the United States opened a parcel post service some eight weeks ago. I applied to the Post Office Department to-day, and I will say that I got a civil and courteous answer from a gentleman in the minister's department, but while I got that information privately I think the matter ought to be brought to the attention of the house and the country. It is a matter affecting Canadian citizens and residents here who are anxious about the fate of their relatives in Germany. Germany, of course, is divided into three zones. I am thinking in particular of two of those zones, occupied respectively by British forces and by troops of the United States army. The letter I hold in my hand is written by a man who tells me that his mother died last year in January, simply from hunger. He has also sisters and a brother over there. It is only natural that he is desirous of sending small items of food and clothing, which he would not himself miss, in an attempt to save the lives of his remaining relatives. This afternoon I was given to understand by the official of the minister's department that the Post Office Department has done everything possible in that regard. Apparently they have applied to the United States authorities in the United States zone without success, and up until the present at least the result has been the same in the British zone. I presume that there is a way around this which is an irregular one. I presume that a man in this position could have food sent from the United States under the United States regulations, and it could be put into the zone now occupied by the United States army, but there would appear to be no way of getting food and clothing to save those people's lives in the British zone. It is a matter which concerns many people of German origin in this country, and I would urge the minister to keep on with the good work of trying to break down these walls at the earliest possible moment and thereby save lives.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I wish to say a few words about this. Ever since the war terminated we have had a lot of requests to send parcels to the former enemy countries of Germany and Italy, but we did all we could to accommodate our own people. There was no service in these countries. Even France, which was liberated some time before the end of the war, was in a similar position. We could not send parcels there because the French authorities had no way of delivering them. We started up by sending a small parcel of four pounds; then the weight was increased to seven pounds, then to eleven pounds and now it is twenty-two pounds. These services are being reorganized as quickly as possible in these countries, and as soon as we get the green light we shall be glad to notify the public of Canada that they may send parcels to these countries.

Mr. BROOKS: I may say to the minister that I have no complaint about the design of the new postage stamp for New Brunswick because there is no such thing. The same applies to Nova Scotia. I might tell the minister, if he has not already heard it, that both these provinces feel that they have been neglected. When the minister was considering designs he might very well have considered New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, especially when we realize what these provinces did during the war. I might refer particularly to the ports of Saint John and Halifax. No port in Canada did as much for the war effort as did the port of Halifax, and to a lesser degree the port of Saint John.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is a better port.

Mr. BROOKS: It does not make any difference which is better; they are both good, and they are both good enough to be considered when stamps are being designed. I know the minister will tell us that he has given us a stamp for the maritime provinces. I believe that stamp represents the new ferry boat between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. Is that not correct?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): That is absolutely correct, and it is a beautiful one.

Mr. BROOKS: The hon. member for Queens will probably tell the minister that they would rather see this ferry on the Northumberland strait than on a postage stamp. They have been waiting a long time for that ferry and I believe it will be some time yet before it is on that route. Therefore, if there is any criticism—

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): According to the stamp she seems to be going fine.

Mr. BROOKS: She is going at Sorel; but, if I understand correctly, it is not on the route between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

My main object in rising was to ask the minister a question in reference to village post offices. We have made application for a number of post offices in my own province. I refer particularly to the village of Rothesay in the county of Kings, New Brunswick. This is a village of nearly two thousand people, one of the few incorporated villages in the maritime provinces. They have post office accommodation which would disgrace a rural community of a hundred or a hundred and fifty people. There is a small room; it is not much larger than, I was going to say, a telephone booth. When the people go for their mail no matter what the weather is like, if there are more than three or four some have to stand outside. In this village there are two large schools, the Rothesay collegiate school for boys and the Netherwood school for girls, and also a large consolidated school. I know of no other community anywhere that I have been in in Canada which has as poor postal accommodation as has the village of Rothesay. I wrote not only to the Post Office Department but to the public works department some time ago, and the excuse that was given was that they were not building any post offices during the war. That was a reasonable excuse; but during the war our Post Office Department must have made considerable money, and I know no reason why something should not be done along this line. If a new post office is not constructed—and I contend that they are deserving of a new post office—at least some suitable accommodation should be provided. The revenue from this village is over $8,000 a year, and I am satisfied that it cannot be costing more than half of that to carry on the postal services.

I might also say to the minister that a short time ago I sent him a petition from the village of Rothesay asking for a new post office, and as yet I have not had the courtesy of a reply from the minister's department. It may be that he has not had time, but the petition was sent.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): When was the letter sent?

Mr. BROOKS: It was sent ten days ago, and that should be sufficient time. If the minister has not had time to reply that is perfectly all right.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We may have to make an investigation; we generally make an investigation.

Mr. BROOKS: As I say, I wrote the department before. The offices in Ottawa should have all the information which is required; it should not take long to make an investigation.

I should also like to take up the matter of rural routes. Possibly what applies to my constituency applies to a great many. Very little has been done during the war to extend rural routes throughout the country. A good many applications have been made for an extension, but the reply we have received is that there has been a war on and they could not extend these rural routes. I hope that the minister will take under consideration the many applications which he must have for the extension of rural routes for the better postal accommodation of the people throughout the country. I do not think there is anything further other than these two items. I hope that the minister will give them his attention and look into the matter of the Rothesay post office.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I do not wish to delay the committee in the passing of these estimates, but I feel that I should give an answer to the hon. gentleman with reference to the stamps. We have nine new stamps. Of course we cannot at all times have a stamp—

Mr. BROOKS: I would point out that there are only nine provinces in Canada.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes. If the hon. gentleman wishes to hear my answer I shall be glad to give it to him. When we print stamps we cannot at all times print nine, one for each province. We have to take care of the large province of Ontario in which is situated Toronto, which produces over $13,000,000 of revenue. It is true that in this issue there is no stamp having particular reference to Nova Scotia. There is one, as the hon. member said, depicting a ferryboat proceeding from Prince Edward Island to New Brunswick or vice versa. It is a beautiful stamp. We take our motif from the different districts, and I must say that as long as I am Postmaster General I shall never forget either Nova Scotia or New Brunswick. I like those two provinces very much; I know their importance, and I am sure that hon. members representing those provinces do not let anyone forget them. We have paid our respects to Nova Scotia in years gone by. In 1938, for example, we had a stamp showing Halifax harbour. In 1929 we had beautiful stamps of the Bluenose, and in 1930 we had a stamp showing Grand Pré. In 1934 we had a New Brunswick stamp showing a ship, and we had one of Prince Edward Island in 1935. I am sure the objection raised is not very serious, but we like to show we are not forgetting New Brunswick or Nova Scotia.

With regard to post offices in villages, as the hon. member knows they are revenue post offices, meaning that the postmaster receives a percentage of the revenue. In places where the revenue may be only $50 or $60 a year we pay the postmaster a minimum of $110, losing money thereby. I know the postmasters have to furnish decent places to keep the post offices, and the department does not look after those places, though we pay a certain amount by way of subsidy. In the case of Rothesay, if the hon. member has had no reply it is probably because there have been complaints and we have asked the district director to make a report; because if it is not large enough, or if it is not convenient having regard to the size of the village, we shall have to ask the postmaster to find another place.

With regard to the post office building, the hon. member answered the point when he argued his case. At this time, when material is so scarce, we cannot expect to build many post offices. I must admit that we are far behind in the construction of these buildings because of the war years. We have received three or four hundred requests for new post office buildings; the population of many towns has increased, and a certain number—I will not say too many, because it might cost us a great deal of money next year—of buildings will have to be erected at points where the revenue is $10,000 or more. The revenue at Rothesay is $7,270. Before the war, and especially before the first world war, if a member of parliament attended the sessions regularly, and I suppose voted correctly, sometimes he could get the public works department to build a post office, but I must say that in my department we are trying to follow one of the rules that have been suggested quite often by hon. gentlemen opposite, a rule called economy. The demand is so great that we have had to make some rules, and we shall not be able to build post offices where the postal revenue is not at least $10,000.

Mr. BROOKS: May I ask when that rule was put into effect, because I know post offices that have been built where the revenue is much less than $10,000.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): As I said, before the war there was no fixed and strict rule as there is to-day. I do not say we shall not depart from that rule. We would depart from it if it were necessary in order to give work to more men in the country, and so on; but at the present time, with the shortage of materials, we would be severely criticized if we started to put up three or four hundred post office buildings all over Canada. A little patience will surely cure many of these things.

As to the rural routes, we are providing as many as possible, but again we have to consider the cost. We have had to cut down certain rural routes in some parts of the country where perhaps only two or three families were being served in a distance of three or four miles. It was very difficult to cut them down, and we have heard about it ever since, but we must be careful with the people's money. Any time we find a situation where there are four farmers or four postal addresses, as we call it, per mile, we extend the route whenever possible. If the roads are impassable of course we will not do it, but we do extend routes where conditions permit. I must say that in years gone by postmasters general were very kind to the people of New Brunswick, because they have a good share of the rural routes.

Mr. WRIGHT: I should like to ask a question with regard to the matter which was discussed when these estimates came up first; that is, the postal rates on parcels to the old country. In his breakdown the minister gave us the figure of $2.25 for an 11-pound parcel, of which forty cents went to our post office, sixty cents to Great Britain and $1.25 in shipping charges. Those shipping charges seem to me quite excessive, because that would be at the rate of approximately $500 a ton, and at that rate it would cost $12 to ship a bushel of wheat from Saint John to Liverpool. I wonder how long that rate has been in effect. Is it a rate that was put on during the war, and what companies are enjoying this rate? It seems to me excessive, and I should like an explanation.

While I am on my feet, I should like to ask another question. The minister stated that to establish a rural route would require four farmers to the mile. I do not believe that rule applies in western Canada. We would not have any rural routes out there if it required four subscribers to the mile. I am just wondering what the rule is there and what extensions have been made in western Canada in the past year.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): When I was speaking of four farmers per mile I was answering the hon. member for Royal, in regard to the east. Of course I admit that in the west we have to be more generous in this, as in some other things.

The rate for parcels is according to weight and also according to the number of cubic feet. We pay seventy-five cents per cubic foot. As the hon. gentleman knows, these parcels sometimes contain clothing and articles that are quite heavy, and I understand that it takes one and a half or two cubic feet for each parcel.

Mr. WRIGHT: How long have these rates been in effect? Have they been in operation for a number of years?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Since the beginning of the war.

Mr. WRIGHT: There has been no reduction in the rate since the end of the war?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): There will be, I am sure. We are trying to get better rates, and as soon as the new lines begin to operate we may do so. To-day, as the hon. gentleman knows, all the ships are crowded, and I do not expect any reduction before another five or six months.

Mr. McLURE: I thought I should rise when I heard some slight criticism regarding the new stamps. However, it was friendly criticism. I wish to say that we appreciate very much the beautiful design on the stamp given to my province, a stamp which happened to be the most expensive one. But, joining with the hon. member for Royal, how much more would we appreciate it if the Postmaster General were to jog the memory of his colleague, the Minister of Transport, and ask him when he is going to give us a steamer between Tormentine and Borden?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. McLURE: I should like to offer a suggestion regarding the bonuses the rural carriers are being paid. These bonuses were most acceptable to them and, as other hon. members have said, the cost of living is still going up. It would not be in their interests to have the cut at the present time. The Postmaster General has told us that possibly sixty days after the next session some legislation in this connection will be introduced. I would suggest, however, that the bonus be continued until the expiration of the contracts. When tenders are called there will be an opportunity for re-tendering and for getting probably more than the five per cent bonus. Or perhaps the Postmaster General has something better in mind for the rural carriers.

Mr. FRASER: I have before me a letter from the Peterborough district council of the civil service federation of Canada. On more than one occasion they have suggested that the Postmaster General see to it that the regulations respecting the size of envelopes be enforced, and that the standard size of envelopes be used. They object to the use of small envelopes and cards such as are used at Christmas and other holiday seasons. The sorters and the letter carriers have great difficulty in looking after these outsize letters and post cards. I would ask the Postmaster General to check on this.

On many occasions I have had letters from people in my constituency respecting the stamping of picture post cards by the post office. They tell me that in most cases they receive picture post cards on which the Post Office Department has placed its stamp, thereby rendering the pictures useless. Only the other day I received a beautiful post card from Italy—I believe it was handpainted —and the only postmark on the picture side of the card was a Canadian postmark. The other marks had been placed on the address side. I suggest that a regulation should be put through to stop the defacing of picture post cards.

I believe the question of sub-post offices is of interest to every city of any size where sub-post offices are used. If I mail a letter in the general post office in Peterborough to any one of the sub-post offices in that city I must place a four-cent stamp on it. For instance, if this chamber were the city of Peterborough and if my seat were the general post office and I were to post a letter from my seat, sending it to the minister who, we will say, is in a sub-post office, I would have to place a four-cent stamp on it. But if I were to post a letter addressed to the house next door to the sub-post office I would have to use only a three-cent stamp. If a party has to call for it at the sub-post office the rate is four cents. This is confusing, because letters are sent out not only by myself but by other people, addressed to sub-post offices. We find that those receiving the letters or calling for them have to pay the additional postage.

Then, according to the district director, an overweight letter sent to a sub-post office must pay two cents for each additional ounce. I believe that all letters posted to any point in a city, whether or not they be addressed to a sub-post office, should pay the same rate of three cents.

I came across an article in the Popular Science magazine of March, 1946, which states that a new federal law in the United States has authorized the postmaster general there to offer anything up to $1,000 to any postal employee in return for a top-grade invention. Such suggestion must either promote economy or increase efficiency so that it may be adopted by the post office department. As at present understood, there will be no time limit placed on the contest, but the total amount of the reward under the act must not exceed $25,000 in any one year. Further regulations are to be worked out under the postmaster general in that country. I believe that our postal system in Canada works well, as does that in the United States. However, I believe our Postmaster General might take that suggestion into consideration, and see what can be done with it.

What was the total revenue for the post office department last year?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): There was a gross revenue of $83 million.

Mr. FRASER: During the war, as a war measure postage was increased from three cents to four cents. Does all that four cents go to the Post Office Department?

Perhaps one of the reasons the revenue for the department was up lies in the fact that service pins sent out by the Department of National Defence had postage paid on them, as well as an additional ten cents for registration. Do other departments in the government put postage stamps on their mail?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I appreciate the hon. member's suggestion concerning rewards. Of course in the United States where the revenue is so tremendous they can offer amounts that we could not afford to offer here.

Mr. FRASER: You could make the amount smaller.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Last year we held a conference of district directors and we intend to repeat this conference every year. This was the first time that it was held, and a large number of suggestions were made which we will consider during the year and try to implement. With regard to the cost of a drop letter, which is a letter dropped in a region where there is a post office, I would say that that is three cents. The cost of a forward letter, which has to go to another post office, is four cents.

Mr. FRASER: This was right in the city, from one post office to another.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I do not know the exact situation in Peterborough, but I shall ask the superintendent to make a report. I would be surprised if what the hon. member calls a sub-post office is really a sub-post office as we understand it in the department. It must be another post office serving another region.

Mr. FRASER: I am referring to sub-office No. 1, which is situated right in Peterborough.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I will make inquiries.

Mr. FRASER: Will the minister answer the other question about the envelopes?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We are trying to settle that question, because the suggestion was made to us at the conference. It would be difficult to have a fixed and drastic rule, but we are trying to work it out by making arrangements with the manufacturers of envelopes.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I hesitate to enter into a profound discussion like the one we have had this evening, but I shall do my best. I was particularly interested in the remarks of the hon. members for Broadview and Davenport of the city of Toronto who referred to the mail service there. I should like to point out that, apart from the north pole, I think my riding has probably the slowest service of any riding in Canada. On the west coast of Vancouver island it is desperate. The minimum time for an ordinary first-class letter is six days, while the maximum will run as high as sixteen days. Is there any possibility of the minister allowing members of parliament the privilege of franking their letters for air mail when it is going a thousand miles or more from Ottawa? The electors of Comox-Alberni and other British Columbia ridings, and those in other constituencies far away, are entitled to a more rapid service. I would appreciate it if the minister would give this matter consideration.

Mr. JAENICKE: The matter I wish to bring to the attention of the minister is related to the question raised by the hon. member for Wentworth who referred to the cancellation of the war bonus paid to rural mail carriers. I should like to refer to what are known as mail couriers; that is, the persons who carry the mail from the post office to the train and from the train to the post office. Their contract does not amount to very much, but I understand that recently they received notice that the war bonus was to be cancelled and that the contract would be renewed only on the basis of the figure that prevailed before the war. Most of these mail couriers are old veterans and the amounts they receive are not large. Many of them have no other income, and I think the minister should continue the bonus at least for the time being. I should like to ask whether these mail couriers are in the same position as the rural mail carriers?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes.

Mr. FULTON: I should like to inquire about the policy of the post office with respect to the use of the mails by charitable and other organizations in connection with puzzle contests. Many communities are endeavouring to raise funds for memorial centres by means of puzzle contests. The Post Office Department has ruled, I believe as of February 15, that the mails cannot be used for this purpose. The result is that in some cases those conducting the contest are unable to reply to entrants and they are now being branded as dishonest. I understand that this action is being taken in order to safeguard the public against institutions that might be working dishonestly. Apparently the Post Office Department have decided that, whether or not a contest is actually illegal, if an attempt is made to mislead the public they rule that it is matter which cannot use the mails.

I suggest that this decision ought to be left to the courts. If it is government policy that people are to be protected from illegal contests, then I submit that they should go to the courts to decide whether or not a contest is illegal instead of trying to do through the post office regulations what apparently they feel they cannot do under other legislation. As I say, many of these institutions have lost potential money and certainly their reputation has been injured. Would the minister consider revising that rule?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The hon. member is referring to the Kamloops recreation centre, or something like that?

Mr. FULTON: That occasioned my question, but I was referring to the matter in a general way.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): In the Post Office Act there is a section which prohibits the use of the mails for lotteries. I must admit that probably we are unable to stop all lotteries immediately they start; sometimes it takes a few weeks and sometimes we do not know that the mails are being used for a lottery. In the last year or so these lotteries have increased tremendously and many complaints have been received from all parts of Canada. I was obliged to make a public announcement in the newspapers about a week or two ago notifying the public that we could not allow the use of the mails for lotteries. We stopped all mail and returned it to the point of mailing. We have been asked by some of these people to give them the letters rather than return them to the senders, but we could not do that because the section is mandatory and we have to obey the law. The gentleman in charge of the Kamloops recreation centre saw me and the officials of the department, and when he left he told us he was satisfied that he could not keep on with what he had been doing.

Mr. FULTON: Admittedly there is power under the Post Office Act in so far as lotteries are concerned. I discussed the matter with the deputy minister, and I am quite satisfied that there is power to rule against an organization running a lottery. My point is that if it is not a lottery, if it is not a game of chance, there is no such power.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): If it is a game of chance it is a lottery.

Mr. FULTON: If the Post Office Department receives a complaint that there is a lottery, that there is something illegal about the contest, then I suggest that, instead of using that arbitrary power in cases of doubt, it should advise the complainant to take the matter to the courts. If it is an illegal contest or gambling game there are statutes prohibiting that sort of thing and the case can be settled in the courts. It seems to me that the Post Office Department is in danger of using one of these regulations for a purpose never intended; that is, to stop games of skill or chance. I am glad to say that the deputy postmaster general advised me that there was nothing dishonest about this puzzle contest, and I presume he is still of the same opinion. But I am not basing my position on an individual case, because I do not think that individual cases should be made the subject of appeals across the floor of the house. But a principle is involved, and inasmuch as many of these contests may be conducted perfectly honestly and without breaking any of the laws of the country I am suggesting to the Postmaster General that he advise his complainants that if they think there is anything illegal about it there are courts provided for the purpose and he should not enforce a regulation which deprives many communities of funds for useful purposes.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I do not think we did anything that was arbitrary. I must tell the hon. gentleman that I was crown prosecutor in Montreal for seventeen years and I have seen a lot of these things. We will never stop the mails when they are carrying something which is not contrary to the Post Office Act. Of course I do not agree with the hon. member in his opinion about this particular case. There is no doubt at all in my mind that it was a lottery.

Mr. McIVOR: I think the minister is to be commended for not allowing the mails of Canada to be used for sweepstakes or lotteries. I know that the opposition will support him in this because they do not believe in spending a dollar to take a chance on winning several thousand. The minister should feel that the House of Commons is behind him in this, and that a big section of this country will not tolerate lotteries or anything of that sort.

Mr. HARKNESS: For some considerable time past I have had a certain amount of correspondence from the federated association of letter carriers in Calgary. I think the Postmaster General will be relieved to know that I am not going to ask for a new post office or anything like that. During the recess I met a considerable number of these men at their request and found them a most conscientious and earnest group of men who seem to be troubled over certain matters which they were anxious to have brought to the attention of the Postmaster General and parliament. Accordingly I have a few questions to direct to the Postmaster General. First is the matter of retirement of men who have already expressed a wish to retire, provided that superannuation is available for them. This whole subject became a live one amongst them because of a notice which was posted up in the Calgary post office on February 22, 1945, which read:

With a view to creating positions in the postal service for returned soldiers the department is desirous of ascertaining the number of vacancies which will be created in the near future. While permanent employees are at present required to furnish schedule "J" before they can be retired on superannuation, there is a possibility that some changes may shortly be made in the regulations.

Will all employees who would be interested under these conditions please submit a written request to me at the earliest possible moment?

I would ask the Postmaster General whether any action has been taken with regard to that matter. Apparently up to April of this year nothing further had been done. The notice had been posted up and the men's minds were considerably perturbed. Some put in a request for retirement and others were wondering whether to do so or not. May I have an answer from the minister stating just what the position is now?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): That was done before my time but I suppose I am responsible. It was exploratory. We wanted to know if it was worth while passing any regulation about it. Very few answered, according to my information, and it did not materialize in any rule or regulation of any kind.

Mr. HARKNESS: I take it that nothing further has been done about the matter. Have those who put in their application been told whether they would be retired on superannuation, or have they not?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I cannot say at the moment. I will look into the matter.

Mr. HARKNESS: The next question is as to hours of duty. I do not know anything about the hours of duty in the post office; but, so far as I can make out, the position of these men was this. The tour of duty in the postal service is at present on the basis of eight hours a day, while the rest of the civil service enjoys a six and one-half hour day. Their contention is that, as part of the civil service, their tour of duty should be on the same basis, namely, six and one-half hours a day. I do not know whether that is a practical request or whether it could be readily put into execution, but it does seem a bit out of line that these men comprise the only large group in the civil service which works an eight-hour day as compared with six and a half hours for the rest of the service.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): They get higher pay, which is not to be forgotten, than do those who are working a fewer number of hours. They also get a larger increase than the others. Most of them got the maximum increase.

Mr. HARKNESS: What is the rate of pay of these letter carriers? I have never understood that it was particularly good.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): They start at $1,320 and go up to $1,800, plus the cost of living bonus.

Mr. HARKNESS: Another matter on their minds is the present system of ninty per cent permanent and ten per cent temporary appointments. Apparently the system used to be that 100 per cent of the appointments would be permanent. I understand that that was done away with; I do not know how long ago. Now ninety per cent are permanents and ten per cent temporaries, and the temporaries do not receive as much pay and are not eligible for superannuation benefits. Is that rule still in effect, and, if so, how long is it to be kept in effect? Or is it a permanent regulation?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): During the war we were not allowed to make permanent appointments. We had to take on temporaries because we wanted to replace these men by returned soldiers. Some employees in certain categories were made permanent. But we keep at least ten per cent as a cushion for an increase of work. In most of the post offices the work fluctuates according to the period of the year, and it has always been the practice to keep a cushion to meet changes in the amount of work.

Mr. HARKNESS: I hardly think that is a satisfactory explanation. I know of at least one case of a man at Calgary who has been on the temporary staff for twelve or fifteen years.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): He may not have passed the examinations. To be permanent one has to pass the required examinations, and some of these men have not done so.

Mr. HARKNESS: There is no question of his not having passed the examination. He has been on the job, but he has not been able to enjoy the benefits of permanency in spite of the fact that he has been working there for twelve to fifteen years. It seems to me that a system like that is a poor one, and calculated to break down the morale of the employee.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): If the hon. gentleman will give me the name of this person I will look into the case and give him a direct answer.

Mr. HARKNESS: It is a system which should be done away with. If a man is doing a particular job he should be put in that job and enjoy the pay and status of that job, and if he is not able to do it, get rid of him and engage somebody else. A man should not be kept hanging around in a position where more or less he does not know what the score is or what is going to happen to him.

The only other point I wish to mention is connected with statutory holidays, which apparently, so far as post office employees are concerned, were cancelled shortly after the commencement of the war. I should like to know whether those statutory holidays have been restored to these men, and, if not, when they will be.

Mr. MARTIN: They have been.

Mr. HARKNESS: I want, if I can, to get an answer to this question.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I want to say a word about this debate. I think it is time we knew where we stand. I heard last week in this house nothing but the cry, with which I have a lot of sympathy, for "economy, economy, economy". Now we have a different cry, for additional expenditures in regard to all the departments of government. We cannot reconcile these two things; and I think, if we are to finish this session in a reasonable time, we should get on with this work in a reasonable manner and conclude these debates.

Mr. HARKNESS: Mr. Chairman, I take objection to the remarks of the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There is no personal reflection.

Mr. HARKNESS: I was not in any instance calling for greater expenditure; I was presenting the complaints of a certain number of my constituents, which I consider it is my duty to do, in this house. I take strong exception to the minister making that an excuse for saying that I, or any other members of this party, have been talking economy in the past and are now talking with exactly the opposite effect.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I assure my hon. friend that there was no personal reflection.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I am sorry that I did not understand at once the last question of the hon. member. The holidays have now been restored.

Mr. HARKNESS: Thank you.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I should like to bring up a couple of questions at this time. They are not related, but in order to facilitate business I will put them together. This does not call for expenditure, either.

I am in much the same spot as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, in that I come from an area of the west coast which has poor facilities for the delivery of mail, namely Queen Charlotte island. There is a boat that goes in every ten days. The people cannot mail on the same boat the answers to the letters they receive, so that there is a lapse of twenty days between a letter being sent and answered. There is an aeroplane service in there now, but it is not on a scheduled basis. As I understand the rule regarding transport of mail, it must be done by aeroplanes on schedule, not just on charter work. But to all intents and purposes these aeroplanes are on a regular schedule, although not listed as such. The people at, say Massett, would like to have air mail now that aeroplanes are calling regularly there. I have no doubt that it would help the company which has inaugurated that service. But when one inquires of the department they say that there are certain regulations which the air transport authorities demand, that the service be in operation six months, and so on and so forth. We are under an economy of private enterprise where we have "get and go". I should like to see that maxim applied to the Post Office Department. Cannot they brush away the red tape in a special case in an isolated area? Granted that you must have a lot of red tape in highly congested areas where there are transcontinental lines and other facilities, here you have an isolated area which should not be subject to the general rule. I hope the department will look into the matter and cut the red tape, so that these planes can pack mail up to these people at Queen Charlotte, Massett and Port Clements.

I should also like to bring to the attention of the minister the problem of the people of Atlin. I am not going to ask him to spend any money, but this is a case of a few nails. They have a building there, but it is not adequate for the purpose. There is very little standing space in the post office, and they have to stand outside in the winter time while their mail is being sorted, but there would be plenty of space in the post office if the wickets were moved back. There is an old Indian office which is not in use that could be made into a general waiting room for these people, so that they could stay inside and be comfortable in the winter weather. Outside, the sidewalk slants into the post office, and there is a pool of water there; they have to be regular puddle jumpers to get in, and if there was just a shanty roof put over it, it would save a good deal of wet feet and so on which is very hard on elderly people. I hope the minister will give consideration to these two matters.

[Mr. Archibald.]

Mr. HANSELL: I appreciate the remarks of the Minister of Veterans Affairs in wanting to get on with the business of the house, but I understand it is the business of the house to debate these matters, even though after we have spoken we do not convince anybody; and that is not personal either. The minister has a habit of hitting a person in the solar plexus and then saying, "Nothing personal; nothing personal about that!"

I want to ask one question, and then you can pass all the post office estimates that you want. The minister was talking some little while ago about rates for overseas parcels. I am not so much concerned about the rates, but the weight of these parcels is limited to eleven pounds each, and of those eleven pounds there is a limit of seven pounds of food. I could never see why that should be. The people in England particularly are in need of food; yet when we wrap up a parcel, in order to get full advantage of the eleven pounds we have to stuff it with a lot of other things because we are not allowed to send eleven pounds of food. Could the minister not change that regulation a little? Then, I believe they are allowed only one parcel a month. There are ways of getting around this, by sending one parcel to your sister and another to your brother and another to your grandmother; but why is each person allowed only one parcel a month?

I have one more question. Has the minister ever given any consideration to the subject of anonymous letters passing through the mails? I do not know what he can do about them; but may I go so far as to suggest that if it were made a criminal offence, perhaps people would not take the chance in sending anonymous letters through the mails. I always assume that when letters are sent anonymously there is mischief somewhere, and if something could be done to curb that practice it would be a good thing. But I am particularly interested in the matter of food for people in England.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I explained a few minutes ago that the limitation of food to seven pounds per parcel and the limitation of one parcel per month are restrictions imposed by the receiving nation. None of these restrictions is imposed by us, and since we are sending the parcels we have to abide by the rules which are imposed on us; otherwise they would not be delivered.

Mr. HANSELL: Then the receiving nations should change their rules.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I believe as the hon. gentleman does, but the receiving nations do not.

Mr. STOKES: Under the heading "departmental administration", there are one or two questions I should like to ask the minister. I do so with some fear and trembling because of the humour expressed a few moments ago by the leader of the house. I wish to compliment the Postmaster General on the reply which he gave earlier to the hon. member for Kootenay West, when he said that so far as he was concerned veterans would have preference in post office matters. I compliment him because, since I came into the house a few years ago, I remember an instance in my county when two fine veterans of the first war applied for a post office position, and a young man who had never seen service got the office. It was something of which I was ashamed to speak.

The matter to which I wish to refer specifically has to do with thickly populated suburban areas outside a city which has a letter carrier service. The area is adjacent to the city but not within its municipal boundaries. The people in that area have to go a long way to the post office. In the one instance I have in mind one rural route goes through the area. Since the population is growing, there is a demand for some service. What is the governing factor in that regard?

Another matter to which I wish to refer is the extension of rural routes. Frequently we find a good class of farmer or two living up a road which would be called a dead-end, which means that if the courier went up he would have to retrace his steps. These people are retepayers and are just as much entitled to postal service as the other people. It is quite a hardship for them to come out and get their mail. Perhaps they may get a letter which requires a reply. They have to go back before the man returns the next day; they cannot stand on the corner waiting. These are matters of policy on which I should like to have the minister's opinion.

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex-East): I wish to comment a little on the work of the post office. I listened with interest to the discussion on the postage stamps. I was going to commend the minister for doing uphill work with a downhill plough.

I also wish to comment on the extension of rural routes. In my riding I have an application for the extension of a route, but most of the people live within a half mile of an already established route, and while there were seventeen within the half mile the route could not be extended which seems too bad.

Then there is the question of drop letters. In London, for instance, a drop letter is delivered for three cents. Many people in London mail a letter thinking that, because it is in London, it will be delivered for three cents; but when the farmer out on the rural route gets it he has to pay two cents more for it. I think that might well be changed. I also appreciate what will be done with regard to the wartime bonus for rural mail carriers.

Mr. HAZEN: May I revert for a moment to the new issue of stamps? How were the designs selected? Who made the designs? Were a number of designs submitted and considered and then a choice made? I ask these questions because I am one of those people who are critical of the designs which appear on our Canadian stamps. If you compare the designs of the Canadian stamps of the past number of years with the designs of some of the stamps of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick prior to confederation, or some of the other provinces prior to confederation, or if you compare the designs of our present-day stamps with some of the designs of the Canadian stamps after confederation you will find that really they are not comparable. They do not compare in design, in colour or in texture. It seems to me that more consideration might be given to the designs of our Canadian stamps in order to make them more artistic and more effective.

I do not know whether it is a good plan to have designs depicting different parts of Canada. Some complaint has been made about that this evening. Some complaint has been made that there was no design for Nova Scotia or New Brunswick. I am not going to harp on that this evening. It seems to me that perhaps we might show more imagination or more vision if we are to depict these regional designs. We might perhaps very well picture the future developments of our provinces. So far as New Brunswick and Nova Scotia are concerned, the minister might put on one of these stamps a design showing the new Chibucto canal which I presume is to be built before very long, or the power development on the Petitcodiac river or the new—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Canso ferry.

Mr. MICHAUD: Canso bridge.

Mr. HAZEN: Or the new airport at Clover Valley, near Saint John, which I understand is to be constructed before very long. Another good design would be one depicting the free port which will be established at the port of Saint John in the near future.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I must admit that the hon. member for St. John-Albert has a good imagination, but if we were making these designs we might be told by the Canadian people that we were discounting the future too much.

With regard to the designs, they were made by our officials. I must tell the hon. gentleman that among the philatelists our stamps are considered the best in the world.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not agree with them.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Well, I shall give the hon. gentleman an example. Recently the collection of the late President Roosevelt was put up for sale by a broker in New York and the stamp which brought the largest amount of money was a Canadian stamp which was issued during the war. It brought $1,167 out of a collection which sold for over $227,000. I give that to the hon. gentlemen as an example, and if I hold my present position for very long I shall probably be able to give him other examples.

Mr. FULTON: It is interesting to note that as a rule the thing which makes a stamp valuable is that there is something wrong with it. I am not sure that it is a good thing to say that the Canadian stamps are the most valuable in the world. Does the Postmaster General know what was wrong with this particular stamp?

Mr. JACKMAN: Reverting from new stamps to old ones, may I ask the minister what was the total revenue of the philatelic division during the last fiscal year? What was the cost of operating it? If the minister has these figures I should like to have them. There are several other questions I should like to ask later.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I shall have those figures in a moment.

Mr. JACKMAN: Very well. Then, may I ask the minister a more important question. Of the total number of employees of the Post Office Department, what percentage is temporary? I ask this question because I should like some information in regard to this policy of the Post Office Department, and I believe some other government departments, of keeping ten per cent of the employees on a temporary basis instead of giving them permanent places. I wish to follow that question with one as to the number of permanent appointments made in the Post Office Department during the last fiscal year. While his deputies are obtaining that information, I wonder if the minister could tell the committee just how severe the fluctuations are in the revenues of the Post Office Department. Do they fluctuate pretty well with the national income of the country, or is there a relatively steady flow of revenue to his department? If the fluctuation is not severe I should think the ordinary mortality and retirement rate would allow for men who have served for three or, at the most, five years having their positions made permanent.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The revenue does fluctuate, at least to a certain extent. In the Post Office Department we have a barometer of business in Canada which is recognized as pretty good and sound. It is the total of the money orders and postal notes sold each year. I may tell the hon. gentleman that this year we have the highest amount in our history. These postal notes and money orders are sent by people who do not ordinarily send cheques; that is, the small people, and this year that total is $498,000,000. In the years of the depression it fluctuated a great deal, I understand. The money we received for mail transit last year increased quite considerably also, owing to the fact that there is more international correspondence. So that there are a number of factors which make the revenue fluctuate quite a bit.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Brandon): In regard to the question of sending parcels overseas. I was told only yesterday by a thoroughly reliable source that an 11-pound parcel sent to Greece from Canada requires the payment of $3.10, but if it is sent from the United States the charge is only half that much, or $1.55. An air mail letter from Canada to Greece costs sixty cents; from the United States it costs from twenty to thirty cents. We have all heard of the dire shortage of food in Greece, where the need is perhaps as great as or greater than in any other part of the world, and I believe that some steps might very well be taken to make it easier and cheaper for the sons of Greece in this country to send food to their starving relatives at home. If my information be correct, as I believe it is, I suggest that the department, which I have always found ready to act on what they believed to be reasonable suggestions, might look into this matter and see if it cannot be corrected.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I do not question the statement made by the hon. gentleman. The United States have direct lines ploughing the ocean between Greece and their seaports. We have not, so that we have to pay for the transit, which they do not have to do.

Mr. BRACKEN: What is the policy of the department with respect to the construction of new post offices? I gather that at the moment you are not doing much at it?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): No.

Mr. BRACKEN: In the estimates before us I see nothing for capital expenditures. What is the policy of the department with respect to the construction of new post offices?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The expenditure on buildings is, of course, made by the Department of Public Works. We requisition them and they build the post offices for us. We have established a rule, which is not inflexible, that we would construct post offices in towns having a net revenue of $10,000 or more; and as soon as we start building those we shall begin with the largest towns or cities and work down. That is our rule to-day, to build only where the net revenue is $10,000 or more.

I must answer the question asked by the hon. member for Rosedale in regard to the revenue of the philatelic service. For the year 1945 the number of orders received was 1,873, which brought a total of $142,740.

Mr. BRACKEN: The Postmaster General says the Department of Public Works constructs the post offices. I presume they do so at the request or on the recommendation of the Post Office Department?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: Are you planning on building any post offices this fiscal year?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): A few, in places where it is absolutely necessary. Those amounts will be provided in the supplementary estimates of the Department of Public Works. I hope hon. members will understand that if they ask me questions in regard to post offices that are not very large I may not be able to answer them until I get the particulars from the officials of my department. I have in mind particularly post offices like the one mentioned by an hon. member from British Columbia. Every time a matter of this kind is brought to our attention we ask for a report from the superintendent of the district, and if the building is not what it should be we see that better service is given, especially where the postmaster has to furnish the premises.

Mr. BRACKEN: Would the minister be prepared to say, perhaps at a later time, the amount of business done at Flin Flon, Manitoba?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes, I have that now. For the fiscal year 1944-45, which are the latest figures we have, the revenue was $32,667.

Mr. BRACKEN: Then, under the policy of the department that town would be in line for the construction of a post office, as soon as you commence construction on any scale?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes. We have a list of those places, and I remember that Flin Flon is on the list.

Mr. BRACKEN: The reason I ask is that for twenty years it was in the constituency I represented. They have made representations to me to see that their position is kept before the department. It is a city of ten thousand, doing a business of $30,000 a year, and the post office is still in very small, rented quarters. They tell me that place is in what the department calls a class A district. I presume they have districts classed as A, B, C and so on, and that class A means the class of towns which will be first to have buildings constructed when you decide to go ahead with them. Is that right?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): That is correct.

Mr. CAMPBELL: During the war there have not been many extensions of rural routes. It seems to me the department should now consider extending rural routes into districts where they are badly needed. I hope the minister will give encouragement to the doing of this work.

How are revenue postmasters appointed? Are they appointed by the civil service commission? Is there any way of getting superannuation for postmasters who have given many years of service?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Revenue postmasters in offices making more than $3,000 in revenue are appointed by the civil service commission. Under that amount they are appointed upon recommendation. In every instance where there is a returned man we are giving preference to him, if he wants the job.

Mr. BURTON: You are supposed to.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We always do.

Mr. BURTON: I know cases where, not many years ago, that did not happen.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): That was "not many years ago".

Mr. CAMPBELL: Has the department considered any scheme for providing superannuation for the postmasters in smaller post offices?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): This is a matter of policy which is being discussed to-day by the association of revenue postmasters. I do not know how it could be done. I understand that it would be difficult of accomplishment, but the question is being studied.

Mr. WARREN: It is only on rare occasions that I bring to the floor of the house problems concerning my constituency. During this question period, however, there are two or three matters I should like to bring to the attention of the Postmaster General. The first of these is the need for additional letter carriers in the town of Pembroke. I am asking the Postmaster General to look into the situation there with a view to rectifying what I think is a grievance.

Then, has the minister up to this point given any consideration to taking care of people living on side-lines on which perhaps only two families live? I have always been confronted with the ruling that in order to have an extension there must be at least three families on three-quarters of a mile.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I said a few minutes ago that we were asking to have four families per mile, or one-quarter of a mile per family. Hon. members will realize that we cannot deliver rural mail in a place, for instance, where there might be only one family in three miles. That would cost too much. In such instances we ask the persons affected to come to a point near at hand where the rural mail passes, and to have their box at that point so that they can be served.

I shall look into the facts concerning Pembroke. The hon. member will understand that we give a letter-carrier service to towns with a revenue of $40,000 or more. If the hon. member wishes to set the facts out in a letter to me I shall be pleased to look into the matter.

Mr. WARREN: In my constituency there are numerous cases of side-lines where perhaps only two families live, the nearest of which might be within half a mile of the corner. However it is a considerable hardship for those people to have to walk to that corner in all kinds of weather and to have to wait for the mailman. The mailman is not always on time.

Now that the war is over, I believe it would not be unreasonable to ask the Postmaster General to give relief in cases of that kind. I have numerous ceases which would fall into this class in my constituency. They have been getting their mail under these conditions through all these years, and their annoyance is growing all the time. The idea of having to walk half a mile through the snow or rain for their mail, when their neighbours have their mail delivered to their gates, does not appeal to them. After all, it is not so long ago that rural mail delivery was introduced, and I should think the time has come to extend the service. I suggest that this matter might be given most serious consideration so as to help these people who must endure considerable hardship in getting their mail.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question? I have been trying all night to do so, and I want to go home. Did I understand the minister to say that some small town in Manitoba is going to have a post office before Chilliwack gets one? Chilliwack has a revenue of $88,000, and it has the poorest service given in any post office on the North American continent. We have been endeavouring to get action from the minister's department for more than a year. I might add that the constituency is the best in Canada.

Despite our efforts to get action from the department, we have got absolutely nothing but a lot of very nice letters—which do not deliver the mail. The people have to stand in queues for three hours to get their mail in a post office bringing in a revenue of $88,000. We are told we cannot use the basement of the building because of something that happened many years ago in connection with the introduction of a stamp. And, by the way, I do not want a stamp, with the picture of a peach on it, or anything else. All I want is service for the post office. If the minister cannot answer to-night, I am not in a hurry. There is no hurry now to get the estimate through; we have been waiting all day. The minister knows all about the situation at Chilliwack.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): This is a place which is on the list, and which will be taken into serious consideration.

Mr. MacINNIS: Earlier in the evening when a question was asked about rural mail carriers I believe the minister answered that sometimes when tenders were called the lowest tender was less than the work could be done for. Under those circumstances, what is the policy of the department?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We know from experience that some tenderers are not going to make much money. But with the law as it is to-day, if the person who tenders is able and has the necessary apparatus, horses, automobiles or trucks to fulfil his contract, we have to give it to him. There is nothing in the law giving us discretion to eliminate the lowest tenderer.

Mr. MacINNIS: But in a case where obviously the tenderer cannot fulfil the contract, and representations are made to the Post Office Department, how is the matter dealt with?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We advertise for new contracts.

Mr. BENTLEY: I should like to ask a question of the minister, and before doing so I want to tell him that I am not going to ask for anything on a stamp, not even the C.C.F. insignia. In reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Renfrew North, the minister said that a post office would require to have $40,000 a year revenue or more to warrant a mail-carrier service. In the important city of Swift Current in southwestern Saskatchewan the revenue is over $40,000 a year, and has been over that point for many years, and yet we have no mail-carrier service. It is not because we have not asked for it. A plebiscite was held in the town and the people asked for it. The Legion branch has asked for it in order that three or four men might be given work in performing a useful service for the city. Since we have a revenue of $40,000 and over, I should like to know what other reason there is for our not having this service.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): When I said that we were giving carrier service to towns that had a revenue of $40,000 or more I did not mention that there are other conditions to be considered. A town must have at least 2,000 points of call because it takes that many to keep two or three letter carriers busy. I would not say that there should be a sidewalk for every foot over which a letter carrier would walk, but we do ask that the letter carrier be able to do his job without having to face possible illness owing to mud and water and so forth.

Mr. BENTLEY: Mud does not bother us a great deal. In the last survey it was found there were 1,600 points of call on sidewalks, and there were also some other points of call on cinder walks. Those walks do not get very muddy. The 1,600 points of call would keep a couple of men busy.

Mr. FLEMING: Mail leaving the parliamentary post office does not reach Toronto until the second day after mailing. I do not see why there should be any delay because mail is sent through the parliamentary post office.

Item agreed to.

262. Railway mail service, $13,299,000.

Mr. JAENICKE: Could the minister break down this item and tell us how much he is going to pay to each company, and the rate that was paid during the last fiscal year?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): In 1945-46 we paid the Canadian National $3,660,000, and the Canadian Pacific, $4,037,000; we paid other lines $413,000, and there is another item of $2,396, making a total of $8,113,598.

Mr. JAENICKE: Will the figure for this year be about the same?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The estimates for this year show a decrease of $1,352,279.

Mr. JAENICKE: Do you pay the same rate to the Canadian National as you pay to the Canadian Pacific?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes, exactly the same.

Item agreed to.

263. Air and land mail services, $18,571,767.

Mr. FULTON: What is the basic rate per mile for air mail?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): 1·5 mills per pound mile.

Mr. FULTON: What was the previous rate?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Forty-two cents per mile and we changed the base completely to a pound-mile base.

Mr. FULTON: I know of a firm which made application for an air route, but they were turned down, one reason being that they could not bid low enough to get an air-mail contract. This particular concern points out that when the T.C.A. first started operations the rate was nearly four times what it is to-day and the present rate makes it difficult for small concerns to get going. Apparently the T.C.A. received ·6 cents per mile throughout the first four years of its operations. At the present time companies other than the T.C.A. are receiving in the neighbourhood of ·5 cents per mile. Is there any distinction in the rates in British Columbia and other provinces?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am informed that there is none whatever.

Mr. FULTON: Will consideration be given to increasing the rate in view of the fact that apparently it took a ·5 rate for the T.C.A. to get going, whereas it is now ·15, which makes it difficult for these small lines to get going?

Mr. MACKENZIE: As acting Postmaster General I shall be glad to bring the representations made by my hon. friend to the attention of my colleague and I am sure they will receive every possible consideration.

Mr. BRYCE: I have one question to ask and I do not know whether I should have asked it of the last Postmaster General or the new one. Has consideration been given to providing an airmail service to Norway House, Berens River, Grand Rapids and Warrens Landing during the winter time? It is essential that this service be provided.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We are giving continuous and anxious and sustained consideration to the development of these routes.

Mr. FRASER: I am told that on many occasions rural mail has been held up because it sometimes takes half an hour to open the mail bags because the locks will not open. At times they have to use a hammer and a few cuss words to get them open.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That may be the fault of the receiver as well as the dispatcher.

Mr. FRASER: I wonder if the Postmaster General would check up on that and have the locks fixed.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I must tell the hon. gentleman that during the war we were unable to have bags made out of good cotton and we used almost anything we could find. There was a great increase in the mail during the war and we had difficulty in getting not only locks but everything that goes with the bags. The hon. gentleman will see that we are asking for quite a large amount of money this year to replace our stock of bags. I am not surprised that something might have happened because we had to take almost anything during the war.

Mr. FRASER: I worked on one of these locks for half an hour, and at last had to use a hammer and then got the bag open.

Mr. HARKNESS: In the railways and shipping committee when dealing with T.C.A. there was considerable questioning in connection with the rate which was paid by the post office to T.C.A. for air mail. T.C.A. seemed quite happy over the rate they are now getting, although it has been reduced from former years, because they are no longer under the thumb of the Post Office Department as to the flights they must make. Is the Post Office Department equally satisfied with the rate which they pay to T.C.A.? I have not the figures, but I understand that that rate is considerably in excess of the rate paid in the United States for air mail. I notice in the estimates that the total amount for airmail service is greater than the amount for railway mail service, although the distances are extremely disproportionate.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We have only one route, and that is east-west or west-east. The post office wanted to help T.C.A. establish itself when it was just starting up in Canada. Now it has passed that stage and we have made a contract on a pound-mile basis, which is the logical way of paying for air-mail service. We are paying a good price, one and a half mills per pound-mile, which is quite a lot. I must admit that it is more than is being paid for express and more than is paid for passengers. Passengers pay $6 for 200 pounds going 100 miles, which works out at about 3/10ths of a mill per pound-mile. We are paying for the air mail 1·5 mills per pound-mile. But that is on a decreasing scale. It comes down in four or five years at the end of the contract to ·9 mills. We are reducing our airmail payment by about $50,000 a month.

Mr. CAMPBELL: For the last two years we spent $350,000 a year on mail bags, and this year the expenditure is $650,000. Would the minister give us some idea of the number of bags purchased and the reason for this large increase in expenditure?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): During the war we could not manufacture or get any mail bags, and those conditions prevailed for five years, so that we did run short quite a bit. We have to replenish what we call our bank of bags. In Toronto alone during the Christmas season it takes 600,000 bags to handle the mail. Of course that is the largest post office we have in Canada.

Mr. MacINNIS: They believe in Santa Claus in Toronto.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We have to replenish our bank and the bags are then distributed amongst the post offices throughout Canada. Last year we had to send out some of the mail in empty flour bags. During the Christmas season we shipped thirty-five carloads of mail from Toronto and, as I said, it took 600,000 bags just for that city. We have asked for tenders from the different cotton mills, and the only company which accepted a contract to furnish us with 10,000 yards of cotton per week was the Dominion Textile company. It will take at least six months before we have the number of bags we would have in ordinary times.

Mr. CAMPBELL: How many yards of cotton does it take for a bag? That would give us some idea of how much a bag costs.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The bags cost about $2. We buy the bag, the lock and everything, and we have the bags manufactured by two different companies, one in Montreal and one in Toronto.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I am happy to be in agreement with the hon. member for Skeena for once when he brought up the subject of airmail service to the Queen Charlotte islands, which is relevant to conditions existing in my own riding. When I go to the Post Office Department I find a courteous minister and courteous assistants, but when you mention airmail service on some route where none is operating they look at you like a banker from whom you are trying to borrow money. I would point out to the minister that in providing an airmail service for these frontier points he is doing a great service for Canada, and I do not think we should penalize them to the extent we have in the past and expect them to put up with a lot of disabilities. Some help is needed from the dominion government. I should like the minister to give the assurance that negotiations are still proceeding with the Canadian Pacific and also with the charter lines that the hon. member for Skeena mentioned.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We are negotiating with these companies.

Item agreed to.

Pensions and Other Benefits—

265. To provide for the payment of compassionate allowances to employees injured while in the performance of their duties, or to other persons injured while performing duties in any way connected with the postal service, or in protecting His Majesty's mails, or to the dependents of such employees or other persons who may be killed while so engaged; payments to be made only on the specific authority of the governor in council, $5,000.

Mr. MacINNIS: Will the minister explain this item? I ask for an explanation because the amount is so insignificant in view of the large number of employees in the Post Office Department. Would the minister also say whether the employees of the Post Office Department come under the Government Employees Compensation Act?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes, they do.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Chief architect's branch—

294. Public buildings generally—repairs, alterations, fittings and improvements, $300,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think this item includes the building which seemed to be going by so quickly and which I wanted to catch as it went by. Are there any anticipated changes or improvements in the near future under contemplation by the government with respect to the buildings here?

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): Under this item, which is a general vote, estimates are made and contracts are let. It will be seen that this year there is an increase of $100,000 as compared with last year. This is the first year after the war and we have added an amount for repairs and maintenance.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does this apply to the parliament buildings?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): No, not this item.

Mr. BRACKEN: Where in these estimates is the item for post offices?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): They are pretty much all along. It is under "public buildings"; we have passed a good many of them as we went along this evening, and I was surprised that I did not get more requests, but really this year it has been the policy of the government not to put up new post offices. In certain instances we may acquire sites for future post offices, but it was represented to the Department of Public Works that the government wanted to keep all the materials we had for construction of housing, and we have taken a back seat this year and did not recommend any construction, so that the government's housing programme can be proceeded with. Next year we hope we shall have some new buildings. We know the state in which some of our buildings are right now; we know that new buildings are needed in many places. We admit that. But we thought the first priority should go to housing, particularly housing for veterans.

Mr. BRACKEN: Is the minister saying that there is no provision in his estimates for the construction of new post offices in this fiscal year?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Well, I would not know exactly. I have in mind right now only one case where we may let the contract this year, and that would be at Sault Ste. Marie. We are acquiring the site now and preparing the plans and having specifications made, and that will not be only for a post office; it will be a general public building. I was out there myself to make a personal inquiry, and I find that a building is needed not only for postal services but for all the government services we have in the district. We are repairing a good many post offices this year, but I do not believe that any contract for new construction will be let during the fiscal year. As I have said, we shall acquire sites and prepare plans, but as to actual construction I do not suppose that before next spring we can get materials. I have in mind an instance where we gave out a contract, not for a building, but for a wharf, and we could not even get timber to proceed with that work at this time.

Mr. BRACKEN: Before the last items of the minister's estimates are passed, will he give us a definite statement as to what post offices, if any, he contemplates building this year? He has said, practically none. What sites has he purchased, expecting to build immediately, and what post offices has he plans for constructing?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): If my hon. friend will refer to pages 34 and following of the estimates he will see that, in Nova Scotia, we have at Halifax a postal station, North End, $25,000, and a Halifax office building, revote last year $50,000, total $100,000. All this work will not be done during the current year, and it is only a partial vote; it is not a complete vote for the whole building. In New Brunswick, there is Saint John, office building, revote of $50,000 from last year to this year; Saint John post office, alterations, and Sussex public building, $15,000 et cetera. As you go over the list you will find every item as to which expenses will be made this year, on pages 34 to 38 inclusive and part of page 39. Everything is there, and I cannot go farther than is mentioned on these pages in these items.

Mr. BRACKEN: The hon. member has said that in some cases this is a revote of moneys appropriated last year. How are we to know whether this is just a figure in a book this year, or whether it is to be a post office?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): It is all mentioned. As to going ahead, the session last year closed on December 16, if I recall well, and the votes which were passed at that time could not be expended on account of the late season. We now have the revote in these estimates; but part of that money may have been spent in preparing the plans and specifications.

Mr. BRACKEN: Then the minister does expect to spend all the money for which he is now asking for these purposes in this fiscal year?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I cannot even go as far as that, because I cannot tell right now if, even with the projects we contemplate, we shall have the necessary materials to proceed. We may not expend all the money that is asked for in these items: it will depend on the supply of labour and materials.

Mr. CHURCH: Under item 294, public buildings, I want to ask the minister what he intends to do to improve these facilities in our city. If we take into consideration the revenue the department derives, something better might be expected. The various departments of government are scattered over a distance of seven or eight miles, and there seems to be no way of finding out how to get in touch with them by telephone. I have tried for many hours to locate particular offices for which I was looking. There should be a general public building. The need of such a provision in our city is urgent. The offices are old and dilapidated. Surely, with the revenues obtained by the post office we should have some new equipment, because business men are complaining that they cannot find offices which, like the income tax branch, are spread all over the city. Contrast this with any of the public utilities. The Bell Telephone, the gas company and all these other corporations provide fine offices for the convenience of the public. I can tell you, although the Minister of Veterans Affairs may smile, that it is not good enough. The business men of the country are kicking, and I should like to know if there is to be an improvement.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

NATIONAL FLAG

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Has the government ordered any flags of the design recommended by the Joint Special Committee to select a Canadian flag?

2. If so (a) when; (b) from whom; (c) in what quantity; (d) of what size; (e) at what price, and (f) under what authority?

3. What is the delivery date of such flags?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. No.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

INCOME TAX—MARRIED COUPLES AND SINGLE PERSONS IN CERTAIN BRACKETS

Mr. McCUAIG:

1. What is the number of married couples in Canada receiving an income of $1,500 or less?

2. What is the number of single persons receiving $750 or less?

Mr. MacKINNON:

1. Normal wage-earner families, by earnings group of head, for Canada, 1941 census:

Earnings group	Number
Total	1,214,858
—$1,450	824,871
$1,450+	373,713
Not given	16,274

Note: This includes only the earnings of the head.

2. Single wage-earners, by earnings group and sex, for Canada, 1941 census:

Earnings group	Total	Male	Female
Total	1,328,030	740,205	587,825
—$450	643,668	339,314	304,354

$950+	220,476	153,649	66,827
Not given	21,001	14,481	6,520

Note: Persons on active service on June 1, 1941, are not included in these tables.

H.M.C.S. DOCKYARD, HALIFAX—TRUCKS

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia):

1. How many trucks are in storage at H.M.C.S. Dockyard, Halifax?

2. How many trucks, if any, have been declared surplus from H.M.C.S. Dockyard, Halifax?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. Fifty-nine: all declared surplus and awaiting disposal by War Assets Corporation.

2. Seventy-four.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

HOUSING—VETERANS—MOOSE JAW

Mr. THATCHER:

1. What is the total cost to date of veterans homes built or being built in Moose Jaw?

2. What is the estimated final cost?

3. What proportion of this cost is being borne by the department?

4. What was the cost of A. Humphrey's 1A house?

5. Has a veteran who is purchasing one of these holdings the right to inquire into its cost?

6. Has the department decided to build additional veterans homes in Moose Jaw?

7. Will costs above $6,000 for each home which were incurred by the director be written off in accordance with the principle of the Act?

VETERANS LAND ACT—COMPARATIVE AVERAGE COST PER HOUSE

Mr. CRUICKSHANK:

1. What was the average cost per house built under the Veterans Land Act at Haney, Mission, Chilliwack, Kamloops, Edmonton and Ottawa for (a) lumber; (b) cement; (c) bricks; (d) electrical fittings; (e) plumbing; (f) supervision; (g) management fees; (h) overhead?

2. What was the average cost for land per holding?

3. What was the cost of construction per cubic foot?

EXPORTS OF PRIMARY PRODUCTS—EQUALIZATION PAYMENTS

Mr. WINKLER:

1. By years from 1939, how much was paid by farmers to the equalization fund of the Canadian Wheat Board on exports of oats and barley to the United States?

2. In the same years, was there any equalization payment by primary producers of mineral, forest and fishery products?

ARMED FORCES—RESIDENTS OF YUKON DISCHARGED IN VANCOUVER

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. Are members of the armed forces, residents of Yukon, on leave in Yukon, employed there preparatory to discharge, taken to Vancouver, British Columbia for discharge and then returned to Yukon?

2. If so, is this done at public expense?

3. What does it cost the public treasury to send such a man to Dawson, Yukon, to take him from there to Vancouver for discharge from the army and on discharge to return him to Dawson, Yukon?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

ARMY REJECTION OR MEDICAL DISCHARGES AT CAMP BORDEN

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

For a copy of all correspondence passing between the Department of National Defence, and/or the Department of Labour, and/or the Department of Justice, and between any one or more of said departments, since January, 1944, to date, in connection with the improper use of army rejection or medical discharges at Camp Borden, wherein one Arnold (also known as William Horrigan), allegedly along with one Bagley utilized army rejection or medical discharges which had been signed in blank by former Major J. A. Elliott, A.19, R.C.A.S.C.

PUBLIC HEALTH

INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TAKEN TO CONTROL INFANTILE PARALYSIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue, who I understand is Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that there is such widespread public concern over the large increase in the number of cases of infantile paralysis in certain sections of Canada, would the minister indicate to the house how the situation stands at present and what steps have been or can be taken in connection with the spread of the epidemic.

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare): I thank the hon. gentleman for having given notice of the question, and I may tell him the matter is being looked into. For the last day or two the acting deputy minister of health has been obtaining reports from the various provincial departments of health, and at a later date, probably by to-morrow, I shall be able to give a more complete answer to the question.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps the minister might indicate the number of cases reported so far and how they compare with the number in previous years when the epidemic was at its height in Canada.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RESTRICTION ON CARRYING OF CAMERAS BY VISITORS TO PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct a question to you, Mr. Speaker, if I may. In these days record numbers of tourists and visitors, from both within and without Canada, are going through the parliament buildings. From some of these has come the suggestion, rather than complaints, perhaps, that there be a relaxation of the wartime restriction on the carrying of cameras with which they may take pictures from the peace tower. There are two reasons why this might be done. In the first place there is considerable disappointment on the part of those who find they have to check their cameras at the door. In the second place the hard-working members of the staff are finding the inconvenience and burden much greater than normally is the case, because of the fact they have to undertake these checking arrangements as the tourists come in. I wonder if Your Honour would be good enough to look into the matter and see if something could not be done.

Mr. SPEAKER: The remarks of the hon. member have been noted with great interest, and will be given careful consideration.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

PREFERRING OF CHARGES AGAINST DOCTOR SHUGAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. J. McCUAIG (Maple Creek): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice. Has the government given consideration to the propriety of either preferring charges against Doctor Shugar or of reinstating him in the position formerly held by him in the government employ?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): The answer is yes. My information is that charges were laid against Doctor Shugar yesterday.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

APPRAISAL OF LANDS FOR VETERANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. B. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I have before me a letter from the district superintendent of the soldier settlement and Veterans Land Act in Alberta, from which I should like to quote the last paragraph:

> We have at the present time a large backlog of appraisals for veterans who have already been qualified and are awaiting establishment, and I regret that due to shortage of staff we are unable to make the appraisal you requested.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. It is a well known rule that questions on the orders of the day must be brief and to the point.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): This is an urgent matter. In view of the backlog of appraisals and the fact that veterans want to settle on the land, will the minister now tell the house whether he is increasing his staff so that appraisals may be expedited and veterans rehabilitated?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): My answer is that the staff will be increased according to the necessity of the occasion, and policy will be announced from time to time.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL

STATUTORY AUTHORITY FOR ORDERS IN COUNCIL PASSED UNDER WAR MEASURES ACT

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee on bill No. 195, respecting the control of the acquisition and disposition of foreign currency and the control of transactions involving foreign currency or non-residents.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Chairman, this is a bill of great importance and one which no one in the committee should vote for lightly, without consideration as to whether it needs modification. I propose at the outset to state my conclusions in the hope that I may thereby indicate a certain moderation, and perhaps get sympathetic consideration for the succeeding remarks I shall make.

I am not prepared to say that with the knowledge the government has there may not be a valid argument for the continuance of these powers, or some of them, for a period. But there are two points I wish to put before the committee the first of which has reference to the duration of the bill, which I hope very much the committee will agree to amend by putting a time limit on it. The second point I wish to bring to the attention of the committee is a matter which was put before the standing committee, and unsuccessfully, of trying to introduce at least some moderation, at least some beginning to a return to freedom which at the present time this bill entirely denies.

I wish to say a word about the importance of the bill. I put this particularly to supporters of the government; we should face the fact that we are trying slowly and painfully—and it is still doubtful whether successfully—to emerge from quasi-socialism with as large a measure of freedom as we can. Hon. gentlemen who sit to my immediate left will, I take it, favour this bill. But to them I should like to point out what was said the other day by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), something which I commend to all the members of his party. These were his words:

> We are not opposed to private enterprise, but we demand that private enterprise shall take the risks if it takes the rewards.

I think that is a fair statement; I would not take away one word from it. But I suggest to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that he might clarify the ideas of some other members of his party, notably the genial member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine), and the sometimes genial member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), because they seem to me constantly to use words which are entirely repugnant to the view expressed in the words I have just quoted of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

I believe it is worth saying this, because in my view the spirit in which we approach these things, particularly with the difficulties we are facing to-day, will be of great importance in the next few years. I resent more than I can say the remarks which I have heard in the house, remarks which were perhaps not made seriously, but which seem to indicate that any man who had been successful in private enterprise must have been either a hard, rapacious, overbearing man, or a crook. I am not saying this in respect of any particular person, nor do I suggest that those were the words used. But I do say that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has expressed a view in the matter which should be taken seriously by his supporters.

I suggest most earnestly that hon. members should consider carefully the powers given under this bill—rigid, uncontrolled, unlimited as they are. They should seriously consider whether it is necessary not only to give these powers, but to give them without any time limit. I had hoped, from the remarks of the Acting Minister of Finance when the bill was introduced, and when we passed second reading, that certainly he had an open mind on the subject of time. However, as I remember, he said later that the government had decided that it would leave the time unlimited.

As the acting minister has said, the government has decided, and I am never at all sure whether that means that the minister himself has decided, or whether the government has made the decision. However that is a detail which perhaps is none of our business. At any rate, that was the attitude the acting minister took.

I ask the committee to look at these powers, and the reasons for which they were granted originally, and then I ask hon. members to consider whether it is necessary that these powers be continued indefinitely and in an unlimited fashion.

The reason for asking these powers was, of course, the situation in which we found ourselves in 1939. Probably the basic reason was the expected flight of capital, particularly to the United States. After all, at that time Canada, a small country in point of population, was at war, whereas the United States, a large country was not at war. It would not have been surprising, therefore, if there had been a serious flight of capital, and I believe the use of these powers at that time was generally approved. I think the officials who exercised those powers exercised them with moderation, discrimination, sympathy and efficiency. I say that now so that nothing I may say later would seem to be a criticism of the way in which these powers were exercised.

I would say further that if ten years ago anyone had been asked to read this bill and to consider the powers it represents, he would have been horrified. He would have said, "Surely we have not come to that; surely we have not to give this board the power to search, the power to arrest, the power to make inquiries of all kinds, not by police officers, not by the ordinary officers of the crown but by agents of this board?" In war time we accepted that. I ask again, and I ask it as earnestly as I am capable of asking: Is it necessary to commit ourselves indefinitely to powers of that kind in a time which we call peace?

It is interesting to observe—this was frankly stated by the witness before the banking and commerce committee—that, as is natural, these powers were built up and based on inquiries and examinations made of the various foreign exchange control boards throughout the world. It is natural and to be expected that they would look at the German board among others. I am not criticizing that, but I suggest to members of this committee that it is worth recalling that it was powers just such as these which enabled Doctor Schacht to exercise the powers which he did. I suggest that when we consider these powers we should consider them as such. We should not consider them merely as powers which are exercised by amiable and pleasant gentlemen who have shown great discrimination and moderation in the use of them, but as powers which may not always be exercised by those same pleasant gentlemen, which may some time get into the hands of people we may not find so agreeable and so pleasant and who may find these powers most convenient for purposes of their own.

I want to make the point that there has been virtually no relaxation or diminution in peace time of the powers which were contained in the wartime act. If there are any changes, they are trivial and of no consequence.

Briefly, let us look at the powers. I will divide them into two groups. There is the power over ordinary current account transactions, and there is the power over capital account transactions. The power over current account transactions, that is to say ordinary buying and selling between Canada and other countries, I think it is fair to say has been exercised in the least oppressive manner. Apart from the fact of getting permission and having to fill out forms, this power has been operated with as little inconvenience as possible. The board has the power to scrutinize and approve every transaction. What it exercises this power for is to make sure that transactions are genuine. An illustration given in the committee was that the board would not approve a transaction where some one wanted to buy a motor car in United States, and where obviously the price being paid was an inordinate one, one which would indicate that it was really concealing the export of capital. If you are going to have power at all, it is reasonable to expect that it would have to be exercised in that way.

The second power is over capital account transactions. In capital account transactions we have reached the point where the expert authorities whom we have set up have full control. I believe in experts as much as anyone, but I should like to quote a little jingle I heard the other day. Experts should be used for advice and not for control; experts should be on tap and not on top.

I want to come back to the experts, for whom as individuals I have great respect. The experts now exercise not only economic judgment but moral judgment or quasi-moral judgment on what the citizens of this country are doing. Let me give an illustration. If I am a manufacturer in Canada and wish to invest money in the United States to build a factory, other things being equal, the permission is likely to be granted. If the hon. member for Lake Centre wishes to make an investment in some stocks in the United States, it is almost certain that permission will be refused. I said to the experts, "Does not that mean that you are really exercising moral judgment?" I said to them, "I am more sympathetic to the idea that the man who wishes to invest money in the United States, if it is for the purpose, let us say, of building a factory there, should be permitted to do so, but I do not know whether a man who wishes to invest money there may not be doing just as useful an act." I could not possibly be sure, but this board is set up and it has power to scrutinize such acts and to reach a conclusion. Again I ask hon. gentlemen to consider whether they wish to give an indefinite life to a bill which does that.

One more argument, in fact almost the greatest argument given by the witness before the committee, was that it was necessary to establish this control in order to carry out our obligations under Bretton Woods. That is a complicated and difficult question, and I do not propose to go into the details at the moment. I have tried to consider it as well as I can. I believe that view is a very narrow, limited and basically unsound view. If I understand Bretton Woods correctly, it is set up for the purpose of preventing depreciation in exchanges. My feeling is that our duty is to maintain stability and to argue that the foreign exchange control board is necessary merely for the purpose of carrying out our obligations under Bretton Woods is to me in principle unsound and untenable.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think he said that was only one of the reasons.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): With deference to the minister I want to say that I read the evidence the other day. I think it is correct to say that it was not stated to be the exclusive reason, but on reading the evidence I was surprised to find the extent to which it was based on that. My own feeling, for what it is worth is that a more basic reason is that probably our trade with the United States will be out of balance for the next months, and that at the present time until sterling is made convertible we are not able to settle our deficits in the United States with sterling balances.

In considering this question of financial control we are in danger of being lulled into a false sense of security. I think we are in great danger of not appreciating the importance of this bill. In the case of other departments I think we have clear evidence which will demonstrate that they hope that the controls will eventually be done away with. I think the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) has indicated that, although sometimes I feel that he is building up new controls almost as fast as the old ones are done away with; nevertheless many of the old ones have been done away with. I think the same can be said of other ministers. I think that is because those departments have had a larger admixture of ordinary business men who have returned to their old occupations, and probably that has hastened relaxation of controls.

I submit to the committee that there has been no sign whatever of any disposition on the part of the Department of Finance to relax controls. I further suggest, that if this bill stays on our statute books for five years it will just rivet tighter all these fetters which we accepted as necessary during the war. There is another reason, and I put this forward with great earnestness and with great respect to the experts. What are the experts? Let us consider what they are. Let me say again that I think they are useful people. Those of us who are not experts, who must rely perhaps only upon common sense, are helped by the advice of experts but, I think in the last analysis decisions have to be left to men of common sense, and we hope men of some experience. Happily the experts are always divided. You are never left entirely alone when you disagree with some of them.

Here we have a situation where these people have had almost unlimited power for seven years. I ask any man in this house if he thinks it would be easy after he had had unlimited power for seven years, power which he feels he has exercised well, when he is much more articulate in talking about matters of finance than other people, to give up any of those powers? He would not give up a tittle of them. I made the suggestion—I do not know whether there was any great merit in it—that there should be a kind of token of a beginning of the restoration of a little freedom. But I was told that it would spoil the pattern, it would spoil the picture; there would be a little blur somewhere. That is the only thing I could make out of it.

I have great respect for the experts, but I think there is great danger in this. Experts believe that they are always dealing with exact things. Some experts are. If you are an expert in nuclear physics you can pretty well predict what will happen, although at Bikini the experts were not entirely in agreement. Generally speaking, though, they can predict exactly what is going to happen. But I charge that we have experts in finance who believe that finance is an exact science and that you can predict exactly what is going to happen there. I suggest to members of the house who are practical common sense business men that that is perfect nonsense, because it leaves out our good old friend human nature. I suggest that not in any partisan way, because this is far too important a matter to put it on any partisan basis. I have the hope that we may still persuade the minister to put this on an annual basis so that we can have another look at it, and I shall suggest later the reasons which I hope may be convincing. If we cannot relax it this year, when are we going to relax it?

Shall we repeal the act? Will the government want that? No. These are things that are being put out of the sight of parliament so that parliament will have no chance to consider them further. I am not enough of an expert on procedure to know how it could come up again next year.

Mr. ABBOTT: By refusing to vote the appropriation.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): With due deference, we do not get very far along that line.

Mr. ABBOTT: And you do not try very hard when it comes to a vote.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That has not been a rewarding line of effort.

Now I want to say a word about the business community. I might be told that I am making a lot of fuss about nothing. The minister would not put it so crudely, but he might more delicately. He might fairly say: You are making a lot of fuss about this. But let us see what happened before the committee. Was the business community there to raise any questions? No; and I will tell you why they were not there—and this is perhaps the most important thing of all the important things that I have to say this morning. I will tell you why they were not there. First of all because business people do not like to come down here and say things that are unacceptable to the powers that be. The officials in the department have great power. I want to press that. I am not joking; I believe it with all my heart.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is an interesting observation, anyway.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I believe it is a true observation, which is much more important. Let us look at the facts. Our national income has doubled over ten years. Why? Because the dominion government was in business, because more than half our business was government business. Is there any mystery, then, in saying that people are a little shy of coming down here and saying things that governments do not like? Just examine the extent to which government is in business of all kinds, and see how much the income of business, even of the banks, depends on the good will of the government and of the governor of the Bank of Canada and the financial authorities. That is as true as we are standing here. That is the first thing.

The second thing—and I want to be frank about this and say that this is not so creditable to the business community—is that along with others it has been lulled into a false sense of security. They have a helpless feeling, if you like, and perhaps there may be some excuse for it. At any rate they were not here partly because they were afraid, and partly because —I say this in the hope that they may hear it—they have not considered this seriously enough. The third reason—and this is perhaps still less creditable to the business community, but I will say it because I am trying to be a witness to what I believe to be the truth—is that there are some people in the business community who have rather liked controls. I should like to quote to them what I quoted this morning from the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. Free enterprise, do not let us forget, in spite of all that has been said against it, has done remarkable things. Those who believe in it have to accept what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said. He said that if they are going to have the rewards, they must take the risks. I would reverse it and say that if they take the risks they must have some rewards. But at the present time a great many people are busy trying to arrange matters so that free enterprise cannot function, so that controls will damp it down.

Just let me repeat that. I want to say that if the business community were not here it was because they were afraid of this government's powers, and that is what power does. Those who exercise it, however sincere they may be, come to believe that ordinary people cannot look after their own affairs. I said to one of these experts, "It is really impossible for you to believe that ordinary people like ourselves can look after our own affairs." I am serious about that. If I had had that power for seven years I might feel as they do. They would have to jump out of their intellectual skins before they can believe we can carry on without their controls. They believe that they have greater wisdom and that they must tell us what to do.

An able lawyer made a remark to me that I think very interesting. He was a great cross-examiner and dialectician. He said, "You may think sometimes when I am examining business men that I am able to put questions about business that they cannot answer and make remarks about their own business which perhaps they could not make, and perhaps some people might get the idea that I knew more about their business than they did. But," he said, "I don't. A business man knows how to carry on his business. I only talk about it."

I come back and say that we have set up people over us who are highly articulate and who believe that finance is an exact science. They believe that ordinary people cannot be trusted to look after their own affairs. I know the minister has been a lawyer and a business man, and I submit to him that he cannot deny that that is true.

I want to say just one word about one aspect of that enormous power which this group of men, highly regarded and highly respected, exercise. Sometimes I feel that I would not fear them so much if they were not so hard-working and respectable, if they were off wasting their time and the country's time. But I am afraid of men who have the power, and stay on the job exercising it all day and every day, and sincerely believe that they can do the job better than the people can run their own business themselves.

What is one of the powers we give to these men? I wish I had with me a book that was written by a distinguished financial authority, Mr. Graham Towers, now governor of the Bank of Canada, a book which was written in his unregenerate days when he was still an ordinary banker. In it you will find some interesting facts. It was written in those strange far-off days when the value of our dollar was fixed by supply and demand. I had hoped to have it here to quote from this morning. You will find what I have in mind at page 90 something.

What are we asked to do now? We are asked to allow foreign exchange—not to find its own level by supply and demand; and mind you supply and demand has made a pretty good job of it. Do not let anybody tell you that exchange was rocketing all over the place before it came under the control of these men, because it was only when the government stepped in and devalued the currency and stepped on and off gold that exchange began to fluctuate so widely.

We are asked now, first, to hand over to a group of men $1,500,000,000, and second, to give them an unlimited draft on the Canadian exchequer. Hon. gentlemen will see that is in the bill, and personally I think that is right if we approve the bill.

Mr. ABBOTT: The principle of the bill has already been approved.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am nearly through. I understood that we had certain rights in committee. I had intended to speak when the Speaker was in the chair but unfortunately he went too fast for me. We are asked to hand over this huge sum of money to these men—let us be clear about this—so that they may have this huge amount of money to spend to back their judgment as to what the rate of exchange should be. That is what we are doing, and do not let us have any doubt about what we are doing. We are given this amount, though not as of the present moment, because the figure we have is a few months late. However, that amount can be taken as approximately correct. It is a billion and a half, and a draft on the consolidated revenue fund to an unlimited amount to back their judgment as to what the level of the Canadian dollar should be. One of the members of the department said to me not long ago, "Doesn't the business community want a stable exchange?" I said, "Did you happen to notice that there was a ten-point drop the other day? That is not very stable." I am not criticizing that, but I am pointing out that if we are to look at it from the point of view of convenience of and assistance to business, it is not very helpful to go on at a certain level and then drop or rise ten points.

It has been suggested that a stable unfluctuating rate of exchange is desirable. It is, but does it look within the bounds of possibility as long as the world is divided into pockets controlled by independent governments? Is it not likely that the best that can be done is so to organize things that the variations in the rate between these currencies will rise slowly and not precipitately? Is it not true that the only way in which a constant rate of exchange between all countries can be maintained is by the constant matching of exports by imports? As has been said by Sir Josiah Stamp, "every import has an export order tied to it." Is not this a vital truth which those who undertake the impossible task of maintaining exchange stability by government ukase would do well to bear in mind?

I want to make in closing an argument for the limitation of time. I do not wish to repeat tiresomely what I said, but I should like to ask hon. members to bear in mind that if we leave this open, we must not imagine that it is going to be seriously considered every year. It is not going to be seriously considered every year. I will suggest some reasons why there is the strongest possible argument at the present time for giving this a one year duration and no more. First, I give the analogy of the emergency powers act, which is strictly limited as to time. I see no reason why this analogy should not apply. Second, I give the analogy, honoured by centuries of practice and principle in the British constitution, of the Militia Act. That comes back to parliament every year. Why? So that parliament can have control over that standing army which at one time was such a menace to liberty. Next I would like to say that an incident has occurred—I say this with great hopefulness to the minister—since this bill was introduced which I think is a very strong argument and, I hope, might be even a compelling argument, and that is that the United States loan to the United Kingdom has been made, and under that loan the British have to undertake to make currency convertible on ordinary current account within a year. I want to make this point, which I believe is an important one. The real reason, in my opinion, why the government may be justified in some further extension of control is the danger of an unfavourable balance of trade with the United States. In the old days we settled it around the corner through sterling. Sterling, being now inconvertible, is not available, but if sterling becomes convertible within the year, if it becomes available on current account, that danger will to that extent disappear. So I say with great earnestness and some hopefulness to the minister that that is a very important reason which has suddenly emerged.

I want to say a word on relaxation of controls. I intend to advance two reasons, in the hope that the minister may change his mind and that we shall have in this bill a signal, a token that some day we really do want to get back to whatever measure of freedom we can. As you come to read the bill you will find that there are strict, hard restrictions on the right of a man if he changes residence from Canada to the United States to take any money with him.

Mr. ABBOTT: Capital.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Capital, yes. The question was asked, suppose a man in Manitoba sells his farm for $15,000, and wants to go across the line to live and take the money with him; unless he can establish that he has, let us say, arthritis and cannot live in Manitoba, or that his wife's mother is ill or needs the family's presence in Dakota, or give some other reason which will satisfy the members of the foreign exchange control board, he cannot take his money with him. Now I suggested—I do not know whether it is a good proposal; there may be a better—as a kind of token or pittance of freedom,—could not the board fix an amount—I made it very elastic—say of ten or fifteen thousand dollars, which a man can take as of right; and I said, if they find that is too much, let them lower it later on. The figures we were given from past experience as to the amounts likely to be taken in that way were trivial, something like a million dollars or less, so there is no indication that the amount would be large. The minister kindly said that he would take it into consideration, and I was hopeful for the moment that this tiny scintilla of freedom would be left. But when we came to the end of the road the minister said, "it cannot be done."

I cannot remember the minister's exact words, but what he said in effect was that the government had to retain liberty of action; the government had to decide that. At any rate this is my interpretation, and this is what I mean by saying that when you get in the hands of experts you cannot blur the picture in any way; you cannot change the pattern, it is whole hog or none. They cannot afford to give that tiny relaxation because they would be admitting a wedge; they would enable us to come back next year and say, "Give us a little more; we got back a little bit of freedom last year, give us a little more this year", and that would not be good. So, having spoken so much longer than the minister approves,—

Mr. ABBOTT: Not at all.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): —although he is very generous in these matters, before I take my seat I want to reiterate that no one who does not want socialism should vote for this bill as it is now. I have some highly valued and respected friends who are socialists, and if they want to vote for this bill they are fully entitled to do so; but you cannot eat your cake and have it, and I say that no one who wants the return of freedom, no one who believes that we should try as soon as we can to let in such freedom as we can get—God knows it is little enough in this distracted world—nobody who does not make socialism his objective, who does not wish to travel along that path, should vote for this bill as it stands now.

I had an amendment here, but I am not quite sure whether this is the proper place to move it. May I read it, Mr. Chairman, and have you tell me whether I should move it at this time? I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kamloops:

That section 1 of the bill be amended by adding the following as 1(a):

"This act shall continue in force for not more than one year from the date of proclamation."

Mr. ABBOTT: I should think on that point that if such an amendment were moved it should come at the end of the bill. That is the usual place for a duration clause.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Is that the chairman's view?

The CHAIRMAN: I would think that the proper place would be in connection with section 74, which provides that this act shall come into force on a date to be fixed by proclamation. I suggest that the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario might move this amendment on that section.

Mr. FULTON: May I point out that the effect of the amendment, if it were adopted, would be in a sense to remove many of the objections which will be raised to the subsequent clauses of the bill as we come to them, and it might be advantageous to know now whether or not it will be accepted.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is out of order. The amendment deals with the question of the duration of the act, and obviously it cannot be considered until we reach clause 74.

The CHAIRMAN: With reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), the considerations he has mentioned have no bearing upon procedure. I am asked by the member for Muskoka-Ontario a question with regard to procedure, and it is my opinion that the amendment should be withheld for the time being and moved when we come to section 74. Is that agreeable to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BOUCHER: I suggest that we might save time if we were to allow the preceding sections to stand and have that section called now and the suggestion disposed of.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Certainly not. We will go ahead with the bill section by section in the usual way, according to the custom of parliament.

The CHAIRMAN: I take it that the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario has the leave of the committee to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No. Let it stand for the time being.

The CHAIRMAN: I simply wish to be sure that the amendment stands for the time being and is not under consideration as an amendment to clause 1.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is right.

Mr. ABBOTT: I might reply briefly to one or two comments made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. In the first place, the principle of the bill with reference to exchange control was approved when second reading was voted two or three weeks ago. Now there are only three ways of handling international exchanges. One is—

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. ABBOTT: I would rather finish the statement I am about to make. However, if the hon. member wishes to put his question I will try to answer it.

Mr. HACKETT: I merely wanted to ask the minister whether it is fair to say that the principle of the bill was accepted. I think he will find it was stated that the bill should be referred to committee and that the house would then be in a better position to consider the actual method proposed.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is wrong in that, because it was suggested that it should be referred to the committee before the principle was adopted and exception was taken to that proposal by the Minister of Finance, and second reading was given in the usual way approving the principle of the bill. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, in the committee itself, has not challenged the necessity of some measure of exchange control, so that I think we may take it for granted that some form of exchange control has been approved by the house.

I was about to say that there are only three ways of handling exchanges. The first is to return to an unrestricted gold standard, the law of supply and demand, and no one has risen in this house and suggested that we should do that to-day. No country in the world is able to do it, with the possible exception of the United States, and I have heard no one suggest it. The second method is that which is proposed here, the method of exchange control, and that is the method, I may tell the committee, which is in force I believe in every modern country to-day—every industrial country, with the exception of the United States. Apart from that, I know of no country which is not adopting the exchange control method. The third method is what is known as the operation of an exchange equalization fund whereby a country sets up a fund to buy and sell foreign exchange. That is the third and last method, and I say to the committee that one of these three courses must be followed: free market, exchange control, or exchange equalization fund. This house has adopted the principle of exchange control.

My hon. friend has said that no one should vote for the measure as it stands who does not approve of socialism. Well, no one should have voted in approval of the Bretton Woods agreement who does not approve of socialism, because when the agreement came before the house for approval it was approved by my hon. friends opposite; and I do not need to tell them—I might have to tell some of them but not the member for Muskoka-Ontario—that the Bretton Woods agreements imply a very definite measure of exchange control. I make that as an assertion and I do so without fear of successful contradiction. Now I am not going to argue to-day—

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If the minister will permit me, while I am sure I cannot contradict him successfully, I wish to call his attention to the fact that I do not accept that statement.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would not expect my hon. friend to accept, but that is beside the point. As I say, I am not going to stand here to-day and argue the necessity of controls. That question has been argued ad nauseam as far as I am concerned, and I believe the great majority of the people of the country recognize that a measure of control is still needed. I repeat, I am not going to argue that point again to-day; nor am I going to go into any extended defence of those whom my hon. friend has referred to as experts. He has dealt in his usual charming way, and in broad general terms, with the way the experts are running the country.

Mr. JACKMAN: Hear, hear.

Mr. ABBOTT: The member for Rosedale says "hear, hear." That, too, was to be expected. Let me say, however, that I have had some limited experience in the last four or five years—I emphasize that word "limited"—with the way in which national affairs are run, and I say to the committee that this country is not being run by "experts."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. member for Halton suggests that I should amend my statement by adding the important qualifying "the"—the experts. What I meant of course was that the country is not being run by experts in the sense in which the member for Muskoka-Ontario used that term. In matters such as foreign exchange control and others, I believe profoundly that it is necessary to obtain the advice and assistance of the best experts one can get in these complex questions, and having heard that advice, if it commends itself to the judgment of those who have the responsibility of taking decisions, then I say the advice should be followed. That is what has been done in this case.

I do not know that it would be appropriate for me to discuss at this stage the question of putting a time limit on the bill. I shall be glad to discuss the matter when my hon. friend's amendment, which has been allowed to stand, is before the committee. I dealt with it fully before the banking and commerce committee, as did my hon. friend, and there I gave reasons why the government felt it would be inadvisable to fix a time limit or duration after which the bill would expire. However, I shall deal with the question more fully when we come to the section.

Mr. QUELCH: I had not intended saying anything at this time, but after listening to the remarks of the member for Muskoka-Ontario I feel impelled to say a few words on the bill. I pointed out on a previous occasion that this group supported the measure because we believe that a foreign exchange control board is necessary to the welfare of Canada. To my mind the only people who have any need to fear a foreign exchange control board are those who indulge in speculation in foreign exchange. They are the only ones who might oppose it. The people who make a living by gambling in foreign exchange will be opposed to the measure because the only thing they do is for themselves and not for the good of the country.

We supported the bill on second reading, and after listening carefully to statements made by Progressive Conservatives in the committee, I do not think they advanced any views which will induce us to change our opinion. The member for Muskoka-Ontario has said he does not think the bill would have passed ten years ago. Many changes have taken place in the past ten years, and one of the greatest was the change that occurred last year when we became a party to the Bretton Woods agreement.

What amazes me is the fact that the member for Muskoka-Ontario criticizes this bill on the ground that we are setting up a foreign exchange control board for an indefinite period and that we shall have a bunch of experts working there. The important point is that parliament will exercise control over that body. The experts can be put out of operation at any time it is felt desirable to remove them or to amend the regulations. Last year when we set up the Bretton Woods agreement the Progressive Conservative party supported it, though we were setting up a bunch of international experts, putting them in for an indefinite period of time, responsible to no one, responsible to no court of the land, and not even responsible to the international court of justice. We did not hear any criticism at all from that party concerning that fact. I believe the foreign exchange control board will be needed as a permanent institution in this country. As the international situation improves we may be able to modify the regulations until they will operate in such a way as not to inconvenience the average ratepayer of this country.

I should like to deal with just one last point. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario said the only people who would support this measure would be socialists. Let me point out to the hon. member that unless we stop the abuses of capitalism we are going to have socialism in this country.

Mr. IRVINE: I can hardly avoid saying a word or two on this matter, inasmuch as the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario made special reference to this party, and indeed to myself, which I appreciate. However, the minister and the hon. member for Acadia have so completely answered the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario that perhaps it is not really necessary for me to say anything at all. The hon. member hitched his opposition to this bill to his contention for private enterprise, and went on to quote the hon. gentleman who leads this group as having gone on record in favour of private enterprise. I was looking up the reference from which I believe the hon. gentleman quoted, and I think I should repeat exactly what was said in order that there may be no misunderstanding. I am quoting from page 4099 of Hansard for this year:

> We are not opposed to private enterprise, but we demand that private enterprise shall take the risks if it takes the rewards.

Of course we are not opposed to certain kinds of private enterprise.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the hon. member permit me to say that is exactly what I quoted?

Mr. IRVINE: I agree.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I thought the hon. member was correcting me.

Mr. IRVINE: No, I am not correcting the hon. gentleman; I am giving the setting in which that remark was made. Perhaps I should quote the rest of it:

> In the second instance, we are proposing as a federal parliament to give complete exemption to the mining industry for three years. Those are two entirely different propositions. We are not opposed to private enterprise, but we demand that private enterprise shall take the risks if it takes the rewards.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was obviously indicating that his opposition to what was proposed by the government in respect to mines was on the ground that it was removing the risks from private enterprise yet permitting private enterprise to go away with the rewards, and he is opposed to that. That was his argument. Of course there is private enterprise in socialism. I shall not take the time now, but some day I will indicate to my hon. friend that he has no monopoly over any virtue there may be in private enterprise. We want to see every person private enterprising, but for what? For private gain? No! We want to see them, on the contrary, private enterprising for the good of the state, the good of the nation, the good of the community. That is the private enterprise we are bound to support, and we do support it. So I think that part of my hon. friend's argument should be amply answered by that statement.

Mr. FLEMING: It is not so.

Mr. IRVINE: I do not suppose it ever would be to the hon. gentleman who made that remark. There are reasons for that, too, which perhaps I had better not go into now.

As has been pointed out, the principle of the bill was accepted by this parliament, and the bill was referred to the banking and commerce committee. We considered it very carefully; we heard all the opposition that flared forth in the evangelical eloquence displayed by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario this morning, but we found no reason to change our views in support of the measure.

The hon. member has raised the question whether power under this bill should not be fixed for a certain number of years, or whether it should be unlimited; "indefinitely" and "unlimited" were the two terms he used. Anyone knows that if you are going to carry out the object of this bill there are certain powers that go with that objective and which cannot be separated from it. There is no reason why we should be afraid of power. That power, finally, is in the hands of this parliament, and we are simply allowing a department to exercise an amount of power sufficient to do a certain job we have already said we want done. If you restrict that power, then the job will not be done; for every relaxation my hon. friend asked for in the committee would have left this bill of no effect, and would have allowed those who wished to do so to deal in exchange for private profit, to despoil the instrument which must be used by any nation in doing business.

As to the time limit, as the minister said that can be discussed later; but I should think the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario is badly mistaken if he believes we are ever going to return to what I have no doubt his party would regard as "normalcy." There is no such return; there is no such normalcy. As long as it is necessary to use an instrument of exchange I do not believe the nations of the world ever again will release that important instrument to the tender care of money mongers. I believe we have come to the end of that period. Whether it would be advisable to have this bill passed each year, just as a matter of form to please the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, is a matter for the minister to settle.

The hon. gentleman objected because he thought that in certain cases those adminstering the act would have to make what he regarded as moral judgments, as to whether this thing should be done or not; whether or not this grandmother should be allowed to go to Detroit to visit her daughter, and so on. Well, I do not know that there is any particular morality about such a decision, but if there is, I think it would be far better for us to have somebody to exercise a moral judgment than to leave it wide open for the immoral practices which would most decidedly ensue were no such safeguards as these placed upon our exchange. The hon. member knows this, but I wish to make the point clear: It is essential to protect the monetary instrument of a nation, not only in the interests of socialism but in the interests of free enterprise. I do not know of anything more likely to destroy the free enterprise my hon. friend so much admires than to allow over-enthusiastic free enterprisers to upset the value of currency. This, really, is the very thing he wishes to protect, so far as that goes, and I am quite aware of it. I am not supporting this measure merely because I am a socialist; I support it because it is the intelligent thing to do under any system, whether it be one of private enterprise or one of socialism.

If I am not mistaken in his words, the hon. member said that the old uncontrolled system had done very well—or made some similar observation. I would refer the hon. member to the years which immediately followed world war I, when we had no such control, and when the bankers were the experts, if you like, who did the controlling. Although I am not certain as to the year, I believe it was in 1924 when, on the advice of our banking experts who had full control of all our financial instruments, Canada went back to the gold basis, and by doing so, we literally doubled our debt. Farmers had borrowed money when the dollar was worth about 55 or 60 cents. By going back on the gold basis they had to pay for 50-cent dollars with 100-cent dollars, and they had to pay it back with much smaller prices received for their wheat. That one simple act, taken on the advice of the financial experts of that time, plunged Canada, as it had plunged every other nation in the world, into the greatest depression history has ever known. That is how they did it. But those who manipulate money can turn either deflation or inflation to their advantage, and they exercise their greed for profit by doing either when it suits their purpose.

I should like to say one word respecting what was said by the hon. member in winding up his speech, when he contrasted what to him were the objectionable restrictions in the bill with what he calls freedom. After all, that is just a word; we all use it. I am afraid many of us do not put much meaning into it when we use it. I must not now enter into an exposition of freedom; but I say simply this, that to use that word and to fling it at the House of Commons, as if security were being violated by this measure, is simply preposterous and ridiculous. It is not worthy of my hon. friend. There must of necessity be certain restrictions in this and other lands if we are to have any freedom at all. Apparently what my hon. friend regards as freedom is a thing which has robbed most people in this country of any freedom at all.

Mr. HAZEN: I should like to place myself on record with respect to this legislation. Earlier this morning the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) said that no one in parliament should vote for this bill lightly. I agree thoroughly with those remarks.

The purpose of the bill, we are informed, is to stabilize exchange and have our foreign exchange resources used to the best advantage. It will undoubtedly take some time for the business of the world to return to normal conditions after the upheaval of war, and a stabilized exchange would, I believe, assist in restoring the flow of goods and services between Canada and other countries.

I am not a financial expert, nor have I had any experience in international trade; consequently I am not in a position to make constructive suggestions which would further the purpose the government has in mind. But what strikes me about the bill is this, that it was promoted, planned and drafted by men whose minds were so centred on currency and exchange that they overlooked the rights and liberties of the citizens of this country.

This bill, if it becomes law—and it will become law in its present form unless members on the government side take exception to some of its provisions—sets up a board of civil servants to buy and sell exchange at rates they will fix, to supervise and regulate the business transactions of our exporters and importers—

Mr. ABBOTT: I know my hon. friend does not wish to be inaccurate. The board does not fix rates of exchange; the government does that.

Mr. HAZEN: They are fixed by the government on the advice of the board—

Mr. ABBOTT: Not necessarily.

Mr. HAZEN: —to supervise the business transactions of our exporters and importers, and to control the assets and in consequence the movements of everyday people of this country. It is by this means that the government proposes to control the rate of exchange.

The bill is not limited in time to the transitory period from war to peace. It sets up a controlled economy in currency, securities and the export and import of goods for an indefinite period.

I favour a stabilized exchange during the transitory period from war to peace, if it can be brought about without interfering with the rights and liberties of the everyday people of this country: I believe it should be possible to enact legislation which would achieve that end. But if it is impossible, and that end can be achieved only by depriving the people of this country of the control of their property, and as a result, of their movements, as this bill does, then I am opposed to a stabilized exchange.

I hold the view that the people of Canada should have the right to do what they like with what belongs to them, provided that they do not interfere with the rights of other people. If this bill becomes law it will deprive them of many of the rights they possessed prior to the war.

Among other things the bill provides in section 25—and I am by no means giving a complete list—that no person in this country shall export any property from Canada without permission of the board.

In section 26 it provides that no person in Canada can import any property into Canada without permission of the board, but the board is not to withhold its permission to export or import when a fair value is being paid for the goods in a currency approved by the board.

By section 27 it provides that no person in Canada shall sell or assign his securities either inside or outside of Canada to any person who is not resident in Canada, unless he gets permission from the board.

It provides that no person in Canada can purchase any securities either outside or inside of Canada from a non-resident unless he gets permission from the board.

It provides in section 29 that any Canadian who owns securities outside of Canada must bring them into Canada when ordered by the board.

It provides in section 31 that no person residing in Canada can set up a trust fund, except by will, without obtaining permission from the board.

It provides by section 31 that no person in Canada shall assign or deliver to a non-resident any property situated in Canada or elsewhere, and no person residing in Canada can give any property to a non-resident without a permit from the board.

It provides by section 32 that no person in Canada may render any service to a person residing outside of Canada without authority, but must charge him and obtain payment within six months unless he obtains a permit from the board.

It provides by section 49 that the board can prohibit any person from exercising any control over his own property whenever it sees fit.

It provides by section 51 that the board can compel a person to transfer his property to a trust company, the costs of that company being a first charge on the property.

Let me give a few examples of the power the board will have under this bill if it becomes law in its present form. If you or I have a relative or friend in dire need living outside of Canada, in Ireland, Great Britain, the United States or some other country, whom we want to help and whom before the war we could have helped without asking permission of any one, under this bill we cannot help that person unless we get a permit from the board.

If you or I want to go on a trip to the United States or any other country, before leaving Canada we must present ourselves before a customs officer and answer all the questions that may be put by him relating to the property we are taking with us. If the customs officer does not believe us and thinks we have other property concealed on our person, he may search us and he may search our luggage. He has the power to arrest and seize and detain our property. Those provisions are contained in section 48.

If you or I want to leave Canada for an indefinite period and go to Australia, Scotland or any other country, either within or without the British commonwealth and empire, we cannot take with us what belongs to us unless we get a permit from the board. If we happen to be people of some means, that permit will probably be refused and we shall not be able to take with us what belongs to us.

If a farmer sells his farm with the intention of moving to the United States and going to work there, and the United States immigration authorities have given him permission to enter the country, the board will not prevent him from going but they will refuse in most cases to let him take with him what belongs to him if it amounts to over $5,000.

If, for what we consider good reasons, you or I have certain securities deposited outside of Canada the board can order us to bring them into Canada.

If you or I have a friend outside this country to whom we are under an obligation, we cannot render him a service or do any work for him without making him pay us for it within six months unless we obtain a permit from the board.

The long and the short of the matter is that this bill deprives the people of Canada of the right to control their own property and places that control in the hands of a board of civil servants.

Mr. ABBOTT: Only as to property they want to take out of the country or bring in.

Mr. HAZEN: Not at all.

When the war broke out the majority of the people in this country did not object to a curtailment of their freedom and liberty under the powers conferred upon the government by the War Measures Act and later by the National Resources Mobilization Act. The people believed that the government should have extraordinary powers while Canada was fighting for its existence. The war is over now, and these dictatorial powers should end. But instead of being brought to an end they will be perpetuated if we pass this bill.

The board to be set up under this bill is to take the place of the foreign exchange control board, which was established by order in council early in the war. It is being given practically the same dictatorial powers that that board possessed. According to section 11 the board will consist of six high-ranking civil servants. We are told that these men would not think of exercising the great powers conferred on them unreasonably or harshly, but would use the best judgment and tact in the exercise of the extraordinary powers that are being conferred on them. The only way in which we can form an opinion of how they will conduct themselves is to recall how they have conducted themselves in the past. I propose now to give a few instances—perhaps the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario never heard of these—of how the present board and its two hundred or so satellites have carried on their duties.

This board has seized the money of many innocent people who live near the international boundary line. A Canadian Pacific employee, who lives at McAdam Junction, New Brunswick, and who does most of his work in the state of Maine, addressed a letter containing about $20 to a relative living in Maine who had assisted him when there was illness in his family. This money had been earned in the United States by a man who worked in the United States, but the letter happened to be mailed from a Canadian post office to a person living in Maine. The money was seized and it has never been returned.

The president of a large United States corporation who was in Vancouver on business was unable to pick up a coat that belonged to him because of the hurry to catch a train for home. He asked a friend whom he knew would be in his town in the course of a few days to bring the coat with him. The friend got the coat and put it in his valise, but he removed a bill-fold which he noticed was in the pocket. He was asked by the Canadian customs officer about the money he was taking to the United States and he gave them the particulars. The customs official asked him what was in the bill-fold, and he said he had not looked at it, that he was taking it to a United States friend who had left it in Vancouver. It was opened and was found to contain, if I remember correctly, $80 in United States funds. The customs official confiscated it, but when the owner heard of what had happened he telegraphed to the state department in Washington and the money was returned. But the railway conductor in McAdam Junction has not got his money back yet.

A young boy living in New Brunswick near the Maine border earned $90 by working in the potato fields. This was the first money this boy had ever earned. The evening he arrived home with it one of his friends suggested that they drive across the line to the state of Maine which was only a few miles away. When he got to the border the $90 was seized.

An old man living near the border who was in the habit of passing from New Brunswick to Maine had about $90 seized. A member of parliament who approached the Minister of Finance on his behalf was informed by the minister that the regulations were not intended to be used in this way and that he would take up the matter with Mr. Graham Towers, the chairman of the board. A few days later the Minister of Finance informed the member that he had seen Mr. Towers, who said that they had taken money from so many people—this is the effect of his words I am not quoting them exactly—that if they paid it back to one they would have to pay it back to all and it might lead to complications. The minister added that he did not care to interfere with the work of the board. That is the way this bureaucratic board carries on. Money was taken in this way from many innocent people and in some cases it has not been returned to them.

There was a case in New Brunswick to which I would direct the attention of the committee. One morning a woman set out for the bank with $300 for the purpose of paying a note which was due that day. When she got to town she found that the bank had not opened, so she proceeded to visit her daughter. Her daughter suggested that they drive across to a town in the United States which was only a few miles away. When they got to the border the $300 was seized by the Canadian officials. Later that day the woman reported the seizure to the manager of the Royal Bank of Canada where the note was due, and the manager said he would write to Ottawa. The woman never got her $300 back, but it was sent by the board to the branch of the Royal Bank of Canada to pay off the note. The fact that the chairman of the board was at one time in the employ of the Royal Bank of Canada is a mere coincidence.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think that is a most unfair suggestion to make, and I take strong exception to it.

Mr. HAZEN: It is the fact.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is bringing up a lot of isolated cases which he could well have brought up in the banking and commerce committee where we could have investigated them, but I am not quarrelling with that. The implied reflection on Mr. Towers I think is quite unjustified.

Mr. HAZEN: I am not bringing up a lot of isolated cases. I am bringing up only a few.

Mr. ABBOTT: Cite all the cases you like. I only take exception to the reflection on Mr. Towers.

Mr. JACKMAN: No one is perfect.

Mr. HAZEN: I was informed that it was not until a man named Tom Kennedy, who had had money seized in the province of New Brunswick by the board's officials, appealed from the magistrate's ruling to the county court and the judge of the court decided in his favour that the board started to pay back the moneys which it had seized. The facts in this case are not without interest. When the county court judge decided against the board and ordered the money paid back, the officials of the board felt outraged and at once gave notice of appeal to the supreme court. But they found when they got into court that there was no appeal. To overcome this difficulty they had the government pass an order in council and then appealed the case again, but they did not get very far with the matter when it came before the chief justice of the province of New Brunswick. I think we should be thankful that there are judges in this country who are willing to protect the rights of the people against the actions of these bureaucrats.

Mr. ABBOTT: Would my hon. friend object to giving the names here so that we can look into the case?

Mr. HAZEN: I mentioned the name—Tom Kennedy.

Mr. ABBOTT: That was the first name the hon. member mentioned. I do not insist, but I should be glad to have the names in these cases.

Mr. HAZEN: I am going to give one or two more instances. A man wanted to go to the United States to have an emergency operation. His brother, who was to accompany him, went to the bank for the purpose of obtaining United States funds. The bank hesitated, but on being informed of the emergency and knowing the applicant well, furnished him with $1,000. In due time the manager of the bank received a most discourteous letter from the board censuring him for advancing the money without obtaining permission. The fact that time might have been a matter of life and death did not enter into their calculations.

A farmer living in Maine, knowing that three of his neighbours across the line in New Brunswick were going to Saint John, asked them to get him some rope that he badly needed. They got the rope in Saint John and paid a small amount for it. They declared the rope to the United States custom officers and paid the duty. Later they were summoned by the board before a magistrate for taking this rope into the United States without obtaining a permit, and each of them was fined $300 and costs.

Mr. ABBOTT: What was wrong with the magistrate?

Mr. HAZEN: What is wrong with the board? What is wrong with this board will be wrong with the new board too. Most of the powers which the board now has will be retained if this bill becomes law, and we have no reason to suppose that the new board will exercise their powers any differently in the future from what they did in the past. If bureaucratic government is to continue, if we want to set up a new form of despotism, all we have to do is to pass this bill in its present form.

Under our constitution property and civil rights are a matter for the provinces, and I doubt very much that parliament has the power to pass an act of this kind, despite the opinion—and it was a vague opinion, if I may say so, not backed up by authority—of the justice department.

I want to point out that when a Canadian citizen goes to the board, hat in hand, for a permit to do this or to do that, the board in granting or refusing the permit is not governed in most instances by any law that parliament has passed, but acts as it sees fit.

The members of this house were elected by the people in their constituencies to make the laws, and we are responsible to the people who elected us for what we do here when the next election comes round. But if we pass this bill and give powers to the board to make the laws under which it grants or refuses permission, if we place in the hands of the board powers that were given us under our democratic form of government—

Mr. ABBOTT: No, we do not do that.

Mr. HAZEN: —we allow the board to make the laws of the country—

Mr. ABBOTT: It is nothing but an administrative body.

Mr. HAZEN: —and we are negligent in our duty and degrading our democratic system of government.

I would refer for a moment to the report made a year or two ago by the committee on civil liberties of the Canadian Bar Association. The report says:

> Laws should be enacted by parliament directly. The essence of democracy is that people govern themselves through their fully chosen representatives . . . The delegation of legislative power is not in the spirit of democratic institutions, the purpose of which is that the people's elected representatives alone shall make the laws . . .
> Governments that try to place in the minds of the people the same respect for orders and regulations of delegated bodies as for public laws of parliament simply degrade the whole system to the level of dictatorship.
> Parliaments, in introducing into democratic institutions the methods of dictatorship, render democracy odious to the people, who, in consequence, will be thrown into all sort of novel theories and political systems, hoping thereby to escape despotism, which they abhor.

Mr. IRVINE: What is my hon. friend quoting from?

Mr. HAZEN: I am quoting from the report of the committee of civil liberties of the Canadian Bar Association.

[Mr. Hazen.]

Mr. MACKENZIE: What about the Marketing Act passed under the Bennett government, of which my hon. friend was a supporter? It was the most vicious piece of legislation ever passed.

Mr. STIRLING: The best act ever passed.

Mr. HAZEN: I did not hear just what the minister said.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Talk about parliamentary control! What about that Marketing Act?

Mr. HAZEN: Let me refer now to another feature of this bill. It gives the members of the board and its employees protection from our laws but it deprives the people of Canada of the fundamental principles of British justice. This bill sets up one system of justice for the members of the board and its employees, and another system of justice, or injustice for the people. It introduces a system of jurisprudence that resembles in some respects that which prevails in some European countries and is very different from our own.

Mr. ABBOTT: Which section is my hon. friend referring to there?

Mr. HAZEN: I am just coming to the section. While the board and its employees are given extraordinary powers over our property, and in consequence over our lives, no adequate safeguards are provided to prevent them from using those powers recklessly or without respect to the rights of the people. On the contrary, the bill contains provisions to protect the members of the board and its employees if they abuse their powers.

Let me give my reason for saying this. The bill provides in section 54 that no action, suit or proceedings shall be commenced against any member of the board, inspector, employee or representative of the board, or authorized dealer or agent of the board for any wrongdoing in the exercise of their duties until one month after notice in writing has been served on the alleged wrongdoer, stating the cause of action and giving other particulars.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is an identical provision, as my hon. friend knows, in the Customs Act. It has been there for many years.

Mr. HAZEN: That does not make it any better. If this notice is given—and may I say it is quite contrary to our usual court proceedings, where the writ of summons is the notice—then the bill provides, section 54, subsection 2, that when the judge tries the case he shall award nominal damages only, without costs, if he certifies—and why and how the word "certifies" is used I do not know—that the defendant acted upon probable cause, or that the defendant acted in good faith in carrying out verbal instructions of the board or an inspector. If that does not open the door to a great deal of abuse—

Mr. ABBOTT: There is nothing new in the section. It has been in the Customs Act, and it has been in the criminal code, protecting public servants, for years.

Mr. HAZEN: I refer now to section 44. A judge on an ex parte application can authorize a member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and another person to enter and search if necessary by force any building for property which he has reasonable grounds for believing is liable to forfeiture, and seize property and carry it away if he finds it, and detain it from the lawful owner for ninety days, while the board makes up its mind if it will prosecute the owner. If the board decides not to prosecute, the property will be returned, I assume, but no compensation is provided for the owner.

If a search is made and no property is found, if the officer, inspector or person had reason to suspect that property liable to seizure would be found, he shall not be liable to any prosecution or action on account of any search or detention of property, although he may have used force, as he is given the right to do, and in consequence done damage, committed assault, or committed trespass.

Mr. ABBOTT: The same provision is in the Customs Act.

Mr. HAZEN: That does not make it any better. That is a pretty poor answer, it seems to me. Laws of this kind, I have no hesitation in saying and I do say, put the subject at the mercy of the police and pave the way for wrongdoing and abuse of power by civil servants.

Now let us see how the bill proposes to treat the people who are arrested by the board or its officials, with or without warrant, or are charged with violating any of its provisions or the regulations that are made by the board when they are dealing with their own property.

The bill says that no prosecution shall be commenced without the consent of the attorney general, and if this were so it might ameliorate to some extent the harshness of the legislation, although the right to lay a charge should not be subject to the permission of the executive. But the bill does not so provide; for it goes on to state that a person can be arrested and put in gaol notwithstanding the consent of the attorney general is not obtained, and then it goes on to say that no further proceedings shall be taken. Well, you go pretty far when you put a man in gaol, and it does not help him much to provide, after you get him there, that no further proceedings shall be taken without the consent of the attorney general. I regard those provisions as most objectionable. A man can be arrested and locked up, and I presume he will remain in gaol unless bail is provided, until the board sees fit to notify the attorney general, and until the attorney general, who may be on his holidays, sees fit to consider the matter. If he decides that the man should not be prosecuted, that there were not good and sufficient grounds for his arrest, the accused apparently has no relief for the wrong he has suffered and the bill does not provide how he is to get out of gaol. If on the other hand the attorney general decides that the prosecution should continue, not that it should be commenced, as the bill states, the bill provides that the judge is to presume that the accused did not have permission from the board to act as he did or had not been exempted by the board from doing as he did. The burden of proof is put on the accused to prove his innocence.

Now, sir, it is a fundamental principle of British justice that a person is presumed innocent until he is proven guilty, and that the crown must prove the guilt of the accused, and that the accused must have the benefit of every reasonable doubt. These principles have been justified by long experience throughout the years.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Read the Marketing Act.

Mr. HAZEN: They were made not to protect the guilty but to protect innocent people. But this bill changes all that, for it provides that the burden of proof is on the accused to show that he had permission from the board to do what he did.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You started that in 1932 with your Marketing Act.

Mr. HAZEN: I was not here.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Well, your party.

Mr. HACKETT: Remember the fate of those who perpetrated the bill of 1932.

Mr. STIRLING: And it was not 1932.

An hon. MEMBER: The same fate will occur to them. Do not worry.

Mr. HAZEN: The persons who drafted this bill took every precaution to safeguard themselves and to deprive the people of this country of the principles of British justice.

This bill will set up a board of civil servants, who are not responsible to the electors of this country, with powers to tell the people what they can do and what they cannot do with their own property; it will protect the members of the board and their officials and employees from the laws of the land, while depriving the people of some of the fundamental rights of British justice.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is the same in the Marketing Act, passed by the Tory party.

Mr. STIRLING: Parrot.

Mr. HAZEN: I am opposed to principles of that kind. We have been told that the desire for money is the root of all evil. Evil has, it seems to me, developed another root, and that is the desire of the government to control exchange by setting up a board of this kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE: "Consistency, thou art a jewel."

Mr. HAZEN: If this bill becomes law it will be a great stride towards centralization, socialization and Stalinization in this country.

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Chairman, again we seem to be discussing the principle of the bill in committee. The principle has already been approved. I am not going to reply to my hon. friend on the points which he has raised particularly about this bill, including the Stalinization of Canada. I think that is utter ignorance, it is one of those nice phrases which reads well in the newspapers but does not mean very much if you analyse it.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. ABBOTT: If you are going to control exchange you must provide the necessary control measures, and that is all we are attempting to do with this bill. No one regrets any more than I do the necessity of having to control foreign exchange. But I am profoundly convinced that it is necessary, and I do not believe my hon. friend's party will take the stand that exchange control is no longer necessary, although some individual members would appear desirous of giving that impression.

As to the various individual cases which my hon. friend has cited, he has given almost no names, and of course it is not possible for me to check them. If he will be good enough to give me names I will see that they are looked into. I will not suggest for a moment that in the administration of this difficult control measure during six years of war there were not some mistakes and some injustices, but my personal experience was that the board functioned very efficiently. Not only did it function efficiently, but it functioned to the general satisfaction of the business community and, as well, of Canadians as a whole.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario paid a well deserved tribute to the manner in which the board was administered during the war. The member for St. John-Albert attacks the methods followed by the board. That is his privilege, but I suggest that it would be much easier for me and for the board to investigate special cases if he would give us names, or if he had given them to us when the bill was being considered in the banking and commerce committee. After all, he has given an ex parte statement, and my experience as a lawyer has been that there are always two sides to a case. I venture to say that if the cases he has cited are looked into, it will be found that in the great majority of them there was a good reason for the action which the board took.

I do not know that there is anything else I can add. We have been discussing the details of the bill on the first section, and possibly it is desirable that we should have a general discussion now, because the individual clauses were considered in detail by the banking and commerce committee and every gentleman opposite who has spoken so far was a member of the committee, so that all are familiar with the points which were brought up there. Apart from that, I have no particular comments to offer on the remarks made by the hon. member for St. John-Albert.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not wish to discuss the principle of the bill, but I should like to ask one or two questions, and this is the only place in which I can put them. I believe we are pretty well prepared in this corner of the house to adopt the measure. It was gone over thoroughly in the banking and commerce committee, on which this group was represented by the hon. member for Peace River, the leader of this party (Mr. Low), the member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), and the member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch). I believe they put on the record fairly well the stand of this group, and they are men in whom I have great confidence in matters of this kind. Moreover, the member for Acadia spent about forty minutes on the second reading of the bill, making some observations that were satisfactory to the group.

The questions I wish to ask arise out of a communication I received not long ago, and the minister is of course well aware of the situation which existed and which called forth this letter. When the exchange rate was changed, on July 5, I believe it was, quite a few individuals suffered great loss in money they received from other countries immediately following the change, and the person to whom I have reference particularly suffered in connection with a money transfer in sterling from Scotland. The transfer took place three days after the exchange rate was changed, and this gentleman sustained a loss of nearly $800. I should like to know whether the government is considering, if it is at all possible under the circumstances, any measure of relief or compensation for individuals who suffered a loss. That is the first question.

The second question is this, and it is what gives rise to my correspondent writing in the way in which he does. He reminds me that about July 25, the newpapers ran an article in which it was indicated that the government would compensate the gold mining industry for losses in this connection, and he writes to ask whether the government is considering a similar measure to compensate individuals who lost money at that time in consequence of such transactions as I have indicated. I wonder if the minister could answer that question. That is all I have to say on the bill, and I ask that question because there are many people who found themselves in a position similar to that of my correspondent.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is right when he says that a number of people found themselves in a position similar to that of his correspondent, who received a remittance from the old country two or three days after the exchange rate had been changed. I gathered that the loss was about $800. The difference in the exchange rate for the pound sterling was forty cents, so that the remittance must have been a substantial one. I can only say that is one of the losses incident to any exchange rate and I fear it is not one for which the government can properly give compensation. It would have to go into every case in which payment had been made after a given date on which the exchange rate was altered. It is one of those cases in which one can only say it is a rub of the green. Payment was received in the foreign currency after the exchange rate had been changed.

On the second point, the newspaper report to which my hon. friend referred related to possible assistance to the gold mining industry as a result of the exchange rate being changed. The assistance, if I may so term it, took the form of certain arrangements for the future. That is to say, no assistance was given to gold mines as such with respect to the stocks of bullion they had on hand at the time the exchange rate was changed, or with respect to any other inventory they might have which would be affected. But realizing that the difference in the price of gold would affect the mines which were mining lower-grade ore, the government did, as I announced a week ago, provide for two years' special depletion allowance and fixed a lower minting charge at the Canadian mint. There were certain other provisions, but there was no compensation to gold mines or anybody else for stocks of gold or United States exchange on hand at the time the change become effective.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at one o'clock it had under consideration section 1 of the act. May I remind hon. gentlemen that the principle of this bill was approved on second reading on July 2. At that time there was a considerable debate, and the procedure so far in committee has not been strictly in order, since at this time it is not in order to discuss the principle of a bill. In the past when a bill has been given second reading without discussion I think it has been customary to permit the principle to be discussed in committee, but I have looked up Hansard in connection with the present bill and find that the discussion on second reading covered some twelve pages. May I suggest to the committee that there should not be a continuation of the discussion of the principle, but that we should consider the sections of the bills.

Mr. HATFIELD: Will the minister say whether "B" forms are now required for the export of goods from this country?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. HATFIELD: Then I should like to know how much it is going to cost the government to protect the 963 forward contracts that were in effect on July 5.

Mr. ABBOTT: It may take a moment to get that information, so we might have to go on with another section for the moment. I can probably give it later.

Mr. HATFIELD: I should like to know if all the exporters had a right to forward contracts. I understand that only a few privileged exporters in Canada could take out a forward contract.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that every exporter who had a firm contract to receive payment within a specified time could obtain the protection.

Mr. HATFIELD: For how long?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am informed that the ordinary period was ninety days but that it went up to periods as long as six months.

Mr. HATFIELD: It went to a period of a year. Some firms had the privilege of taking out forward contracts for a year's time. Other firms had the privilege of taking out contracts for only three months. Why the difference?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told by the officials before me that they do not believe that is the case, but I shall look into my hon. friend's statement.

Mr. HATFIELD: I was so informed by the board.

Mr. ABBOTT: As to the figure for which my hon. friend asked, on July 6 the net forward position was $132,000,000.

Mr. HATFIELD: And ten per cent of that?

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is good at mathematics, and I suppose he can make the calculation.

Mr. JACKMAN: I shall endeavour to pay heed to your suggestion, Mr. Chairman, that the principle of this bill was adopted by this house some time ago. May I say, however, that in regard to many of these technical measures it is impossible to know the ramifications and the full import of a resolution until one sees the bill itself. I recall that on more than one occasion, if not in this precise instance, a discussion of the principle itself was permitted after the standing committee had reported back to the house. Certainly in a bill such as the one we are now considering there are very many technical matters which could not be known in advance. So if in a sense what I say is a report on the findings of the committee, I hope you will pardon me.

In the committee we found that if we were to have foreign exchange control we must have all or nothing. Apparently there was no halfway measure. At the same time, however, we find that those who operate the foreign exchange control board have great discretion, and that the satisfactory or otherwise operation of this board depends a great deal if not entirely upon how those who are in authority —and I am speaking not of those in political authority but of those in administrative authority—exercise their discretion from time to time.

One or two matters were brought up this morning by various speakers, to which I should like to refer. First the hon. member for Acadia wondered how it was that the progressive Conservative party could support the Bretton Woods agreement and at the same time dislike the present bill to set up a permanent foreign exchange control board. May I say to the hon. member that many of us in this party hope that Bretton Woods and the international monetary fund which will be established under that agreement will prevent some of the disruptions of foreign exchange, and thereby of foreign trade, which took place in pre-war years, and which were among the indirect causes of war itself. We hope the nations subscribing to the Bretton Woods agreement will include most of the trading nations of the world, and we hope those nations will not again engage in currency warfare. A nation which wanted to increase its exports reduced its currency in terms of the currency of other nations, and in this way the goods of the exporting country were made cheaper. In return they got money, usually hard money from the United States or some other country where they wanted to buy in future. But this process of lowering the value of exchange led to competition and to great difficulties, and it is something we hope Bretton Woods will obviate in the future.

Mr. QUELCH: Does the hon. member see any sign of trade wars lessening soon as a result of the Bretton Woods agreement?

Mr. JACKMAN: I am hopeful, as I think most of the world is, that the signatories to Bretton Woods will include most if not all the trading nations, and that those signatories will live up to the agreement which they undertook when they signed the Bretton Woods pact. If they do, there will be strict limitations on the extent of any change they may make in the value of their currency. They may not alter their currency by more than ten per cent without the approval of the governing body; up to ten per cent it may be done without approval, though they must first consult the international board. It is hoped that by this means currency wars will be avoided in future.

The hon. member for Acadia also said that if we did not have an exchange control board, exchange rates would be at the mercy of and subject to all the hazards of speculators. May I say to the hon. member that in the normal working of exchange rates the exchange values of different currencies were the reflection of economic events in different countries. They were the result of the work, labour and trading of the ordinary man who did business with other countries. They were not the result of speculators or others who would say, "We want the rate to be so and so, so that we can make a profit." They came about substantially by the working of natural economic forces. What the present arrangement of having a control board does is to make of every Canadian a speculator, willy-nilly. The ordinary individual has no choice in the matter at all. As a citizen and taxpayer he is subject to the risks of exchange through the foreign exchange control board. And if one does not fully realize what the situation is, when we placed the Canadian dollar on a parity with the United States dollar the loss, while not yet revealed to us, is estimated—a very good guide being given to us by those who are in control —at approximately $150 million. So that, spread over 11 million or 12 million people it is easy to see that in a sense we are all made speculators and made to bear a loss which we would not otherwise have to bear.

Again, the hon. member said that Bretton Woods implies exchange control. Even the Minister of Finance when he introduced the resolution on which this bill is based said there were three policies which would be followed, and one of them was exchange stabilization, or an exchange equalization fund. I believe that would work with greater satisfaction to Canada and to our people than would the present hidebound, iron-clad system of exchange control over even the most petty transactions with the United States or with other countries.

While as a result of the exigencies of the war most other countries do have foreign exchange control to-day, we have in the United States the great example of a strong economic power, similar in many respects to our own, only larger, and to some extent more self-sufficient. That country does not have exchange control, nor, so far as one can see, is there any likelihood of its having it. I should also think that as soon as possible the United Kingdom will do away with exchange control, because so long as she has these controls, particularly on capital account, she can never again become the financial centre of the world. That position, occupied with such ability by Great Britain for so many years, brought to her a source of income which she cannot well do without, and gave her a position in world trade which was the envy of every other country.

May I point out that already Canada has become the third or fourth largest trading nation in the world, and the amount of foreign exchange bills resulting from that trading is substantial. But these bills are now all cleared through New York, and a commission is paid to those engaged in financial business in that centre. If we were able to do without control in this country there is the possibility that just as other centres in Europe such as Paris, Brussels and Berlin did at a time when London was the paramount financial centre, so we might on this continent become a financial centre of some importance, and thereby add to our national income. But that cannot be attained so long as we have the rigid controls provided by this bill.

This morning the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) said that exchange controls will always be with us. Let us hope that we can get away from controls. Later I shall cite what the Minister of Finance said when he introduced the resolution. The hon. member for Cariboo implied that exchange rates had in the past been made by certain wealthy individuals in other countries. But may I tell him, as I have suggested to the hon. member for Acadia, that exchange rates were always made by the work and trade of all the people in a country. It is the result of all the transactions connected with the buying and selling of goods between our country and other countries that determines the exchange rates existing between those countries. That again is influenced by the cost of producing goods in one country as against producing them in another.

Exchange controls perpetuate or endeavour to perpetuate artificiality. We had an example of that on July 5 when suddenly, and without any warning to our people, the Canadian dollar became worth ten per cent more in terms of United States and sterling currency. That situation would not have come about with such abruptness if the ordinary working of the economic forces which are continuously at play were not under the poultice and the cover of the foreign exchange control board, and we should not have had the dire results in some of our industries which followed as a consequence of that ten per cent change overnight in our exchange rate.

Let me say a word or two about what I believe is the really important matter behind this bill. The dominion government has taken unto itself the management of our whole economy. The federal power ramifies through the life of every business man and every worker in the community, not only by way of taxation, but through price and wage controls. The dominion government in its offers to the provinces has undertaken to look after all unemployment in the event of bad times, and it will guarantee a fairly stable economy provided that it is allowed to run the whole show. It will give to the provinces a bag of gold so that they can run their own shows in their own back yards. But if the dominion is to assume the responsibility for a managed economy, then there must be no one else's hand on the steering wheel. They must run all business. They must run the whole economy, to the point where it means that any other political power or any other political subdivision in Canada must become a nonentity.

We have seen what happened after five years, during which time the provinces leased their taxing powers in certain fields to the dominion.

Mr. ABBOTT: What has this to do with the foreign exchange control board?

Mr. JACKMAN: It has a great deal to do with it, because, as I shall point out in a moment, the foreign exchange control board is an arm of this creature which is gradually enclosing the whole Canadian economy and endeavouring to make of this country what we were never supposed to be, a unitary state, when we are in fact a federal state. It is the desire, I believe, to continue as a federal state, not only in my own province of Ontario but I am sure also in the province of Quebec. I believe, too, that most other provinces desire that control over their own welfare be in their own hands; they do not want it to be transferred to the federal power in Ottawa which under our constitution never had that right, and I hope never will have it under present conditions.

Mr. ABBOTT: I still ask what that has to do with the bill we are discussing.

Mr. JACKMAN: Now that the minister has given me that much help, I can go on to explain exactly where we are.

The CHAIRMAN: May I again point out to the committee that the principle of this bill was approved on second reading.

Mr. GRAYDON: Was there any debate on it?

Mr. ABBOTT: Twelve pages.

Mr. GRAYDON: That was on the resolution.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, on the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: When the bill was before the house for second reading, at which time the principle of the bill was considered, it was discussed by different members of the house, and Hansard records from ten to twelve pages of debate. I am not referring to the resolution; I am referring to the second reading. There is no doubt that when the bill was before the house for consideration on second reading there was a discussion which is recorded in Hansard. It is not the purpose of the committee of the whole to consider the principle of a bill which has already been approved. The committee is set up to consider a bill clause by clause.

I do not think the purpose of this committee is being carried out when hon. members discuss the principle of the bill. I hesitated to interrupt the hon. member for Rosedale in his opening remarks because he was replying to certain things that had been said, and I thought it was only fair that he should have that opportunity. I suggest to him and to all members of the committee that the principle of the bill should not be further discussed, but that it should be taken up clause by clause.

Mr. MacINNIS: On the point of order, I think in theory the chairman is correct, but my understanding is that in discussing section 1 of a bill there is just as much latitude allowed as there is on the second reading when the principle is being discussed. That has always been the practice. I think the hon. member for Rosedale is talking nonsense, but I think he should have the right to do it.

The CHAIRMAN: May I say to the hon. member for Vancouver East that it is my recollection that the principle of a bill is discussed on the first section in committee when the bill has not been discussed in the house on second reading. Hon. members will recall that frequently a bill receives second reading without discussion, in which case discussion is allowed on the principle when the first clause of the bill is before the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Only with the consent of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN: With the consent of the committee. That is customary. I do not think there is general consent at this time to renew the debate on the principle of the bill. Again I would ask all hon. members not to discuss the principle of the bill at this time, but rather to discuss the clauses as they are called in committee. The clause which I have called is No. 1.

Mr. JACKMAN: I believe I was paying pretty close deference to your original suggestion. This bill is of a technical nature and I do not think it was before us on the second reading. If, as you say, only twelve pages of Hansard were taken up on a matter of such great importance, parliament must have been derelict in its duty—unless there was a clear understanding that the principle or certain matters pertaining to the principle could be discussed at a subsequent time. Certainly the remarks that were made when the resolution upon which the bill is founded was discussed did not give very much indication of the severity and the true nature of the controls which were envisaged. However, if I may continue, I think what I want to say can be summed up in one sentence, namely, that the foreign exchange control bill is a very powerful arm of a managed economy.

Mr. ABBOTT: Is the hon. member opposed to this bill? Is the hon. member opposed to foreign exchange control? Let us get it straight, yes or no. This is a typical example of Conservative inconsistency—approve the principle and then criticize essential details.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is just trash.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is exactly what he is giving out.

Mr. ABBOTT: I want to find out whether the Conservative party is opposed to the foreign exchange control bill.

Mr. GRAYDON: Surely we are not going to have a short-grained government.

Mr. MACKENZIE: When the hon. member for Peel says "trash" he is speaking his own mind.

Mr. GRAYDON: If that is your strongest answer I am going to accept it. Keep your temper.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You just keep quiet.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Rosedale has the floor.

Mr. MACKENZIE: If there is going to be a dog fight, it will be a dog fight.

Mr. GRAYDON: No one knows more about that than you.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. JACKMAN: We did suggest in the committee certain matters which the minister did not see fit to accept. Had they been accepted we might have been more enthusiastic about the acceptance of this bill. What we did not find in the bill when we came to examine it in committee were certain things which the Minister of Finance led us to believe, when he introduced the resolution, we might expect to find. Let me quote what he said, and I refer hon. members to page 2547 of Hansard:

> We hope that it—
> Referring to the immediate future.
> —will be one which does not call for restrictive controls and we shall do everything in our power to bring this about.

I refer to those remarks in view of the absence of any time limit to this bill, and the refusal of the Acting Minister of Finance to adopt our suggestion that a time limit of a year, or even a slightly longer period, be put on this bill. Let me refer to what the Minister of Finance said on June 17, as reported on page 2548 of Hansard:

> When the world returns to a more normal basis we shall have a fresh look at the question.

Surely in view of those two statements one might have expected to find a time limit here. But we did not. We hope that hon. members of this house who value freedom, who believe that this matter is one which may be useful to tide over an emergency, let us say until Bretton Woods comes into effect, will consider this matter. I made my statement when the resolution was introduced in this house. I was not against the exchange controls until the time arrived when we could have a look at them to find out what other nations are going to come in under the agreements. Surely within a year or two years this bill should automatically come before parliament again to see whether or not parliament thinks the restrictions on the normal activities of our people should be continued. I cannot see any reason why the government should not be agreeable to that suggestion.

Let us consider the position of our country in regard to foreign exchange in 1939, and whether it would have been better if controls had existed during the thirties. I asked in the committee how much better off Canada would have been in 1939, when of necessity we thought it was the correct thing to impose controls in order to strengthen our sinews of war, if we had had these controls foisted upon us during the period of the thirties. There was no satisfactory answer to that. We got through the war period, we handled our exchange, we had our controls when necessary and we were all agreeable to that. If we are going to adopt the control philosophy which is sponsored by this government we might as well have had those controls all during the twenties and the thirties. But to what purpose? They would have served no useful purpose.

Mr. IRVINE: How do you know?

Mr. JACKMAN: What have we to fear in the future that we need these controls now? Reference is made to an exposed economy, but of course we as a trading nation are always exposed to other nations. If we buy too much, then we run short of United States dollars; if we sell too much and do not buy enough, then we have a surplus and some other country is embarrassed. Each country must look after its own economy; it must look after these matters, and not by exchange controls.

Are we likely to become an aggressor nation so that we shall need controls? The United States has not always been a friendly economic neighbour, but of necessity she has always been a friendly political neighbour. Controls during the last war did not save us. We ran short of United States exchange. But we had the Hyde Park agreement. There is not much doubt that if we are in a crisis at some time in the future the United States will also be behind us or we behind them because we have the same philosophy of life. Neither country is an aggressor nation, and just as they came to our financial aid in 1942 they will come to our aid again. In the meantime we could get rid of these controls and we could then trade freely, not only on current account but on capital account, with our cousins in the United States.

It was not pointed out in the committee by the witness for the government to what extent our external currency position is more hazardous now than it was in 1939. The Minister of Finance at page 2543 of Hansard reported that Canada's holdings of gold expressed in United States dollars amounted as of September 15, 1939, to $393,000,000 and on December 31, 1945, they amounted to $1,508,000,000—holdings of gold and United States dollars at the end of the war about four times as large as we had at the beginning. Yet we did not have controls then, and we got along all right without them. But now we must have controls. Why? Because we had controls during the war. Those who have this tremendous economic power just cannot understand why they should ever give it up. If they knew the effects which these controls have had in restricting private business in this country and preventing its expansion, they might even now reconsider. That was our position vis-à-vis the United States.

The Minister of Finance reported on page 2545 of Hansard that Canada's balance of indebtedness vis-à-vis the United Kingdom improved by approximately $1,500,000,000 in the course of the war. So Canada emerges from the war greatly strengthened in United States dollars and greatly strengthened in our sterling position. yet we must have controls! The reason has never been adequately set forth. The Minister of Finance in introducing the resolution by no means showed substantial and satisfactory reasons why these controls should be foisted upon us for an indefinite period.

[Mr. Jackman.]

May I ask what have we to fear? Even if we have reason to fear, what can the foreign exchange control board do about it?—even with all these ironclad regulations which prevent a Canadian, for instance, from going to the United States for a week-end without filling in forms and going to the bank and wasting time. You cannot do business without filling out innumerable forms, and generally you cannot carry on as a normal individual because of all these regulations. The board seems to think that business men have no more to do than to sit in their offices and fill out forms. What can the board do even if we have reason to fear? The star witness for the government, under a government instruction, refused to tell the committee what the loss to the Canadian taxpayer, to my constituents, was by reason of the fact that on July 5 Canada's dollar was no longer at a discount with the United States dollar but by the action of the government, on the advice of the foreign exchange control board had once again assumed parity with the United States dollar. That loss was never indicated to us, and the reason given was that it would give away the position of the board—give it away to speculators, they said, or to people with so-called "hot" money, who might do something to disrupt the Canadian economy. If the board cannot prevent disruption of Canada's economy through outside influences just because somebody knows the position of the board, how much gold and United States dollars and currency it has, what good are all these regulations? Surely business men can guess pretty well what the board is doing. They cannot help but know pretty well, and if that knowledge is going to make it possible for outside forces to disrupt our exchange position, what on earth is this board going to do anyway, with its cost and its nuisance to the Canadian people? Why is the board, on instruction from the government, refusing to tell the people of Canada how many millions, $150,000,000 or $250,000,000, of the taxpayers' money was lost when the exchange rate was changed by the action of the government?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Are you against that?

Mr. JACKMAN: I am very glad that the minister asked me if I guessed that. The star witness for the government, Mr. Rasminsky, gave us the position as of December 31, 1945, and at a subsequent meeting he pretty well indicated—I do not want to be too definite—that we would not be far off the beam if we took that figure.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Are you opposed to parity of the dollar?

Mr. JACKMAN: I am opposed to the way in which your government reached parity of the dollar. I would rather have a situation where you can make commitments, in the mining industry, for example, whose experience is fairly fresh in the minds of hon. members.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Now we will get it.

Mr. JACKMAN: You asked for it. They had contracted for labour and for supplies on the basis that they were going to get $38.50 per ounce for gold. Then the government at Ottawa changed the price of gold to $35. The effect of that was that many mines would go out of production, especially those producing gold at a high cost, and that is the situation of most of the gold mines in northern Quebec; their marginal profit was lost when the 10 per cent disappeared. Many of them will have to close down, many workmen will be thrown out of employment, and tradesmen will be worried about payment of their supplies.

What I am saying to the minister is this, that the ten per cent change was merely the reflection of economic forces working underneath, and working so hard in this case that finally even the Liberal government boiled over and was forced into action. There is no doubt in my mind that the Canadian dollar was becoming more and more valuable, or that the United States dollar was becoming less and less valuable in terms of purchasing power, and parity would have been reached much sooner under a free exchange market. May I say to the Minister of Veterans Affairs that there are business men and economists who are trained to foretell economic events but they cannot tell what is going on in the mind of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Is the hon. member against enriching the Canadian dollar as a result of the country's enrichment?

Mr. JACKMAN: I did not understand my hon. friend's question.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You would not, naturally.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is quite possible that the Canadian dollar may go to a premium over the United States dollar. It depends upon how we run our economy and how the United States run theirs. What I want is a natural working of these economic laws. Even under a stabilization fund we might have definite rates fixed by the governing body, but we hope that the rate will not jump ten per cent at a time but vary only one or two per cent.

Just along that line the Minister of Finance had something to say when he introduced the resolution. He said, as reported on page 2541 speaking of the action of the foreign exchange control board during the years:

> I believe that the house will agree that the complete stability of exchange rates which has been maintained since September, 1939, has been of great advantage to the Canadian economy.

I will not disagree with him, but to put a ten per cent jump all at once is something which no industry can very well stand. The only reason that the newsprint industry, one of our largest manufacturing industries, was able to stand it, was that there being a seller's market in the United States, they were able to increase their prices in terms of United States currency another ten per cent and in that way equate themselves. The gold industry could not do that. What use are these controls if they cannot control? Why is the board unwilling to let us know the extent of the loss suffered by the country on July 5?

Mr. ABBOTT: That will be disclosed in the next annual report.

Mr. JACKMAN: That will be a long time.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The thought comes to me, of what use is the chairman of the committee if he cannot control the proceedings in the committee? I think all members in the committee agree that the bill was discussed on second reading and that the principle was approved. It is not in order to discuss the principle when the bill gets in committee of the whole. So far the remarks of most hon. members in the committee have been directed to the principle of the bill.

Mr. STIRLING: Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN: To my mind that is the wrong procedure. The committee is set up for a purpose, and the purpose is not the same as the purpose of consideration of a matter in the house. When the bill is before the house the principle only is discussed; the sections of the bill are not discussed. In committee the reverse holds; the sections are discussed and not the principle. Of course I am in the hands of the committee. If the committee wants to continue the discussion of the principle, I will not interfere with the speakers, but otherwise I feel it my duty to call an hon. member to order when he is discussing the principle of the bill and not the sections.

Mr. HACKETT: On the point of order, I did not recall that the principle of the bill had been accepted; so since you, Mr. Chairman, made that statement I took the trouble of turning up the debate. Naturally I have read it over hastily, but I cannot on the reading agree with your statement of fact.

Mr. ABBOTT: May I refer my hon. friend to page 2539 of Hansard? He will find the statement there.

Mr. HACKETT: I am looking now at page 3039.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, but refer to what the Minister of Finance said at page 2539. The leader of the opposition raised this question as to the discussion of the principle of the bill on second reading, and the minister replied. Would my hon. friend care to look at it? Or, I will read it; it is short.

Mr. HACKETT: We will come now to the second reading of this bill and refer to Hansard at page 3039. The Acting Minister of Finance there moved second reading, whereupon the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario said:

> I had understood that there was to be a motion to refer the bill to the banking and commerce committee. Did I misunderstand?

Then the acting minister answered, and he said that he did not wish to curtail the debate:

> As the minister indicated, there is no desire to curtail debate on the second reading, although in the interest of expediting the business of the house I perhaps might express the hope that the greater part of the discussion and questions with respect to this rather technical bill might well take place before the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. ABBOTT: And they did.

Mr. HACKETT: Whereupon the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario pointed out in a couple of sentences two fundamental objections to the bill, and said no more. Now, unless, Mr. Chairman, I have overlooked something in the expressed opinion of the official opposition, there was no concurrence in the principle of the bill. I know, sir, that your duties are manifold and are not easy of discharge. The doctrine of infallibility does not apply either to you or to me, and it may be that I have overlooked something, but I do think that this is a matter of the utmost importance, and I know that my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance would not wish to curtail discussion, which after all is beneficial in a matter so far-reaching as this.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not attempted to curtail discussion, Mr. Chairman; but as the committee knows, the general rule followed is that the principle of a bill is approved when it is given second reading. This question was raised on the resolution preceding the introduction of the bill, Hansard, page 2539. The leader of the opposition asked this question:

> Mr. Bracken: I understood that the minister was willing to have this bill go before a committee of the house. Is he willing that it should go before the committee before the second reading?

The Minister of Finance replied:

> I do not think that course should be taken on a bill such as this. Rarely a small or unimportant bill is referred to a committee without first approving the principle, but I think the principle of a bill as important as this should be approved before it goes to the banking and commerce committee. When it comes back from that committee there will be opportunity to amend it in the committee of the whole and, on the third reading, to defeat it, or move the six months' hoist, if anyone desires to make such a motion. After the second reading I am suggesting that the bill be referred to the banking and commerce committee, as was done with the Bank Act.

It is true that the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario did not make extended remarks. The hon. member for Acadia made rather more extended remarks, and the hon. member for Vancouver East spoke on it. I submit there can be no doubt that the principle of this bill was approved when it was given first reading.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Also on this point, what the minister says is perfectly true; nevertheless on July 2, I submit, the atmosphere of that discussion was indicated in the words of his which were read before:

> . . . there is no desire to curtail debate on the second reading, although in the interest of expediting the business of the house I might perhaps express the hope that the greater part of the discussion and questions with respect to this rather technical bill might well take place before the banking and commerce committee.

I submit it is a fair interpretation that the whole tenor or implication of that discussion was that we were to reserve our remarks and not go into detail until we had—

Mr. ABBOTT: Precisely, and we discussed it, Mr. Chairman. Everything without exception which has been said in this committee to-day is in effect a repetition of what took place before the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. JACKMAN: Not everything.

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh yes, all of it. I followed these proceedings pretty closely.

Mr. HACKETT: I draw to the attention of the minister the fact that on the same page, 2539, a line or two below where he stopped reading, we find the following statement by the leader of the opposition:

Mr. Bracken: So far as the official opposition are concerned we shall be glad to facilitate passage of the measure up to the second reading, on the understanding that there will be an opportunity for study of the bill before the debate on the second reading begins.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. Carry on, now. Then comes a statement by the minister.

Mr. HACKETT: The Minister of Finance said:

I shall not move the second reading for a few days, because there ought to be an opportunity for hon. gentlemen to study the bill. But I think it is important to get through all these early stages, and I cannot do that without making an extensive speech on the resolution.

Mr. Bracken: That is satisfactory.

Mr. ABBOTT: And second reading was not moved until July 2.

Mr. HACKETT: Nowhere do we find—and I am willing to carry the search farther—anything that savours of acquiescence by the official opposition in the principle of the bill. We have a great deal to do here and we cannot be in entire agreement. Indeed, that is the reason for the existence of this body, that we may thresh out our disagreements. Surely, therefore, the assertion should not be made that we have agreed when there is nothing to warrant such an assertion. To say that the official opposition has acquiesced in a bill which imposes control without a time limit on the life and destiny of the whole people, is to make an assertion for which, I submit, there is no warrant. I would ask you therefore, Mr. Chairman, after having taken cognizance of the record, to permit the debate to go on as if the principle of the bill were under discussion.

Mr. JACKMAN: On page 2539 of Hansard the Minister of Finance is reported as follows:

My suggestion would be that the questions—

I pause there for a moment, because this is a highly complicated and most technical bill; and while it affects the generality of our people, even our humblest constituents, it affects to a greater extent those engaged in commerce and those having to do with foreign exchange. Without a thorough understanding of the bill and all that it entails, it would have been virtually impossible to understand what the principle behind it was, and that understanding can be gained only by means of questioning. I come back, therefore, to the statement made by the Minister of Finance on the page to which I have just referred:

My suggestion would be that the questions be asked in the banking and commerce committee. That is by far the best place to ask questions. This is a most inappropriate stage at which to answer, if not to ask, questions on a measure of this kind, because the bill itself is not before the house. It is a 74-section bill. There can be any amount of debate on the second reading—although I hope there will not be any—and every opportunity to ask questions when the bill is taken up section by section in the banking and commerce committee.

I am not suggesting that the Acting Minister of Finance is not endeavouring to interpret this in the proper spirit, but the spirit of the section and the declaration by the Minister of Finance were that we should have an opportunity to ask these questions in the most appropriate place, namely, in the committee. Moreover, I am suggesting that, without an understanding of what is behind the bill, it was hard to appreciate what was involved in the principle. Therefore I feel that we are not suggesting any undue stretching of the rules in asking you, Mr. Chairman, to allow us to continue our discussion of the principle as applied to the sections. As you recall, sir, the section with which I was dealing had to do with the time during which the bill, if adopted, would be applicable.

Mr. IRVINE: With respect to this point of order, I cannot see why my hon. friend, who desires to object to certain restrictive provisions in the bill, cannot raise those objections on the particular clause in which the restriction is to be enacted. I think we should confine our discussion to each section as we come to it. That would make for progress. I cannot see why the hon. gentleman would not have the fullest opportunity to do all his objecting without rehashing the general principle of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: I thank all hon. members for the assistance they have given me in trying to come to a conclusion on the rule to be interpreted. There is general accord so far as the meaning of the rule is concerned, and that is that the principle of the bill should not be discussed at this time, and could be discussed at this stage only under special circumstances and with the unanimous consent of the committee. Hon. members have referred to what took place in the resolution stage. I would point out that the Minister of Finance suggested that there should not be a great deal of discussion at that time since hon. members had not the bill before them. Several weeks intervened before the bill was presented to the house for second reading, during which time all hon. members had every opportunity to examine the bill. The references that have been made to the committee are in all instances references to the committee on banking and commerce. The minister's suggestion was not that the questions be asked in committee of the whole. His suggestion was, if hon. members will read his remarks, that the questions be asked when the bill was before the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. HACKETT: That is not denied.

The CHAIRMAN: That, I presume, has been done. The bill was before the house in the resolution stage when there was some discussion, and again it was before the house on second reading when, without doubt, the principle was adopted.

Mr. HACKETT: By whom?

The CHAIRMAN: By vote of the house. That is the record and I can only go by the record. The bill was then referred to the banking and commerce committee where, I take it, questions were asked, and probably the principle was again discussed. It was then reported to the committee of the whole. It is suggested that I interpret the rule differently. I am powerless to do so. As I have said, however, I am in the hands of the committee and, unless I am instructed otherwise, it is my duty to insist that at this stage the principle be not discussed but that the bill be discussed clause by clause. That is my ruling.

Mr. HACKETT: I would point out that the minister has stated on several occasions that the principle of the bill has been accepted by the official opposition.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not say that. I said it had been accepted by the house, and the official opposition did not vote against it.

Mr. HACKETT: I call the attention of the Chairman to the fact that the minister has said it was accepted by the official opposition, and I further point out to the Chair that that is an inaccuracy. We thought we had an undertaking which would enable us to discuss the principle at this time but, apparently, according to the ruling of the Chair, I am in error in that regard.

The CHAIRMAN: I hope I did not say that the bill in principle had been accepted by the opposition. If I did I made a mistake. I meant to say, and I believe I did say, that according to the record the principle had been adopted by the house.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, principle or no principle, you should pay no attention to the shadow-boxing of the Progressive Conservative party.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

[The Chairman.]

On section 5—Exchange fund account continued.

Mr. FULTON: This section has been amended on the recommendation of the banking and commerce committee. The amendment is incorporated in subsection 4 of section 5, and it will be observed that subsection 4 requires the minister to report to parliament within thirty days after the 31st day of March the amounts authorized by the governor in council under paragraph (c) of subsection 2 of this section. Paragraph (c) deals with the transactions of the board in the currencies of countries other than the United States and apart from gold. Gold is covered under paragraph (a), and United States currency under paragraph (b). I have been looking through the records of the banking and commerce committee and I cannot find the reason why paragraph (c) was the only one which was affected by the amendment. It seems to me there would be equal reason for paragraphs (a) and (b) to be affected by the amendment, requiring the minister to table the information in the house or to have it published in the Canada Gazette. I would ask if the minister would accept an amendment inserting paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) in place of (c) only.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, with the consent of the committee I should like to revert to section 4, which passed very quickly.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Order. Could we first dispose of section 5?

Mr. POULIOT: Very well; I shall speak on section 5 in relation to section 4. This is supposed to be under the Minister of Finance, and the Minister of Finance is supposed to be the big boss of the foreign exchange control board. What I have contended in the house, what I have submitted every time I have mentioned these matters, is that the minister shall be responsible to the house; and I cannot understand how hon. members could have let section 4 pass like that without saying a word. I have to come back from the east to remind the house of these elementary matters in constitutional practice. Section 5 refers to the exchange fund account. It is an exchange fund account under the Minister of Finance, who is not responsible to the house for the foreign exchange control board. Those people are above parliament, and how many times have I protested against that loudly and strongly. I have left no stone unturned in protesting against encroachments upon our constitution with regard to the foreign exchange control board, the Bank of Canada and all similar organizations.

Mr. FULTON: I wonder if I might point out that the very purpose of my amendment was to bring information on gold and United States currency transactions to the house by requiring the minister to table it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall answer that in a moment. It is covered by another section.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member for Kamloops cannot complain if I speak in the same vein, then, though that seldom happens. Here we have a matter of tremendous importance to the Canadian people, the question of foreign exchange. What happened? Not long ago there was a considerable change in our rate of exchange. We were paying a premium of ten per cent on United States dollars. Overnight that was changed. Many people had paid the premium on American money in the normal way; but when they went to the bank to get the premium back, the day after, they could get nothing at all. How is it that no member of parliament rises to complain on behalf of those people, and those who had contracts with Americans, and who found those contracts considerably changed because of the action of the foreign exchange control board? Members of parliament heard nothing about it; the change was made bringing up our currency to the same level; it was done overnight, and now this section passes like the Chicago flyer, at full speed. It is railroaded through, and no member of parliament protests against it here in the house. It takes one who comes from the east to remind everyone in this house that we have a supreme duty to defend the rights of the Canadian people with regard to the foreign exchange control board as with regard to any other matter. Here we are now, just the same as when the Bank of Canada Act was discussed by the banking and commerce committee. The attention of hon. members is adroitly turned to another matter; it is carefully directed to one side, in order that they may forget the elementary matters, the elementary principles we have to defend in this house. How often do I hear hon. members complain about bureaucracy? Here we have bureaucracy at its worst, and it is swallowed like spring water.

Mr. HACKETT: By whom?

Mr. POULIOT: By everybody.

Mr. HACKETT: Not by me.

Mr. POULIOT: I hope not, but the hon. gentleman did not rise when section 4 was called and passed, railroaded through. I was the one to rise and awaken the hon. member for Stanstead to the fact that there is a danger here that should be noted by every member of this house. Now that he is awake, I hope he will not fall asleep again right away.

Mr. HACKETT: He has not fallen asleep for some time, nor has he been absent.

Mr. POULIOT: What has he been doing about the matter? Nothing; yet he complains about bureaucracy all the time. He curses bureaucracy, but when the time comes to curb bureaucracy he is not here; he has gone away.

Mr. FULTON: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. POULIOT: I am not to be interrupted by anyone when I have the floor, and I have the floor now.

Mr. FULTON: I asked the hon. member to permit a question.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. gentleman has not the right to interrupt when I am speaking.

Mr. FULTON: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. POULIOT: No. I have the floor, and I hold it. How many times have I done my best to try to awaken members of the House of Commons to a sense of reality, to a sense of their responsibility, but they were Rip Van Winkles, sleeping beauties. There they are; and that is what the Canadian people say from coast to coast, that they are asleep. When they do speak out they speak as somnambulists. Here they are shadow-boxing all the time, complaining about the policies of the government when they have no constructive policies of their own to suggest. They only repeat the same useless criticism.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Just a wilderness.

Mr. POULIOT: A voice in the wilderness? I wonder if the Minister of Veterans Affairs is not wilderness personified, especially when he uses the strong language of the highlands in this house. But now we can do something for this country; we can curb the powers of the foreign exchange control board. In the banking committee members have been listening to Charybdis and Scylla, in the form of Louis Rasminsky. He has a fine voice; he was listened to by all hon. members, who said, "That gentleman has polished manners. We must believe in him". That is not a reason. You can pick up a dude anywhere who has polished manners, who has a facial massage every day, who has scent, who has a shampoo every day, who is dressed up by the finest tailors in this country. That is not a qualification to put him in charge of the foreign exchange control board.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The members of the committee have unanimously agreed that they would direct their remarks to the section under consideration. At the present time the committee is considering section 5, and I would ask the hon. member for Temiscouata to direct his remarks to that section.

Mr. HACKETT: On a point of privilege, Mr. Chairman, may I say the committee has not come to that decision unanimously; it is the Chairman who has reached it.

The CHAIRMAN: Then may I say that until the committee comes to some other unanimous decision it is my duty as Chairman to see that the remarks of all hon. members are directed to the section under consideration, in accordance with standing order 58. We are on section 5.

Mr. POULIOT: Sir, I agree with you entirely. Section 5 concerns the exchange fund account:

> The special account in the name of the Minister of Finance, known as the exchange fund account, established by the Bank of Canada, pursuant to The Exchange Fund Act, is continued and all gold, currency, deposits, securities and other investments purchased or acquired with moneys out of the said account by or on behalf of the minister and held by him or on his behalf for the said account shall continue to be so held.

That account was held by him or on his behalf. And if it is held on his behalf, then by whom is it held on his behalf if it is not held by Louis Rasminsky and all the other big-wigs who control the foreign exchange control board? Therefore, sir, I am perfectly in order when I mention what shall be and what shall not be the qualifications of those who held that fund on behalf of the minister, as indicated in section 5 (1).

Everyone knows that when the word "minister" is used in that section, it shall be interpreted without forgetting paragraph (1) of the interpretation section which says:

> "Minister" means the Minister of Finance.

But that definition is not complete, because "minister" means not only the Minister of Finance but also all those who act on his behalf, if we follow section 5. Therefore I submit I am perfectly in order when I mention what shall be and what shall not be the qualifications of those acting on behalf of the the Minister of Finance.

Hon. members know very well some people have boasted that fifteen days before the Canadian dollar was placed on a parity with the United States dollar, there were stock-market dealings which gave evidence that it was known by a small group of privileged people what the decision was to be with regard to the ten per cent which had been paid on the Canadian dollar in the purchase of United States funds. It was denied in some quarters, but one has only to look at the file of newspapers to see the sales made on the stock market in order to realize that there had been a leak.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is completely mistaken in that.

Mr. POULIOT: I may be mistaken, but the records are there in the daily press. One has only to look at them. I will not say that it was done wilfully; probably it just happened that way. But some good Canadian people have been placed in a very wrong and difficult position precisely because that change was made overnight.

The foreign exchange control board is an institution which considers itself far above parliament. We are here to-day to analyse the situation. If there are men who have the power to curb the influence of the foreign exchange control board, then it must be members of parliament, if they were to unite together. I make an earnest appeal to all members who are liberal-minded, whether they belong to one group or to another, to unite and to show the government that they are the bosses in this chamber.

Why should we discuss this matter until the millennium, to improve conditions that cannot be improved unless some radical change is made? It is possible for members of the House of Commons to take control of power, if they will forget their party prejudices, and to make reforms so badly needed in this country, as badly needed in the foreign exchange control board as in the Bank of Canada.

That is what should be done, and I appeal to hon. members once again. I appeal to their sense of duty to forget the party line or the party bonds which keep them with an inferiority complex in regard to the bureaucrats who ruled this country during the war.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must again remind the hon. member for Temiscouata of standing order 58 (2), which reads:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

Mr. FULTON: Speaking to a point of order, may I say that I had raised a question in connection with section 5, and then took my seat to give the minister, as I thought he was about to do, a chance to reply. Actually the hon. member for Temiscouata took the minister's place, and really took what was my place in addition, and he refused to allow me to ask my question. I am bound by the rules of committee, but I would ask that the hon. member make his interruption brief so that the minister and I may resume our discussion.

Mr. POULIOT: There was no point of order in what the hon. member said.

Mr. FULTON: Yes, I have raised a point of order. May I have the floor?

Mr. POULIOT: I had the floor, and I do not want to be interrupted. I sat down when the hon. member rose to speak, but I will tell you why I am so insistent—

Mr. FULTON: Again speaking to a point of order, I would ask for the Chairman's ruling as to who has the floor?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Kamloops did ask a question of the Acting Minister of Finance, and it was my impression that the minister was considering the amendment which had been made. While he was considering the amendment the hon. member for Temiscouata commenced his address, and has the floor at the present time.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you, sir. But I will tell you now why I am so insistent and so persistent regarding section 5 (2). It is because I remember the time when all the gold and currency held by the Canadian treasury, and all the securities in the treasury of this country were kept in the east block under the custody of the Minister of Finance. I also remember, sir, the day when all that gold, securities and currency was transferred by truck to the vaults of the Bank of Canada, not to be under the control of the Bank of Canada, mark you, but to be under the control of the foreign exchange control board.

I wonder why some members are silent about this matter, because the foreign exchange control board holds all the gold, all the securities and all the treasury notes which form the national wealth of the country, and which are the guarantee of the bank notes issued by the Bank of Canada. Long before the hon. member for Kamloops was elected, I warned the House of Commons in committee of the whole, in committee of supply and in other committees that it was absurd to have Canada bank notes issued by the Bank of Canada when the securities were in the hands of the foreign exchange control board.

Who thought of that? The promise to pay is made by the Bank of Canada, and the guarantee is in the hands of the foreign exchange control board. That is on record in Hansard. There is discrimination; there is disparity; there is something that I cannot understand about it. All that should be either in the hands of the Bank of Canada which issues the bank notes or under the Minister of Finance. These notes should be issued in the name of the Dominion of Canada instead of being issued by the Bank of Canada.

I do not think it can be said that I am not in order when I remind the committee of these things because they should be known to all hon. members. Hon. members should be warned against the excessive powers that have been given to the foreign exchange control board. Our Social Credit friends complain about the monetary policies of this government, but this is one reform they should advocate, that all the treasure of this country, all the gold and securities, all the wealth that is in the hands of the foreign exchange control board should be placed in the hands of the Minister of Finance so that he may be responsible to parliament for all financial legislation passed by this house. That would be an easy thing to do.

That is what was done in the past. That is following the tradition of Fielding, a Liberal; it is following the tradition of White, a Conservative; it is following the tradition of Jim Robb, one of the last Liberals who was Minister of Finance. I want those hon. members to leave aside all their abstractions and get down to brass tacks. I want them to advocate reforms that are practical, reforms that can be brought about. Instead of getting into new fields that are unknown to all they should get back to the sound traditions of the past so that we could have parliamentary control to prevent waste and foolish expenditures. If all the expenditures that have been made by the foreign exchange control board had been submitted to the rigid control of the house the financial condition of this country at the present time would be different from what it is.

I am not saying this to discourage my hon. friends of the Social Credit group or of any other party in this house; I say this in order to encourage them to learn the history of Canada, to learn the lessons of the past, to remember those things which were good in the past so that we may come back to them and improve conditions instead of making them worse.

Mr. HANSELL: Why not teach the government? We are not in office.

Mr. POULIOT: No, but I want the support of hon. members. I am putting things in black and white; and I am hopeful that my hon. friends will end up by supporting these submissions which are made, not only to the government and to the members of the government but to the members of all parties and groups in this house. In saying these things I do not speak as a government supporter; I speak as a Liberal who wants reform in this country. I think we shall be able to have reform only by men of good will in this house uniting together to secure it.

Then there is the question of infallibility; some people feel that they cannot make a mistake, that they are infallible, that they are always right. They may be right in abstract but it is much better to be right in fact. It is much better to redress wrongs, to improve conditions for all Canadian taxpayers so that they may have a ray of hope for the future.

I assume that my hon. friends are for public finance; I assume that they believe that the Minister of Finance should be responsible to the House of Commons for all that is done by the various agencies under his control. Not only is that the Liberal policy of the past; it is the Conservative policy of the past. Since there have been only two major parties, that was the policy of Canadian statesmen for the past fifty or sixty years. That was the policy until this organization was set up, an organization which was copied from organizations in other countries.

Why could the Minister of Finance not deal directly with other nations in connection with monetary matters? Why does he need the assistance of a board which is not responsible to parliament, which is composed of members of the intelligentsia which all of us curse, if not openly at least secretly, on occasion.

Mr. ABBOTT: The assistance of deputy ministers.

Mr. POULIOT: He is the worst of the intelligentsia and he should have been fired long time ago.

Mr. ABBOTT: There are five or six of them.

Mr. POULIOT: I named them already and I shall not name them again. The trouble with the government is that it will never admit its mistakes. I suggested to the government to fire all these so-called fine brains which are a curse to the country and to the private individual. But I was told that they were great Liberals. They are great Liberals that are bringing this country on the rocks and it is time that the House of Commons awakened to its responsibilities. We should see through the veil of propaganda that is put out on behalf of these men who are incompetent and unworthy of the high office they hold at the expense and suffering of the Canadian people.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

I cannot understand why the big bankers who are supposed to be so powerful did not protest when the wealth which is behind the Canadian bank notes was transferred from the vaults in the east block where the privy council sits to the vaults of the Bank of Canada. Why did they not raise their voices in protest? The bankers were mute just as they were when the Bank of Canada was instituted.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, yes; carried. The plain fact is that the banks were derelict in their duty. My hon. friend in the Social Credit group is suggesting that I should not proceed, but I am saying exactly what they should have said and what they would have said if they had been well informed as to the real situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not very much impressed by the Minister of Veterans Affairs when he says "order."

Mr. MACKENZIE: The Minister of Veterans Affairs is not impressed by the hon. member.

Mr. POULIOT: I know that and I am sorry for him.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. My concern is whether or not the hon. member is directing his remarks to clause 5. At times it occurred to me that they might have been very remotely related to clause 5. May I ask him to direct his remarks to that clause which has to do with—and I read the marginal notes—"exchange fund account continued; minister may purchase gold, currencies, securities, etc.; minister may sell gold, currency, securities, etc.; report to parliament."

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir. I have another observation to make. In the meantime, Mr. Chairman, you and my hon. colleagues will understand that I at least have made a solemn protest against this legislation.

Another ground of complaint that I have—and I lodge it as a Canadian and a Liberal—is this. When we got gold from Great Britain in payment of our exports, that gold was turned over to the United States, not to the credit of Canada but to the credit of Great Britain.

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, yes; it was stated by the finance minister in one of his speeches that the last payment of gold that we had received from Great Britain in 1940 or 1941 was turned over to the United States in part payment of obligations contracted by the United Kingdom in that country. I protest against that. I have numerous other grounds of complaint; but I shall wait a little before I submit them to you, sir, and in the meantime I am anxious to hear what suggestions my hon. friends and colleagues have to make to the minister.

Mr. FULTON: May I amplify a question I asked of the minister? I asked if he would accept an amendment. I did not move one. I am sure that the hon. member for Temiscouata had no desire to be unfair or to misrepresent members on this side, but he was not strictly accurate when he said that no member of the house other than himself was concerned to limit the powers of the foreign exchange control board. I have in mind an amendment to section 5 requiring the minister to table in the house or insert in the Canada Gazette full information as to the dealings of the board to enable parliament to exercise control over his responsibility and the conduct of the board. That is the object of my amendment.

Mr. ABBOTT: Would my hon. friend allow me to give a word of explanation before he moves his amendment, because I think he may have overlooked another section which also deals with this matter. There are three sections under which information is to be given, and after he hears my explanation he may conclude that his amendment is not necessary; I do not know. But I would appreciate the opportunity of making the explanation.

Mr. FULTON: I shall be glad to do that. Would the minister accept my suggestion to include paragraphs (a), (b) and (d)?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not believe it is necessary, for the following reasons. If my hon. friend will look at section 5 he will see that there is no limit placed on the amount of gold or United States currency that the board may hold, but there is a limit fixed by the governor in council on the amount of foreign currencies other than gold or currency of the United States. Under subsection 4 of section 5 a report must be made to parliament stating the amounts of all these other currencies authorized to be held, and under section 7 a report must be made to parliament, or be published in the Canada Gazette if parliament is not then sitting, with respect to advances made to the exchange fund. Then under section 39 the annual report of the board, which would contain full information as to the holdings of gold and United States currency, has to be made within five months after the 31st day of December. Hon. members who were on the banking and commerce committee will recall that on the suggestion of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario the period was shortened from six to five months to ensure that the information would be available, if possible, when parliament was in session. So that under section 5 (4), section 7 (2) and section 39 (1) and (2) the information which my hon. friend suggests should be made available, and which I agree should be made available as to paragraphs (a) and (b) of section 5, will be produced. It is not felt desirable to disclose the holdings of gold and United States currency sooner than five months after the end of the fiscal year. That is the reason why the disclosure as to those holdings is covered by section 39.

Mr. JACKMAN: Why?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised by those who are familiar with foreign exchange control operations that in order to prevent undue speculative transactions a period of five months is necessary. These three amendments were made as a result of the discussions that took place in the committee. I am convinced that my hon. friend's point is covered. As the committee will see, if parliament should not then be sitting the information has to be published in the Canada Gazette and be tabled in parliament immediately following the commencement of the next session.

Mr. FULTON: That covers part of my suggested amendment but not altogether. Admittedly amendments were adopted as a result of the deliberations of the banking and commerce committee, but they did not meet the purpose we had in mind when we asked that the information be given to parliament earlier than is now provided. My suggested amendment is a further attempt to comply with our desire to have the information quickly.

To illustrate the necessity of my amendment, and in answer to the minister's statement that two other sections take care of the subject-matter of my request, I would refer him to what took place in the house on July 22, to be found on page 3667 of Hansard when, in answer to a question by the hon. member for York West as to what other countries besides the United States Canada sold gold during the fiscal years 1943, 1944 and 1945, the parliamentary assistant to the minister replied:

As such transactions reflect the exchange policies and transactions of foreign countries or central banks, it is not considered desirable to give details regarding them.

One of the objections taken by this party to the bill is that it sets up another board which to some extent is subject to the criticism advanced by the hon. member for Temiscouata, in that it is not directly responsible to parliament. Parliament attempts to get information and is sometimes denied that information. The answer is frequently given, when we criticize the policies of the board and say that it is a supreme board, that if any objection is taken to the policies of the board it can be raised in the banking and commerce committee or in parliament. That would be all right if it were a true picture; but it is not, because frequently the information sought is denied, and how can we criticize the policy of the board and say that they are not administering the act in the interests of the country if we are denied the information on grounds of public policy? We are told: We cannot tell you with whom we have had dealings or how much gold we hold because it is not in the public interest to disclose that information. We are further told that if we have any objections to the way in which this board is carrying on there is the high court of parliament to which to appeal. But what sort of appeal can one make when the facts on which parliament could base its judgment are withheld from it? So the purpose of my amendment is to ensure that we get full information as to the holdings in gold, in currency of the United States, in currency of countries other than the United States, and of securities of or guaranteed by the dominion. Those are the four classes covered by section 5(2) (a), (b), (c) and (d). All we ask is that information with regard to these holdings be tabled at the same time as the information with regard to the holdings of currency of the United States and be reported to parliament within thirty days after March 31.

Mr. ABBOTT: The date March 31 does not apply to the United States currency but only to other currencies.

Mr. FULTON: Yes. I should have said, so that the holdings in gold, United States currency and Dominion of Canada securities shall be reported at the same time as the holdings of currencies of other countries and reported by virtue of subsection 4 of section 5. The reason I ask that is that, as matters stand, we cannot obtain the information which is required to enable us to make an intelligent criticism of the policies of the board. Unless we can get that information we are handing over our powers and will be in a position where we cannot make a criticism, for we shall be told, "You gave the board that power in the first place and, now that the board is administering the fund in accordance with the act, you can have no objection". So long as we cannot get the information we are not able to make an intelligent criticism, and it is to enable us to do this that I move the amendment.

Mr. ABBOTT: I should just like to answer that by saying that, if my hon. friend insists, perhaps he had better move the amendment, but I cannot accept it.

Mr. FULTON: I move:

That section 5 of the bill be amended by deleting the words "paragraph (c)" where they appear in lines 37 and 38 of subsection (4) thereof and inserting in their place the words "paragraphs (a), (b), (c) and (d)."

The CHAIRMAN: Is the committee ready for the amendment?

Mr. ABBOTT: May I comment on it first? The amendment as it is put will be largely meaningless. I cannot accept it even if it were changed to put it in the terms which I think my hon. friend wants. Subsection 2, paragraphs (a) and (b) authorize the minister to purchase with moneys in the exchange fund account gold or currency of the United States. There is no limitation placed on the amounts. Under paragraph (c) the minister may purchase currencies of other countries up to such amounts as may be authorized from time to time by the governor in council. Subsection 4 of this section requires the minister to report to parliament or publish in the Canada Gazette the extent of the authorization to purchase foreign currencies, but not necessarily the amount of such foreign currencies held at that time. That information is given to parliament in the annual report of the board, which under the amended section which we shall come to in a moment, must be tabled not later than five months after the end of the year. The information will be made available and it can be discussed in parliament. The amendment of section 39 was put in expressly so that parliament would have an opportunity of doing so; and in all the five or six years I have been here parliament has been in session in the month of May, so that I think my hon. friend is mistaken when he says that we shall not have an opportunity of discussing this matter with knowledge of the facts. The government must come before parliament each year with an appropriation for the expenses of this board. That is going to afford a full opportunity each year for criticism and discussion of these operations, and under section 4, which we passed a moment ago, the board is responsible to the minister. Therefore I cannot accept my hon. friend's amendment.

Mr. FULTON: I do not quite appreciate the reason for the minister's reluctance to disclose the amounts which have been expended on the purchase of gold or currency of the United States. We fully discussed this matter in the banking and commerce committee, and in order to save the time of the committee, I am not going to repeat all the arguments we advanced at that time, but I would point out that at present we are limited to a very great extent in making an intelligent criticism of the effect on the gold and United States currency holdings of the board of the restoration of the Canadian dollar to par with the United States dollar, by the fact that we do not know how much gold or United States currency the board holds. All that this is is an attempt to get this information before parliament earlier than would otherwise be the case.

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot agree that that information should be given sooner than the 31st of May in each year for the figures as of the preceding December 31.

Mr. FULTON: Well, if that is the case, and the minister refuses to accept the amendment, I will close by pointing out again to the committee of the whole that the effect of the amendment is merely to enable parliament to obtain, sooner than would otherwise be the case, information which would enable it to make an intelligent criticism of the operation of this board, and information which, if it had it now, would enable it to understand fully the effects of the restoration of the Canadian dollar to par in so far as any losses in United States holdings in the foreign exchange control board are concerned. At present we cannot make that criticism.

Mr. POULIOT: I can hardly support the amendment of the hon. gentleman because, for me, the only possible reform of the exchange control board would be to abolish it.

Amendment (Mr. Fulton) negatived.

Mr. HACKETT: This is an important section, because it confers upon an agency of the government great powers. The pedigree of an idea is sometimes interesting, and the idea incorporated in this section may be found, if nowhere else, in the Regina programme of the C.C.F. party. One finds in that document, in the second paragraph, the following:

> We aim to replace the present capitalist system.

Then, under the heading of planning:

> The first step in this direction will be the setting up of a national planning commission consisting of a small body of economists, engineers and statisticians, assisted by an appropriate technical staff.

Which to an extent might be either the wartime prices and trade board or the foreign exchange control board.

A little further down in this same programme of the socialist party one finds this statement:

> The commission will be responsible to the cabinet and will work in cooperation with the managing boards of the socialized industries.

Under the second paragraph, which bears the heading, "Socialization of Finance", we find this statement:

> Control of finance is the first step to the control of the whole economy. The chartered banks must be socialized and removed from the control of privaite profit-seeking interests; and the national banking system thus established must have at its head a central bank to control the flow of credit and the general price level, and to regulate foreign exchange operations.

I point out that this is a socialistic enactment, and because it is I am fearful of it, fearful of the principle which places in government the management and control of our economic system. The control of production, of wealth, is the control of human life itself. The relationship between what we sometimes call money or credit and production is so intimate that if we yield up the control of these essential elements to the government we are yielding to it control over our persons as well as over our property.

Mr. IRVINE: Will the hon. member not admit that almost every nation of the world to-day, whether socialist or capitalist, has found it necessary to resort to some form of control of exchange?

Mr. HACKETT: It is true that forms of control of exchange have been, shall I say, foisted on many an unfortunate people. Control of exchange obtained in Japan, in Italy, in Germany; it obtains, so far as our information goes, in Russia; and wherever these controls do obtain there has ceased to be any political liberty. The existence of party, as we know it, has been eliminated and replaced by a dictatorial oligarchy which has rendered life completely devoid of freedom.

To pursue the question further: forms of control have been introduced, I believe, in Australia amid great financial and fiscal anxiety and upheaval, and likewise in New Zealand. Forms of control were introduced into France so effectively that France stood on the threshold of civil war and public commotion at the outbreak of the great war, and so effectively was that country hampered by the socialistic system that it failed in a moment of great crisis in what many Frenchmen considered to be their high mission.

We come now to England and we find there a system of control. The necessities of that great country have brought upon it very sad days. Whether financial control will succeed in relieving the situation of that people we know not. We know that under that system it has required the assistance of people like ourselves and the United States, and it is too soon yet to say to what extent it will succeed. But there are indications in the by-elections that have been recently held in England that the people have not confidence in their government, that it is a waning quantity. In the general election, the government supporter was elected by 19,000—that was less than a year ago—a successor to him has been elected in a very recent by-election by a very meagre majority.

The CHAIRMAN: May I interrupt the hon. member to remind him of standing order 58, subsection 2, which stipulates that speeches in committee shall be not only relevant, but strictly relevant to the item under consideration.

Mr. HACKETT: I am grateful to the Chairman for his admonition. I may say, in the first place, that I was endeavouring to answer a relevant and pertinent question by the hon. member for Cariboo. In the second place, I submit that anything I have said is entirely within the scope of section 5, which is now under discussion. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that almost the entire bill seeds and stems from this section 5 and that I would be able, without going beyond the terms of the section, to discuss the bill in its widest aspects, because the germ of the whole enactment is here.

The words "exchange fund account" are above the section. The exchange fund account is a very large one. The minister will correct me if I am wrong, but it is several hundreds of millions, and possibly a billion dollars. Just how did that come into existence? Exchange is or was a commodity that was sold on the market like wheat or lumber. Competition in that market was very keen. The normal rate was one-eighth of one per cent. But when the amount was one of any size it frequently was reduced to one-sixty-fourth, and competition was so keen toward the end of the period which preceded control that it sometimes took a magnifying glass for the banks to find a profit. But when government came into control it immediately determined that the exchange should be one per cent. The government bought United States exchange for $1.10 and sold it for $1.11. The moment the government enters business the cost to the people is greatly enhanced. Whereas under the competitive system you and I paid one-eighth or one-sixty-fourth of one per cent for our exchange, under government operation we paid one per cent. Someone has been good enough to give me within the last few minutes the amount the government advanced to the foreign exchange control board to enable it to do business; it was between $1,300 million and $1,500 million. If hon. gentlemen will take the ordinary interest rates on a sum of that size they will see that the foreign exchange control board was handsomely treated by the people of Canada and that the expense of operating it is very high indeed.

It is not agreeable to me to criticize the persons of people who disagree with me. I do not wish any of the gentlemen who are in the service of the government to feel that because I cannot share their views I am critical of their persons. I do not share the views of the gentlemen who administer the Bank of Canada or the views of the gentlemen who administer the foreign exchange control board, and I am forced to the conclusion that through them we are introducing into this country modes and manners that are not well suited to this continent. In Europe the multiplicity and continuity of wars have forced the governments of those unfortunate countries to resort to methods of finance which are not indigenous to this continent and which I believe have no place here. We have brought here a central bank; we have set up here a foreign exchange control board, the result of which is to give a fictitious value to our money or to take from it a value that it has. We are making of our currency and exchange a plaything of this group who, sincere though they may be, are not men of experience, who are not men who have learned the lessons of trade and commerce in the hard school of experience. They came into office during the war, when we had to adopt methods that irked us all, that we might make an all-out effort in the championship of ideals in which we believed. The effort was a success; but now we find that the system we invoked to meet the great perils of the war still persists, that these gentlemen who managed our economy for a time, as a necessity of war, are still to be expended either in the provincial capital or in some other suitable place as the provincial government may determine. I do not think all this money should be used for a national war memorial in one place. Let it be clear that this party will support the expenditure of money in Ottawa to make this a beautiful capital, not on the excuse that it is a national war memorial, but on its merits, and for no other reason.

Motion agreed to, on division, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—"National capital district."

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Chairman, when this measure was at the resolution stage the leader of the opposition asked certain questions with respect to it. I had some answers ready; but while the motion for second reading of the bill was being put by Mr. Speaker, an hon. member was already on his feet to take the floor, and no sooner had the last words left the Speaker's lips that that hon. member commenced. From that moment until two minutes ago, when the motion was put, there has been always at least one hon. member up before the preceding speaker had quite finished. Since it would take me more than the two minutes now remaining before eleven o'clock to answer the questions asked, I move that you do now report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. CHURCH: It should be withdrawn and left as a municipal institution.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

END OF VOLUME IV

occur to me to-morrow. When the federal district commission undertakes its work I hope that this is one of the first things that will be done, because I think it will be a great attraction and a great convenience to tourists who visit the grounds. I hope that the Minister of Public Works will give attention to it. It may not come under the federal district commission at all. I thought that perhaps we could finish this debate to-night.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): On the resolution stage of this proposal I asked certain questions of the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) who introduced it. I was not here earlier this evening, but I understand that he did not speak on this stage of the bill.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: He has had no opportunity yet.

Mr. BRACKEN: So far as I am concerned, he will have an opportunity in five minutes, if he chooses to take it.

The questions I asked at that time were these as reported at page 4385 of Hansard, I said:

> I am rising now to ask the minister if, when we go into committee to deal with the bill itself, he will give us a brief statement as to what has been done by the state in connection with this project, when it was started, roughly what has been done, the expenditures from year to year from the beginning, in tabulated form, and what the national war memorial aspects of this proposal are likely to mean in the way of increased cost to the state.

If we had some of that information we might have proceeded with more confidence at this stage. But I am sure the minister will give us that information later, if not to-night.

In the debate so far, we have heard comments regarding the recommendations of a joint committee which was set up a couple of years ago to consider the relations between the Canadian government and the municipality of Ottawa or the community of Ottawa. That commission made four recommendations. I shall refer to two of them. One was that the number of members on the commission should be increased, and another was that the appropriation should be increased to $300,000 a year—I think it was $200,000 before. The bill before us proposes what? The recommendation of the commission was to increase the grant to $300,000 for five years. The proposed bill suggests an appropriation of $300,000 a year for not less than fifteen years. In addition, it proposes to make available a lump sum of $3,000,000. It also proposes to call the project a national war memorial. As I see it, these are the main features of the bill before us. The committee which was appointed made no recommendation with respect to expenditures for fifteen years, made no recommendation with respect to a lump sum of $3 million, made no recommendation with respect to making this federal district project a national war memorial. Those features have been added by the government to the commission's report. I suggest that the government might have stirred itself to see that we had something more in the way of a detailed report from the French expert who has been retained to study this question and make recommendations. In the absence of that, rumour has it that, before we are through with it, this project will cost the state scores of millions of dollars. It is not expected that at this time anyone can see into the distant future, but if we had something more of the commission's ideas, to indicate what they have in mind, I am quite sure the house could act more intelligently.

With respect to beautifying the nation's capital, I have not heard anybody in this house disagree. Certainly I do not. Whatever the future may hold for me, I will stand with all those who desire to see that done and who will make the necessary sacrifices to see that Canada's capital is the most beautiful in the world, not because I want to make it the only war memorial in Canada, but because we should do this by reason of the fact that it is the nation's capital, and without any other excuse. I do not believe in making a national war memorial an excuse for spending a great deal of money in Ottawa. We do not need that excuse; and in addition, I do not believe all the money for a national war memorial should be spent in any one place. The provinces of Canada and all the people of Canada helped to win the war.

When this bill passes second reading, as it will, and is considered in committee I propose to advance two amendments. The membership of the commission is being increased, and the government is generously saying to the prairie provinces that they may have one member, and to the maritimes that they may have one also. At the same time they are saying to the city of Hull that they may have one, and to the city of Ottawa that they may have one. In any national war memorial proposal, if that is what this is to be, I think every province in Canada should be represented, and I give notice to that effect.

Then, if these large sums are to be used for the purposes of a national war memorial I am going to move that a certain portion of those moneys be made available for the same purpose in each province of Canada, the capital, and the next step—perhaps it is of equal importance although in a different way—is to stop the pollution of the Ottawa river. If you want to beautify a place you have to get your underpinnings right, but as long as you continue to despoil this river by dumping sewage into it you will not have a healthy or beautiful countryside. However, everyone has his own ideas as to how it should be done.

I do not think we are justified in giving a blank cheque of $3,000,000 to the commission to spend as they see fit; and as I read the bill, that is the purpose of section 9. Last year we increased the grant from $200,000 to $300,000.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): You are speaking of the Ottawa agreement. This is not the Ottawa agreement.

Mr. HAZEN: But under this act we are going to spend about $300,000 a year, and, in addition to that, we are asked to vote $3,000,000 in the form of a blank cheque to the commission. When we vote money in this house we should vote it for a specific purpose instead of being so trustful. I do not want to be mean about this thing, but in looking through the estimates of the Department of Public Works I saw very large sums provided for the city of Ottawa which must help not only to maintain but to improve it, and I hesitate to vote $3,000,000 more at this time for this purpose. Perhaps if the Minister of Public Works and I could get together on Chance Harbour we might come to an agreement.

Mr. R. H. WINTERS (Queens-Lunenburg): Until just a few moments ago I was pretty well satisfied with the formation of this commission because, as hon. members said there was to be one member from the maritimes, I naturally assumed he would be from Nova Scotia and therefore I felt that I had no plea to make. But in view of the fact that hon. members from Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick have challenged Nova Scotia's right to have the maritime member on the commission, I simply want in a few words to assert Nova Scotia's undoubted right to have that representative, or, better still, I think each province should be represented on the commission.

Hon. members have spoken about and extolled the beauty of New Brunswick and other provinces, and I agree with them entirely. I do not feel that I need to say anything about the beauty of Nova Scotia, because all hon. members are fully familiar with it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You have no apples.

[Mr. Hazen.]

Mr. WINTERS: Yes; we have apples in Nova Scotia, and I say to the hon. member for Fraser Valley that they are good ones.

Mrs. STRUM: Apple sauce, too.

Mr. BRIDGES: The female of the species is more deadly than the male.

Mr. WINTERS: I cannot compete on those grounds. I say, Mr. Speaker, since we have recently been left off the postage stamps, as hon. members have heard, we do not want to be left off this commission. Nova Scotia agrees with the proposal as set forth in this bill. We agree that Canada should have the most beautiful capital in the world, and we are quite prepared to make our contribution to it. We do not feel that this will go the whole way toward solving the problem of maritime rights, but I presume we shall have other opportunities to speak on that issue.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Because of the hurry we were in yesterday I thought we would have completed this debate by the time I came in. When I left the chamber the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) was in Greece. I see that he is now back. Despite all that has been said in opposition to this bill, there are some things that may be said in its favour. Perhaps this is not the time to deal with it because there are so many other things that could be done. When the proposal was first made in September 1945, the leader of this group gave his blessing to it and he did it for the group. Therefore, if it is planned carefully and the commissioners appointed from all across the dominion as is proposed in the bill we should give it our support.

There is another point to which I should like to refer, but I do not know whether it would come under the federal district commission or not. I took it up with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) early in the session. There is a walk around this building which up to a few years ago was known as "Lovers' walk."

An hon. MEMBER: What is it now?

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not know what it is now; it is not Lovers' walk because no lovers can use it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: How do you know?

Mr. BOUCHER: Are you too old to use it now?

Mr. MacINNIS: No; but I never climbed over fences for anything of that kind; I want to do it in the proper way.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacINNIS: I imagine my Scotch humour does not take in the joke; it may have made the statement that the maritime provinces are to be generously treated by having one member on this commission; and I must protest. Perhaps you may think that we in the maritimes are inclined to be, to use a vulgar word, "kickers", but we are so often ignored that we have been called the forgotten provinces of Canada. I do not want to be accused of going back too far into history, because we are told, whenever we complain, that we go back to confederation; but let me tell hon. members that when we came to discuss the question of confederation, certainly more than one member from the maritimes was called forward to discuss the plan.

Let me remind hon. members that we are one million people in the maritime provinces —no small population. We may not be known because on the map of this broad country we occupy a very small place. That may be the reason why we are not known. It may be because so few from the other provinces know our maritimers. I have been amused a couple of times since coming here by being asked, when I told a confrere that I had just returned from the northern part of New Brunswick, whether I had found the crossing of the bay of Fundy very rough. We know too little about the maritimes and that is why we are too often forgotten.

The hon. member for Kings, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Grant)—perhaps he was too humble—said that he came from perhaps the loveliest province in the dominion. Let me say emphatically that I think we in the maritimes come from the garden of Eden in the whole dominion. If it is beauty you wish to implant in Ottawa, then why not choose men who were born and who have lived amid the natural beauty of the dominion, in the maritime provinces? To them the knowledge of real beauty comes natural and I am sure they would be a great help on the commission.

I should probably also plead for the west, which is supposed to be represented by only one member, but they can defend their own rights. I do not want to be parochial or provincial, and therefore I will support the proposal that this commission represent every province in the dominion. The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) said that under the bill the commission could represent every province, that whoever might have the appointing of the commission might take a member from each province. I do not like the word "may". We in the maritime provinces have suffered too long as a result of depending on the word "may". There is too much uncertainty about it. We wish to have the word "shall" instead, and I hope that will be done.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): While we are making up our minds as to the amount of money, or the amount of work which may be done in beautifying the city of Ottawa, I hope that in the meantime nothing will be allowed to impair the natural beauties of the Gatineau park. We speak of beautifying the federal district, but luckily for Ottawa in particular and the Canadian people in general, it is not a case of beautifying the Gatineau park but of preserving the natural beauties which are already there.

Even our C.C.F. friends would have no objection to the preservation of the natural beauties of the Gatineau district and the Gatineau park.

Mr. D. KING HAZEN (St. John-Albert): In the county of St. John in the province of New Brunswick there is a small settlement called Chance Harbour. The people who live there are fishermen, who make their livelihood on the stormy waters of the bay of Fundy. For some time past they have been endeavouring to have a breakwater established there to protect their boats from the sea. I have brought this matter to the attention of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bridges) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier). I have looked in the estimates this year and I find no appropriation for the establishment of that project. I am willing to enter into some dickering with the government, and I would possibly consider voting for this large sum of money if the Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Fisheries and the government would give some attention to the needs of the people in that constituency.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. HAZEN: I will not pursue that matter any farther. I have gone as far as I need in that direction. I believe that Ottawa should be beautified and improved as the capital of this great dominion. I think we all agree that, while the fathers of confederation were very wise in many respects, they were short-sighted when it came to laying a plan for the development of this city. I presume we all have our ideas of how it should be done, but if I had the planning the first thing I would do would be to establish a boulevard from the main entrance of the parliament buildings to the museum. The establishment of a boulevard right down Metcalfe street would be the first step to take if we want to improve a national library. The need of a national library is very great. A national gallery is another. And there are other national projects. What I am saying now is that the idea of development of a national capital area does not need to be supported by the idea of a national war memorial, the need of which existed before the war and would have been with us had there been no war. So let us not confuse these ideas.

There is one other thought to which I should like to give expression. I am, I hope, no narrow Canadian nationalist. I hope that in the breadth of view that will prevail in parliament we shall always be willing to learn where we can from other peoples. But I should like to think that in years to come, when this national area has been developed and visitors come here and express admiration of it, we shall be able to tell them that it is a Canadian expression of the conception of the national capital. In saying that, I should like to see those immediately charged with responsibility for the development of the capital area free to consult the best advice anywhere in the world; but I want to see this conception developed as a Canadian conception, the driving force behind it Canadian, the expression of thought Canadian, and the work carried out principally by Canadians. Let us consult others and get the best advice where we can, but let the work be carried out by Canadians. We have the experts here who can do it, and do it in keeping with the national objective.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I think we all agree that we do not wish to see lavish expenditure made. We want an adequate return for all expenditure. I think that principle ought to guide us in connection with all our planning, whether of war memorials or the development of the national capital area or in any other way. Before sums are voted for the development of the area, apart from those immediately provided in the bill, we shall wish to see the plans; we shall wish as a parliament to be satisfied that the plans which are developed and the way in which it is proposed that the work be carried on to a conclusion will be in keeping with the national objectives. Let us encourage the planning; but before large amounts are voted to put the plan into execution, it must be submitted to parliament, and parliament must have full opportunity to record its approval or disapproval.

Mr. E. G. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I could not allow this bill to go through without rising to speak upon it. I want to criticize as strongly as I can the timing of this bill. When I do so I do not think I am less a Canadian than any other hon. member, nor do I say that I am not in favour of the beautification of this city. When I first came here the beauty of Ottawa and the surrounding district appealed to me very much, and I think it is one of those odd psychological facts that those things which are beautiful we like to make more beautiful. Two of the recent speakers on the government side said they came from the most beautiful part of Canada. While one may not be able to claim as much for the province from which I come, it is yet one of the most important provinces in the dominion; and had it not been for the good fortune of rains this year, that great area where we grow so much wheat and other produce to feed not only the people of Canada but the peoples of the world would have been a source of great worry to all hon. members, because we would not have been growing any appreciable amount of wheat and other foodstuffs. This bill asks for appropriations from the consolidated revenue of this country of $300,000, and when I read press reports, with which I agree, that under the Greber plan perhaps $300 million will ultimately be required for the beautification of this area, I say very strongly as a democratic socialist that we should put first things first. I come from an area of this dominion where I have seen people moving out of that "Palliser triangle" by the hundreds and the thousands into other parts of our province to try to get a livelihood, just because this government and past governments have not seen fit to make provision and set on foot undertakings to give irrigation to those areas where we can harness our rivers and assure our people of the production of crops, and I say, therefore, that this bill is inopportune.

When it is said that we should beautify this district and be proud of it as a national capital I quite agree. I believe all hon. members are of opinion that we should have the finest and most beautiful capital possible. But it is an economic contradiction that throughout the world we see beautiful capitals which have been built up, and right alongside these evidences of wealth we find scenes of abject poverty. That is true even of this country. We do not have to go many miles, not only from our capital city but from other urban and rural areas, to find similar conditions. So I say as a socialist that we should put first things first; and when our scale of living is brought up to a decent standard, when we have health insurance and the rest, the time will have come to introduce a bill such as this.

Mr. C. T. RICHARD (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this discussion—I approve the principle of the bill—but I notice that other members

Galt was not founded by John Galt, the great Scottish colonizer and settler of western Ontario. It was settled, before John Galt came to Upper Canada, by Absalom Shade and was known as Shade's Mills when John Galt came to visit it—

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is correct. He cut down the first tree. There began the real development of Galt, Guelph and Goderich.

Mr. FLEMING: Absalom Shade named this settlement "Galt" in honour of the visit of his friend John Galt.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is correct.

Mr. FLEMING: But we are far from the city of Galt at the moment. This city of Ottawa is one that no one can come to as a member of parliament does without being very proud of it. Prior to entering parliament, I had been a frequent visitor to the city of Ottawa, but I must confess that I never fully appreciated the beauty of this city and especially the majestic beauty of these buildings and of the hill on which they stand until I entered parliament. I think those who were responsible for selecting this site for the home of Canada's national parliament were men of great vision to whom we owe an inestimable debt of gratitude. This majestic and dignified building is worthy to house this nation's parliament, and this great hill on which it rests is undoubtedly one of the beauty spots of the nation. Any man who calls himself a Canadian need have nothing but pride in the location of these buildings. It is to be regretted that many of the other government buildings in this city are not in keeping with these majestic parliament buildings. I think we ought to take from them our inspiration in seeking to develop in this district sites worthy of the national capital.

I was glad to hear what the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) had to say to-night, because he gave expression to a thought that has impressed itself on my mind many a time as I have strolled around the rear of the parliament buildings and looked over the expanse of the Ottawa river to the lovely Gatineau hills beyond. Whoever was responsible for permitting the location just across the river, in sight of all who visit the parliament buildings, of a match factory from which every vagrant breeze blows sulphur fumes across these grounds and into this building was surely lacking in foresight. I hope that the Minister of Public Works and those charged with the responsibility for making plans for beautifying this capital area will see to it that provision is made for clearing up that unsightly picture immediately on the other side of the river and eliminating those sulphur fumes.

I entirely endorse what the Minister of Public Works said to-night about the necessity of taking a broad view and making both sides of the Ottawa river contribute to the beauty of this district. I have always been an enthusiastic advocate of municipal planning and had something to do with efforts in that direction in the city of Toronto. One thing that can be said with certainty about municipal and community planning is that the longer it is deferred the more costly it becomes. To those who feel that the prospect before us now is one of substantial expenditure, may I say that if we leave it much longer, the cost will be so much greater. So, if we believe in planning, let us begin now and lose no more time.

I wish to make one reservation with reference to this bill and any support I give to the general idea of a national area which will be a credit to the nation. I draw attention particularly to it because of the explanatory note which appears in the bill. I read the first sentence.

> The purpose of this bill is to amend the Federal District Commission Act, 1927, so as to enable the commission to discharge more readily the duties that will devolve upon it in connection with the development of the national capital area as a national war memorial.

I wish to make it perfectly clear that, as far as I am concerned, as one member of this house, the two thoughts are entirely separate and distinct. The development of this capital area ought to stand on its own feet, without reference to any national war memorial. It should be a national objective which has no reference to the war and no reference to the memorial. It should be a national objective because, being the kind of nation we are and hope to be, we ought to have here a capital that is worthy of the nation, regardless of war memorials. If we are to think in terms of war memorials, frankly, I can think of some types of memorial which would be much more in keeping with the conception of an adequate national war memorial than the development of this federal area.

Mr. ROBINSON (Simcoe East): Will the hon. member please name them?

Mr. FLEMING: I should be very glad to give a number of them.

Mr. ROBINSON (Simcoe East): Please do.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. FLEMING: To begin with, as the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) said, war memorial. If we are to apply this money to the building of a war memorial, it should be spent in the nine provinces of the dominion. Instead of the money being spent only in this city, it should be spent in Toronto, Montreal, Saskatoon, Calgary and all across the dominion. I can see no reason why we should be asked at this time to vote—

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): $20,000,000 for Sunnybrook.

Mr. COCKERAM: The hon. member for Ottawa East is being very funny.

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): I am not funny.

Mr. COCKERAM: I think this is the first time I have heard him speak in this house.

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): You are wrong.

Mr. COCKERAM: I may be wrong and I am willing to admit it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He spoke very well, anyhow.

Mr. COCKERAM: I admit that, but at the same time—

Mr. MACKENZIE: What is your kick?

Mr. COCKERAM: Both members for the Ottawa ridings must support this bill, but I believe that this government has a greater duty than to vote money for the city of Ottawa. I believe that the money we have voted in the past has done much over a period of years to relieve many of the unfortunate situations that have arisen. When we talk of a war memorial, why should we spend a colossal sum, to which it appears to me there is no limit, on this one city? After all, the men who volunteered and went overseas in the Canadian army came from every province of the Dominion of Canada. Very few people in this dominion find their way here in a period of a year or many years. If we are to spend a colossal amount of money on a war memorial, spend it in beautifying the capital cities of our provinces from which these men went to serve overseas.

I have no objection to spending money for the beautification of Ottawa. I believe it is a good thing to do. But why centre a national war memorial in this city? We have a national war memorial here now, the Peace Tower, which is a great memorial that compares with the memorial in Edinburgh which many of us have seen. I believe that if we are to do something worth while and want the people of this country to see something for the money spent we should spend this money in the provincial capitals throughout the dominion.

[Mr. Cockeram.]

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support wholeheartedly the principle of this bill and to endorse the remarks made by previous speakers from British Columbia and others who have supported the bill.

In a matter like this, I think we should certainly avoid taking a parochial outlook. This is a national matter in the national interest and I think we should maintain the correct perspective. I am as anxious as any other hon. member to see increased old age pensions, better social security benefits and that everything possible be done for the working people as a whole, but I cannot see any logic or sound argument in criticizing what, after all, is a small expenditure when one compares it with our national expenditures as a whole.

I have always been interested in taking around this building people from my own province of British Columbia, particularly young people. A nation does not live by bread alone, and when you take young people and older people around these buildings you have evidence of the fact when you see how inspired they are by the buildings and surroundings and by the fact that they have had an opportunity of visiting their national capital. I think, this proposal further to beautify the federal district will be an inspiration not only to individuals but to other cities in Canada, to every town and every village and to every Canadian who has an opportunity to visit this district. I am quite sure that, as the years go by, the greatly increased facilities for travel will enable great numbers of Canadians to visit the national capital and have an opportunity personally to see the scheme as it is developed.

I want to support two objections that were raised to certain features of the bill. I think every province should be represented on the commission so that we can call it a truly national commission or committee.

I am certainly not in favour of seeing this scheme promoted as a scheme for a national war memorial.

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) is responsible for my participation in this debate. In his stimulating historical review he began with the city of Athens and wound up at the city of Ottawa. In the course of his tour he arrived at the great city of Galt, my native ctiy, and I feel compelled to participate in this debate to offer a word of correction of the historical reference made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs to that lovely city. It is the city with which his tour should have begun.

commissions, but if we are to have at least fifteen members I think I would be safe in saying that this bill will not pass before Christmas if each province is not represented.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Maritime rights.

Mr. GRANT: Maritime rights. The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) got around it very nicely when he said that there would be a member representing each part of Canada. He would consider the maritime provinces as a part of Canada. I want the hon. member and others to remember that confederation was born if not conceived in Charlottetown, the capital of Prince Edward Island. God himself decorated that province and we do not have to decorate it ourselves. Therefore we are ready to bear our equal share of the decorating and beautification of Ottawa. I ask the government to reconsider this matter. Since there are to be so many members on the commission, each province should be represented.

Mr. J. T. RICHARD (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, being a representative of the most beautiful part of the capital area, I think I should rise in support of this bill and, in doing so, I think I am reflecting the feelings of all hon. members when they seriously consider this bill. For many years the House of Commons has approved the principle of this bill, and the only thing now before us is to decide whether we shall go ahead and make this national area a real one. Credit should be given where credit is due. In addition to commending the work of the commission, I think great tribute should be paid to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). When he came to Ottawa from another part of Ontario he immediately took an interest in the development of the greater Ottawa area. If the Prime Minister should ever consider leaving active politics in the near future or at any time I hope he will consent to remain as adviser to or perhaps act as a director of the federal district commission.

At times the people of Ottawa do not like it to be said that Ottawa should be beautified, because they feel that this city has a natural beauty which cannot be improved by human hands. The people of Ottawa support this plan because they are citizens of this country. In paying tribute to this capital city, they are only doing what other parts of the dominion are doing. I wish we all had the same spirit in connection with this bill. A while ago the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Argue) spoke in a prejudiced manner. He approached this subject as though the delay of the beautification of this area would bring about more social measures or do more socially for other parts of Canada. He said also that this bill had not been timed properly. I think the only thing wrong with the timing is that it is a little late.

We should go ahead as quickly as possible with the beautification plan for this capital area. We in Ottawa would like to have the Greber plan made public as soon as possible. At times blame is placed on municipal, provincial or federal authorities because no one knows just where to place it, but you cannot really blame any authority until you know what the plan is going to be. There has been some delay on the part of certain municipalities in the district in doing this or that because they did not know just what to do. Now that the war is over, the Greber plan should be made public so that every one can cooperate and put it into effect.

For example, I am thinking of the approaches to Ottawa, such as the Montreal road. Representations have been made to me on many occasions by the citizens of Eastview. This road has been used more or less as a national highway, and the only reason the municipality has not done anything about it is that they are not sure whether it will be part of the plan for the capital area.

In conclusion, I can only say that it is always difficult for an Ottawa member to insist too much that he is attached to this plan, but as one who was born and raised here and whose soul is in this centre I trust that the members will not consider this question in any other way than as citizens of this country and will do all in their power to make the Ottawa area a beautiful capital and the soul of this country.

Mr. ALAN COCKERAM (York South): Mr. Speaker, until the last speaker had spoken, I had thought this was to be in the nature of a memorial to the men who served overseas, but now it seems that it is to be more or less a memorial to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I believe in the beautification of Ottawa, but I believe also that there should be some limit on the money spent.

Mr. McILRAITH: The money is voted in the ordinary way; you have every control over it.

Mr. COCKERAM: The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) is quite interested because this is in his constituency and it is only natural that he should go out and bolster up the thing. It is true that money has been spent over a period of years and that parliament has voted money for the beautification of Ottawa, but now we are being asked to vote additional money for a they live in Ottawa or not, whether they will ever see Ottawa or not, I cannot support this bill.

Mr. REID: $96,000,000 for Saskatchewan.

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this bill for a moment, I want it distinctly understood that I am thoroughly in favour of this beautification scheme in connection with the federal area. I am inclined to agree, however, with the view of the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) that we should know where this money is to be spent. By that I mean we should know what part of this scheme is to be undertaken first. Before this bill was discussed, I think we should have had the report of the planner, Jacques Greber. I think we should know whether the plans call for the immediate removal of the cross-town railway tracks and the temporary buildings. We should know something of what is to be done during the next few years. Are they to improve the east and west blocks? Do they intend to relieve the traffic congestion on what is called hell's half-acre, Confederation square? Some mention of that was made to-night, and I believe the city of Ottawa was criticized for the present state of affairs there. My understanding is that the city of Ottawa had very little to do with the planning of Confederation square, so that we cannot blame the city for any traffic jams that occur. I believe it is a federal matter, which should be straightened out by the federal authorities.

Mr. REID: It is bad, anyway.

Mr. LENNARD: Yes, it is bad.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): It could have been worse.

Mr. LENNARD: There is one feature which I do not approve, however; that is the development of this area as a memorial to those who served in the armed forces. I believe we should have an improved federal area; but, as another hon. member said this evening, let the various municipalities and provinces create their own memorials for those from their own districts. Then, if I might offer a suggestion to the commission, it would be that this red brick monstrosity directly in front of these buildings, the Victoria building, could very well be removed.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): There is no relation at all between that building and this bill. The commission has nothing whatever to do with any of those buildings; that is the public works department.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. MACKENZIE: And would you please remove the Daly building?

Mr. LENNARD: Finally, Mr. Speaker, since it is to be a memorial to our armed forces, how is it proposed to commemorate their accomplishments within the area? Will it take the form of another cenotaph or a hospital or what?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I do not know. If they follow my advice the first building to be put up would be a building for the veterans.

Mr. LENNARD: Finally, I suggest that after some of these other buildings which may be considered more important are erected, the matter of a national gallery be given early consideration.

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I found it necessary, for my own comfort and that of other members of this house, to object to the noise which was heard around Confederation square. At that time I said I would be unable to support any bill designed to allocate any money to the federal district commission. I do not know that my threat really affected the government or that they were influenced by it at all, but I should like to take this opportunity to thank the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) if he had anything to do with it, the municipal authorities and the street railway authorities for having rearranged their schedule of work so that hon. members are no longer disturbed between the hours of midnight and three o'clock in the morning. Therefore, since I am of a forgiving nature, I shall not be influenced at all by past events in coming to a decision as to whether or not I should support this bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I inform my hon. friend that we always give him a good hearing?

Mr. T. V. GRANT (Kings, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, as the senior member for perhaps the most beautiful province in Canada—and I am very modest in using the word "perhaps" —I should like to place on record one principle, one ideal; and I shall not delay the house if I am given a good hearing. The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) and the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) have stated that there is a member from their province on this commission, and I thank them for coming out in the open and saying that there should be a member on the commission representing each province. I do not believe in large was procured by the federal district commission at low cost. The actual work of the commission deserves the highest praise. They have performed their work efficiently and inexpensively to the taxpayers of Canada. They have one other duty which has not been emphasized much to-night in the development of the area, and which is important, namely the coordination of the work as between the different municipalities. The duties of the commission in coordinating the activities of the different municipalities in internal developments which are within the jurisdiction of the municipalities are important ones. They are not ones which involve any expenditure of public funds.

Perhaps I need not say any more to-night. I wish to thank hon. members at large for the expressions of opinion which we have had to-night. Generally speaking, I believe that the approach was fair, and I am particularly pleased to see hon. members from outlying areas view this bill for what it is, namely, an attempt to supplement and complete the legislation dealing with the development of our national capital.

Mr. H. R. ARGUE (Wood Mountain): I find much in the bill with which I am in agreement. I am sure I should like as much as any other member to see Ottawa beautified. However, the emphasis to-night seems to have been put on making it a capital city for tourists to see, especially tourists from other countries. Most of the people whom I represent will never have an opportunity of being in Ottawa because they will never have sufficient money to buy a railroad ticket to come this far; therefore, I think we should consider beautifying not only Ottawa but other parts of Canada as well.

I notice that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) made several references to beautifying Hull. I also noticed that the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) emphasized that slum areas be cleared. When the government gets around to beautifying Ottawa I hope that it clears the slum areas in these two cities, which, in my opinion, will add to the beauty of this area more than any other single thing. If we want a beautiful nation for tourists from foreign countries to observe we might start by beautifying the slums in Halifax. We might try it in Montreal. Riding on the Canadian National railway trains from Montreal, one sees acres and acres, if I might put it in that way, of slum areas which are indeed a disgrace to this nation. So I say, when we are trying to beautify Ottawa, let us also attempt to beautify other parts of Canada.

The single thing to which I most object is the timing of this bill. If I may use the argument that has been used time and again by government members, an argument with which I am to some extent in agreement, we are indeed in an inflationary period. The government does not need to take my word for it. Donald Gordon says so, and anything Donald Gordon says just must be so. Here we are contemplating the expenditure after March 31 next of upward of $3,300,000. At the same time, when the workers of this country want an increase—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is totally out of order. The bill before the house is to amend the Federal District Commission Act. It does not concern labour conditions at all, and I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the principle of the bill.

Mr. ARGUE: I accept your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I was just saying that if $3,000,000 spent in the beautification of Ottawa is not inflationary then $3,000,000 spent in any other way, whether it be for the wages of labour or anything else, is not inflationary either. You just cannot have it both ways. I support this bill if it is implemented at a time when the inflationary period is over.

Mr. REID: Would you mind telling us where the $3,000,000 comes in?

Mr. ARGUE: There is a provision in the bill which says this amount may be spent after March 31 next. The hon. member can read the clause for himself.

Mr. REID: That has been there for years, but they have never spent the $3,000,000.

Mr. ARGUE: That is all right; they are given authority to spend it. I shall support this bill when the old people of Canada are treated properly. I shall support this bill when the workers of Canada are given decent wages.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have not permitted that kind of debate, and I will not permit the hon. member to go farther. I would ask him to be kind enough to speak on the principle of the bill which is before the house.

Mr. ARGUE: I am attempting to keep within the confines of this bill, because when money is spent, no matter what it be spent for, it is not going to affect just the city of Ottawa. We all know that. It is going to affect the whole nation. Until I am convinced that something better is being done to improve the conditions of all people in Canada whether national capital in a way that is worthy of the nation and fitting to the capital of the nation.

I had deliberately refrained from speaking in the earlier stages of the measure, and in fact I intended not to speak to-night, for the very reason that I wanted to have this measure approached rather as something having the approval of all parties in this house, and to have the measure visualized not as one brought forward by any party having a special interest in the matter or by any members from the particular area having such an interest.

I must say that I felt myself impelled to speak especially when I listened to two speeches from members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. Perhaps it is putting it somewhat mildly if I content myself with saying that those speeches were distressing; distressing not because the hon. members oppose the bill; that, indeed, is their privilege; but distressing because of the tone of the speeches.

Very early in his speech the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton) said that he spoke only for the members of his constiuency. He then continued to speak for some considerable time. The only comment one could make about the tone of his speech is that if it is read by any of the electors of Humbolt it will appeal only to their prejudices. I hope that he did not intend that. When he reads his speech I hope that he will see that that is so and that he will seek to correct it at the appropriate moment, as that can be its only effect. I should like to remind him that the citizens of Humboldt are Canadian citizens. They are interested in this country, vitally interested in it, in common with the citizens of all other constituencies. This is a measure having to do with the development of a national capital, their national capital, as well as the national capital of all other parts of the country. When he speaks to his electors, as he promised he would do, I hope that he will approach the subject in that light and that he will remember that hard fact, however much it might upset what might otherwise be an easy speech to make to his electors.

The timing of this bill is particularly appropriate. During the war years it was proper and necessary to lay aside energies which would be devoted to this subject and direct them into more appropriate lines. But in any event, as the result of some activities in which I may properly claim some considerable part along with others, a committee of the two houses of parliament was set up in 1944 to deal with the subject, not of the development of the national capital as such, but with the agreement between the corporation of the city of Ottawa and the dominion government. I should like publicly to acknowledge the good work done by the members of all parties on both sides of the house who sat on that committee. I am glad to see the realization of most of the recommendations of the committee and their development into actual legislation and the appropriate steps which are necessary to give effect to the recommendations of the committee.

To-night some reference has been made to the representations from other parts of the dominion. As a representative of a part of the city of Ottawa, I may say that I am wholly in accord with the sentiments expressed, and indeed I took my part, along with others, in suggesting that representation should be given to all parts of the country in order that the matter would be approached in a proper way and not in any section way. But I would point out to the members who have dealt with this subject and apparently share the views I hold on the matter, that they are not wholly accurate in reading the section of the bill in the way in which they do. In appointing the commissioners, the government may appoint thirteen from different parts of the country. Only two of the appointments are to be specific appointments from specific areas. Then there is a provision that five of the others shall come from the maritimes or the western provinces, Ontario and Quebec as the case may be. I would point out that there is nothing to prevent the government from appointing one member from each province, if the proper person is available, interested in the subject and prepared to give the time and energy which are required.

There is one other point I should like to emphasize. In the early speeches to-night a great deal of reference was made to the city of Ottawa as such, and the development of the city of Ottawa. That is not the correct view of this legislation. If hon. members will examine the subject more closely they will find that it deals with the development of the whole district, the capital area, and indeed the greater part of the area is outside the city of Ottawa. I hope that the mistake will not be made of viewing it solely as a city measure, because that is not supported by the facts.

Mr. HACKETT: Does it extend to Hull?

Mr. McILRAITH: Yes. A great part of the property owned by the federal district commission is considerably north of Hull, some ten miles north of Hull. It is fine park land in the Gatineau area, and incidentally the terminus a little further out. I understand that no instructions have been given by the government to the federal commission to request a meeting of the railway companies looking toward this great improvement.

The union station should also be improved. That was recommended by the committee. So far, however, no steps have been taken in that direction.

When I last spoke I made reference to the beautiful tulips that were growing out here this spring, and since I made that speech I have received six or seven letters castigating me about the things I said about this gift from Holland. I am not taking back one word of what I said about the gift to Canada. I did say that these bulbs were some of the nicest I have ever seen, but I still remember that during the years of the war, when other countries were turning their grass lands and, indeed, all the land they had into land for the production of food, Holland was preserving these bulbs, and naturally they grew to a great size. When the war ended, the devastated countries around Holland were unable to send anything out, whereas Holland was in the right position to export bulbs, samples of which reached Ottawa, Montreal and Toronto.

I have always been curious to know why these three cities were chosen—Ottawa, Montreal and Toronto. We did not expect any in British Columbia because we do grow beautiful bulbs out there. Our growers produce splendid bulbs. But in view of the fact that I have received seven castigating letters, I repeat what I said on that occasion. It was a straight business deal on behalf of Holland and they made a pretty good job of it. I admired the bulbs, but from the advertising point of view it has done them more good and we in British Columbia will probably have a harder time in selling bulbs to the people around here.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Except that ours are better.

Mr. REID: I am going to make a suggestion. I do not know under whose authority it would come, but I offer the suggestion in all seriousness. We are going to enlarge the personnel and take in all the provinces, and I hope we so enlarge it as to take in all three maritime provinces instead of having one representative. I suggest again that the provinces be asked through the provincial governments and their representatives to have plots of ground set aside on parliament hill, if that can be done, so that each province may there display its interest and demonstrate what can be and in fact is grown in the province represented in any particular plot. I know that many provinces may not wish to take advantage of that proposal; nevertheless, those who do wish to take advantage of a plot on parliament grounds, or who wish to take an avenue or a portion of an avenue for the planting of trees, should be given every encouragement to do so. Members from the various provinces would be watchdogs and would see that the trees were looked after, and the representatives of each province would take pride in what was being done in that regard. Each province so represented would take a greater interest in the national capital than would be the case if this suggestion were not carried out.

I am not going to delay the house any longer. I thought I would put on the record the recommendations of the committee and at the same time try to correct one or two statements that have been made, pointing out that the $300,000 given under this bill is not all for the beautification of Ottawa. As a matter of fact—and I say this in all sincerity—I do not think we are giving enough money. I make a further suggestion. Leading into Ottawa, the highways should be modernized by the federal authorities, because you cannot expect some little municipality two or three miles on the outskirts of Ottawa to bear the burden of the cost of a modern highway.

The approaches to a city have a wonderful effect on visitors who come in cars. We are living in the days of modernized vehicular traffic and we must have modernized highways. I went up the Gatineau two Sundays ago. What the great drawback is about visiting the 16,000-acre farm under the federal district commission is the lack of roads. I did not suffer greatly going over some of the rough corduroy gravel roads, but I said to the superintendent of the federal commission, Mr. Hay, "I doubt very much whether our United States visitors would ever come back to see the beautiful lakes in the Gatineau area after travelling over these corduroy roads." As everyone knows, the roads in the United States are splendid. They are very comfortable to travel on and motors are built especially for such splendid highways, but none of them will travel twice over roads such as I travelled on in going up the Gatineau two Sundays ago.

I am all in support of this measure, Mr. Speaker, and the passing of it.

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Ottawa West): As member for the greater part of the city of Ottawa and, indeed as member for the part of the city of Ottawa in which these parliament buildings are located, I particularly welcome this bill. I also welcome it because it represents one more step in the achievement of some ideas I have held and tried to assert at appropriate moments in the appropriate places with respect to the development of our million from the people of Canada by way of subsidies, should now object to $300,000 being spent in the capital city. Perhaps it is because it is not for Saskatchewan, but for the Dominion of Canada. And might I remind the hon. member for Humboldt that on that committee was a member of his own party. The report made to the house in 1944 was unanimous, and the $300,000 which is proposed in this bill was the amount recommended in 1944 by that committee. I do not suppose that the people of Humboldt will hear about the $96,757,000 that has been given to the people of Saskatchewan by all the taxpayers of Canada. They will probably hear about some cement, and someone not sleeping, and the lack of this and the lack of something else.

However, I did not rise particularly to try to enlighten the people of Humboldt as to the actual expenditure of this money, but I think the record should be kept straight, that the money which is to be spent under this bill is not altogether for the beautification of Ottawa. If anyone would care to read the report he would find that over $55,000 is spent annually around the parliament buildings and other public buildings by the federal district commission, and I could give the items on which these expenditures are made. There is a water-sprinkling system which costs the city of Ottawa $23,500 annually; there is a lighting system for the various driveways which costs $5,000; there is also the collection of garbage and a scavenger service in respect to the various buildings, including the parliament buildings here; and there is the removal of snow and clearing of the walks around parliament hill which, as everyone knows, are kept fairly clean throughout the early part of the year when we are here. I think that in fairness those facts should be placed on record so that the matter may be put more clearly before the members of this house.

I want to make one comment regarding the proposal of the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) that the commission should be enlarged to more than thirteen. With that I am in hearty accord, because the recommendation of the committee on page 172 of the report reads:

> In order that such development may be coordinated in general with what has been already laid down, we suggest that the powers of the federal district commission be increased and its personnel be enlarged to include not only representation from the Ottawa area but from the people of Canada as a whole.

I cannot see how the people of Canada as a whole can be represented if you have representation from seven or eight provinces and then appoint only one to represent the three provinces of the maritimes; and I would suggest to the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), who is piloting the bill through, that representation be given to every one of the maritime provinces, in compliance with the report of the commission.

Mention has been made of the architect from France, Mr. Greber. I was on the committee, and I will repeat what I said then when the federal commission came before that committee. One of the objections I had to Mr. Greber was this: France and Great Britain and the other countries of Europe are old countries. They have historic buildings dating back a thousand years and more, and the architecture which is suitable for those countries is not suitable for modern countries like Canada or the United States. Regarding Confederation square, I used to wonder as a boy about the sentence in the good old book which spoke of "the quick and the dead", but it was not until I tried to get around Confederation square that I realized that the "quick" is if you get across, and the "dead" if you don't, for you are no more, so that the scriptural reference to the quick and the dead is being fulfilled down on Confederation square.

To me it is most unfortunate that the parliament of Canada, in keeping company with the city of Ottawa, did not start earlier with their plans. They have developed Elgin street right up to the great war memorial. I am not a town planner, but I think everyone will agree with me that Metcalfe is the street that should have been widened, and it should have been widened up to the museum. It should have been made a wide and spacious street right from the parliament buildings down, and in the course of conversations with persons born in Ottawa, when I suggested this they have said to me, "Well, Mr. Reid, you don't know just how this council of ours works. Many of these things might have been done, but there was real estate to sell on Elgin and other streets and so we were not too keen about making this the capital." But even at this late date the beautification of Ottawa, and the undertaking to make it the real capital city of Canada, of which everyone could be proud, should be further considered, and to this end we should widen Metcalfe street from the front gate of parliament straight to the museum. That, I think, would be a far better approach to the parliament buildings. It would be better than further developments of Elgin street.

The committee in their report made some recommendations which have not yet been dealt with by the government, and one of them was to have the railroads coming into Ottawa routed under a subway, or in some way have of the work they are doing, and I think it is up to the people of this country to see that when visitors come here they will be able to see not only what is beautiful on this side of the river but also to enjoy the same thing on the other side of the river. We speak of good relations between the provinces and of unity. Would that not be a nice way to bring about good relations and unity among our peoples? On this side of the river the people are English-speaking; on the other side they are French-speaking. Let us develop the capital district on both sides of the Ottawa river. I live on the other side, but I am closer to the parliament buildings than a good many people here in Ottawa. When the interprovincial bridge is open it takes me only five minutes to come here from my home.

The purpose of this bill is not the expenditure of money for just to-day or to-morrow, but to plan for the future and to have a capital which will be the pride of the Canadian people. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Boucher) has the right idea. He does not think of this as a bill applying only to the city of Ottawa. He knows it applies to the whole federal district. We intend to try to cooperate with the different municipalities in the planning of their own developments, so that, as the years go by, people will like to come, not only to the city of Ottawa and the county of Carleton, but also to the other side, to the city and district of Hull.

Mention was made of Mr. Greber and the progress of his plans. Mr. Greber is the only Frenchman on that committee which is devising a master plan for the national capital. The committee has a staff of thirteen people who are working in Ottawa on this plan, and I understand that in six or seven months Mr. Greber will be ready to make his report. I am not going to discuss his qualifications, but I believe he is well qualified. Perhaps somebody else believes that others would be better qualified. That is a matter of opinion. But I think Mr. Greber will do quite a good job.

As to the bridges mentioned, we know we need bridges; but before building them so far away from the capital city, I think we should try to build some reasonably satisfactory bridge right in the centre of the city or in close vicinity to it, and that would be, I think, one of the means of developing also the other side of the river.

All hon. members know the men on the federal district commission, especially Mr. Bronson. We have from my own city Mr. Ste. Marie, K.C., who has been on the federal district commission since 1927. He has devoted his time and energies and talents in cooperating with the other members to maintain and develop this capital city of ours. I believe that these gentlemen deserve gratitude for the work they have been doing, and I hope that when this new commission is set on foot it will be deemed fitting to keep them as members to continue the good work they have been doing.

I listened to the statement of the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) to the effect that the city of Toronto was a very fine city, though it had not been built with federal government money. I recognize that. In 1867 no question had arisen of having a capital city or federal district commission. We came into Bytown, Ottawa, and development proceeded in cooperation with the municipality. In other cities administration of streets and civic services is carried on by the municipal governments, and we do not want to invade their domain or take away their civic autonomy; we want to cooperate with them to try to develop this city. If Ottawa had not been the capital city of Canada, for all we know to the contrary it might have been a large industrial centre, because of its water power and other natural resources in the immediately surrounding district. I believe that there is understanding between the municipal and federal authorities, and that, with the passing of this bill, as the years go by we shall see this city expand and develop and become one of the finest of capital cities.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee in 1944 I should like to join in the debate which has taken place this evening. It seems strange that so far in the debate, of all who have taken part, the three members from British Columbia have been the greatest supporters of the bill and the beautifying of this federal capital. Surely every one of us can and should take pride in our capital city. I know that those who visit Washington usually come back full of enthusiasm, and while I realize that Canada, with twelve million people, cannot compete with the great country to the south of us, nevertheless we can have a capital which will be the envy of many other lands. As a matter of fact we have here in Ottawa a great chance to make a splendid capital, for it is better in location even than Washington.

I was suprised to hear the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton) coming out against the appropriation for the beautifying of the capital city. During the recess I took time to hunt up some facts, and I am just going to remind him that it seems strange that a province, which in six years got over $96 exceedingly able architects of our own in Canada. Why we should go outside of Canada and get somebody else to come in here and do this job is beyond my comprehension.

So far as the bill itself is concerned, I think it is a good thing to have a federal district, but we should go slow in this matter in the next two or three years and remember that we are spending the taxpayers' money.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am quite interested in this bill because I happen to represent the riding right across the river, which has a representative on the federal district commission. I have listened attentively to what has been said up until now. On the second reading we are to decide on the principle of the bill. That is not difficult to do because that principle has been agreed upon for the last fifty years. If I remember aright, the first Ottawa improvement commission was created by statute in the year 1899. There were modifications made under every government, and now this bill is to amend the Federal District Commission Act which dates from 1927. The object is to try to plan a capital of which Canadians will be proud.

This bill is based on the recommendations of the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons which was set up in 1944. This committee, chosen from both houses of parliament, was set up to try to find a better plan for the capital and to devise plans which would be executed by governments in the future.

The first recommendation of that committee was to enlarge the federal district commission from ten to fifteen members, and if hon. members will read the bill they will see that that is what the bill proposes, to meet the wishes of the joint committee set up in 1944.

Even the title of this bill is another of the joint committee's recommendations. Instead of calling it the federal district commission, the committee favoured the title of national capital district commission. Those two recommendations of the committee are implemented in this bill.

Then there follows a clause by which the commission and the operation of this bill will come under the president of the privy council instead of under the Minister of Finance. I think we can all agree on that. So that there should be no difficulty in our agreeing upon the enlargement of the commission, the new name of the commission, and the minister who will have charge of the act.

[Mr. D. G. Ross.]

There are other sections of the bill which deal with expenditures. It is proposed to increase from $200,000 to $300,000, an increase of $100,000 a year, the annual grant to the commission for the maintenance of the grounds belonging to the federal district commission on both sides of the river. That is understandable because, since the act was passed in 1927, the government has acquired a good many other properties and put up many buildings and even extended the government driveways.

Another section provides for the expenditure of $3,000,000 to be spent as the years go by, over, I think, the next ten or fifteen years. Parliament in 1927 voted the sum of $2,000,000 for the commission to acquire property and develop parks, gardens, driveways, roadways and sidewalks. The commission was authorized to spend the $2,000,000 at the rate of $200,000 a year during ten years. That amount has been completely expended. During the war the government did not see its way clear to voting any further amount for that purpose. Now this additional sum of $3,000,000 is for the enlargement of the plan during the next ten years.

For many years in this house I have listened to members on both sides telling us what we should do in the city of Ottawa. Everybody wants to have a national capital which they would be proud to show to visitors and to speak about. If you travel in other countries you will notice how proud the people are to show you their capital city, their public buildings and parks, and the souvenirs of their past history. In this country we are trying to build up the same mentality. The only difference I see is that, as regards Canada's national capital, we have flowing between Ottawa and the city on the other side one of the most beautiful rivers we have in Canada. On one side of the river you find sumptuous buildings, splendid driveways and parks. If you look on the other side of the river you will find the industrial part of this district. That dates back to a long time ago. The city of Hull was built as an industrial city and it has developed the natural resources that were close to that city at that time. But I believe that now, in view of the development of the city on this side of the river, it is time to develop the other side of the Ottawa river. Why should we deprive the Canadian people of the beauties we have on the other side of the river? Why should we develop driveways and parks and put up fine buildings just on one side of the river and ignore the other side? I have heard a member on the other side of the house speak of the slums across the river. They are poor people but proud being held; it may be New York, the seat of the UNO and UNRRA. We do not know what capital we have. Ottawa is not definitely our capital, and it will not be if we abandon any part of our sovereignty to the big powers. If that is done, then the capital that we shall have to improve and beautify will be Chungking, China; London, England; Washington, D.C.; Paris, France, and Moscow, Russia. If the big five are to control our destinies Ottawa will not exist any longer as the capital city. Since this bill proposes the beautification of the capital city of Canada, there is still a little bit of hope for the future.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I certainly enjoyed the few words that were said by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie). He is one of our real highland Scotsmen and we all know how sentimental they are. I agree with him that Canada has really a wonderful history, but it is a pity that many of our people do not understand our background. It is a pity that people in one part of the country do not understand the people in other parts.

There is no doubt that Ottawa is a beautiful city. Whoever was responsible for putting this House of Commons in the place it is deserves a great deal of credit. The House of Commons, the east block, the west block and many of our buildings are really beautiful. I would rather bring about a better understanding of our history by the people of Canada than spend a lot of money in beautifying the capital. Toronto is a beautiful city, but the citizens of Toronto made it beautiful, not the Ontario government. We are proud that Toronto is the capital of the province of Ontario, but the provincial government have not spent a lot of money in making Toronto beautiful.

What we need is a unified history of Canada that would be acceptable to everyone. We talk about a war memorial, but if we could publish such a history and have it understood by all the people it would be the greatest war memorial we could possibly have. It do not think this is the time to talk about spending a lot of money. It is all very well to get prepared for these things. Mr. Bronson, whom I know, has done a wonderful job with the federal district commission and we are all indebted to him, but he is still a young man and will have lots of opportunities in the future.

Being the legislative centre of Canada means that Ottawa has many advantages. That brings many people to the city and they spend their money. I do not think we should be asked to do too much for the city of Ottawa. I believe in the federal district commission and I believe we want to have a beautiful capital some of these days. As far as a war memorial is concerned, we should not forget that the war is just over and there are many things that have to be done. We should think this thing over for a while to see whether we want to carry this out as a war memorial or whether we would rather do something else. Ottawa is only a small city in comparison with other cities in the country. As I say, I think we want a good capital; we want to have a lovely place.

What we have to do is to cut our coats according to our cloth. We have a war to pay for. It is all very well to say that it is only going to cost us $223,000 more this year, but $223,000 is a lot of money. This is not the time to be increasing expenditures at the expense of the taxpayers of this country. That is a fact that has to be taken into consideration. I find that under this bill the federal district commission will have the right to borrow $3,000,000 or to obtain $3,000,000 from the consolidated revenue fund. I think that should be thought over. Let us get settled down after this war and think about expenditures of one kind and another, and the taxpayer. The government has been so used to thinking of hundreds of millions of dollars that it does not think about hundreds of thousands of dollars any more. If the commission borrows money the government will guarantee the bonds and pay the interest. It may be a good project, I do not know. I think this matter should be carefully considered before we go on spending the taxpayers' money.

There is just one other factor about this matter. An architect has been brought here from Paris, France. He may be the finest town planner in the world, but the fact is that Canada has many fine architects and town planners. Many of these men have studied overseas in Paris and other places on the continent. A great Canadian architect, Mr. Pearson, built this building, and it is a great tribute to his ability. Why should we go outside the country, why should we import someone from some other country who is not acquainted with Canadian culture? We should try to develop our Canadian art. We have our French-Canadian songs and our French-Canadian music and we are trying to get English-Canadian music and songs through Sir Ernest MacMillan. We have our own artists whose works are being shown all over the world at the present time. We have our schools of architecture; our universities are training men to be architects, and we have still, in the fields and woods surrounding it, the loud and screaming colours of a vulgar commercialism.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have enjoyed the speeches which have been delivered so far during this debate, though they have been contradictory. One can take the beautification scheme for Ottawa for granted, but beautification is a relative thing. There are parts of Ottawa which have been left untouched, where people live in dwellings which certainly are not the pride of the capital city of a great country. The idea was advanced that Ottawa should be the Washington of the north. I want the capital city of Canada to have personal distinction, not to be a pocket edition of the capital city of any other country. I do not personally know the planner who has been chosen, but I presume he is an able man; and the fact that he comes from another country should not be considered as an objection, provided that he is well qualified for what he is going to do.

Members of parliament who spend six months a year here in Ottawa should not be considered as strangers in the city. Something has been suggested by one hon. gentleman concerning the offices of the members. Such a suggestion might be appropriate, but when we want to come here with our families the difficulty is that it is impossible to get an apartment because of the duration of the session. It seems to me that members of parliament should be treated as citizens of Ottawa, because we spend most of the year here—

Mr. BURTON: And most of our money.

Mr. POULIOT: —and we should have some facilities for securing proper housing in this city. Something else has been mentioned to me; I am laying my grievances before the Chair. I am told it is impossible to park a car in this part of the city, not only on parliament hill but in this vicinity. This situation should be improved, and it surely is possible to do that in some way.

In my humble view the first thing to do to improve the city of Ottawa, if something is to be done by the government, is to build a fireproof library. The other day I had the support of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) for this suggestion, but he gave me more than his support; he suggested a cultural centre for Ottawa. I am not at all interested in that cultural centre, at least for the time being, but here in the library of parliament we have the most precious collection of books, newspapers and historic documents in this country; and it should be protected against fire. By doing this, we shall give the Canadian people an opportunity to learn the history of Canada just as well as it has been learned by the hon. members who have spoken in this debate.

It is pitiful to see some of the homes on both sides of the river, in lower town as well as in the western part of the city of Ottawa. It makes such a difference when one comes to the centre of the city from those sections, and something should be done for those people. We have a great many office buildings that were fully occupied during the war. They are not beautiful; but the roofs do not seem to leak; the walls seem to protect those within from the cold and excessive heat. I wonder why some of those buildings are not divided into apartments to give shelter to those families who are living in shacks and slums.

This is not what one might call a speech, Mr. Speaker; it is just a collection of observations I have made lately, and suggestions that have been made in my presence. Messengers are provided for the service of members of the House of Commons. They are most obliging and some of them have cars which they are always ready to use to go on errands for the members. One of them told me—and I have been told this by others—that it takes him an hour and a half to park a car on parliament hill. There are still some places left, and these messengers who are at the disposal of members and who have cars that they are ready to use to go to the printing bureau or other places some distance from the House of Commons should be able to park their cars in some secluded area. It would not need to be very large, but they should have their own places in which to park their cars on parliament hill. I hope, if other hon. members have suggestions to make, they will be taken into consideration by the proper authorities

Before concluding, I should like to congratulate both members for Ottawa and the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier), Minister of Public Works, upon the interest they have taken in improving some of the ugly areas that have existed previously in this city. In carrying out this work, I hope the government will not try to achieve too much grandeur. Some consideration should be given to comfort. We should not to be too boastful because Canada may not really be considered as an autonomous country at the present time. Some people are Canadians in name and they believe very strongly in it.

If we are going to improve the capital city of Canada we should not try to do too much. The capital city of the commonwealth may be Paris, where the peace conference is now his party in this regard, who once went so far as to advocate a building for ballet dances and a national theatre of arts and sciences and so forth. If the hon. member will look up the record he will realize that his leader had a vision which the hon. member for Humboldt negated here to-night.

I rose to try to induce hon. members to look upon this not as a local area. I resent anybody calling it the city of Ottawa project, because I represent the best part of the Dominion of Canada, the area surrounding Ottawa. In Carleton county we do not need it as Ottawa does, but we can use it better than Ottawa can.

Mr. R. R. KNIGHT (Saskatoon City): I say at the outset that I am not opposed to the beautification of Ottawa, provided that it does not take too great a sum of money. It has been an inspiration to me to-night to listen to the pœtic speech of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) and the less pœtical but more witty speech of the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). The Minister of Veterans Affairs even took us back to Greece and Rome, and with his permission I should like to follow him for the time being to those far distant places and to remind him that while the civilization of Athens, to which he referred, was probably an ideal one for some people, I cannot forget that it was built upon a class society. I point out to him that the fine things which he described were enjoyed by only one class of people, and that the civilization there was built by slaves, as were the buildings. I would also remind him that the civilization of Greece, boasting as it did these marvellous buildings, the Acropolis, the Stadia, was like Rome with its Coliseum, based upon the slave market, and that both these nations neglected their people. Their decay and fall are matters of history.

I might also remind the scholarly minister that if he knows his Horace—and I presume he does—he will recall that Horace had an idea of a better type of monument which might well be built by men.

Mr. IRVINE: Probably he lost his Horace.

Mr. KNIGHT: I do not think great buildings will ever take the place of that particular type of "monumentum." The hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton), who has been much maligned here to-night for his advocacy of a bath in Moose Jaw, did say something with which I heartily agree. He said, "Let us beautify the whole countryside." With that in mind, I wish to say something here because I think I should be out of order on any of the items something which I have wanted to say in a public place for a long time, and I know of no more public place than this. He said, "Let us beautify the whole countryside." I should like to put it in reverse and say, let us cease to make it ugly. Some hon. members will have suspected already to what I refer. I want to speak of beautification and commercial signs, if I may mention the two things in the same breath. On coming to Ottawa I was interested, of course, in the beautification scheme for our national capital. I live down off the foot of Bank street, if that is the right way to describe it, and one day while going down there I saw some men just at this side of the railway subway tearing down an ugly clay bank. I thought to myself, "Here is some of the beautification of which I have heard; no doubt they are going to level this place up and plant grass and trees." Two or three days later, enough lumber, zinc and wire were brought there to make the heart of War Assets Corporation shudder, and some of these ugly signs were erected. I am quite sure they took enough lumber and other material to build, if not a cottage, at least a decent summer shelter.

On looking around the district, however, I realize that this particular sign is not too incongruous there after all. The shacks; the juke joints advertising soft drinks, the little restaurants with their loud and lurid signs advertising cigarettes of various kinds which will cure your sore throat—no, they do not look so bad in the city, where men generally have vitiated the scenery and the landscape. Now they are trying to bring nature back into the city by planting trees and grass and flowers. No; it is out in the open country, in the fields and the woods and upon the roadsides that these atrocities of signs are really incongruous. One gets outside the city and begins, shall I say, to be soothed by the soft green of the fields or the grey of the clouds; then he runs into a great sign, perhaps on the side of a hill near a little lake. Hon. members know the type of sign I mean, and it brings a jarring note into the whole landscape. Or you see the whole side of a barn—and I am astounded that any farmer would permit his barn to be used for this purpose—covered with a huge advertisement telling you to chew somebody's tobacco.

I merely wanted to say that in any beautification scheme for Ottawa—and I understand it is to extend some considerable distance beyond the city—I hope all this will be remembered. I would not vote a five-cent piece, if I may use that historic phrase, for the beautification scheme of any city that would allow along the highways contiguous to it, and, worse

Canada, has done a work that will be a monument many centuries after he has passed away, one that will be appreciated by the people throughout Canada. I repeat, the Canadian people owe a great debt of gratitude to Mr. Bronson in particular.

I think there is something to be said in support of the hon. member for Fraser Valley in the suggestion that each province should have a representative on the commission, because each province should be entitled to have its aims, ambitions, industries and undertakings demonstrated within the federal area.

I do not believe that the phrase "beautifying the city of Ottawa" correctly expresses the views of those who support this bill. In my opinion it is the exemplification of Canada rather than the beautification of a city that we are interested in. I say, therefore, to those who, dealing with federal district relations, and others who have studied the history of the movement to create around Ottawa a federal area, have said that a great deal has been put into it, that a great deal more is necessary.

We must bear in mind that now, and for a considerable length of time, the government of the day has engaged one Jacques Greber, a town planning expert from Paris, France, to prepare a plan for the federal area. I would have been happy to see the government give to the house a great deal of information on the progress which he has made. I believe the house is entitled to much more information than we have had on the progress which Mr. Greber is making on his plans for this area. I do not think it is sufficient to have a town planning expert, good or otherwise as he may be, work for the length of time that Mr. Greber has been working and then ask parliament to apportion money for the expense of developing a federal district, without having seen some results of his work.

Within Ottawa, particularly these days, work for the sake of employment is not necessary. For that reason the house should be acquainted with the definite and concrete proposals which the government has to offer in the immediate future so far as a federal area is concerned. When the committee sat a year or a year and a half ago we made concrete proposals. So far as the expansion of the committee and the nationalization of the committee are concerned the recommendations are pretty well incorporated in the bill; but the development of Ottawa, from a practical point of view, has not been incorporated nor have we had information on it. As an example, in Ottawa we have the cross-town tracks. As a matter of progress, as a matter of strict economy, the removal of the cross-town tracks and the re-routing of the railways in Ottawa should be the first consideration, so that municipal, provincial and dominion enterprise could work together in the federal scheme.

I believe the federal area scheme contemplates building certain highways. Land on both banks of the Rideau and Ottawa rivers has been set aside. Much of the congestion in Ottawa complained about by nearly every visitor to Ottawa, be it member of parliament, tourist, commercial traveller or business man, is created by the railways, the defective transportation highways and the difficulties of traffic within Ottawa. In asking parliament to apportion money, the government should have some definite proposals to place before the people on this particular point.

I noticed in last night's paper that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) had made some comments indicating that in the immediate future he might commence the building of a bridge across the Ottawa river some ninety or one hundred miles northwest of Ottawa. Although that bridge is needed to accommodate Pembroke, I believe it should be built within the capital area, so that if both sides of the Ottawa river are to form a federal district there will be driveways along the scenic Ottawa river with a crossing within the federal area at some place within the county that I have the honour to represent. I would suggest that it be some forty or fifty miles north of here. If that were done I would not be bothered incessantly by members asking me where they could go for a drive and get back safely. I would just tell them to follow the federal area.

I believe that we should look upon this as a matter of national pride, as a demonstration plot of national industries, national cultures and national ambitions. I do not think any Canadian will object to a true depicting of the Canadian spirit right in the federal area. I do not think the hon. member for Humboldt by any means had the vision which should be possessed by anyone who would discuss the bill before the house at this time. If he feels that the face of Ottawa needs uplifting I would tell him that the face of Canada needs uplifting and this is the place to do it. I do not think his worthy leader will agree with the comments that he made this afternoon and to-night, because on several occasions I have seen the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) rise in his place and give ample support to a move to establish a real federal area. May I ask the hon. member to look up Hansard and see the record of the leader of sary to leave the entire planning of the capital of Canada to a gentleman from Paris, I do not care who he is or what he is. Particularly do I say this when I think of anyone who is privileged—perhaps I should say anyone who has the misfortune—to drive a car through the streets of Ottawa to the place called Confederation square when one never knows whether he is going to be killed in turning a corner. There are streetcars going both ways and automobiles adding to the traffic. If my hon. friends who take exception to this statement with regard to Confederation square will come to Vancouver they will see what traffic control is like.

Mr. McILRAITH: May I point out to my hon. friend that the plan of the gentleman in question was not followed in Confederation square.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am glad to hear that. That is one more reason why I suggest that we should have a representative from each province, because it must have been planned by the citizens of Ottawa themselves. I may tell the government that I intend to move an amendment to this section, which will provide each province with a representative on the commission. There is another section that I am not satisfied with, and if I am wrong I can be corrected. I refer to section 17.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. member that on second reading of the bill he cannot discuss individual clauses. He should confine himself to the principle.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: As the hon. member for Temiscouata would say, that is just what I am doing, Mr. Speaker. I am speaking entirely on the principle of the bill and I think the principle is wrong. As I understand it, there is no accounting for expenditures. As I understand the principle, a report is to be brought in so many days after parliament meets, but it is not provided that all expenditures shall come before this parliament, and that, in my opinion, is a principle that should not be lost sight of. After all, parliament is, or it should be, supreme in the expenditure of every dollar of the Canadian public's money.

I do not think I will take up any more of your time now, Mr. Speaker, but I intend to move the amendment which I have suggested, so that every province shall be represented on the commission and every dollar of expenditure be accounted for to parliament.

Mr. G. RUSSELL BOUCHER (Carleton): Like the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) at the outset of his remarks, I assure the house that I intend to support the principle of the bill; but unlike that hon. gentleman, in his concluding observations, I intend to remain consistent with the statement I have made.

May I first say that in discussing this bill we should cast our minds to the real intent of it and not to the intent as indicated by the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton), who attempted to compare Ottawa with the city of Moose Jaw, when he said that Ottawa needed a face-lifting while Moose Jaw needed a bath. I believe that was the sum total of the comparison he made in that respect.

It strikes me that some ambiguity is created by the very nomenclature of the act in calling it a Federal District Commission Act. What is really meant, I believe—and that would be the proper nomenclature—is a federal area act; because, when speaking of a federal district or a federal area, as I believe it should be called, we are not speaking of the city of Ottawa and the surrounding country, but of the capital of the nation, of which we should be proud. We are speaking of an attempt on behalf of all Canadians, who are proud of this country, to exemplify in their federal area and its environs, the capital city of the dominion, the aims, ambitions, industries, hopes and aspirations of Canadians.

Therefore, as we approach any discussion of a bill of this kind we should see in it an endeavour to establish in the capital and in the neighbourhood of the capital of Canada an area that exemplifies Canadian life in all its aspects. I suggest that we discuss it as an area rather than as a district. In my opinion "federal district" is itself a misnomer, because I do not believe that the people of Canada generally, certainly not the people within the area, want to see an area set aside, similar to the capital area in Washington, as something to be run by commission government, where local autonomy, municipal enterprise and self-government within the area will be placed in the hands of a federal district commission. I believe that we should retain our municipal institutions, and our provincial authorities within the area must have their scope as well.

When, therefore, I come to the section providing for an increase in the membership of the commission to fifteen, I see something of much wider national aspect, in that body of men charged with the responsibility of exemplifying Canadian life. I think I should pause here and express in this house the gratitude of the people of Ottawa and of Canada as well, I believe, to Mr. Fred Bronson, the present chairman of the federal district commission, who, with his interest, energy and all the efforts he has made on behalf of the capital of have to work for a living and at one time shoveled cement, and I can tell him that you do not use old torn-up cement to build a school.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How do you know?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I listened to the hon. member speak for thirty minutes about nothing; now let me talk for ten minutes about something. As a matter of fact, I regret that the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) has—unfortunately in so far as his party is concerned—been called away to another political convention. They have one only about every two months.

Mr. McKAY: When did you have one last?

An hon. MEMBER: Why don't you have one?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Why don't we have another one? Because we have the privilege of having the only leader in the British empire who has survived as leader of his party for twenty years. That is nice going. I have a great deal of admiration for the C.C.F. a lot of the time, when they do not waste time in talking about something which happened twenty years ago when a bill like this one is being considered.

There is one thing about this bill which I do not approve at all. First, let me say that I think the bill should be considered entirely on its merits; that is, as a measure for the beautification and improvement of the capital of our country, not as a war memorial. I do not think there should be any camouflage about it at all. Speaking on behalf of a farmer riding in the province of British Columbia, I can say that we are willing to pay our share to improve our capital, the capital of Canada, but we do not want the scheme camouflaged under the name of a war memorial. We in the Fraser valley want our own war memorial in our own district to the men who went from our own district.

There is another thing to which I want to take exception in this bill, and I intend to move an amendment, not talk about tearing up a bag of cement. Probably I shall be called out of order, but I do not mind that; I have been called out of order so often. I think it is unfair to the people of Canada, who are expected to pay for these improvements, to limit the representation. In all parties in this house—I repeat that—in all parties in this house are men who have had experience of serving on municipal or city councils in all parts of Canada. In every political party represented in this house there are men who have had experience in the promotion of parks and other improvements. For instance, in our own province—and I think even the Saskatchewan members will give us credit for having the most beautiful parks in Canada—we have men of all political parties who have had experience in connection with our parks. So that I do not think it is fair to the taxpayers of Canada to limit the representation. As at present, one member is from British Columbia, one from the prairie provinces and one from the maritimes. I insist that every province is entitled to have a member on that commission.

When I first came to this house we voted, I think, an annual grant of $100,000 to Ottawa. At that time I was sitting over in the opposite corner; the people of Canada were a little wiser then, so that some Liberals had to be accommodated, Mr. Speaker, on your left. We over there objected to this expenditure of $100,000 for Ottawa. However, I had the privilege of being a guest in the city of Washington, the capital of the United States, and I changed my opinion after visiting that city. We cannot equal Washington; we have not the wealth to do so; but we can do much to improve our capital. It is the capital of Canada; not the capital of Ontario, but the capital of Canada. I am proud to be a Canadian and I intend to continue to be proud of Canada, in spite of all these bills to change the names of this, that and the other thing. I remember a poem—it is the only poem I remember—which I learned when I used to trudge as a barefoot boy around Matsqui:

> Breathes there the man, with soul so dead,
> Who never to himself hath said,
> This is my own, my native land!
> Whose heart hath ne'er within him burn'd
> As home his footsteps he hath turn'd
> From wandering on a foreign strand?
> If such there breathe, go, mark him well;
> For him no minstrel raptures swell.

I am proud of being a Canadian, and the people of my riding share that pride and are quite willing to contribute to the improvement of our capital. But I wish to warn the government that we are not prepared to have one dollar of our money used for the purpose of buying out this man Weston, or E. B. Eddy or any other concern. Make no mistake about that. We wish to beautify Ottawa and improve the capital city and we will see that a proper job is done, but we do not want to have any unfair expenditure made in purchasing these different properties. Above all—and here I may be treading on somebody's toes—we in the Fraser valley at any rate cannot see why it is necessary to leave the entire planning of the capital of our country, Canada, to someone in another country. I hope I am not hurting the feelings of anyone who may be of French descent; but I repeat, we cannot see why it is necesshould be cleaned out from top to bottom and modernized. When you think of the important offices that are housed in that building and the state of those offices and of the building itself, to talk about beautifying the city and leaving that building in its present state is absolutely ridiculous.

Furthermore, if the government is prepared to spend any more money—nobody knows how many millions of dollars—in beautifying Ottawa it should also make arrangements to give assistance to the various provinces so that they can carry on a scheme, not only of beautification, but one that will be of benefit to the people of those provinces. Until the government is prepared to make some worth-while changes in the bill I am opposed to the principle of it.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the house is fairly well aware that I rarely intervene in debate, but I must repudiate at once, with all the strength at my command, the tone and tenor of the ideas to which the house has just listened from the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton). He referred to the treatment of veterans in a debate that should deal entirely with the beautification of the area surrounding the capital city of our dominion. Yesterday this house voted generously some $800,000,000 for the welfare of the veterans of Canada, and it comes with bad grace from any hon. gentleman to say that this parliament is spending undue amounts of money on the district of Ottawa when this house and parliament—not the government, for I am not taking credit to the government for it—voted yesterday and the day before a contingent of $1,500,000,000 for the welfare of the veterans of the Dominion of Canada.

I should like to say a word about this bill dealing with the national capital and district. I am probably the farthest away from the capital city of any member of the house except the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson). Hon. members are students of history. There are two great features and factors in this situation. The one is immediate, surrounding the capital city of Canada; the other one goes right to the soul and spirit and history of this dominion. If you study nations and their histories, think of the glory that was Athens in the days of Pericles; think of the grandeur that was Rome before the tyrants came; reflect on the beauties of Prague and Budapest; think of Paris, the most beautiful capital in Europe; of London, the most beautiful capital in the world; and we of Canada should be proud to have here in Ottawa, as our capital, the finest city in the world.

When I think of the history of that beautiful province, Prince Edward Island; when I recall the story of the United Empire Loyalists in New Brunswick; when I think of the baronets of Nova Scotia and the Hector in 1773; when I think of Jacques Cartier coming to Quebec from St. Malo in 1534 and the wonderful crowd of missionaries who penetrated that province during the next hundred and fifty years, the settlements and the government which give us to-day in Canada the house in which to-day we dwell; when I think of the settlement that John Galt effected in Guelph and Goderich in Ontario; when I think of the Selkirk settlers who came to Manitoba in 1812; of Samuel Hearne and Alexander Mackenzie going through to the prairies, and Mackenzie's voyage in 1789, the year of the storming of the Bastille in France; when I think of Douglas and Fraser and the other great explorers who gave us the beginnings of British Columbia, I come back to this capital, built upon this bastion beside the grand confluence of our rivers, the most beautiful city, I think, in all the world; and I say to you that we should endow and enrich this city and its environment for all the people of Canada.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) is going to follow and support me.

I come from the province of British Columbia, but I shall not go into history as my good colleague has done. One thing which disappointed me in listening to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) speaking of these people, Mackenzie and the rest, who came from different places, was that he never said a word about Cruickshank coming from the Fraser valley.

I have listened to-day and for the last two days to the Toronto stock exchange. Then I listened to the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton) talking for an hour about something that had nothing to do with this bill. So that I think the house can bear with me, Mr. Speaker, through you, when I talk about this bill. At least, I am going to say a few words about it. I may mention the Fraser Valley and include a few words about British Columbia in the course of the discussion. But certainly I am not going to talk about one bag of cement just because my good friend the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) could not sleep. It is a ridiculous idea that one bag of cement has anything to do with tearing up a street here. I happen to was destroyed by fire. The trustees of that district have wired me on a number of occasions asking me to intercede with the Minister of Reconstruction and his parliamentary assistant because they were unable to obtain a bag of cement within a hundred mile radius of the school. I did so and was told that the trustees should keep on searching. I want to tell the government that if this bill carries I shall have to tell those school trustees when I get back home that the federal district commission was using air drills on the streets of Ottawa, and incidentally disturbing the sleep of the hon. member for Nanaimo, to tear up good cement and use it to cover up some of their unsightly dumps in different parts of this city. And to the children who will not have a school to attend I shall have to say—

Mr. LENNARD: If the hon. member will permit a question, did the drills not disturb his sleep also?

Mr. BURTON: My conscience is too good to be disturbed at night by a noise like that.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the hon. member will permit another question, does he not know that that work was not something that was done under the federal district commission at all, but was being done by the Ottawa Electric Railway company which operates the street railway in the city of Ottawa?

Mr. BURTON: At any rate the impression was conveyed at the time that it was part of the work of the federal district commission. But I accept the minister's explanation. The point I want to get across is this, that good cement was torn up and carted away, while people in my constituency cannot get cement to rebuild a school which was destroyed by fire. I shall have to tell those school children: Never mind, you will have a longer vacation; our government is doing everything possible to beautify Ottawa. Above all, I shall have to tell them that there is one way, and possibly only one way, in which the government can silence the members of the opposition—

Mr. PEARKES: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I have not been silenced.

Mr. BURTON: I am happy to see that the hon. member for Nanaimo has sufficiently recovered to make good the promise he made when he said that we were going to have a showdown before we voted any more money for the beautification of Ottawa.

The town of Humboldt needs water; Moose Jaw, Regina, Weyburn and other cities in Saskatchewan need water. But if this bill goes through, I shall have to tell the people back home: Go take a bath in the dust bowl because your government is busy beautifying Ottawa.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I thought you had a progressive C.C.F. government out in Saskatchewan.

Mr. BURTON: Let me tell the Minister of Veterans Affairs that if his government showed half as much action in twenty years as the C.C.F. government in Saskatchewan has done in two years I should not have much to complain about.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: But we shall be here for twenty years, and they will not be there long.

Mr. BURTON: I have always attempted to make it a practice, when I am opposed to the principle of a bill, to offer something constructive in place of it, and I should like, before I conclude, to make a few suggestions to the government as to what, in my opinion, could be done and would be acceptable.

First of all, I would suggest that the dual control which apparently we have in this area should be ended. On the one hand, there is the federal district commission looking after some of the streets and sidewalks; on the other, the civic authorities have other things to take care of, and there seems to be constant confusion over jurisdiction and as to who shall do a particular work. We should set aside an area here which would be recognized as a federal district for which the federal district commission would be entirely responsible.

There is in this bill a principle which I think is wrong. It provides that different parts of the country shall be represented on the commission, but I would draw to the attention of the members from the maritime provinces and from the prairie provinces that the three maritime provinces are to have only one representative on the commission and the three prairie provinces only one representative. If you want a commission that will be representative of the entire dominion every province should have a representative on the commission.

Furthermore, I would draw to the attention of the government that before any further beautifying is done, if that be possible, to this city, provision should be made for suitable and adequate accommodation for the members of this house who have to spend their time working in Ottawa. There is ample beyond the west block where suitable additional facilities to accommodate the members could be provided. In my opinion the east block this should be done in view of the decision of Chief Justice Greenshields and another judge referred to by the hon. member for Lake Centre.

It should be provided that such judges shall take notice of and be bound by the then last decision or judgment of the judicial committee of the provincial, or other court of final appeal, rendered by such court upon or with respect to such application of law. This amendment would apply to all provinces of Canada. Federal authority should be paramount and supreme, because all judges are under this act. One of the cardinal principles of the British constitution is that the courts are subservient to the legislature. It is well known that in other countries when decisions are given judges follow them as being authoritative until they have been upset. During the recess of parliament the minister should consider this matter with a view to submitting the case to the supreme court.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would not undertake to recommend to His Excellency that this matter be submitted to the supreme court for an opinion, because it is one about which I entertain no doubt at all. I could not take the responsibility of recommending that the time of the court be taken up to pass upon a matter upon which there appears to me to be no doubt whatsoever. The doctrine of stare decisis may be the doctrine of the common law which it has been developed by the decisions of the courts, but it is not the doctrine of the civil law of the province of Quebec. I am sorry to have to differ with the hon. member for Broadview on this matter, but I have some responsibility when I undertake to recommend a reference and I could not recommend that this question be referred to the court.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, may I say to the right hon. gentleman that there has been a rule in this house long before I came here, in fact ever since confederation—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: I moved the adjournment of the debate to aid in giving the whole hour for government business, at the minister's request. I am only continuing the second reading of the bill and I have not finished. I shall not take up the time of the house because there is more important business to be done, but I want to say that since confederation it has been a rule that the Minister of Justice, who is Attorney General, should not give a legal opinion in this house and the minister has violated that rule by giving an opinion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has no right to speak twice on the second reading of a bill. Second, he knows that the motion for the adjournment of the debate is not debatable.

Mr. CHURCH: With all due deference to Your Honour I am continuing the debate on the second reading of the bill. This bill was called.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member spoke on the bill and he resumed his seat, and then the right hon. Minister of Justice answered the hon. member. The hon. member knows perfectly well that he cannot speak twice on the bill.

Mr. CHURCH: I moved the second reading of this bill and I moved the adjournment of the debate, only to let the government have my time. The hour for private and public bills was called.

Mr. SPEAKER: According to the rules of the house, a motion for adjournment is not debatable.

Mr. CHURCH: The bill is debatable under the guarantee I had. The minister has given an illegal opinion and he has no right to give any such opinion. It is an intimidation of the judges.

Mr. SPEAKER: The list of private and public bills having been exhausted, the house will resume the consideration of the business it was considering at six o'clock.

FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION

PROVISION FOR ADDITIONAL COMMISSIONERS, TRANSFER OF CERTAIN JURISDICTION AND GRANTING OF MONEY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for the second reading of bill No. 357, to amend the Federal District Commission Act.

Mr. BURTON: Mr. Speaker, when the house took recess at six o'clock I was trying to indicate to the government what I would have to tell the people of my constituency when I got home, I hope in a few weeks, should this bill carry. A few days ago the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) raised a question in the house about the hideous noise created by the federal district commission engineers or workmen when tearing up the cement on confederation square. A short time ago a school in my constituency more than any other needs a face-lifting treatment. I would suggest also that, in my opinion, Ottawa is the city that would respond least to treatment of that kind. You could pour the entire resources of the country into this place to carry out the plans of a few people, and how many folks throughout the nation would have an opportunity to see the result? I have enjoyed being driven around this city by some of my friends, seeing the drives which no doubt will be extended under the measure now before this house. But I am sure a casual visitor to this city would be astounded to find that in order to get to a streetcar in the morning to go to work he had to stumble over ashcans and garbage cans, even on many of the so-called respectable streets. Further, while I have had the pleasure of meeting many people here who have been kind and friendly and, as individuals, quite hospitable and fine, I could take you to many a prairie town which would show a decided improvement over the city of Ottawa when it comes to a cooperative spirit in wanting to do something to the advantage of their city without having to ask the government for money all the time.

I shall detain the house for only a moment longer, but I want to add that I hope to be able to return to my own constituency within a few weeks, and when the veterans there ask me what I have done and what the government have done so that they may get homes for themselves and their families I shall reply, "My friends, we have made plans to beautify Ottawa." I must say that a short time ago a school burned down—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Six o'clock.

Mr. BURTON: Perhaps you would call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker; I see some hon. members are anxious to take recess.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

JUDGES ACT

JUDGES NOT TO ACT AS COMMISSIONERS OR ARBITRATORS—TO BE BOUND BY DECISION OF COURT OF FINAL APPEAL

The house resumed from April 16 consideration of the motion of Mr. Church for the second reading of bill No. 13, to amend the Judges Act.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I did not happen to be in the house when the matter was up before about bill No. 13, to amend the Judges Act. The first part of this amendment which deals with judges acting as commissioners or arbitrators has already been dealt with. The second part refers to a matter commented upon by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) when he replied to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) on Friday night. I contend that there should be a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada to decide whether federal judges appointed under this act of the parliament of Canada should not be found by the decisions of the court of last resort, in other words whether the doctrine of stare decisis should apply. That doctrine is that the decision of a court of record is authoritative and must be followed by judges appointed under this act.

There have been a number of decisions in the province of Quebec, and Chief Justice Greenshields decided that judges appointed under this act were bound by the decisions of the imperial committee of the privy council, following this doctrine. By the act of 1792 considerable law was copied into the statutes of Ontario and Quebec, such law as was adapted to our circumstances. During the discussion on the second reading of this bill I agreed to bring up the matter on the estimates so as not to take up the time of the house, but I suggest to the minister now that he should consider referring this matter to the supreme court for a decision. I submit that

There are two features to the bill which make it objectionable. They are wrong. My first objection is based on the explanatory note to the bill which is found on page 1 and which reads as follows:

The purpose of this bill is to amend the Federal District Commission Act, 1927, so as to enable the commission to discharge more readily the duties that will devolve upon it in connection with the development of the national capital area as a national war memorial.

My next objection is to the manner in which the introductory resolution was piloted through the house. When my colleague, the hon. member for Moose Jaw, questioned the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on the day that the resolution was put through the house, the Acting Prime Minister made reference to what the bill would be. These references may be found at pages 4384 and 4385 of Hansard. He said that the purpose was to increase the allowance to the district commission from $200,000 to $300,000. Nowhere is there any mention made of the $3 million which we later discovered in the bill when it was put into our hands.

As has been said by the hon. member for Moose Jaw, this can easily be considered as a start on expenditures which may run into hundreds of millions of dollars. I believe that the vast majority of the people whom I have the honour to represent feel that the best and most fitting memorial that we can have to the memory of those who gave so much is a healthy, happy and contented people with security in their own homes. I agree with the hon. member for Moose Jaw that first things should come first. We need to make it possible for people to have security and the needed requisites which will make them healthy and enjoyable from one end of Canada to the other. Let it never be forgotten that those who died, died not for Ottawa alone. They died for Canada, and for the institutions we hold so dear to our way of life.

As to my second objection, namely the slipping into the bill of the $3 million clause, as has been pointed out previously this is likely to be just the thin edge of the wedge and may lead to the point where this will become the sump hole into which we shall be draining the revenue of the entire nation. Of course we should beautify, but not only Ottawa. Let us start out to beautify the entire country. Let us spread this thing out; let us beautify in different directions. Give all our communities an opportunity to beautify, to make the whole country a living memory to those who gave so much to save it for us. Only a few weeks ago I had an opportunity to be in the city of Moose Jaw, represented here by my hon. colleague. While waiting for the evening session of our convention to commence, I walked through the city park, which was constructed at a time when in many parts of this country people did not know what to do in order to provide labour for those who required it to maintain themselves and their families. In that park are little artificial lakes, a little stream with wild fowl on it, flowers planted here and there, shade trees growing up; and as I walked through I thought what a vision the people had who were responsible for that monument constructed at that time by those who needed help and were given useful employment. I could not help thinking also that during that same period hundreds, yes, thousands of young, able-bodied men had started to trek from the western provinces all the way to Ottawa, and that they were stopped in Regina by the government of that day by means of policemen's billies and bullets, instead of being told to go ahead to Ottawa where they could get work and wages on which they could live respectably.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. gentleman to confine his remarks to the bill before the house.

Mr. BURTON: I shall be happy to abide by your request, Mr. Speaker, and I thought I was doing so by giving this illustration as to what we could and should have done in the past. Perhaps you will permit me to conclude that portion of my remarks by saying that if those young men had been able to come on to Ottawa, if they had been provided with work and wages, we would have been able to beautify—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If he looks at the bill the hon. gentleman will realize that the house is not discussing labour problems. The bill is to amend the Federal District Commission Act, 1927. I would ask the hon. gentleman to confine his remarks to the principle of the bill which is before the house.

Mr. BURTON: Very well, Mr. Speaker; to the best of my ability I shall endeavour to abide by your request and deal with the provisions of this bill, in which we are laying the groundwork for the things that are to be done here. I was merely pointing out that some of that work could have been done in the past, at a much more appropriate time than the present.

In my travels across the country I have been in many cities, and I am quite prepared to admit that of all those I have seen, Ottawa or not that is the amount, but it has been suggested. I oppose the scheme at present because I believe that first things come first. In Canada to-day we have certain vital projects which are needed for the actual well-being of the Canadian people. For example, water is one of the necessities of life. On the prairie provinces there are thousands of square miles which have not enough water. Surely an irrigation project for western Canada is more important than a beautification scheme for Ottawa. If we can have both, that is fine; but while the beautifying of Ottawa and Hull can be classed in the category of a luxury, irrigation in western Canada cannot. Therefore I say that first things must come first. It is ill-advised to spend an amount such as this on beautifying Ottawa at the present time with so much other more important work yet to be done.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I wish to make one or two general comments on the bill. I do that, having in mind the question which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) asked the other day. He asked whether, when the bill came up for second reading, a statement would be made by the acting minister as to the scope of the expenditures.

But I wish to raise another question. As I read the bill, it provides not only $300,000 a year but that the commission may on its own authority raise an additional $3 million. So far as I have read the bill, it seems to me that it leaves the door wide open as to how this money is to be spent. What I am not clear on is whether we may wake up and find a federal expenditure of this $300,000 a year and this sum of $3 million has been used as the entrance fee, the money paid to get in to see the game. We may find projects have been started which may involve us in vast expenditures. In this I have the same fear as the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher).

There is one other point I wish to raise, and it has to do with another question asked by my leader. I assume that the minister will answer these questions, because to me they are important. As I understood the words used last September in the speech from the throne, it was proposed that there should be a national war memorial the scope of which staggered me. My leader asked the other evening whether the Acting Prime Minister would state just where this memorial fitted into the proposals in this bill, and it is in that connection that I wish to make this remark.

[Mr. Thatcher.]

In my opinion there are two proper kinds of national war memorials. One is the shrine that they have, let us say at Edinburgh, or here in the Peace Tower, and the other is something in the way of a social amenity, a park or a playground or something of that kind. We have a war memorial here which I term the shrine type, and I do not think we need another. Quite properly, in my opinion, that is at the national capital. I strongly suggest that the other type of war memorial, the type which usually takes the form of a park, a playground, or something else should not be put in the national capital, but should be spread all through the country. There should be one in each province because they are for the use of the people as a whole.

What I fear about this bill is that we might find ourselves embarking on a plan which has no limitation to it, and which may involve us in spending hundreds of millions of dollars for the beautification of this area. There is no one prouder of the national capital than I am; there is no one more ready to give credit to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and I think we should. I believe that he is the man who has given more thought to it than anyone. There is no one more ready to see appropriate amounts spent for that proper purpose, but I am absolutely opposed to a bill which may involve us in the spending of hundreds of millions of dollars in Ottawa under the guise of a national war memorial.

I am therefore anxious that, before the principle of the bill is approved, we have our minds cleared on this point which seems to me to be so vital. If we were merely voting $300,000 a year and $3 million—that is a lot of money—I would feel somewhat differently about the matter. If I felt, as I do not feel, that these expenditures were likely to be the end I would look at it in a different way. But we may wake up one day to find that this money has been spent in such a way as to commit us to the expenditure of further amounts, part of which, if they are for a national war memorial, are in my opinion not properly expendable under this heading.

Mr. J. W. BURTON (Humboldt): In rising to take part in this debate on the second reading of the bill in support of the objections raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher), I wish to say that I am prepared to go farther than he did. I am opposed to the principle of the bill. When I say that I wish to make it plain that I am not pretending to speak on behalf of anyone other than the people of the constituency which I have the honour to represent.

present. A large number of votes for Ottawa were passed the other night in committee of supply without one question being asked, and I do not think we should be spending money in that way.

I believe the city of Ottawa should receive its proper due, but it should be remembered that it is to receive a grant of $300,000 in exchange for exemptions of property from taxation and services rendered by the municipality. I suggest that the time has come when there should be equality of treatment along the lines indicated, for every other municipality that gives federal property services. The government now intends to branch out and take in the city of Hull. Its scheme embraces a radius of thirty miles. The taxpayers are being asked for fabulous sums of money today. In 1896 and 1897, in the time of Sir Charles Tupper and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, our estimates amounted to $36 million; then it went up gradually to about $425 million, and now our civilian estimates amount to a billion and a half.

I do not think the time is appropriate for such a grand programme as this. Where is the plan and survey for such a scheme and cost? What is more, Canadian engineers do not seem to be good enough. We must bring men in from France and Europe and other countries when we can get capable men from our own Canadian universities. Posterity will have to pay for this expensive programme which the government proposes to undertake. There ought to be some sanity about these expenditures when more houses are needed. The time may come later when we ought to have a federal district commission, but this is not the time, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is not here to explain the bill.

We have had a federal commission in Ottawa for a great many years and members of parliament have never been asked to look over their work. The government is now going to step into another province and make the work cover two provinces. That sort of thing is all very well for the United States, with a population of 135 million or 40 million, but I do not think it should be undertaken in Canada at the present time without at least consulting the provinces, especially the old provinces of Ontario and Quebec. The people should be asked to vote on it. The city of Ottawa should be asked to vote on it. I suggest to the Acting Prime Minister that it would be well for him to lay this bill, as only a secondary one, until next session.

As regards the proposal to appoint fifteen men to the commission, if you are going to run the federal district commission by provinces, by geographical area, rather than from the commercial point of view, you are making a great mistake. When the city of Toronto took over the transportation system and formed a commission some people wanted to have a political commission set up, but we appointed only three commissioners and they did the work quite efficiently. I do not believe in having too many men on a commission of this sort, who never direct and are only figureheads. The commission that has been running the light, power and transportation system in our province has given satisfaction. This is true of both the provincial and municipal commissions. It has made a great success of that undertaking from the commercial aspect, with large surpluses.

This whole question should be given further consideration. This bill which proposes to amend the act of 1927 is going to be very wide in scope. The government will be acquiring property; as I say, it will be branching out into another province; and if you have a commission of fifteen men the whole thing will be run by provincial and geographical considerations. We should have a report on the subject. I do not see why we could not appoint Canadian engineers, when wanted, from our own universities. There is no need for us to go outside Canada if we want to get able men.

This is only one of the secondary bills which the government is proposing, and in my opinion it should strike about twenty of them off the list so as to enable the house to get through at the end of next week.

Mr. W. R. THATCHER (Moose Jaw): There are just a couple of comments I wish to make on this bill. As I said the other day, I agree with the principle of it. Most Canadians, I believe, wish to see a beautiful capital city. But, like the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), I do not think the timing is appropriate. Perhaps I fail to grasp the significance of this important bill, or perhaps, as was suggested the other day, my outlook is provincial. Be that as it may, there are certain clauses which I cannot support at the present time.

The bill makes two main financial proposals. In the first place, it will increase the grant to the commission from $200,000 to $300,000 a year. In the second place, it plans to give to the commission an additional sum of $3,000,000 in the near future. I think this house should seriously consider the latter provision because it looks as if the Greber plan is to be started almost immediately. If the newspaper reports are correct, this plan may ultimately mean the expenditure of as much as $300 million. I do not know whether asked in effect to administer and apply the Family Allowances Act in the case of children under their care. I drew attention to the statement made by the superintendent of the children's aid society of Toronto to this effect, that the cost of bookkeeping and other services in connection with the allowance is "colossal." That was his expression in his last annual report. Having regard to what the minister said at that time, from which I inferred that the matter was under consideration, is the acting minister in a position to indicate if progress has been made in the consideration of that question? Unless some assistance is given to these children's aid societies the present form of administration will continue to cast an unfair burden on them.

Mr. McCANN: I am informed that, to offset the extra expense which children's aid societies are put to, there is a considerable saving by virtue of the fact that they are allowed to spend some of the monthly payments for children in other directions; for example, keeping children at summer camps and the like, where under other circumstances and in former years that expense would have to be borne entirely by the children's aid societies.

Mr. COCKERAM: Is that an additional allowance?

Mr. McCANN: No.

Mr. FLEMING: I do not wish to repeat what I said in the house at that time. I thought the minister might be able to give the committee some further information. His answer now seems to indicate that the policy of the department is opposed to giving consideration to the request of these children's aid societies and other similar societies which have children as wards for some allowance for the bookkeeping expense to which they are put. Of course the regulations did permit the application of part of the allowance to what is called "additional benefits". All these societies acknowledge quite readily the benefit that that conferred upon them in caring for their wards. But over and above that, attention was drawn to what, in the case of the children's aid society of Toronto, was called the "colossal expense" of bookkeeping and administration involved, and it was my hope that the department might have given some consideration to that. I—perhaps wrongly—inferred from what the minister said on that occasion, about six weeks ago, that the department was giving consideration to it. I thought perhaps the acting minister might be able to give the committee some further information.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. McCANN: Apart from the fact that the hon. gentleman has brought this matter to the attention of the house, and that he says the children's aid society—I assume, of Toronto—has made a protest with reference to the increased expense by virtue of the increased amount of work in keeping records and the like, I am informed that no representations have been received from any children's aid society in the country along the line of asking for any extra compensation because they have extra work to do in the line of records.

Mr. FLEMING: I am sorry to disagree with the acting minister, but that is not what the minister said on that occasion. It was not that the Toronto society was the only one that had complained; the minister indicated that requests of the same kind had been received from other parts of the country. I am not going to press the inquiry if the acting minister has not any further information. I thought some further information might have developed from a departmental review of the question during the last six weeks.

Mr. McCANN: I think the hon. gentleman might check up on that, because I am informed that the Minister of National Health and Welfare did not make any such statement at that time. I do not contradict the hon. gentleman, but he might well be mistaken.

FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION

PROVISION FOR ADDITIONAL COMMISSIONERS, TRANSFER OF CERTAIN JURISDICTION, AND GRANTING OF MONEY

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister) moved the second reading of bill No. 357, to amend the Federal District Commission Act.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I am objecting to the principle of the bill at a time like this as a half-way measure. I think it is a great mistake to have fifteen men appointed to undertake such work as this. A federal district commission is something for which the taxpayers of Canada have not at the present time sufficient funds, and I do not think large expenditures such as the government contemplates here are justified, especially when we consider how much is being collected from the people in the form of income tax, and what is being given to the city of Ottawa at exceeds the amount or value of contributions for such purpose made by any other individual or individuals.

(2) A parent shall be deemed not to cease to maintain a child who is attending school or receiving equivalent training, only by reason of such child being partially employed or engaged in work unless the earnings received therefor exceed, on an average, the sum of $35 a month.

(3) A parent shall be deemed to cease to maintain a child who is not attending school or receiving equivalent training and who is fully or partially employed or engaged in work for which he receives a salary or wages.

Mr. COCKERAM: I understand that Indians and Eskimos are not paid the allowance in cash but in kind. Has the minister the scale showing what is issued in lieu of the allowance to Indians and Eskimos?

Mr. McCANN: The amount of money which is paid in respect of Indian children is the same as is paid for white children. The Indian affairs branch has a list of articles and foodstuffs which may be purchased with the money. With reference to food, they are guided by the formula which has been set up with respect to nutritional values.

Mr. COCKERAM: Is it not right that children of Indians and Eskimos are not entitled to the allowance in cash but rather in kind? Would the minister give the committee the scale of rations, food and clothing, which the parents receive in lieu of cash.

Mr. McCANN: I am informed that at least half the Indians are paid in cash. For the other half the money is paid to the Indian agent, and the parents of the Indian child are given a credit and a list of articles which they may purchase against that credit. The list is one designed to satisfy normal requirements, and nutritional values are taken into account with respect to foods.

Mr. COCKERAM: As I understand it, and I travel occasionally in the north country, there is not any question of giving cash to a great many of these Indians.

Mr. McCANN: Fifty per cent of them get cash.

Mr. COCKERAM: Some bands do get cash? My understanding was that they all went to the Indian agent and he supplied them with beans and rice and various items of food and clothing which they might require. I wondered whether the minister could give us the scale of issue in lieu of money for those bands which do take the allowance in kind, and why there is any distinction, that some should be paid in cash and some should be paid in kind.

Mr. McCANN: As I have said, almost fifty per cent do receive cash. The reason others do not receive cash is that there is among Indians, as among other people, a difference in intelligence, and there would not be much point in sending a cheque to people who could not get it cashed, so that they are given a credit which enables them to purchase whatever articles they need. Does that answer the hon. member's question?

Mr. COCKERAM: Yes. I agree with the principle of giving the allowance in kind to Indians, certainly in a great many parts of Canada, but the reason for the differentiation must be known to the Department of Mines and Resources, and I wondered what it was.

Mrs. STRUM: Has the minister considered extending this grant to cover the period of education other than in the public school? It seems to me that, while education is, of course, a provincial matter, we have connected the administration of this with the school term. We start with compulsory education and we end with compulsory education. It seems to me that we might extend that to cover the life of the child through the secondary school, because, as I have said before in this chamber, that is when the child really become expensive to maintain; school books must be purchased; very often there are tuition fees to pay, and it may be necessary to provide for boarding the child away from home. It seems to me that under this bill the provision might be extended to cover the secondary school as well as the primary school.

Mr. McCANN: That is a matter to which consideration might be given. But the act has been in effect for only about a year, and we do not contemplate any great changes until we have reviewed our experience in that period. I might point out that, as regards most provinces, the mothers allowance act provides for the age of sixteen years as we have it in this bill.

Section agreed to.

On section 2.

Mr. FLEMING: In connection with payments to children's aid societies and other institutions of that kind, when the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare were under review in committee of supply some weeks ago I drew the attention of the minister and the committee to the fact that complaints have been received from some of the leading children's aid societies about the great cost of bookkeeping which has been imposed upon them by reason of their being cooperate with us or to supply us with specific information in specific cases where we have requested it. The proviso merely gives the administration an alternative in any case where the provincial authorities, after having been asked for information, fail to supply it.

If this ever occurs, the proviso in the amending clause makes it possible for the governor in council to prescribe an alternative method by which such information may be obtained. Presumably the governor in council, if such a situation ever arose, could pass a regulation authorizing the regional director of family allowances in the province concerned to make the decision himself on any matter of school attendance or equivalent training which ordinarily the provincial educational authorities will be asked to make for us.

Mr. FLEMING: It is quite clear from the statement just made that the proviso in the new section 4(2a) is not to take care of any situation that exists at the moment, and that there is no occasion in mind to apply it?

Mr. McCANN: That is right.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I should like to be clear about children who are not attending school because of physical or mental disabilities. Would they still be eligible for the family allowance, provided that they are maintained by their parents or guardians?

Mr. McCANN: That would be accepted as a legitimate excuse from school attendance and therefore they would receive the allowance.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: That would be a justifiable excuse?

Mr. McCANN: Yes.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: In remote areas where no schools are available, if the parents or guardians did not take advantage of the correspondence course the child might receive no education whatsoever. Would such child still be eligible for the family allowance?

Mr. McCANN: The department would accept the judgment of the educational authorities as to whether or not school facilities were available.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Paragraph (b) deals with a child who ceases to be resident in Canada. Has the minister given consideration to special circumstances or special cases? I am thinking of a girl in my constituency, the child of people of very modest means who suffers from a peculiar nervous affection. The child is highly intelligent and normal in every other way; but on account of this affection she has to be sent to the United States to school, either in the state of Washington or in California, to receive instruction and treatment. I brought this case to the attention of the minister last fall, but it was not possible under the act then for these parents to receive the family allowance for the child. It would seem that this amendment makes no change in the law in that respect. The child's parents are not well off but are in very modest circumstances and the family allowance would be a great help to them. They cannot help the condition of the child, and they are doing all they can to assist her, straining their resources to the limit. Is special consideration given to that type of case?

Mr. McCANN: The practice has been that where the child is resident outside Canada for a period of not more than three months the child is considered resident in Canada for the purpose of the family allowance plan, but where the period is longer than that the grant under the present act does not apply.

Mr. HERRIDGE: It is impossible for the parents to bring the child home and send her back again to school in order to comply with the act. I think special consideration should be given to cases of that type.

Mr. CAMPBELL: How are the children of Indians and Eskimos in remote areas taken care of, also the children of Indians on reserves where there are no convenient schools? The correspondence course would be almost impossible for them to take, because the Indian parents are not able to read or write and could not pass on the correspondence courses to the children. The minister mentioned the Indian affairs branch. Is that the branch which would decide whether these children in remote areas are eligible for the allowance?

Mr. McCANN: We rely entirely on the judgment of the Department of Mines and Resources, which is responsible for the Eskimos and Indians.

Mr. FLEMING: With regard to the new subsection 2 (a), providing that the allowance shall cease to be payable when the child ceases to be maintained by a parent, what interpretation has the department given to the word "maintained"? Has a ceiling been placed on a child's earnings as a condition of eligibility for the allowance?

Mr. McCANN: That is clearly set out in the regulations. I will read the regulation which covers it, regulation 12, under part IV:

(1) A parent shall be deemed to maintain a child substantially so long as the amount or value of the contributions made by such parent, in cash or in kind, for the maintenance, care, training, education and advancement of such child, exclusive of the allowance is $5 or more per month, and provided such amount or value

It is alleged that the federal government, in prescribing school attendance through these years as a condition for receiving family allowances, is in effect prescribing school attendance requirements without reference to the provinces whose responsibility it is under the British North America Act, to deal with all matters pertaining to education and to control the ages of school attendance and provide the necessary facilities for education. Regulations passed coincident with the inauguration of family allowances have actually laid down the policy which is now being incorporated into the present amendment to section 4, subsection 2.

The gist of this amendment is that an allowance shall cease to be payable if a child does not attend school in conformity with the age limits and other conditions laid down by the school attendance authorities of the province in which the child resides. In other words, we will take the judgment of the provincial school attendance authorities in each province as to whether or not a child is attending school in accordance with the laws of that province affecting school attendance. Where the provincial school attendance authorities are satisfied that a child is attending school in accordance with the laws of that province, we will continue the allowances. Where the provincial authorities are satisfied that a child absent from school is legally excused, or that it is not in any way violating the school attendance laws of the province—over the age limit, absent from school on work permit, et cetera—we will likewise continue to pay the allowances as long as the child does not enter the wage-earning class and cease to be maintained by his parent. If, however, the provincial authorities advise us that a child is of school attendance age and is absent from school without justifiable excuse, we will then discontinue the allowances. This means that our practice and procedure will necessarily vary from province to province in accordance with the varying requirements in each province with respect to school attendance.

It should be pointed out further, in connection with the new section 4 (2) (a), that the school attendance regulations with respect to Indians in each province and the school attendance regulations with respect to all children —Indians, Eskimos and whites—in the northwest territories or Yukon territory are matters over which the federal government, through the Department of Mines and Resources, has control. The amending clause, therefore, exempts Indian children in the provinces from the control of provincial school attendance regulations in so far as family allowances are concerned and provides that an educational authority prescribed by regulation shall determine matters of school attendance with respect to Indians in the provinces or children in the northwest and Yukon territories in so far as family allowances are concerned. Under arrangements already set forth in the regulations, designated officials of the Department of Mines and Resources have been named as the educational authorities referred to in connection with these matters.

There is a reference in section 4 (2) of the act as it stands at present to equivalent training as being an acceptable substitute for school attendance. The question has arisen as to who should determine the adequacy of equivalent training. It would not seem to be proper that the federal authority should take it upon itself, in the administration of family allowances, to decide what, in any given case, is training equivalent to that which is offered by the provincial educational authorities. This would mean that the federal government would be setting itself up in judgment over provincial educational authorities and systems. Consequently, instead of prescribing equivalent training by regulation, as called for in the present act, the new amendment contemplates referring all questions of equivalent training to the appropriate provincial authorities in all cases where the provincial authorities have jurisdiction. It will be for the provincial authorities to certify in any given case whether or not training outside the ordinary school system is equivalent to that which would be furnished if a child were actually in school attendance.

Likewise the educational authorities designated by regulation to deal with Indian children and with children in the territories will pass upon questions of equivalent training in cases falling under their jurisdiction.

One of the best examples of equivalent training is the system of correspondence school education which is offered by most provinces for the instruction of children living in remote areas where school facilities are totally lacking.

Finally, some comment should be made on the final proviso in amending section 4(2)(a). We confidently expect that all the provincial educational authorities without exception will agree to cooperate with us in supplying the information and certification on matters pertaining to school attendance or equivalent training. In all provinces without exception we have developed good working relationships with the provincial educational authorities. The time might come, however, in some province when the provincial authorities for one reason or another would not wish to

Mr. ABBOTT: I think that is correct, but that section was put in particularly in view of these numerous local agents of the board.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I think that covers my objection completely, and I want to thank the minister for agreeing to the amendment.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING SCHOOL ATTENDANCE AND POWERS TO MAKE REGULATIONS

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved the second reading of bill No. 308, to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1944.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Proviso.

Mr. FLEMING: Mr. Chairman, I think the first part of the proposed amendment, subsection 2 of section 4, is clear in its intent. With regard to the proposed new subsection (2a), I should like to ask the acting minister a question or two. It will be observed that the effect of subsection (2a) is to take care of cases where a child is not regularly attending school in accordance with the laws of the province or, in the case of the territories, an educational authority prescribed by regulation; that is, attending school or taking training equivalent to that which he would receive if he attended school. Then, at the conclusion of paragraph (2a) is this proviso:

> Provided that where information as to school attendance or equivalent training, as may be requested, is not furnished by the competent educational authority of the province, the governor in council may prescribe the manner in which such information may be obtained.

I should like to ask the acting minister whether any such cases have occurred and whether there has been any difficulty in establishing school attendance on the part of children eligible for family allowances in accordance with the laws of the province of residence.

Mr. McCANN: I might say the department is getting cooperation from every province and there have not been cases of complaint. The main purpose of the amendment to section 4, subsection 2, is to deal with the question of school attendance. At the present time the act provides that the allowance shall cease to be payable with the payment for the month when the child, being above the age of six years and physically fit to attend school, fails to attend school or receive equivalent training as prescribed in the regulations.

On the face of it, this clause as originally drafted might be interpreted to mean that a child over six years of age had to attend school until he was sixteen in order to receive family allowances, even though the laws of the province in which he resided did not provide for compulsory school attendance between the ages of six and sixteen. The fact is that hardly any of the provinces provide for compulsory school attendance at an age as early as six. In most provinces the age for commencing school is fixed at six, but the age for compulsory commencement of school is seven or even eight. That means that children are allowed to go to school at six, but in some provinces they are not compelled to go to school until they are either seven or eight years of age.

In many provinces also the school leaving age is not fixed as late as sixteen. In some provinces it is fixed as early as fourteen or fifteen, and in some provinces there are other provisions to the effect that if a child reaches a certain standing in his school grade, for example, grade nine standing, he is not required to attend school any longer. Other provinces again, in some cases, set the school leaving age at fourteen or fifteen or sixteen, but require a child who attains this age in the middle of a school year to complete the school year before leaving school. Most provinces have developed systems of work permits and other devices under which they legally excuse children from school attendance under certain circumstances, for example, to go to work, to help on the farm, to help at home, et cetera.

All these factors have influenced us in reaching the conclusion that it is not practical to insist in any federal law on compulsory school attendance between the ages of six and sixteen without adjusting our provision regarding school attendance to the circumstances prevailing in the different provinces whose responsibility it is to prescribe the ages for compulsory school attendance.

Exception has been taken to this insistence in federal legislation on school attendance between the ages of six and sixteen as a condition of the receipt of family allowances.

exchanges will be such that it will be possible to remove exchange control within the period suggested by my hon. friend. No one would be better pleased than I were that possible, but I am convinced that it will not be possible. All the indications are the other way. For instance, under the Bretton Woods agreement it was indicated that what was referred to as the transition period would be probably a period of at least five years. Under our loan to Britain there is a preliminary period, a transition period if you will, of five years during which no interest is payable. All the indications are that it will be a period of perhaps two, three, four or five years before we can expect to have anything resembling normal international exchange conditions. That is a matter of opinion, I appreciate, but I put this forward as my opinion.

The difficulty and danger, I think, in putting a rigid time limit on a bill of this kind—a year, the hon. gentleman suggests—would be that this period might expire at a time parliament was not in session, a most inconvenient time, when it would not be possible to have a full and free debate on the matter. There are a number of reasons which I think should be obvious to all hon. members as to why I, at any rate, feel it is not desirable to put a time limit on a bill of this kind. Circumstances are rather different with respect to the Emergency Transitional Powers Act, because in that act the executive branch of government is given power to legislate in regard to a wide variety of subjects. Here we are dealing with a matter the principle of which is very simple.

Mr. HACKETT: But it affects a whole range of subjects.

Mr. ABBOTT: The principle here is that we exercise government control of the international exchanges in place of the free market. The method of administration is complicated, but the principle is simple, and that is the single principle before this house. The house will have an opportunity each year to review the operations of this board, and I should hope and expect that it would review them pretty thoroughly. I should expect searching questions to be asked as to the operations of the board and as to the necessity of continuing those operations. That is why we have inserted in this bill a provision that each year the government must come to parliament for an appropriation to carry on the activities of the board.

For all these reasons and others, the government has come to the conclusion that the usual practice should be followed, that no definite limitation should be imposed upon the operation of this measure, but that it should be left to parliament to repeal the legislation when it is considered no longer necessary in the interests of the people of Canada.

Mr. HACKETT: I should like to draw the attention of the minister to the fact that in Britain the practice to which he has referred appears to be one of definite limitation. I have before me the statutes of 1945, chapter 9 of which is headed "An act to continue certain expiring laws," and begins in this way:

> Whereas the acts mentioned in the schedule to this act are, in so far as they are in force and are temporary in their duration, limited to expire on the thirty-first day of December, nineteen hundred and forty-five:
> And whereas it is expedient to provide for the continuance as in this act mentioned, of those acts and of the enactments amending or affecting the same . . .

They are continued for one year, and are to expire on the last day of December, 1946.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is exactly what I said.

Amendment negatived on division.

Section agreed to.

On section 54—Protection of officers and others.

Mr. ABBOTT: You will remember, Mr. Chairman, that this section was allowed to stand. I have given some consideration to the section, and I think that has been done as well by the hon. member for Lake Centre. I explained that the words "written or verbal instructions of the board or an inspector" were put in the section primarily to protect the numerous authorized agents of the board, and particularly the branches of the chartered banks, against frivolous litigation. In order to tighten it up a little, I would suggest that the words "or an inspector" be struck out, and would be prepared to ask one of my colleagues to move an amendment to that effect. Perhaps the hon. member for Lake Centre would care to look at that.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move accordingly.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I think the removal of the words "or an inspector" would cover my main objection to this section. It would then place the responsibility on the board, not on an inspector. As it is proposed to be amended it will not go any farther, as I see it, than the preceding portion of the section, namely that the defendant acted upon probable cause.

were looking at it twelve months from now or eleven months from now we might have a substantially different situation.

I have one further point to make, namely, that I have been disappointed and other people have been disappointed—but I am not going into that—by the fact that the minister has felt it was necessary to have this bill with every "i" dotted and every "t" crossed. Some of us hoped that there might have been some alleviation, some lessening of rigidity. I suggest that from the point of view of those who will administer the act, the foreign exchange control board, psychologically it would be of the greatest advantage if they had facing them the fact that within a comparatively short time this thing has to be reviewed. I think that as things are we have to rely on them to some extent—it is a faint reliance—to come back and tell us that there is some way in which the matter can be handled, the rigidity can be lessened and some freedom restored. Therefore I suggest that from the point of view of those who are to administer this act—if we wish for relaxation ourselves—we should leave them with the onus of coming back next year and saying either that the situation is unchanged and that, therefore, we must extend this power for another year, or, in the alternative, that it can be relaxed in certain ways. Perhaps it is too much to hope that that might be done; perhaps it is too much to hope that they would recommend that. For this reason I put this forward.

If I remember correctly, in committee the minister gave as his reason for the view which he held that the bill should be left as it is—and I am hoping that he has changed in that regard—that he preferred to follow the British practice. I believe that was the statement.

Mr. ABBOTT: That was one of my reasons.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The chief reason, as I recall it. I suggest that the British practice is not always uniform; that it does not really get us anywhere by saying it is the British practice, because there are cases where that is not the British practice. I have said that it is not the practice with the Militia Act.

I leave the matter with the minister now by suggesting that no harm can be done by limiting the time, if there is no change in the next year, as I believe we all hope, as I believe the minister hopes, there will be, which will enable us to take a different view. If those changes do occur, then it is of manifest importance that we do not send this out with no time limit on it, but that we have one. Conversely, if we come here next year and we say regretfully that there is still an emergency and we cannot do much about the matter, no harm will have been done except that we shall have spent a little time considering the matter. At that time we would regretfully say—and I am sure the minister will agree with it; in fact he has already said it—that we would again abandon what we regard as the usually normal processes and take up and accept emergency measures to meet with an emergency. I earnestly plead with the minister to grant this last request.

Mr. HACKETT: I listened to the plea of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I fear that his plea, eloquent though it was, has fallen on deaf ears. I have heard that plea made in the house on a number of accasions, but at no time has there been any indication that the government was willing by one iota to depart from the position that it had taken.

The war is at an end for well over a year. Controls still persist and the means of enforcing them have been reenacted. Much as I should like to see some indication on the part of the government of a return to free enterprise, I am bound to inform you, Mr. Chairman, that the trend is the other way. The trend is directly toward centralization, socialization and perpetuating that system which we took on for the period of the war. There is no intimation, no suggestion of any relaxation, and I say regretfully that, in my view, the plea of the last speaker has fallen upon deaf ears.

Mr. ABBOTT: May I say just one word in reply, more particularly to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. Let me assure him that I did give the most earnest and careful consideration to the desirability and the advisability of putting some time limit on the duration of this bill. After giving it that consideration, for a number of reasons I came to the conclusion that it was not desirable to do so. In substance I gave those reasons to the committee, and I do not know that there is any particular need for my elaborating them here. Under the British parliamentary system it is the general practice not to put a time limit on the duration of a statute unless it is of a special kind. That contrasts with the practice in other jurisdictions where the executive branch of government is separate from the legislative branch; but where the executive branch of government is responsible to the legislative branch, the usual practice is to impose upon the government the responsibility of deciding whether a measure should or should not be repealed, and of course parliament really has that responsibility. There is no indication that conditions in international are not as well trained as those in the Department of Finance or in the foreign exchange control board—when, in addition to all that, you put upon a man the burden of proving his innocence, then I am surprised that you have not 100 per cent of convictions. I would ask you, Mr. Chairman, to put the question.

Mr. JAENICKE: Is it not true that the burden of proof may be shifted automatically where certain facts are or should be within the knowledge of the accused or defendant?

Mr. FULTON: That may take place, yes, but not as a rule, where the crown has to prove intent. If the crown establishes a prima facie case the defendant has to answer it.

Mr. JAENICKE: Is it not the case here that where the crown establishes a prima facie case that the offence has been committed the burden of proof is shifted?

Mr. FULTON: My point is that the crown is relieved of the burden of proving intent on the part of the person charged.

On section 74—Coming into force.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I believe it was when the first clause of the bill was under discussion that I asked whether I might then be allowed to move an amendment limiting the effect of the act, and it was ruled by you, Mr. Chairman, that I should reserve the amendment until this time. I do not propose to speak at any length because I gave my reasons substantially the other morning. I wish to go over them briefly.

The CHAIRMAN: Perhaps I had better read the amendment to the committee. It is moved by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario that section 74 be amended by adding the following as subsection 2:

This act shall continue in force for not more than one year from the date of proclamation.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I think I am correct in saying that when the matter was first under discussion the minister indicated that his mind was open on the subject; and although there has been a period in the interval when I feared that it was not open, I am hoping that it might have opened again. Alternatively, I am hoping either that he has become so tired of saying "no" that he will finally say "yes" to this final appeal. I hope that he has not got so used to saying "no" that he does not know how to pronounce the word "yes".

Mr. ABBOTT: There is nothing I like better than to say yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to go on by saying that I think the minister has said—whether he has said it or not, I am sure he believes as I do—that this should be regarded as an emergency measure. When you have an emergency measure, it is reasonable to treat it as something which in the ordinary course you would review in a reasonable time. I think there is a danger that in these days the abnormal becomes the normal. One gets used to things which a few years ago he would have regarded with absolute abhorrence. But I am not going to deal with that any farther. I am just going to repeat that I feel that this bill should be looked upon as a temporary measure. I appeal to the minister to accept the view that it is reasonable in these days not to put this on the statute books without a time limit, so that within a comparatively short time we may take another look at it. I submit that if the situation has not changed in a year from now —that is what I am suggesting—but if the times are just as difficult, if nothing has happened to change the situation as it is now, then at that time we could extend it.

I wish to put forward again the two or three precedents which I gave. There was the emergency powers bill which we passed in this house last autumn. There is the militia bill which by the sanction of centuries has been regarded as an emergency measure which parliament has brought back to it each year so that it can have the control clearly in its own hands. And then there is another matter. I mention this specially because it has happened since the bill was introduced, and I hope that it may particularly influence the minister's mind. I mention the fact that since the bill was introduced we have had the United States loan to Britain, and I think he will agree with me that at any rate that introduces a situation which possibly, and I might say even probably, may affect the situation so vitally within the next year that if we

On section 59—Where offence deemed to have been committed.

Mr. HAZEN: Subsection 2 provides that any information or complaint with respect to any offence against the provisions of this act may, where the prosecution, suit or proceeding is instituted under the provisions of the criminal code relating to summary convictions, be laid or made within three years from the time when the matter of the information or complaint arose. Under the criminal code, in matters of summary conviction the information or complaint must be laid within six months.

Mr. ABBOTT: On summary conviction, yes.

Mr. HAZEN: Why is it deemed necessary in this case to extend the period to three years? As pointed out by the hon. member for Kamloops, a man may have a permit now but not three years hence. Why is the period extended for such a length of time?

Mr. ABBOTT: The reason is that a large number of exchange control offences are of such a nature that they are not ordinarily disclosed until a considerable time after the commission of the offence, and in the absence of this section, under those circumstances, prosecution by indictment would be necessary if a charge were laid more than six months after the offence had been committed. There are similar provisions in the Income War Tax Act, section 80, subsection 4, where the time is five years; in the Excise Act, section 121, two years, and in the Customs Act, section 277, where the time is three years.

Mr. HAZEN: Those all have to do with business enterprises.

Mr. ABBOTT: This has a lot to do with business enterprises.

Mr. HAZEN: The ordinary man will not keep his records for three years. There should be some provision to protect him and this section does not make it.

On section 60—Penalty—offences relating to property.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not know whether the minister has given any information in regard to the number of offences tried by way of summary conviction procedure in each of the last three years and the number tried by way of indictment.

[Mr. Castleden.]

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not a breakdown as between the two types of offences, but I have the totals:

Year	Convictions	Fines	Prison sentences
1940...	54	$15,455	2 years—3 cases
1941...	114	39,511	9 months—4 cases
1942...	109	53,450	12 years and 3 months—5 cases
1943...	170	47,560	13½ years—6 cases
1944...	81	40,458	1 year and 2 months—2 cases
1945...	47	28,815	No prison sentences
From Jan. to April, 1946...	12	1,300

The total fines were $226,549.

On section 61—Property liable to forfeiture.

Mr. FULTON: I raise the same objection to this section as I did to section 58. This is a most important matter, and I will simply ask you, Mr. Chairman, to put the question in order that we may have a vote on the section. Before you do that, however, may I say that the principle is exactly the same as we discussed before. Since prosecutions, fines and convictions have been mentioned, I recall speaking with an enforcement officer under the wartime prices and trade board where there are many similar provisions shifting the onus of proof, and that officer boasted—well, I would not say that he boasted, I will simply say that he said: "After all, we are pretty careful before we bring any prosecution. We make sure that we have all the facts, and our record in the cases that we have prosecuted runs to about ninety-eight per cent guilty. That, I think, speaks for itself". The answer I made to him was to this effect: The reason may be one or both of two things. We will admit that you are careful about the way you bring prosecutions, but on the other hand the high level of convictions may mean that you frame the law in such a way that once you lay the charge, a man is automatically found guilty. I think it speaks more that way than it does the other.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Or it may be that the law is so just and the facts so clear that conviction necessarily follows.

Mr. FULTON: That might be too; but when you have all the burden of proof placed on the defendant, when you have a department having complete records and compare that with the businessman—and I am speaking of small storekeepers who engage in minor transactions, whose records are not as complete as those of the department and whose clerks with the foreign exchange control board as such; they relate to the effective enforcement of the act, which of course is a pretty important portion of the control, because it is important that people should believe that the act is fully and fairly administered. The great majority of permits and declarations are approved or made to authorized dealers, that is to banks, and it is generally impossible for the board to state definitely that no permit has been granted or declaration made covering a particular transaction. On the other hand the declarant or applicant for the permit gets the copy of it and he knows whether he has got the permit or not.

Mr. FULTON: How long does he keep it?

Mr. ABBOTT: The shifting of the burden of proof is therefore no hardship on the applicant. The defendant in one of these actions knows perfectly well whether he has obtained a permit or not, and it is very easy for him to establish that. On the other hand, permits have been issued by thousands of branch banks throughout the country, and it is pretty difficult if not impossible for the board to know at a given time whether or not an applicant has his permit. Careful consideration was given to this. My colleagues and I are conscious of the fact that this is an exception to the general rule that the burden of proof is on the crown to show that a man is guilty. But we feel on balance that this is a not unreasonable condition to put upon those who are dealing with foreign exchange, and for that reason I feel that the section should remain in the act.

Mr. FULTON: I appreciate the minister's point of view, and I accept at its face value his assurance that careful consideration was given to this matter; but I must make this observation, that it is the first time I have heard difficulty of administration advanced as a reason for making a fundamental change in legal principles, and I think that it is an entirely invalid ground on which to base any argument. For my part I do not accept it. As far as difficulty is concerned, it is no more difficult for the board to prove that it did or did not issue a permit than it is for a man who received a permit three years ago, but who has lost or destroyed it, to prove that he received it; and if the statement that banks or agents of the board do not keep records—

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, they do.

Mr. FULTON: —is to be urged as justification for importing this principle, I do not think it is a valid argument. I have in mind that this transaction may have taken place four or five years ago and that persons may actually be completely unable to prove they ever received a permit, because they have lost it. Business men, and particularly small business men—country merchants, country storekeepers —do not keep their records as carefully as government departments do, or as we hope government departments do. It is the crown that lays the prosecution or the information; it is the crown which brings the action, and I think the crown should accept the normal responsibility which rests upon it of proving its case before the unfortunate innocent citizen can be found guilty. It is a principle which we simply cannot allow to be infringed for the slender and tenuous reasons the minister has advanced. In order to bring the matter to a head, I move:

That section 58 of the bill be deleted, and that the subsequent sections be renumbered accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN: A similar amendment was moved this morning, and I declared it out of order. The effect of the amendment, in fact the words of the amendment, are that the clause be deleted. The clause will automatically be deleted if it is not carried when I take the vote.

Mr. FULTON: I was under the impression that it was necessary to renumber the subsequent clauses, and that that should be included as an amendment. However the purpose of the amendment is that the question shall be put.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should like to ask the hon. member for Kamloops one question. If he were charged with driving a car without a licence, would he expect the burden of proof that he had a licence to be upon the officers of the law, or would he consider that he would have to produce his licence?

Mr. FULTON: I can answer that this way. There is a burden which I know now rests on me to carry my licence while I am driving. But as far as I know there is no burden on me to keep an export permit or any sort of permit, which I may have had four years ago, indefinitely from year to year to be produced when asked for. There is no such obligation upon me.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think the same principle applies.

Mr. FULTON: There is a clear duty on a man to produce his licence whenever he drives his car. There is no such duty in this case.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think there is.

Section agreed to on division.

On section 58—Burden of proof on the person that he possessed necessary permit.

Mr. FULTON: Subsections 1 and 2 of this section shift the burden of proof which would normally rest on the person prosecuting the case—on the crown, that is to say, or whoever has laid the information—to the defendant. I am going to move an amendment that the whole section be deleted. If the whole section were deleted it would in no way interfere with the principle of foreign exchange control and would not interfere with any powers necessary for its efficient administration, because this clause concerns only the prosecution of a person charged with an offence against the act. The reason I think it is important to delete the section is that it is time parliament put an end to the practice that has been creeping in of shifting the burden of proof on to an accused person or defendant. I admit there are precedents for that in the Customs Act and Excise Act, but that does not make the principle a good one. I do not think one wrong is justified by another. Secondly, this is an entirely new set of circumstances. Even the minister has admitted that he hopes this control will only be temporary and that he does not want to give powers that are not essential. That in itself makes the argument as to what was done before in some other act invalid in this case. A further reason why this section should be deleted is to be found in the sections immediately following, sections 59 and 60, which provide that all proceedings under this act are to be laid in accordance with the criminal code. There is no separate procedure provided for by this bill. If the proceedings are brought under the criminal code it becomes in essence, although some details of the procedure may vary, an offence that partakes of the nature of a crime. It has always been held, and never questioned, that before a man can be found guilty of a crime the crown must prove the element of intent, and I think it is a bad principle to make it possible to lay proceedings under the criminal code and then to say "we will exempt the crown from the obligation of proving that the man intended to commit the infraction of which he is charged." If it is not intended that the crown should have to prove that intent, if it is not intended that the crown should accept all the burdens imposed on it by the criminal code, I suggest that some other procedure should be laid down.

By reason of a conviction under this act a man is virtually branded a criminal, because that is the effect when an information is laid under the criminal code. I suggest that the effect of this section 58 that when a person is charged with an offence, and it is established in proof that the person did any act or omission for which a permit is required, it shall not be necessary to establish in proof of the offence that the person charged did not possess a permit or had not been exempted, and so on, and the burden of proof that he did act in accordance with the regulations shall pass to the person charged—means that the crown is relieved from the burden of proving that the person intended to break the law. It is admitted, of course, that ignorance of the law is no excuse; a man cannot plead "I did not know the law and therefore I am not guilty of intentionally breaking the provisions of the act." But many people, knowing the law, nevertheless do things entirely innocently as far as intent is concerned, having no wish to break the law or even infringe any of its provisions. I know that similar provisions are found in many regulations under the wartime prices and trade board with regard to rationing, and that it is provided that if a certain set of circumstances is proved the onus of proof is placed on the accused person to show that he did not commit an infraction of the act. But these infractions may extend back over three to five years, and no one can prove, if he is in business, that every single transaction back over that period complied with the terms of the act, because he will not have all the records to show it. Virtually all the crown has to do is to lay a charge, and he cannot prove his own innocence, and therefore he will be found guilty. That will be the result of section 58 in many cases.

I feel that it is time we in parliament objected to what is in effect a change in the principles of the criminal law and in the procedure under the criminal code. Members of parliament should take a stand in defence of the rights of individuals who were placed under so many regulations passed by this and other boards that, although the legal maxim "ignorance of the law is no excuse" still exists, it is utterly impossible to know what the law is. When we follow that up by saying, "Whether you know the law or not, and whether you intended to break it or not, you shall be found guilty and the crown shall not have to prove the intent", I submit we are introducing a very bad principle. I ask the minister whether he is prepared to delete this section.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I may say a word at this point to explain the reasons. My hon. friend is quite right when he says that the provisions of this section have nothing to do acts when he said that they conferred similar unlimited terms. They do not. I agree that a defendant acting on probable cause should be protected, but I cannot see how anyone could justify a situation wherein a defendant who has proceeded unfairly may defend himself by citing to the judge that he was acting on behalf of some one superior to him. It opens the door to the interference with private rights, and it gives a sense of security to offending officials which I submit is not justified. You might just as well go as far as regulation 39 did during the war and say that there is no right of action at all. However, that would have been too direct and too startling. Instead of saving that, provision is made that a person while technically having the right of recourse to the courts, has in reality no rights against a wrongdoer. I want to see the law enforced, but I do not want to see administrative officers becoming the masters of the people because of the reliance they will be able to place on a section such as this, which gives them unlimited and unrestricted power to interfere with private rights. I appeal to the minister—I will do no more than that—to consent to an amendment deleting that portion of subsection 2 beginning with the word "or" and ending with the word "instructions", so that the subsection would read:

> If in any action, suit or proceeding to which this section applies the court or judge before whom the trial takes place certifies that the defendant acted upon probable cause, the plaintiff shall not be entitled to more than nominal damages nor to any costs of suit, nor, in case of a seizure, shall the person who made the seizure be liable to any civil or criminal proceedings on account thereof.

The effect of the amendment would be to make the section the same as it is in the Customs Act and in the Excise Act. The minister felt it was the same until I brought it to his attention this afternoon. Apparently he had been so instructed. I appeal to him that parliament should not go further in giving that immunity to public officials which the subsection in its present form will confer.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am sympathetic to my hon. friend's amendment, but perhaps I should tell him why these words were put in the bill. The board acts, as he knows, in large measure through the managers of branch banks. The banks act as agents for the board, and it was felt that to afford reasonable protection to the branch banks, which act merely as agents for the board, these words should be put in. I do not think it really adds to the protection which is afforded under the Customs Act. Under the Customs Act the officers are all government employees, but in the administration of the affairs of the board we have to have a good many outside agents. Every chartered bank and its branches are agents for the purpose of issuing or refusing permits, and so on. I do not think this is an arbitrary or excessive power, and I should be reluctant to strike it out of the bill, for the reason which I have given.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Will the minister let the subsection stand and give consideration to the amendment?

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be very glad to do that.

Mr. HACKETT: My very brief observations will have to do with the following section, and I am going to ask the minister if he would be willing to consider my suggestion also at the same time. Section 55 gives immunity to any officer who has attempted to effect a seizure of the property and has found out after making the attempt that there was no property there to seize. Has the minister considered whether it lies within the power of this parliament to impinge to the extent that the section seems to impinge upon property and civil rights? If I have been damaged by a person, he is liable to me for those damages and the rule in the province in which the minister practices is that a person can only disinculpate himself if he can establish that he has exercised reasonable care; the mere instructions of a senior officer are not sufficient to give immunity to the police officer who arrests a person without reason. I am going to ask the minister, when he is considering the suggestion made by the hon. member for Lake Centre, to consider and advise the committee whether the powers of parliament have not been exceeded in the enactment of the following section 55.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised not. This section is in effect the same as section 162 of the Customs Act, which has been in that act for a great many years. I am satisfied that it is within the legislative competence of parliament. My hon. friend's point is slightly different from the one raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre, although it resembles it.

think my hon. friend intended to imply this, but if the penal provisions are enforced and an individual is fined or sentenced to imprisonment there would be an appeal in the ordinary way. There is no suggestion that that form of appeal is taken away under the bill.

With the exceptions which I have mentioned, the three cases where appeal to the courts is provided, the decisions of the board would concern principally the granting or refusing of applications for permits and the like; in other words, the exercise of discretionary power. No one knows better than my hon. friend that where a person is given discretion, whether it be a minister or a municipal council, to issue permits, the courts do not interfere with the exercise of that discretion unless it is shown it was not exercised in a bona fide manner or was influenced by improper motives. That is a well recognized principle.

Mostly the matters in which those discretions are exercised have to do with administration. In cases where the liberty of the subject is involved, in cases where there is a question of fact such as the fair value of property, in cases where the board has made a prohibition under section 49 to deal with property or where currency has been forfeited, there is an appeal, first to the board, then to the minister and finally to the courts. In these discretionary and administrative matters the appeal is from the authorized agent in the first place, if it is a customs officer or a bank, to the board and then from the board to the minister.

I do not agree with my hon. friend that appeals to the minister in cases of this kind are futile. I have had a few personal experiences of this kind; I know that there is opportunity for the minister to review administrative decisions, and on occasion they have been overruled. I suppose it is only fair to say that in the vast majority of cases the minister would confirm the exercise of discretion by the board. That would probably be because he agreed that it was wisely exercised.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How many appeals were there in the last three years, and in how many cases did the minister reverse the order made?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told by the secretary of the board that there were no appeals from the board to the minister.

Mr. HACKETT: Have not those appeals been given up since the Pioneer Laundry case?

Mr. ABBOTT: That was a question as to the exercise of a discretion. It has been a well-recognized legal principle for years that the courts do not interfere with the proper exercise of discretion.

Mr. HACKETT: That is quite true, but the minister will recall that the privy council held in the Pioneer case—

Mr. ABBOTT: I am familiar with that case.

Mr. HACKETT: —that that was a judicial discretion and that the discretion should be exercised only for legal and judicial reasons; that the arbitrary exercise of discretion was illegal.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is true. As I said once in this house when referring to the Pioneer Laundry case, the mistake made by the commissioner of income tax was in giving his reasons.

Mr. HACKETT: He attempted to give them in a subsequent case, and you know what the court of appeal in British Columbia did to that?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I referred to this section a while ago, and I am not going to repeat what I said. This is the section that absolves and frees a person from any action, however illegal, however unjustified and however tyrannical it may be, who is able to say that a member of the board or an inspector, had instructed him whether verbally or in writing, so to act. I looked up every act and every regulation I could find, and never before has the government asked that a person who acts beyond the powers of a law, who diminishes or destroys the rights of an individual, shall be able to offer as a defence that somebody his senior instructed him so to act. Apparently the minister had not read the Excise Act, or the Customs Act, or he was following the advice of advisers who had not read those be followed here. If you are providing for an appeal to the minister, what is your position? In that regard the report of Lord Sankey's commission, which was tabled in the House of Commons and the House of Lords and has since been accepted as a cardinal contribution to the maintenance of the liberty of the subject, has this to say:

> In future legislation parliament should proceed on the principle that no minister (in which word we include any officer of a minister acting under his orders) should give a judicial decision in any dispute . . . in which departmental interest prevails. If such cases appear likely to arise, parliament should provide for determination of the dispute by a ministerial tribunal functioning independently of the minister.

If you are going to deny that right of appeal, your position is this. If there is no appeal the servant is indeed the master, for the appeal is to the master. An appeal to the minister is merely illusory and a formality; in addition, an appeal to the minister places him in the position of being a judge in his own cause. There is also a further point in that connection, that a person should not be condemned unheard, that he has a right to equality under the law and to the application of the principle that one shall not be discriminated against unfairly within any one class. All these provisions and recommendations of the Sankey commission are set at naught by section 37, which simply provides that there is no appeal except to the minister which, at the risk of reiteration, I say is an appeal to the person concerned himself. It is interesting to read what the Sankey report has to say with regard to appeals to the minister from the decision of an administrative board:

> Indeed we think it is clear that bias from strong and sincere conviction as to public policy may operate as a more serious disqualification than pecuniary interest. No honest man acting in a judicial capacity allows himself to be influenced by pecuniary interest; if anything, the danger is likely to be that through fear of yielding to motives of self-interest he may unconsciously do an injustice to the party with which his pecuniary interest may appear to others to identify him. But the bias to which a public-spirited man is subjected if he adjudicates in any case in which he is interested on public grounds is more subtle and less easy for him to detect and resist.
> We are here considering questions of public policy and from the public point of view it is important to remember that the principle underlying all the decisions in regard to disqualification by reason of bias is that the mind of the judge ought to be free to decide on purely judicial grounds and should not be directly or indirectly influenced by, or exposed to the influence of, either motives of self-interest or opinions about policy or any other considerations not relevant to the issue.
> We are of opinion that in considering the assignment of judicial functions to ministers parliament should keep clearly in view the maxim that no man is to be judge in a cause in which he has an interest . . . Parliament would do well in such a case to provide that the minister himself should not be the judge, but that the case should be decided by an independent tribunal.

These views, as expressed by this commission which was representative of the greatest leader of both British houses of parliament and of the bench, deserve consideration. I realize that the minister takes the view that certain control is necessary in order that this legislation may be carried into effect, but surely any person whose rights are unjustly interfered with should have a right to appeal beyond the minister. I can see no reason why a question of one's liberty or of one's rights as a citizen should not be subject to appeal, while in connection with monetary matters there should be an appeal to the exchequer court. On the one hand the individual has no appeal when rights are swept aside. On the other hand if a question arises as to the fair value of any property, debt, obligation, claim or service, then there is the right of appeal to the exchequer court.

I ask the minister in what way this control would be interfered with if those who administer the law, the servants of the people, were to realize that when they did wrong or acted unfairly there would be a right on the part of the aggrieved person to appeal to the courts as is provided in section 38? I can do no more than say that, however desirous he may be to perpetuate these controls, surely he should be as anxious and as zealous to assure those whose rights are interfered with unfairly a right of recourse to the courts without which there can be no justice or equality under the law.

Mr. ABBOTT: I should be very glad to say a word on this question of appeal. I know my hon. friend will believe me when I say that I am just as anxious as he is that appeals to our courts should not be unduly curtailed. I hold with him that legislation which takes away from the subject the right of appeal to the courts in a proper case is not proper legislation.

Under this proposed measure there are three cases in which an appeal to the courts is provided. First, there is the case of the determination of fair value of property under section 38; second, there is an appeal from a prohibition made by the board under section 49 on dealings with a person's property in order to ensure the carrying out of the provisions of the act, and, third, there is an appeal from a decision of the board forfeiting currency valued at not over $100 which has been dealt with contrary to the act. I do not sections and the remainder would be handled by regulation. The hon. member for Lake Centre referred to the British measure as being passed by a socialist government. Let me tell the committee that in England the foreign exchange control provisions are still being administered under emergency powers enacted by the previous government, which was not a socialist government. They have not brought into parliament a special statute as we have here, subjecting the board to the control of the minister, in that case the chancellor of the exchequer. This measure is an attempt to combine the doctrine of ministerial responsibility to parliament with the wide administrative discretion which must be given to a board to exercise powers which we believe are in the interests of the Canadian people.

Mr. HACKETT: In Britain are the powers not exercised under a statute which was passed by the present government?

Mr. ABBOTT: No; I am informed they are powers which were exercised under emergency orders in council, or whatever is the equivalent over there, passed under the Emergency Powers Act, enacted by the previous government.

Mr. HACKETT: By act of parliament.

Mr. ABBOTT: Just a short enabling bill of two or three sections. It is all covered by regulation. As I say, if we had followed the practice there we would have brought in a short bill of two or three enabling sections and then done it all by regulation. Instead of that we have brought in a bill in which we are trying to spell out in as complete terms as possible the powers which we believe the board should exercise. In a measure of this kind it is obviously easy to point out that broad powers are conferred on the board. My answer is that the powers must necessarily be broad. The very essence of exchange control is control. It is unfortunate that we must have control; nevertheless I am profoundly convinced, and the government is convinced; in view of the conditions under which the world finds itself to-day, it is essential unless we are to leave the thing wide open. I dealt with that yesterday. We have to provide working machinery to do it. That is what we are trying to do in this bill.

Amendment (Mr. Diefenbaker) negatived on division.

Section agreed to.

Section 36 agreed to.

[Mr. Abbott.]

On section 37—Appeals.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In the matter of appeals, Mr. Chairman, it is all very well for the minister to brush the matter aside and say you must have power, and you must have unnecessary power, in order to carry out the provisions of the law; but I do ask the minister to give consideration to this matter. He has spoken of the situation in Great Britain. In that country since the war, under the present government—and you can follow this through day by day—when any matter has come before the House of Commons involving wartime restrictions against appeals, invariably those restrictions have been removed, to the end that the subject may be assured an opportunity to secure justice. Look at this section. It provides for an appeal to the minister against every matter, order or declaration made by this board, and that when an appeal is made from the employee of the minister to the minister, the decision of the minister shall be final. In 1930 a committee of the British parliament was set up under the chairmanship of the lord high chancellor with a view to looking into this whole question of the maintenance of the right of appeal to the courts; and I cannot conceive of any justification for an arbitrary declaration of a board not being subject to appeal to the courts. In that there is nothing which would interfere with control; for if the decision is legal it will be upheld. If on the other hand it is illegal, the order of the board never should have been made and should be reversed. The only reason for which an appeal can be opposed is that the board is afraid that on appeal its decisions might not be supported; and in these days when it is so necessary to assure a degree of justice to everyone, and to assure that justice is done, I submit that the opinion expressed not too long ago by the lord chief justice of Great Britain is applicable and pertinent at this time. He said:

> Amid the cross-currents and shifting sands of public life the law is like a great rock upon which a man may set his feet and be safe, while the inevitable inequalities of private life are not so dangerous in a country where every citizen knows that in the law courts, at any rate, he can get justice.

I appeal to the minister on this matter. I know he has the support of the majority behind him in whatever stand he takes; but I suggest that where, as in this act, the servant if he acts illegally may indeed be the master and where there is no supervisory jurisdiction on the part of the courts of the land against arbitrary or illegal interference with rights, what is followed in Great Britain might well should not be too technical about the details of its administration. Evidently the government is willing to take the responsibility for the administration of this board, and if in the future we find that some of the things they do are not right, we shall have the opportunity to criticize them.

If it is in order I should like to refer to a newspaper clipping to indicate why I am surprised at the attitude taken by the hon. member for Lake Centre. Speaking to the Toronto Conservative business men's club in 1942, he is reported, under the heading of "Advises Tories to Modernize" to have said: I do not know whether they took his advice, but referring to the challenge of the C.C.F. and the Liberal party he said:

> The Conservative party must meet this challenge that comes to it and show the people that our economic system shall continue to be one of free enterprise under stringent control.

These are his words. If the hon. member wants a free enterprise system under stringent control, I am not going to argue with him about it. I think that is what we are getting. According to the argument used by the hon. member for Stanstead—and I respect his views—he wants unrestricted private enterprise. These may not be his exact words, but I believe it is his political philosophy. If we were to follow that to its logical conclusion we would not have free enterprise at all. We would have monopoly capitalism. If we are to have controls—and we seem to agree that there should be some controls; I do not say we should have stringent control such as advocated by the hon. member for Lake Centre—we should have controls which can be removed by the action of this parliament. Any powers that we give to a board under this legislation will eventually come back for review where there is power to remove them if we dislike them.

Let us never forget that we have controls at all times. The lack of legislation does not mean the lack of controls, financial or otherwise. The controls are always there. Somebody is always manipulating our monetary system. Someone is manipulating the finances of this country. Somebody must be in control or else we would have only chaos. We must either choose the controls which we can remove if we do not like them, or we must accept control by private interests.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have a word to say before the amendment is put. The hon. member for Lake Centre, who is not given to understatement, in his comments on this section to-day has almost excelled himself. I have heard him express the views on other measures which have been brought before parliament.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Which were changed.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not for one moment question the sincerity of these views. I admit that the powers which are conferred by this bill are broad. I am not prepared to say that they are the widest powers ever conferred by parliament on administrative bodies. My experience is not sufficient to enable me to make that categorical assertion.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They are not half as broad as those conferred in 1934.

Mr. ABBOTT: I say that they are broad powers; but here is the position. The government believes that exchange control is necessary in the interests of the Canadian people. That being so, the question arises as to how that control is to be exercised. The government feels that it can be best exercised in the interests of the people of Canada by the administrative body which was set up during the war to exercise it, namely, the foreign exchange control board, and it believes that the Canadian people are prepared to accept administration by that board.

In passing a bill of this kind it is impossible to spell out in detail all the powers which such an administrative board will require. After most careful consideration we came to the conclusion that the policy which must be followed would be to confer upon the board broad powers, subject, of course, to their being approved by the governor in council and to appropriate publicity being given to them; to give the board broad powers and then to permit those powers to be varied by regulation as was done during the war. For example, the regulation which is being suggested here to declare that a non-resident shall be a resident or a resident a non-resident is a case in point. Let me give an example of that. During the war and to-day a number of United States citizens are residents who have come to Canada for a year, two years, or three years to do special work. Now, technically, on coming here they become residents of Canada, but it has been always felt that it would not be fair to subject that class of persons—those who were not here before the war—to the operations of foreign exchange control restrictions; therefore by regulation the board, the administrative body, is given the power to exempt them from the provisions of the act. It seems to me that that is an eminently reasonable provision.

I do not deny for a moment that the powers which are given to this board are extensive, but my submission is that of necessity they must be. If this bill were being put forward in the British parliament I venture to say it would consist of two or three enabling asked to set up a board to overrule the laws it has passed. It is the first time that parliament has given a board power to overrule the laws passed here. No one will know what the law is if we pass this section. The board can change the law at any time. To give a board such powers is to violate a fundamental principle of democratic government.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I read a section from the act passed by my hon. friends opposite. Quoting from Hansard of May 21, 1934, page 3256, in the discussion of the marketing act:

Every local board established hereunder—

Listen to this Tory perfidy.

—shall continue to have authority to exercise its powers—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE:

—until such time as the governor in council withdraws such authority.

That is Toryism. That is the Tory party.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ABBOTT: I intend to say a few words in reply, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Before we are called upon to vote on the amendment I think I should say a word or two. I have been listening patiently and not saying anything in order to facilitate the work of the house. I understood when I came here that if we refrained from speaking it would expedite business, but evidently someone gave me a wrong steer, because, according to the way things have worked out, if we refrain from speaking some other members regard our silence as meaning consent and spend their time making attacks on us. I would not say anything at all except that hon. members to my right—and the members I refer to are among those I admire most in that group—have repeatedly referred to the C.C.F. in this argument. Why they bring us in I do not know. I for one was not consulted by the government before they drew up this legislation. I do not know whether my colleagues were. We are simply considering what has been placed before the house, and why the official opposition insists on giving us credit for everything the government brings forward that is of any value I do not know.

The member for Stanstead, the member for Muskoka-Ontario and the member for Lake Centre are the gentlemen to whose arguments I refer. I have a great deal of admiration for their ability; but the more they speak the more I find myself at a loss to know where they stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They don't stand; they fall.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I do not wish to become personal or to criticize them because I admire their ability and I respect their views. But the member for Stanstead is opposed to the bill holus-bolus; the member for Muskoka-Ontario is opposed to some of its provisions, and only to-day the member for Lake Centre gets up and says he admits the necessity for the board.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I never said any such thing.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: He admits the necessity for it—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That was one time you were not listening.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I accept his denial, but I am sure the record will bear me out.

Mr. GRANT: Don't scratch it out of Hansard to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN: May I interrupt to point out to the hon. member for Dauphin that he is referring to a debate which took place within the last few days and which frequently dealt with the principle of the bill. I feel it my duty to remind members of the committee that they must make their remarks relevant to the section under consideration and not discuss the principle. The committee will agree with me, I think, that the time for a general discussion has come to an end and that remarks now should be strictly relevant to the section before us. I would ask the member for Dauphin to be good enough to relate his remarks to the section and not refer to the remarks of other members with reference to the principle of the bill.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): He can't get in propaganda under the section.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Thank you for your guidance, Mr. Chairman. This section deals with regulations which I understand are based on the principle of the bill, and I am only following the line of argument used by the member for Lake Centre when I refer to some of his remarks. I hope I shall stay within the four corners of the rule.

The impression I had, listening to the member for Lake Centre, was that he felt there was need for such a board as this. He is nodding his head. He admits that. If we are to have a foreign exchange control board, if we admit that it is necessary, then I think we

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, after all, sir, before a person can set forth his amendment he has to set forth the circumstances making it necessary. We are not in the same position as the government, who can hand their friends a dish of crow and say, "Take it or leave it". We have to advance reasons why there should be a change in the law. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John-Albert:

That paragraphs (d) and (e) of section 36, subsection 1, be deleted.

In consequence there would be a renumbering of the subsequent paragraphs.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know whether any other hon. member cares to speak to the amendment. If so, it may save time if I wait until all hon. members who wish to discuss it have spoken.

Mr. IRVINE: The hon. gentleman who moved this amendment told the committee frankly that he did not understand the section. I think he took a little more time than was necessary to prove that. I was interested in the discussion which took place arising out of some of his remarks, reference having been made to a certain bill with similar clauses which was passed by a previous parliament.

Mr. FULTON: They were not similar at all.

Mr. IRVINE: I am glad to say I supported that bill, and some of the strongest artillery on the side of the present government opposed it. To my mind that was one of the best pieces of legislation ever put on the statute books of Canada. Here we have one of the best pieces of legislation which this government has ever brought forward, and it is being opposed by the heaviest artillery on the other side. I am glad, Mr. Chairman, to realize that I have been right both times.

Mr. HAZEN: In rising to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre I feel there is little I can add to the statements he has made. He has gone thoroughly into the matter and has pointed out very clearly the reasons why these clauses should be removed from section 35 of the bill. The day before yesterday, when section 23 of the bill was before the committee, I pointed out that a business man would be precluded from paying or handing money to a tourist. The minister said in reply that this was correct, but he added that it was or would be covered by regulations. His statement and mine will be found on Hansard at page 4452. I read the section of the bill and I said:

In view of that part of the section which I have read, and that definition, is not a business man in this country precluded from paying money or handing any money to a tourist who comes in here? As I read the section, that is one of its effects.

The minister said: "Theoretically my hon. friend is correct." I take it from that statement that he meant I am right.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is covered by the regulation. as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. HAZEN: The minister continued:

That, of course, is covered by regulation. That is an obvious case in which there should be the general rule, and payments to tourists are accepted from that general provision.

I was surprised by that answer. As I understand it, what it means is that when the members of this house have passed a law which has a clear meaning, the board can change the law by regulation.

Surely things are coming to a strange pass in this country when a thing like that can happen. I recall reading some time ago—I have since looked it up—Lewis Carroll's classic. When Alice took exception to Humpty Dumpty defining the word "glory" as meaning "a nice knock-down argument," Humpty Dumpty replied in rather scornful tones, "When I use a word it means just what I choose it to mean, neither more nor less". But "the question is whether you can make words mean so many different things," Alice objected; and Humpty Dumpty replied, "The question is, which is to be the master—that is all."

The question here, it seems to me, is, who is to be master? Are members of parliament to be master, or is the board?

An hon. MEMBER: Surely.

Mr. HAZEN: An hon. gentleman suggests that members of the House of Commons are to be the master, and so they should. But under this section the board by regulation can change the laws that we make here. Let me refer to the section again. Section 35 makes the board the master. It is provided that the board may make regulations, and when we turn to paragraph (e), taking the two together, we read:

The board may make regulations notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained elsewhere in this act, exempting any person or any class of persons . . . from any provision of this act.

Surely that is going altogether too far. This is the first time, as the member for Lake Centre pointed out, that parliament has been faith in carrying out such instructions, the plaintiff shall not be entitled to more than nominal damages.

They have extended the freedom of the board by those extra words, so that this board and everyone acting not only under the board but under an inspector is free from prosecution if he is able to say "I did wrong; I am sorry about it, but I did it in good faith because Inspector Jones told me to do it." That is the end of the action so far as the liberty of the subject is concerned. There is the difference.

Mr. ABBOTT: A distinction without a difference.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is why I submit that if the subsection is passed in its present form it simply amounts to this, that you substitute the interpretation, the will or the action of an individual or of the board for a statute passed by parliament. If you pass that subsection in its present form and give those powers to a board uncontrolled and untrammelled, I ask you where is responsible government in this country? Admitting the necessity for a board, admitting the necessity for regulations in respect of routine matters, why should we place the servants of the people above the law of the land, so that each in turn can say, "It was somebody else that led me astray. I got the order from the man immediately above me." To do that is to make a mockery of responsible government.

Yes, you have a servant of the people who is the master of the people, and free from any supervisory jurisdiction by the courts against arbitrary, unlawful and unfair interferences with private rights. There is not an hon. member who can read this section without seeing what it means. I have no objection to the first part of it. An officer must have some protection, but let him have the same protection as has been granted to any officers in the past—that they are acting upon probable cause. Do not let this parliament go to the point that no matter what right is trampled upon, the individual when he goes to court to try to rectify what has been done against him unfairly in the matter of trespass, can be answered by an official who says, "Well, if I did wrong I did it in good faith, because somebody higher than I told me to do it"—the old excuse right from Eden down.

When I first heard the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario speak about the effect of this provision I asked myself, can it be so? Then I heard the hon. member for St. John-Albert reciting the unfairnesses which had taken place. You could not touch these officials during the war. They made their own regulations then. They were honest enough in those regulations to say that you could not do anything but take what you got. This is the wording of the old section:

No person shall have any rights or any remedies against and no action shall lie or be brought against any person in respect of any act or omission of such person on or after the 16th September, 1939, which was required or which he believed in good faith would have been required by this order or by regulations or instructions of the board.

In other words, you did not have any rights. They did not want to put it in that way, so they altered it a bit and used these words to the effect that the defendant is absolved if "he was proceeding under written or verbal instructions" of his superior. I again point out that nothing like this appears in the Customs Act, in the Excise Act, or in any other act I have been able to find. I looked at the statutes my hon. friend mentioned because I thought he would know which one contained such a provision. Are there any other acts I should refer to? I should like to know. I have not been able to find them.

Without regard to the merits or necessity or lack of necessity of this legislation, has the time not come for this parliament to put a stop to the administrative lawlessness which the passage of such an order in council permits? Parliament alone can do it. The individual member of parliament can do it. It is not a matter of any other consideration than a facing of the issue. To-day in this parliament we are asked to do something which we have never been asked to do before—to give a servant, however far down in importance in the work he does in the department, the power to determine for you and for me your rights and my rights. The only appeal is an appeal to the minister—and I will deal with that, when we come to question of appeals, by indicating what a British judge recently said with regard to the impropriety of appeals being to the minister. And we are denied the right to go to the courts, however unfair the action may have been. During the war arbitrary rulings were made by various boards. They had a job to do in war time, and all honour to those who served and did those jobs at that time. Arbitrary rulings were made, and they were accepted, and a man's right of appeal and of recourse to the courts was taken away. But, sir, when you take away all right of recourse to the courts, place uncontrolled power in the hands of any individual or board, you deny freedom and equality and justice to the individual. I therefore wish to move an amendment—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Part of the filibuster.

There is one small recourse. Ordinarily when you are treated arbitrarily and trespass has been committed against you, you could go to the courts. That is all over now. If my rights are interfered with, all the defendant has to do, if I sue him, is to say that he was proceeding under written or verbal instructions of the board or of an inspector and was acting in good faith in carrying out those instructions. In other words I go to the courts for the purpose of establishing my rights against these unfair and discriminatory orders. Trespass has been committed against me.

Mr. ABBOTT: How do you trespass against the foreign exchange control board?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Look at the rights which the inspectors have. If they do not amount to trespass, I do not know what does. I am sure that my hon. friend was speaking jocularly, as he answers many questions in the house. He did not mean that seriously. Because trespass is exactly what that action is—an unfair interference with my rights.

What happens? I go to the courts. All that the defendant has to do is to say that an inspector told him to do that verbally—not even in writing—and my rights disappear. All I can get is nominal damages, and no costs for having brought the matter to court. Such a section has never before been enacted in this country. I pause to give my hon. friend the opportunity to say what he said last night and two or three times yesterday, that such a section appears in the Excise Act and in the Customs Act. Never before has that section been incorporated in our statutes to deny the rights of individuals. It is neither in the Excise Act nor in the Customs Act.

Mr. ABBOTT: Will my hon. friend look at sections 157-160 of the Customs Act?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, I have them here.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have them too.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: All right; we will read them together, and that will show that my hon. friend has not read them because such a section is not in the Customs Act.

Mr. ABBOTT: Suppose you read them before you make assertions. Read section 157, under the heading, "Protection of officers."

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Section 157 reads:

No action, suit or proceeding shall be commenced—

and so on.

Mr. CLEAVER: Read it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, I will read it for my legal friend from Halton.

No action, suit or proceeding shall be commenced, and no writ shall be sued out against, or copy of any process served upon any officer—

And so on.

Mr. CLEAVER: Read it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am not leaving out any material part.

Mr. ABBOTT (reading):

—or person employed for the prevention of smuggling, for anything done in the exercise of his office, or duty—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: All right; let us get back to what I am saying.

Mr. ABBOTT: As Mr. Gladstone used to say, read on.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The laughter indicates that my hon. friend the minister is not the only one who has not read this section. Section 157, subsection 1, provides that no action against an officer shall be taken while a proceeding is pending nor until one month after notice. Subsection 2 sets out what the notice shall state. Subsection 3 sets out what the evidence shall be. Section 158 sets out in subsection 1 that the defendant may tender amends; subsection 2 deals with what may be done if the amends are sufficient. Subsection 3 deals with costs and subsection 4 with payment into court. Section 159 deals with the limitation of time. Then I come to section 160, and that is different from the section to which I have been referring. Section 160 says:

If, in any such action, suit or proceedings, the court or judge before whom the trial takes place certifies that the defendant acted upon probable cause, the plaintiff shall not be entitled to more than twenty cents damages nor to any costs of suit, nor in case of a seizure, shall the person who made the seizure be liable to any civil or criminal suit or proceedings on account thereof.

The section in the Customs Act and the section in the Excise Act provide that if the defendant carrying out a public duty does so on probable cause, then in that case he is absolved from damages. But the board was not satisfied with that section. The board thought that it did not give them sufficient protection, and so here is the section which they now place before parliament. This is subsection 2 of section 54:

If in any action, suit or proceeding to which this section applies the court or judge before whom the trial takes place certifies that the defendant acted upon probable cause—

It is the same up to that point, but then these words are added:

—or, if the defendant was proceeding under written or verbal instructions of the board or an inspector, that the defendant acted in good

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Naturally I would not concede that, because this is the high water mark that is before parliament now.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You cannot have it both ways.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Lake Centre has answered the question of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. May I remind hon. members of the committee that a discussion of the powers of some other board is not relevant to the discussion here. We do not know what powers are given to other boards. The committee is considering the regulations as set forth in section 35. I would ask all hon. members to make their discussion strictly relevant to this section.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, I am trying hard to keep on the track, but my hon. friend is endeavouring to get me away from my argument. Where was parliament asked before, under the marketing act referred to by my hon. friend or anywhere else, to give to a board the power to say that no matter what is in a statute it can be changed by the board? Never before was parliament asked, first to define what a resident means, and then to give a board the power, indicated by (d) of section 35:

(d) prescribing that persons who would otherwise be residents shall be deemed to be non-residents.

Can you understand that? I have heard that parliament is all-powerful, that it can do everything but make a man a woman; yet here parliament is to give to a board the power to declare a non-resident a resident, or a resident a non-resident. That is what this section says. It places in the hands of the board, untrammelled and uncontrolled, the right to determine as between individuals and to discriminate in favour of one at the expense of the other.

You may say: If there are safeguards, then what is the harm? If we pass this section in its present form, what is the right? Is there a right of appeal? Can a person aggrieved secure his rights by showing that the board has gone beyond its powers? No, not under this legislation. There is no appeal; there is no control against the rulings made under this section.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is an appeal under section 37.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh, yes, an appeal, but to the minister—from the hired man to the boss. That is the very thing that has been asked for in the United Kingdom from 1932 on, from the time a report was made to parliament in that regard.

[Mr. Mackenzie.]

Mr. MACKENZIE: There was no appeal under the marketing act.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Apparently the only act my hon. friend has ever heard about is the marketing act. I have that act here, and I will deal with it if you will permit me, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: The only way it could be dealt with would be to show that the regulations under that act were exactly the same as the regulations under this act. I did not interrupt the hon. member for Lake Centre when he was answering the question; it was only after he had answered it that I drew the attention of the committee to the fact that we are dealing with the powers of the board under his bill.

Mr. BRACKEN: Why did you not stop the minister?

The CHAIRMAN: I thought it was only fair to allow the hon. member for Lake Centre to answer.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Unfortunately I have not got to the answer yet; when I start to give the answer, my hon. friend does not want it. I have the act before me, and the powers of that board were strictly limited to the provisions of the Natural Products Marketing Act. This bill does not limit the powers of the board to make regulations within the act; it gives power to the board to make regulations outside the act, beyond the act, in spite of the act, and contrary to the act. Those are the material differences between the two pieces of legislation.

My hon. friend says: Oh yes, there is an appeal; and he refers me to section 37. Yes, there is an appeal to the minister from decisions made by a board appointed on the recommendation of the minister to carry out an act administered by the minister. In other words, except for the appeal on the question of the amount in dispute under section 38, however arbitrarily the board may act, however unjustifiably or tyrannically its inspectors may act it is futile to go to court against them because the board will be fortified by a defence that has never before been incorporated in a Canadian statute in a time of peace. I do not understand this section 54 to which my hon. friend referred the other night. I am showing what the powers of the board will be. Suppose I am interfered with unfairly, that my rights are infringed, my privileges destroyed, and I appeal to the minister. Well, he will say, what can I do? Change the order? Would he do that, he himself having appointed the board or being responsible for it?

peace time, to grant to a board power to say that no matter what is in a statute passed by this parliament, notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained elsewhere in this act where we provide for certain prohibitions and exemptions, for privileges, for the commission of offences and infractions, the board can come along and say to one man, "You do not come under it", but to another man, "You do". Parliament is asked to place in the hands of a board the power to discriminate against one class of business, or between one class and another or one individual and another. In other words no matter what the law of this land is, and regardless of what parliament says the law is under the statute, the board is placed above the law and may by regulation remake any part of the law to suit its purposes, its whims and its caprices.

My hon. friend said this was a Liberal speech. Mr. Chairman, parliament has a responsibility; that is why I make this appeal with respect to the section we are now considering. What do we do? We make a board set up by parliament the absolute judge of who shall be the beneficiary of its benevolence and who shall be the victim of its arbitrary discrimination. Where, in any parliament, should any board ask for power such as that? Can there be any argument that when a board has the power and right to discriminate as between individuals, to grant preference to one citizen as against another, the subjection of all persons to the law in equality disappears and arbitrary power is substituted for equality before the law?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, before the recess I was dealing with the effect of section 35, subsections (d) and (e), and I had pointed to the absolute power that would be placed in the hands of the board under this bill as it now stands. It was suggested this morning that under this legislation, in effect, a socialistic viewpoint had been arrived at by the government, having regard to what has been done since the Prime Minister left. From the legislation that has been introduced in the house it is apparent that the government is on the socialist side, and when I say that I refer to this legislation.

The United Kingdom has similar legislation, but I would point out that the Attlee government, which is desirous of introducing socialism, has not given the power to any board to make such regulations as are set out in section 35, free and uncontrolled by parliament. My hon. friend will say that a sop has been thrown to parliament by sections 2 and 3. All that sections 2 and 3 do is this: After the board is empowered to act as it chooses, to interpret the law as it may, any regulation that is passed shall be laid before parliament within fifteen days after it has met, and is effective only when approved by the governor in council. These are not sufficient safeguards. It still remains within the power of the board to go contrary to the law as set forth in the bill. This is something I cannot understand. It defines what resident is.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Has my hon. friend read the provisions of the Natural Products Marketing Act passed by the Bennett government?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have heard that repeated and repeated. I have read it. One of its greatest opponents was my hon. friend.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No? He just voted against it, that is all.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Spoke against it for four weeks in this house and voted against it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is what I am saying; he spoke against it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It was the most vicious act ever introduced in this parliament. Talk about regulations and regimentation!

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The only justification my hon. friend now advances as a member of the government is that what was wrong under one act—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Was it wrong?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: According to my hon. friend.

Mr. MACKENZIE: According to my hon. friend, was it wrong?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That marketing legislation would have been advantageous to this country, but the government of which my hon. friend is a member took it before the courts, appointed lawyers for the purpose of saying to the courts that the legislation was not within the power of parliament, and had it declared ultra vires of this parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am sorry to interrupt; I have great appreciation and admiration for my hon. friend. Will my hon. friend not concede that the powers and regulations and regimentation and evasion of the supreme authority of parliament under that act were the most atrocious in the history of Canada?

knows, but will not tell, which of its two officials was responsible for the destruction of shoes.

Mr. ABBOTT: I want to take exception to that. I do not know what was in the Montreal Star last night, because I have not seen it; but I can say now that the Department of National Defence was not responsible for this alleged condition, and has not refused to name any of its officials. I am prepared to make a full statement on this shoe business, but there is nothing in it. I shall make the statement at the appropriate time. This is not the time.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The committee is considering section 35, "Powers of the board to make regulations". I think the discussion should be related to the powers of the particular board concerned and not to boards generally.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: With the greatest deference, I have no argument with that; but I have heard discussions going on around me in which I have not participated. A very wide range has been covered. This section dealing with powers of the board is very wide, and I thought that I would deal with all these matters at one time instead of rising regularly on this matter.

Mr. MUTCH: There is something to be said for that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What does the parliamentary assistant say?

Mr. MUTCH: Thanks for the promotion.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: May I return to the section in question? In the last few months parliament has regained some of its powers. It did so last fall, as the result of a great deal of opposition on the part of the official opposition, and public opinion which was created at the time that many of the boards were asking for powers under the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, Mr. Chairman, some make their contribution by raucous interruption. I am trying to make an intelligent contribution to the question of the abdication of parliament.

An hon. MEMBER: It is not on the section.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I venture the opinion that my hon. friend has never even read the section, much less the act; yet he interrupts regularly. Under this section this board will regain, and it is apparently endeavouring to regain in what is asked for here, many of the powers that these controllers and board members lost last fall, and which they are anxious to recover. I think the time has come for parliament, as far as this and succeeding sections are concerned, to call a halt once and for all to this wartime trend of making boards and controllers all-powerful; for unless it is stopped, it becomes a permanent institution.

Mr. MUTCH: That is a good Liberal speech.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, I think it was the hon. member for Stanstead who said earlier to-day that Liberal speeches are no longer expected from the other side of the house.

Mr. MUTCH: There are still a few of us left.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am glad to have my hon. friend's support in this regard, and he will have an opportunity of voting on behalf of good Liberal principles when I introduce the amendment I intend to move in a moment. In this section parliament is asked to abdicate its legislative power and hand it over to this board. Let me refer to the provisions. What are the powers parliament is asked to give under this section? As to subsections (a), (b) and (c) there can be no argument at all, because they cover regulations in matters of routine, and as such are necessary to the proper operation of any statute. Now we come to subsection (d) of section 35. This gives the board power to make regulations prescribing that persons who otherwise would be residents shall be deemed to be non-residents, or that persons who otherwise would be non-residents shall be deemed to be residents for any of the purposes of this act. What a power! We are going to define what a resident is and what a non-resident is; we have done so in the first portion of the act. Now a board is going to be able to determine by regulation that a person who is a resident under the act is a non-resident under a regulation. I think it was the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard who said this is indeed the top; this is the apex of the grasp for power. This section gives the board power to determine when you are liable and when you are not, irrespective of the wording of the statute; but the board is not satisfied with that power. It is not enough to be able to make a resident into a non-resident or a non-resident into a resident by a simple regulation. They go on with subsection (e). I can find no other case in which parliament has ever been asked, in security. He showed how often that was the pretence under which boards received powers unexampled in the history of the country.

Under this bill we are asked to perpetuate in time of peace the powers of boards in time of war. It was most significant that when the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario endeavoured to limit the period there was opposition by the government. I can see no great danger in limitation unless this kind of control is to become part and parcel of the peacetime life in Canada. Why should it not have been limited to a reasonable period and then continued by parliament? But not so. When I see some of the recent trends so far as boards are concerned I agree with the hon. member for Stanstead that if the government does not intend to bring in socialism it is doing its best to lay the foundation and the framework for that purpose. I am sure hon. members on the other side of the house do not want to see that; certainly some of them do not.

When I look at the powers contained in section 35 I ask myself, what is the limit of the empowering of boards going to be? When this bill is passed we shall have a statute. Will anybody know what the law is then? In regard to many of the statutes passed by parliament to-day no one is able to advise on the law because power to make regulations, over and above the actual written word of the statutes, is placed in boards. Some will say to me: No, that cannot be; regulations have to be within the power of the legislation passed by parliament. That is not so. This is the first time that a government has asked parliament to set up a board to pass regulations contrary to a statute, ratifying them in advance. I admit that regulations are necessary in order to make matters of routine in a statute workable. Can any hon. member say that the making of regulations contrary to the provisions of a statute has any justification? I point out that that is being done under paragraph (e) of subsection 1 of section 35, which reads as follows:

> Notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained elsewhere in this act, exempting any person or any class of persons or any transaction or class of transactions from any provision of this act;

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a relieving measure, of course.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh, yes; no matter what parliament has said shall be the law, the board has the power, as my hon. friend says, to relieve any person in Canada whom it may choose to single out for its benefits, to relieve him or to single out an individual for its discrimination. It has the power to exempt any person from the application of this bill.

What about boards? I do not know whether my hon. friends on the other side of the house know—I am sure they do—that to-day the common man is beginning to realize that there cannot be justice and equality under a system of boards controlling the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Marketing controls.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I shall give you a few examples in the last few months. Take the War Assets Corporation. A big investigation took place in Montreal to ascertain where all the shoes came from which were destroyed. War Assets Corporation investigated the matter and concluded that it was no officer of theirs who gave the orders. The Department of National Defence conducted an investigation.

Mr. ABBOTT: A thorough one, I may say.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: They have the information to-day as to who was responsible. Does my hon. friend, as Minister of National Defence, deny that? I do not get an answer to that question, because—

Mr. ABBOTT: The answer is yes. The Minister of Reconstruction two or three weeks ago gave the press gallery the name of the person to whom the shipment of shoes was sold as scrap. He showed it to me; it was given to the gallery.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well—

Mr. ABBOTT: I have no objection to giving it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Let me read from the Montreal Star of August 8.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but I shall be delighted to discuss this matter of mutilated shoes or waste of assets at the appropriate time, but not under the foreign exchange control board, please. I can have my full data here. I have information. I had my personal assistant make an investigation into this matter some time ago. We have the whole picture, but this is not the time to discuss it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am giving an example of what these boards do. The heading of the section is "Powers of boards". At the moment I am dealing in general with the question of powers of boards, to indicate that parliament is being asked in this case to abdicate rights that it ought not to abdicate. According to the latest issue of the Montreal Star, the Department of National Defence spite of the plausible and able argument made by my good friend the member for Stanstead I am afraid he lives in a world that is different from the one in which I live. I agree with the minister that, the world being in the economic state in which it is, legislation such as this is necessary, at least for the present. However, section 33 is far-reaching in its subsections. You cannot release or fail to take reasonable steps to acquire or recover from a non-resident any property or any right, title or interest in or to any property to which the resident is or may be entitled. A man whose father died in the United States might be entitled to a share in the estate the deceased left. He might wish to assign his interest to his mother, which is a very reasonable and proper thing for a son to do, but he would not be able to do that unless he obtained a permit. According to the next paragraph you cannot grant an unreasonable extension of time for payment of any debt owing by or any claim upon a non-resident, or fail to take reasonable steps to collect any such debt or to prosecute any such claim. If he does not wish to spend the money to go to court for the reason that the debtor may be insolvent or on the eve of insolvency, he cannot refrain from taking steps to collect the debt unless he has a permit. The question I wish to ask is this. What formality will be required in order to obtain a permit? Where will one be able to obtain it? Do we write to Ottawa, or go to the banker as at present in connection with small remittances? I suggest to the minister that full publicity should be given this new law. We should know what steps the government is taking to publicize it so that Canadians will know about it and not be guilty of infractions.

Mr. ABBOTT: On the first question, the bank manager who ordinarily acts as agent for the board in ordinary transactions would not have authority to grant a permit for a transaction such as my hon. friend has referred to. Application would have to be made to the board. The usual practice would be to write direct to the board at Ottawa, or any bank manager would forward the letter, if desired, asking for permission. In a case such as my hon. friend cited, an estate, where the son wanted to assign his interest to his mother, if the circumstances were normal I am sure permission would be granted.

Mr. JAENICKE: Would an affidavit be required?

[Mr. Jaenicke.]

Mr. ABBOTT: I should not think so. When I was doing some practice I found that all that was needed in most cases was a letter setting out the circumstances.

Mr. JAENICKE: How would the department determine whether the statement contained in the letter from the applicant was true?

Mr. ABBOTT: If it appeared on its face to be plausible and reasonable it would be taken at its face value and accepted as true. If there were in it anything which aroused suspicion, I suppose the board might ask for further verification. I realize that this is only administration, but my experience with the operation of the board was that they were very flexible. There was no question of rules of evidence or affidavits, and every effort was made to facilitate the smooth and easy disposition of applications.

Mr. HACKETT: Where a substantial amount was involved, definite proof was expected.

Mr. ABBOTT: I agree that if there were large amounts involved, obviously it would not be proper to accept a simple letter. One might want an audited statement, a certificate from a banker or something of that sort, but nothing that would involve out-of-the-way expense or research on the part of the applicant.

Section agreed to.

Section 34 agreed to.

On section 35—Board may make regulations.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have not had anything to say in reference to this bill, but I have sat here and listened to the arguments advanced by the Acting Minister of Finance, and may I thank him at this point for having postponed consideration of section 28, subsection 2, dealing with the question of regulations, until consideration should take place of section 35. I have listened to the arguments advanced from the time the member for Muskoka-Ontario made his opening address, pointing out some of the dangers of this legislation, and as I view it, the greater the consideration that has been given to this bill the more significant becomes the cogency of that hon. gentleman's argument.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario was followed by the hon. member for St. John-Albert, who spoke against the tendency which was developed during the period of the war of placing controls in the hands of boards and always under the guise of necessity or of should go to the board for a permit to obey the ordinary dictates of human kindness, let hon. members tell that constituent and their constituents generally—

An hon. MEMBER: We will tell them you are wasting the time of the house.

Mr. FLEMING: —that the board, under that section, can make an interpretation against him, and that individual, if he is haled into court by the board, goes in with the obligation of satisfying the burden of proof, and in the second place is liable, under section 60, subsection 2, to a fine of $2,000 and twelve months' imprisonment, and let them tell their constituents that that is the kind of legislation that they are supporting in this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Don't you worry. We have been here a longer time than you have.

Mr. HATFIELD: If I employ a broker to sell goods for me in the United States, does the foreign exchange control board tell me what is a fair commission?

Mr. ABBOTT: I suppose that is governed by the custom of the trade, is it not? I imagine there is a standard commission for most commodities.

Mr. HARKNESS: Leaving out of consideration the desirability or otherwise of foreign exchange control, it seems to me that the essential question at issue here is whether that section is necessary to enable foreign exchange control to work satisfactorily. My contention is that it is not necessary to do that, that it is entirely unnecessary, that it is just an extra red-tape annoyance and nuisance. The minister has not produced this morning any good and valid reasons why this particular section is necessary to the successful carrying on of foreign exchange control. Neither did Mr. Rasminsky, the expert, produce before the committee any good reasons for it. The only reason which was produced was that it would enable the board to prevent any citizen of this country from building up a foreign credit abroad and would force him to have the payment for his services, which if this section were not there he might keep in some foreign country, brought into Canada. The argument does not mean anything, because section 29, which we have already passed, gives the board power to force any resident of the country to bring into Canada any credit which he may have. Section 29 says:

> Every resident who possesses, owns or controls any securities which, or the certificates or instruments representing which, are physically located outside of Canada, shall, if so required by the board, cause the said securities, certificates or instruments to be brought into Canada.

With the board having that power, there is no reason, from the point of view of making foreign exchange control a success, to retain section 32. On the contrary,—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Filibuster.

Mr. HARKNESS: —it is very likely to prevent certain credits, which might be of very considerable value, particularly credits in the United States, from being built up in this country, because of the nuisance involved in doing so. As my amendment to delete this clause is ruled out of order I should like to have a vote on it.

Mr. MERRITT: Sitting here listening to the discussion, it occurs to me that we have reached new heights in controls, because under this section you have to get a permit not to deal in foreign exchange, and therefore you have to get a permit in this country now to do nothing.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That does not apply to the Tory party. It needs no permit.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It is hard on the opposition.

Mr. HAZEN: How does the minister propose to enforce a law of this kind? If I see fit to render service to a friend of mine living outside the country and not to charge him for it, or if I see fit to do some work for somebody living outside the country and I say to him, "You don't have to pay me for twelve months or until some later date when I send you a bill, a year or two from now", how will you prevent me from doing that? Are you not passing a law that will be wholly inoperative? How will you prevent me from doing these things if I want to do them? What is the good of having a law if you cannot enforce it?

Mr. ABBOTT: The answer is simple. Admittedly it would be difficult to enforce it in some cases, but we assume that the majority of law-abiding citizens will obey the law.

Section agreed to on division: Yeas, 30; nays, 24.

On section 33—Other transactions between residents and non-residents.

Mr. JAENICKE: I should like to ask three questions of the minister in connection with this clause and, I believe they will refer to any other sections which require a permit. First of all I might say that in

But that is not all. We go a little further, and see, in the seventh place, that it is left to the foreign exchange control board to decide whether the undertaking has been to perform these services at less than the fair value of the services. Who is to determine the fair value of the services rendered by anybody within the wide scope of section 2, subsection 1(w)? The foreign exchange control board.

An hon. MEMBER: That is too bad.

Mr. FLEMING: And, number eight: payment must be "in a currency designated by the board as acceptable for such a transaction", and that, again, is for the decision of the board. It is obvious that an individual who has performed or entered into any kind of transaction just hasn't a chance. It is not a case of coming before a court; it is a case of having his transaction reviewed in all these respects by a board, the foreign exchange control board, whose decision in practically every respect is final.

An hon. MEMBER: Too bad.

Mr. FLEMING: Let us take a simple transaction to test the sense, if any, in a section of this kind. Suppose I have a friend in Scotland who writes to me and says, "Will you do such and such a service for me? I am pretty hard up right now; I don't know when I can pay you. You will just have to take that chance. I will pay you when I get the money, but I haven't it now and I don't know when I will have it." When I perform that service, it being a service ordinarily performed for remuneration, I cannot say to my friend in Scotland, "Don't worry; pay me whenever you like", without a permit from the foreign exchange control board.

An hon. MEMBER: Quite right.

Mr. FLEMING: I cannot say to him, "Don't worry; pay me any time," without a permit.

An hon. MEMBER: You are a man after my own heart.

Mr. FLEMING: Or suppose I have a relative in France who writes to me and says, "Here is a service I should like you to perform." My relative in France has undergone hardships during the war, and I say, "I am not going to charge that relative of mine according to the full tariff", so I write and tell him, "Here is my bill for services performed; actually it is about one-third of what would be ordinarily charged."

Mr. ABBOTT: You would not ordinarily charge your relatives, would you? They would be excepted from the act.

Mr. FLEMING: That is not an exception from this section. I could not in any cases of necessity or other circumstances, submit to a friend or relative anything less than the normal tariff charge without a permit from the board. If I did I would be committing an offence under this measure, and the board could put an inspector in and examine that whole transaction.

Mr. ABBOTT: We shall be coming to that to-morrow.

Mr. FLEMING: They could go through my books, examine me, put me under oath, as provided for under section 41. And that is not all. Suppose, as in the case I cited of a friend in Scotland, I told him that he could pay me whenever he likes or whenever he is able, and they are going to prosecute me, you will see under section 58 that the burden of proof is on me.

An hon. MEMBER: I would say it is a good idea.

Mr. FLEMING: Look at this section:

> 58. (1) Where any person is charged with an offence under this act, if it is established in proof of the offence that the said person did any act or omission for which a permit is required under this act, it shall not be necessary to establish in proof of the offence that the person charged did not possess a permit or had not been exempted from the applicable provisions of this act, and the burden of proof that he possessed the necessary permit or had been exempted from the applicable provisions of the act shall be upon the person charged.

I go into the court with another strike against me. The burden of proof is on me to show that my case is one which under the terms of the act is an exemptable case.

That is not all. Look at section 60, subsection 2, and observe what follows in respect of penalties:

> (2) Every person guilty of an offence under this act for which no penalty is provided under subsection one of this section—

Subsection (1) relates to property.

> —shall be liable, on summary conviction under part XV of the criminal code, to a fine not exceeding two thousand dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months or to both such fine and such imprisonment.

An hon. MEMBER: Is that section 32?

Mr. FLEMING: Section 60, subsection 2. Will hon. members opposite restrain their mirth long enough to ask themselves this simple question. If a constituent of theirs so allows his judgment to be guided by the dictates of human kindness that, for the sake of assisting a friend in Scotland who has lost much during the war, he tells him, "You do not need to worry about paying me now; pay me whenever you like," and either does not know that he is committing an offence under the act or does not see any reason why he that provide for payment within six months", and so forth. You need no permit if you comply with that.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I ask the minister whether he considers that clause, interpreted as he likes, necessary for the protection of the Canadian dollar.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, I do. Take my own case. When I was a practising lawyer, if I did a job for a client in New York and sent him a bill in United States dollars and it was payable in six months I did not have to consult the foreign exchange control board at all. I got a cheque in United States dollars and it went into the bank. If I were to give my client twelve months to pay, or wanted to be paid in Brazilian currency, I suppose I should have to get a permit.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If it was not paid within six months. Does the minister consider the difference between six months and six months and a day so important as to justify this provision?

Mr. ABBOTT: The same term applies to the sale of merchandise. I used the example of a bill submitted by a lawyer. My bill is payable on demand and in United States dollars; and if I sent the bill to my client in New York with a polite request for a remittance, I would not have to go near the foreign exchange control board at all.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister will agree that lawyers very often do not get paid within six months, in which event does the minister think—

Mr. ABBOTT: My bill must not give a longer term of payment than six months. If my client is not able to pay me within six months, that is my misfortune. But I cannot without a permit give him a term of twelve or sixteen or eighteen months within which to pay.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I would be in order under this section in referring to the arrest of a director of Fresnore Mines Limited in Toronto in the company's office on Temperance street, on a charge of receiving $100,000 under false pretences in 1945-46?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not think that has anything to do with the exchange control board. It is another type of control.

Mr. FLEMING: I cannot yet persuade myself that certain hon. members opposite can meekly submit to being parties to this kind of legislation. Let me reduce it to its simplest terms.

I suggest that this section has inherent in it this vice, that it puts power into the hands of the foreign exchange control board to make its own interpretations of the statute itself. Just what is involved in a decision of the foreign exchange control board under this section?

I say that there are at least eight places in this section where the foreign exchange control board may make a determination. In the first place, it may determine whether the individual in question is a resident or not. That is not unusual; it is being done in many cases. In the second place, the board may determine whether the resident has performed an obligation. That is the exercise surely of judicial functions, but this section purports to give the board that right. In the third place, it gives the board power to determine whether there has been on the part of a resident of Canada an agreement to perform a service. Fourth, the board has to determine whether the service is to be performed or has been performed for a non-resident. Fifth, the board has to determine whether a service has been performed, and if anybody thinks that is a simple determination let him examine the provisions of paragraph (w) of section 2 of this bill and see what the services are. I quote:

> (w) "services" include skilled and unskilled labour, professional services, services as an agent or employee, storage and warehousing, freight, transportation, advertising, services to vessels and any other services whether payment for such services is ordinarily made in the form of wages, salaries, fees, rents, royalties, commissions, profit-sharing, or by payment of a lump sum or otherwise howsoever;

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. FLEMING: Some hon. members opposite may derive a certain amount of mirth from this, but I think, when it comes down to persons in their constituencies whose transactions are to be brought under review by the foreign exchange control board—

An hon. MEMBER: We will take a chance on that.

Mr. FLEMING: —they will take a somewhat different attitude.

An hon. MEMBER: We don't represent stockholders.

Mr. FLEMING: Then, number six: no resident shall perform for a non-resident any services of a kind ordinarily performed for remuneration. What kind? The foreign exchange control board, sitting in judgment, will decide whether the services in question are of a kind ordinarily performed for remuneration.

right away than continue to put up with what I have seen happening in this house, because we are sent here to represent the people. I come from a large commercial city which pays more taxes than any other city in the country and as much as several of the provinces. The business men expect me to look after their interests.

We are very shorthanded here. There is one vacancy; two hon. members are ill and one hon. member is not here. We have a fine representative in the hon. member for Davenport, who never misses a day. I represent Ashbridges bay where there are over a hundred new industries, coal and all these other things, and I am pestered to death when I go home. People telephone me to ask if I have seen the wartime prices and trade board and the foreign exchange control board about permits and I have to advise them whether they are residents or non-residents and how to go about it.

I do not know of anything that will cause more unemployment than this section, and there are hundreds out of work in our city at the present time. The business men are scared to death of being prosecuted in the police court under the bureaucratic system we have in this bill. Talk about hitlerism; we have hitlerism right now. Business men have a heavy task awaiting them in reconversion so that Canada may recover quickly. I would not want to be a business man to-day. I am sorry for business men, large and small, and for retail and wholesale dealers on our main streets. They are scared to death to do anything in export trade with non-residents for fear they will be summoned to the police court.

Is Canada going to recover any more quickly by having section 32 in this act which compels the taking out of a permit to do any business and requires a lawyer to tell you what a non-resident is, or value, or enchange rules, or a contract? I say no. Canada needs stability to speed the delivery of all classes of goods and meet market demands, so as to aid peacetime economy in employment, supply civilian needs and restore as soon as possible living standards, and defeat inflation and black markets. During the war we had a whole carload of people down in Washington to tell our business men what they had to do and what was the next step. We should get rid of these ham-stringing regulations so that business men can do business. Let us get rid of these irksome controls and remove the shackles from industry large and small. Give private enterprise a clear right of way unfettered by a small standing army of inspectors, examiners, supervisors, card-filing clerks of a worn-out system of control. The time has come to end this bureaucratic system by striking out this classe. Every other two pages of definitions have to be read into section 32. Business must have freedom once again to succeed by free enterprise. We should put an end to government controls by blueprints and a horde of useless officials, most of whom have never had any training in any competitive business which they seek to control.

The CHAIRMAN: Before the committee continues with this discussion may I remind hon. members that we are considering clause 32. I hesitate to rise to interrupt any hon. member when he is speaking to remind him of the clause before the committee. A good deal of the discussion this morning has been with regard to the principle of the bill and has not been directed strictly to the clause. I believe it is the wish of the committee that the clauses should be considered and that the discussion should be directed to the clause under consideration.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I shall follow your instruction, Mr. Chairman. All I want to do is to read this clause, and I ask hon. members to listen to it—it is quite short; then I want to ask hon. members and the minister whether by any conceivable chance they can agree that this clause is necessary to what I admit is a legitimate aim of the bill. I have said frankly, and I say it again, that I would not want to take the responsibility of saying that there may not be an occasion on which some of these controls are temporarily necessary. What I plead for is a relaxation of the rigidity of the controls and for a limitation to be placed on its operation. The section reads, and I ask everyone to listen:

> No resident shall, except in accordance with a permit, perform or agree to perform, in Canada or elsewhere, for a non-resident any services of a kind ordinarily performed for remuneration otherwise than on terms that provide for payment within six months of not less than the fair value thereof in a currency designated by the board as acceptable for such a transaction.

As I understand that, it means that nobody in this country can do a job, however small, with anyone in the United States without having it approved. Who is going to approve it? Who is going to exercise the judgment?

Mr. ABBOTT: No permit is needed if he complies with the instructions in the latter part of the section, "otherwise than on terms will be asked to declare who is a resident and who is a non-resident, what is the value, and so on. If I have to swallow that I want to know the reason why. We are sent here to find out who wrote this section 32. We should take section 32 and examine it word by word. Who is a resident? If you look up the interpretation on page 3 you will find that a non-resident is defined as a person other than a resident. Did you ever hear of such a play on words? A non-resident is any person other than a resident.

What is domicile? I should like to know who wrote section 32. I tried to find out in a respectful manner, but I could not. I know the two gentlemen sitting in front of the minister only for their reputation as good men and able officials. I have nothing to say about our expert staffs because they all did good work during the war. They represent in peace what I would call a bureaucratic staff. The minister and the deputy minister and all ministers are tied up to bureaucrats; they are bound and gagged. If this section is to pass we might just as well go home and let the experts in front of the minister decide the liberty of the subject under section 32 and everything we are talking about to-day.

Under section 32 you were going to have a permit from the bureaucrats. Every minister is getting a permit system. The minister of health has it. I asked him what could be done about certain permits and he said he would have to consult the provinces, if you please. It is getting so bad that the hon. member for New Westminster will have to consult the provinces in order to be able to play the bagpipes. Everybody has to get a permit. Soon we shall all have to have permits; we shall have to bow down and worship these bureaucrats. This is not real Liberalism. As I said the other day, there is no real Liberal on the government benches except the hon. member for Temiscouata. He is wearing the school tie and the mantle of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his principles, and all the others should wear the school tie of real Liberalism. They may have to get permits from the bureaucrats to wear that tie.

The result of this will be that business men will have to appear in the Toronto police court before a lay or legal magistrate. Men who have never been in court before will be dragged before the magistrate and be charged by some representative of the bureaucrats under this section of lack of a permit or for dealings with a non-resident. They do not leave it to the crown attorney; they engage a lot of Liberal lawyers to appear in the police court and charge these men with not having a permit or not following this section. They are charged with not being residents, in dealing with non-residents, what is real value, what is remuneration, and other matters. I studied this bill from beginning to end last night; I read it three times, and I am surprised that I did not know about it before last night. The business men do not know all about it and I do not know what is going to happen when they do find out about section 32. Who is going to decide who is a resident and a non-resident in order that he may get a permit to do business? The business man will have to get his remuneration in cash or on the counter; he must have it within six months. How are you going to conduct business under those conditions?

There are other sections, but they are all related to this one. The chairman is a lawyer and he knows that you must read the marginal notes, the headlines and the interpretation section into every section. Into section 32 will be read four pages of the interpretation. When you get a permit you have to be paid in six months. What happens then? They go to work and they make every excise officer and every customs officer an officer of the board. Every Tom, Dick and Harry who boards the train at Hamilton bound for the border will be an agent. I do not know what American officers are doing on a train. The United States customs officers are there and the Canadian officers and they will be asking everybody to produce permits because they are officers of the board. There will be deputies all over the country of the bureaucrats who are running this country.

I want to pay a tribute to the civil service, because there are good men there. We have a fine civil service. Some of the men attached to the foreign exchange control board have been in the civil service a long time, and they are not to blame for the mistakes of the administration. However, none of the bureaucrats have had very much training in practical business, or they would not have written in section 32. How in the world can you conduct a retail or wholesale business with this horde of inspectors who under this bill will be inspecting you to death? There will be all the red tape, there will be all these regulations, there will be an army of officials, miles of restrictions, gallons of official red ink and an army of clerks and stenographers. How is any man going to conduct business? I do not know.

We shall have to change our ways. The House of Commons might as well be abolished because we are virtually signing the death knell of parliamentary and responsible government in this country by such acts as these of bureaucratic control. I would rather resign

May I say at the outset that no one regrets more than I do or more than the government does the necessity of having to continue foreign exchange control. My hon. friend has said that now the war is over we should be able at once to dispense with all these devices. Well, it is true that the fighting has ceased, but if any man looks around the world to-day and says that economic war has ceased, or that we are in a stable, ordered condition, I say that is a serious reflection upon his intelligence. I say that as far as economic conditions are concerned we are just as much in need of protection for our foreign exchange resources as at any time during the war.

The hon. gentleman has said that this is an attempt to shackle trade, and what we should do is assist trade. I turn that around and say the sole purpose of this measure is to see that we shall have adequate foreign exchange resources to assist trade, and not shackle it. Let me assure this committee that as a member of the government nothing would please me more than to be able to get rid of control and be able to operate under the old law of supply and demand; but if anyone will tell me that with conditions as they exist to-day any country would be able to carry on under those conditions, all I can say is that the person making that suggestion is not aware of modern economic conditions.

My hon. friend speaks of preserving good relations with the United States. No one is more anxious than I that this be done; as a matter of fact my grandfather came from the United States. But surely we must face the situation as it is. We have to deal with the matter of exports to and imports from the United States; and to-day our imports from that country are at an all-time high. This is not an attempt to restrict trade between the two countries; it is just the reverse. This is a measure intended to assist trade.

My hon. friend asked why we were taking these measures to separate the two countries. Well, the answer is simple: we are a separate country, with a separate currency. If we were part of the United States, of course we would not be faced with all these difficulties; we would all have the same currency. But on balance we are a debtor nation, and to a very considerable extent. If we are to retain our national integrity and the integrity of our dollar, we have to adopt appropriate measures to see that our exchange position is protected. That is the purpose of this measure. It worked effectively during the war, and has worked effectively since the war.

My hon. friend made a moving plea for importers and exporters, but I think if he took a poll of importers and exporters in this country he would find them pretty well satisfied with the way in which exchange control operated during the war. I think a little more attention should be paid, as I hope it will be paid, to some remarks made last evening by the hon. member for Charlotte, as to his experiences and the experiences of his neighbours and friends in connection with exchange under abnormal conditions, where one man was quoted one rate and another man another. Whatever may be the defects of the present system, and it may have some, at least everyone knows the situation with respect to foreign exchange, and everyone is quoted the same rate.

The last point my hon. friend made was that this is part of the C.C.F. platform. It is no such thing. Exchange control is in effect to-day in every modern country in the world with the exception of the United States. The reason it is not in force there is that the economic position of the United States is so strong and its holdings of gold are so high that the United States dollar is the strongest currency in the world, and everyone wants it. But everyone does not want Canadian dollars.

I repeat that the whole purpose of the measure is to provide for the efficient handling and conservation of our essential foreign exchange resources.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to refer to section 32, and I do this because I come from a commercial city. I am very much surprised that a bill like this has been brought up in the dying days of the session. I feel a great deal of sympathy for the acting minister who has been placed in a position where he has to practically apologize to the house. He has performed a brilliant service during this session of parliament. He comes from a commercial area, the city of Montreal, as does the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. We are now in the ninety-ninth day of this session and here we have a bill that has never been before the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. ABBOTT: It was there for weeks.

Mr. CHURCH: It was in some respects. Who are the men who proposed this bill? Has the Department of Justice seen it?

The CHAIRMAN: I would ask the hon. member to relate his remarks strictly to section 32 and not speak generally on the bill. I think the committee would now like to have the bill discussed section by section.

Mr. CHURCH: I was about to make some remarks on section 32. Under this section every citizen of Toronto is likely to be dragged into the police court where a lay magistrate

Mr. ABBOTT: I have had no practice in that.

Mr. HACKETT: If there were some indication that this government intended to quit, intended to recede from the position it has taken, I am sure that there are many people in this group who would say we do not want to be unreasonable; but because we can see no hope, no intent, no wish, no willingness to get away from these shackles, we say and I say we are against it, we want the people to know where we stand and why. We have nothing to enable us to pass judgment upon the legislation which is submitted because nobody has given any reason for it other than that it is government policy.

Another question which was asked was, "Do you object to the Canadian dollar being at par?" I do not object to the Canadian dollar being at par, but I want the Canadian dollar to be where it should be in the judgment of people who know values and have learned values in the harsh school of buying and selling. The difficulty with the Canadian dollar to-day, if it is two or three cents below parity in the markets of New York, is not that the Canadian dollar is worth less than the United States dollar; it is that the people of the United States are fearful that somebody without responsibility will mark it up or down, will do something with it which cannot be foreseen. That is the weakness of the Canadian dollar to-day. The Canadian dollar and the Canadian people are sound. The weaknesses of the dollar arise from the tampering with it, from the legislation which places the foreigner at the discretion of people who are not in trade and whose experience is not in real values.

As I said yesterday, I do not wish any of the gentlemen whose duty it is to operate this foreign exchange control fund to feel that because I cannot agree with their philosophy and management I am criticizing them personally. I am willing to believe that they are sincere and that they are doing what they think is right; but the result is that we cannot perform the smallest act which is reflected in dollars and cents without seeking the let or hindrance of the government or some of its minions; that is not a desirable situation.

Last evening we were talking about exports. An amendment was introduced freeing farmers and fishermen from the obligation of getting a permit when exporting their produce monthly up to an amount of $100. The amendment failed. I tell you, Mr. Chairman, one thing that we are exporting very rapidly and at great cost—our youth, our young men and young women of vigour and hope, who find themselves denied an opportunity in this country. I shall read a letter which I received only yesterday from an involuntary exile:

> Bill has a very nice proposition awaiting him in—
>
> There is an American city named, which I need not read.
> He worked at it for six weeks, and he is now on leave of absence. We are looking over the Canadian scene, so far with a notable lack of success. The newspapers are howling about ten thousand-odd Canadians who have crossed into the United States since the war, but so far as we can see there are no jobs to be had in Canada, at least jobs that pay or offer a future. I hate leaving Canada in every respect, but am beginning to fear we have no alternative.

The spirit that has inspired this bill, Mr. Chairman, is a spirit which has denied opportunity to Canadian youth in many spheres. It is that spirit which has taken aviation out of the competitive realm and put it under the dominion government. It is the spirit which has made the C.B.C. an overlord, the same spirit that is crowding out private enterprise, stifling the private stations. It is the spirit which is preventing the young Canadian engineer, the young Canadian chemist, the young Canadian doctor from getting jobs in Canada, driving them away to the United States.

I regret most sincerely that we should be faced with legislation of this type, especially when there is no reason for it. If it could be justified; if there was anything that could be said in support of it other than that it is government policy, I am sure the people on this side of the house would be willing to listen. This entire policy of the bill is the policy of hon. gentlemen of the C.C.F. I do not begrudge them their views, but I do not sympathize with them and I cannot share them. Just why the government, the party opposite, should have adopted the programme of the C.C.F. is beyond the imagination of man to comprehend. I ask myself, where is the Liberal party? Where are the people who stood for private enterprise in other days? Where are the great advocates of Liberalism? It may be that we shall have to wait until this measure is taken to another forum, to another place, as it is called. It may be that in the senate there still lingers a flickering of the Liberal spirit which contributed so much to Canada's greatness.

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt to rise to the heights of moving oratory displayed by the hon. member for Stanstead, because I am not capable of doing so. He raised two or three points, however, to which I want to make brief reference.

treaty of 1854, after some of the restrictions which had compelled us to trade with England and with no other country had been lifted.

Through the civil war we supplied materials to the United States and for the first time, with the exception of a few people who had been engaged in the fur trade, did we encounter some wealth and general prosperity in this country. Our relationship with the United States has been most intimate. We enacted restrictive regulations at the beginning of the war because we feared that much of the foreign capital that was here might take flight. We feared that citizens of the United States who had invested largely in the development of our resources, and who were deeply interested in the development of this country, thinking their capital in jeopardy, might take it home. That was when the United States was not an ally. Later the United States became an ally, a great ally, and we must admit that its support of the allied cause was one of the determining factors of the war. Those unhappy war days are over, and I ask the minister what reason there is now to restrict that flow of financial and commercial business between the two countries. These restrictions are not only prejudicial to our own people; they are unfair to those who have had great confidence in the development of Canada and who have supplied capital for its development.

In other days we have heard a great deal about the dangers to international amity resulting from high tariffs. It seems to me that these restrictions are far more dangerous than any peril that could have resulted from a tariff. After all, tariffs are enacted, rightly or wrongly, with the view of giving employment to the people at home. I must tell the minister that no one has been able to get at the real reason for the passing of this legislation and for the enforcement of the regulations which will be enacted under it now that the war is over.

In the banking and commerce committee we had the opportunity of questioning at some length two or three very agreeable gentlemen, but we never could get very far beyond the fact that it was government policy to do thus and so. We never could get the reason; we never could get anyone to say that hard-headed business men had found it was in the interests of this country so to manacle and shackle the trade of Canada. I am asking the minister—he has had experience in business; he knows a great deal about industry, commerce and banking—whether there is any underlying philosophy that justifies the country in embarking on an economic programme which is entirely at variance with that which we have followed up to now and that which has always prevailed on this continent.

In old lands where resources are exhausted and where people and weary from frequent and long wars resulting from rivalries and sometimes from hatreds which this continent has been spared, certain nationalistic tendencies have sprung up and developed. But on this North American continent there are still vast resources to be developed, and much depends upon our being able to get on with the job freely, without losing time in complying with meaningless formalities, there is real work in Canada for all, and the workers should not be burdened unnecessarily with the support of large numbers engaged in watching, spying and making records. I ask the minister why should we, the Canadian people, ninety per cent of whom live within two hundred miles of the international boundary, eighty per cent of whom live within a hundred miles of the international boundary, a boundary which it has been our pride to boast does not separate our peoples if it does delineate our respective territories—why should we attempt to segregate ourselves from the other people of this continent? What good purpose is to be served by it? These are questions which were asked in committee; these are questions to which we tried to get answers and nobody was able to give an answer.

Unfortunately matters dealt with in this bill appear to be remote to most Canadians, they appear to be shrouded in mystery. Nobody knows exactly why the bill should become law, and that seems to be taken as a reason for enacting it. I am confident that there is nobody in Canada who is not willing to put up with a great deal of inconvenience if it is for any useful purpose; but so far no one has explained, either to the banking and commerce committee or to this committee, why we should depart from the freedom which has characterized our relations with the United States for the last hundred and eighty years, and why we should depart from that programme unprovoked while in the United States there is still the tendency and willingness to treat us with absolute confidence and good will.

Last night when an hon. member was speaking some hon. members asked—and I think the minister was of the number—"Are you opposed to this bill?" I am opposed to it. It sometimes happens that one gets himself into a situation out of which he has to ease himself. Even tenants of houses of ill fame are entitled by law to a three day notice to quit.

agent here and wanted to pay him out of previously accumulated Canadian dollar assets, that is not permitted.

Mr. HATFIELD: Suppose a prospector wants to go down to New York and get somebody to back him, and the backer in New York has Canadian funds in Canada; can he pay him from those Canadian funds or must he pay him in United States funds?

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, these are hypothetical cases. That would sound like a new investment in Canada, and in those circumstances under existing regulations and practice the United States citizen could send in his United States dollars, convert them into Canadian and pay the prospector.

Mr. COCKERAM: Can he get them out again?

Mr. JAENICKE: I was wondering whether the minister could see his way clear to change the period of time from six months to a year. I am personally interested in this matter, having some clients in the United States who have considerable farming interests in this country and, because the crop is not always marketed at once but over a period of twelve months, accounts are usually not rendered until after a year, only once a year. It would occasion inconvenience to these people if they had to do it within six months.

Mr. ABBOTT: The six months period is the period which is applied with respect to goods, and it is considered the normal period for payment. Provided payment was to be made within that period there would be no necessity to approach the board in connection with it. I am advised that if there is good reason for a longer period being ordinarily required, say twelve months or eighteen months, permission is readily granted.

Mr. JAENICKE: Where is the authority in the act that the board has the right to grant that permission?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is under the phrase "except in accordance with a permit." The permit could make the period twelve, eighteen or twenty-four months. But provided it is within six months there is no necessity for a permit.

Mr. McLURE: There are in the maritime provinces a number of agents or representatives of American firms. These American firms send their American money down to the provinces, appoint an agent to buy goods for them, in Canadian funds of course, and the goods are shipped. Does this bill preclude that agent from being paid because he will have to be paid in Canadian funds?

Mr. ABBOTT: Not at all. The hon. member for Queens asked a question last night about the free port of New York, and I should like to get rid of that point now. I was not quite clear whether the question was directed to the method by which the foreign exchange control board ensures that the foreign exchange proceeds of the sale of goods are returned when received by the exporter, or whether he was concerned with the credit risk which the exporter might assume in making shipments in that manner. So far as the foreign exchange proceeds are concerned, that procedure is the same as for other exports. At the time the goods leave Canada the exporter declares the approximate amount and currency of the payment to be received and the board looks to the exporter to sell funds to his bank at the time of receipt. So far as the credit risk is concerned, that is a matter between the exporter and his customers. I am informed that no cases have come to the board's attention of difficulties in connection with exports to the New York free port either from the board's or from the exporter's point of view.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister state to what extent the provisions of section 32 apply to countries other than the United States? I am speaking in terms of volume of controlled dollars.

Mr. ABBOTT: It applies generally to all countries. The purpose of the section under existing conditions is frankly to conserve the supply of United States dollars, and so far as the sterling area is concerned, by administrative practice and regulation, services may be performed for non-residents in those areas for payment in sterling or Canadian dollars or may be performed gratuitously. The real restriction for the time being is on areas where United States dollars are the currency.

Mr. HACKETT: That being the case, and the restriction having its practical application almost exclusively to American dollars, I ask the minister what is the purpose of the enactment. We have lived beside the United States for nearly two hundred years. We have lived with the United States in unbroken peace for nearly a hundred and fifty years. Our relationship has been one of the greatest amity and confidence. Why therefore should we at this time attempt to control the financial and business relationships which exist between these two countries? For generations we have depended upon our trade with that country. The first blush of prosperity that coloured the drab financial complexion of this country grew out of our trade relationship with the United States following Lord Elgin's trade

Section 31 agreed to.

On section 32—Services.

Mr. HARKNESS: This whole bill is an example of bureaucracy in full force and power, bureaucracy being most careful to stretch as much red tape as it possibly can around all exchange regulations and transactions. The persons who drew up this bill, as far as I can see, were so insistent on stopping up all holes through which any capital might get out of the country that they have carried it to the extent of stopping up a lot which exists purely in their own minds; and this clause is an example of it. It prevents anyone in this country from performing any services for a person in another country. The result of it is that if you have a friend or relative in a foreign country you are not permitted to sell any real estate for him, or to buy real estate, or perform any service of the kind without getting a permit from the board. Of course quite a number of services of this kind people frequently wish to perform without any remuneration; but in any case under this section you must not receive remuneration for a service.

When the matter was being discussed in the committee I asked an expert witness if there was any real reason or necessity for this clause, and the only answer I could get from him was that it was put there in order to prevent a resident of Canada from building up a credit abroad. That is no reason at all. Under another section of the act, any credit which any resident of this country builds up or secures abroad, through a sale of goods or in any other way, the board can force him to bring back to Canada. In view of the fact that the board has that power of compelling the Canadian resident to bring into Canada any securities or credits he may have in a foreign country, I can see no necessity for this clause. It is just a piece of useless red tape which further complicates the matter and makes it a nuisance. Therefore I move that the bill be amended by deleting clause 32.

Mr. MacINNIS: Will the minister, for the benefit of those of us who were not on the banking and commerce committee, explain this section?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. I thought perhaps the amendment would be put and then I would answer my hon. friend.

The CHAIRMAN: With regard to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Calgary East, that the bill be amended by deleting clause 32, that clause would be automatically deleted if it were defeated on the vote. The question on this particular clause will be: Does clause 38 carry? If the clause does not carry, it is automatically deleted; accordingly I must rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I might comment on the statement made by my hon. friend. As members of the committee will see if they read the clause, it provides that services rendered by Canadians to non-residents must be paid for in a currency designated by the board. The purpose of the clause is to prevent Canadians from rendering services in the United States and either agreeing to accept payment in Canadian dollars or allowing the matter to stand and not accepting payment now, or making what might appear to be a gift. One of our large sources of United States dollars is the performance of services by Canadians, individuals or corporations, for non-residents. It includes not only legal services but insurance services and that sort of thing; and it is felt that, since an exporter of goods is required to take the fair value of those goods in United States dollars—using that as an example—it is only fair that the lawyer or the insurance man or anybody else who performs services for a United States resident should get paid for those services in United States dollars, in order that those United States dollars may be available for Canada. That, briefly, is the purpose of the section, and I may say that it is considered an essential provision of the bill.

Mr. HATFIELD: What about a company in the United States which had a branch office in Canada and hired the services of a Canadian?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is the reverse case. A company in the United States hiring the services of a Canadian would pay him in Canadian dollars, I suppose.

Mr. HATFIELD: Suppose the United States company has only an agent in Canada and has Canadian funds which have been here since the beginning of the war. I know of companies in the United States that have had millions of dollars tied up in Canada all during the war. They left it here because they could not get it back to the United States. Now they want to get it back.

Mr. ABBOTT: The position with respect to a case such as my hon. friend mentions is this: if the American company were earning revenue in Canada they could pay their Canadian representative in Canadian dollars out of that revenue, but if they were not earning revenue in Canada, if they had an capacity. Its present capacity for automobiles is 37, but by the addition of a flat car another 24 automobiles can be carried, making a total of 61. It is expected that the addition of the flat car will take care of any congestion during exhibition week.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): May I ask the Minister of Transport when the new ferry steamer Abegweit will be in service? It was understood it would be in service in 1946. Can the minister give the date?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I could give the hon. member perhaps a little more information than I did when he last asked this question, but I would prefer to make a statement on the whole matter when my estimates come up. In view of changed circumstances it will be impossible to have this ferry ready for September 30.

BACON

BRITISH CONTRACT WITH DENMARK

Mr. J. A. CHARLTON (Brant): I wish to ask the Acting Minister of Agriculture when I may receive an answer to the question I asked yesterday about Danish bacon.

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Acting Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I happen to be the Acting Minister of Agriculture, and I must admit that my experience is not very great in these matters. I am asking the department to have a report prepared, and I hope to be able to give an answer to my hon. friend to-morrow.

MOUNTED POLICE

USE OF LIGHTER UNIFORMS IN HOT WEATHER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, as we are in a period of hot weather would it not be possible for the government to supply the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who are on duty in front of this building with lighter uniforms?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): They do not want them.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it would be possible to do so, but I think it would be undesirable.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL

STATUTORY AUTHORITY FOR ORDERS IN COUNCIL PASSED UNDER WAR MEASURES ACT

The house resumed from Thursday, August 8, consideration in committee of bill No. 195, respecting the control of the acquisition and disposition of foreign currency and the control of transactions involving foreign currency of non-residents—Mr. Abbott—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 28—Registration of transfer of securities by resident to non-resident, etc.

Mr. COCKERAM: Would the minister explain section 28(1) (a) which says that:

No person shall, except in accordance with a permit, (a) knowingly register any transfer of Canadian securities from a resident to a non-resident.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Acting Minister of Finance): The purpose of that is to prohibit the transfer of Canadian securities from a resident to a non-resident without a permit.

Mr. COCKERAM: Does this mean that transfer agents in Canada must obtain a permit before making a transfer from a resident to a non-resident on a Canadian register?

Mr. ABBOTT: The transfer agent must not transfer a security from a Canadian resident to a non-resident without first having been furnished with a permit for that transaction.

Mr. COCKERAM: And that applies to every transaction?

Mr. ABBOTT: That has been in force ever since the inception of the foreign exchange control board.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Subsection 2 deals with the matter of regulation. I suggest to the minister, and I am sure he is in agreement, that that subsection stand until we have the opportunity of dealing with the general question of regulations under section 35.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is quite agreeable.

Subsection 1 of section 28 agreed to.

Subsection 2 stands.

Section 28 stands.

Section 29 agreed to.

On section 30—Governor in council may require residents to report ownership of foreign securities.

Mr. POULIOT: On a previous occasion several years ago I asked for the registration of all diamonds and precious stones entering this country, but that was denied. There are people who come to Canada with bags of diamonds worth millions of dollars, and they pay no tax on them. There should be an inventory of those possessions.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not familiar with the diamond situation, but the registration of particular commodities such as diamonds would not come under the board.

SS. "BEAVERHILL"

QUESTION AS TO REMOVAL OF WRECK FROM SAINT JOHN HARBOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. K. HAZEN (St. John-Albert): Before the orders of the day are called I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Has a report been received about the removal of the wrecked SS. Beaverhill from Hillyard's reef where it went aground on November 24, 1944, and if so, can the minister tell us when the wreck will be removed?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): The hon. gentleman telephoned my office a short while before I came down to the house, so I have not a complete report on the subject matter. From memory I can state that the SS. Beaverhill has been in the harbour of Saint John for almost two years. This vessel was owned by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and it was abandoned by that company to the insurance company which in turn entered into a contract with Foundation Maritimes Limited to remove it at a very high cost. The position to-day, I am informed, is that the contractor is awaiting favourable tidal conditions in order to remove it, possibly at the end of this month. The department officials are doing everything they can to expedite its removal. I am further informed that it is not interfering with traffic.

P.E.I. CAR FERRY SERVICE

USE OF "SCOTIA" FOR OLD HOME WEEK—SS. "ABEGWEIT"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. MacNAUGHT (Prince): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport, a copy of which has been delivered to him. Will the Department of Transport place the Scotia on the Borden-Tormentine run to assist the present ferry during exhibition week, and also during the busy fall season?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the department officials have given consideration to the placing of one or other of the Scotias on the strait of Northumberland during exhibition or old home week in Charlottetown, but the position with reference to the two Scotias is this. Scotia I is now in dry dock at Halifax, and will not be out for some two or three weeks. As soon as it is released, Scotia II, which is in need of extensive repairs, will have to go into dry dock and will not be released until the month of November. During the month of November the weather is so rough in the strait of Northumberland that the department officials think it would be dangerous to add either Scotia I or II to the present Prince Edward Island car ferry service. But in order to relieve the congestion that might arise during old home week it is proposed that the Prince Edward Island car ferry be used to its maximum

Mr. JACKMAN: I do not know whether the minister understands what I am talking about.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think I understand what the hon. member is talking about, and I understand the principle involved.

Mr. JACKMAN: I shall have to go into some detail and explain.

An hon. MEMBER: At this late hour?

Mr. JACKMAN: Yes, unfortunately, because this bill, while there may be some good points about it, is going to cost the Canadian people in the way of employment and progress untold amounts. Its cost will far outweigh the benefits to be derived from it. The simple question that I asked the minister was, if the Canadian acquires these United States securities through the sale of Canadian assets in the United States—he is not drawing on the funds which the board has in funds in the pool—

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend knows that the foreign exchange control board will not allow a Canadian who goes to the United States to export his Canadian capital to that country unless a permit is granted.

Mr. JACKMAN: I know of all the prohibitions of the board, but what I want the committee to understand is why? Why are there to be prohibitions against that which in no way interferes with what the board would otherwise have?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Tory filibuster.

Mr. JACKMAN: Because of the prescience of the individual in looking after his old age he has provided himself with funds at no cost to the board. He has in no way interfered with the board. What I am asking the minister is, in what way has the transaction which I have outlined interfered with the amount of United States funds which would otherwise be available?

Mr. ABBOTT: Again the short answer is that the Canadian who sells Canadian securities in New York and buys United States securities has increased the over-all debit balance of Canada to the United States, if he then moves to the United States.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LOW—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN OTTAWA "JOURNAL" OF AUGUST 5

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, on a question of personal privilege, I have before me the Ottawa Journal of Wednesday, August 7. On page 3 is an article entitled, "Low charges Mr. King courted communists." The heading and the body of the article are both inaccurate in reporting the contents of my speech at Noranda, Quebec, on the evening of August 5. I did not charge Mr. Mackenzie King personally with deliberately courting the communist party in the 1945 federal election. What I did say was, "The Liberal government is alone responsible for the alarming growth and spread of communism during the past ten years." I further stated that the Liberal party deliberately courted the communists prior to and during the election campaign of 1945.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LOW: I will repeat that for the benefit of the hon. members who want to drown it out. I further stated that the Liberal party deliberately courted the communists prior to and during the election campaign of 1945. My statements were based on an imposing array of factual evidence which I would gladly present here if the rules of the house did not forbid it. I stand by what I said and will present the evidence I have in this house at the proper time and before the highest court of this land, the people.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Even in the revised version now submitted, what the hon. gentleman said was unutterable nonense.

Mr. MacINNIS: Page Tim Buck.

Mr. POULIOT: Page the civil liberties league.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Acting Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 368, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Acting Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 369, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

have passed now and these controls, with their attendant offences and penalties, should be removed as quickly as possible. I see no reason why our businessmen should not be allowed to carry out their transactions as they did before the war. In your district, Mr. Chairman, you are not far from the border and you know how difficult it is in Detroit and in the lake Erie and Niagara ports. People have complained to me also. I represent a large commercial constituency and I know that businessmen, large and small, are, as I have said, being simply hamstrung at the present time. No wonder we are not getting consumer goods as rapidly as we should.

Amendment (Mr. Hatfield) negatived; yeas, 17; nays, 57.

Section agreed to.

On section 26—Property.

Mr. HATFIELD: I should like to point out that I believe section 26 interferes with treaties existing between the United States and Canada. Maybe the Minister of Justice should look into it. Under these treaties there are points in Canada where United States goods can be loaded in bond for shipment back to the United States at Canadian railway points; likewise, Canadians can load certain produce in the United States for shipment back to Canada in bond. That treaty has been operative for a good many years.

Section agreed to.

On section 27—Resident dealings in securities with non-residents.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If this is the appropriate place I should like to ask a question on interpretation purely for information purposes. If a chartered bank holds victory bonds to the credit of a United States purchaser, will such bonds be released to the purchaser on application to the bank, or are they still under the control of the foreign exchange control board?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that the answer is, yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Still under the control of the board?

Mr. ABBOTT: No; they can be released to a United States resident. A permit will be given without question.

Section agreed to.

On Section 28—Registration of transfer of securities by resident to non-resident, et cetera.

Mr. JACKMAN: I wish to ask a question in regard to these securities. For the benefit of the hon. member for Halton, I had not thought of this question when the committee was holding its meetings. Apparently no one is allowed to take securities with him should he change his residence to the United States. Let us suppose that an elderly person has arthritis or some other difficulty and goes to a warmer climate. Naturally he wants to remove the means by which he lives. Suppose that particular Canadian had the foresight to provide himself in Canada with United States securities, as is easily done under the present regulations of the board, as follows, namely, by selling Canadian securities which are saleable in New York and obtaining funds and putting these United States funds into United States securities. I understand that a Canadian going to the United States will not be declared a resident of that country under the interpretation section of the bill except within the discretion of the board itself. Does it matter to the board whether that man is allowed to take with him the United States securities which he has purchased while here in Canada from the proceeds of sales of Canadian securities in New York? When the witness was before the committee the suggestion was made that there was a certain pool of United States funds which was available to the Canadian economy through the sale of Canadian securities to United States citizens. What I am suggesting to the minister is that there is a pool of United States money at a certain time in exchange for Canadian securities; but if that pool is not dipped into at the particular time it is gone, lost forever, and then you must wait until some Americans want to buy some more Canadian securities. I do not understand how the Canadian economy can be in any way damaged or this right to acquire more United States funds lessened by reason of the fact that the Canadian who was about to settle in the United States provided himself with United States funds at a particular time and then, when he established residence over there, he wished to take those funds with him. How can the board possibly have its scope so far as United States funds are concerned lessened by the transaction which I have just outlined?

Mr. ABBOTT: The short answer to my hon. friend's question is that it is an export of capital by this resident who changes his residence from Canada to the United States, whether he takes it in Canadian dollar securities or in United States dollar securities.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is no answer at all.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is a pretty good answer.

were allowed to go over the border and get their money and bring it home. Any man who was well known, a prominent citizen, could go to a bank and get sixteen, eighteen or twenty per cent. If I went in, dressed roughly, and perhaps with fish scales in my hair I would not get the same theatment. I know of many cases of that kind. I remember the case of a man who came with his wife to the town where I lived, and I may say before going farther that as a rule the larger the amount of money you had, the greater percentage you received. This man's wife had $1,000 to deposit in the Bank of Nova Scotia in St. Andrews, and incidentally, I may say, the manager of that bank is still living. She deposited her money and received twelve per cent. Her husband came with $700 and when he deposited his amount he received eighteen per cent. As they were about to leave for home he mentioned to his wife that he had got eighteen per cent and she was surprised to hear that. Although the bank was closed by that time, they went back and the manager discovered that he had made a mistake and the other six per cent was paid.

I do not know what conditions were like in the larger centres, but I know that in New Brunswick the rate of exchange was never at any time posted in the banks. I know of another case—this gentleman is living to-day. At that time he lived in the town of St. George, and it is interesting to know that there are many "saints" in Charlotte county. He had a certain amount of money to deposit and at one bank he was offered twelve per cent. He came to St. Andrews and they offered him fifteen per cent. Then he went to the Bank of Montreal in St. Stephen and was offered twenty per cent—all on the same day.

My chief reason for supporting this measure is that the foreign exchange control situation has been so handled during the war years that every man in the country, regardless of whether he wore a top hat or, as I have said, had fish scales in his hair, got the same treatment when he went to the bank. Everybody got ten per cent. That is the fair and just way of handling the situation, and I have no doubt whatever that if to-day the foreign exchange control board were thrown aside the same thing would happen as happened during the period of which I have spoken. You would find shysters on both sides buying and selling exchange. That happened before and I have no doubt it would happen again.

One hon. member to-night suggested that these regulations were going to create a nation of law-breakers. I suggest that if we dispensed with the foreign exchange control that we have had during the war we would have a nation of lawbreakers, and they would be the banks and bankers. In my opinion we should stick to the board and allow them to carry on as they have been doing in the past five or six years.

Mr. CHURCH: There is no doubt that we had a good many valuable officials in connection with the foreign exchange control board in war time. They did good work during the war. I suggest, however, that there is too much red tape about the regulations. These controls remind me of the game called winding and unwinding, in which the players rehearse a large number of words and repeat them backwards. In my opinion we are surrendering too much of our financial initiative to Washington all along. We have had controls of foreign currency for five or six years and, if we are to wait for another eighteen months or two years before these controls are all removed, our businessmen will be hamstrung. We have nothing but officials, filing clerks and all the rest of it from the cradle to the grave over exports and foreign exchange, and no business, large or small, can possibly carry on under the interpretation definitions in this section.

Industry and labour in Canada worked wonders in the war and they can work wonders again in peace, but the prime necessity is stability in the delivery of all classes of consumer goods so as to promote our peacetime economy and provide the fullest measure of employment and export of goods and services. But how are our businessmen to do this under these definitions as set out under (a) and (b) as to property and sale by residents of "goods" to be exported. Under this control system we shall have to maintain a whole staff of employees of the foreign exchange control board. As I say, there is altogether too much red tape about the regulations, with armies of officials who think we cannot now live without them.

I have seen the way in which these regulations work at Fort Erie. I come from a commercial city in which there is a heavy American trade by water and rail. I have seen goods coming in and export of goods to non-residents, and I know the difficulties which businessmen, large and small, have to put up with to meet market demands. I fail to see why, fifteen months after the war, we should continue to maintain these irksome controls, which interfere with the freedom of our people. Various transactions which were not regarded as offences in time of peace were created offences during the war; but the war years into the country without dealing through the agent of the foreign exchange control board. The total fines amounted to $300, all over a few tons of hay and straw.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am glad my hon. friend said he did not object to the B form, because my information is that there is really no added work in filling out the entry.

Mr. HATFIELD: But the farmer has to send $2 to Ottawa to get a chance to take a few dozen eggs across the border.

Mr. ABBOTT: That, I am glad to say, is a responsibility of my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce and not of the Acting Minister of Finance.

Mr. HATFIELD: I am told by the Department of Trade and Commerce that they do not want to continue the export permit board, that this is only done at the request of the wartime prices and trade board and the foreign exchange control board; they are only policemen for that board; they are not getting anything out of it.

Mr. KIDD: I should like to draw to the attention of the minister a condition which, somewhere between the foreign exchange control board and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, is proving a hardship. I speak on behalf of citizens of the upper St. Lawrence, Wolfe island and Howe island, which I represented in the upper house for fifteen years, and I want to endorse everything that was said by the hon. member for Stanstead. These farmers who have been living in the vicinity of Howe island and Wolfe island have been going back and forth across the border; in fact they are nearer to the United States border than they are to their own county town. Strawberry producers were practically put out of business two or three years ago on account of these controls. But I want to refer particularly to a man in my own city who went over to Saratoga Springs with a string of horses. He tried to get a permit to take a few oats over to the United States, and this was refused.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but this has nothing to do with the foreign exchange control board.

Mr. KIDD: But there is an overlapping. I wish the Minister of Trade and Commerce was in his seat at the present time. As I said, here was a man with a string of horses going to the United States, and he cannot get oats for them and cannot bring oats in. The results are obvious.

Mr. BRYCE: Feed them hay.

[Mr. Hatfield.]

Mr. KIDD: You cannot even get hay over there. We have at Kingston one of the finest racetracks there is; northern New York has nothing to touch it. Men arrange to take six or eight horses over, and then they are turned down at the border when they want to take over a few bags of oats. It is a nuisance, and I think that between the Acting Minister of Finance, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and some of their officials it should be possible to issue a permit to a horseman allowing him to take eight or ten or a dozen bags of oats in the back of his truck to feed his horses over there.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall bring my hon. friend's remarks to the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

On the question which has been raised here about the farmers along the 3,000 miles of undefended border being able to ship produce back and forth, I do not think I can accept the amendment in its present form, and I question whether my hon. friend really intended to eliminate the B form. But what I will do is this: I will discuss the matter with the officials of the board and see whether, by regulation now or at a given time, some limit could be set under special local conditions. But, as I said before, I think it should be done by regulation so that it could be adapted to local conditions, instead of trying to make it general.

Mr. HATFIELD: I do not care how they do it, but I should like these ministers and the boards to get together so that some simple way could be devised whereby a farmer can take over and sell his goods without going through all this nonsense. It piles up work for the different boards and departments and it is a great nuisance to the farmer. A United States citizen can come over here, buy $100 worth of goods and take them out of Canada without getting a permit; he only has to declare his purchases. Why should the Canadian citizen not be in the same position?

Mr. ABBOTT: I appreciate my hon. friend's willingness to cooperate.

Mr. STUART (Charlotte): The county in which I live is on the United States border. I believe there are hon. members on the other side of the chamber who can remember as well as I the way the foreign exchange control was instituted during the last war. At that time, as I recall, the Right Hon. R. L. Borden was prime minister of this country. I remember distinctly as a very young man at that time that, instead of the money of our fishermen and farmers being handled through a foreign exchange control board, our people

That will do to start with. I will also ask him, with his experience as Acting Minister of Finance and in dealing with other departments, if the same information could not be obtained from officials in other departments who do exactly the same work? Would the minister be kind enough to answer my question?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think that information can be made available. It would be exactly the same number as the number of customs export entries. The Department of National Revenue may have the figures as to the number of entries. It is issued at the same time. It is the same form.

Mr. POULIOT: It is a perfect example of duplication and waste.

Mr. McLURE: I want to put a question that will not be as noisy as some of the questions that have been asked. To-day there is a large export trade growing up, that is large in number, to what are called the free port zones in New York. These zones are especially established for dutiable goods. I am wondering whether we shall have any protection under this new bill and these export regulations. To-day an exporter has, we will say, a thousand dollars worth of dutiable goods going into the United States. He just ships that with an ordinary permit, or has been shipping it with an ordinary permit. He does not have to declare any valuation except for insurance. Those goods, if they are shipped to New York, are shipped to the New York free port zone. The goods are not in bond but they are dutiable. The exporter ships through some chartered bank which has an agency there. Then the exporter notifies the man to whom he expects to sell, and that man goes to the free port zone and examines the goods. A price is then placed on them by the exporter which is sufficient to cover the value, plus the exporter's profit, plus the duty that will be paid on the goods. The buyer has nothing to do with the duty. He just goes in and looks at these goods and, if they are worth to him the price which the exporter states, he buys them. He pays the bank, and the bank pays the United States customs officer the duty. What I want to know is, when that transaction is completed, how the funds will be handled and how the exporter will be protected under this new bill.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not familiar with the practice which my hon. friend has so clearly outlined. I think I shall have to make some inquiries and give him an answer a little later.

Mr. McLURE: Hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of goods have been shipped in the last few years. It is a trade which is essential to Canada. One of its advantages is that it is so easy to ship now. You do not have to value your goods; you do not have to pay your duty to go into the United States and then try to sell your product afterwards, and if we could get proper protection in this connection it would be a great thing for the exporters.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will make inquiries and see if I can find out what happens in these cases.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. We have an amendment proposed by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton. Is it his wish to press the amendment in view of the explanation the minister has made?

Mr. HATFIELD: I should like to say to the minister that I am not so much opposed to the B form, but I understand that the export permit board is being carried on by the Department of Trade and Commerce at the request of the wartime prices and trade board and the foreign exchange control board.

Mr. ABBOTT: May I assure my hon. friend as strongly as I can that that is not the case.

Mr. HATFIELD: That is, the permit.

Mr. ABBOTT: I thought that was the permit to which my hon. friend was taking objection.

Mr. HATFIELD: That is the permit on which the foreign exchange control board has prosecuted all these people in my constituency, and the commissioner of customs told me that they were only policemen for the minister's department, that they were tired of doing it, that they had to put on an extra staff to police his foreign exchange control department. A certain farmer applied for an export permit on so many tons of hay and so many tons of straw. Since that time, two years ago, there was a shortage somewhere in Ontario or Quebec, a long way from his market, they refused a permit on the hay but they gave him a permit on the straw. The man, when he started to haul the straw, went around the Canadian customs, paid the duty on his straw, and delivered it to the United States market, and when he got through with hauling the straw he hauled the hay. The mounted police came along and checked with the United States officer and found that the farmer had paid duty on so much hay and so much straw. He was arrested, brought before a magistrate and fined for exporting goods without making an entry to the proper customs officer, and he was also fined for bringing money back statistics on wheat and other things produced in Canada. Those were very satisfactory. That branch had many able men, and I do not see why there is so much duplication and triplication of bureaucracy in the form of various boards, commissions, branches, bureaus, et cetera.

Here we have another example. The country is going to have to feed all those who come from the university with diplomas bearing bright gold seals. They are the ones who are going to run the country. The policy of the government is supposed to be to promote private initiative, but how can there be private initiative when the men in this country with private initiative are like the giant described by a well-known English author and who was tied up by dwarfs? He was a giant, but he could not move; the dwarfs were all around him.

Mr. HACKETT: Do you remember his name? Was it Gulliver?

Mr. POULIOT: I know very well, but I wanted my hon. friend to show how well read he is. It was a classic. When as a child I read "Gulliver's Travels" by Swift, if I am not mistaken, I was enchanted. But I said to myself, how can a giant be tied up by dwarfs like that? I never thought I would see it done in the year 1946, that I would be a member of parliament then and actually see it done here in the House of Commons. We have through this board of duplication of services for which the taxpayer has to pay. I admit that hon. gentlemen have a right to lay their grievances against the board before this committee. I will go farther and say that it is their duty to do so. But on the other hand, if we want to stop these grievances against the board for good, we have simply to give no power to the foreign exchange control board, and I ask the committee not to forget what I said yesterday, that the only way to reform that board is to abolish it. It is the fifth wheel of the coach of state.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. We are on section 25.

Mr. POULIOT: If I am permitted, Mr. Chairman, I will conclude. To come back to exports and imports—and I hope that the committee will be indulgent enough to let me speak of both at the same time because the two go together—

Mr. MacINNIS: The committee is far more indulgent than that.

Mr. POULIOT: The committee is generous. My hon. friend was a member at the time I referred to and he remembers the discussion on imports and exports. There are two sections of the bill in relation to imports and exports, sections 25 and 26. There should be only one section, consisting of two subsections, subsection (a) dealing with exports and subsection (b) dealing with imports, so that the two could be discussed together and so that we could reach some conclusion regarding trade, which is the lifeblood of the nation.

What information can we get from this board about the shipment of various products since the beginning of the war? What about the shipment of cheese? What about the shipment of powdered milk? What about the shipment of meat, dressed meat, frozen meat and canned meat? What about the shipment of wheat and other grains? Can we get the figures of these shipments to various countries for the last five or six years? The board must have that information; otherwise they would not be in a position to grant any permit. In the Department of Trade and Commerce we have gentlemen who are most serviceable to members of parliament. We have to go to them sometimes when we are sending gifts to another country to find out if they are dutiable in that country, and they give us that information. What information can one get from the foreign exchange control board? What is the personnel of that board? What is the personnel that looks after imports? What is the personnel that looks after exports? We know the personnel in the Department of Trade and Commerce, the gentlemen who are compiling statistics, and we know the gentlemen who are issuing permits and compiling data in the Department of National Revenue.

I do not understand how any gentleman can complain about bureaucracy if he does not seize this unique opportunity to redress wrongs, to put a stop to them, and at the same time make life easier for the businessman, who at the present time has to go to the board and get this permit and that permit, then come back and get another permit, then have it countersigned by one expert, and even that counter-signature is not enough but must be initialed by another super brain. Even that is not enough. It mst be folded in such a way as to conform with the standards of the board. I cannot understand how business can prosper with all those obstacles in the way. I will ask the minister a simple question. Is it possible for the board to give any definite information about the total number of permits which have been issued over a certain number of years, say one, or two or three or four or five years, by the foreign exchange control board for various commodities; for flour and grain, including wheat of course; cheese, powdered milk, all kinds of meats, lumber, and minerals?

Mr. HATFIELD: I have in mind the case of a farmer who exported two cords of wood. When he came to the border he was asked to fill out the B form which the minister has spoken about, indicating how much he expected to receive for the wood. He said he had sold the wood for $30, and he made out the B form, stating that he would return $30 and sell it to the bank. The bank was acting as the agent for the foreign exchange control board. The man overlooked the fact that when he was in Maine he would have to spend $1 for his dinner. When he came back he had only $29, and he had to write a number of letters and the banker had to write a number of letters to the foreign exchange control board explaining why it was that he had not brought back $30.

Mr. HACKETT: Inasmuch as our dollar is now on a parity with the United States dollar, does not the reason for this provision in the bill, within the limits of the amendment, pretty well disappear? When there was a difference of ten per cent it was a much more serious matter than it is now. Another regulation imposed on the small exporter means an additional deterrent. I am reminded of the provision in the constitutions of many of the southern states that voters must read, write and understand the constitution. One gentleman of dark complexion was asked if he knew what that meant, and he said, "Yes, sir, it means that this nigger isn't going to vote." These regulations mean that our people cannot take their products to a ready and customary market. The result is an unnecessary loss.

Mr. ABBOTT: Referring shortly to my hon. friend's first question, as to whether or not the fact that the Canadian dollar is on parity with the United States dollar has not largely removed the necessity for this restriction, I would say that the answer is in the negative. We still need to conserve our United States dollar reserves, and that is the purpose of foreign exchange control. Prior to the change in the exchange rate, the Canadian exporter received more in Canadian dollars for the goods which he exported, but that is the only change which has taken place.

Mr. HACKETT: United States dollars seem to be in current circulation in Montreal these days.

Mr. JACKMAN: Illegally.

Mr. POULIOT: This afternoon I listened to hon. gentlemen who were not satisfied with the legislation for returned men because it was not broad enough. I was reminded of denunciations of taxation which have been made in previous times. When expenditures come before the house or before the committee they are all agreed upon; they are never enough. To-night I am thinking of the denunciation of bureaucracy. This bill is intended to increase bureaucracy. Hon. members have referred to a few cases where complaints could be lodged against the action of this board, but I am distressed by the fact that the hon. gentleman who sponsors this legislation has said that the export permits to be issued by the foreign exchange control board will not be the same as those issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce. This is another permit, something entirely different; it is not the same thing; it is something new. Then there will be other permits for imports different from those issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

There are four departments of government set up to promote trade between provinces or between Canada and other countries. The first of these is the Department of Agriculture. The next is the Department of Mines and Resources which supplies prospectors with maps, et cetera. Those two departments help the different producers in this country to develop trade. I remember the legislation passed by the Bennett government in connection with marketing between the provinces. That caused more trouble than could be described now, but the purpose was to develop trade through the Department of Agriculture.

Trade consists of exports and imports. To promote exports we have the Department of Trade and Commerce. This department has assisted Canadian producers and Canadian manufacturers; it has paid subsidies to navigation lines, et cetera. But on top of this department we have now set up a commercial corporation. This has been established by legislation, and unfortunately I was not in the house on Monday when the particular legislation passed like butter in a pan. It was a new scheme thought up by a few of the intelligentsia to give direction to trade through the Department of Trade and Commerce. The long-established department was not enough; a corporation had to be set up on top.

We have had since confederation the former department of customs and excise, afterwards the Department of National Revenue, to deal with imports. There is another branch of that department, the bureau of statistics, which is supposed to do the work that is proposed to be done by this board. We have not heard from the bureau of statistics for a long time. I remember, when the Bennett government was in power, I used to receive farm or the catch up to a value of $100 each month, but it would not relieve such exporters from the necessity of making the usual export entry.

In point of fact, this permit about which so much has been said, as to the nuisance of getting it, is issued by the customs officer and forms part of the forms in connection with customs export entries. It is known as form B, and the permit is obtained by filling out the usual customs export entry form, which now calls for a declaration by the exporter of the goods, their destination, the price to be received and so on.

The whole purpose of this permit system is to make sure that exports to foreign countries and in particular to the United States—that is what we are talking about now—will result in proceeds of sales being paid in United States dollars and made available to our exchange fund. That is the purpose of the permit. Under subsection 2 of section 25 it is provided—

> The board shall not withhold a permit for the export of goods from Canada where payment of not less than the fair value of the goods in a currency designated by the board as acceptable for such a transaction,
> (a) has been received by a resident from a non-resident and, in the case of payment in foreign currency, the foreign currency has been sold to an authorized dealer; > or
> (b) is due to a resident from a non-resident under the terms of sale within six months after the goods are exported from Canada and, in case where payment is to be made in foreign currency, the board is satisfied that the foreign currency will be offered for sale to an authorized dealer forthwith upon receipt.

There is not any great hardship involved in that. There is not any great formality involved in it. It is true there may not be a customs officer close to the point where a particular farmer wishes to take his load of hay across the boundary line. Nevertheless, if he is selling hay or any other commodity in the United States he must make an export entry for that produce. He should be required to do so and he is required to do so. There is no additional formality in obtaining a permit of the foreign exchange control board, because customs officers act as agents of the board in issuing those permits.

Mr. HATFIELD: May I ask a question?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. HATFIELD: I understand that the export permit board, which is under the Department of Trade and Commerce, was set up for the purpose of forcing the exporter to take out a permit, so that the foreign exchange control board could keep track of the exports from this country. I took this matter up—

Mr. ABBOTT: What is the question? I was making a statement.

Mr. HATFIELD: I took the matter up with the commissioner of customs—

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend may make another speech later. I answered the question by saying that the export permit required by the Department of Trade and Commerce has nothing whatever to do with the foreign exchange control board. I say that positively. It has nothing to do with it at all.

Mr. HATFIELD: In these cases where a farmer was fined for taking a few dozen eggs or a ton of hay—

Mr. ABBOTT: It has not anything to do with the export permit branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce. I was proceeding to say that this really involves no additional trouble on the part of the exporter. He must make out his export entry, and in making out that export entry he obtains at the same time a permit from the foreign exchange control board. He does not even fill out the extra form. The customs officer is the agent of the board for the purpose of issuing that permit.

The whole purpose is to enable a scrutiny to be made of the exports which are going to other countries, and the amount which is to be received for them.

I think, if a provision of this kind were to be included—and I shall be glad to discuss it with the officials of the board to see whether it is practicable—it would be desirable to make it by regulation rather than by statute. Personally I believe it would be a mistake to single out a special group or special groups for special treatment. If this can be done without danger to the efficient administration of exchange control, then I quite agree that it should be put in. But I think it should be done by regulation and not by singling out any special group for this special treatment.

I repeat that I do not think any real hardship is involved in getting this extra permit. I have a strong suspicion that some of the cases which have been described by the hon. member for St. John-Albert and the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton are cases of individuals who were anxious to ship hay or some other product to the United States in order to avoid the ceiling prices which still prevailed in Canada.

plaint before the banking and commerce committee when the bill was before it, so that the matter could have been gone into?

Mr. HACKETT: Because we understood we were going to discuss this matter.

Mr. CLEAVER: Obviously you cannot have a matter of this kind discussed in the house. If the hon. member had brought these complaints before the banking and commerce committee—

Mr. JACKMAN: The free press of Canada has been stirred up on behalf of the victims.

Mr. HAZEN: I think I expressed myself clearly with regard to this bill when it was before the committee.

Mr. CLEAVER: Did the hon. member make any of these complaints before the committee?

Mr. JACKMAN: What would you have done, if he had?

Mr. HAZEN: If the chairman of the committee wishes me to read the stand I took then, I have it here and I am prepared to read it.

Mr. CLEAVER: Well—

Mr. HAZEN: Now, do not get impatient. He has asked if I mentioned certain instances before the committee. I did not mention particular instances because I did not think it was necessary. I had one or two instances in mind at the time.

But I will say this, that since we were before the committee there have been a great many more of these instances brought to my attention, and I am giving a few of the instances to the committee to-night. I am going to refer to two more of them. These are only two; there must be thousands of them; I do not know how many there are.

Mr. CLEAVER: I understand that the hon. member did not know of these instances.

Mr. HAZEN: A farmer took a few tons of hay across the line because it was convenient for him to do so. He declared it to the customs authorities and paid the duty. He was summonsed before the magistrate by the board and fined $200. This man's name was Cain, from the county of Carleton in the province of New Brunswick.

There was another man who took a load of hay across. There was no Canadian customs officer there. He paid the duty on the hay to United States customs officer. This man was summonsed before the magistrate and was fined $200.

Mr. ABBOTT: Does the hon. member know whether these cases were for infractions of foreign exchange control regulations or for failure to obtain export permits from the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. HATFIELD: They were prosecuted by the foreign exchange control board.

Mr. ABBOTT: I was asking the hon. member for St. John-Albert. I did not know that the information was provided by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton. But I see that it was.

Mr. HAZEN: If you want to make a speech, go on. My information is that these charges weres laid by the foreign exchange control board.

Mr. ABBOTT: But you have not personal knowledge of it.

Mr. HAZEN: I was not associated with the case.

Mr. HATFIELD: I was.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What difference does it make who has the information, if it is a fact?

Mr. CLEAVER: There may be some doubt as to whether it is a fact.

Mr. HAZEN: I have the records of only a few cases, but there must have been thousands. However, I have referred to them to point out the hardships which exist under these regulations, and I cite them as an argument in support of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton.

Surely it would not have affected the rate of exchange if these primary producers were permitted each month to take not more than $100 worth of the goods they produce by their own efforts to the United States. As the hon. member for Stanstead has said, it is their natural market.

Mr. ABBOTT: And where they can get higher prices, too.

Mr. HAZEN: As the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton has said, it is their natural market. I would ask the minister to give this matter his sympathetic consideration, and to bless it with his approval.

Mr. ABBOTT: Just a word respecting the proposed amendment. As the hon. member for Stanstead has said, I am thoroughly familiar with the conditions along a certain part of the Canadian-American border, having been born and brought up very close to that border. The proposed amendment would provide that in the case of a bona fide farmer or fishermen there would be no requirement to obtain a permit from the foreign exchange control board in exporting the produce of the

Mr. ROSS (Souris): In this amendment we are asking that the producer should report to the customs officials and make a declaration so that he would be saved the bother of writing to Ottawa for an export permit.

Mr. ABBOTT: He does not have to; it is done by the customs officers when he fills out the declaration.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, it is.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Whether it is or not, he would have the right to do it by this amendment. Does the minister say he has the right now?

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall answer in a minute.

Mr. IRVINE: I wish my hon. friend would also tell us what the amendment is, because he is the only hon. member whose voice we can hear over here.

Mr. ABBOTT: Would it help if I made a brief statement?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am sorry if the hon. members did not hear the amendment proposed by my colleague. It reads as follows:

That section 25 be amended by adding a further clause, to be numbered 3, as follows:

"Nothing herein contained shall require a bona fide farmer or fisherman to secure a permit under this act to export the products of his own farm or his catch up to the value of $100 every month, providing that an export entry is made by such exporter to the appropriate customs officer at the port of entry."

That is exactly what is proposed. The situation as set forth by the hon. member, which prevails along the borderline in the towns of the maritimes, prevails all across Canada. I happen to be resident of a community close to the borderline. I personally know the details of the situation which exists along the boundary line through Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba, and it is a situation which prevails from coast to coast in Canada. As has been pointed out, tourists travelling back and forth to Canada and the United States are allowed, under some reciprocal arrangement, to make a purchase every so often up to the value of $100, provided that they have spent so many days in the country. The minister should give careful consideration to this amendment which would grant that privilege to producers along the boundary lines. In many cases the closest town or community or market is much closer across the border than on the Canadian side where they happen to be living. I do not wish to repeat any of the arguments which have been made before the committee, but I hope that the minister will give serious and favourable consideration to this amendment in the interests of a great many of our citizens.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. HAZEN: I rise to support the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton. The regulations made by the board are continued by this bill. These regulations have been not only a nuisance but a hardship to many farmers and fishermen who live along our international border. The hon. member for Stanstead has referred to the close community which exists between citizens who live on the other side of the border and those in or near his constituency. I would point out that in New Brunswick we have the town of St. Stephen on the New Brunswick side of the river with a large surrounding population, and the town of Calais on the Maine side of the river with a large surrounding population. The fire department of one community goes to the fires in the other community. The two communities use a common graveyard; the two communities celebrate the 24th of May and the 4th of July together.

Mr. IRVINE: Do they vote at the same polls?

Mr. JACKMAN: There are no C.C.F. there.

Mr. HAZEN: I referred to the hardships which have existed under these regulations. I wish to give one or two instances of them, and I can furnish the names if the minister wants them. Take the case of a farmer taking ten dozen eggs across the border. He declares these eggs to the United States customs and pays whatever duty there is on them. At the particular place where he declares these eggs to the customs authority there is no Canadian customs official. In more than one instance, as a result of not obtaining a permit before taking these few eggs to the United States, he has been summoned before a magistrate and fined $100. If the minister wishes the names I can furnish them. I have the name of the man who was fined in this instance, and I shall give another instance.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think we should have these names.

Mr. HAZEN: One is a man by the name of Burt, who lives in Centreville, New Brunswick. Another is a man by the name of Hartley, who lives in Centreville, New Brunswick.

Mr. CLEAVER: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. CLEAVER: Will the hon. member tell the committee why he did not bring this com-required to secure from the export permit branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the permit which one has to obtain under this section.

Mr. HACKETT: What is the point of order?

Mr. LESAGE: I submit that the amendment is out of order, and so have been the speeches delivered by the two hon. members. I believe the hon. members are confusing export permits that must be obtained from the export permit branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce and permits under this section.

Mr. HACKETT: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. May I ask that the hon. member be requested to state his point of order instead of attempting to make a speech in the middle of mine.

Mr. LESAGE: I am stating the point of order. I say that the two hon. members are not speaking about permits that have to be obtained under section 25, but about those that have to be obtained from the export branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce and, therefore, are out of order.

Mr. HACKETT: I merely point out to you, Mr. Chairman, that no person shall, except in accordance with a permit, export any property from Canada, and I submit that that includes fish and the farm produce of which I am speaking. I know that, whatever be the lot of this amendment, it will have the friendliest consideration of some gentlemen opposite because they know the conditions whereof I speak.

There is one other point I should like to bring to the attention of hon. members opposite. By these unnecessary enactments, by these restrictive and highly irritating bits of legislation, without point or purpose we are making of our people a nation of lawbreakers. We are belittling the majesty of the law, we are sapping its status and its value and undermining its dignity. We are dragging it in the dust by this pettifogging type of interference with ordinary liberty and everyday business.

Mr. JACKMAN: Hear, hear.

Mr. HACKETT: My hon. friends are fully aware that along the border there are opportunities for our farmers and, I suppose, for our fishermen to get substantial prices for produce. I fear that if they cannot get them in the ordinary way in which they have got them in the past they will seek to get them illegally, and that is a result which is greatly to be deplored. In the past ours has been a law-respecting population, a God-fearing people. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that by restricting the people without purpose, by restraining them to no end other than aggravation, the law loses its majesty and the people their reverence for it. I ask the minister to consider the amendment carefully.

Mr. IRVINE: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question before he resumes his seat?

Mr. HACKETT: Yes.

Mr. IRVINE: Perhaps I had better put it as straight as I can so as not to take time. I should like to know if there is any difference in principle between the so-called pettifogging restriction which my hon. friend referred to in respect of section 25 of the bill, and the restrictions which a man would exercise if he were to buy a box of cigars in New York, a pair of silk stockings in Philadelphia and a couple of new tires for his car in the days of the tariff and tried to cross this mutual border about which my hon. friend has been talking? I do not remember my hon. friend ever using that argument when he was supporting the tariff policy of Canada.

Mr. HACKETT: I shall be glad to answer that. I am speaking for the farmers of a farming community who are merely seeking the right to exercise a prerogative which has been theirs for generations. These markets in adjacent towns or in the other part of the same community have always been open to them; it was only when the restrictions of the foreign exchange control board were put on as war measures—I am not talking now of customs duties; they have to be paid—that their position was made impossible. I am talking of getting the permit which takes so much time and discourages the people from seeking the ordinary outlet for their produce in a local market.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): In supporting the amendment of my colleague the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, may I first of all add to the answer given to the hon. member for Cariboo. As I understand the situation, there is at the present time a reciprocal arrangement whereby tourists crossing the border, after having spent so many days in either country, can purchase $100 worth of goods, including the goods which my hon. friend mentioned. By comparison, that is all we are asking for in this measure.

Mr. ABBOTT: They have to make a declaration.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is true.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is all that there is in this section. It is a form combined with the customs form.

In my constituency the nearest market of a great many farmers is over in the state of Maine, a mile or two from where their farms are located; the Canadian market is probably ten to fifteen miles away from that point. Before the war and prior to the regulations brought down by order in council, these farmers always hauled some of their produce, when they could sell it at a higher price, over the border to the nearest market, and brought their money back into Canada and spent it to suit themselves. This section forces them to send two dollars to Ottawa to the export permit board to obtain a permit to export these goods. Therefore, to help these farmers who live near the border, I am going to move an amendment to section 25.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Acting Minister of Finance): There is no fee on the export permits. I think my hon. friend is confusing these permits with the permits of the export permit board.

Mr. HATFIELD: I move, seconded by the hon. member for Souris:

That section 25 be amended by adding a further clause, to be numbered 3, as follows:

"Nothing herein contained shall require a bona fide farmer or fisherman to secure a permit under this act to export the products of his own farm or his catch up to the value of $100 every month, providing that an export entry is made by such exporter to the appropriate customs officer at the port of entry."

Formerly that was all they had to do, these persons who live near the border, before the regulations came into effect. They put up with these regulations during the war because they thought there should be some regulations to help the war effort, but it works a hardship. Men have been refused export permits a great many times. Growers of strawberries throughout Canada, and specifically in Ontario and British Columbia, have been refused permits to export their strawberries to the United States market and forced to sell them to the British food ministry at a very low price, packed in SO2, and these strawberries were shipped to jam manufacturers in Great Britain. You can go into any grocery store in New York or other United States cities and buy these strawberries, converted into jam, to-day, although the farmer who grew them was not allowed an export permit to export.

Mr. HACKETT: I was very much pleased, in talking the matter over with the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, to promise him my support. I told him that he would find on the front benches opposite at least some members who are familiar with life on the border and who would probably lend a sympathetic ear to his suggestion.

Hon. members who are not acquainted with border life do not appreciate the extent to which these regulations have wrought a hardship on border populations. Villages have grown into communities and the communities have stretched across the border. For instance, in my own constituency there is Stanhope and across the border in Vermont is Norton Mills. They form but one community. The acting minister knows well the geographical location of Beebe, Vermont, and Beebe, Quebec. The post offices were in the same building, the Canadian postmaster was for many years a faithful servant of the United States postmaster. He sold postage stamps for two countries as he dodged from wicket to wicket. He was a very useful member of the community. Stanstead and Rock Island, Quebec, and Derby Line, Vermont, constitute but one community. There was no duplication of service. There was one undertaker and there were churches on either side of the line, which people frequented according to their denominational preference. The butcher lived in one country, the candlestick maker in the other. The theatre was in both, straddling the line.

These regulations to which people submitted throughout the war, have created tremendous dissatisfaction and genuine difficulties. The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton is not seeking to undermine or defeat the main purpose of the act. He is asking the minister if bona fide farmers and bona fide fishermen may not have access to the markets that they have always known and supplied. It may be true that the actual monetary outlay to obtain a permit is not great, but there is interminable loss of time, and that something which every man hates and detests; going into an office where he is confronted by gentlemen who, though courteous enough, bring home to him the fact that he may not be able to read, or to write, the fact that he is not fully informed as to the date of his birth or the date of his marriage, or has not at his tongue's tip some of the minutiae of information which he is required to supply to get a permit to take a dozen eggs to the old lady just across the way, whom he has known and to whom he has sold eggs for probably twenty years.

These are matters of small importance, so small that they are unnecessary. These regulations spring, I dare say, from a desire to serve the country, but they are dictated by people who are not familiar with local conditions.

Mr. LESAGE: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I wonder if the two hon. members who have been addressing the committee are not confusing the export permit that one is headlines these words: "Corps to be a civil defence organization"? There it is right in the order in council and in the regulations that were put out at that time. How can anyone, in the face of that, say that there was double-crossing?

Mr. GREEN: What date was that?

Mr. TUCKER: The date of the regulations approved by order in council was March 3, 1942. There cannot be any doubt at all in the face of that.

Bill reported.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in moving, with the consent of the house, the third reading of the bill, may I be permitted, as a minister of the crown, to say that this is the conclusion of the work of that painstaking, industrious, excellent and devoted committee on veterans affairs, and to extend to the committee on behalf of this house our thanks for the wonderful work they have done. Long after we have left this arena, the work that they have done for their comrades in Canada will be remembered by the veterans of Canada, those who survived, as long as they do survive, and it will be remembered, too, with deep gratitude by the nation at large. It is not surprising in the slightest degree that we had our contentions, controversies and disputations, but I think the measure of cooperation which the committee achieved was an example for all time to the parliament and people of Canada and will be an abiding inspiration to our comrades across the broad acres of the nine provinces of Canada.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift-Current): I am not quite satisfied yet. I appreciate, as I know all members of the committee do, the very fine words of the minister, and we are glad that the work we tried to do was recognized, but in our opinion that work has not been completed in the bill in its present form. The parliamentary assistant made quite a case a few minutes ago by holding up a pamphlet or some other document which stated that this civilian corps of fire fighters was in actual fact, by the order in council, a civilian corps. That could have been corrected. If I remember correctly we had to take action in the committee to bring the W.R.N.S. under the operation of the bill because of a technical error somewhere in the preparation of the order in council. Because of that, and because I believe this action is necessary, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright):

That this bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with instructions that they have power to reconsider the position of these fire fighters.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I rise to a point of order. The only possible implication of the amendment, Mr. Speaker, would be that the bill would be referred back to the committee of the whole in order to reconsider the position of the fire fighters, which would mean the imposition of greater taxes upon the people. I therefore suggest that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. IRVINE: On the point of order, surely it is not infringing the rule to ask the committee to consider this. It is not a specific motion which would involve an increase of public expenditure; it is asking that the matter be referred back for reconsideration.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall have to put that amendment aside, and refuse it, since it is out of order.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. LENNARD: On division.

Mr. IRVINE: We should like to know very much, Mr. Speaker, how you decided the point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have told the hon. member that this amendment was out of order, and then I put the question.

Mr. IRVINE: On what grounds, sir?

Mr. SPEAKER: And I put the question to the house "that the bill be now read the third time", and the house adopted the motion.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL

STATUTORY AUTHORITY FOR ORDERS IN COUNCIL PASSED UNDER WAR MEASURES ACT

The house resumed from Wednesday, August 7, consideration in committee of bill No. 195, respecting the control of the acquisition and disposition of foreign currency and the control of transactions involving foreign currency or non-residents—Mr. Abbott—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee was last sitting it was considering section No. 25—Property.

Mr. HATFIELD: I should like to point out to the minister that this will impose hardship on thousands of farmers and other citizens of this country living near the Canadian border.

channel daily, but our chance never came, and it was with keen disappointment and regret that our overseas contingent was finally disbanded before we could go farther and do more.

I simply wished to put that on the record.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I trust that the hon. members in the rooting section we have over in this corner will endeavour to be more fair. It may be necessary to put on Hansard the names of hon. members who make themselves obnoxious. I may tell the hon. members that I think they have disrupted enough the debates in this house on many occasions. They have been here long enough to learn how to behave in parliament, and I think it is time they began to do as they ought to do.

The CHAIRMAN: There are so many interruptions that it is impossible for me to hear the hon. member for Lethbridge. He has the floor.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I feel that the government is trying almost frantically to make a distinction without a difference in the case of the fire fighters. It is argued, for example, that they did not wear the king's uniform. I do not think it ever entered the heads of any of the fire fighters that they were not wearing the king's uniform when they donned the uniform of the fire fighting corps for service in Britain. Certainly they were in uniform. It was said that they were not wearing khaki. Neither were the men of the naval forces wearing khaki nor the men of the air force. I think the longer this discussion goes forward, the more complicated the position the government is in becomes and the more completely untenable. It is argued that General LaFleche did not speak with the authority of the government. Let it be borne in mind that General LaFleche was a responsible minister of the crown for a long time.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not at that time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: At one time.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Later on. You are all mixed up.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Did not General LaFleche sit in this house as a responsible minister of the crown?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not then.

Mr. BLACKMORE: But he did sit here as Minister of National War Services.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Afterwards.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is true, but the simple fact remains that all over Canada it was recognized that General LaFleche was a minister of the crown. Could a man in one of the remote parts of Canada be expected to know, when General LaFleche made that promise, whether technically he was a minister of the crown and thereby empowered to make it?

Mr. POULIOT: He was always irresponsible.

Mr. BLACKMORE: All I can say is that when he was a member of this house no one dared rise and tell him that that was the case.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We have had five irresponsible leaders of the opposition in this house within recent years.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I really do not see the connection between that remark and what I am saying. The point I was making was simply this. There was a considerable period of time during which General LaFleche was a responsible member of the government of Canada. He was a member of parliament and a minister of the crown. It must be conceded that he probably was not a minister of the crown when he made the promise to these men, but he certainly had been for so long a member of the government that anybody would be justified in accepting his word as being the word of the government.

The hon. member for Rosthern seemed to make a considerable amount out of the fact that General LaFleche said in 1944 that he was "trying" to get a certain thing done, but all he succeeded in establishing was that the government simply double-crossed General LaFleche. After he had made that promise to the fire fighters the government let him down. That is just about all that the statement of the hon. member for Rosthern amounted to.

Mr. TUCKER: I just wish to place this on the record because statements are being made here about double-crossing that I do not think should appear on the record in justice to parliament and to honest and honourable men.

I want to draw again to the attention of the committee the regulations under which these men entered the service. I have sat here and listened to a great deal and I propose to set the record straight. Here are the regulations, and on page 6 in black headlines is set out the intention of the government beyond peradventure or doubt. It says in black headlines: "Corps to be a civil defence organization". How can anybody say that there was double-crossing when right in the order in council and in the pamphlet placed in the hands of these men there appeared in black

My main purpose in rising is to draw attention to the fact that we seem to be getting this bill out of perspective. Even if I were opposed to this bill as some hon. members are I would not further delay the debate. I would try to keep in mind the legislation which this house has passed in the last couple of days. I would keep in mind the record of the government in accepting the recommendations of the committee. I think, that situation being as it is, this government or any government—if in point of fact an injustice is being done by this legislation—will find that the remedy lies at the hands of members of this house and changes will be made. Those of us who are not happy about this legislation are obviously not going to get any farther at the moment. We might just as well accept it, accept what we have got which is considerably more than we were offered at the beginning.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We have had a very fine debate representing the various viewpoints of the house. I think this committee is entirely in support of what is in the bill, but some hon. members would like to have some additional clauses. I wonder if I could not appeal to the committee to get ahead with what we have. This is the declared policy of the government and I think, in the interests of the fire fighters themselves, we should get along and finish this job.

Mr. IRVINE: There is much good sense in what the minister has said, and the reason we on this side did not oppose the bill on second reading was because of what he has just stated.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Will my hon. friend pardon me for interrupting him? The War Service Grants Act and the Veterans Rehabilitation Act which affect 1,115,000 Canadians passed this house in thirty minutes this afternoon, and we have already spent nearly two hours in discussing the problems of 400 fire fighters.

Mr. IRVINE: I appreciate that. I will tell the minister that I have not taken one minute of that time and I shall not take any more than one minute now. All of us were not members of the veterans committee and we are not acquainted with the details of this and other legislation. A distinction has been made between the fire fighters as a civilian group and the army as such, and on the face of it that seems reasonable. I should like to ask what the fire fighters were paid. Were they paid on the basis of the rates paid to soldiers or on the basis of civilian rates?

Mr. MACKENZIE: On the basis of the rates paid to soldiers.

Mr. IRVINE: If they were paid on the basis of the rates paid to soldiers, then I think the distinction was not made in time. The distinction cannot be made now when they were enlisted as soldiers.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No; as civilian fire fighters.

Mr. IRVINE: I understand what the minister's objection is, but I am trying to get over my viewpoint. While they are called a civilian group, in reality they were nothing of the sort. They were enlisted on the same basis as soldiers; they were paid the same rates and they should receive the same consideration in every detail as is given to all the rest.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They were not enlisted or attested as members of the fighting services.

Mr. LENNARD: Replying to what the parliamentary assistant had to say in connection with my quotation of what Major General LaFleche said in 1944, I would point out that he was merely qualifying his promise to the fire fighters in 1942. It was stated a few moments ago that heat and pressure or a sort of high-powered bombardment had been exerted in connection with the fire fighters. I want to assure every hon. member that at no time was any heat or pressure put upon me in connection with my stand with reference to the Canadian fire fighters. I did what I did because I conscientiously thought they deserved these rights.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think everyone who knows the hon. gentleman will agree with every single word he has said.

Mr. KNIGHT: A great deal has been said to-night by hon. gentlemen on the other side about the dissimilarity of these men and the ordinary enlisted soldier. I rose once to reply to a statement made by the parliamentary assistant and I should apologize to you, Mr. Chairman, and to the committee for rising out of turn. You will have to put it down to my enthusiasm for the cause. The parliamentary assistant said that these men in their civilian jobs were not liable to go overseas, I mean from Great Britain to the continent, to take part in the fighting. While that is strictly true, I should like to place on the record the statement of these men about what happened when they were in England. This reads:

> We further offered our services anywhere in the world, on any battle front. One hundred men spent four and a half months taking specialized training to go to the continent with the invasion forces. We were attached to the British twenty-first army, with their army personnel as liaison officers. We expected to cross the

Mr. ARCHIBALD: When the government denies the responsibility of a deputy minister, and then on the other hand when it suits its purpose in the case of a man like Gordon when it is a matter of ten cents an hour—

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: —it shows the hardened attitude on the part of the government.

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I can out-speak you.

The CHAIRMAN: I must ask hon. members that when the chairman rises they take their seats. The hon. member for Skeena has stated that he can out-speak any other member, and that may be true—

Mr. MACKENZIE: I challenge him on that.

The CHAIRMAN: —but it is improper for him or any other member of the committee to out-speak the Chairman.

Mr. MUTCH: To-night I am listening to this debate for the fifth time in less than a year. As I listen to it, I am reminded of the fact that we have already passed some eleven bills, ten of which I think deal specifically with the care of those who served in the armed forces. The whole ten of them have not generated as much heat either in committee or in this chamber as has this particular bill—and not just to-night.

I have been one of those who have, as recently as last week, and on various other occasions asserted myself for, and put forth claims on behalf of these fire fighters. But I am also one of those who have held and will continue to hold—and will make no apology for so doing—the view that there ought to be some measure of demarcation between that which is done for a civilian in any branch of the war effort and that done for those who were in the armed forces. In that I made one exception—I made it the other night, and I make it again now—and that is the case of the supervisors, which I shall not discuss now, but mention only to keep the record clear. I held the view then and I do now, that possibly there should be some differentiation between them and the fire fighters. But I am bound to say that I am not one who doubted or now doubts the fact that the fire fighters who left Ottawa to proceed overseas were in their own minds, and with justification, convinced that they had become without uniforms a part of the services.

Further to that, there was one observation made by an hon. member this afternoon—I do not remember which one—where he said that the fire fighters had fought fires in England under the same disciplinary terms as those under which the armed forces were operating. So far as I know, that is the only wholly inaccurate statement made in the discussion this afternoon. I think it has some bearing—in my judgment it has—because I am—

[Mr. Mackenzie.]

Mr. LENNARD: On a point of order, I was the only one who spoke this afternoon with respect to fire fighters, and I never said that.

Mr. MUTCH: I would have been surprised if the hon. member were in error, because he showed great restraint. However, it may have been this evening. I know the statement was made, and it is inaccurate.

As a member of the House of Commons, I am not completely happy—indeed I am not happy at all—about the situation which has arisen with respect to the fire fighters. I will be perfectly frank about it and say this, that, had it not been for the fact—to me it is a fact—that commitments were made—whether they were made with or without authority is beside the point at the present time, because they were not refuted by anybody who was in authority—I would not have urged in the committee, as I am prepared to urge here now that further consideration be given to those claims. But I am not prepared to go the whole way with this or any other group which is really a civilian organization. To my mind, there must be some point of discrimination between the volunteer military services and those who served, no matter how meritoriously, in any other branch of the war effort.

I do not intend to interject anything into this debate which will precipitate another discussion, but I am thinking of men who were test pilots and were never out of this country but who were engaged in an exceedingly dangerous occupation. I am thinking of those who worked on the ammunition dumps on our sea coasts and in the artillery camps. I was not much moved by the picture of a chap sitting on a ship loaded with bombs. People have been blown up in dumps and by explosions in our artillery camps. It seems to me too bad that this kind of emotionalism has crept into the debate. I would not suggest that the heat that has been engendered in debate is due to the name of the organization. I am inclined to think it grows out of the commitments made by certain members and perhaps by certain groups in the house before all the facts were fully before them.

Mr. TUCKER: May 8, 1946. It states:

Following for the Hon. Ian A. Mackenzie, begins:

Your telegram No. 72 of May 7. When fire fighters volunteered they faced risks as great as any, although they would be unarmed.

That was the attitude of General LaFleche.

Through official channels I did everything possible to assure them pay, pensions and other benefits, identical with those for members of the armed forces—

This is his attitude. Nobody denies it. He wanted to get these things for them.

—but could never, and did not, pledge. Chester Payne and Walter Wood know and file will show, as I dealt with my deputy minister, departmental officials and then with my colleagues. I believe any remaining discrepancies are worthy of your further consideration. Ends.

That is the attitude of General LaFleche when he was fighting for these people to get these things, so that they should have them. But he did not pretend that he had authority to promise them. That is the cable from General LaFleche, and it is accepted by the government as correct. It should be realized—

Mr. COCKERAM: On a point of order—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Order.

Mr. COCKERAM: I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: Order; if the hon. member has a point of order he should state it.

Mr. COCKERAM: The parliamentary assistant has placed a cable from General LaFleche upon the table. I wonder if he would place on the table the telegram which he sent.

The CHAIRMAN: Order; that is not a point of order. Rather, it is a question which the hon. member could ask the parliamentary assistant.

Mr. TUCKER: I have no objection to placing on the table our cable. This is what it says:

Following for Major-General Lafleche from Ian A. Mackenzie, Begins:

Thirty fire fighters filed affidavit you pledged full treatment same as members forces. Claim rehabilitation legislation limited benefits to overseas is breach faith. Your confidential comment desired. Ends.

I have already placed on Hansard the cable from General LaFleche. Anybody who has anything to say about—

Mr. MACKENZIE: You have the whole story of that.

Mr. TUCKER: Anybody who has had anything to do with this sort of thing—any lawyer in the house—will know that you cannot go very far on the recollection four years later of a speech, when nobody made any notes of it. What was said in this house has been by affidavit, identical affidavits taken by these various members of the fire fighters. Everyone of them is identical. In other words, one has said, "This is my recollection", and the others all concur in it. The very fact that they are identical shows that it is based upon discussion between them, and they say now that that is their recollection.

Mr. GREEN: You think the affidavits are untrue?

Mr. TUCKER: The statement made by the hon. member for Wentworth, that General LaFleche at the very time that he was trying to do these things thought they should have them, showed why these people might possibly have that opinion now. That is borne out by what he says now in this cable. He thought they should have it, and he tried to get it. He was a deputy minister, and he had no right to pledge the government. Is it to be said by members of this house that if a deputy minister without any authority from a government goes out and makes that sort of statement, the government is bound then to carry it out? Is that responsible government? Is that what members of this house say?

Mr. POULIOT: What about Chisholm?

Mr. TUCKER: Somebody has said that these people enlisted upon the face of this so-called promise. My understanding of this matter is that these people were already signed up. They came to Ottawa to be looked over, reviewed, congratulated and talked to. They were already in the forces before General LaFleche made this alleged statement to them. So that any suggestion made that they were lured into the service—

Mr. PEARKES: Would the hon. member permit a question? Did he not say, or did not General LaFleche say he was using every influence to try to get the men to join?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not to join, no.

Mr. PEARKES: Is that not the inference?

Mr. POULIOT: He was talking through his hat. He had no power of attorney.

Mr. TUCKER: I will read it again. This is what he says:

Through official channels I did everything possible to assure them pay, pensions and other benefits identical with those for members of the armed forces but could never, and did not, pledge.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The words are "could never, and did not, pledge".

adian fire fighters with reference to causes of death and pensionable disability which the fire fighters experienced. There are thirty-three members of the corps in receipt of disability pension.

Mr. GREEN: Out of how many?

Mr. TUCKER: Out of 405. One of them only sustained injuries as a result of enemy action; one out of 405. There were three deaths, of which one was due to enemy action. Therefore, out of the 405 fire fighters there were two cases of death or disability due to enemy action. I thought the committee would like to have these figures.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. LENNARD: I was ruled out of order a few moments ago on a question of privilege. I just wish again to draw the attention of the committee to the statement made by Major General LaFleche on April 24, 1944, as reported at page 2323 of Hansard. This is what he said:

I think I can save a great deal of time and speak as forcibly as anyone can and cover the entire ground when I say that my department is trying at this moment to make certain that members of the fire-fighters corps receive benefits identical with those granted to men who are discharged from the armed forces.

When the parliamentary assistant says that Major General LaFleche declared definitely that he did not make that statement I challenge him to state when and where he made it.

Mr. TUCKER: The very statement read by the hon. member contradicts what he has just said. In the statement he just read General LaFleche said, my department is trying to get these things done.

Mr. LENNARD: That was two years after.

Mr. TUCKER: Trying to get it done.

Mr. GRAYDON: What was stopping him?

Mr. TUCKER: The decision of the government. Our department has recommended that various things should be done and the government has not accepted it. We have tried to get certain things done, but because we say we tried to get them done it does not mean that the government has to do them. The very statement indicates that that was the attitude of General LaFleche; that he would like to have these these things done. The statement itself is an admission that he did not say that they would be done, or he would not have made that statement.

Mr. LENNARD: No, he would not.

Mr. TUCKER: I submit that is it. If I may I should like to read a statement in regard to a matter referred to by Mr. Winston Churchill.

Mr. LENNARD: Has the parliamentary assistant the statement?

Mr. TUCKER: The statement I should like to read is as follows:

Mr. Winston Churchill is quoted in the London Times of March 14, 1945, as stating that war gratuities would be paid to firemen on the same general principle but at three-fourths the rate that is payable to the armed forces, namely seven shillings and sixpence for each completed month of service. In referring to other groups who had contributed to the war, he stated that excluding them would cause disappointment, but that it was impossible to extend the concessions further without opening the door to an unending succession of new claims.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We pay them $15 a month for every thirty days of service.

Mr. TUCKER: I have already laid before the committee what we have done with regard to these people who served in civilian services. They were serving alongside of people in the civilian fire fighters corps of the United Kingdom doing their ordinary civilian work.

Mr. LENNARD: That is no comparison.

Mr. TUCKER: They were serving alongside of other A.R.P. workers, serving alongside other people whose duties kept them in London during the blitz. There were the merchant seamen who had to go into Archangel, who had to undergo all the dangers and difficulties of being torpedoed in those northern seas.

Mr. LENNARD: What has that to do with it?

Mr. TUCKER: There are all these various grades of civilian service. All I say is this, that it was felt by the government that when they went as far as they have gone in regard to this particular civilian group they had gone so far that, if they went a little farther, they would be admitting that this particular civilian group was entitled to practically the same rights as if they were in the armed services.

I have here the telegram from the Canadian ambassador to Greece, which sets out what he has to say about this matter. When so much has been said, and I have been challenged to put it on the record, I will now do so.

Mr. GREEN: What date?

Mr. TUCKER: We asked him to state actually what had happened.

Mr. GREEN: What date?

kenzie) to see that they would get a square deal. I shall have to take back that message and modify it a little bit when I go back. The fact is that a veterans affairs committee was set up and, since all of us could not be on that committee, we put our trust in the capabilities of those who were appointed members of the committee. I think it is generally recognized that the members of the committee did a good job. On two different occasions the committee voted on the question whether these fire fighters were to be given the same benefits as the soldiers, and on both occasions the contention on behalf of these men was upheld and the committee passed it. But when it comes to the government they just disregard the committee's proposals entirely. They set aside its recommendation, notwithstanding that we as members of the house put our faith and reliance in the government to see that the returned fire fighters should get a fair deal.

It seems a queer state of affairs that we should set up a committee of the house to investigate thoroughly all these problems; and, when they take evidence from all parts of the country, when witnesses are brought in from every section, and when the committee in their considered judgment, arrived at on two occasions, declare that these benefits should be extended to these men, the government takes it upon its own responsibility to disregard these recommendations. I fear that the country will not take this too well. Further than that, I wish to join with those who protested on the grounds that General LaFleche made this promise. As the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) said a moment ago, no matter how the government may endeavour to use it as an excuse to get out, the fact remains that when General LaFleche was deputy minister he made the promise in order to get the fire fighters to enlist. Therefore they were bribed into enlisting under the pressure of something which they believed would be given. It cannot be considered in any other light than a deception on these men who put their faith in a government official of no less standing than a deputy minister. The Minister of Veterans Affairs excuses the government by saying, "Oh, well, we cannot be responsible for that." If that be true, then it was the duty of the government to dissociate themselves entirely from the remarks made by the deputy minister; otherwise the men who joined the corps were justified in taking the remark as being true, more particularly when they were going on a mission of life and death.

It would not have been difficult for the government to dissociate themselves from the remark when they knew well that they had no intention of putting the promise into effect. It is not good enough for them to say now that it was given by an inferior member of the civil service. When the parliamentary assistant tries to imply that the fire fighters were not in as great danger as some of the others in the armed services he is belittling the work that these men did.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He never said that.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Yes, he did; he said they were not in as great danger as some of those in the front line. When these men went over there they were fighting fires under attack. They could not run to shelter; they were not a voluntary service in that respect. They had to stay there and face the music with no possible chance of escape. One hon. member said that they were guarding ships full of ammunition. That should not be taken too lightly at this time. In my opinion it is a disgrace to men who conducted themselves so valiantly overseas, who were promised these considerations, who were called the fourth arm of the service and who were given the definite assurance by the deputy minister that they would be given all the consideration of those in the armed services. It is not right for the government to back down now in the face of the fact that on two occasions the committee made this recommendation and that it was carried by a majority vote of the committee. Having regard to that fact, the government should withdraw this bill and reconsider it.

Mr. RODNEY ADAMSON (York West): I spoke on this matter at some length when the budget resolutions were before the committee, and I do not propose to take up the time of the house at length at this time. I merely wish to add my protest against the discrimination which has been shown to these men who were definitely promised that they would be given this consideration. Everything I said on that occasion still stands. As a member of the veterans affairs committee which, as has been said here to-night, asked for, and in fact voted that these men be given this consideration, I wish to protest against the lack of generosity in the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. TUCKER: There is just one set of figures which I am sure the committee would like to have in regard to the corps of Can-

Mr. TUCKER: I am speaking to a point of order. The point is this. It is said that this commitment was made by General LaFleche. General LaFleche denies that he made that commitment; others say that he did.

Mr. IRVINE: That is not a point of order.

Mr. TUCKER: My point is this. It is alleged that General LaFleche made that statement. General LaFleche denies that he did, and no member has the right to say that he did make it and then proceed to argue that there is a breach of faith.

Mr. LENNARD: When did Major General LaFleche say that he denied making that statement?

Mr. IRVINE: That is not a point of order either.

Mr. LENNARD: That is only on the word of somebody else.

Mr. BENTLEY: When the hon. gentleman who rose to the point of order can produce in this house a statement signed by General LaFleche denying it, and when the hon. gentleman can lay that statement alongside the one which all of us on the veterans affairs committee have, signed by thirty members of the fire fighters organization, in a letter committing themselves to get all the fire fighters living in Canada to sign that statement that General LaFleche did make the statement in question, then I will begin to doubt that General LaFleche said it. But until I see that signed statement by that gentleman to offset the statement we have, I must still believe that he made the statement in question, regardless of the denials coming from the parliamentary assistant to-night or at any other time.

Mr. KNIGHT: Mr. Speaker, in justice to the parliamentary assistant and certainly in justice to the fire fighters, it should be pointed out—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Order. Did not the hon. member speak before?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has already spoken.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, it is really quite astonishing to me to see the government bring in such a bill.

Mr. GRANT: Are you a fire fighter? You are a fire eater.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am a member of the House of Commons. Perhaps that it enough. As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, I am surprised to see a measure of this sort brought in. I had always supposed that we granted rewards to our armed service personnel for certain considerations such as: that they had rendered service; that they had risked danger; that there had been disruption in their lives, with resultant financial and economic loss; that they had shown a willingness to place themselves at the complete disposal of the government, and so forth. In the case of these fire fighters, we find that these men have rendered excellent service. No one doubts that. They risked great dangers, loss of life and limb; their lives were disrupted, with resultant economic and financial loss. I know farmers who were in the fire-fighters corps who, in order to serve their country, disposed of their farms only to come back finding themselves with no farm. How were they to tell when they enlisted how long they would be called upon to serve? Finally, they had a willingness to go wherever they were told to go by the government of the country.

Under those circumstances, surely they have qualified for treatment similar to that which we accord to our fighting men. How can discrimination against them such as is contemplated in this bill be justified? It has been argued that General LaFleche, when he made the promise to these men, was only a civil servant. I see no disposition on the part of the government of Canada to treat lightly the pronouncements of Donald Gordon, who is also a servant of the government. His pronouncements seem to be surrounded by an air of sanctity.

It seems to me that the government has no defence for the position it has taken up in this bill, and, if this house is to reflect upon Canada that honour which it should reflect upon the country on this occasion, I believe it should ask the minister to withdraw the bill and reconstruct it in such a way as to give the men of this splendid corps treatment such as they have richly deserved.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I would be remiss in my duty if I did not add my protest to the passing of this bill now. Over a year ago, before the veterans affairs committee was set up, I had the pleasure of interviewing a number of fire fighters, and particularly the fire fighters of Calgary and that district, who came to me in regard to their case. I pointed out to them on that occasion that I felt certain a committee of the house would be set up to deal with the matter and, rather foolishly I think, judging by the way matters have turned out, I told them that I put a great deal of confidence in the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mac-

Sir Aylmer . . . spoke glowingly of the work of the Canadian fire-fighter corps, "which fitted in awfully well, worked hard, did any job under the highest pressure and usually in the most dangerous spot.

Actually there were members of this corps killed and other members wounded in Great Britain. When the raids were on they had to be out on the streets. Evidence to that effect was given before the special committee on veterans affairs; and, as other members of the house have pointed out to-night, the veterans affairs committee recommended that these overseas fire fighters be accorded all benefits, pensions, rehabilitation rights and income tax exemption accorded to members of the armed forces. We had the question up the other day when considering income tax, and the Department of Finance have now agreed to treat these men in the same way as the auxiliary supervisors, those men sent over by the Canadian Legion, Y.M.C.A., Knights of Columbus and the Salvation Army; the firemen are now to get exemption for one-fifth of their income. Further, this very government last fall brought in a bill giving the men of the auxiliary services and the fire fighters exactly the same allowances. I have here the draft bill then submitted to the committee on veterans affairs, and it treats these two groups in exactly the same way. But this year it is different. The house this afternoon passed bill No. 325, which gives the supervisors of the auxiliary services all the rights of men in the forces with the exception of income tax exemption, but the bill for the fire fighters leaves out quite a few of these rights. In other words, the two groups are now being treated in a different way. I suggest to that house that that is not right, but that the fire fighters' bill should be in the same terms as the bill for the supervisors which was passed this afternoon; and I would urge the minister, even at this late date, to comply with the recommendations made by the veterans affairs committee and treat these firemen just as though they had been members of the armed forces.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I can only speak with the unanimous consent of the house, because I formally moved the resolution. If I have that consent I should like to say a word.

Mr. GREEN: The minister can close the debate.

Mr. POULIOT: I hope that the minister will speak. We all like to hear him.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): I feel I must make a protest against this bill, on the same grounds as have been made before. The parliamentary assistant has pointed out that these people were civilians, that they were issued a pamphlet, more or less a bill of fare of what they could expect. All of this may be very true. He says also that there are other types of civilian workers in the war who may claim equal treatment with the civilian corps of fire fighters. I shall not debate that question now. But I protest against this bill and support the other members who have demanded that the fire fighters be included in all the benefits, because of the statement of General LaFleche. The parliamentary assistant said that the government cannot be responsible for what an officer of the government says. I am the last one, probably, in this house who would say very much in favour of private enterprise; but I cannot believe that one could find a company in Canada, no matter what other faults it might possess, which would repudiate a statement to any of its customers or anyone with whom it dealt that had been made by one of its highest officers.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He was not a government officer. He was a servant of the crown under the government.

Mr. BENTLEY: You can use that term or any word you like. My statement was that if any reputable company in Canada had a servant or an officer, call him by whatever name you like, who was responsible to that company, and who made a commitment on behalf of the company, that commitment would be honoured, no matter how severely that officer or servant might be dealt with for having made an error. This promise was made to these men.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not by a minister of the crown.

Mr. BENTLEY: By an officer of the crown.

Mr. MACKENZIE: By an officer not charged with ministerial responsibility.

Mr. BENTLEY: I have the floor. I think I have made my position clear, Mr. Speaker, but if I have not I will do so again. I said that a reputable company would not do that.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Neither would a reputable government.

Mr. BENTLEY: One hon. gentleman says, "neither would a reputable government." Well, we are not debating that.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am glad my hon. friend is standing for reputable companies.

Mr. BENTLEY: The point is that no reputable company would repudiate a commitment made by a responsible individual in their employ.

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—to fight wherever he was sent and the man who went into the service of his country in a restricted way. If you give to civilians exactly the same consideration as you give to those in the armed services who placed their lives at the disposal of their country without any restriction whatever, then those who did that might have some cause to think: Well, after all, there should be a little extra consideration given to the men who volunteered and placed themselves entirely at the disposal of their country. So that it was not a question at all of not recognizing the splendid work that these men had done, but it was felt that those who went into the armed services should get a little extra consideration because in volunteering and enlisting they placed themselves entirely at the disposal of their country.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The minister said that these fire fighters went over for the civilian service. I wonder if he, as a fire fighter sitting on a ship loaded with munitions in a harbour in Great Britain, would think he was doing civilian work when at any moment he might be blown to hell and back again by one German torpedo or bomb. And they did that; do not let us have any doubt; they did it in Great Britain.

Mr. TUCKER: Merchant seamen did it right along. People working in munitions factories were working in very dangerous places. So were most of the people in Great Britain who were working in war factories.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Certainly.

Mr. TUCKER: Then why pretend that these people were so different from thousands and thousands of other civilians?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Because they sat on munitions ships to protect them from fire.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They did nothing of the kind.

Mr. GREEN: How many speeches is the parliamentary assistant going to make?

Mr. TUCKER: Do you object? I am giving the facts.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Let him go on. It gets worse all the time.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): The parliamentary assistant has based his argument on the order in council which was passed in 1942, and which, he says, sets out the conditions that were to apply to these firemen. That order in council does not mean a thing, because it was passed after these men, or certainly after a great majority of them, had been recruited, and neither the parliamentary assistant nor anyone else can properly contend that the men knew they were being recruited subject to those terms. He has made light of the promises given by Major General LaFleche, who at that time was deputy minister of national war services and was in charge of raising this corps of fire fighters. I have an affidavit here, sworn on August 3 in Windsor by Lester Barron, Robert Ferguson, Joseph Shilliday, Douglas Copeman, George T. Monk, Neil Brillinger, George Glabb and Donald Berneche, firemen, all of the city of Windsor in the county of Essex, and John Thornton, captain, fire department, Hedley G. Coates, deputy fire chief, and James Emmett Byrne, captain fire department, all of the city of Windsor. These men make oath and say:

1. That we were all members of the corps of Canadian fire fighters.

2. That we were present in Ottawa and were addressed by Major General L. R. Lafleche (then deputy minister for national war services) prior to our departure for service overseas.

3. That at the times referred to in paragraph 2 Major General Lafleche, in substance, assured us that we would be looked after in the same manner as the armed forces; that our families would receive the same protection and benefit granted to families of persons in the army and that we were to be known as the fourth arm of the services.

That affidavit was sworn five days ago before J. P. Holden, a commissioner for Ontario.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We have all seen that.

Mr. GREEN: Surely the government is not going to "renege" on a promise of that type. This parliament should stand behind the promise made by the deputy minister who was in charge of recruiting these men. Quite apart from what the men did, the government should stand behind that promise. And that is only part of the story. The hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Lennard) told the house this afternoon very clearly what type of work these men had done. Other members have told the same story here to-night. I have here a press dispatch from the Ottawa Citizen of May 24 of this year, reporting a statement by Sir Aylmer Firebrace, C.B.E., R.N. (retired), chief of the British national fire service, at a civic reception and luncheon in his honour at the Chateau Laurier on May 23. The heading of this dispatch is:

Sent Canadians to hottest spots says Sir Aylmer.

And Sir Aylmer had this to say:

Because they wanted action, we sent the Canadian fire fighters to the hottest spots in Britain, Plymouth, Portsmouth, Southampton and Bristol . . .

which I put on record in the committee praising their work most highly. There is no suggestion that their services were not most highly appreciated.

Mr. HARKNESS: On what basis were our troops recruited at the outbreak of the war? Certainly they were not, so far as I know, promised any of these benefits which they now enjoy.

Mr. TUCKER: They were not enlisted as civilians. But the fire fighters were a special corps and the basis on which they were to serve was laid down in this pamphlet. The men who joined the armed services were subject to being sent wherever they were required. They placed themselves at the disposal of the government in every way, shape and form, and there did not have to be a pamphlet like this issued in their case. But the very fact that a pamphlet like this was issued shows that the fire fighters were joining a very special corps to do civilian work.

Mr. QUELCH: Did the government contradict the statement made by General LaFleche at the time it was made?

Mr. TUCKER: I think it was put on our records just what General LaFleche did say.

Mr. QUELCH: It was not contradicted by the government.

Mr. TUCKER: The government's policy in regard to fire fighters is laid down in the order in council, and General LaFleche had no power to alter the order in council. The fire fighters knew their terms of service because they all had a copy of this pamphlet.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Did they know that General LaFleche could not change the order in council?

Mr. TUCKER: May I put upon the record exactly what is being done for the fire fighters? This table shows the benefits extended to them:

	Post-Discharge Benefits Fire Fighters
Clothing allowance	Same as armed services
Transportation on discharge to place of engagement	Same as armed services
Rehabilitation grant	To members who served overseas
Reinstatement in civil employment	Same as armed services
Free transportation to Canada of wife and children	Same as armed services
Pension	Same as armed services
Medical treatment:
(a) conditions related to service	Same as armed services
(b) conditions not related to service	None
Veterans' Insurance	To members who served overseas
Veterans' Land Act	To disability pensioners
Unemployment insurance credit	None
Vocational and technical training	To disability pensioners
University training (including post-graduate)	None
War service gratuity	$15 for each 30 days' service overseas
Reestablishment credit	None
Out-of-work benefit	None
Temporarily incapacitated	None
Awaiting returns	None
Civil service preference	None
War veterans' allowance	None
Decorations	None
Exemptions from income tax	None
Assistance from dependents' board of trustees	None

Mr. BENTLEY: Did I understand the hon. member to include Veterans Land Act?

Mr. TUCKER: To disability pensioners, yes. I do not want to take up the time of the house—

Mr. BLACKMORE: Do not worry about time.

Mr. TUCKER: I am sure that everybody feels that this subject has been debated at considerable length. The fire fighters have deserved a great deal of consideration and that is why we are extending their benefits under this act. It carries the benefits quite a step farther in regard to vocational and technical training and benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act. That is to meet the recommendations of the committee. But it was felt by the government that there should be some distinction drawn between the man who placed himself or was placed by the law entirely at the disposal of the government an O.B.E. for their work on behalf of the services because we have passed eight bills to-day. I want to pay a tribute to what the fire departments have done, not only overseas but here in Canada. According to a return I got in 1944, we had $4,500,000 worth of damage done by fire in our camps while the troops were in training during this war. That is a lot of money and much of that loss was not insured. There was a large fire at Camp Borden, and only for the fortunate fact that the wind was blowing in a certain direction many people might have been killed. The same thing happened in the maritimes.

Some tribute should be paid to the fire departments of the country. During the last two great wars these departments, along with the police and street departments, provided hundreds and hundreds of recruits, many of whom were wounded and many of whom did not return. These recommendations in connection with those who went overseas are most commendable. While I am dealing with this particular question, I might mention that we have a fine fire chief, George Sinclair, who has been on duty for a long time and he was passed over when the decorations were handed out. When we leave this mortal body and take on the immortal body I suppose a few letters after our name will not make much difference. I believe in paying tribute to the men who have worked in our fire departments both in peace and war. I remember that the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when a student at Toronto university, used to cover the fire halls and police court when Colonel Dennison was the magistrate, as a reporter for the Globe and Mail, and he took a great interest in the department at the time of the disastrous fire of 1905 in Toronto in which the father of our able present mayor, R. H. Saunders, K.C., C.B.E., was badly injured.

In adopting this bill, parliament will be paying a tribute long overdue to a fine body of men who by day and by night risk their lives to protect the life and property of the citizens of our country.

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): I am another member of the committee who feels that I cannot let this bill go forward without recording that I also regret its present form. To be brief, may I put on the record that these fire fighters for overseas service were recruited under federal authority and were asked to serve in the United Kingdom, but so far as the men themselves were concerned they were prepared to go anywhere. Had they been asked to serve in Burma, India, the middle east or anywhere else, it would have been the same thing to them. Sixty per cent of these men were trained fire fighters and they were directed into this corps because that was their trade. It may interest the house to know that a brigade of this fire-fighting corps embarked for France on D-day, but through some technicality they were recalled and did not enter France. But they never argued that that was not a part of their voluntary duties. I am sorry indeed that the government has not made good the promises which, if it did not put them in writing, were assumed to be a moral obligation on the part of the government, and I am sorry to see that these fire fighters are being penalized as to income tax, in benefits and even in decorations.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there has been the suggestion that promises were made to the fire fighters when they went into the service. I have here a pamphlet issued by the king's printer in 1942, containing the regulations pertaining to the corps of (civilian) Canadian fire fighters for service in the United Kingdom, as approved by order in council, P.C. No. 76/1656 of 3rd March, 1942. It sets out exactly the terms under which these men were recruited and were supposed to serve. If anyone is interested, I have no doubt that he can get a copy from the king's printer.

The pamphlet also sets out what they were to receive on discharge. We hear a lot about what somebody is supposed to have told them, but this pamphlet sets out in writing what they were told they were to get upon discharge. It will be found at page 17 of this pamphlet, under the heading, "discharge":

> Upon discharge, at the termination of his service or for medical unfitness or other cause, a member shall be provided with a transportation warrant to his home, together with such meal and lodging warrants as may be required. He shall be given a clothing allowance of thirty-five (35) dollars provided he has completed one hundred and eighty-three days of full service with the corps.

There is no suggestion whatsoever there that they were to be on the same basis as the armed services. But it does set down in writing the basis upon which this corps, which is definitely referred to as the (civilian) Canadian fire fighters for service in the United Kingdom, was raised.

In the face of what they were actually promised, I should like to put upon Hansard what is being done for the fire fighters. Incidentally I think we shall all admit that they did a good job. The head of the fire fighters in the United Kingdom wrote a letter ing; we should be getting more than that." They will not be satisfied, and then we shall have trouble. But I shall not be responsible; I shall tell them what occurred in this house, and Hansard will be there as a record to show that I foresaw what was necessarily going to happen.

Mr. R. R. KNIGHT (Saskatoon City): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the veterans affairs committee has seen fit to recommend to the government that increased benefits be provided for this handful of brave men, and I am pleased also that the government has seen fit to follow that recommendation. I have argued previously in this house the case of the fire fighters, taking the attitude that they should receive equal benefits with those men who are commonly called the combatant veterans. Like other hon. members, I attempted to prove, and I think I did with little difficulty, that in some cases their task was equally arduous and dangerous as that of the soldier in the front line. However, I shall not go into that now.

There is one question I should like to ask with reference to section 6. I think this should be asked before we come to the section so that it may be passed at that time. I refer to vocational training. Prior to the war, some of these boys were not, as the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) has said, experienced firemen with technical training. Some of them were attending the universities of this country. I know one student of theology who enlisted. In the expectation that the benefits granted to the fire fighters would be increased, he went back to the university after returning from overseas and he has been there for a year. Perhaps I could have found out this information in another way, but I should like a definition of vocational and technical training benefits referred to in section 6. I should like that defined in terms of university work such as I have described. As I understand it, it would not cover university work; that, as it now stands, it means training a man to work with his hands for the purpose of fitting him to make his own living.

Mr. TUCKER: It does not cover it.

Mr. KNIGHT: All I can say is that I am very much disappointed. I do not see why a young lad at the university should not receive the same benefits. Unfortunately many people think of education as being vocational training only, and I had something to say about that in the budget debate. This man who is taking up theology or a man who is taking up an arts course to become a teacher, should be encouraged, and I appeal that these benefits be extended to cover the cases I have cited.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I regret that the government has seen fit to bring in this bill in its present form, because I am satisfied the majority of the fire fighters will look upon it as being a breach of faith. Furthermore, it is in direct opposition to the wishes of the veterans committee. The veterans committee gave this question a lot of consideration. They listened to briefs by the fire fighters on two occasions and, as a result, came to certain definite conclusions. One of them was that the full benefits of veterans legislation should be made available to the fire fighters. It is well to remember that on two occasions a vote was taken and that each time the vote was in favour of full benefits being given to the fire fighters. This bill is being brought into the house in direct conflict to the wishes of the veterans committee.

I think the reason the veterans committee took this stand was obvious. In the first place they felt that the government was under direct obligation to make these benefits available in view of the fact that General LaFleche, then deputy minister of war services, had made that promise to the men upon their enlisting. The second reason is that, when they enlisted, the battle of Britain was on, and it was believed that these men would face hazards just as great as those faced by the men in the armed forces. If it is argued that the hazards to be faced by these men decreased greatly and their job became easier as a consequence and, therefore, they should not receive the full benefits, then I would point out that the same might be argued regarding many of the men who served in the armed forces.

An important point to remember is that these men volunteered for service overseas on the plea of the government. In many respects we treat the man who never went outside Canada more generously than we are treating the fire fighters. These fire fighters enlisted and went overseas, and it was not their fault that the blitz subsided and the work they had to do was less hazardous than was expected. Why should they be penalized because of that fortunate situation? I submit that, when a pledge was given by the government to men going overseas, that pledge should be kept and not broken merely for the sake of saving a few dollars.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the bill which is before us now is one of the most important we have had this session. I think the least that could be done is to grant all the members of this committee retraining overseas to fit them to do the fine job they did could not have cost very much. When they went over they were fit and qualified to do their job. As a citizen of Toronto, I cannot, of course, be criticized for taking pride in the Toronto fire department, the job it has done in peace time, the masterly job it has done through the years, and what this large number of volunteers did overseas.

I know a number of these men—I have the names of nine of them here—and I shall close what I have to say by putting on record the names of these outstanding and practical firemen of Toronto. They are Dick Hake, Tom Kendall, Jim Gow, Tom Hogg, Charles Rowntree, Jr., A. Blackburn, M.M.—it will be noted that this man had won the military medal—Dick Wood, Dave Maxwell and Herb Magill.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) upon the fine speech he has made. As a Canadian I am proud of the fire brigade in Toronto, just as I am of the fire brigade in every other city across Canada. However, under the able leadership of my honourable and very dear friend the member for Broadview (Mr. Church) the fire brigade of Toronto was particularly well organized.

My hon. friend's remarks bring to mind those cities which have chosen the most able men in every field of activity, so that the business of those cities might prosper and the taxpayers pay the least possible in taxes. One realizes when he goes to Toronto that the two most popular men there are, precisely, the hon. member for Broadview and the hon. member for Davenport. Even the taxi drivers speak highly of them, and I am sure many of them know no other men in public life than my two hon. friends. Surely that is some reward for their years of service and their accomplishments on behalf of the common people.

We have seen the Canadian fire fighters at work in front of this building, and we know they did exceptionally well. However, there is one thing that strikes me, and that is that the fire brigades have been so well organized in the various cities of Canada that it was possible for them to take the risk of sending some of their members overseas to fight the fires in the large cities of the British isles, and particularly in London. Those men deserve great credit. As a young boy I was always interested in where the fire brigade was going; we were always like that, and I believe we still are. Many people go to the window to look at them when they pass. Those men are well trained and do their work well. This is not only a tribute to the heads of municipal councils who have provided all our cities and towns with excellent fire protection, but also a tribute to the people of Canada who have taken upon themselves the risk of sending overseas for the protection of the British isles against fires precisely those men who were needed at home. Not only the municipal authorities but also the people of Canada generally should be commended upon that act of generosity. I wonder if the same thing would have been done by other countries if Canada had been exposed to bombardment similar to that which cursed the British isles. However, we must give everyone the benefit of the doubt.

Since those men did so well, I cannot see why the British government does not fix them up so that they will get from the United Kingdom, which has been showered with so many gifts of money from Canada, some reward. I admire the firemen. They went over there and assumed great risks, They did so for civilization, and for the civilization of the British isles. I wonder why the British government comes again to Canada begging—no, they did not come to Canada this time; they are reluctant to come—but the firemen are being helped by this country just because they were not given enough by the United Kingdom government. Here again I protest against this kind of legislation. I do not do this because I am not in favour of the firemen. I admire them just as much as do the hon. members for Broadview and Davenport and all my colleagues in this house. I admire them and realize that they deserve a lot, but that lot should come to them from England and not from Canada. That is my point of view.

This reminds me of the father—and I use a metaphor to illustrate my point—who had numerous children who were crying for bananas. He got sick and tired of hearing them, so that he decided to buy a large bunch of bananas. The children started to eat bananas that day and they had plenty of them and finally ate the whole bunch. Then the father bought another bunch and, after they had eaten a few of that bunch, they were all sick of them; they had eaten too much. The same thing is likely to happen to the men for whom this legislation is designed. They may get too much; they may become fed up with it all, and it will cause trouble.

After Jean François Pouliot has protested, it will be the men themselves who will show their dissatisfaction. I had an example not long ago of a boy who said to me, "We are getting only $60 a month for vocational train-service considered then to be as dangerous as that performed by any human being in the British isles, whether in uniform or not.

At the next session of parliament he had this to say on April 24, 1944, as reported at page 2323 of Hansard:

I think I can save a great deal of time and speak as forcibly as anyone can and cover the entire ground when I say that my department is trying at this moment to make certain that members of the fire-fighters corps receive benefits identical with those granted to men who are discharged from the armed forces.

In conclusion, may I say that I want it clearly understood that I am not one who is merely advocating a greater government expenditure. I have never done that and I hope I shall never be guilty of it. I put forth these arguments merely because, in my opinion, these promises were made by a responsible representative of the government. They were left unchallenged when they were made; they were accepted in good faith and, in my opinion, they should be recognized. That is cricket.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Lennard) did such a good job that he left very little for anyone to say. I compliment him upon his contribution on behalf of all the firemen who participated in the serious work for which they volunteered overseas. But I would be derelict in my duty if I were not to say something about those gallant and efficient men who volunteered from the Toronto fire department to go overseas. I might say, Your Honour, there was a considerable number of them, and of that number a large proportion enlisted from Davenport riding.

I have used the word "efficient", because the captain of the Toronto fire department, Captain George Sinclair, is known throughout America as a chief who is efficient and who has raised high the position of Toronto firemen on this continent. Before proceeding to say what I intend to say, I should add that, during his seven years as mayor of Toronto, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) was to a great extent responsible for the high standard of efficiency of the fire brigade in that city.

To-day I received a letter from one of the fire fighters in Toronto who enlisted and went overseas. It is not my intention to read the letter, but only to state briefly what is contained in it. They are not complaining. They volunteered; they went over there to do their duty and were proud to have that opportunity. Some of them were wounded, while others made the supreme sacrifice. But, with all that, they were all gallant men who were proud to render a service during a great war.

This man tells me in his letter, however, that he and his buddies were away for two years, eight months and eleven days, or a total of 999 days. This particular correspondent's pay from the Toronto fire department, which pays good wages to its men was $2,624 a year. In the 999 days he was away, had he been home at his job with the Toronto fire department he would have earned $7,021, or within a dollar or so of that amount. While in the service he received $2.70 a day, with $35 a month separation allowance for his wife, or $3,942 for the 999 days he was absent. This meant a depletion in his income, or what would have been his income if he had remained at home, of $3,079. He tells me that he received—I presume as a gratuity, although I am not quite sure what it is called—the sum of $465. This means a net loss to that Toronto fireman—and, for all I know, to all of those Toronto men who enlisted—of $2,614.

The bill does say that, if they wish to have it, these men will receive vocational training and unemployment insurance. But to the professional firemen on the Toronto fire brigade those two items are of little significance. They will not require unemployment insurance because their positions are permanent. Then, the men in that fire department received sick leave, and all those other things which go along for the benefit of those who work for a city which pays its men as the Toronto city council pays the men of that city. Nor will they require vocational training.

I have been wondering what the department will give those men in place of vocational training and unemployment insurance. They suggest that they be granted the benefits of the Veterans Land Act which, as I understand it, would entitle them to assistance, provided that they took over a small lot close to the city. Some of them, of course, are pensioners. There is a suggestion that they be given reestablishment grants. I am not conversant enough with what the minister has in mind to pass comment upon it, but I am just passing on this information as it has been given to me.

Those men who went from the Toronto fire department—and I have no doubt the same would apply to others who went from other fire departments—were well trained. Their what they knew best and they gave to that service their best. Several of these fire fighters were married men with families and would never have been called up by the armed services in any event.

I am sure that what I have said applies to all fire fighters who went overseas, some 400. They volunteered at a time when the national defence tax was being deducted at the source. None, however, was deducted from them. The same thing applied when income tax deductions were made at the source. If they were to have been taxed, the government as their employer erred badly in not deducting that tax. Those who paid the national defence tax for the early part of 1942 received rebates from the government. I wish to point out to the house that none of these deductions made by the Department of National Revenue were made at the source.

These men were all on the same footing as the Canadian army overseas. They came home and were discharged, and months after that they received notices from the revenue department—the good old revenue department—that they owed so-and-so in back income taxes. That is a fine reception, a grand finale to a job well done.

It is repeatedly stated that the corps was limited to service in the United Kingdom. I wish to quote a portion of paragraph 3, part I of the regulations, which reads as follows:

Purpose of corps—

3. The corps shall assist the national fire service in Great Britain in—

By the way, Mr. Speaker, the corps was considered by the British government as a fourth arm of the service and was on the same footing as those in the armed services. I continue:

The corps shall assist the national fire service in Great Britain in (1) the extinction of fires, and the protection of life and property in case of fire, in Great Britain, Northern Ireland and the Isle of Man; (2) the extinction of fires and the protection of life and property in ships and vessels at sea.

There is no restriction there. There was no limitation to their duties at sea, apparently.

Another angle that I wish to emphasize is that these overseas fire fighters were asked to volunteer to proceed to France on or after V-E day. The entire overseas force volunteered for this special duty, and from them were picked 100 men who were specially trained and attached to the 21st army group, and were ready to leave for France on V-E day. They were on the boat or on landing barges and they were taken off. They were fully trained and had army personnel attached to them in a liaison capacity. The only thing that prevented them from seeing duty on the continent was the mere fact that the raids in France did not develop as was expected.

[Mr. Lennard.]

Another matter that I feel should be emphasized is the fact that of the overseas personnel three were killed, five seriously wounded, three wounded, and twenty-seven are at the present time receiving pension. Some hoped to receive treatment. This is being denied them under the bill.

As is often the case, a man who served overseas with the corps applies to the civil service commission for a position as fireman. I know of one or two cases where this has happened. What happens when he applies for that position? He is turned down. Why? Because he is told that he was not a member of the armed service. He is told that, despite the fact that he is a full-fledged and experienced fireman who has served overseas. He is told that, because he was not with the armed service, he can get no civil service preference.

These fire fighters have received recognition from the British government in the award of the defence of Britain decoration. They have quite recently, as announced by the Minister of Veterans Affairs, been promised the latest service decoration, the war medal. I would urge that the government give consideration to awarding them the general service medal. This medal has been worn by all those in the service whether they left Canada or not, and I feel that these fire fighters who went over and did their bit should be extended that privilege. I hold in my hand an editorial which appeared in the Toronto Daily Star of August 1. This is a paper which usually supports the government, and has done so in recent years. I shall not read the whole article because we want to get along.

Mr. TUCKER: The hon. member would say it is a wise paper?

Mr. LENNARD: In this case I am quoting from an editorial which reads as follows:

Mr. Abbott said: "I do not know whether a promise was made or not."

The Minister of National Defence was referring to the promise made by Major General LaFleche. I continue with the editorial:

Mr. McCann would only say that General Lafleche "did not recall having made any commitment." It appears to be reasonably established that he did so, and while he may have had no authority from the government, a promise from the deputy minister was regarded as a governmental pronouncement by the enlistees.

I may say that in 1943 Major General LaFleche, as minister of war services, had this to say when he spoke in the house on July 22, 1943, as reported at page 5244 of Hansard:

But may I say that Canada will never forget the fact that these men volunteered for a

Mr. GREEN: As I read the section, it is not wide enough to cover business and professional loans under the other bill we passed to-day. Should it not be amended to provide that the supervisors may get the benefit of the loans? I am not sure either whether it covers educational allowances.

Mr. TUCKER: The veteran is described as a person resident and domiciled in Canada who has received or is entitled to gratuity under the War Service Grants Act. It gives all rights in regard to these rehabilitation benefits.

Mr. GREEN: That would include educational allowance?

Mr. TUCKER: Yes. As to the other point, about whether we are conferring on them the benefits that we have given other veterans under the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act, that is not yet in force. It was certainly the intention that the supervisors should have the same rights except as to income tax as if they had been members of the armed forces. I am sure there is no objection to giving them the benefit of the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act, and to that end we might have another subsection added.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would move that section 3 (a) be amended by adding a further subclause, 6, to read as follows: "business and professional loans act".

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

FIRE FIGHTERS

WAR SERVICE BENEFITS TO CANADIANS WHO SERVED IN THE UNITED KINGDOM

Hon. IAN A MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of bill No. 326, respecting benefits to fire fighters who served in the United Kingdom.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I formally move the second reading of the bill.

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): In rising to speak on this subject, I beg to assure the house that I shall be only a few minutes. Mark Twain once said that a man could say all he knew on any one subject in twenty minutes. I am not going to take that length of time.

Mr. TUCKER: You have not wasted any time.

Mr. LENNARD: I may observe in passing that, with the exception of one or two important debates, if speakers were limited to twenty minutes the affairs of the house would be conducted in a more businesslike manner. I fully realize that this is the bill, and it will go through as it stands, regardless of what I have to say, but I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without pointing out certain facts.

In volunteering to do the job they were best equipped for, men from the Canadian fire departments answered the call of the dominion government, and accepted the dominion government's terms without question, just as volunteers did in any other service. They offered their lives if necessary, their limbs and their health. Their term of duty was for the war's duration, or as long as required, just the same as the armed troops. It has been said by a present responsible minister of the crown that the reason fire fighters did not receive full recognition was that they could resign from the service at any time they wished. I have a copy of a letter written in reply to a communication from a controller in Toronto which would lead one to believe that the members of the cabinet council, or some of them, did not have the actual facts before them, because regulation 30 reads:

> A member may be required to serve for the duration of the present war or as long thereafter as his services may be needed.

These men accepted comparable ranks and pay, the same allowances for their wives and families; they received the same treatment as regards medical examinations, medical care, pensions, discipline, clothing, feeding, travel, right down to the smaller items such as carrying Canadian army cards, being photographed and finger-printed by the Canadian army, and receiving similar discharge certification on discharge. Before these men went overseas, they were promised by Major General LaFleche, then deputy minister of war services—and he made the statement on more than one occasion, because these men left in drafts of fifty or so—that they would receive all the advantages that would be granted to the armed forces.

It has been said that some of these overseas fire fighters were conscientious objectors and had joined the fire-fighting corps to evade the army call-up. The boys who went from my part of the country—Dundas, Hamilton, Wentworth riding and the surrounding district, some twenty or so—had been volunteer fire fighters for a good many years; some of them were members of the permanent fire departments, and all of them had years of fire fighting experience and knew a great deal about the mechanics of that job. That was

SUPERVISORS WAR SERVICE BENEFITS

PROVISION WITH RESPECT TO AUXILIARY SERVICES

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue, for the Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of bill No. 325, respecting benefits to certain supervisors in the auxiliary services.

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): I wish to say a very few words with regard to the provisions of this bill. The older veterans of the first war well recall the three associations named in this bill: the Knights of Columbus, the Salvation Army, and the Y.M.C.A., and the splendid services they rendered to the troops. In this war we had, in addition to these three associations, the Canadian Legion, and I am sure that if the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) were here at the moment—and I see he is not—even he would not find anything to object to in this bill, because all the supervisors as they are defined in this bill are Canadians; they all served outside the western hemisphere, and while perhaps they were not really part of the army, they were attached to the army for discipline, pay, rations, quarters and everything of that kind. It was only when the war started that the government realized that only these different bodies could render the type of service which was required, and, quite properly, they made the necessary arrangements for these four bodies to carry on.

With reference to the various provisions, there is one matter which I should like to mention to the minister, and that is regarding the amendment which he agreed to this morning in connection with a somewhat similar bill, as to benefits granted to persons recruited in Canada by United Kingdom authorities. The minister agreed to accept an amendment whereby he would remove the words "part I of" in section 3. By doing that, he would make the provisions of part II of the War Veterans Allowance Act applicable to the widows and children of these supervisors. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that all hon. members, not only members of the veterans affairs committee but all members of the house, will be heartily in accord with the provisions of this bill. I know that the old soldiers of the first war have many pleasant recollections of the benefits and services which they received from these organizations.

Mr. POULIOT: I appreciate what the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) has said, and I will remind him that, although I try to be as conscientious as possible, I am not a conscientious objector.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. BROOKS: I want to ask a question with reference to the definition of "supervisor". Is that broad enough to include the helper and the man on the headquarters staff of the auxiliary services?

Mr. TUCKER: It was not intended to include that. It was just intended to include the supervisors.

Mr. BROOKS: I do not think, if I remember correctly, that was the intention of the committee. I think the committee felt that the helpers should be included as well.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They are dealt with separately.

Mr. TUCKER: As I understand it, "supervisor" means a duly selected and approved representative of these four groups who was attached to and served with the naval, military or air forces of Canada outside the western hemisphere. He must be a duly selected and approved representative and attached to these groups. Of course there were many individuals who worked with these groups but whom it is not intended to cover. This is, I think, an all-inclusive definition.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Supervisors deemed to be veterans with entitlement under certain acts.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Would the parliamentary assistant agree to amend this section whereby "part I of" in paragraph (a) in subparagraph (iv) will be removed, as was done in the amendment of the bill to which the minister agreed this morning?

Mr. TUCKER: That is satisfactory. That was the understanding, that they should have all rights under the War Veterans Allowance Act, and it was our understanding that the bill gave them those rights. If there is any possibility of doubt it is quite satisfactory that the matter shall be made very plain, by deleting "part I of" there, and perhaps the Minister of Justice will move that "part I of" in section 3, paragraph (a) (iv) be deleted from the bill.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

afford to pay the expenses of every soldier, nor do I think the great majority of these students expect it. I just wanted to make that clear.

Mr. QUELCH: I rise to support the bill in its present form. I think we are doing a very fine job in helping to establish the veteran. The amendment contained in this bill widens the scope of the act and will receive our support. It is true that the committee did receive a request from student bodies that the amount of the grants should be increased. Nevertheless the students made it quite clear that they appreciated very much what was being done for them. I know that a great deal of pressure has been put on the minister to get an increase in the amount of the grants to the student, but on the other hand, when one considers that university students are benefiting to a far greater extent than any other group of veterans I do not think the government would be justified in increasing the amount of the grants. It has been argued that unless there is an increase in the grants many of these students will have to give up their studies. This bill provides for taking care of that situation by making loans available to them, and no veteran who finds himself in a position where he cannot carry on his studies because costs are increasing should hesitate to take advantage of this legislation and obtain a loan.

VETERANS REHABILITATION ACT

LOANS TO UNIVERSITIES—TRAINING OUTSIDE OF CANADA, ETC.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of bill No. 333, to amend the Veterans Rehabilitation Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

WAR SERVICE GRANTS ACT

PAY AND ALLOWANCES, SUPPLEMENTARY GRATUITY —ENTITLEMENT TO REESTABLISHMENT CREDIT

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of bill No. 334, to amend the War Service Grants Act, 1944.

Mr. D. S. HARKNESS (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the amendments, so far as they go, to the War Service Grants Act which are covered by this bill. There has been criticism that some of the amendments do not go far enough. Some are merely clarifications and nothing need be said about them.

There are four amendments which amount to anything. Two of them deal with gratuities, particularly the supplementary gratuity, and the other two deal with reestablishment credits. The ones dealing with gratuities mainly provide that a man who joins the permanent or interim force and takes a reduction in rank to do so shall not thereby lose part of the gratuity to which he would otherwise be entitled. That, I think, is sound and fair, and we are entirely in agreement with it. The other amendment dealing with gratuities fixes a cut-off date for men who join the permanent or interim force. There is no criticism of that. The third amendment deals with the extension to the widow of a soldier who may have died of the right to his reestablishment credit if the veteran had not drawn it before his death. That is a provision with which we are wholly in accord, and in my opinion it should have been written into the act to begin with. At the same time it impresses me as unfair that, because a man did the country a service by not drawing his reestablishment credit immediately, his wife should be penalized if he happened to die before he had occasion to use that credit. The only criticism I have is that I think the privilege should have been extended to the man's children. The amendment only provides that it may go to the widow and the dependent mother. The case of a man with dependent children, whose wife or whose mother is dead might well have been covered in the amendment, and I hope that that will be done at some future time. The fourth amendment is with regard to the use of the reestablishment credit to enable a veteran to pay off indebtedness on his home. Previously he had only been able to use this credit up to twice the amount which he himself paid. That is now being improved in that he can use it up to twice the amount paid, even though it was paid some years in the past. That also, I think, should have been liberalized so that it would not have been necessary to limit the amount of this reestablishment credit that he could use to twice the amount he paid himself. That is another change in the act which I would also hope to see instituted.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

Mr. GREEN: There is not much point in setting off one group of veterans against another.

Mr. McKAY: What about the Veterans' Land Act?

Mr. TUCKER: The hon. member comes from Saskatchewan, and he should be the last to suggest that we are doing too much for the men going on the land in Saskatchewan.

Mr. McKAY: I did not suggest that; I simply asked as a matter of information. I think the hon. member should withdraw his remark.

Mr. TUCKER: I did not make any improper remark.

Mr. McKAY: You said I was the last one that should be suggesting that.

Mr. TUCKER: I said you are the last one who should suggest that. Why did you mention it?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I would remind the hon. member that an hon. member who is speaking should not be interrupted without his permission.

Mr. McKAY: I was speaking on a point of order.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): If the hon. member wants to raise a point of order, that is quite all right.

Mr. McKAY: On a point of order, I want that withdrawn. I did not make any such implication.

Mr. TUCKER: If the hon. member just wished to ask me why we are giving so much under the Veterans' Land Act—

Mr. McKAY: I did not; I said, "What about it?"

Mr. TUCKER:—and did not want to make any suggestion about it, I accept that. I suggested that he was finding fault with what we are giving under the Veterans' Land Act, but if he was not, that is all right. If a man goes on a farm there is considerable risk and so on, and if he does not get a certain equity he cannot hope to make a success.

Mr. McKAY: On behalf of this group I wish to support what the hon. member for Vancouver South suggested with reference to these university grants. Several members of this house have benefited by that paternalism which the Minister of Veterans Affairs suggested was not so good and incidentally almost abhors. We have several Rhodes scholars in this house, and I consider it an honour to have them here. I do not think there can be too much subsidization for education. I would remind the Minister of what the poet said:

> A little learning is a dangerous thing,
> Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring.

I would suggest that if any of these boys or young ladies are unable to complete their full course at the university it might mean that some of our best brains would be lost to Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I completely and definitely and emphatically repudiate the suggestion of the hon. member that I had said the state should not assist education. I know the value of education possibly more than my hon. friend does. I came up the hard way.

Mr. McKAY: So did I.

Mr. BROOKS: I do not wish to prolong this debate, but there is one point I wish to bring up. The hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. McKay) has said that his group was supporting a certain idea.

Mr. McKAY: And it still does.

Mr. BROOKS: May I point out that in the committee we acted as individual members and soldiers, and party views were not expressed?

I do not agree entirely with the hon. member for Vancouver South in what he said, nor do I agree entirely with the sentiments expressed by the minister. I take a sort of half-way course. But I feel that in what we are doing for these students the country is only paying a debt that it owes to these men. I was pleased indeed to hear the minister's parliamentary assistant speak of the good work that these students have done. I had an opportunity of visiting some of the universities, and I know that the returned soldiers are leading their classes all along the line.

As to the comparison which the minister makes between the cost of education to-day and fifty years ago, one can hardly make such a comparison because I remember that when I attended university I paid $3 a week for board and my son who is now attending pays $14 a week for board. As the minister says, the real comparison is between the different kinds of rehabilitation benefits our veterans are getting.

We must also consider what the country can afford to pay. If this country could afford to pay the expenses of every soldier at university I would have no objection at all but I do not believe that the country can is no political value of any kind in it. We have been very generous to them; let us not be too generous. We shall have approximately 38,000 in the universities next year at a cost of about $4,000 apiece. That is what is being given to those who are privileged to go to our universities when we give only $400 to the boys who are receiving just the reestablishment credit. I say it is fundamentally unsound.

Mr. GREEN: What about my two suggestions: first, the transportation allowance and textbooks, and then the dependents board of trustees.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We considered that very carefully. I want to say honestly and sincerely to my hon. friend that we felt it would be creating additional discrimination. That is the final answer. As my hon. friend knows, under section 5 (a) there are alternative benefits provided to students at the university. The first duty of this parliament is to be as fair as possible to all veterans who have served.

Mr. GREEN: What about the dependents board of trustees?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Of course that is a matter that could be considered. It has not as yet been considered.

Mr. GREEN: Would it not be possible to do something of that kind?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not at the moment, no.

Mr. TUCKER: Just so that the members of the committee may have the actual figures, which are much more encouraging than the hon. member for Kamloops indicated—

Mr. FULTON: I used the figures that were supplied to the committee.

Mr. TUCKER: I have the figures up to July 31, 1946. First, I should like to say that these students have made a wonderful record, and all the university presidents are delighted with their showing. The numbers at present in training are as follows:

Post-graduate	1,138
Undergraduate	21,130
Pre-university	15,840
	38,108

Those discontinued to date are as follows:

Post-graduate	64
Undergraduate	1,436
Pre-university	1,429
	2,929

The total since inception is as follows:

Post-graduate	1,202
Undergraduate	22,566
Pre-university	17,269
	41,037

The analysis of discontinued cases, university and pre-university, since inception is as follows:

University graduation	324
Employed before completion	1,055
Entitlement expired service	401
Failed in year's work	368
Transferred to vocational training	422
Ill-health	165
Re-enlisted	184
Financial reason	10
	2,929

I should like to comment upon the fact that only 368 failed, which I think is an amazing record. Then there were only ten discontinued for financial reasons.

Mr. GREEN: We include the ten hundred in that reason.

Mr. TUCKER: Those are the actual figures and I think they indicate that this programme is working amazingly well. Great credit is due to the universities which have accommodated these 38,000 extra students, and it is a great credit to the students who have come back and were ready to enter these courses and make a real success of their studies.

There is one thing more I should like to say. I think most of the university graduates in Canada to-day went into debt in order to get their education. Most of the boys I know did that.

Mr. FULTON: Most of them were a good deal younger.

Mr. GREEN: They were not married either.

Mr. TUCKER: I was not, and then I did not have nine children either. Eighty per cent of the veterans will get the reestablishment credit, which averages a little under $425. The number who will receive these university grants is approximately 40,000 which, as the minister stated, amounts to $4,000 apiece. There are about 100,000 who will receive vocational training. The figures which I have up to date show that this will cost about $9,100,000, or approximately $910 apiece. Then there is the Veterans Land Act under which we hope to settle 100,000. In that case the maximum grant is $2,320.

There is something else I should like to put to the members of this committee. If a man has the ability to go through, say for medicine, and the state advances him sufficient to get a medical degree, to the extent of $4,000, even though he has to go into debt for $1,000 or $2,000, I think we are doing infinitely more for that man than we are for the man who is receiving a reestablishment grant of $425.

In other words, the committee found that the allowance is not sufficient for some of the married men who have not suitable housing; and they based their findings on the fact that the government—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Which committee is that?

Mr. GREEN: The university advisory committee. They based their findings on the government only being responsible for board and lodging, which was not the basis for the fixing of the allowance at all. The committee based their findings, further, on the students being able to work in the summer. As I have pointed out to the minister, many students cannot do that because they take courses in the summer months.

I do not think the minister will dispute that it was his intention to get at least a text-book allowance and transportation allowance for these university students. I understood that that was to be done. About two weeks ago a Canadian Press dispatch appeared in the papers to the effect that the Department of Veterans Affairs had recommended that student veterans at universities be given $5 a week commutation allowance, if they had to travel a certain distance to school, and $5 a month text-book allowance. The report went on to say that the veterans affairs committee, if you please, had rejected that recommendation.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That was wrong.

Mr. GREEN: I raised this matter on a question of privilege, and the minister admitted that the veterans affairs committee had never rejected any such proposal.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Correct.

Mr. GREEN: But that proposal did not just come out of the air. I suggest to the minister that that was the original intention of his department, namely, to provide for allowances such as were set out in the dispatch. They would certainly have helped a great deal, and I still suggest to the minister that he give consideration to allowances of that type.

If he cannot do that, I suggest that he make provision whereby the dependents trustee board would be able to help out needy cases. There is not the slightest shadow of a doubt that, particularly among married veterans, there are many cases of real suffering. These young men, backed by their wives, are going through great hardship in order to obtain university degrees. I know of cases where there has been sickness or, as this young wife says, where there have been additions to families, with great hardship as the result. Why would it not be possible to give power to the dependents trustee board to help out in those cases of hardship?

I should like to have a statement from the minister, first as to the possibility of some arrangement of that type being made and, second, as to this phantom allowance for commutation expenses and for textbooks.

Mr. MACKENZIE: My hon. friend has made his usual human appeal in regard to the situation. But when one analyses the whole picture of what the taxpayers of Canada are doing—and generally in matters of this kind I am on the aggressive side, although on this occasion I am on the defensive—he must keep in mind the $693,500,000 being spent this year, the contingent liability of a billion and a half dollars for the next four and one-half years, the matter of the uniformity of treatment, the matter of the average cost per student who is taking university training as paid by his fellow taxpayers in Canada, a cost of about $4,000, when the maximum grant to the settler on the land is $2,320 and the amount for vocational training, $1,120—

Mr. GREEN: Twenty-three hundred and twenty dollars.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I said that, did I not? Vocational training $1,120. Then the reestablishment credit to the great bulk of the 1,125,000 soldiers, airmen and sailors who served Canada in this war and who will not get these other benefits amounts to an average of $400. The hon. member is a sincere friend of the veterans and has been for many years, but I say to him that if you go too far in one direction you are going to create resentment in another. The policy we have been trying to establish, possibly not successfully, is one of equality.

Mr. GREEN: You started this university training; why not see it through?

Mr. MACKENZIE: We are seeing it through. I was through it myself and on a much tougher scale. These men can get through on $60 a month for a single man and $80 a month for a married man, with allowances for dependents. I know I am saying an unpopular thing, but I do not care a bit about that. My heavens, if I had had $60 a month when I was going through—

Mr. GREEN: You would have considered yourself a millionaire?

An hon. MEMBER: You would not have graduated.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Let us have a sense of balance in this thing, because honestly there

Mr. GREEN: —therefore I have to be careful. But I suggest to him that there have never been a finer type of young manhood and young womanhood produced than the young men and women who fought this country's battles in the second world war.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We agree with that; that is not the issue.

Mr. GREEN: No one can question that they are certainly the equals, and perhaps the superiors, of those who served in the first world war. This whole question comes down to whether or not the investment this country is making in these young men and women is to be lost. It is not a question for a lot of excitement and emotionalism; it is purely a question of investment. I would point out to the minister and to the committee that twenty-five per cent of the veterans who are attending universities are married men. That is a condition which did not exist after the first world war. We have never had a situation like it in Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Under the present bill we are making provision for loans to these married men.

Mr. GREEN: Well, if you were a married man you would understand these problems better than you do.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Thank you very much.

Mr. GREEN: Surely the minister knows that these young veterans will think twice before they will incur an indebtedness of $2,000 or $3,000 to get a university degree, particularly when they have wives and children to support. That means that when they start out in civilian life, after receiving training, they have that tremendous burden on their backs. I am quite sure many of these young men will decide that the game is not worth the candle—

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, they will not.

Mr. GREEN: —and they will not go ahead with their courses. In its wisdom, the government decided that young veterans would be given this chance to get university training. It was a splendid move, and it will reap wonderful dividends for Canada. What worries me is the danger of losing that investment.

I have had letters from many of these veterans. I have one here, received this week, from the wife of one of these student veterans, which I shall read to the committee. This woman's husband is a student at the university of British Columbia, and she says:

I am the wife of a U.B.C. veteran. It is absolutely impossible for us to live on the government allowance. We realize that it is wonderful that the boys are being given an opportunity to receive a university education, but after all it is nothing more than they deserve. My husband, like millions of others, gave the best five years of his life to his country. He is twenty-six now and had the war not come along he would be well-established in business. As it is now he has to start at the bottom. I'm not not complaining or even hinting that he is sorry he enlisted in the active army very near the beginning of the war, but don't you think they are entitled to a living when they come back?

I am working and in that way we are able to scrape by, but in the event that we should have an addition to our family, we should find it impossible to live on the allowance alone. I feel that as long as the government says that they will pay the education and give the boys a living allowance while they are attending school, they should see to it that it is a living allowance. The only way one could manage on it would be to pay $8 per month rent and as you well know, such places are not to be found these days.

You might say that the boys should be able to earn enough during the times they are not at university to put to their allowance and make it sufficient to live on. Well, since the boys have lost so much time being in the army for a number of years, I think they are entitled to take advantage of these "speeded-up" courses they are offering. In that case they are given very little free time in which to work. They have to complete a year's course in two subjects in six weeks. That takes a lot of studying.

As the minister knows, that is so. At the university of British Columbia there are hundreds of these men taking special courses this summer.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have exactly the same letter.

Mr. GREEN: It continues:

I sincerely hope you see the point in the boys' asking for increased grants. They have given so much, it is up to the government to do the giving now.

The first year is past. These men have used up their gratuity. The minister himself told the committee that of the 2,740 who had dropped out, over 800 had gone to take employment. We submitted to him then, and we submit to him now that many of them left because they could not carry on with the allowances they were being paid.

Then, this afternoon, the minister referred to the advisory board, comprising men from different universities, and said that they agreed with these allowances. Well, here is their statement read before the veterans affairs committee, as set out at page 683 of the proceedings:

Summing up, the committee was of the opinion that if employment is available during summer recess and if the government confines its responsibility to board and lodging, the present training allowances are adequate for all but a relatively small group of married veterans without suitable housing.

Provide any university in Canada with moneys whereby and wherefrom the university may make small loans to meet emergency conditions among veterans who are being paid allowances pursuant to sections 8 and 9 of this act.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would remind the hon. member that we are on second reading of the bill. He should discuss only the principle, and not the different sections until we get into committee.

Mr. HERRIDGE: The previous speaker referred to this section and I was replying to him. I believe that the previous speaker clinched my argument by saying that possibly at the conclusion of the university course the student would be short possibly $1,000 or $1,500.

Mr. FULTON: Barring any other development; that is the minimum.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Yes. Apart from that, Mr. Speaker, I do not think the party to which my hon. friend belongs has always considered it reasonable to provide for all the vicissitudes of life or things which might happen.

As I said before, the hon. member said that a student might find himself in the position where he owed $1,000 or $1,500. We should face this question realistically. After the amount of money which will have been granted to the students, which will, I understand, average something over $4,000 each, has been expended by the people of the country, surely no Canadian who is anxious to improve his own circumstances and to play his part is going to take exception to finishing his course with a loan of possibly $1,000 or $1,500. I believe that the provision made in paragraph (a) of section 5 covers the situation, according to the information presented by the representatives of the university students.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. We are discussing the principle of the bill. I suggest to the hon. member that he wait until we are in committee before he discusses the different sections.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: We are considering bill No. 327.

On section 1—Supplementary grants to universities.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I just wish to say one word. We had a university committee consisting of some of the most distinguished members across Canada investigate the whole sphere and scope of the adequacy of allowances. I made certain remarks before the veterans affairs committee which have been extremely criticized—I do not mind that—in my home city in regard to the fact that the allowances are inadequate. If $60 for a single man and $80 with allowances for a married man are inadequate, it would have meant untold wealth to me when I was struggling to pay my own way through university in the old days. I hope this nation in being generous will never lean too far toward paternalism. That is the danger which exists in this situation to-day. I want to tell every party in the house that there is not the slightest political advantage to be gained in advocating higher rates for university training, because no nation in the world has made a more generous investment in its future or in the future of its higher education than has Canada, which will probably have 35,000 or 38,000 students attending these courses next year. According to my information, so far only nine have been constrained to abandon their courses as a result of financial necessity. To me $60 would have been a goldfield.

Mr. GREEN: That was fifty years ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, but fifty years ago developed men.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BROOKS: You will have to prove that.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think the story of the nation will prove it. Paternalism will never develop men.

Mr. McKAY: Time will tell.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You believe in individual enterprise. What does that mean? It means the striving of the student against odds, and it is the finest thing you can get any nation to do. Subsidization of the student by the state is a most dangerous thing in connection with developing free enterprise and brilliance in university courses that one can possibly adopt. When I say that I know I am saying an unpopular thing; I do not care, but it is the right thing to say. I have no sympathy whatsoever for these people who tell me that they cannot go through on $60 for a single man and $80 with allowances for married men. They can. I am against all this agitation, strongly against it, and I will say so on any platform in Canada.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has said a few words about the type of men produced fifty years ago. I am in that class myself—running into debt at the rate of $300 a year and, in many cases, considerably more. That was an average figure. So that at the end of four or five years, barring any emergencies, they would be approximately $1,500 or $2,000 in debt on the average.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We are together there.

At about that time the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), while in Vancouver, made a statement in a public speech which afforded a great deal of encouragement to many veterans. What the minister said on that occasion was summarized in the Vancouver Sun of June 27, 1946, as follows:

> Order in council bringing "improved" benefits to war veterans attending Canadian universities is expected to be passed by the federal cabinet next week, veterans affairs minister Ian Mackenzie said to-day. While the minister said he could not specify what added benefits the new schedule would bring student veterans, he declared that the government planned "fairly substantial improvements for the men."

As I understand the position, the only order in council which was passed was the order in council now embodied in bill No. 327. That bill, however, makes provision only for grants to universities to enable the universities themselves to make loans to the veterans. It in no way extends grants to veterans and, inasmuch as the universities will only extend loans to veterans, it makes no change in their financial position. They will still finish with the same amount of debt as if the order in council or this statute had not been passed. Bill No. 333 merely introduces a number of technical amendments into the act and makes no change in the financial effect of it. Therefore the lack of fulfilment of the minister's statement merely had the effect of disappointing the veterans without meeting the situation.

In the light of these facts, it is interesting to look at the statistics as to the number of veterans who have left universities since the inception of the plan. These statistics will be found at page 1407 of the proceedings of the veterans affairs committee, and they show that 2,470 students have discontinued their courses, of which number nine left for financial reasons, while 841 left to take jobs before completing their courses. In view of the information given the committee by the organizations which presented briefs, it is a safe assumption that these students left, not because they preferred to take jobs rather than to complete their course, but because they had to take the jobs for the reason that they were financially unable to complete the courses. This means that 850 out of 2,470 left for straight financial reasons or because they had to take jobs. In other words, thirty-one per cent of the total number up to that date left for financial reasons. The information we have is that a great many more will leave this summer. I have heard that the number will be as high as fifty per cent in some universities. However, that is in the future. I have given the statement that was made by the students themselves, and we have no figures on which to base definite predictions for the future.

Unfortunately, the only amendment we can move to take care of the situation is one that would involve the expenditure of public funds. It was urged that the grant for married veterans be increased to $100. The attempt we are making to-day is to show that the act, as it stands at present or as it is about to be amended, will not take care of the position of the married men at the universities who are running behind at the rate of $40 a month.

I would conclude by urging the minister to fulfill the implication contained in his speech as reported in the newspapers on June 27, so that veterans may be able to take advantage of the legislation and we shall not be in the position of spending a great deal of money on veterans and having it wasted because the veteran is unable to complete his course, because those who have looked into the situation are convinced that large numbers will be forced to discontinue their courses. I should like to conclude by reading the following submission:

> In conclusion, student veterans, and especially married, have adopted every means possible to keep going. We submit that they will still try in the future, but that the case is obviously that they won't be able to unless, at least in the case of married, a substantial increase is made in the allowances.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). I would expect him to put forth that argument. Being a Rhodes scholar, he would naturally argue for increased grants to university students. The committee gave this question a great deal of consideration. I listened with great interest to the representations put forth by the representatives of the university students. I must say I am quite sure that the committee were sympathetic to the necessities of university students; but, after listening to the presentations and considering the bill which was presented to us by the government, and which was considered previously by the committee, I am quite frank in saying that the government has, in my opinion, been most considerate in this respect. Paragraph (a) of section 5 of bill No. 333 reads:

that the interest rate shall be 3½ per cent. It is therefore an imposition on the revenues and taxes of the people.

Mr. GILLIS: We are reducing it, not increasing it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. member for Melfort has very kindly but bluntly suggested that we subsidize the difference.

Section agreed to.

Mr. McKAY: On division.

Mr. GILLIS: What is the difference?

Sections 4 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

VETERANS REHABILITATION ACT

SUPPLEMENTARY GRANTS TO UNIVERSITIES

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of bill No. 327, to amend the Veterans Rehabilitation Act (university grant).

Mr. FULTON: Mr. Speaker, I just spoke to the minister a few minutes ago and suggested that items Nos. 15 and 19 on the order paper be called together. No. 19 is bill No. 333, to amend the Veterans Rehabilitation Act. I suggest that both measures deal with the same subject.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, certainly. Mr. Speaker, have I your permission and the permission of the house to move at the same time the second reading of the concomitant bill?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): Before the second reading is carried, I have some remarks to make. Both bills, Nos. 327 and 333, are amendments to the Veterans Rehabilitation Act, and both have largely reference to the facilities afforded to veterans in university and vocational training. Briefly, the attitude of our party can be summed up by saying that the bills are quite acceptable as far as they go, but they do not go nearly far enough.

The minister summarized the effect of these bills in his general statement on July 30, as will be found at page 4087 of Hansard in connection with bills Nos. 327 and 333. Of that summary we have no criticism to make. In stating that the bills do not go far enough, the basis of our position is that the veterans will not actually be able to take advantage of this legislation because the benefits extended are not sufficient, and to that extent we are in danger of wasting the money which parliament has indicated it is willing to vote for the purpose.

In order to make that point clear, I should like briefly to summarize the present position as regards vocational training and university attendance on the part of veterans. The deputy minister of veterans affairs recently made a statement that it was expected that a maximum of 40,000 veterans would take advantage of the act to receive university training while 70,000 would take vocational training. He placed on the record a statement as to the importance of the act when he appeared before the veterans affairs committee. This will be found at page 682 of the report of the proceedings of the committee:

> It goes without saying that after enactment of a programme that has attracted over 30,000 veterans to our universities our department is vitally concerned that no appreciable number of veterans are compelled to give up their course on financial grounds.

It is largely with respect to university students that the criticism made to-day is offered, and it is particularly to that statement of the deputy minister that I wish to relate my remarks, because the point we make is that the grant is not sufficient and that, therefore, there is grave danger that many veterans who have so far taken up university courses will not be able to complete them because of serious financial embarrassment.

The position of the veterans was fully discussed before the veterans affairs committee when briefs were presented by the national council of student veterans and a separate brief was read by the university of British Columbia branch of the Canadian Legion. It was pointed out that under the present grant of $80 a month for the married veteran attending university the veteran incurs an average deficit of $43.50 a month. That statement is to be found at page 1407 of the report of the committee's proceedings:

> The dominion bureau of statistics figures given to the committee by the deputy minister reveal that married student veterans have borne deficits averaging $43.50 per month. With living costs still rising, particularly with respect to housing, the deficits between allowances and actual living costs will become even more severe in the future.

On that basis, these veterans presenting the brief, who were acutally student veterans themselves and knew what they were talking about, suggested to the committee that many veterans would be forced to give up their courses, although they had started on them, because they would not be able to undertake the financial obligation which they were incurring. At the rate of $40 a month, and taking a six-month course, that would mean an average of $240 a year, and it was stated that most of the veterans found that they were in the last six years has been an attempt at uniformity. We have not accomplished that yet, but the suggestion of my hon. friend would, in my humble judgment, involve discrimination against other veterans who are not able to get the same treatment.

Mr. WRIGHT: Then eliminate the discrimination.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We have to be as fair and uniform in our treatment of the veterans as we can be, and I must reject my hon. friend's suggestion at once.

Amendment (Mr. Green) negatived.

Mr. GILLIS: Apparently I am too late.

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. GILLIS: I have not any intention of sitting down. I think such a remark from across the floor is the height of ignorance. Eighty-five per cent of the people who voted on the amendment had not the slightest idea of what it was all about. That is what I am objecting to.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is not right.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The amendment was put to the committee and defeated; there can be no further discussion on that. If the hon. member wants to discuss section 2 he would be in order.

Mr. GILLIS: I have no intention of disregarding your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but I certainly should like to see the interest of the veteran protected, and I am not so sure that it was, in the vote which has just been taken. The matter is pretty well tangled up.

Mr. LESAGE: I have a question on the definition clause, paragraph (k), which states:

"veteran" means a person resident and domiciled in Canada who has received, or is entitled to a gratuity under the War Service Grants Act . . .

I have here a copy of the War Service Grants Act, chapter 51 of the Statutes of Canada, 1944-45, and in paragraph (p) it is stated that:

"service" means time served on active service in the forces (i) while enlisted or obligated to serve without territorial limitation; or (ii) in the Aleutian islands.

It seems to me that this does not cover the case of a veteran who has not volunteered but who has served in Canada only for two or three years, whilst under the Veterans' Land Act he is entitled to the benefits of that act, and I just ask the question if it would not be fairer to provide that the definition of "veteran" in the bill we are now studying should be the same as in the Veterans' Land Act.

Mr. TUCKER: If the hon. member will permit me to answer that, the reason why it was put here is that this is a companion measure to supplement the use of the reestablishment credit under the War Service Grants Act. The hon. member is quite correct; a person who was called up and did not volunteer and only served in Canada does not get a reestablishment credit. It was felt that this is a companion measure to that, and should be on the same basis. Incidentally I might say that I think the reason why the veterans affairs committee did not recommend anything further was this, that we felt that the person who volunteered was entitled to some extra consideration as against the person who did not.

Mr. LESAGE: I know, but why extend the provisions of the Veterans' Land Act to those persons who have served for twelve months even if they did not volunteer, and not extend it in this case, which in my opinion is a companion bill to the Veterans' Land Act. That act was also a measure to supplement and complement the war service gratuities.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I point out to my hon. friend that the committee on the Veterans' Land Act sat in 1942 before certain other issues developed within the nation, and the provisions made there were made universal, before other difficulties developed which we were confronted with.

Mr. MUTCH: It is a mistake in any event to suggest that the credits under the Veterans' Land Act make it a companion measure to this, because it is impossible for the veterans to take advantage of both, whereas in this case they may.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Minister to pay losses of banks within certain limits and under certain conditions.

Mr. McKAY: I have an amendment, which is seconded by the hon. member for Melfort, that the word "five" in subsection 1, paragraph (g), line 39, be struck out and the words "three and one-half" be substituted therefor.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I immediately rise to a question of order. It is completely out of order.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): That amendment is out of order.

Mr. McKAY: On what ground?

Mr. MACKENZIE: On the ground that the message from the crown through His Majesty's advisers has recommended five per cent, and there is the suggestion of my hon. friend march to socialism. I am sure that the hon. member for Acadia in that suggestion is not following the lead of his leader.

Mr. QUELCH: The civil service could give this service at cost instead of at a profit.

Mr. TUCKER: That is following the C.C.F. ideas. The ultimate cost to the veteran and to the taxpayer under state administration would probably be twice as much as under the banks, which can do it as an extra to their present business. I could understand such a suggestion coming from the C.C.F., but not from the hon. member for Acadia or any other member of the Social Credit party.

Mr. GILLIS: Why not use the industrial development bank?

Mr. TUCKER: The industrial development bank was set up to make industrial development loans. It has very few branches throughout Canada. If a veteran in the province of Saskatchewan had to travel all the way from Melfort to Regina to try to get a loan of $1,000 or $1,500, and the bank had to make investigations three or four hundred miles away before making the loan, the thing would just not be feasible. To carry out that suggestion, the industrial development bank would have to set up branches all over the country. Our experience with the Farm Loan Improvement Act was so satisfactory that I am surprised that there is any criticism of this bill. There was some doubt about the act when it was first brought in, but it enabled the farmers to get a loan from their own bank at five per cent, and the banks did that extra business much more cheaply than a new institution that was set up especially for that purpose could possibly do it. I think it will be agreed that five per cent is a reasonable rate, especially when the borrower is allowed ten years to repay the loan. It is much better for the farmer to be able to go to his own bank only a few miles away than to have to deal through the government and go through all the red tape that is necessary when you deal with governments.

Mr. WRIGHT: The parliamentary assistant has given quite an explanation but, he did not explain why the government could not absorb the difference between 3½ per cent and five per cent in order to assist the veteran. Anyone can get a loan at five per cent but a veteran is entitled to a better deal.

There is one other point. The chief objection raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South with regard to not being allowed to incorporate was the personal responsibility which would be the veteran's in case of failure. The bank might seize other than the particular business for which the loan was made. Section 7 empowers the governor in council to make regulations and to prescribe the security, if any, to be taken by the bank for the repayment of any guaranteed loan. I would ask the minister to state whether the government intends to pass regulations under that clause to prevent the bank from taking over other assets of the veteran than the particular business for which he secured the loan.

Mr. TUCKER: The banks have a tremendous amount of protection against loss, and they can lend freely under this bill. The five per cent is to cover their costs of operating these loans; there is nothing in it to provide against loss. The regulations will provide that they may take security upon the property purchased with the loan. The attitude of the banks under the Farm Loan Improvement Act is this. They can rely on the government's guarantee, and they do not like to take any more security than they are required to take. In other words, the security is more or less a protection against the government having to pay a whole lot of losses rather than the banks. The banks take only the security they are required to take by the regulations, and the regulations will require them to take security on the property purchased.

Mr. WRIGHT: I suggest that the regulations prescribe that that shall be the only security which the banks shall take, that they shall not be able to take security on other assets of the veteran.

Mr. TUCKER: The difficulty about that is this. A veteran might be anxious to get a loan, but his record might be such that even with the guarantee the bank would not make the loan. But if the veteran can say to the bank, "I will repay this and as a guarantee here is some extra security," he might be able to get a loan that otherwise he could not obtain. The more elasticity you have in this, the more useful it will be to the veteran. It enables the veteran to get a loan that he might not otherwise be able to obtain. The various veterans' organizations have pressed strongly for legislation of this kind, and they would be sorry if we had too many hampering restrictions so that the loans could not be made speedily.

Mr. WRIGHT: Why is the government not prepared to absorb the difference between 3½ per cent and five per cent?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The whole underlying policy of government legislation for veterans section 1 of the War Service Grants Act contains almost the same definition of business as there is in this bill. That was done because we felt that these are companion pieces of legislation and should be more or less the same in their provisions as to where the money could be invested. That is one reason why it was felt that they should be permitted to use their reestablishment credit to buy into a partnership or to buy an interest in a business, but not to buy shares in a corporation. It was felt the restrictions should be the same.

Our department, which has had a great deal of experience in the reestablishment of veterans, felt strongly that veterans should not be exposed to the possibility of somebody coming to them and getting them to go to a bank to borrow money with which to buy an interest in a corporation. We felt that we might be exposing veterans to pressure from unscrupulous persons. They might have a tendency to throw their reestablishment credit into some business and lose everything.

It was not pressure from the financial institutions that decided the government; it was advice from Major General Burns, our director of rehabilitation, and the deputy minister, that decided the government. The government felt they would be wrong in not taking that advice, that they should not permit this act to be used to buy shares in corporations. In following that advice we felt that we were following the best advice we could get.

There has been some question as to why there should be a guarantee of only ten per cent in the case of farmers who are going to farm under the Farm Improvement Loan Act when there is a guarantee of twenty-five per cent of the first million of loans made by banks under this bill. The answer is that the whole basis of this act is to help the veteran who has enlisted and who may have been overseas for five years when he would not have an opportunity to build up a relationship with his bank manager. When this man comes back he is almost a stranger, and it was felt that the government should give a form of partial guarantee of his loan. This is an altogether different proposition from a farmer getting a loan, because the farmer is generally well known. This higher guarantee is given not to help the banks, because we know they will do business in such a way as not to throw away their money; it was done so that credit should be freely available to worthy veterans. If a bank can lend a million dollars and if one-quarter of those loans are guaranteed, it obviously means that the veteran with any reasonable proposition can hope to get a loan. This is a most advantageous piece of legislation for any veteran going into business.

Some question has been raised about cutting down the rate of interest. I am just as anxious as any one to see rates of interest kept low, but I think it would be a poor way of serving the best interests of the veteran if you said to him that he could get a loan, say of $3,000, under this act and be charged three per cent instead of five per cent, which would save him $60, and then have the bank decide that they could not work under that arrangement no matter what the guarantee might be. The bank might consider that they would lose money on it and refuse to make any loans at all. That would be an amazing way to help the veteran.

Mr. QUELCH: Why could not the government supply the money in exactly the same way they are supplying it under the Veterans Land Act?

Mr. TUCKER: I am surprised at my hon. friend mentioning that. Obviously if you try to handle this under the Veterans' Land Act you would have this position. The banks are set up to advance money; that is their business. They have branches all over the country. The banks are supervised to see that they do not make undue profits. Very careful investigation was made and five per cent was considered a rate at which the banks would probably break even. My hon. friend says, why not do this under the Veterans' Land Act?

Mr. QUELCH: No; I said in a similar way.

Mr. TUCKER: I am surprised at my hon. friend suggesting that.

Mr. WRIGHT: My suggestion was that the government pay the difference between the 3½ per cent and the five per cent.

Mr. TUCKER: If the suggestion of the hon. member for Acadia had come from the C.C.F. I would not have been surprised, because they believe that the government should go into this business and have a horde of civil servants operating every branch of business from one end of the country to another.

An hon. MEMBER: You are already in it.

Mr. TUCKER: I am surprised at the suggestion coming from the Social Credit party, because it would cut down the field of private enterprise still further and accelerate the the Veterans Land Act, legislation which in part would give them a grant, and then a loan at a reasonable rate of interest of not more than three and one-half per cent.

While no doubt this legislation will help, nevertheless, as I have said, it will be a great disappointment to the veterans of Canada. Under it no grant is made, although I understand a veteran will be eligible for a reestablishment credit. It is stated however that the rate of interest will be five per cent. I cannot understand why we can help set a veteran up on a farm at three and one-half per cent, in addition give him a grant of $2,300, and then say to the veteran who wishes to begin a business, "We will not give you a grant, but we will soak you five per cent interest." I cannot see any possible explanation or justification for that attitude.

As the hon. member for Weyburn has pointed out, these veterans are not to get even the benefits a civilian gets when he asks for a farm improvement loan. He can borrow money at five per cent, with the government putting up only ten per cent, whereas in this instance they guarantee the chartered banks up to twenty-five per cent of their aggregate losses.

During the war we heard a great deal about the patriotic services rendered by the chartered banks in helping to do this and that. The war is over, and I think the banks might very well prove their sense of patriotism by letting the veterans have these loans at a rate of three per cent, thereby giving them a little more help. If the banks are not prepared to do that, I suggest it is a service the government might very well perform.

A short time ago we made provision in this house for loans to foreign countries at the rate of two per cent. The reason given for that low rate of interest was that these countries could not afford to pay more. Many applications for loans by veterans are being turned down on the ground that they will not be able to meet their obligations. If it is found that a veteran is not able to meet his obligations under this act, should not the rate of interest be reduced on the same ground that we are making money available to foreign countries at the rate of two per cent? There is no suggestion of that kind at all. Why are we so liberal in making loans to foreign countries at two per cent when we refuse to treat our own veterans in a decent manner?

The hon. member for Weyburn suggested that the government might well consider reducing the rate of interest on these loans to three and a half per cent as a maximum, and then if the banks will not accept that responsibility the government should make the loans themselves. After all, during the war the government was able to borrow money at less than one per cent, for short term loans, and I am sure they could borrow for less than three per cent and then pass the money on to the veterans at a rate of three per cent.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. GREEN: This is a section about which I made some suggestions during my remarks on second reading. I am going to move:

That section 2(i) of Bill No. 332 be amended by striking out the word "partnership" where it appears therein and substituting in the second line of the subsection the word "business."

The subsection would then read:

(i) "purchase of a business" includes the purchase of an interest in an existing business and the advance of capital for a new business, if the business is to be the main occupation of the veteran, and he intends to participate actively in that business.

I pointed out before my reasons for suggesting that change. I am quite sure that if the change is made the bill will be of more benefit to the veterans than it will as the section reads at the present time, and I urge the government to accept the amendment.

Mr. TUCKER: This was very carefully considered by our committee, and it is quite true that the committee finally recommended that this change be made. The government has had the advice of the director general of rehabilitation, who carefully considered the matter, and of the deputy minister, and their feeling is very strong that we should not agree to this change. As has been pointed out, the veteran must pay one-third of the total amount of the investment. Most veterans will have to use their reestablishment credit in order to do this. The reestablishment credit provisions were before the house, and our committee, and it was decided that we should not permit the veteran to use his reestablishment credit to purchase shares in an incorporated company. It was felt that a veteran might be lured into buying shares in an incorporated company, perhaps on the promise of getting a job, and then, having no control over the company after he had invested his reestablishment credit he might find that for some reason or another he was dismissed and would lose any benefit from the reestablishment credit. So we did not recommend that they have the right to use the reestablishment credit to purchase shares.

There was also the danger that they might be exposed to all kinds of pressure to buy shares in various companies. Section 2, sub-suggestion by the hon. member for Vancouver South to allow veterans to purchase interests in incorporated companies, or to allow them to establish such companies. The protection offered is that in every instance the loan must be secured, with the endorsation of the veterans affairs department; and the credit issued as the result of investigation by the local bank manager who knows the situation, and the man involved. I would again ask the minister to give this matter his careful reconsideration.

Mr. E. B. McKAY (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) did not wish to imply that only supporters of the government and the official opposition had anything to do with the preparation of this legislation.

Mr. GREEN: No.

Mr. McKAY: As a matter of fact both C.C.F. and Social Credit groups played their full part on the veterans affairs committee, and I believe our record for attendance was good. Moreover, while I am definitely in favour of the principle in the bill, I am not in favour of the banks being granted the privilege—and I use that word advisedly—of being able to charge a five per cent interest rate. The banks have argued that of necessity the loans will be small, and that they will be spread from coast to coast. They point out that in most instances repayment will be on a monthly basis, and that therefore the costs of administration will be high. Let me point out that the great majority of loans made by banks are small; any bank manager will say that. They are widespread, too. Every bank manager handles such loans, and veterans' loans will not require any more attention than average small business loans will.

A local bank manager always investigates a loan before he will make it, and most loans are repayable on a monthly basis. For these reasons I cannot understand why a rate of five per cent should be charged, and six per cent on loans in default. In fact, six per cent is the legal maximum; they could not charge more if they wanted to. Anyone knows that he can go into a bank almost anywhere and obtain a loan at five per cent. At the present time veterans can obtain loans at three and one-half per cent from the Department of Veterans Affairs for the purchase of land. Why is the government not handling business loans in the same manner, either through the Department of Veterans Affairs or through the industrial development bank?

A guarantee to the extent of twenty-five per cent has been made to each chartered bank in Canada against a loss. This guarantee is made where the amount of guaranteed loans does not exceed a million dollars. For anything exceeding that amount there is a guarantee of fifteen per cent. Despite these facts, the banks are permitted to charge what I describe as an exorbitant rate of five per cent on what anyone who has anything to do with banking knows is almost a sure-fire proposition.

The banks say they would like to have a reasonable rate of interest. Well, they got only three per cent on victory bonds, and they have other investments on which they receive considerably less. They go on to say that otherwise they will not have any incentive to do this business. It is all very well for them to say that, but they must remember that the boys left our shores for $1.50 a day, and did a good job. It seems to me if the banks take that attitude they are not patriotic, that they are cold-blooded free-enterprise businesses which our lads at $1.50 a day went from our shores to preserve. Apparently the chartered banks have forgotten already the sacrifices made by those boys on the field of battle.

In connection with farm improvement loans, the banks are guaranteed only ten percent of their loss by the government, and surely there can be nothing more risky than loans of that kind. Losses in connection with home improvement loans have been considerably less than two per cent, and small business loans losses run from one-half of one per cent to one per cent. Under this bill the government guarantees to every chartered bank in Canada —not to just one of them—twenty-five per cent on loans up to a million dollars. To me this makes the loans a sure thing so far as the banks are concerned. It is a sure profit with no risk—or at the most very little risk. Even if the Department of Veterans Affairs recommends favourably, a bank does not have to make a loan. Then, out of his own money a veteran has to put up fifty per cent of the amount the bank will agree to lend. Very seldom do banks ask for that percentage.

Unless the banks are prepared to lend money to veterans at three and one-half per cent—or three per cent, as someone has suggested, which is the rate on victory bonds; this is just as good a proposition—I suggest the Department of Veterans Affairs reconsider the matter with a view to lending the money themselves. I am opposed to veterans getting into the clutches of the money lenders.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, for a number of years there has been a persistent demand for legislation to help set veterans up in small business. I believe the veterans will be disappointed with this legislation. They had hoped that legislation would be brought down along the lines of is section 2, paragraph (i), and I am going to read the recommendation which we made as the wording for that paragraph:

"Purchase of a business" includes the purchase of an interest in an existing business.—

We struck out the word "partnership".

—and the advance of capital for a new business—

Again we struck out the word "partnership".

—and if the business is to be the main occupation of the veteran and he intends to participate actively in that business.

That is the suggestion I have to make to the minister in regard to this particular bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member—

Mr. GREEN: I have concluded my remarks, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): What I find wrong with this bill is that it applies to veterans, and the word "veteran" is not properly defined. How can we know? Do members have to carry a library with them, have to carry the statutes of 1942, 1944 and 1946, to know who are those who will be benefited by this act? The drafting of the legislation is bad. Every time something is done for anyone, those who have to interpret the law must know exactly who are those who will benefit by it. That is elementary; the interpretation should not be left to the courts or to the bookworms who try to find out what the legislators in their wisdom have decided. There is no wisdom because there is no proper definition. Plato used to say that those who can define are divine. In this case there is no divinity in the department.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Nor in the hon. member.

Mr. POULIOT: And there is no one who can add the letters "D.D" to his name. I have an objection to this bill. I like to see the returned men, all the men in the army, helped by the assistance of the state. I have no objection to that, and everybody is for it; so far as is possible and reasonable we are all for it. Nobody can say that I am opposed to it. But I have another ground for complaint, one which is entirely different from the one which was expressed so ably by the hon. member for Vancouver South. It is that only those who have volunteered will enjoy the benefit of this legislation—and if I am wrong I want to be corrected at once, because I do not want to put the house under any false impression. I have fought bitterly against the theory that those who have done their duty are only those who have volunteered. Of course the men in the air force and in the navy volunteered to get in; that is right. But in the army there are men who have abided strictly by the law, and they are put into the class of untouchables. The benefits of this legislation will be denied them.

I will not repeat what I have said, but again I protest strongly against the kind of legislation, which deprives assistance to law-abiding Canadians who have done their duty, who have complied strictly with the law of the land, and who are set aside by a measure such as this, which gives benefits to some Canadians who have done more than was required by the law of the land.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): I rise to support the bill. It will be a great benefit to a large number of veterans who wish to establish themselves in business or professionally. But I wish to concur in the suggestion made by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). The defect in this bill is that it does not enable veterans to buy into an incorporated business or to establish small incorporated companies. I am going to speak of a situation of which I have some knowledge. There are experienced loggers and lumbermen in my constituency. I know of their circumstances; I know their experience, and I know the conditions. In my constituency, we have immense stands of timber. I can think of one block—the hon. member for Vancouver South knows of it—where there are over 500 million feet of timber in the Lardeau district. We have veterans of experience. We have the natural resources. I believe if this bill had included a provision under which men could join together to form incorporated companies we would be giving those veterans with experience residing in that community their rightful opportunity to develop those natural resources. In that district alone, if this provision were incorporated in the bill—and I suggest that the minister give the matter serious consideration—he would be making it possible for a considerable number of veterans to establish themselves soundly, as the result of experience, in the lumber industry of that community. I am sure a similar situation exists in other parts of British Columbia.

Under the present bill it is possible to enter into a partnership, but I am sure the minister must realize that partnerships of that type are most unsatisfactory. Under modern conditions a business cannot be carried out in the proper way by sharing the ownership with three or four other persons in a partnership. I would ask the minister to reconsider the lines of endeavour. However, this bill should help, and the official opposition believe that it should be passed and given a fair trial.

I think I am correct in saying that of the bills being considered by this house it is the only one that is brand new. The others are either amendments to old acts or bills enacting orders in council in statute form. This bill however is a new one, and it is to assist not only in the establishment of a business but also in starting in a profession or going into a trade.

As I read the bill, the general plan is that it will enable the commercial banks of the country to extend assistance to veterans in cases where normally they would not grant a loan. This end is achieved by way of a guarantee by the government to the banks. It is a blanket guarantee, and if I remember correctly the government is liable up to a total of 25 per cent of the money lent, up to $1,000,000,—

Mr. TUCKER: For each bank.

Mr. GREEN: —and fifteen per cent for any amount over $1,000,000 lent to each bank. In return for this backing the banks are to make longer term loans than they would normally do, the limit being ten years under the act. They are to charge a lower rate of interest, five per cent only, I believe, until the loan falls into default, when they can charge a higher rate. They are enabled to take security on real estate, which as members know they cannot do in their ordinary business.

From the veteran's point of view the maximum loan, I believe, is $3,000. He cannot get more than that amount, and he must put up half as much as he borrows; in other words, if he received $3,000 he would have to put up from his own resources the sum of $1,500.

Mr. TUCKER: One-third.

Mr. GREEN: It is one-third of the total invested in the business, as I read the act, which means that if the bank put up $3,000 the veteran would put up $1,500. There is a very wide discretion in the bank to turn down loans. The banks do not have to make loans unless they wish to do so. Finally, the act is in effect for only five years. In other words, if the veteran is to get a loan he must get it within five years from the passing of the act. These, I believe, are the main features of the bill. The minister or his assistant will correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: There is one point about the bill which should be drawn to the attention of the house, namely, that it restricts a veteran to buying into a business which is a partnership. He cannot buy into an incorporated company. That feature was considered carefully by the veterans affairs committee, and after a good deal of discussion we recommended that the veteran should be given the power to obtain a loan for the purpose of buying into an incorporated business; that he should not be restricted to a partnership. But the government did not see fit to accept that recommendation. According to the bill as it now reads, the money can be used only to buy a partnership or an interest in a partnership. I would point out to the minister that it is unwise to make that restriction. In these days, as he and I well know, the average business man wants to have his business incorporated. That gets him away from a personal liability. If the business fails, then the owner of the business will not be personally responsible for all the debts. The veteran is entitled to the same privilege, but he is not getting it under this bill. The reason given was that he might buy into a firm where he did not hold a majority of the shares, and then the majority shareholders could squeeze him out or be unfair to him. Of course there is a good deal of truth in that, but at the same time he could be treated roughly even if he were in a partnership. Despite the fact that he has certain rights as a partner, still, in the long run, if the partnership goes broke he is in a bad spot.

This is an instance in which the finance department, who drew this bill, was not willing to go far enough. We are told by the government that if the veteran is to use his rehabilitation grant he can use it only for buying into a partnership, not into an incorporated company. But this is a different case entirely, because these business loans have first to be approved by the Department of Veterans Affairs, which is one protection for the veteran, and after that there has to be approval by the bank which makes the loan, which is the second assurance that the veteran is not to be treated unfairly by the person with whom he is going into business.

I do suggest to the minister that even at this late date he accept the recommendation made by the veterans affairs committee, that there be no such restriction placed on the veteran; that he be allowed to buy an interest in a business, or buy the whole business, whether it is a partnership or an incorporated company. The minister will remember that the section under which that would be done

General measures which might be taken during an epidemic are: First, general warning to physicians and people generally of the prevalence of the disease, and warning of parents to report all suspicious cases for immediate medical care. Second, all children with fever should be isolated in bed pending diagnosis. Third, protection of children as far as practicable against unnecessary contact with other persons and crowds, avoiding all unnecessary visiting and travelling. Fourth, maintenance of general health of all children at as high a level as possible, with rest periods.

For the general information of the house I may say that not a great deal of progress has been made in the treatment of infantile paralysis. The new drugs which people speak of so much nowadays, sulpha drugs and penicillin, are absolutely powerless against the ravages of poliomyelitis. The disease is caused by what is known as a virus, and these drugs do not appear to have any effect upon that particular virus. It would appear that the disease itself occurs in cycles, because the virus increases in virulence over a period of four or five years. Other methods of treatment which have been discarded have been the injection of human serum taken from the spinal cord of patients who have made a recovery. That is not giving the beneficial results which had been hoped for. I hope that people will not place too much reliance in the new drug called curare, which in isolated cases has given results but which has not been generally tested sufficiently to warrant the assertion that it has specific curative powers. For that reason it is to be hoped that people will not put too much confidence in it.

I am apprehensive that this may be one of the cycle years and in view of the fact that the epidemic has reached enormous proportions at this time in the United States, there is grave danger of there being a considerable increase in the number of cases in Canada.

I do not know that any better advice can be given than to tell people generally to follow the precautions that we have outlined, and that children, who are the principal victims, should be kept away from crowds and given plenty of rest and that their lives should be so regulated as not to give them too much exercise.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it from the minister's remarks that medical science has not made very much progress in ascertaining the cause of the disease known as infantile paralysis.

[Mr. McCann.]

Mr. McCANN: The cause has been pretty well determined. It is caused by what we call a virus as distinct from a bacillus, and medical science has not been able to find any specific remedy that will kill the virus.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member should be thanked. That is the way the minister of health should talk to the house.

Mr. McKAY: Has the minister considered the advisability of using the Canadian Broadcasting corporation's stations, under the auspices of the Department of National Health and Welfare, to inform the public of the symptoms of the disease and the early treatment?

Mr. McCANN: I may assure the hon. gentleman that every facility will be used by the federal department of health, in conjunction with the provincial departments, to keep the public aware of the progress which the disease is making and of such measures as can be provided to prevent the spread of it to the proportions of an epidemic.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

VETERANS BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONAL LOANS ACT

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of bill No. 332, respecting loans to veterans to assist in establishment of business or professionally.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): The description of this bill gives an idea of what it is supposed to do. It is described as an act respecting loans to veterans to assist in their establishment in business or professionally. I believe the main idea was to help the veteran to become established in a small business. Recommendations to that effect were made over a year ago by the Canadian Legion and other soldier organizations, and the special committee of this house which sat last fall also made a recommendation which is to be found in their last report as follows:

> Your committee further recommends that the government give consideration to providing some measure of assistance other than that now provided under the War Service Grants Act, 1944, by way of loans to veterans who wish to engage in business.

This legislation is the result of those recommendations. I regret that there has been such long delay in bringing in the measure, because probably the result will be that quite a few veterans will not be able to take advantage of it, having in the meantime gone into other give me the assurance that we can take this matter up with the Minister of Transport and that he will have the authority to introduce bills dealing with the rehabilitation of merchant seamen without interfering with the work that has already been done by the veterans affairs committee, I shall be prepared to accept that.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I shall be very glad indeed to give my hon. friend, on behalf of my colleague, that assurance. May I refer the hon. member for Cape Breton South to a pamphlet issued by the Department of Transport on merchant seamen: part 10, benefits to members; part 11, remuneration—I am not going to weary the house by reading it now—wartime benefits, income tax concessions, pensions and compensations; part 12 thereof, civil reestablishment, hospitalization and treatment, merchant seamen, special bonus order; part 13 thereof, other benefits to seamen; and part 14 thereof, before the discussion which he expects will take place.

Mr. GILLIS: That is all contingent upon whether the seaman is pensioned. If he is not pensioned he is not entitled to this.

Mr. TUCKER: Not all of it.

Mr. GILLIS: None, unless he is pensioned.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh, no.

Mr. GILLIS: According to our evidence it is.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We will discuss it later.

Mr. POULIOT: My suggestion is that in due course preference should be extended only to seamen on Canadian registered vessels, especially Park Steamships, not the vessels of the united nations.

PUBLIC HEALTH

STATEMENT AS TO STEPS TAKEN TO CONTROL INFANTILE PARALYSIS

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, may I have the permission of the house to make a brief statement with reference to a question which was asked yesterday by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon)? Yesterday the hon. member for Peel asked a question with reference to the increase of cases of infantile paralysis in certain sections of Canada, and wished a statement on the present situation and what steps can be taken in connection with the spread of the epidemic. He also asked for a report on the number of cases and the comparison with the number in previous years when the epidemic was at its height in Canada.

I can well understand the concern of the hon. gentleman, as well as that of the Canadian people generally who recall the devastating effects of previous epidemics. This matter is of increasing importance to Canadians in view of the fact that the epidemic is sweeping sections of the United States, and our proximity to that country gives us reason for fear that the epidemic may spread to Canada.

Infantile paralysis is a peculiar disease, in that it appears to run in cycles of years. The greatest incidence of the disease in recent years was in 1941, when there were between January 1 and July 31 of that year two hundred and two cases. In 1937, it was regarded as epidemic in Ontario from the middle of August until the middle of October. In 1941 it was regarded as epidemic in Manitoba and New Brunswick from the middle of July to the middle of September.

I will now give you the total number of cases occurring in Canada from January 1 to July 31 for the years 1937 to 1946: 1937, 130; 1938, 139; 1939, 85; 1940, 47; 1941, 202; 1942, 111; 1943, 43; 1944, 88; 1945, 67; and to the end of July, 1946, 155 cases have been reported.

The control and treatment of poliomyelitis falls within the jurisdiction of the provinces and the municipalities. The dominion Department of Health and Welfare can act only by extending any assistance in its power upon request of the province. Actual control and treatment of the disease is primarily a matter for municipal authorities acting along general lines of the regulations of the municipality and of the province.

Methods of control may be classified under two headings. First, as respects the infected individual. We suggest encouragement of as early recognition of the disease as possible. When the disease is epidemic, measures are taken to make consultant and laboratory services easily available to medical practitioners. Those laboratories are both provincial and dominion laboratories. Second, the hospitalization of the sick as far as this is possible, with isolation of the patient for from two to three weeks. Third, disinfection of discharges from the nose, throat and bowels, and of soiled articles. Fourth, investigation as far as possible of the sources of infection to locate unrecognized and unreported cases of the disease.

Mr. POULIOT: Just a word in support of the contention of the hon. member for Fraser Valley. This bill is for the purpose of granting allowances to men who do not have a pension. If a man has a sufficient pension to live on, he does not need any allowance, and that is so much saved to the country. The purpose of the allowance is to correct the position of the man who is entitled to something from the state but has not been awarded a pension. If the seamen are given the civil service preference, they will be appointed to jobs which will provide them with enough to live on, and they will not ask for allowances. Therefore I think we are perfectly in order in suggesting that the civil service preference be given to seamen. These men were down in the engine rooms of ships that were stoked in the old-fashioned way, and they had to work much harder than seamen who were working on big modern ships. If they are given the civil service preference and get a civil service job, a lesser amount will be paid in allowances by virtue of that. So in the first place there are those seamen who have a pension; in the second place those who have jobs by virtue of the civil service preference, and the men who will get an allowance will be those who have not a pension and have not been successful in passing a civil service examination and getting an appointment notwithstanding the civil service preference given to them.

I am interested in this matter. Last session I asked a question about the civil service preference being extended to merchant seamen, and I did so again this year. Therefore I believe, Mr. Chairman, that we are strictly in order in discussing the improvement of this bill by giving to the seamen the same opportunities as have been given to men in the armed forces.

The CHAIRMAN: I am afraid that the discussion is not strictly in order. For instance, the preference which is given to members of the armed forces is given under the Civil Service Act and not under the Pension Act. The discussion of the civil service preference at this time when we are considering a bill to grant war pensions is not in order. One hon. member stated that the bill had to do with civil war pensions and allowances. I have glanced through the bill and it occurs to me that the allowances referred to are allowances in lieu of pensions, and not allowances generally. If I am incorrect in that, I would ask the parliamentary assistant to explain to the committee the meaning of the word "allowances", so that the discussion in committee may be in order.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

Mr. TUCKER: There is just one thing in this bill in regard to allowances for a merchant seaman who is taken prisoner. Provision is made for his pay and allowances being brought up to the level of what the merchant seaman would have got if he had not been taken prisoner. That comes under section 14, and these allowances are called detention allowances. The only reason that this department is involved is that the administration is placed in the hands of the pension commission. I suppose strictly speaking it could be argued that because provision is made for detention allowances we should provide a lot of other benefits, but my suggestion to you, Mr. Chairman, and through you to the committee, is that all these other things to be done for merchant seamen will be done under the Department of Transport. That department has been studying the evidence taken by the veterans affairs committee and its recommendations and has arrived at certain decisions as to what they will ask parliament for. I think this discussion is a little beside the point, because we are not prepared to answer questions in regard to what another department is going to do. If we are to do that we should send for the Minister of Transport and his officials, but it would seem to me that in the interests of speeding up the work the members should be willing to bring those questions up on the estimates of the Department of Transport.

Mr. GILLIS: I would be satisfied to accept the suggestion of the parliamentary assistant and hand this whole thing over to the Department of Transport and discuss it on the estimates of that department if I were not afraid of what the Minister of Transport would say. In fact he did tell us that the only bill that they were preparing was one with reference to compensation. We have already accepted this responsibility. Reference has been made to our proceedings in the veterans affairs committee. If hon. members will look at page 40 of the proceedings they will find that we have extended to seamen the benefits of veterans' insurance, the Veterans' Land Act, vocational training, and certain other benefits contingent upon the merchant seaman being pensioned. That gives the Minister of Transport a chance to say that all these rehabilitation measures are conditional upon "if pensioned". It is not reasonable to suppose that the Department of Transport will bring in bills duplicating something we have already done. As we have made the benefits conditional upon "if pensioned", I think we are obliged to discuss the position of the merchant seamen under veterans affairs. But if the Minister of Veterans Affairs will

A bill was brought in concerning merchant seamen, but it was an imperfect bill. As a member of parliament I have the right and privilege to make recommendations.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Did my hon. friend make any remarks whatsoever when the bill was discussed last Monday?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I do not know whether I did or not, but I am going to make plenty before this is through.

Mr. GREEN: That bill dealt only with workmen's compensation.

The CHAIRMAN: A bill which passed the house last Monday cannot now be discussed.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The minister referred to it; I did not.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think the discussion should continue.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is just the point I was going to make. The bill last Monday did not have any relation to the matter that is before us now, and it should not have been discussed under this measure.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. TUCKER: The reason it was brought up—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Have I the floor, or not?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order:

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am not going to sit down for the new leader in Saskatchewan. I am asking if I have the floor or not.

The CHAIRMAN: I am giving a ruling with regard to procedure. It is irregular to discuss a bill which has already been passed at this session. I suggest that the committee do not discuss it further.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is the very thing I did not want to discuss; I did not bring the bill into this discussion and I leave it to any member to say if I did. I understood defintely, and other hon. members of the veterans affairs committee were with me, that we had the assurance that any suggestions or amendments we wanted to bring in concerning merchant seamen could be brought in. That is the only reason why many members of the veterans affairs committee agreed to allow this bill to pass. I am not opposing this bill; I am simply stating that we were given that assurance. One particular item I want to discuss is the fact that a merchant seaman has no civil service preference. Can you show me anything in this bill having to do with that? I am merely asking if there will be any opportunity for a member to discuss these matters concerning merchant seamen.

Mr. TUCKER: Just so that there may be no doubt about this matter, may I say that our committee did deal with that question and were very much concerned about the merchant seamen. They discussed it, and the understanding was that it was a matter for the Department of Transport to handle, because merchant seamen were always under that department. This bill gives rights to merchant seamen in regard to pensions—

Mr. GREEN: And allowances.

Mr. TUCKER: It provides for a detention allowance for merchant seamen, and I suppose that if you were to press very strongly you could argue, why not give other rights? Technically I suppose that could be discussed. But I do suggest to my hon. friend that our department, outside of the administration of pensions and administration of detention allowances, has not had under consideration this whole question of what further should be done for merchant seamen. That has been under consideration by the transport department and its officials. We have not the transport officials here, and we did not come prepared to discuss matters coming under that department. The Minister of Transport is fully familiar with this question, and I suggest to hon. members that they bring up this question of what is being done for the rehabilitation of merchant seamen and salt-water fishermen when the estimates of the Department of Transport are before the house, or perhaps on some bill which that department brings in. There is no doubt that hon. members will have a chance to discuss this matter under the estimates of the Department of Transport.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Have I the assurance of the parliamentary assistant that this matter can be discussed then? I and others did everything we could to bring the matter before the veterans affairs committee, and each time we were sidetracked by the statement that we would definitely have an opportunity to discuss it. If that matter has nothing to do with veterans, why are seamen mentioned in this bill? Of course it has something to do with veterans affairs. By order in council these merchant seamen were given the assurance that they would be treated as a fourth arm of the service and given every consideration. Surely we are entitled to the assurance that we shall be able to discuss whether the merchant seamen should be given the same benefits as an A.R.P. warden in Hull is getting.

Mr. TUCKER: The exact situation with regard to what has been done for merchant seamen will be found set out on pages 36, 37, 38, 39, 40 and 41 of the proceedings of the committee. To read those pages and place them on the record would take a considerable time. Every hon. member has a copy of the proceedings. It would be out of order for me to outline them unless I had unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN: I am sure the parliamentary assistant has answered the question of the hon. member for Skeena. The hon. member did not necessarily want a statement placed on Hansard; he wanted to know where it could be found.

Mr. GREEN: There is one serious omission in the allowances made to merchant seamen. The bill we are now dealing with has to do with allowances and pensions, but the omission I refer to is the inability of merchant seamen to qualify for educational assistance or vocational training. They may qualify for vocational training if the training they are to take has something to do with their ocupation as seamen. In other words, a seaman can take training in order to qualify for certain posts in the merchant navy, but he cannot take general vocational or university training. I think that is unfair. I do not blame the Department of Veterans Affairs for it, but the fact is that a man who served only in Canada, in the forces, can get training at a university, while the seaman who served in dangerous waters cannot. I suggest that the government give consideration to remedying that omission.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I understand that the Minister of Transport is making provision for exactly what is suggested by the hon. member. I think my colleague has a letter to that effect.

Mr. GREEN: Could we have the letter read into the record so that we may have assurance that the omission is to be made good?

Mr. TUCKER: We have been interested in the matter because it was before the committee. We are assured that vocational training can be dealt with by an item in the estimates, and I understand it is to be dealt with. It does not have to be done by way of change in the law.

Mr. GREEN: Will it include educational assistance?

[Mr. Bradette.]

Mr. TUCKER: The Minister of Transport will deal with that. I do not want to be too definite about it, and I suggest that the matter be brought up on his estimates.

Mr. GREEN: Will it include educational allowances?

Mr. TUCKER: No, vocational training only. If it does not go as far as some members of the committee would like, I suggest that they bring up the matter when the estimates of the Department of Transport are before us. In regard to unemployment insurance, a bill amending the Unemployment Insurance Act is before the senate and will come before this house. That is all under the Department of Transport, and it would be better to have the minister deal with it. The committee can then get exact information as to what the intentions are.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Speaking on behalf of a new member of my party and myself—I am speaking jointly—I want to say I understood that assurance was given in the veterans affairs committee—my hon. friend will correct me if I am not right—that we would have a chance to discuss the things that have not been done for the merchant seamen. Some members of the veterans affairs committee took strong exception to the decisions of the chairman and of some members of the advisory committee, and my understanding was that we were to have a full opportunity here under some bill to make recommendations in the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Was my hon. friend in the house last Monday?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I was here all the time.

Mr. MACKENZIE: A bill dealing with merchant seamen went through the house last Monday.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Yes, that is just the thing I am kicking about. I think some hon. members feel that that bill did not include everything they wanted.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Did my hon. friend not have an opportunity to discuss that bill in this house last Monday?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I do not want to get into any argument. I attended nearly every meeting of the veterans affairs committee and I understood distinctly that we were given the assurance that we should have an opportunity—other hon. members will bear me out—to make any recommendations.

from Wabana to Sydney which, if proven, would establish to the satisfaction of the commission that the ship was engaged in essential war work.

Nothing further was heard from the applicant although this decision was communicated to him on June 26, 1944, and nothing further has been heard from him since that time. He has the right to renew his claim and to present oral evidence to prove his claim. The commission would consider all such evidence. On the evidence before them they made this decision. He had all the rights left to him that are found in the Pension Act. To make an attack on the commission, based upon the first decision, when all these other rights were open to the person in question, and explained to him, is to give a wrong impression.

I would ask the hon. member and other hon. members that whenever a case like this comes up, they ask that the matter be looked into further, and the commission will only be too glad to hear the evidence. If the evidence in any way indicates that the person in question comes under the provisions of the order in council of that time, or the act as it is passed, I can guarantee he will receive every possible consideration from the pension commission.

Mr. GILLIS: The statement just made by the parliamentary assistant does not alter my opinion or contention one iota. In the first place the accident arose out of this man's employment on a ship. The decision rendered by the commission in 1944, if sent to him, must have been vague, because in April 1946, as indicated by letters I read into the record this morning, he wrote to the director of merchant marine at Ottawa asking exactly why his claim had been turned down. The director of merchant marine in Ottawa got in touch with the commission, according to the letter I read this morning, and made an apology to the boy—

Mr. MACKENZIE: My good friend is referring to some observations made by a minister or an official of another department. The section before us deals entirely with the Department of Veterans Affairs. The parliamentary assistant has given the concise facts in the matter.

Mr. GILLIS: What I am stating now is relevant to the statement made by the parliamentary assistant. The natural and logical person for a member of the merchant marine to approach would be the director of merchant marine service.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Again on a point of order, I say the decision was rendered in this case.

Mr. GILLIS: That is not a point of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, it is. This morning the hon. member said that this matter had been taken up in 1943 and no decision had been rendered. According to the statement now submitted a decision was rendered in 1944.

Mr. GILLIS: I did not interrupt the parliamentary assistant when he made his statement. I listened attentively, and I am not now assessing its validity or otherwise. However I too read documentary evidence into the record this morning, upon which I based my opinion. I did not attack the commission. I did not say they were lax in rendering their decision. I simply pointed to the statement made by the director of the merchant marine service to the man affected, that the reason he did not answer more quickly was the delay on the part of the commission in answering him.

I am glad that matter has been discussed, because it focuses attention on the point. I have written the minister about it, and I hope the matter will be straightened out so that this boy may receive what I think he is legitimately entitled to, compensation for the loss of his leg.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The facts will speak for themselves, and if my hon. friend will look over the file I think he will agree with me.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: The parliamentary assistant stated this morning that he did not want to list the benefits that had been extended to seamen, but for my information I should like him to do that.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member replied he would not be in order, because the bill before the committee deals with pensions and allowances.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think the hon. member's request is a reasonable one, and we shall be glad to accede to it, but it would be out of order unless there were unanimous consent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is a matter of record; it is a matter known to every member of this committee, but if the hon. member has the unanimous consent of the committee he can have it now.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: It would take only two minutes to outline exactly what has been given them. I should like to have it on the record.

Mr. BRADETTE: It is on the committee record already.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not correct; they do not get the run-around from our department.

Mr. TUCKER: He should not say that.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not want to take up the time to give a lot of other cases.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We are prepared to meet you at every opportunity.

Mr. GILLIS: In this particular case, as I pointed out earlier, I do not make these accusations. I ask the minister to check with the director of Canadian merchant seamen, because in the letter he definitely states that there was a delay and that the delay in answering this boy was occasioned by the fact that his checking with the commission was delayed. He says that they merely confirmed to him that the appeal for pension was duly considered but disallowed.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Chairman, on the point raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, examination of the files he mentioned bears out what I had thought probably happened. A first decision was rendered and no further action taken.

Before dealing with this case may I have your permission, sir, to be out of order for a matter of only three or four sentences? During the consideration of this legislation I have had occasion to rise and suggest that certain other hon. members were out of order. It was for this reason that I did not at once, as I should have done, thank most sincerely those hon. members who were so kind as to welcome me back from my province of Saskatchewan, to say such kind words concerning me and to offer me their good wishes. My relationship with members of the House of Commons has been so friendly and pleasant that the thought of having to terminate that relationship at some time in the future and ceasing to be a member of parliament is a most unpleasant one. It will be one of the most difficult and painful things I shall ever have had to do.

I am glad the hon. member for Cape Breton South is in his seat, because I have before me the facts respecting the gentleman mentioned. I shall not give his name, because I should like to place on record the actual decision rendered in the matter. I do not think his name was given by the hon. member.

This gentleman was serving on a ship which was certified by the Department of Transport to be a ship of Canadian registry. On June 2, 1943, he met with an accident on board ship which resulted in amputation of his leg. Following upon the accident he was admitted to hospital and apparently was discharged on January 27, 1944.

An official of the immigration branch at Halifax telephoned the commission's representative, the pension medical examiner, and asked if he was interested in the case. Doctor Henderson, the examiner, thought it would be wise to carry out an examination and so obviate the possibility of any delay. This examination took place on January 26. The seaman was supplied with the necessary application form and the provisions for merchant seamen with regard to pension were fully explained to him.

The completed application form was received by the commission on February 24, 1944. Five days later the commission wrote to the Department of Transport requesting official advice regarding the registry of the vessel, whether the applicant was a member of the crew, and particulars regarding the operating company. On the same day the commission wrote to the seaman acknowledging the application, advising that it was receiving attention and requesting advice from him as to whether his statement that the accident occurred during a blackout referred to a general blackout in the area or during one on board the ship. He was advised at that time that his eligibility would hinge on the question whether the disability resulted from extraordinary marine peril consequent upon the existence of a state of hostilities. On the same day the commission made further inquiries with regard to the treatment which had been carried out at the marine hospital at Halifax and as to the extent of his disability.

When the necessary details were before the commission they were very carefully reviewed, and on May 12, 1944, the following decision was rendered:

> According to the information available to the commission this applicant fell and injured his right leg on June 2, 1943, and later the leg had to be amputated. He alleges that the injury was sustained when he fell down a stoke-hole during a blackout aboard the ship. This contention is not borne out by the extract from the official log book which states that he was the worse for liquor all during the evening of June 2 and had fallen over a settee on the deck, and about 11.30 p.m. was found on the floor of the stoke-hole—leg broken.

Mr. GILLIS: If there is an argument now it was not developed by me; it was developed by the minister and by the chairman of the veterans affairs committee. I was dealing specifically with the administration of the Pension Act with reference to Canadian seamen, and I put a particular case on the record. It is not my story at all, but the story of the director of the Canadian merchant seamen. In addition to that there is the fact that a seaman who suffered the loss of a leg has been endeavouring to get redress under the Pension Act since 1943.

Mr. TUCKER: The letter which the hon. member read was not from the pension commission at all. It is most unfair to bring a charge of that kind against the pension commission when the letter is not from that commission. Section 3, which we have already passed, reads as follows:

> All claims for pensions, allowances and compensation under this act shall be dealt with and adjudicated upon in like manner as claims under the Pension Act.

I would ask the hon. member whether this matter has been pursued and all advantages taken as provided by law. He does not know. I submit to you, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MACKENZIE: He does not know where the case rests.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, I do.

Mr. TUCKER: He does not know how far it was taken.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, I do.

Mr. TUCKER: Does the hon. member know whether it was taken to appeal as provided by the Pension Act?

Mr. GILLIS: It took from 1943 to 1946 to get this far.

Mr. MACKENZIE: And a letter was written to the minister on August 7, and has not yet been received.

Mr. GILLIS: True, but the minister is not the pension commission.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is a good thing he is not.

Mr. GILLIS: It went there only as a last resort to see if the minister would not improve the machinery in this particular case.

Mr. MUTCH: When was the application for pension made?

Mr. GILLIS: The application for pension was made when the boy was admitted to hospital with the loss of a leg.

Mr. TUCKER: When?

Mr. GILLIS: In 1943.

Mr. TUCKER: Does the hon. member know?

Mr. GILLIS: His leg was amputated on October 4, 1943, in a departmental hospital; he was admitted to the hospital on June 3 of that year.

Mr. MUTCH: How soon after that did he make application for pension?

Mr. LENNARD: Who made the application?

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is the point.

Mr. GILLIS: I am sure the hon. member—

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is important to get the facts.

Mr. GILLIS: Hon. members know that if I went into a departmental hospital there would be a file started immediately. My claim would be registered and my disability noted.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Was there such a claim?

Mr. GILLIS: Certainly there was.

Mr. MACKENZIE: When?

Mr. GILLIS: When he entered hospital.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Has my friend a copy of the claim?

Mr. GILLIS: I assume that will be in the department's files. That is why I wrote the minister, to get it. The claim started when the boy's leg was amputated in the departmental hospital.

Mr. TUCKER: I suggest the hon. member is drawing an inference from the letter he read which is not correct.

Mr. GILLIS: I am stating the facts.

Mr. TUCKER: Does the letter say that is was not due to his service? It may very well be that he did not make a claim until recently.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is the point.

Mr. TUCKER: It may be that the claim is in its early stages.

Mr. GILLIS: His claim was disallowed.

Mr. TUCKER: I say this with a great deal of reluctance, because the hon. member has been most cooperative in the committee. I do suggest that to rise and read a letter such as that, without any definite facts or anything else, and to suggest, as the hon. member did, that the merchant seamen get the run-around, is to do something which is not right.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am told by the chairman of the pension commission that he has not yet had this case brought to his attention.

Mr. GILLIS: The reason I put it on the record is that this boy lost his leg in 1943.

Mr. MACKENZIE: But I am afraid the inference is that there has been some delay in our department. That is the last thing we want to have happen and the first thing we wish to avoid. I wish to trace it to see when my hon. friend's letter came to my office. I am told by the chairman, who is most sympathetic to those cases, that he has not heard of the case yet.

Mr. GILLIS: There is no inference that there was any delay on the part of the minister. There is an accusation of June 28 from the director of merchant seamen that the Canadian pension commission did delay. I might read the paragraph again:

> I regret very much that there has been such a delay in replying to your letters but I have been daily expecting a reply to the inquiries I made regarding your case, to the Canadian pension board.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Was that done locally or from the national board, the Canadian pension commission?

Mr. GILLIS: The commission here; this letter is from Ottawa and is signed by G. L. C. Johnson, director of merchant seamen.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I should like to check that, if the hon. member does not mind.

Mr. GILLIS: There is no inference on my part. I merely read the letter to indicate that the man had an accident in 1943 and was put in hospital under pension regulations. He was then discharged. Really his case has been in the files of the commission since 1943.

Mr. MACKENZIE: In all fairness I want to say—and I am not speaking in a partial way at all—I have never seen such marvellous expedition of business as I have seen in the Canadian pension commission in the last two years.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not saying there has not been; I am merely placing the facts on the record. I have a letter from the director of merchant seamen which indicates that there was delay on the part of the commission in answering correspondence. I have written the minister about it, but of course he has not had a chance to answer the letter or to take the matter up. The reason I do this is that I find in all phases which the merchant seamen have to go through to secure war bonus, based on wages, it takes weeks and weeks of writing and completing forms. My experience has been that there is a tendency to brush the merchant seamen off—

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, we cannot accept that. I should like the committee on veterans affairs to review the benefits extended by Canada to merchant seamen and compare them with the statement of Right Hon. Winston Churchill on what England has done for the merchant seamen. We have done ten times more than the old country did for their seamen.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not concerned about that—

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am.

Mr. GILLIS: —and the fact that South Africa and England—

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is a credit to our own country.

Mr. GILLIS: —are not doing something. I am concerned with this letter and the fact that if we in Canada have an obligation we should live up to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We are ahead of every other country.

Mr. TUCKER: The difficulty about this matter is that when an hon. member rises in his place and says all these things—

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. TUCKER: If I rose and answered the hon. member and recited all the things we have done for the merchant seamen outside of pensions I would be out of order. The practice of getting up and saying that we are not doing something in other directions, and saying it in such a way that it cannot be answered without being out of order, is improper. If the hon. member is going to debate what we are going to do for the merchant seamen, have done and will do, he is certainly outside the ambit of this bill, and I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. IRVINE: What is the point of order?

Mr. TUCKER: The hon. member is out of order; that is the point of order. He is discussing matters other than pensions, which is the only matter before the house. I could list the things which we have done for the merchant seamen. The hon. member has made a statement as to what has been done for merchant seamen, which is unfair to this committee. If I were to rise and recite all that has been done I would be distinctly out of order. I suggest the hon. member should not have done that.

compensation schemes that exist in all the provinces. It is really a civilian matter. The members of the veterans affairs committee—and this is the reason why these men were overlooked there—were under the impression that the Minister of Transport was preparing a bill that would cover these men.

Mr. BROOKS: We were told so.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, but unfortunately that did not take place. I suppose it is too late at this session to do very much about it. It is a matter for the house to decide. Personally I think a special bill should be prepared covering Canadian merchant seamen, extending to them the benefits of rehabilitation as in the case of the armed services and the auxiliary services. In my opinion no one who went through the war is more entitled to consideration than the merchant seamen, because they certainly took it on the chin. They had no glory, they had no uniforms, they got no medals, they spent a lot of time on rafts in the ocean and all that kind of thing, and at this stage of the game the least we can do for them is to give them the rights of rehabilitation as we have done for the armed and auxiliary services.

As to pensions, I have something specific to say. It is difficult for a Canadian merchant seaman to secure a pension. I have a case in point, and the best illustration is the way in which the act is being administered. I have here two letters which I think pretty well cover the point. They show the run-around that the merchant seaman gets in all these matters because he is not looked upon as one who had anything to do with the war. Here is a statement from a boy who has a disability. He suffered the loss of a leg. The letter reads:

Sydney Mines, N.S.,
5 April, 1946.

Mr. G. L. C. Johnson,
Director of Merchant Seamen,
95 Rideau Street,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir:

On June 3, 1943, while serving as a merchant seaman aboard the steamship Phillip T. Dodge in Sydney, Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, I suffered an accident which later necessitated the amputation of my right leg. Particulars of the case are as listed hereunder:

On June 3, 1943, while the ship was in Sydney harbour, unloading, I accidentally fell into the stoke hole. I was admitted to Sydney City Hospital on June 3, 1943. Amputation was effected 4 October, 1943 and I was transferred to the Halifax Infirmary on November 8, 1943, where I remained under treatment for approximately four months. Later, on return to Sydney Mines it was necessary to be admitted to the Sydney Merchant Marine Hospital and again to the Halifax Infirmary for checkup and further treatment.

The steamship Phillip T. Dodge is owned by the Waterman Steamship Company, registered in Saint John, New Brunswick, and at the time of my accident was chartered by the Dominion Steel and Coal Company.

Prior to this accident I was actively engaged as a merchant seaman, in dangerous waters aboard Canadian ships for several years.

He concludes by asking whether the director of merchant seamen would advise him of the procedure he should follow in order to qualify for a pension. The answer he received was written on June 28, 1946—and it will be remembered that this boy suffered his accident in 1943. This is what they say:

Ottawa, June 28, 1946.

Dear Sir:

I regret very much that there has been such a delay in replying to your letters but I have been daily expecting a reply to the inquiries I made regarding your case, to the Canadian pension board.

They have confirmed to me that your appeal for pension was duly considered but on full investigation of the circumstances surrounding your accident on board the Phillip T. Dodge it was found that it was not within their power to grant you a pension. Inasmuch as you are not pensionable it is also impossible for you to be considered for a vocational training grant.

It is indeed unfortunate that such an accident occurred to you but from the facts now ascertained it would appear that your accident resulted not through the line of duty but it was through your own personal liability that you suffered the loss of your limb.

I assure you that I greatly sympathize with you in your predicament but there seems to be absolutely no way in which assistance may be given to you.

I have written to the minister with reference to the case and I do not suppose he has had a chance to check it up. That was only on August 7. I have asked him to check with the commission and ascertain on what basis they made the decision.

Mr. TUCKER: Does the hon. member know at what stage the application stands now? I hate to see these statements put on Hansard and the suggestion made that there has been a final decision, because the same steps are taken in this as in the case of an ordinary application for pension. First there is a ruling and then the matter goes to the pension appeal board. It might very well be that this man's application has not yet reached the last stage. If the hon. member will give the particulars to the minister or myself or the chairman—

Mr. GILLIS: I have already given them.

Mr. TUCKER: —it will be looked into right away.

Even yet, I suggest, some consideration should be given by the house to extending the rehabilitation regulations to the Canadian merchant seamen. I believe the education benefits should have been extended. I believe some form of gratuity should have been given them. I am of course aware of the fact that the Department of Transport has set up a bonus system which is considered as a gratuity, but the nature of the requirements, the form of application and the procedure which the seaman has to go through restrict the scheme, in my opinion, to the point where very few men are benefiting by it. Of course we shall examine that under the minister's estimates.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he is not in order. He knows perfectly well that it is against the rules to refer to former debates in this house, and I understand that the matter he is talking about was discussed here some time ago.

Mr. GILLIS: Well, Mr. Speaker, on second reading of this bill we are discussing the principle, and I am objecting to the principle of the bill in leaving Canadian merchant seamen out of certain benefits which were granted to other auxiliary services under other bills. As I see it, this is the only opportunity I shall have to discuss the case for the merchant seamen, as part I of this bill deals specifically with Canadian merchant seamen.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he well understands that we have rules and I am obliged to call his attention to them. This subject was debated in the house some time ago. If, as he himself suggested, he wants to discuss this matter under part I or a specific section, that may be different, but he should wait until the house has resolved itself into committee. I think he is out of order in discussing this matter at present.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Speaker, if you make a ruling that I should discontinue discussing the matter now and take it up in committee I shall just have to abide by it.

Mr. TUCKER: I hesitated to say anything, because the hon. member who spoke was very cooperative in committee; but the only difficulty about it is that if he makes a speech on this, several other hon. members, who feel just as strongly about it as he does, will want to make speeches on it, and if we do not apply the rule to the hon. member of course we shall be faced with the possibility that the whole house may want to debate this question. The question before the house is the giving of pensions to these various groups. My hon. friend is of course discussing the question of other rights which he suggests should be given, and I submit that on the principle of giving pensions to these groups he is out of order in that discussion, especially since it has been dealt with by the Department of Transport in other legislation.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would point out to the hon. member that the motion actually before the house is that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee on the bill. That motion is not debatable. When an hon. member of the official opposition rose to speak I was under the impression that he intended to make simply a few brief remarks, and perhaps I should not have permitted him to go on. I must point out that the motion is not debatable.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Definitions: "Commission."

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Chairman, I was not aware that this bill had been read the second time.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes. It was read the second time and there was a motion that the Speaker leave the chair for the house to go into committee of the whole. The house is now in committee on the bill. Shall section 1 carry?

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

On section 5—Definitions: "Canadian National."

Mr. GILLIS: I am not going to repeat what I have already said with regard to benefits granted Canadian merchant seamen. I merely reiterate that in my opinion the Canadian merchant seamen were overlooked by the veterans affairs committee in the matter of extending certain rehabilitation rights to them.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Only by some members of the committee.

Mr. GILLIS: That is right. The idea seemed to prevail that the Department of Transport was making the necessary provisions which would offset the complaint that these men have with regard to rehabilitation rights. That is not true. One bill presented to the house by the Minister of Transport had nothing whatever to do with the war. It was merely setting up a compensation scheme federally to take care of merchant seamen in the future, and it is equivalent to the regular briefs and in evidence before the committee those who were sponsoring the cause of these different groups assured the committee of the valuable services which their particular group had rendered, told a thrilling story of the difficulties that they had experienced and the dangers they had run. The committee I am sure would join with me in saying that we marvelled at the heroism shown by these various civilian groups, and that we as soldiers, sailors and airmen would like to express our profound gratitude for what these civilian groups did to assist the armed forces and to assist this nation in winning the victory which she so well deserved.

Some of those who advocated the particular cause of a particular group with which they were associated may feel that they did not get for their group all the benefits that they would have like to have gained. If so I should like to assure the advocates of the group that it was not because they did not present their brief in an efficient and persuasive manner. But the committee on veterans affairs had to take a realistic and practical view of the situation. They assessed the dangers which had been run and the sacrifices which had been made, and then in committee they made the recommendations which are to-day embodied in this bill. I am not at all sure that practically every member of the committee might not feel that this or that group should have been given a few more benefits. But it is not my intention to-day to champion any lost causes. I feel personally that the members of these groups by and large will agree that the country has dealt generously with them, and in practically every case has given them benefits exceeding those which they expected to obtain when they offered their voluntary service in the first instance.

I want to refer only for a moment, first, to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I would ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs to investigate a little further the question of pensions to this gallant body of men, to see whether they are getting all that they are entitled to, in recognition both of their service in the mounted police and of the service which they continued when they went into the army, because they were the leaven which promoted the discipline of the whole of the Canadian corps. They were a well disciplined group, and they were responsible for insisting upon discipline being maintained. They did so from an efficient and broad point of view, and discipline came easy to a large number of civilian soldiers who had joined the army because of the example set and the method of controlling their activities as exercised by the members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who formed the personnel of No. 1 Provost Company overseas.

The other group I should like to refer to is the group of ladies who acted as V.A.D.'s, I think the term is, with the Red Cross and St. John Ambulance. I am referring particularly to the girls who served with the Canadian Red Cross. It has been brought to my attention that in the evidence given before the committee by the chairman of their corps he inadvertently made the statement that those girls when they were discharged received an allowance of $150 to buy civilian clothes. That, I believe, is an incorrect statement, and has been recognized as such by the assistant national commissioner of the Canadian Red Cross.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about one particular classification which I think was overlooked by the veterans affairs committee. Unfortunately I have not been able to be in the house and I missed the latter part of the discussions in the committee because of being a member of the industrial relations committee.

In looking over all the bills which came out of the veterans affairs committee I found only one which makes any mention of merchant seamen: it is this bill 335, and all that it does is to give the merchant seamen the benefits of pension rights under the Pension Act. My conception of that particular problem when it was discussed before the veterans affairs committee was that it was to be referred to a special committee on auxiliary services, and that these men would be included in the auxiliary services bill for certain rehabilitation rights. Evidently there was some misunderstanding in the committee with regard to the disposition of the case of the Canadian merchant seamen. Personally I am disappointed that something was not done by the veterans affairs committee to grant to merchant seamen some at least of the rehabilitation rights which were granted to the armed services. As has been stated here on many occasions from all sides of this house, had it not been for the Canadian merchant seamen and the struggle they put up during the years of the war in getting supplies, munitions and so forth to Britain, the war might have lasted much longer, and perhaps a different story would have had to be written. I myself think that they made the greatest contribution of any section of the service to the winning of the war.

training and then joined the Canadian army, they would come within the provisions of this bill.

Mr. GREEN: They cannot qualify unless they were domiciled here.

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Speaker, just so that we may not waste time on this I would point out to my hon. friend that that is not the purpose of this bill at all. The person must be domiciled in Canada before he enlists in order to get the benefits of this bill, and for my hon. friend to think that the Polish troops coming over here who were not domiciled in Canada before they joined the forces of our allies will get the benefits of this bill indicates that he has not read it carefully. It does not apply to them at all.

I would also point out that the very principle he mentions has been accepted—that of not giving benefits to people who were not domiciled in Canada before they entered the armed forces. The civil service commission to-day does not give a preference in appointment to anyone unless he was domiciled in Canada at the time he entered our forces or those of the allies. So the very thing he mentions has been accepted by the government in this legislation.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, as a rule when you are in the chair a member is allowed to finish before another member rises to make observations. I would say to the parliamentary assistant that the acceptance of the principle is no evidence that the principle is right. I find the principle wrong, and that is why I object to it.

With regard to the Poles, I know very well that they do not come under this bill, but the policy with regard to them is similar to the policy proposed in this bill. I repeat, Canada is becoming the dumping ground for the nations of the world and I regret it. There should be some examination before immigrants are allowed to enter this country.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, speaking for this group here—they are not here now—I want to explain why nobody could expect them to stay here and listen to the utter nonsense we have listened to from my hon. friend who is opposing this bill, which is to do something for the soldiers. I am just as anxious as the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) to conclude the business of the session so that we can get out of this hot weather, and I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that you call any member to order if he talks nonsense on any bill for the veterans.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. POULIOT: We have no lesson to receive from the hon. member for Fraser Valley.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Last year the hon. member said I would not be elected, and I trebled my majority.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. POULIOT: Just one word in reply to the hon. member for Fraser Valley.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Let him go.

Mr. POULIOT: Before the election I said he would be defeated, but he was not because he was called the Jean-François Pouliot of British Columbia.

CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS

PROVISION FOR BENEFITS TO OTHER THAN MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of bill No. 335, respecting civilian war pensions and allowances.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee on the bill.

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, this bill covers a very wide group of persons who actively engaged in war work in various civilian capacities, ranging from merchant seamen and salt-water fishermen, personnel of the various auxiliary services which were helping the troops, members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, air raid precaution workers, members of civilian air crews and a large number of other groups.

Members of this house who were privileged to sit on the committee on veterans affairs listened to the briefs which were presented by the representatives of these various organizations. In every case their representatives told a story of high endeavour prompted solely by the loftiest of principles. The greatest reward which the individuals in these various groups expected to receive was the knowledge of a voluntary duty accepted and that duty efficiently and adequately performed. In their

It was of great value to the allied cause to have these different national units available when the liberation of Europe came about. Troops were identified as Polish, as Belgian, as French, as Norwegian, and as Dutch. It was a great thing for the nationals of those countries to feel that their own forces had been kept in being and that they had fought for freedom on the outside and were now coming to liberate their own countries. I understand that in a great many of these cases the government has endeavoured to arrange set-offs or reciprocal benefits with the countries with which we were allied. I hope the Canadian government and the Minister of Veterans Affairs will continue to arrange these reciprocal benefits.

It has been stated clearly that it is the government's intention that no man shall be included under these benefits who was not domiciled in Canada before going into the forces of an allied country, and that no man shall have these benefits if he does not indicate his intention to take up his domicile in Canada upon discharge from the forces. In other words, it takes into consideration only those members of the allied forces who were in Canada on September 10, 1939 and who have returned to Canada to make their homes here.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, this bill is another instance of the policy put into force by the Meighen government after the war to give preference to men who were not in the Canadian army and who were taking the place of good Canadians who were in the Canadian army. The definition of "allied veteran" is as follows:

"Allied veteran" means a person who, subsequent to the tenth day of September, 1939, served in the armed forces of any of the nations allied with His Majesty in active operations against the enemy in the war and who, at the time he joined any such forces, was domiciled in Canada.

This man may have come here simply to enlist. This thing was done in the first world war and it is being done in the second, on account of the promises that were made by the government. Sometimes men were not domiciled in Canada before the war, but were given the opportunity to come here and take advantage of all the benefits that were being offered to Canadians. One example is the 4,000 Polish soldiers who will be given benefits that are being refused to Canadians who were in the army.

I cannot understand why men who have fought under different colours, not even British colours, should be placed ahead of our own men who have worn the Canadian uniform. I mentioned not long ago that some benefits are being given to complete strangers. It is admitted that these men fought in the same cause against Germany and Japan; they may have fought quite well, but that is no reason for making Canada the dumping ground for all the nations of the world. I said that in one of the committee rooms adjacent to Westminster Hall. Why should Canada be the dumping ground for all the nations of the world? Why should we do more than any other nation for outsiders? It is a strange thing.

I think of those Canadian boys, big and small; I think of those young men full of hope who came here but who met with such poor success because every place was occupied, there were no more vacancies, they had been given to outsiders. They were told, "You Canadians go away; there is no room for you." That is the policy that has been sponsored by the civil service commission. When the member for Temiscouata presided over that committee he got all that information from the civil service commission, about men who had come from all over the world to take positions that rightly belonged to red-blooded Canadians.

I have no objection to a well-balanced immigration policy, but I do not think any immigrant should take the place of a Canadian. I do not think any outsider should take the place of a man who has the right to get all the benefits that this country may offer. When I say "Canadian" I want it to be understood that I do not mean only those who were born here; not at all. That is precisely the reason why I have never joined the Native Sons of Canada. I mean also those who may have been born somewhere else in the world but who have made Canada their country of adoption, their country of love, the country they want for themselves and for their children, the country in which they intend to establish themselves permanently. These things should not apply to the migratory birds who came here just to get some advantages, just to get rich quick and then return to their country of origin. We do not need those people; they are not desirable immigrants.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would direct the attention of the hon. member to the fact that the bill before us is not a bill dealing with immigration. It is an act respecting veterans of forces allied with Canada.

Mr. POULIOT: I know that, but you know very well that if they came here simply to enlist and get the advantages of the Canadian army, if they were sent from overseas for

Mr. BROOKS: If there is no objection to altering it, why not strike out the words "part I", and simply leave it to read "to be a 'veteran' within the meaning and for the purposes of . . . the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946"? I am sure that it is limited by the inclusion of the words "part I".

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. member would use only the words "the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946"?

Mr. BROOKS: Yes, so that there would be no doubt about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: If my hon. friend will move that, I shall be pleased to accept it.

Mr. BROOKS: Very well. I move in amendment:

That the words "part I" in subparagraph (iv) of section 3 (a) be stricken therefrom, so that the words "The War Veterans' Allowance Act, 1946, and" shall remain the only words in the subparagraph.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am prepared to accept that amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 4—Discharge rank for purposes of the War Service Grants Act, 1944.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, before we proceed further I should like to add a few words to the gracious remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), who welcomed the hon. member for Rosthern and congratulated him upon his choice as leader of the Liberal party in the province of Saskatchewan. I know I am not strictly in order in making these observations on section 4 of the bill, but I believe I am more in order than some may think, because the act will be operated with the assistance of the hon. member, who has been the right arm of the minister for over a year.

I know the hon. member for Rosthern personally, and because of that I not only congratulate the hon. member but also the delegates upon their very good choice. The reason I am so well satisfied with the nomination of the hon. member to lead the Liberal party in Saskatchewan is that he is human, and understands the difficulties of the common man. He tries to redress wrongs when they are submitted to him. I shall not say that he always succeeds; I shall not call him a miracle man. But he is a man of good will, a man with deep convictions and a sincere desire to do his utmost, not only for his province but for the country as a whole. Therefore it is with the utmost pleasure and with real joy that I congratulate him and wish him success.

[Mr. Mackenzie.]

Sections 5 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved that the bill be read a third time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house that the bill be now read a third time?

Mr. POULIOT: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time, on division, and passed.

ALLIED VETERANS BENEFITS ACT

CANADIAN SERVICE MEN IN ALLIED FORCES AND THEIR DEPENDENTS

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of bill No. 328, respecting veterans of forces allied with Canada.

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I expect that the bill now before the house will prove uncontroversial, as the previous one did. If I may, for a moment or two, I should like to cover the reasons why I approve the introduction of this measure.

As I understand it, the bill is to make provision for the nationals of other countries who were allied with His Majesty and who joined the forces of the countries of their origin, being recruited in Canada with the permission and concurrence of the Canadian government, and—may I emphasize this—with the cooperation of the Department of National Defence. I see from the minutes of a previous meeting that it is designed to cover men who have been discharged from the Canadian active army as being unlikely to become efficient soldiers. I understand that in some cases that was owing to language difficulties. Some men of European origin had come to Canada only recently and understood little of our institutions, and it was thought that these men would feel more at home in the forces of their previous country. Actually some of these men were directed by the government and the Department of National Defence to join the forces of the country of their origin. According to the official government record this bill will cover 827 veterans. As I said, in most cases they were directed to those particular forces by army orders. In many respects the government is just honouring its obligation to these men because the Department of National Defence directed them to join up with those forces.

Mr. JAENICKE: The "service comparable" refers to the work a man was doing.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Of course.

Mr. JAENICKE: It does not refer to the country in which he must be enrolled, which is the United Kingdom, according to section 2.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That makes no difference at all.

Mr. JAENICKE: As I say, I am not satisfied. I do not see what harm it would do to amend either section 2 or section 7 to cover the persons who were enrolled in Canada on behalf of some other ally.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I can assure my hon. friend that the intent of the bill is to cover them, and the effect of the regulations will be to cover them.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Deemed a veteran.

Mr. BROOKS: I thought it was understood that these operators would get all the benefits that a veteran would have. I notice that paragraph (a) (iv) of this section reads as follows: "Part I of the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946." Why should they be included only in part I of the War Veterans Allowance Act? Why should they not have all the benefits of the act?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Because the other part referred to widows and orphans.

Mr. BROOKS: Should not the widows and orphans of these men have the same privileges as widows and orphans of other returned men?

Mr. MACKENZIE: They will.

Mr. BROOKS: They do not come under this act.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am informed that they are cared for in the Veterans Allowance Act.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest this should be checked again. I do not see how the widow of one of these men could possibly get a benefit under the War Veterans Allowance Act, in view of the restriction in this section. This section covers only part I. If it is the intention to cover widows, then surely we should refer to parts I and II.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They are classified as veterans for the purposes of the act, and entitled to all the benefits therefrom. The widows automatically will then benefit. I am assured by my advisers that that is correct.

Mr. GREEN: The minister's advisers are not always right. We found that out in the veterans affairs committee. They did a good job, but they are not perfect.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Neither is the minister.

Mr. GREEN: Either the section should include parts I and II, or there should be no reference to part I, thereby simply making them subject to the provisions of the War Veterans Allowance Act. The very fact that part I is mentioned, with no mention of part II, prevents a widow getting the benefit of that part.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The widow inherits and possesses all the consequential benefits, I am informed.

Mr. GREEN: I would draw the attention of the minister to the wording of the section where it refers to a special operator being a veteran within the meaning and for the purposes of these acts. It would not be so bad if the words "and for the purposes of" were not included, but those words restrict the benefits of the section to part I of the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Which line is the hon. member referring to?

Mr. GREEN: I am referring to section 3 (a).

While I have been speaking I have noticed the entrance to the chamber of the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) and I avail myself of this opportunity to welcome him back. He is to be congratulated upon the new task he has undertaken as leader of the Liberal party in Saskatchewan, and I believe perhaps also to be pitied. From the personal point of view I wish him the best of luck, but from the political point of view I would wish him just the opposite.

We shall now proceed to attempt to straighten this section out. I was pointing out that section 3(a) which reads "(a) to be a 'veteran' within the meaning and for the purposes of . . . means that a veteran, or rather his widow, could not get the benefits under part II. That is, the widow of a veteran could not get the allowance under part II of the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE: My hon. friend may be right. It is probably a matter of technical and legalistic reasoning. But I am assured by those who drew this up, in conjunction with the Department of Justice, that widows are completely protected under the terminology of the bill as we have it. If there is any specific desire to alter it, I would have no objection, but I am assured that it is ample as it is.

as it was theirs, and a cause in which we joined almost as they joined, are on a par with the Canadians who served in the Royal Air Force and in other branches of the British forces as well as in the United States and other allied forces. Why anyone should dare to assume that the taxpayers of Canada—we are all taxpayers, and in these days that includes practically everybody—would desire that Canadians who risked their lives in a more real sense than anyone in any other branch of the service did should not be provided for, I do not know. The penalty of being caught was to be shot—some of them were—and we are not asking the Canadian people, for whom the hon. member for Temiscouata speaks so eloquently, to do anything for them.

This is a small bill, and as the minister said, the sum of money which is involved may be inconsequential. I take exception to blase suggestion that these men served their country in Britain. They served all the free people of the world. They served under extraordinary conditions, as the hon. member for Grey-Bruce has said. He has some knowledge of it because he served in the theatres of war. These people took the greatest risk. They did not have the trappings of uniforms; they did not even have the rank of a commissioned officer. They served with the rank of sergeant in the British army. They served voluntarily, having been selected by our own people to work with their allies and friends in the British and other armies. That is all that this bill amounts to. All this talk about the cost and that we are doing something for the British—God knows we should—is nonsense, when what we are doing is trying to give a decent deal to our own boys.

Mr. JAENICKE: I should like to say a few words with respect to the point raised by the hon. member for Royal. With great respect to the Minister of Veterans Affairs I cannot agree with him that section 7 covers the special operators who might have been enrolled in some other country, such as the United States, for service with the allies. Section 7 provides:

> The governor in council may make regulations . . . may declare any other person, who has had war service of a kind comparable with that of a special operator, to be a special operator . . .

I submit that it refers to the United Kingdom; that a special operator must have been enrolled by the United Kingdom government. If it is intended to cover operators who have been enrolled by any other country which was allied to Canada during the war, we must amend the bill to cover such persons.

[Mr. Mutch.]

Mr. MACKENZIE: I tell my hon. friend that the intention was to cover precisely the point which has been raised. The matter was referred to the Department of Justice, which helped us to draft the section as it now stands. It is the intent, and I am sure it will be the effect, to guarantee what he desires.

Mr. JAENICKE: Hon. members who are lawyers will agree with me that that is not the way in which the courts will interpret the act. Provision should be made either at the end of section 7 or in section 2, which we are now discussing, to cover the point I have raised. The section should be amended to read that it covers not only the United Kingdom but any other country with which Canada was allied during the war.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I refer my hon. friend to paragraph 3 of the explanatory note, which says:

> It is understood that there are about fifty-one of these men now recorded with the Department of External Affairs, but as there is a possibility of some other persons of the kind or who saw similar service turning up later, it is deemed advisable that the governor in council be given power to provide for them in a similar way.

Mr. JAENICKE: The explanatory note will not be part of the law, nor will anything that the minister says in the house. The act will be interpreted as it is passed and assented to.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Section 7 empowers the governor in council to pass regulations, and I can assure him that all the reservations which he has in his mind will be amply protected in the regulations.

Mr. JAENICKE: The Minister of Veterans Affairs is a lawyer. Section 7 must be interpreted in the light of section 2. Section 2 refers to a special operator as one who has been enrolled in Canada by the United Kingdom authorities; therefore it does not cover any other country.

Mr. POULIOT: In accordance with what has been said by the minister and by my hon. friend who has just spoken, the hon. member for Winnipeg South will have to redraft his speech by striking it from the record.

Mr. MUTCH: I doubt that.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I say to my hon. friend that this is purely a legal argument. I hate to be technical in these things.

Mr. JAENICKE: I think you should be.

Mr. MACKENZIE: If my hon. friend will read section 7 again, he will find the words "service of a kind comparable with that of a special operator" which protects any others.

men who run the country. We are often told it is the province of Quebec, the minority of Quebec, that runs the country. It is that minority of bigoted fanatics who may be counted on the fingers of both hands who try to impress the government, as R. B. Hanson did during the war—who did more to impress the government than any other member of the house; so much so that he was praised to the limit by the Prime Minister, the leader of the Liberal party, and so much so that when the Tories made him a gift of a silver platter on his retirement they inscribed on it praise and eulogy from the Prime Minister.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I did not interrupt the hon. member for Temiscouata because I thought he should be allowed to reply to interruptions, but now that he has replied may I remind him and all members of the committee that the principle of the bill was approved on second reading and all remarks now should be strictly relevant to the clause under consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE: These fifty-two men were all Canadians, all domiciled in Canada, some of them in the armed forces before they were selected for this special duty, and according to the laws of Canada for many years past Canadians who were domiciled in Canada before serving with the allied forces were entitled to all the benefits of other Canadians who served with our own forces. That is all this does. They are all Canadians, all among our own friends and comrades in the Dominion of Canada. That is all this bill seeks to do.

Mr. POULIOT: The question is not so much that of domicile as that of service. If they were serving in the Canadian army, it would be all right, but they were not under Canadian command. They were under British command, and it is precisely because their service was for the United Kingdom that the United Kingdom should pay them, whether they were domiciled in Canada or not.

Now I know very well that the press will come out with headlines: "Quebec member opposes grants for heroes who were picked out by the United Kingdom to serve in most difficult jobs during the war." It will come out like that. I do not oppose it because I come from Quebec, but because I find it nonsensical, and I would oppose it anywhere. I would speak outside the province of Quebec, speaking only to audiences of other origins than French, and say the same. It is not a question of race; it is a question of dollars and cents—

An hon. MEMBER: Publicity.

Mr. POULIOT: —and it is not because it is only fifty-two who will enjoy it that I protest. I protest against the principle of always doing more and more for other countries—not only for the United Kingdom but for other countries. Canada should be symbolized by a squeezed lemon on a white square. That would be the proper flag for Canada—a squeezed lemon on a white piece of paper. As I said, I shall be described not as a member of parliament, but as a Quebec member opposing the measure. We shall again be told that Quebec people are not loyal to the king and to the traditions of good citizenship because we use that freedom of language which is considered to be the cornerstone of constitutional democratic government. I know that that will be done because it has been done in the past, and those who inspire and support legislation of this kind with the power of strong voices are those who impress the government and rule the country.

I should like to have a truly liberal government, a democratic government, and not a government which takes its inspiration, not from Quebec or any other province of Canada, including Ontario, but from a group of fanatics who are not interested in this country and whose heart is overseas.

Mr. MUTCH: As a member of the house who comes from a part of Canada which is not Quebec I should like to assure the hon. gentleman at once that the people of the other eight provinces are too intelligent to judge Quebec by the kind of performance which he puts on in the house. I can say from knowledge that the gentlemen who are to be taken care of in this bill are Canadians domiciled in Canada and selected for duty which was exceedingly dangerous and highly confidential, and by the very nature of their work it was a question of win or die. The work which they were doing was such that no one could know where they were or who they were.

I should like to point out to the hon. member for Temiscouata, and to any other Canadian if there is one who thinks as he does, which I doubt, that it was not a Canadian war, a United States war, or a British war. It was an allied nations war in which we all combined to defend those things in which we believe and in which my hon. friend, in his more lucid moments, himself believes. There is no point in rising in our places to answer that type of argument, beyond saying that this committee should know what the committee on veterans affairs knows, namely, that these Canadians, who were directed in their service by the British government in a cause which was ours as much

Mr. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce): When this bill was introduced to the veterans affairs committee I formed an opinion, which I expressed at that time, on very little information. Since that time my opinion has been confirmed by additional information and further thought. I think this bill should be amended in some respects, although I am perfectly prepared to support it as it is. It provides benefits for persons who in this country enlisted for special purposes and at that time took the rank and pay of sergeant. It is my proposal and it is my opinion that we should increase that benefit to the rank of commissioned officer. Those of us who were in the armed services know very well that if our luck ran out we had perhaps two chances in five of surviving. These gentlemen had no chance at all, or little, if their luck ran out. I know quite well that the contract of enlistment was a contract with the United Kingdom authorities, and these persons accepted the rank and pay which were theirs at that time. The Canadian government has gone to the extent of granting them practically all the privileges of the Canadian soldier so far as things in Canada might go, but I believe the government and people of this country should properly reward these persons by increasing at the same time, by way of grant or otherwise, the benefits they obtained during the enlistment period from the rank of sergeant to that of commissioned officer.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. BROOKS: This clause gives the definition of special operator and says it means a person certified by the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs as having been enrolled in Canada by the United Kingdom authorities. There were men enrolled in Canada by the United States authorities, and I understood the bill was to be amended so as to—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Is not that covered by section 7? The suggestion was made by the hon. member for Nanaimo in the committee, and the point is covered by section 7.

Mr. BROOKS: So long as it is understood that the section covers those men.

Mr. POULIOT: Will the minister tell us how much the bill will cost each year?

Mr. MACKENZIE: There are only fifty-two persons concerned, plus the three mentioned by the hon. member for Royal, who were engaged in special services through other agencies. Possibly there may be no cost at all, but the purpose of the bill is to give to these men, who were the bravest of the brave, who went into enemy territory by means of parachutes, and who did wonderful service for the cause of freedom for which all the nations were fighting, the opportunity of qualifying for the same benefits as if they had been members of the armed forces as such. That is surely clear and definite. There may be no cost, there may be some; it is impossible at the moment to forecast.

Mr. POULIOT: This is the same story. It is to give something to men who may have a very fine record—I do not discuss that—but who were not in the Canadian army. We paid the boys in the Canadian army when they were the only ones defending the shores of Great Britain after Dunkirk. We paid them, and we were the only dominion doing so. We did a lot for our boys when they were going all around and were under British command, and now we are paying men who have not been in the Canadian army but who should be fully rewarded by the United Kingdom government, especially because that government is much richer than we are now and because taxation is heavier in this country, all things considered, than it is in England.

Is it because men had a fine record that we should pay them? They must be paid by those for whom they were fighting; otherwise we could have a contest between the boys who have been fighting in all the united nations armies, in China as well as in Great Britain. This is not pay; this is an award for bravery. That is all right, but if the government is going to do something in that way, it has only to give them a decoration, and institute at last a Canadian decoration for these boys. I do not see why we should pay them. It is the same story. It is because they are not Canadians that they get something.

Some hon. MEMBERS: They are Canadians.

Mr. GREEN: They are all Canadians. That is the point.

Mr. MUTCH: May I interrupt the hon. gentleman to ask a question—

Mr. POULIOT: Absolutely no. I do not want to be interrupted. If the hon. member has something to say, he can say it afterwards. I hear that clamour. I should like every taxpayer in Canada to hear that clamour—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): So would we.

Mr. POULIOT: —when I protest on their behalf and when I say precisely what they are thinking. It is that small group of men, that small group of prejudiced and bigoted

Mr. POULIOT: What?

Mr. MUTCH: A nuisance.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not think much of what has been said. If I have been called a demagogue it is because I have referred to the promise of a million jobs that has been given to the veterans. That is demagoguery. I remind the house of the demagogic appeals which have been made in the past, and I warn the house that all this legislation is to redeem a pledge which cannot be redeemed.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, many of those fifty-two members were from the province of Quebec.

Mr. POULIOT: I will ask the hon. member to keep quiet and still; and he may boil, and he may boil again, but it will not impress me at all. I am here to do my duty.

Mr. MUTCH: Where there is no sense there is no feeling.

Mr. POULIOT: And if he speaks loud I can speak loud. I have a duty to do. I have a duty to try to awaken the members of the House of Commons to a sense of their responsibilities. It is a hard job, but I will try again to-day. I like my colleagues, I appreciate their good will—to use the words of the Prime Minister—and I do not despair of them. There is still a ray of hope for the future. I hope that some members will get away from racial prejudice—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: And will think of Canada as their own country.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: And that they will censure the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) for quoting those two lines from Canning and making them his own:

A statesman of the world alone,
A friend of every country but his own.

Incredible! It shows a mentality which has been deformed, the mentality of an intelligent and gifted man thinking of all other countries and forgetting his own. How many times must one repeat that, to put to shame the members of the House of Commons and make them see —those who were born in this country as well as those who were born outside it and have made Canada their country of adoption; that they must love it; that they have patriotism; that they must not have that false internationalist deformation of mind which has been the error of the past fifteen years. The members of this house will have to render account to the Canadian people of what has been done in this country, and when the time comes to vote, the vote will not be given by those outside of Canada, as was done in part during the war on account of our men and women being all over the world; the vote will be given by the Canadian people, who are suffering from taxation imposed to pay to that extravagant extravaganza of parliament during these years. What was the expectation of the Canadian taxpayer during the war? It was that he would have some relief as soon as the war was over. But what relief will he have when he has to redeem the foolish pledges of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, the pledge of a million jobs for the boys overseas who were to come here and find a horn of plenty in the great city of Ottawa, with a job for each of them, making them all civil servants, making them all bureaucrats, deforming their minds? Because the mind of the government was deformed, they wanted also to deform the minds of these enthusiastic boys who were coming, crowned with glory, from overseas and from all over the world.

I have nothing else to add on this, but I shall repeat the same thing on the other bills if I have the opportunity to do so; if it is not given to me I will take it.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I wish for two or three minutes to refer to the principle of this bill. I have just now seen the text of it which applies to those whom the former minister of national defence, Mr. Ralston, said would get credits and gratuities, men who enlisted in Britain and went overseas at their own expense as active combatant soldiers. But this bill opens the door and extends privileges to fifty-one people who are now recorded with the Department of External Affairs, actually only civilians. I think that is a very wrong principle, to extend to civilians connected with the Department of External Affairs grants and gratuities and other allowances to actual combatant veterans who served at the front. I know something about that department, and much of what it did was unnecessary during the period of the war—a policy of separatism and isolation from the mother country. A good deal of its work did not meet with the approval of a large number of members of this house. Bills which give allowances and gratuities to soldiers and veterans who served overseas are most commendable, but to extend these concessions to a lot of civilians is, I contend, all wrong.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

certain kinds of fruit from the United States. It was stated to me over the long-distance telephone that any duties operative, particularly on plums, have not been imposed quickly enough. I have not had time to check the details, but I am asking that the proper officials of the government be instructed to look into this matter at once, because it is urgent. I can give more details if required.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, following up the representations of the hon. member for Lincoln, may I point out that hampers of peaches are being brought into Canada which are found to be full of worms. I think the minister should check that and stop these importations at once.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Why don't you get some good ones from British Columbia?

Mr. FRASER: That is right.

SPECIAL OPERATORS

WAR SERVICE BENEFITS TO CANADIANS ENROLLED BY UNITED KINGDOM AUTHORITIES

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of bill No. 330, respecting benefits to certain persons who were recruited in Canada by United Kingdom authorities for special duties in war areas.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in formally moving the second reading of this bill, which I understand was unanimously recommended by the veterans affairs committee, may I say that it extends to special operators to the number of fifty-two, who were engaged on very secret duties in enemy countries, all benefits awarded to the members of the armed forces.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): Mr. Speaker, the minister is quite correct in stating that in the committee there was unanimous consent to this bill, but it was on the understanding that an amendment would be made to the bill to include others besides the fifty-two whom the minister mentioned. As the bill reads, it is limited to those with the United Kingdom forces, but there were others who were attached to the United States forces and possibly one or two who went to the east. On the understanding that these will be included by an amendment, there is no objection to the bill.

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote two phrases from Canning as quoted by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) the other day:

A statesman of the world alone,
A friend of every country but his own.

It is applicable to this very piece of legislation. Why should we have this bill before us to-day to pay for obligations of Great Britain, selecting men for war areas? A friend of every country but his own! I will ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs which is his country? If it is Canada, if he gives me that answer, I will say that it is unfortunate that he ignores his own country. In view of the legislation that has been sponsored in this house, not only on the recommendation of the veterans affairs committee but other legislation passed in the last fifteen years, I think that we should add to the letterhead of the note paper used by the members of the House of Commons precisely these two lines the minister quoted from Canning:

A statesman of the world alone,
A friend of every country but his own.

Those words should be written on every sheet of note paper that goes out through the mail from the House of Commons, in order to describe the mentality of those who have been framing and sponsoring legislation in this house for years.

If we read the title of this bill we see that it is "An act respecting benefits to certain persons who were recruited in Canada by United Kingdom authorities for special duties in war areas." They were not recruited by Canadian authorities. They were recruited by the United Kingdom.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is absolutely wrong.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, through the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. POULIOT: In other words, it was done for them, done on their behalf, and the Department of Veterans Affairs acted as their agent.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No.

Mr. POULIOT: Then how is it that the title of the bill is not different from what it is?

Mr. MACKENZIE: They are all Canadians—good Canadians—brave Canadians.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes; "every country but his own".

Mr. MUTCH: No.

Mr. POULIOT: This is another piece of legislation of that kind; and if I have suffered mental cruelty, if I have suffered abuse and humiliation—

Mr. MUTCH: You are more than even.

Mr. POULIOT: —and if I have been called a demagogue before—members to work during the quiet, cool days of the year when they would have something like a chance to do the work that has to be done, the government insists on calling parliament every year at a time when we must face this almost unbearable situation; when members have to work themselves almost to death during the hottest part of the year in this city of Ottawa where the heat and moisture conditions are almost insufferable. We have to do it every year; and then we are called upon to add a burden to ourselves by working on Saturday as well. I heartily concur in what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). He was simply facing facts as they are, and we may as well face facts as they are. One thing I have never been able to understand is why it is that in the cool parts of the year, in February and March, we never sit on Friday night or on Wednesday night, and then at this time of the year we are asked to do this sort of thing.

Mr. MUTCH: You are a nuisance.

Another thing to which we seriously object is that after it was agreed that we should speed up matters the government brought in a good many rather contentious measures and piled them on top of members of parliament right at a time when they were busy with committees and morning sittings, and when they had no chance to deal adequately with those measures.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I will repeat that we will fall in line, but we would ask the government if they cannot do something to end this absurd way in which the affairs of this country are now being carried on.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, in opposing this motion I want to point out that during the early part of the session, when the debate on the address is before us, this house sits exactly twenty-four hours a week, at a time when there is no other business that the members can do, no committees meeting; and we carry on in that way month after month—

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is not right.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: We do not sit on Wednesday nights, and often not on Friday nights in the early part of the session, so that at that stage of the session we sit only from twenty-four to twenty-seven hours a week. Later in the session when four or five committees are at work the house starts sitting at eleven o'clock in the morning and carries on until eleven at night. That is when the strain is great. If we want to be consistent when we talk about expediting the business of the house, we should start to expedite it in the early part of the session. I am sure that would lead to more speed and efficiency.

Mr. MACKENZIE: If my hon. friend will look over the Votes and Proceedings for the present session he will find out that what I am about to say is true. Never in any previous session was the work of government advanced so rapidly as it has been during this session, even when the debate on the address was being carried on.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I doubt it very much.

Motion agreed to.

BACON

BRITISH CONTRACT WITH DENMARK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. CHARLTON (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the announcement yesterday in the Ottawa Journal concerning British bacon contracts with Denmark at $5 a hundredweight higher than our price, would it not seem fair to the hog producers of Canada that the government should make some statement in that regard?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this is a question for the Minister of Agriculture. I cannot say definitely that he will be back to-morrow but I am told that he may be. I shall bring the question to his notice, and he will no doubt deal with it immediately upon his return.

Mr. CHARLTON: In view of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture is absent I would direct the question to the Acting Minister of Agriculture or to the Acting Prime Minister.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): The Minister of Trade and Commerce has said that he will bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture, and I am sure that an answer will be forthcoming just as soon as a proper one can be prepared.

FRUIT

IMPORTS FROM THE UNITED STATES—PLUMS AND PEACHES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, arising out of information which reached me just twenty minutes ago I should like to direct a question to the appropriate minister. It would appear that the Canadian market is now being flooded with opportunity as a party to consider it, but if I may speak as one member, I am quite agreeable to the minister's proposal. Is it the minister's thought that we should meet Saturday night as well as Saturday morning and Saturday afternoon?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The motion was framed in such a way as to leave that decision to be arrived at on Saturday. We would sit on Saturday morning and proceed at least until six o'clock. At that time, or earlier, if hon. members express any special wishes about it we can determine whether we should adjourn at six o'clock or go on in the evening. I think hon. members will admit that it is as inconvenient for the government as it may be for any other hon. members to have such frequent sittings, because of the other work to which they have to attend, but the government wishes to meet the desires of the majority of hon. members in that regard. I do not think it necessary to determine now whether we should sit Saturday evening or not; that might be left to be determined on Saturday.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I agree fully with the proposal made by the Minister of Justice, and I rise now to commend the persuasive and gracious manner in which he has sponsored the motion. It has not been considered a contentious matter, probably because of his skill in moving it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: I hope the fine example of the right hon. gentleman will be followed by his colleagues, and also by my own who said "carried" just a moment ago.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I think the house is appreciative of the way in which the Acting Prime Minister has put this question before us. This group has had an opportunity to consider the matter and we are opposed to Saturday sittings. We are opposed to them for several reasons. First, we are not the people who take the long week-ends. The people who take the long week-ends and prevent anything being done on Fridays and Mondays throughout the whole session should not be talking now.

Mr. MacKINNON: You have no corner on that.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You are not members of the government. We are here on Saturdays, I can tell you that.

Mr. MacINNIS: There are twenty items, most of them important, on the order paper.

[Mr. Bracken.]

Another one was introduced this morning which also may be important. We do not know whether that is the last of the items that are to come before us. The great bulk of the estimates have yet to be passed. We do not believe that there should be unseemly haste in dealing with the business that is before this house, particularly when we are urging other people to assume their responsibilities in regard to matters pertaining to the welfare of the country.

With committees sitting, and with the house sitting from eleven o'clock in the morning until eleven o'clock at night, members have no opportunity to prepare themselves to deal properly with matters that come before us. It is only on Saturday and Sunday that we have an opportunity to catch up with our correspondence.

An hon. MEMBER: Do you work on Sundays?

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, I work on Sundays.

An hon. MEMBER: Shame.

Mr. GILLIS: Why do you not pass an order in council and wind it up?

Mr. MacINNIS: There is one further matter. About two weeks ago we appointed a committee of this house to investigate a crisis which had developed in our economy. That committee should have an opportunity to hear all the evidence there is to hear, and make its report. Then I think there should be an opportunity for discussion of the matter in the house, because it is one of the most important matters before the people of this country to-day. I would say to those who want to get away that we have been here only from March 14.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Where is your leader? What is he doing to-day?

Mr. MacINNIS: There have been only 147 days since the session began, which is a mighty short session for people who have been so generous to themselves.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think after the most courteous and gracious submission of this resolution to the house it might be left to the free and unfettered judgment of the house, without whips and without pairs.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, the members of our group are not going to take sides one way or another on this matter, but we would like to draw the attention of the government to something which rankles in our being. Instead of calling parliament in October and allowing hon.

It is also necessary to amend the rules regarding the retention of domicile to prevent duplication of registration by Canadian citizens who remain absent from Canada for extended periods. These rules have been recast and minor changes made in two sections for the purpose of clarification and to meet the present administrative machinery.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

BIOLOGICAL RESEARCH IN AGRICULTURE—VANCOUVER AREA

Mr. FULTON:

1. Has the Department of Agriculture given consideration to the establishment of a biological laboratory in the province of British Columbia at or near Vancouver, B.C.?
2. If so, has the site been chosen?
3. What is its location?
4. Has an agreement been entered into for the purchase of the land?
5. If so, what is the consideration?
6. What are the specific objects for which this station is being established?
7. In connection with what specific types of agriculture, live stock, or produce is it intended to carry on biological research?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier):

1. A dominion laboratory of plant pathology was established on the university campus in Vancouver in June, 1946.
2. The university of British Columbia.
3. Point Grey.
4. No land has been purchased.
5. Answered by No. 4.
6. To provide farmers and gardeners with essential services connected with problems of plant diseases. The research programme will be built around the most pressing economic problems.
7. The production of field, fruit, vegetable and garden crops. We are also giving serious consideration to the establishment of laboratories of animal pathology and entomology in or near Vancouver.

STRAIT OF CANSO CAUSEWAY SURVEY

Mr. McGARRY:

1. Has the survey on the proposed construction of a causeway, bridge or tunnel over the strait of Canso been completed?
2. If so, has the location of this proposed structure been determined?

Mr. CHEVRIER: In so far as the Department of Transport is concerned:

1. No. Work on the borings in the central section of a possible site of a causeway is progressing.
2. No decision can be made with regard to the project or the location until the engineering survey and borings have been completed.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

INDIANS—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. What land was sold since the 24th July, 1902, (a) on Indian reserve No. 100 being the reserve of the James Smith band of Indians at Fort a la Corne, Saskatchewan, and on Indian reserve No. 100A being the reserve for the Cumberland band of Indians; (b) on the Chacastapasin Indian reserve No. 98?
2. Of the total amount of the sale, how much is owing to-day, and what amount thereof has been placed to the credit of these Indian bands?
3. How many acres of the lands so surrendered still remain unsold?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SATURDAY SITTINGS

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister) moved:

That on Saturday, the 10th August, 1946, and every Saturday thereafter until the end of the present session, the house shall meet at 11 o'clock, a.m., and the order of business and procedure shall be the same as on Fridays.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the government in placing this notice of motion upon the order paper is not to force its acceptance upon the house but to provide an opportunity for members of the house to express their views as to whether or not it would be desirable to begin Saturday sittings on Saturday of this week.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Several have expressed the view that as a large number of members remain in Ottawa over the week-end, it would expedite the business of the session if we began Saturday sittings this week. On the other hand, there is no desire on the part of the government to rush the work of the house. There is still some very important work to be considered and dealt with. I say again that the reason for placing this motion on the order paper to-day and presenting it to you, sir, is to give members of the house an opportunity of expressing their own views, because it would be the wish of the government to meet the views of the majority of members of the house in that regard.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, judging from the reception of the minister's remarks I gather that there are some at least who favour the proposal. We on this side have had no Amendment negatived: yeas, 22; nays, 38.

The CHAIRMAN: I declare the amendment lost. Shall section 25 carry?

Mr. JACKMAN: On section 25 the minister advanced the reason—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Six o'clock.

Progress reported.

LORD ADDISON

ANNOUNCEMENT OF VISIT OF BRITISH SECRETARY OF STATE FOR DOMINION AFFAIRS IN SEPTEMBER

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I may have the unanimous consent of the house I should like to make a brief statement on behalf of the Prime Minister.

When in London at a meeting of Prime Ministers in May last, the Prime Minister extended an invitation to the Right Honourable Viscount Addison, Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs and Leader of the House of Lords, to visit Canada as a guest of our government at a time convenient to him. I am pleased to inform the house that I have received from the Prime Minister word that Lord Addison will visit Canada during the parliamentary recess. It is expected that Lord Addison will reach Halifax early in September and that he will spend the month of September in Canada. Lord Addison will be accompanied by Lady Addison.

As hon. members are doubtless aware, Lord Addison is a leading British statesman of great experience. He assumed his present office on the formation of the Labour government a year ago and he has held high cabinet posts in various governments during the last thirty years. These include service as Minister of Munitions and as the first Minister of Health in Mr. Lloyd George's cabinet during and after the first world war and as Minister of Agriculture in 1930-1931. On his visit to Canada I am sure that he will receive a most cordial welcome from the Canadian people.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, August 8, 1946

The house met at eleven o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ST. LAURENT—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN "OTTAWA JOURNAL" OF AUGUST 7

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to a matter of privilege, in the absence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and on his behalf. I raise this matter of personal privilege relating to a news item published in the Ottawa Journal of yesterday under the heading "Low charges Mr. King courted communists." This article is dated at Noranda, Quebec, August 6, and states:

[The Chairman.]

Solon Low, national leader of the Social Credit party, in an address here said Prime Minister King "deliberately courted the communist party in the 1945 federal election."

Mr. Low spoke in behalf of Real Caouette, Social Credit candidate in the September 16 federal by-election in Pontiac. The Pontiac vacancy was caused by the death of W. R. McDonald, Liberal.

Mr. Low said "the government of Canada is responsible for the shameful conditions we witnessed recently when so many government employees took the stand to admit loyalty to a government other than Canada."

He charged this was proof of the courtship of the communist party in 1945 and said ostensibly the party was outlawed in the early part of the war but later it was permitted, and as proof of government friendship a large number of civil servants of doubtful loyalty were hired in important posts.

I hope that this report is unfair to Mr. Low; I know it is unfair to the Prime Minister. I was closely enough associated with the Prime Minister before, during and after the 1945 campaign to enable me to state positively that there is no foundation for the allegation or insinuation that this report suggests.

STANDING COMMITTEES

First report of the joint committee of both houses of parliament on printing,—Mr. Emmerson.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS—CHANGE IN PERSONNEL

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved:

That the name of Mr. Bentley be substituted for that of Mr. Moore on the standing committee on industrial relations.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION ACT

AMENDMENTS FOR PURPOSES OF CONFORMITY WITH CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP ACT

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 367, to amend the Immigration Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is necessary to make certain amendments to the Immigration Act to bring it into conformity with the Canadian Citizenship Act, as the present definition of "Canadian citizen" in the former does not agree in some respects with the term "Canadian citizen" as defined in the citizenship act.

man selling his farm in Manitoba and going south, let us say, to live. At the present time he must get a permit. Not only must he go to the trouble of getting a permit but he must make a case satisfactory to the board I think some of the conditions suggested were illness on his own part, or family obligations, things which would make a sufficient human nature story for the board to be impressed by it and to grant him the permit. I suggest that is not necessary. I suggest that in a case of that kind there might very well be a small amount which a resident making a bona fide change might be entitled to take with him as of right. To me it is very important that there should be something here, some signal as it were of the desire to retrace our steps and to get back what freedom we may as quickly as is reasonable. Therefore I put this forward in the hope that this very small request—and I hope it is also a very human one—will receive support in various quarters of the house.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend raised the same point in the committee where he moved an amendment; and I do not think I can do better, in replying to him, than to repeat the statement I made on that occasion in which I gave the reasons why, in my opinion, I could not agree to the amendment. It will be found at page 196 of the report of the committee:

The position of the government with respect to these proposals is this.

That is, the proposals which my hon. friend has just made.

It believes that the continuation of foreign exchange control is necessary for the reasons given by the Minister of Finance in his statement on the resolution preceding the introduction of the foreign exchange control bill. It also believes that the system of exchange control which is established should be effective to accomplish its objects. The question of the circumstances under which and the amount to which capital may be exported from Canada is a matter of policy which must necessarily be determined by the government in the light of the general exchange position as it exists from time to time. The policy presently being administered by the foreign exchange control board —and it will be continued so far as possible— is a liberal one and the intention is to pursue as liberal a policy as the circumstances warrant. No one can predict what the foreign exchange position will be in the future, however, and if the present measure is to be effective in accomplishing its purposes the government must be free to change any of its foreign exchange control policies to meet changing situations as and when they occur. Accordingly the government cannot accept amendments to the foreign exchange control bill of the character proposed by Mr. Macdonnell, which would have the effect of limiting the government's ability to adapt its foreign exchange control policy in order to deal quickly and effectively with situations which may arise in the future.

For these reasons I must oppose the amendment.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I make one further and brief observation. This fully underlines what I said this morning and there is no suggestion that I was not right. There is no suggestion that I was not right in saying that the amounts are trivial, as they are; there is no suggestion that this cannot be done without danger. There is merely the reiteration that there must be complete power, that power must not be lessened in the slightest particular anywhere. Let us be quite clear; that is what we are voting for.

Mr. ABBOTT: If my hon. friend wishes to have me answer that I will do so and do it briefly. I do not say that these are trivial or unimportant. I say that if you give to any individual in this country who wants to move to the United States the right to take $15,000 with him, then, if it should become necessary to impose travel restrictions, as we had to do two or three years ago, it would be impossible to do it fairly and effectively without amending the law, which might necessitate the calling of a special session of parliament for the purpose. I simply wish to deny the statement made by my hon. friend that, by inference, I am agreeing to his assertion that such a provision would be unimportant, or would not in any way affect or handicap the efficient administration of the control measure. That in my judgment is not the case.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I make just one more observation which I think is relevant. In the committee I said, although it is not in my amendment, that I wished to make it clear that I am in good faith when I say that I do not want this to create any danger. If the minister would take the amendment and alter it, giving further power, if necessary, for the board to vary the figure, I would be perfectly content to accept it. To me it is a kind of symbol that some day we are going to begin to restore rights to the people. That is all I want it there for, and at the present time there is no right to anybody.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) moves that clause 25 (1) (a) be amended by adding after the word "Canada" the following words: "provided that in the case of a bona fide change of residence a Canadian resident may without permit export an amount not exceeding $15,000". Those in favour of the amendment will say aye.

which is saddled on the people. The whole thing amounts to another cost of doing business and making it more expensive for people to live in Canada than in other countries.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—C. R. and Audit Act not applicable to account.

Mr. McMASTER: I should like to ask the minister why the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act shall not apply?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is the act which says that all receipts have to go into the consolidated revenue fund, so that in the case of a board of this kind the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act is not applicable. But provision is made for an audit of the board's transactions by the auditor general.

Section agreed to.

Sections 10 to 22 inclusive agreed to.

On section 23—Payments by residents to non-residents.

Mr. HAZEN: This section states:

(1) No resident shall, except in accordance with a permit,

(a) pay, lend or otherwise dispose of Canadian currency to a non-resident.

A non-resident, under the interpretation clause of the act, means any person other than a resident. In view of that part of the section which I have read, and that definition, is not a business man in this country precluded from paying money or handing any money to a tourist who comes in here? As I read the section, that is one of its effects.

Mr. ABBOTT: Theoretically my hon. friend is right. That, of course, is covered by regulation. That is an obvious case in which there should be the general rule, and payments to tourists are excepted from that general provision.

Mr. McMASTER: Will it still be the law that you cannot deposit money in the bank to the credit of a non-resident without filling out that form?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct. That is equivalent to making a payment to a non-resident.

Section agreed to.

On section 24—Designation of currencies by the board.

Mr. JACKMAN: What are the designated currencies at the present time?

[Mr. Jackman.]

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised, to the sterling area, sterling or Canadian dollars; to any other points, United States dollars.

Mr. JACKMAN: What would happen, then, if a Canadian importer wants to deal, let us say, with Guatemala; or, to make the case a little more difficult, let us say, with Greece, what is to be the situation there, particularly if those currencies do not happen to be convertible into one of the so-called designated currencies? Is the Canadian trader to be prevented from dealing with a Greek because Greek drachma do not happen to be convertible into United States currency or sterling?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes: if he were selling to Greeks he would have to make his contract in United States dollars, or the drachma if that happened to be convertible into United States dollars.

Section agreed to.

On section 25—Property.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): In my remarks this morning I said there were two things, among others, in which we had sought to have slight changes. One was the question of time and the other was the introduction of some slight relaxation of the general rigidity of this bill. Without making any extended remarks, I just want to recall to the committee that I told them this morning that we suggested, in the case of a Canadian resident making a bona fide change of residence, a small amount should be allowed, to be fixed by the board. I have put it in an amendment, but I said I would be perfectly ready to have it left flexible. I wish to remind the committee, before I move this amendment, that the amounts involved are, I believe, comparatively trivial. I frankly confess that, in a sense, I am making this amendment as a kind of token or a beginning toward the lessening of the rigidity. Having said that, I will move an amendment to subsection 1, paragraph (a). It now reads:

(1) No person shall, except in accordance with a permit,

(a) export any property from Canada.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rosedale, the addition of these words:

provided that in the case of a bona fide change in residence by a Canadian resident he may without permit export an amount not exceeding $15,000.

I believe the practical significance of that is quite small. I gave an illustration this morning which I hope will come close to the minds of hon. members, the illustration of a that large sums should be used to purchase foreign exchange to support a rate which is not justified. I agree with my hon. friend on that point. But under a system of exchange control that must be left to the exercise of the judgment of the board.

Mr. JACKMAN: To speculate.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is not speculation, but an exercise of judgment on the part of the authorities.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the minister in his reading and studying of the Bretton Woods agreement consider this point, that nothing will contribute more to the success of that agreement than that the level of our currency should have a realistic relationship to the actual business conditions from day to day?

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Earnings paid into C.R.F.

Mr. JACKMAN: This clause has to do with the earnings of the board, which now are to be paid into the consolidated revenue fund, I am thankful to say, and are not to be allowed to revolve within the ambit of the board itself. But this is supposed to be a control measure, and not a tax-raising device. Under the War Measures Act, which has allowed the existence of this creature for the last five years, it has not been a control board alone but a tax-raising expedient. Let us look at the burden which this board has been to the Canadian public since its inception. From September 15, 1939, to December 31, 1940, it took out of the Canadian public $16,000,000.

Mr. ABBOTT: That was put on the record a moment ago, I think by the hon. member for St. John-Albert.

Mr. JACKMAN: It will not hurt to reiterate it.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps they were different figures.

Mr. JACKMAN: I say that in that period $16,000,000 was taken out of the Canadian public, as a cost to business which is passed on in higher costs to the Canadian public. The profit on that was transferred to the reserve fund, which now is seriously dented by the mistakes leading to July 5 last. The board accumulated a surplus that year, 1940, of $8,900,000; and in the following years surpluses of $9,200,000 in 1941; $11,225,000 in 1942; $9,400,000 in 1943; $6,600,000 in 1944 and $3,841,000 in 1945. Yet this is supposed to be a control board and they are making all this money. No doubt they would point to it as a profit. But it is nothing more or less than an additional burden on Canadian business which must be passed on to the Canadian citizen. Not only is that bad enough in itself, but it arises from the fact that formerly one per cent was charged on the buying and selling rate. When a merchant wanted to deal in United States exchange or sterling the rate was one-half of one per cent. The rate should have been reduced to that figure years ago; but the bureaucrats seek to justify their salaries which are not published to the members of this house or known to the people of Canada. You can believe me that they are very adequate salaries; the jobs have no insecurity about them, and when these officials retire they are given a pension which is very adequate. The men, who are no doubt able in their particular fields, the bank and the exchange board, are very well paid, and apparently so well paid that it is none of our business or that of the people whom we represent and who put up the money for them. Of course, if they can show a paper profit, if they want to call it that, it looks well; it is a good thing; they may say they are making money for us, but let us go back one step and realize that this money—every cent of it—is coming out of the Canadian taxpayer.

Mr. ABBOTT: Supposing these same transactions had been carried out by the commercial banks; does my hon. friend think the profit would have been less?

Mr. JACKMAN: As has been pointed out to-day, I think, on the floor, and certainly was brought out by the committee, the star witness for the government said that on small transactions—by which, I suppose, is meant five to fifty dollars—the rate prevailing before the war under ordinary private banking practice was probably no smaller; but on the transactions which have to do with business, transactions the costs of which are passed on to the Canadian people, the rate was very much less. Instead of being half of one per cent, which again is fifty per cent of what the board charged a year ago, it used to be one-sixteenth or one-eighth, or at the most three-eighths.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, but I think the banks took positions on the exchange.

Mr. JACKMAN: Never mind. I am speaking of the cost to the Canadian public. You could either buy or sell within a one-sixteenth or a one-eighth spread. Now it is half of one per cent, and the result is shown not only in the costs of running this board but the costs of paying the banks, and the very large profit—that is, the so-called profit—

September 15, 1939, we had in Canada holdings of United States dollars and gold amounting to $393 million. This amount fluctuated at the end of each year, and I should like to give the round figures for the different years. In 1940 it was $404 million; in 1941, $332 million. Then we reached a low point on December 31, 1941, when we were hard pressed for money with which to purchase war supplies in the United States, and the fund got down to $187 million. The next year it had increased to $318 million; then $649 million and $902 million. On December 31, 1945, it was $1,508,000,000 in United States currency and gold. Apparently the tendency in recent years has been for this fund to grow about 60 per cent a year. It does not take very much compounding at that rate for the fund to grow out of all sensible proportions, and possibly a limit should be put on it. But the least we can expect is a statement of policy from the minister as to what the action of the board is likely to be. When this question was under discussion in the banking and commerce committee as to how much the board should have of the taxpayers' money with which to speculate in gold and United States currency I asked the expert witness whether it would make very much difference if $500,000,000 of this $1,500,000,000 were not held in the fund but held by Canadian individuals in the form of United States investments, and his answer was that it would not make a great deal of difference. The only difference that I could gather from his answer was that it is always nicer in a difficult time to have cash in the bank rather than assets in the form of securities which, while pretty readily convertible, are not just cash. There were days before central banking was instituted when one could not get cash and when securities were not of very much value; but those days have long since passed, particularly in view of the fact that we now have the Bank of Canada and its integration with the foreign exchange control board.

What would be the result if $500,000,000 of this $1,500,000,000 were held by private investors and not by the board? The difference would be that private investors in United States securities, if they were allowed to buy them, would be able to get a rate of 2½ to 4 per cent, whereas the Bank of Canada does not earn any such figure as that, probably not even one per cent on its balances. If individuals in Canada were allowed to own these United States securities they would be under the control of the board in just the same way as all other United States securities in Canada can, if necessary, be taken over by the board. I admit that an order in council or some other authority would be necessary to do that at the moment. Under the proposed bill individuals holding these United States securities could be made to report the same, and if these securities were not physically in Canada the individuals could be made to bring them over to this country. So that if the board would allow individuals to own some of these securities and would supply them with funds to acquire them we would have an income in United States dollars in Canada from these securities, which the board claims is badly needed. But only the board is allowed to purchase these United States securities with funds under its jurisdiction. There again is another evidence of the cost of this type of regulation to the Canadian public. But what I am chiefly concerned about is some indication of policy on the part of the government or the board as to how much of the unappropriated revenues of this country is likely to be taken for the purpose, as I say, of allowing the board to speculate in gold and United States currency.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is almost impossible to give an accurate estimate. It depends on circumstances as they exist from day to day. What is being done here is this. When an advance is made from consolidated revenue fund to the board it is in order that the board may purchase United States dollars or purchase gold. United States dollars are the dominating currency, and what the board is doing in effect when it gets an advance of $100,000,000, let us say, from consolidated revenue is to convert that into United States dollars. That was discussed before the banking and commerce committee. I gave substantially the same answer there, and it is the answer I must give to this committee.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I appreciate the minister's difficulty, but I would ask this question which I think is not irrelevant. Reference has been made earlier to-day to the obligation we have under Bretton Woods. I am not going to go into that at length, although I do not agree with what was said. Under Bretton Woods we can, if necessary, depreciate our currency up to ten points merely by saying that we want to, or virtually so. I would think it undesirable that we should be in a position where we might just stubbornly stick to a certain parity that we started off with, with the idea that we must stick to it whether or no, and perhaps use large reserves in doing that. I wonder if the minister would say something as to that. There is a point there.

Mr. ABBOTT: I appreciate the point, and speaking as an individual member of the government I do not suggest for one moment

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall certainly look into it, although I do not know whether it is so or not. I would point out to my hon. friend something which he no doubt knows, that our exports are approaching a nearly all-time high and have been for some time. Without having the figures before me, I am not prepared to accept a general statement such as the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton has made, that millions of dollars worth of exports have been lost because of our exchange control policy. I have serious doubts as to whether that is an accurate statement.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister knows very well that it is impossible to base any estimate upon our present condition of trade. We are exporting mainly raw products which are not available in other countries. We are fortunate to be able to obtain that business, but when normal times return this may not be the case.

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton has pointed out that many potato exporters in New Brunswick have lost money because of the change that was made without notice in the value of the Canadian dollar on July 5. It has been brought to my attention that losses were also suffered by exporters in the maritime provinces, or at least in New Brunswick, who engaged in selling tinned fish. It seems to me that some provision should be made or some steps should be taken to protect these people and save them from loss. The report of the foreign exchange control board issued in March, 1946, shows on page 39 and following that for the years ending December 31 the board made the following profits:

1940	$8,915,000
1941	9,265,000
1942	11,225,000
1943	9,414,000
1944	6,659,000
1945	3,841,000

In view of those figures, it seems to me that the board might very well do something to compensate these people for the losses they have sustained by reason of the government taking this action without any notice.

Mr. ABBOTT: Would my hon. friend suggest that the board should get the credit on the imports?

Mr. HAZEN: No, I do not suggest that at all; I do not suggest they should. Do you?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, I do not, and I do not think they should pay the losses on the exports.

Mr. JACKMAN: As I recollect, there was some discussion in the committee that the board was to have the power to use for the purchase of gold and United States exchange any unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is covered by section 7.

Mr. HAZEN: This section deals with the special account in the name of the Minister of Finance, known as the exchange fund account, established by the Bank of Canada pursuant to the Exchange Fund Act. The total assets in that account at the end of December 31, 1945, were $1,435,130,213.63, which is a large sum of money. Could the minister tell us how much of that money was seized from people of this country at the international boundary line and not returned to them?

Mr. ABBOTT: None of it.

Mr. HAZEN: Where did that money go that was seized?

Mr. ABBOTT: Any fines or seizures of that kind go directly into the consolidated revenue fund under the appropriate statute.

Section agreed to.

Section 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Advances out of C.R.F. to exchange fund account.

Mr. JACKMAN: While I do not intend to move an amendment by way of providing a ceiling, nevertheless I think the committee should be made fully aware of the power which is being given to the board through the Minister of Finance under this section. Under this section the minister may make advances to the exchange fund account; that is, the fund with which the exchange control officers speculate, out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund on such terms and conditions as the governor in council may prescribe. This board, through the minister and the governor in council, do not have to come to parliament if they want a $1,000 million. When we talk in figures like that we must realize that in my constituency there are taxpayers who pay a tax of twenty-two per cent after $750 if they are single, or after $1,500 if they are married. They are not eager to see the government drop $150,000,000, as they did on July 5, or more. May I point out to the committee how this fund has grown and why we should have some indication from the minister in charge as to how large this frog is going to expand itself, so that we may have an idea of how much of an encroachment it will make into the taxpayers' funds. On

Mr. HATFIELD: Then I must object to the continuation of regulations under this measure which will force exporters in this country to go to the expense of making out these forms, and which will require the exporter to make out the B form, one which is prepared in seven copies. Before making out these forms they have to make application and obtain permission to export goods. All this is unnecessary.

We always made out export papers which were required by the customs branch, and in those papers we stated the amount and value of the goods. These provisions set up by the foreign exchange control board have the effect of compelling exporters to add to their office staff. I am only a small exporter, but I have had to add four or five people to my staff to make out these forms. If one is going to export a cargo of goods from this country, and if he has about fifty consignees, days are required to make out these papers.

It is just a waste of paper and a nuisance to the exporter. We are an exporting nation, but we in the maritime provinces have lost sales of goods through the cancellation in July. The maritime provinces have lost sales amounting to millions of dollars. This is true particularly of the growers of certified seed potatoes, who were not as fortunate as the pulp and paper people. The market for seed potatoes in the United States and South America was limited, and we had to meet competition. The result has been that we have lost about half our market for certified seed potatoes in the United States, South America and South Africa because of the cancellation of the premium on United States funds, it has meant a loss of millions of dollars to the maritime provinces.

Mr. GRAYDON: Arising out of what was said by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, the minister made reference to forward contracts as distinguished from other types of contracts.

Mr. ABBOTT: Forward contracts for the purchase of exchange.

Mr. GRAYDON: I understand. Would it be correct or incorrect to suggest that the exporters who would have forward contracts would be the larger ones, while those without would be the little men?

Mr. ABBOTT: Not necessarily. My hon. friend will recall that in the days before the foreign exchange control board any exporter could hedge his sales in foreign exchange by making a forward purchase of foreign exchange.

Then, I do not know what the hon. member means by "the larger ones". I used to have a client who was a substantial tea importer and exporter, and who dealt extensively in foreign exchange. He always covered his commitments by purchases with his bank. Similar facilities are available to the trade to-day, under the conditions I outlined earlier, namely, that there must be definite commitments to pay a definite sum within a definite time. I do not think it would be fair to say that these arrangements are available only to the large exporters.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not suggesting that, and I would not think that would be the case. But as it would work out in a practical way, I should think, as an onlooker of the argument, that the little fellow would be the one who would not have the money with which to purchase blocks of exchange that the big man would, and for that reason the little man in this case would be the greater sufferer instead of the larger exporter who would be in the business. I think the minister, on contemplation and reflection, will perhaps find that that assumption is correct.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told that the cost of the protection referred to is only one-sixteenth of one per cent a month, which I would not think would be such as to preclude any reasonably solvent merchant from availing himself of this form of insurance.

Mr. HATFIELD: Any exporter could not take out a contract for more than three months. If I entered into a contract in May with a person in the United States for so many potatoes to be shipped this fall, I could get protection only up to three months. I could not enter into a contract for five months when the goods are going to be shipped, but other exporters can. The agents of the foreign exchange control board and the bankers have lists of preferred exporters. I tried to make a contract and I know.

Mr. MacNICOL: In former years I had a good deal to do with exporting. What the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton has said seems to me to be a serious statement. He has made the statement that the situation he is up against affects not only his business but has resulted in the loss of many millions of dollars of orders from South America. If that is so, that is an extremely serious situation. Anyone who knows anything about business knows that export trade is of great value to a country. If what the hon. member has said is so, I would think the minister or his department should rectify it.

with us, and appear to be unwilling to depart. Knowing many hon. gentlemen opposite as I do; having known some of them for many years, I know that legislation of the type under discussion is as disagreeable to them as it is to many who sit on this side. I cannot imagine that champions of freedom and liberty such as the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, who hails from the highlands and who sits in the front bench opposite, and my good friend, also from the townships, who is Minister of Finance for the moment, really rejoice in legislation of this nature; but I feel that they have been ensnared by a system of controls to which we resorted during the war, and that they have become so dependent upon this bureaucratic system that they cannot shake themselves free from it.

The United States, our nearest neighbour, a country with which our relations are intimate, a country whose development is somewhat ahead of ours, but a country whose activities have always had a profound influence upon our destinies, has shaken itself free from those controls with which it found it necessary to shackle itself during the period of the war. It has never saddled itself with the type of institution set up by the present bill. We are creating a difficult position for ourselves if we attempt to manage our currency and our whole economic system, and thus give rein to an intensive nationalism which will prevent ordinary intercourse between friendly nations. It was pointed out here this afternoon that if a farmer living on the border wishes to sell his farm and move across into the United States, in effect he cannot do so because he cannot take with him the amount necessary to buy a farm there.

Mr. IRVINE: Is that quite true? Might he not be permitted by the board to do so?

Mr. HACKETT: In special circumstances and with the permission of the board he might be permitted to go to the United States. This is an important matter for many people, particularly for those living along the international border. Those who are aware of the ease and facility with which people moved across the international boundary in the past, have found most galling the regulations enacted by the foreign exchange control board, which are perpetuated by this measure. Ultimately, misunderstanding and possibly bad blood will result from the enforcement of these regulations.

There is a growing tendency to dominate and to control the individual. I am not at the present time going to deal with the sections in the measure which are so extremely harsh in respect of the control of human conduct. My objection to the bill is that it takes away from individuals and institutions prerogatives and rights which belong to them, and places upon the government added burdens which it is not able to carry. If we benefit from the lessons of history, we are bound to know that such controls breed tyranny and revolution and must result in sorrow for the Canadian people and the loss of that freedom which has characterized our growth and development to this time.

Mr. HATFIELD: I want to know if protection to be given to exporters who, prior to a few weeks or days preceding July 5, had exported goods and had a contract with the foreign exchange control board under its B form to bring the currency back to Canada, and sell it to the board. Those exporters of goods sold with the expectation of receiving ten per cent on their money, and in some cases that ten per cent was more than the profit on the goods. In all fairness the government should have protected them. It is protecting a few privileged exporters, to the extent of $13 million of the country's money. Surely it should have protected exporters who sold goods on a distinct understanding, and who made a contract with the foreign exchange control board prior to July 5 to bring that money back. They carried out their conditions under the contract, but the foreign exchange control board failed to carry out its part of the contract.

Mr. ABBOTT: If they had a forward contract, which was open to everyone, they would be protected. But if they had simply filled out the B form, which is a notice that they intended to export and were going to receive payment in United States funds, they were taking the exchange risk themselves.

Mr. HATFIELD: Many of these exporters were not privileged to have a form of contract. The only exporters who were thus privileged were the exporters who had long-term contracts. It required about a month or two months to get a permit from the board to take out a forward contract. The procedure had to be taken up with one's banker. Certain exporters, such as those who export pulp and paper products, and some other privileged exporters, were the only ones who could take out forward contracts. The others could take it out for three months.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the section carry?

Mr. HATFIELD: No; I should like to have an answer.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have given the hon. member all the information I have on the subject.
