PARIS PEACE CONFERENCE

ATTENDANCE OF PRIME MINISTER—CANADIAN DELEGATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have told hon. members of the invitation extended by the government of France, acting in the name of the council of foreign ministers, to the government of Canada to send a delegation to represent Canada at the conference which will open in Paris on July 29, to consider the terms of peace with Italy and with Roumania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Finland.

The preparations for this conference have been a long time under way. The decision of the council of foreign ministers to convoke a conference is, in itself, evidence that the preparations have resulted in a substantial measure of agreement among the great powers.

The conference now arranged represents a further stage in the process of working out the treaties of peace. In this stage all the countries which have made their military contribution to the defeat of the axis powers will have an opportunity to express their views on the terms of the peace settlement, in so far as it relates to eastern and southern Europe. It is important to note that the proceedings of the conference which convenes in Paris on July 29 will be concerned only with a consideration of the terms of peace with Italy and with the axis satellites of eastern and southern Europe.

The Paris conference is not to be confused with a peace conference to determine the final settlement with respect to Germany. While the Paris conference is of importance in what it may accomplish in creating a more peaceful atmosphere in Europe, it will be concerned neither with the treaties of peace with the major enemy countries, Germany and Japan, nor with international problems as a whole, such as are the concern of the united nations. The plans for a conference respecting Germany and the date at which it may be held have still to be determined. It is not possible at the moment even to suggest a probable date. Nor, as I have said, will the conference which meets in Paris on the 29th instant be concerned, directly or indirectly, with the conference which presumably will be held ere long with respect to Japan and Pacific questions.

Although this is still one world, and its peace is indivisible, it is apparent that some countries are much more closely and directly concerned than others with the specific solutions of questions of territorial boundaries, population transfers, war damage indemnities, and so on. Such will be the class or kind of subject to be discussed at the forthcoming Paris conference. They obviously are of primary interest to the European countries. In these circumstances, Canada's principal interest and duty will, it seems to me, lie in helping the countries more directly concerned to work out agreed solutions which are fair, and will be likely to endure. Our national interest is to see that, as far as possible, the peace treaties are based upon broad and enduring principles of justice and equity. Canada is not seeking territory or reparations, but we do want a lasting peace. With this conception of our role in mind, and with the proceedings of the Paris conference restricted to the subjects I have outlined, the government does not feel that it would be either necessary or appropriate to have a large Canadian delegation.

REVISED EDITION

In particular, we have considered whether it would be desirable or necessary that Canada's representation should be along the lines of our representation at the united nations conference on international organization at San Francisco, which was concerned with bringing into being the charter of the united nations, and at the preparatory commission for the united nations organization which met in London in November and December last, and at the first part of the first assembly of the united nations which met in London in January and February of this year. On these occasions several members of the administration and representatives of national parties in parliament were present.

There are important differences between the organization and working procedures of a body, such as the assembly of the united nations, and a diplomatic conference such as that which is meeting in Paris at the end of this month. The united nations charter stipulates that each member of the united nations is to have five delegates and five alternates representing it at the general assembly, and the assembly is organized into a number of standing committees which meet simultaneously to discuss the disposition of the several items on the assembly agenda. The assembly and its committees are public deliberative bodies, governed by rules of procedure very similar to those followed in our own parliament. The assembly does, perhaps, contain within itself the germ of a world parliament. It is our hope that it will develop in strength and responsibility along these lines.

The Paris conference, on the other hand, is essentially a diplomatic conference, at which most governments will be represented by their foreign ministers. It is not yet clear how the conference will be finally organized for the transaction of its business. Considering the nature and history of the questions which are bound to come up for consideration, it is most improbable that the conference will conduct its business through a series of public committees reporting to a plenary session.

In considering Canada's representation at Paris, we have had to take these facts into account. We have also had to keep in mind the fact that our parliament is still in session, and that its proceedings may continue for some time. Account also had to be taken of the fact that the united nations assembly which adjourned in London in February will resume its meeting in New York during September.

The government, I might say, contemplates, for the meeting of the united nations assembly in New York, a delegation similar in its representative character to that of the delegation to the London meeting.

In the light of all these circumstances, the government feels, as I have already intimated, that the delegation to the Paris conference should not be any larger than the situation appears to warrant and to justify. I may add that, having regard to the significance of the conference, my colleagues share the view expressed by the leader of the opposition on Friday of last week, when he said that in his judgment the country would expect the Prime Minister to go to the Paris conference and that parliament would also expect this.

Quite frankly, I have been deeply concerned as to whether I should be away from parliament for a second time this session. I feel, however, that other countries to be represented at the conference, as well as our own, may also hold the view expressed by the leader of the opposition and by my colleagues. In coming to the conclusion that I should make every effort to go, I may say that I have been helped by the assurance of the leader of the opposition that during my absence he and his party would be disposed to facilitate the work of the house. I am accordingly making my plans to be in Paris in time for the opening meeting of the conference.

I shall have with me as a member of the delegation the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton). I shall also have associated with me as members of the delegation a small staff including the under-secretary of state for external affairs, the clerk of the privy council and the Canadian ambassadors to France and the U.S.S.R. If, after my arrival in Paris, when I have full particulars of the organization of the conference, and of the rules of procedure to be followed, it should appear that, in Canada's interests, it would be advisable to have additional representation, I shall not hesitate to have matters arranged accordingly.

I have one or two other statements to make to the house, but if my hon. friends wish to raise any questions with regard to the statement I have just made I would defer making the other statements until after they have spoken.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am aware and the house is aware that an announcement of this kind at this time is not debatable, and I appreciate the Prime Minister's indicating that we might wish to make a comment. I am sure Your Honour would have permitted it in any case. When the press intimated a few days ago that the peace conference was likely to be held in Paris on July 29 I took the opportunity to indicate that I thought the country would expect the Prime Minister to go. Certainly we in this section of the house thought that he should go. I am glad to learn now that he has decided to go and I am sure the house will approve that decision, and the country as well. The occasion, it is needless to say, is a very important one for Canada and the world; and I believe all will agree that the Canadian delegation should be headed by the Prime Minister. I am sure we all wish for him every success in this important mission.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I thank my hon. friend for the cordial manner in which he has received the announcement I have just made, and for his expressions of good will. I should like at the same time to thank hon. members generally for the gracious way in which they have received and approved the views expressed by the leader of the opposition.

UNITED NATIONS

RELIEF AND REHABILITATION—MEETING OF COUNCIL AT GENEVA AUGUST 5

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I wish to say a word about an important conference to be held very shortly in Geneva. Some days ago I received from our ambassador in Washington a communication quoting a letter which had been addressed by Mr. LaGuardia, who is director general of UNRRA, to the ambassador, and which has since been forwarded to me. The letter addressed to our ambassador is under date of June 27, 1946:

My dear Mr. Ambassador:

The agenda for the forthcoming meeting of the UNRRA council includes an item regarding the future of UNRRA. There will in due course be circulated by the administration council documents bearing upon the several aspects of this problem on which decisions will be required.

I believe it to be of the greatest importance that delegations to the council meeting be fully prepared to discuss this question, and I am, therefore, sending to you for the information of your government an aide memoire drawing attention to the situation. I earnestly hope that your government will give immediate consideration to this document.

Sincerely yours,
F. LaGuardia,
Director General.

Mr. La Guardia also sent a personal letter to myself. It is under the heading United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, and is dated Washington, June 29. In this communication Mr. LaGuardia says in part:

I am now giving some thought to the work of the forthcoming UNRRA council session. I am convinced that the meeting will be of great importance since it must decide what, if any, future provision should be made for relief activities. I am sending an aide memoire to you and other heads of member governments on this point since I know it will be essential to face these issues squarely and get clear-cut decisions.

The meeting of the UNRRA council had been arranged at first to take place in Paris on August 2. Owing, however, to the meeting of the peace conference opening in Paris on July 29, the UNRRA meeting is to be held at Geneva on August 5. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that the cabinet has given careful consideration to the steps that should be taken in meeting the request of the director general of the UNRRA, and I have an announcement to make as to the manner in which we believe it can best be met, which I think will be warmly received by the house.

It will be recalled that the third council session of UNRRA determined provisionally that final UNRRA shipments should be completed by March 31, 1947. The principal questions for consideration at the forthcoming meeting will be the transfer or winding up of UNRRA functions in the field of emergency supply, work with displaced persons and in relation also to welfare activities in countries devastated by war. In each of these fields much has been accomplished, but many problems remain and it will be for the forthcoming council meeting to make proposals for the consideration of the governments as to how these problems can best be solved.

In view of the importance of the financial implications of the questions to be considered at this meeting, the government has arranged that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) should himself attend the meeting at Geneva. The Minister of Finance will be accompanied by Mr. L. B. Pearson, our ambassador at Washington, who has taken a foremost part in the relief and rehabilitation activities of the united nations since their inception.

Hon. members are aware that my colleague the Minister of Finance has intimated at different times to fellow members in the house that he felt considerably fatigued as a result of the strenuous exertions he has had for many months past, and that he was contemplating an absence after the motion to go into committee of ways and means had been decided. He had that very much in mind, without having reached a decision as to just where he should go for the vacation to which he has looked forward, if it can be called a vacation. Having in mind the communications that were received from the director general of UNRRA, and realizing how very important this meeting will be, I felt, and so expressed myself to my colleagues, that the Minister of Finance might be able to get a bit of a change and rest on an ocean voyage en route to Geneva, and that perhaps he would be able to make better use of his time than otherwise would be the case if while away he had some active work to engage his attention.

Mr. GRAYDON: A busman's holiday.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: At any rate, I have asked Mr. Ilsley if he would represent Canada on the council, and he has agreed to do so. I am sure I may say to him that the members of all parties in this house will welcome his willingness to assume this particular responsibility, and will hope he will at the same time be able to combine with it what is obviously desirable, namely, a much needed and well earned rest and change.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ARRANGEMENTS IN CONNECTION WITH ABSENCE OF PRIME MINISTER AND MINISTER OF FINANCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I come now to the question of the affairs of the house, and of the ministers who will be acting in the absence of others, during the time that the Minister of Finance and I will be away from Ottawa. As the house is aware, when I have been absent on recent occasions, the Minister of Finance has been Acting Prime Minister. As Mr. Ilsley will not be here during my absence on this occasion, I have asked my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) if he would take on the duties of Acting Prime Minister and he has agreed to do so. I assured him that if he were willing to assume the responsibility and the announcement were made to the house, he would see for himself, as he has now seen, how acceptable his decision would prove to be. In the absence of the Minister of Finance, my colleague the Minister of National Defence, Mr. Abbott, will be Acting Minister of Finance. The Minister of Justice, Mr. St. Laurent, will be Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, as he has been on previous occasions, and my colleague, Mr. Mackenzie, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, will be acting president of the council and will also continue to exercise, in the very efficient manner in which he has in the past, supervision over the organization of the business of the house, as house leader. In the absence of the Minister of Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) will be acting Minister of National Health and Welfare.

I should like to thank the house for the responsive manner in which it has received these several announcements.

AMENDMENT TO OLD AGE PENSIONS ACT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): On Friday last, July 5, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) referring to the statement which I had just made concerning legislation still to be brought down by the government, inquired what the intention of the government was regarding an amendment to the Old Age Pensions Act; and he made reference to some promise that my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) had made. I said that I would look into the promise. The hon. member referred to a statement made on June 24 by the Minister of National Health and Welfare in which it was indicated that it was proposed, during the present session, to have legislation introduced. Obviously a bill will have to be introduced at some time to continue in force the changes made in old age pensions under the War Measures Act. It had been the intention of the government to introduce a bill at this session.

In view, however, of the great amount of business still to be concluded at this session of parliament, the government suggested that the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, should be extended for an additional forty-five days after the opening of the next session in order to make it unnecessary to reenact a considerable volume of emergency legislation at this session. It is the intention of the government to avail itself of this amendment and to delay the introduction of the necessary old age pensions bill until next session.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—OPPORTUNITY FOR DISCUSSION BEFORE PRIME MINISTER'S DEPARTURE FOR PARIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister? Will the house be given an opportunity to discuss external affairs before he leaves for the Paris peace conference?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I say to my hon. friend that one of the regrets I have in being obliged to leave very soon is that there are some things that I should like to do that it will not be possible for me to do before leaving, and the discussion of external affairs matters is one of them. Before I left to go overseas some time ago I arranged that the estimates for the Department of External Affairs should be placed before the committee dealing with external affairs. I understand the committee has had very full information given to its members with respect to the several items that come under the head of estimates, and which may be made to include, if so desired, pretty much all the subjects that are likely to come up for debate on the estimates of the Department of External Affairs. I should have liked very much to have the privilege of saying some things on external affairs that I have been anxious to say for some little time, but I am leaving on Wednesday of next week and I do not think in the interval I should break into the proceedings of the house in its debate on the budget in order to take up external affairs. Moreover, I cannot imagine anyone who is in a better position to discuss external affairs than my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), who will be acting minister in my absence.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Prime Minister, before he closes the door entirely to bringing the estimates of external affairs before the house, to reconsider the matter in the light of the present circumstances?

REPARATIONS

INTER-ALLIED AGENCY—CANADA'S REPRESENTATIVES —ALLOTMENTS TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that news reports are reaching Canada relating to inter-allied reparations agency decisions, will the Prime Minister be good enough to inform the house who are Canada's representatives on this body, and what reparations from Germany in money or other property have been or are likely to be allocated to Canada?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In answer to my hon. friend's question, of which he sent me a copy, I would say the Canadian government is represented on the inter-allied reparations agency in Brussels by the Hon. W. F. A. Turgeon, Canadian Ambassador to Belgium. The alternate Canadian delegate is Colonel G. W. McPherson, of the custodian's office, Department of the Secretary of State, at present serving as custodian representative on the Canadian military mission to Germany.

According to the final act of the Paris conference on reparations, to which the Canadian government is a signatory, Canada has been allocated 3·5 per cent of German assets under category A and 1·5 per cent of German assets under category B of the Paris conference on reparations. Category B assets include German industrial and other capital equipment removed from Germany and merchant ships and inland water transport. Category A assets include all forms of German reparations except those under category B. German external assets held in custody by the member governments and in neutral countries are assets of this category.

The Canadian custodian holds German assets to the extent of $6,485,204.26. Under the terms of the Paris agreement the Canadian government is authorized to hold or dispose of these assets, which are to be charged by the inter-allied reparations agency against the Canadian reparation account over a five year period.

From time to time lists of industrial equipment available for distribution as reparation to the member governments through inter-allied reparations agency are communicated to the Canadian government. Canada's share of assets of this kind is 1·5 per cent of the total available.

The inter-allied reparations agency has allocated most of the ex-German shipping available. Canada has been assigned 1·42 per cent of the tonnage amounting to some 10,797 tons made up of the ships Huas Caran, Tiefland and Weserwehr.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question? How will the reparations which come to Canada, and to which the Prime Minister has referred, be distributed? What channels will be used for that purpose?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend I am unable to answer him offhand but I shall seek to give him the answer in due course.

FISH

DOMESTIC ALLOCATION OF BRITISH COLUMBIA CANNED SALMON

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. F. G. BRIDGES (Minister of Fisheries): For the information of the house and the public I would like to say that under plans which have now been worked out for the allocation of Canada's 1946 production of canned fish, 500,000 cases of British Columbia canned salmon, or 24,000,000 pounds, will be made available to Canadian consumers from this year's pack. This is an increase of 200,000 cases, or sixty-six and two-thirds per cent, over the domestic allocation from the 1945 salmon pack. I may add that in making this increase in domestic allocation we have the concurrence of the international emergency food council, which has taken the place of the combined food board.

The house will recall that during the war years Canada sent nearly all its canned salmon overseas to help meet the critical food needs there. This year, however, it will be possible to take care of a much greater part of the domestic demand. Normal domestic demand runs to something more than half a million cases a year, but this quantity will at least be fairly well up to the usual requirements, and, as I have said, it is a much larger supply than has been available to Canadian consumers in any recent year.

Perhaps I should add a reminder that naturally it will be some months yet before this year's domestic allocation flows to market in volume and reaches the merchants' shelves. While salmon canning is now under way on the Pacific coast, it is in midsummer and on into the autumn that the big production takes place.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STEEL INDUSTRY—PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): May I be permitted to direct a question to the Minister of Labour of which I have given him notice? It arises out of several telegrams which I have received from Nova Scotia expressing great anxiety about the present steel dispute. Is the minister in a position to indicate to the house whether any progress has been made toward reaching a final settlement?

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State): As the house knows, the Minister of Labour is rarely absent from his seat at this time, but he is engaged in an important conference, and he asked me to say to the hon. gentleman that he has no final information on the subject.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY EMPLOYEES—PENSION RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I sent him notice of this question two days ago, but at his request in view of the other matters that were before him I delayed asking it until to-day. When is the royal commission to be appointed to inquire into the matter of the pension rights of Canadian Pacific Railway employees involved in the 1919 strike, as requested over a year ago by unions representing the men, and as recommended to the government last December by Mr. H. S. Johnstone, conciliation officer of the Department of Labour?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend was good enough to write me a letter about this matter. May I say to him that unfortunately I have not had the opportunity thus far of reading the recent reports on the matter, or the representation of the Canadian Pacific Railway company. I should like the question to stand for my colleague, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), to answer very shortly.

ARMY SUPPLIES

PRESS REPORT AS TO DISCARDING OF SHOES AND SLIPPERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, in connection with which I have sent to him a copy of the Montreal Star of July 10, the day before yesterday, in which appears a news story accompanied by pictures indicating that thousands of pairs of serviceable army shoes and slippers are lying on the Wellington street dump at Point St. Charles. In view of what appears to be a serious situation I would ask the minister to make an investigation and give the house a report on the matter as soon as possible, if he is not able to do so at the moment.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I have read the newspaper account sent across to me, and it seems to absolve both War Assets Corporation and the Department of National Defence. The report indicates that the material was dumped there by a private merchant. I shall make sure no government agency was involved, but beyond that I do not see what action the government can take.

Mr. COLDWELL: Cannot waste of that description be prevented?

NATIONAL FLAG

INQUIRY AS TO MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN COMMITTEE REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay): I should like to ask the chairman of the flag committee when he will move in the house—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DORION: I should like to ask when he will move concurrence in the report he tabled to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DORION: I think I am entitled to an answer. I am not asking the government; I am asking the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The report was tabled to-day, and as the hon. member knows, under standing order 45 some time must elapse before concurrence may be moved.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Richelieu-Verchères): Arising out of the statement you have just made, Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion), may I ask the Prime Minister if it is the intention of the government that such a motion shall be made later this day, and that the unanimous consent of those present in the house will be asked in order to do so?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Do I understand my hon. friend to ask if there is any intention of having the motion made later this day? There is no intention to have a motion later this day.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Thursday, July 11, consideration of the motion of Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. MacInnis.

Mr. WILFRID GARIEPY (Three Rivers): Last evening, Mr. Speaker, in my desire to conclude my remarks before adjournment I neglected to reply to a couple of interruptions as I might have done. I shall do so now. To the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Heon) may I say that upon investigation I have found that the school legislation adopted by the Anderson government in Saskatchewan has not been repealed or altered by the present Douglas C.C.F. government of that province. To the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) I must say that on looking into the records I have found I am somewhat mistaken, in that he has seen the error of his ways oftener than I thought. I have discovered, and I must admit, that he has voted with the government oftener than I thought had been the case. For this good move I am satisfied his electors will be very grateful to him when the proper time comes.

Two hon. members from my province yesterday raised the question of clemency in connection with our youngsters who may have violated the Militia Act. In this connection let me read an article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of October 31 last:

> In the united nation countries, it is recognized that the men who served on land, at sea, and in the air to defeat Germany, Italy and Japan have rendered a priceless service to humanity. But in Dublin, Mr. DeValera takes a different standpoint.
> By an emergency decree signed by Mr. DeValera himself, deserters from the Irish army who were absent from Ireland during the past five years for a period of more than six months will be barred from any government employment in Ireland for seven years and will be denied unemployment benefits . . .
> Admitting that these men committed an infraction of Irish military law in going to war for freedom, it would seem sensible and practicable to grant them amnesty—treat their war service as if they had been sent on special instructional courses—and use them to frame an army in Ireland which would really mean something.

Recently some military police have been in my own county putting their hands on a young man belonging to a well-known family. I am personally aware that the chief of police residing in my district has a list of a certain number of young fellows who are being looked for. I have visited the Longueuil camp not far from Montreal, where at the time I visited it there were over a thousand young men who were prisoners and treated as such. I am not going to plead, Mr. Speaker; I am not going to give any special reasons for what I ask. The war has been over for one year. I appeal to this house, to the country and to the veterans' associations of Canada to join hands, grant amnesty to our young men and let them make a fresh start for the welfare of Canada as a whole.

As to the budget, I accept it as it is, complimenting the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) on the magnificent work he has done. We have undertakings, we have debts, we have responsibilities that must be met. Mr. Brunet, assistant general manager of Alfred Lambert, Incorporated, made a statement yesterday which seems to me to contain what I might have to say in connection with the budget. Mr. Brunet believes the present yield on capital after payment of taxes is not commensurate with the risk involved in industry; that income tax deductions from the salaries of employees affect their efficiency, because employees mistakenly hold employers responsible for the decrease in their salaries; and that delays in assessing income tax liability hamper industry. To remedy this situation Mr. Brunet suggests the abolition of the excess profits tax; determination of the date for giving back the refundable portion of taxes already collected, and a tax rate decrease of about 50 per cent on individual incomes of $3,000 and less, with a decrease of 25 per cent on larger incomes.

In connection with cooperatives, let me say that I have eight parishes in my own constituency. The cooperatives in those parishes are organized among farmers of good standing who, through their organizations, operate successfully. If the state interferes by putting a tax on them, their progress will be hampered. I have been requested to lay their request for exemption before the Minister of Finance. I am now waiting until the budget resolutions are debated to find out to what extent the views I have in mind are being met.

One other point to which I would refer in closing has to do with the harbour at Three Rivers. Last year the business at that harbour compared favourably with that done at other harbours in Canada. Statistics show that Montreal harbour handled 118,361,000 bushels of wheat, Halifax 14,762,000, Quebec 15,603,000 and Three Rivers 26,378,000. I have the figures for other harbours in Canada, but the ones I have given are sufficient to show that the business done at Three Rivers compares favourably with that done in other Canadian ports, and indicates that at Three Rivers we have a harbour of which we have reason to be proud.

Mr. Briggs, the manager of our local elevator, has said that our harbour is the basis of the future prosperity of our district. The visiting owner of an ocean liner used these words:

> Your harbour is one of the best in the world. I have travelled all over the seas. My boat has been everywhere, and I can give you a certificate that I was astonished to find in Three Rivers, between Montreal and Quebec, a harbour so modern and so easy of access, where a large boat like mine can land without any help.

The Gibb report, made at the request of the Bennett government in 1931-32, states this at page 31:

Considerable latitude should be allowed to the port managers so long as their activities are directed to carrying out the policy laid down by the central authority. It is essential to avoid emasculating the local administration, since no centralized control can replace an efficient and active local administration, or the special knowledge and initiative of the local business community, both of which are vital to a port's prosperity.

For this latter reason I strongly advocate a local advisory council. There are very many aspects of port working which such a council can properly care for, such as the representation of the interests of private wharf owners, of local merchants and distributors, of local consignees and exporters, of the labour view, and of the attitude of boards of trade, chambers of commerce, corn exchanges and other such trade organizations, in addition to shipping.

It serves very usefully to identify the community with the port; and to secure the support and interest of local members of parliament, the city council, or provincial government in schemes, and so anticipate and meet criticisms from any such quarters, or action that might be prejudicial to the port.

It is invaluable in exploring the possibilities of local markets, in carrying out advertisement and propaganda and in cooperation with interests likely to promote industrial developments. Finally, a local council provides a useful check on the tendency of more or less permanent officials to become stereotyped or arbitrary.

The port manager would be ex officio chairman of the council, which would meet regularly and be consulted on all such matters as proposed developments, alterations in rates, important changes in operation. The members of the council should have the right of initiating discussions on matters of policy affecting the port, on any complaints raised by users of the port, and on questions of rates, charges, etc.; but not on any purely executive matters, and they would have no executive duties or powers.

The advisory council's proceedings and recommendations would be submitted to the central authority, and they should have the right of direct access to the central authority, but not to any other department of government.

The council should be sufficiently large to include all important interests and to ensure that its recommendations will be characterized by a broad outlook. Its composition should include the representation of the following interests:

Provincial government; municipalities; board of trade; railways; shipping; Department of Trade and Commerce; merchants, corn or other exchanges or organizations; dock labour.

I shall point out to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) that this requirement has not been lived up to. In the old days we had a local organization composed of Three Rivers business men. These were leading men in the community who served without salaries and who gave their time and energy to furthering the interests of the harbour. That system was discontinued. We now operate under the administration of a central national harbours board. This national board, efficient as it may be, is composed of three men who reside in Ottawa and who have only a limited knowledge of conditions down my way. They act through an official who to some extent is protected because he has been appointed by the civil service commission and therefore cannot be removed from his office. He is a little czar in his realm. I am not suggesting that he is making too many mistakes, but I am saying that through him the requirements set out in the Gibb report should be resurrected and enforced.

I want the government to understand that with the advantages offered by the harbour of Three Rivers, with the possibilities of development found there, it should be helped in the way I have mentioned, namely by the aid of a local advisory board who would follow up developments and give advice on whatever might be done for the advancement of the interests of that port.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member is right.

Mr. GARIEPY: May I lodge another small grievance? The family allowance provisions are effective in my part of the country, as in others. Moneys have been distributed, but in this matter of distribution I believe there is cause for some complaint. Possibly for reasons of economy, or because of the newness of the system, the department has only one general office for the whole province of Quebec, so far as the administration of family allowances in that province is concerned. This is neither practical nor effective. Three Rivers is situated centrally in the province. Families drawing these allowances are generally poor, and many are not educated. The idea is new, and frequently investigations are necessary. The people need help, and they write to Quebec, Montreal or Ottawa. Many cases have not received attention for weeks or even months, and I say this is an improper practice. It would not be more costly to have at Three Rivers a local office from which the ten or twelve surrounding counties could be served. The same applies to the administration of the income tax. At present there is only one general office in Montreal, and one can well imagine the volume of correspondence flowing to that office.

It is true that some officials travel, but their visits are hasty and they do not long remain at one point. If, as we must, we are to continue collecting income tax, then it should become a part of the system to have local offices in different districts. I am not suggesting that there should be an office in every county or in every town. But for those in Three Rivers to have to seek information from Montreal or Quebec is placing the people of that city at a disadvantage, and is a condition which is not conducive to good results.

Anyone who travels through Quebec, as does the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), will have noticed that the section between Montreal and Quebec is somewhat segregated. Running north from Three Rivers we find places like Shawinigan, Grand-Mere, and La Tuque, where one reaches the main line of the old Grand Trunk Pacific railway. Then, coming south one reaches points such as Nicolet, Victoriaville, Drummondville and Sherbrooke. From there one approaches the boundary line and the connections with areas south of the border.

At Three Rivers we are in the centre of the power area. Shawinigan Falls was the first power development project in Canada. Even to-day a million more horse-power could be developed if the factories were in existence to warrant it. This great power development is only about twenty miles north of my constituency. In the area are half a dozen paper companies. It is the world's centre for paper manufacturing, and we have the biggest mill in my own city, shipping its products day in and day out. It ships by water in the summer, and also by rail, one route going around by Montreal and the other by Quebec. The St. Lawrence river is very wide at that point and the ferries have been inadequate. There does not seem to be any practical way to get crossings that will give satisfaction. In that district there is eighty miles or so of first-class farming country, but it is not doing as well as it might if more attention were paid to it. I am not blaming anybody for that, but you know how it is. In the old days I lived where my hon. friend the member for Peace River (Mr. Low) resides, and I remember that Edmonton and Calgary were taking everything and the poor little town of Vegreville and the poor little town of Red Deer did not get much. Up to the present Montreal has been asking for a lot, and when it has not been Montreal it has been Quebec.

This country must go ahead and we must get busy to produce the best results. We have a large debt to pay. We want our people to get returns for their work and for their abilities. The centre of our province can and should be opened up, and it would then provide ample revenues. We have a gold mine lying dormant there. What is required?

A request was made not long ago, but dropped, to build a bridge between Quebec and Levis. There has been agitation also for a bridge between Montreal and Longueuil on the south shore of the St. Lawrence. For two hundred miles there is no bridge across the St Lawrence between Montreal and Quebec, and in the summer you will see on both sides of the river hundreds of automobiles waiting for a chance to cross. Is that right? Is that proper? I say no. For various reasons a bridge must be built across the St. Lawrence between Three Rivers and thereabouts and the south shore.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is right.

Mr. GARIEPY: That bridge will give connections and open up trade. It will give access and satisfaction to a great number of people. There are miles and miles of territory on the south shore which can be used by new industries. Industries can no longer go into the large centres because of the taxation and obligations of one kind and another, but in the territory I speak of there is room for industrial expansion, and at this time when money is plentiful and our business men are looking for new openings it is the duty of this government to invite the cooperation of the provincial government and of the municipalities and of the two railways, the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National, both of which are interested in crossing the St. Lawrence near Three Rivers, so that all these bodies can get together to promote the building of such a bridge. It would provide work; it would give encouragement to the people, and it would meet a necessity. Now, when things are at a low ebb, and we are looking for something new and bigger, this is a project that should receive the attention of the government and of the best brains of the country to the end that a bridge may be built in the near future.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think it is some two years since I took part in a budget debate, but I always enjoyed it. The nature of some of the opposition criticism during the present debate has made me feel that I want to get into the ring again.

The main line of criticism taken by hon. gentlemen opposite has been twofold: first, that the reduction in taxation provided for in this budget is inadequate and niggardly, to use the term used by some of the press supporting hon. gentlemen opposite; and in order to support their thesis, seeing that the budget shows a deficit of some $300,000,000, they contend that government expenditure is extravagant and reckless and must be reduced. If they did not contend that, of course, they would be advocating either more borrowing or inflation, and while some would like to borrow more, on the other hand they do not care to advocate that openly.

Before I deal, as I propose to do, with the main heads of expenditure, I want to point out to the house what it already knows, that the estimates have been before the house for some two months now. The items of some of the more important departments, including agriculture and national health and welfare, and a substantial part of the estimates of the Department of Justice, have been considered in detail, and so far as I can recall the only suggestion made by hon. gentlemen opposite for a specific reduction in expenditure was in one of the items of the Department of National Health and Welfare, where they criticized a proposed expenditure of $300,000 to see that an expenditure of some $273,000,000 was properly made. On the other hand there have been numerous suggestions that expenditures should be increased. I asked someone in my office to prepare a list of the suggestions that have been made by hon. members opposite for increased expenditures. The job is a big one and it is not completed yet, but I can assure the house that it will be an impressive list when it is finished.

The total estimated expenditure this year is $2,769,350,000. Of that amount $1,515,846,000 is for demobilization and reconversion. I am prepared to concede that there may be items in those estimates which can and should be reduced. In my own department, for instance, we have estimated that some $488,000,000 will be required for the three defence services this year, but because demobilization is proceeding more rapidly than we had anticipated and because of our continued efforts to effect economies I believe that this amount will be reduced. On the other hand I believe that the expenditures for veterans' benefits will be somewhat above those that have been estimated.

Of this total of roughly, $1,500,000,000, close to $700,000,000 will be for veterans' benefits in one form or another. Another $400,000,000 odd will be for the three defence services. The house will appreciate that the balance represents either necessary demobilization or reconversion expenditures, which, while I hope they may be reduced, cannot, I believe, be substantially reduced.

Coming to what might be described as the ordinary expenditures of government, they total $1,253,504,000. In that $1,253,504,000 there are a considerable number of items of expenditure which can be classified as absolutely uncontrollable and a number of others which are relatively uncontrollable. I am going to break that figure down.

Public debt charges amount to $481,207,000. Pensions, superannuation, et cetera, amount to $76,985,000. There is no possibility of reduction in either of those two items.

Subsidies and payments to the provinces under the taxation agreements amount to $99,062,000. There is no possibility of reduction there.

Unemployment insurance amounts to $20,432,000. I do not know whether hon. gentlemen opposite would suggest that that should be reduced, but I do not believe it could be reduced to any considerable extent.

For the Post Office Department the amount is $60,455,000. Admittedly that is only relatively uncontrollable, but it is a service department, and while it might be possible to effect some economies I do not believe the expenditure can be substantially reduced.

The Department of National Revenue shows another large expenditure, $26,062,000. I would point out to the house that while that is substantially higher than the year before the war, that department is charged with the collection of revenues amounting to some $2,600 million. That is not out of line with the work involved.

There are other expenditures totalling $6,097,000 which include amounts payable under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not suggest that these expenditures, which amount to $3,000,000, should be discontinued. There is some $2,000,000 included in this total for cheese and cheese factories, and I understand that these payments have been effective for some time. Certainly no suggestion has been made that these should be reduced. There are sundry others.

We have family allowances, $250 million. I have heard no hon. gentleman opposite suggest that these payments should be discontinued or reduced. Finally there are payments under veterans affairs which amount to $58,320,000 exclusive of pensions. These include such matters as hospitalization grants, pensions under the Veterans Allowances Act, soldier settlement board expenses, Veterans Land Act, and the like. From my limited experience in the veterans affairs committee I have not been led to believe that there is any persistent or extensive demand among hon. members of the official opposition, or for that matter elsewhere in the house, that expenditures of this kind should be reduced.

Those total $1,078,620,000 in round figures. If you take that figure and deduct it from the figure of $1,250 million which I mentioned at the outset, you are left with the more or less controllable expenditures of government amounting to $174,884,000. That is an increase of some $62,700,000 from the corresponding comparable figure for the last pre-war year of 1938-39, which was $112,200,000. At first sight that figure may seem somewhat large, but there is a good explanation for all these increases. I am not suggesting that no effort should be made to effect further economy, but I do not believe it will be possible to effect substantial economies and maintain efficiently the services of the country.

I come now to the main items which make up this increase of $62 million odd. The first and largest is the cost of living bonus to government employees, which totals in the neighbourhood of $20 million. Perhaps I should not prophesy, but I think it is fair to say that that will become a permanent part of the government wage structure. There is assistance to agriculture which cost $4,200,000. The increase in external affairs is over $3 million, but that is consistent with our greater stature as a nation, the additional legations we have opened, and the added representation we have abroad. Department of Finance is up $5,300,000, largely because of increases in the cost of operating the office of the comptroller of the treasury, due to the vastly greater expenditures which it is necessary he should supervise.

Mines and Resources and Public Works are both up substantially, but those are departments which cut their maintenance operations to the bone during the war. The increase of $5 million in the case of Mines and Resources, and some $20 million in the case of Public Works, represents largely deferred maintenance. Expenditures of the Department of Transport are some $5 million higher, due largely to deferred maintenance and the construction of terminal facilities for the Prince Edward Island car ferry. Finally, the expenditures of the Department of Trade and Commerce are $3,900,000 higher, owing largely to increases in the operation of trade services.

Taking $200 million as a fair estimate of the really controllable portion of our expenditures, if we were to cut those twenty per cent it would amount to $40 million. I do not believe it would be possible to cut them twenty per cent and maintain efficiently the services of this country. But if it were, it still would not be possible to balance the budget. Moreover, I suggest to members of the house that in total expenditures of some $200 million to cover the ordinary services of the government there is little justification for the charges of reckless and profligate expenditures, which were the adjectives used by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: They have not been changed after hearing the statement of my hon. friend.

Mr. ABBOTT: The facts speak for themselves. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), who is the financial critic for the opposition, reproached the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) when he rose to speak after the minister had completed his budget address for not using the word "economy" in the course of his speech. I hold in my hand an extract from the Montreal Gazette of May 16, 1945. It is entitled, "Bracken's Charter for a Better Canada." It reads:

The following is the text of a declaration of policy for the Progressive Conservative party, by John Bracken, as given in a speech delivered in Ottawa, last evening, in the Glebe collegiate auditorium.

I have been through this statement carefully, and if I may paraphrase the remarks of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, I have been unable to find any use of the word "economy" in that impressive document. But I do find a great many references to proposals which would involve substantial expenditures of public money. If I may, I should like to state a few of those to the house.

Mr. GREEN: What date is that?

Mr. ABBOTT: This is dated May 16, and it is apparently the text of an address delivered the night before by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) in the Glebe collegiate auditorium in Ottawa.

An hon. MEMBER: An election speech.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. I quote:

Members of the armed forces, except at their own request, will not be demobilized until they have jobs at proper rates of pay. On the basis of this policy the first-in-first-out principle will apply.

Then follows a long list of suggestions for increased payments to veterans, which I may say have been more than implemented, so far as I have been able to see, by legislation either now before the house or to be brought before the house within a few days. Under the heading "Youth of the Nation" this text states:

To broaden opportunity, we will encourage through grants the development in our secondary schools of specialized training for primary industries such as agriculture, mining, forestry and fisheries. We will provide financial assistance to enable our young people, according to their abilities, to receive advanced technical or professional training in our universities, at home or abroad.

Some expenditure involved there.

Mr. JACKMAN: Would you not expect more production if you had them trained?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am talking about expenditures at the moment.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. JACKMAN: If you have more production your taxation brings in more.

Mr. ABBOTT: The report continues:

We believe in and will encourage a nationally uniform system of recreation and cultural centres. These will be extended to the rural areas through assistance in the erection of community centres.

Then under the heading of "International Trade":

A general overhaul of the Department of Trade and Commerce to convert it from a junior and unnecessary arm of the diplomatic service to a live department responsible for organizing, with exporters themselves, the sale of Canadian goods in the markets of the world.

Mr. HAZEN: Is there anything wrong with that ?

Mr. ABBOTT: Not a thing, except that it involves expenditure. I do not quarrel with any of these; my point is that they all involve expenditure. I continue:

The establishment under the auspices of and at the expense of the department of training courses for young war veterans to become salesmen of Canadian goods in foreign countries.

The establishment of an export board with power and authority to determine and pay whatever difference may exist between a fair Canadian price and the actual world market price on approved items of export selected with a view to maintaining a balanced Canadian economy.

In other words, export subsidies. Here is one to which I should like especially to draw the attention of the house:

We recognize that in the period of adjustment after the war there must be a continuation of the principle of "mutual aid." Further, we recognize that in order that world trade (so essential to Canada's welfare) may expand, it will be necessary for Canada as a surplus producing country, and a large exporter, to give a lead in stabilization of international trade. In addition, Canada must be prepared to give long-term trade credits to Britain and also, in proper cases, to devastated and economically backward countries—thus building up customers for our goods.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am glad to hear hon. gentlemen say "Hear, hear". When I read that statement, and when I recalled the speech made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario at the time the loan to Britain was before the house, I was astounded to read a statement which appeared in the Montreal Gazette yesterday, Thursday, July 11, 1946. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition has not yet spoken in this debate, but he made a speech over the radio the other night and this is what he said as reported by the Gazette, the reporter being Mr. Mears:

The opposition leader was critical of the export credit policy. This year, we are being asked to dig into our pockets for $2,700,000,000 of taxes and in addition to go into debt another billion dollars—what for? Not to buy things for ourselves, but—think of it!—to pay for our own exports to ship away to other countries. We can never have permanent prosperity in this country by continuing to pay out of our own pockets for our exports to other lands.

The member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) the other day likened the Minister of Finance to John Bunyan's Mr. Facing-Both-Ways. May I suggest that he might have found a better example for that description a little nearer home. If I may continue with some more of these "economy" measures, Mr. Speaker, and I quote:

To make these rights real and effective, we shall establish a national development board to include leaders of business, labour, agriculture and government. The board will have the responsibility of working out plans for full production and employment as well as the preservation of our natural resources and the construction of projects in the public interest.

When I read that I almost thought I was reading a part of the C.C.F. manifesto. Under the same heading, that of workers, I read:

We shall provide a uniform and comprehensive security plan for all Canadians, including: extended unemployment insurance coverage; accident and sickness benefits; children's allowances; maternity benefits; widows' benefits; retirement pensions; increased old age pensions at age 65.

And may I interject here that in a speech at Kenora, and elsewhere as well, the leader of the opposition indicated that what he and his party advocated was an increased pension of $30, payable at the age of 65, without a means test, to all Canadians. My information is that that would involve an additional expenditure of at least $300,000,000 a year.

An hon. MEMBER: If we had an agreement with the provinces.

Mr. ABBOTT: He did not refer to that in the course of his speech, nor did he refer to it anywhere in this charter.

Mr. KNOWLES: Are you opposed to that?

Mr. ABBOTT: Never mind whether I am opposed to it or not; at the moment I am dealing with the proposals of the official opposition as set out by them in this document. To continue:

Where social services are administered provincially, we shall provide grants large enough to ensure adequate standards of social security to all Canadians.

I pause here to interject that while there has been no official statement by any member of the official opposition in this regard, many of my Conservative friends have stated to me that all these social security measures are so much nonsense, that they are not in favour of them, and that the sooner we get rid of them the better. They are sincere and genuine in that belief. I do not question their right to express their opinion on that point, but I would appreciate it if their spokesman in the House of Commons would be equally frank.

Mr. GREEN: Was that down on St. James street?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, some of it was on St. James street. Then, with regard to a national health programme, this statement appears:

Therefore, pending the setting up of this national health programme, we will make grants to all the provinces according to standards and in amounts to be agreed upon, so that they may work out health programmes of their own.

Then further:

In cooperation with the provinces, we will set up a dominion-wide farm rehabilitation and soil conservation plan. We will reestablish a natural products marketing act. We will appoint a board of live stock commissioners in which shall be vested power to regulate and direct all aspects of live stock marketing in somewhat the same manner as the board of grain commissioners regulates the handling of wheat.

Then with regard to the fishermen:

We pledge ourselves: to enact legislation to assure our fishermen adequate basic prices.

Again:

Establishing an export board to ensure a fair price to Canadian exporters of natural products and manufactured goods.

Then, a further proposal:

Encouraging great expansion in the fields of industrial and scientific research, supported at every stage by financial aid from the dominion government.

Under the heading of natural resources there appears this:

Our policy will be based upon the principle of managing, developing and conserving our natural resources so as to achieve the greatest possible annual return from them consistent with their preservation as a continuing source of wealth for future generations. To this end we will make provision for generous financial assistance from the dominion to the provinces to aid them in planned development and conservation.

Mr. FULTON: A thing you failed to do.

Mr. ABBOTT: Passing over the question of abolishing the fee for radio licences, because that was part of Doctor Manion's platform too, I come to the following:

This party will see that the financial resources of the dominion will be used in the clearing of slums and to provide subsidized housing for those in the lowest income group. We will initiate a large-scale housing programme to supply the new homes so urgently needed throughout Canada. For that purpose we will enlist the cooperation of the provinces, the municipalities, the building trades, the construction industry and private investors.

Well, that is a fairly comprehensive list and if hon. members care to look at it they will find, as I have found, that there is no mention of economy throughout the whole document. Bracken House did pretty well on that charter, but they overlooked the feature of economy.

Now I come to a more recent date. Last March, just about the time the house opened, the Progressive Conservative Association of Canada, at its annual meeting in the city Ottawa at the Chateau Laurier, passed a number of resolutions, publicity as to which was given in the newspapers. I asked my office the other day to get for me a copy of these resolutions, and I have it here. It is entitled:

Appendix B to the minutes of the annual meeting of the Progressive Conservative Association of Canada, 1946.

That was the meeting at which my hon. friend the financial critic of the opposition, the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, was elected dominion president of the association—and may I observe, in passing, that a very excellent choice was made by the party in that regard. There are twenty-seven resolutions. The first deals with leadership, the second with appreciation of Progressive Conservative members—well deserved, I am sure. The third deals with press and radio, the fourth with farm prices, the fifth with bureaucratic controls, the sixth with taxation, the seventh—

Mr. GRAYDON: Are you passing over bureaucratic controls?

Mr. ABBOTT: I will read that, gladly.

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes, read it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will read it with pleasure:

We are opposed in principle to the continuation of other wartime wage and price ceilings and to restrictive controls. With very few exceptions we demand their immediate removal.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would you like to have it read again?

Mr. ABBOTT: That was resolution No. 5. Under the heading of taxation they say that every citizen of Canada should bear his fair share of the burden, and so on; and they state:

(3) That income taxation be such as to provide that tax exemption for single persons should be raised to $1,200, and for married persons to $2,000.

That, no doubt, is commendable, but I am informed that it would involve an additional loss of revenue of some $325,000,000, and this added to the $300,000,000 that would be involved in the increased expenditure for old age pensions, making some $600,000,000 in all, shows how close to balancing the budget my hon. friends opposite would have been had the electorate of the country showed such poor judgment as to return them to office.

There is a resolution concerning "women". I will not read what is there set out. Among other things, they want more women appointed to the senate. Resolution 10 is an elaborate one, it has to do with veterans' affairs. But, as I say, most of the recommendations in that resolution, and perhaps more, have been implemented. There is a resolution about old age pensions which repeats what was in the charter. Then follows a resolution on social security, which reads as follows:

Be it resolved that we reaffirm the position stated by the party in the Winnipeg platform, that Canada should include a comprehensive body of social security measures in a unified system.

Resolution 14 has to do with national soil conservation. It reads as follows:

Whereas the operations of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act have proved of great benefit to the prairie region of western Canada; and whereas every province has its own peculiar problems of soil conservation and farm rehabilitation; therefore be it resolved that this association urge the government to expand the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act into a national soil conservation and farm rehabilitation act and extend its activities to all the settled farm areas of Canada.

Resolution 20 deals with scientific research. Other resolutions deal with cattle embargo, floor prices, and so on, which I do not think involve any added expenditure. Resolution 20 reads as follows:

Be it resolved that in view of the fact that science played such an important part in the winning of the war, and in view of the fact that our survival in the days which lie ahead will depend primarily on our progress in scientific research and invention: We therefore urge the government to expand the research facilities of the national research council and provide further grants to the provinces for scientific research.

Resolution 21 deals with the tourist industry, educational services to point out to private enterprise the opportunities of the tourist trade, and the latest methods of conducting such business, being advocated.

Resolution 26 is a special one; it deals with Prince Edward Island transportation. It reads as follows:

Be it resolved that continuous all-the-year round transportation for passengers, freight, trucks, buses and vehicles to and from Prince Edward Island be provided immediately at the expense of the dominion government; and that the increase of cost of moving motor vehicles, as well as farm products and other freight, by truck or rail, occasioned by this water route, over the normal cost of moving freight for the equivalent mileage on land, be borne by the government of Canada as a matter of national policy.

Finally resolution 27 deals with the Peace River outlet. It reads:

Be it resolved that this association urges the construction of a rail outlet to the Pacific coast, for the Peace River district.

These are desirable objectives, no doubt, but none of them involves any reduction in expenditure, and the word "economy" does not appear in this document either.

In his budget criticism the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario used a picturesque phrase. I am sorry he is not in his seat this afternoon, but he told me yesterday afternoon that he had to be in Montreal to-day. He said, as reported at page 3215 of Hansard:

Is that the reason no mention of economy was made at the dominion-provincial conference or here in this house? I think it is fair to say that the talk was tax, tax; spend, spend; borrow, borrow, but never save, save.

That is a delightful phrase; but I suggest that it would have been happier if my hon. friend had thought of it when he was elected president of the national Progressive Conservative association, and when these resolutions were being adopted. But of course the conditions were completely different at that time, and perhaps he is to be forgiven for its not having occurred to him under those circumstances.

My only reason for doing this, Mr. Speaker, is to attempt, if I may use a slang phrase, to debunk all this talk about reckless and extravagant expenditures on the part of the government. I can make an assertion as well as the next man, and I say that these charges of extravagance and reckless expenditure are totally unfounded. I go further and say that the fiscal record of this government during the last six years, throughout the period of the war and to-day, will not only compare favourably with any other country in the world, but is better.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does not my hon. friend think that that is a reckless statement?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The recklessness continues.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think it was Edmund Burke who said that it is not possible to tax and be loved. Perhaps that is true, but I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is possible to tax and be respected for imposing those taxes. I believe that is the position in which the Minister of Finance finds himself to-day. I was struck by a remark which was made to me by a friend of mine in Montreal—and he is also well known to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. I met him on the Saturday morning, two days after the budget was brought down, and he said to me: "Well, judging by some editorial comment that I have seen and some talks that I have had with some of my friends, I am one of the few men who like this budget; but as a man who has bought all the victory bonds he could afford during the last six years I say, thank God we have a minister of finance and a government that is not afraid to tax."

Mr. H. R. ARGUE (Wood Mountain): We have all listened with interest to the able speech presented to the house by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott). He shines best when he criticizes the Conservative party, because in that criticism he is always right. But in my opinion he does a poor job of substantiating his own case.

Mr. GRAYDON: He did not have a case.

Mr. ARGUE: The minister can rest assured that the members of this group are not going to make the burden of its criticism that there has been much wasteful government expenditure. While no doubt some economies could have been made in different places—I am sure that all members on this side of the house will agree that it might have been possible—nevertheless what the people of Canada need is plenty of expenditures in the right place at the right time.

In my remarks this afternoon I shall attempt to deal in the main with the speech which was ably delivered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). Throughout his whole speech the minister referred again and again to what he thought were prosperous conditions in Canada to-day. He said he considered Canada more prosperous and further along the road to reemployment and reconversion than we could reasonably have expected last August. He said that we are enjoying a level of employment and prosperity that we had never experienced before in peace time. He then went on to show the main props that are under what prosperity we have at this time. What hon. members are attempting to do is to see that the props under what prosperity we have at this time are sound, secure and likely to be durable, because if they are not durable, then it goes without saying that the prosperity will not last long.

I believe we should attempt to analyse economic conditions in Canada to see if indeed we have prosperity at this time. Certainly if the great masses of the Canadian people are not receiving sufficient incomes to enjoy a high and decent standard of living then the so-called prosperity we have is nothing in which we should take pride. We should attempt to decide in our own minds if government policies are moving in fact toward greater prosperity in the nation.

The Minister of Finance rested his case that there was prosperity in Canada upon three main items. He said that our income from export trade is the most important factor determining our prosperity and employment in peace time. Certainly I do not think our exports are a large factor in maintaining prosperity at this time. It is not exports as such; it is government money that belongs primarily to the people of Canada, which is being lent to other nations so they may buy our exports. What prosperity we now have in Canada does not depend principally on exports but on Canadian income which is advanced for payment of those exports, and which eventually finds its way into the hands of Canadians.

I think, too, we should look at what is happening to export trade. If our volume of export trade is going up, then I think we can be reasonably sure that export trade will continue to be a substantial factor in maintaining prosperity as it might be defined at this time. In April, 1945, the export trade index for Canada stood at 312. In April, 1946, the index was 178. Within one year, comparing April, 1945, with April, 1946, the value of export trade from this nation has fallen by 43 per cent. Surely, if we are looking to the value of our export trade as the most important prop to maintain prosperity, it is a very weak prop; and it is 43 per cent weaker this year than last year. If we are to tie our prosperity to the shipping of the real assets and real wealth of Canada out of the country to other nations, we shall not have prosperity at all. Prosperity in Canada depends upon the incomes of Canadians and the goods they are able to buy with those incomes. Export trade, to be a factor in maintaining prosperity in Canada, must be used with the object of obtaining imports to Canada which will then add to our prosperity. If, in effect, we are to have imports coming into Canada in exchange for our exports it is not sufficient that our income remain at the present level. The Canadian income must go up continuously so that the people of this nation will be able to buy the increased volume of exports other nations will be prepared to send to Canada.

The minister said another of the main factors supporting a continuation of prosperity in Canada was the large savings of the people. It was pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), far better than I could do, that the amount of savings in the chartered banks, held by the average Canadian, is not large. According to the report of the chartered banks of October 31, 1945, some 5,616,712 people had deposits in the Canadian banks; and of that number almost five million held deposits of less than $1,000, averaging only $173.50 each. Those savings, to the extent of $173.50 for each of five million people, are not going to be a large or important factor in maintaining what prosperity we may have in Canada. A report has been made by the federal reserve board in the United States showing that savings in that country are not large, that in effect they are not held by people likely to spend them on automobiles, radios, refrigerators, washing machines and household appliances. The pent-up demand that manufacturers, distributors, wholesalers and retailers have been banking on to take up the slack of higher prices during the next twelve months, according to the report, is largely illusory. I do not think it can be successfully argued that, on the whole, Canadians have a greater proportion of savings than the people of the United States. Certainly, according to the survey made over there, those savings are not going to maintain prosperity for very long.

The third prop under what prosperity we have at this time, according to the Minister of Finance, is capital expenditure; but according to the James committee it will take capital expenditures of $1,500 million annually to maintain full employment in Canada. According to a report coming from the Department of Reconstruction this year, only some $1,200 million is being devoted to capital expenditure. So we see that this year private enterprise is not making the large capital expenditure necessary for full employment. The April index of physical volume of business in Canada was 232 in 1945 and only 193 in 1946. So that within that period of one year our volume of business dropped by 17 per cent. According to the statement of the Minister of Finance, the income of the Canadian people in 1946 is running at least three-quarters of a billion dollars less than in 1944. I say to this house that we are not maintaining the prosperity we had two years ago. The volume of purchasing power that people have to spend is not being increased and the physical volume of business is going down.

We should not assume, however, from the fact that the physical volume of business is falling that the corporations in Canada are not faring very well. In April, 1945, dividends declared mounted to $16,612,000, while in April, 1946, they were $20,808,000. The corporations who are producing only to such an extent that the volume of business is decreasing have found it possible to make some $4,000,000 more in dividends in April of this year than they made in April of 1945. Figures for the month of May are much the same; this year dividends were 7·3 per cent higher than in May of last year. But though big business is not maintaining full employment in Canada; though this year it is making higher profits than last year, in his budget proposals the Minster of Finance is saying to the corporations, "Next year you can make more profits. You shall have your corporation tax reduced by 20 per cent." Then the corporations can afford to produce even less, because they will have a larger margin of profit. So that every time the corporations are given tax relief they find it possible to withhold goods from the market, and they do so, in order to make extremely high profits.

As I said at the outset, the minister stated over and over again that we are enjoying a large measure of prosperity in Canada at the present time. Figures coming from the Department of National Revenue show that the average income in Canada in 1945 was $25 less than in 1944. More than that, in 1945 there were 85,000 fewer people in Canada who earned sufficient money to get into the very low income tax brackets. Of those in the bracket from $660 to $1,000 a year there were 40,000 more in 1945 than in 1946. The labour force in Canada is something like 5,000,000. In 1945, of the 5,000,000 labour force, 2,365,000 were paying income tax. Thus over 2,600,000 of the 5,000,000 in the labour force of Canada had not earned sufficient income to get into the very low income tax brackets which, for a single man, is $660 and, for a married man, $1,200 a year.

The minister stated, too, that in the niggardly increase in the amount of income allowed before taxation took place, namely between $660 and $750 for single men and between $1,200 and $1,500 for married men, there were 600,000 taxpayers. That is 600,000 in the lower income tax brackets. Add to that the 2,600,000 who were not in the income tax brackets at all because they had not earned sufficient income, and we find in Canada 3,200,000 Canadians out of 5,000,000, or more than sixty per cent, who had not earned sufficient income to get into the very low income tax brackets.

Surely, then, the minister was not right in saying:

> We find Canada to-day more prosperous and further along the road of reemployment and reconversion than we could reasonably have expected last autumn when I presented the previous budget.

Surely, if a test of the way we are getting along the road to reemployment and reconversion is to say that there are over sixty per cent of the labour force in Canada earning less than the very small amount which will get them into the income tax bracket, then in effect we have anything but prosperity in Canada. We have a continuation of poverty for the many and plenty for the few.

The Minister of National Defence pointed out, most ably, that the Conservative party was not living up to its election promises. I noticed when he was reading their proposals that, as he said, they sounded like a real, socialist election manifesto. Consequently one could hardly expect the Progressive Conservative party to live up to a socialist election manifesto. What surprised us most was that they had wisdom enough to draft it, and that the people of Canada had even more wisdom and to a great extent refused to vote Conservative.

I do not think the record of the Liberal government, so far as keeping promises made before the election is concerned, is any better than that of the Progressive Conservative party. I have here some quotations from the Glace Bay Gazette of May 22, 1946. I have from another magazine quotations which are similar, almost word for word. Under date of June 2, 1945, a message to Canadian labour entitled, "The Liberal party is the workers' party" states this:

> Liberal aim: Jobs for 900,000 more workers than in 1939, 60,000 more each year as the population grows. Every kind of enterprise will be encouraged. The Liberal government has already set up machinery of the Department of Reconstruction. The Liberal government has the man, the Hon. C. D. Howe.

With the last sentence I cannot quarrel. It seems to me that if the government were maintaining its pre-election pledge there would be 900,000 more jobs, and the Minister of Finance would not have to say to the house that there are to-day 200,000 unemployed in Canada.

Another article sent out on May 15, 1945, entitled, "Liberal policy will create post-war opportunities for all", states:

> Jobs! Jobs with bright futures for the young men and women coming out of the armed services with the best part of their lives before them. Jobs for all! Jobs with big prospects and good reliable money that will keep its buying power! After all the hard work, sacrifice and self-discipline which has brought us through the war, the people of this country have earned a brighter future in a better, juster, grander Canada than we have ever known!

That extravagant English sounds like the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie).

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is that a pre-election promise?

Mr. ARGUE: Yes; May 15, 1945. I should like to read these words:

Jobs! Jobs with bright futures for the young men and women coming out of the armed services with the best part of their lives before them!

And then, in the official publication of the Department of Veterans Affairs, under date of June 15, 1946, we find that at the end of May, 1946, there were 43,336 veterans obtaining out-of-work benefits. Does that look like jobs for veterans, jobs with bright futures? Does that look like jobs with good reliable money?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Are you opposed to it?

Mr. ARGUE: With that many out of work—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Are you opposed to it?

Mr. ARGUE: I am opposed to a party making a pledge before an election and then failing to live up to it. I am not opposed to benefits for those who have not jobs. The benefits are not much; they are second best. But a slice of bread is better than no bread at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You are against it.

Mr. ARGUE: I am not against it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You seem to be.

Mr. ARGUE: I don't seem to be.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How about your promise?

Mr. MACKENZIE: You can't have it both ways, either.

Mr. ARGUE: If the Minister of Veterans Affairs will say that there are good jobs, then I assure him that the boys will not any longer want these niggardly out-of-work benefits.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I can tell my hon. friend that I have done more for the veterans than he has ever done.

An hon. MEMBER: Give it to him; you have got him going.

Mr. ARGUE: Another thing we should attempt to do is to find out if there is to be greater prosperity in Canada in the future, and if so, we should attempt to see what the income tax exemptions for 1947 will do for the people who will receive the benefit of them. In 1946 a single man earning $1,250 paid $140 tax. In 1947 a single man earning $1,250 will pay $118 tax. He will be given tax relief in 1947 to the extent of $22 in excess of what he received in 1946. A married man in 1946 earning $2,000 a year pays $194 tax, while in 1947 he will pay $118, or will have a reduction of $76 in taxation.

Many statements have been made that we are witnessing to-day an increase in the cost of living. We know that there is a certain amount of inflation in Canada and that the prices of many articles are increasing by leaps and bounds. The cost of living index published by the bureau of statistics in April, 1945, was 119 and in April, 1946, 121, an increase of two points. The homemakers' association, as recorded in the Toronto Star of April 9, found that in six years the cost of feeding a family had increased by fifty per cent.

I am not attempting to argue that there will be all-out inflation in Canada. What I am attempting to do is to have hon. members agree that there is a certain amount of inflation, and that there will be inflation next year. Some of us might be reasonably well satisfied if the cost of living next year did not increase by more than ten per cent. I do not know if that would be considered a reasonable figure, but some of us might think it was not too bad. Others might think that if it increased only five per cent a good job was being done. I believe most will agree that if it increased four per cent, that is the least that could be expected. If the cost of living increases four per cent in 1947 over what it is now, then four per cent of a married man's income of $2,000 will amount to $80, and that $80 in fact will buy him nothing, because of the decreasing value of money. So that if the cost of living increases on the average four per cent in 1947 the small tax relief of $76 that is being given for 1947 will be in effect entirely wiped out.

If the cost of living increases two per cent a single man earning $1,250 will have to use $25 of his income to make up for the increase in prices. His tax relief for 1947 will be $22. So that if the cost of living increases in 1947 by two per cent, the very small tax relief given to a single man earning $1,250 will in effect, by another means, be taken away from him.

If we look to see how the exemptions will benefit the taxpayer within the next twelve months we find that if there is a two per cent rise in the cost of living it will cost a single man earning $1,250 some $25 to make up for the additional increase in the cost of living. But his tax relief within the next twelve months will be only $11. So that in effective purchasing power within the next twelve months, if the cost of living goes up by two per cent, he will be $14 worse off than he was before.

The Minister of Finance is, with one hand, granting some small amount of tax relief to income earners, but because the government is not successful in maintaining rigid price control he is in effect taking away that small amount of tax relief with the other hand because the value of the money which the income earner receives will be less through the increase in the cost of living.

Let us now look at the policies which the government is inaugurating or is likely to inaugurate to increase prosperity in Canada and see if the low paid sixty per cent of the labour force do get increases in income so that their incomes will be up at least to the extent of reaching the low income tax brackets. To provide more prosperity for Canada the government made certain proposals to the dominion-provincial conference. As I understand those proposals there were mainly two fields in which the government proposed new measures. One was a taxation agreement with the provinces so that there would not be double taxation in the income and corporation tax fields and in succession duties. Second, the government proposed a social security programme, including public investments, a health programme, adequate old age pensions and unemployment insurance.

We all know the history of the dominion-provincial conference. It failed. Then the government announced proposals for taxation agreements minus the social security programme. The Minister of Finance in his budget address stated:

> Financial pressure on the less-favoured provinces will give rise to increasingly arbitrary and discriminatory taxation, will lead to interference with interprovincial trade and to the extension of government ownership and operation of business merely in order to obtain additional provincial revenues which of course would mean loss of revenues to the dominion.

I would like hon. members to note that according to that statement of the minister, without an agreement with the provinces, there is likely to be an extension of provincial government ownership. The minister went on to say:

> The dominion cannot stand aside and allow such a situation to develop. It would seriously impair the capacity of private enterprise to provide high and expanding employment.

There was some danger, if an agreement had not been offered, of some provinces going into business for themselves. The premier of Manitoba made a statement to that effect at the conference. If the provinces were forced to go into business undertakings for themselves it would of course deal a severe blow to big business and corporations in Canada, and the Minister of Finance says the dominion cannot stand aside. But there was no offer made to the provinces to sign separate agreements for social security measures. The dominion government, while not ready to stand aside and see big business double-taxed, is willing to stand aside and see the Canadian people go without an adequate social security programme. Surely that is placing the emphasis entirely in the wrong place.

Mr. ILSLEY: Did I say anything in that speech to the effect that we did not want government ownership to take place in the provinces because it would hurt private business?

Mr. ARGUE: No; but apparently that is what the minister had in mind.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is most unfair. What I had in mind I said, which was that it was undesirable to have the provinces taking over business purely for revenue purposes. That is what that says.

Mr. ARGUE: That is right.

Mr. ILSLEY: And that is undesirable.

Mr. ARGUE: Because it would force governments in some of the provinces to go into the public ownership of business, as the Saskatchewan government has done.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. member think it is desirable for a province to go into public ownership of private industry, merely because it can get a tax advantage or increased revenue at the expense of the dominion?

Mr. ARGUE: A province goes into business for many reasons. If it gets revenue for the province rather than allowing the corporations to skim off the cream of the revenue, certainly that is for the benefit of the people of the province.

The minister went on to say that the proposal that he was making to the provinces was based on fiscal need. He stated that a number of times, I believe. It is based on fiscal need to this extent, that a poor province will be enabled to get some additional moneys that are raised by taxation by the federal government and turned over to the province in the form of a subsidy. I wonder, in looking over the various amounts that will be paid to the different provinces, If indeed they are based on fiscal need. The people of British Columbia under this proposal are to get approximately $20 per capita. The people of the other provinces will get something over $15 per capita, considering the gross national product and the formula that is used. I am not suggesting for one minute that the people of British Columbia should get any less than $20 per capita, but I am suggesting that if the people of British Columbia are to be paid $20 per capita, then the people of the other provinces of this nation should be treated equally well.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would you place everybody on an equal per capita basis?

Mr. ARGUE: No, I would not, but that would be better in my opinion than the method now proposed, because I do not think British Columbia is likely to have the same expenditures in providing social services that some of the other provinces will have.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They have the highest standard in Canada.

Mr. ARGUE: I am talking of the cost of providing the social services, not what social services they have. For example, in British Columbia approximately 394,500 people live in towns of over 5,000, and this out of a total population, according to the 1941 census, of some 817,800. In other words, in British Columbia about forty-eight per cent of the people live in towns of over 5,000. I am sure that even the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) will admit that it costs more money to provide social services in the rural areas where people are widely dispersed than it does to provide the same services in towns of over 5,000.

In Saskatchewan there are 147,000 people living in towns of over 5,000 out of a total population of some 895,000, or about seventeen per cent. The number of people in Ontario who live in centres of over 5,000 is more than half the total population. Surely it cannot be said that proposals are based on fiscal needs when in certain provinces the cost of providing social services is more per capita because the population is widely disbursed.

I do not think it can be said that the proposals are based on fiscal needs because, if widespread drought occurs in the west, the provincial governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and to a lesser extent Manitoba, will be almost bankrupt. If we experience a period of low prices for our primary products the people on the prairies will not have sufficient income to provide a taxation base by which the provinces will be able to furnish the social services they may wish to provide. I do not think any effective argument can be made that these proposals are in any way based on fiscal needs. Before there can be continuous social services we must protect the primary producer against drought and low prices, and protection also must be provided to see that unemployment does not recur.

In conclusion, I contend that the Minister of Finance has based his statement that there is prosperity to-day in Canada on three weak and breaking props. There is no prosperity in Canada when the vast majority of Canadians are not receiving incomes sufficient to maintain an adequate standard of living. More than that, the very small income taxation reductions that have been provided in the budget and the utter failure to go ahead with an agreement to provide social security measures place the people of Canada in a position where they cannot look forward to years of prosperity, but rather only to depression, poverty and misery in the very near future.

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, this effort on my part will in no sense be a sermon but it will open with a text. I am grateful to my hon. friend, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott), for supplying that text. It will be found in part of the quotation with which he closed his remarks this afternoon: "We have a Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) who is not afraid to tax." Apparently this is the cry of the Liberal party: We are the party of taxation; we are the party which is not afraid to tax. Their fitness for office apparently is to be based upon their ability to heap on the taxation.

During the five days of this debate a good many adjectives have been devoted to this budget. Probably it has earned a good many of them because it is certainly a record-breaking budget. It has engendered more bitterness than any budget in the living memory of the people of this country who were led to certain expectations in consequence of lavish government promises. They have carried a heavy load of taxation during the war; they struggled along manfully hoping to see light at the end of the road, in the form of some relief from the crushing burden of taxation. What have they been given in this budget—this budget for the first full year of peace?

In the first place, they have been told that there will be no easing of the load this year. In the second place, they have been given no hope of any worth-while or substantial easing of the load after this year. In the third place, they have been given no evidence of retrenchment on the part of the government. Is it small wonder that the taxpayers of this country feel frustrated, defeated and bitter? And bitter they do feel. They put the responsibility squarely where it belongs, on the doorstep of the government.

May I say a word concerning these so-called deferred reductions. To what shall we liken these slight reductions, these phantom, fugitive reductions? Would this be a fair picture? We have a very tired, jaded steed which has covered six long, hard laps. We have a rider plunging the spurs in further and further and calling for another long, hard lap, with greater expenditure of effort on the part of the steed than has been made in the previous laps. What is the steed offered? The rider dangles a carrot, and a very small one, in front of the steed just out of his reach. The tired steed must gallop another long, hard lap, in the hope of catching up with the small carrot at the end of the lap.

In truth, this is a two-in-one budget. Where did this extraordinary and novel idea originate? It certainly was not conceived by anyone devoid of political considerations. It certainly was not conceived by anyone who was prepared to come forward and say frankly that there would be no reduction in taxation this year for the people of Canada. Apparently it was conceived by those who were not prepared to make a reduction in taxation this year, but who were afraid to tell the people of Canada that they were unwilling to make a reduction. So there has been resort to this curious expedient of announcing in the budget for the fiscal year 1946-47 that certain meagre reductions in taxation will come into effect within the course, not of this year, but of next year. It is a curious and interesting device.

I suggest that the people of Canada are going to have certain convictions and certain knowledge in their minds on this subject. They know perfectly well that this budget covers only the fiscal year which began on April 1, 1946, and which will end on March 31, 1947. It does not go one day beyond that. They know also that the Minister of Finance cannot bind or undertake now for the fiscal year 1947-48. They know, too, that these elusive and fugitive reductions announced in the budget will apply for only three months of next year, January, February and March. They know that something has been done by the Minister of Finance in this budget which has never been done in the previous fiscal history of this country, the announcement of reductions which will not come into effect until the following year.

This leads me to ask: will there be a budget next year? It is hard to see what occasion there will be next year for a budget since the Minister of Finance has rolled two years' budgets into one. Apparently this is the beginning of biennial budgets. Apparently, also, in view of the fact that we have had six heavy budgets in six years and that this is the seventh, the Minister of Finance has adopted the timely suggestion of the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) that, this being the seventh year, he, the minister, might observe a Sabbatical year and go on an extended absence. The leader of the Social Credit party suggests that it would be helpful to the minister to move closer to the people and understand what they are asking. It may be that the Minister of Finance, in looking forward to a Sabbatical year, has decided to roll two years' budgets into one.

But what will he do next year when this fiscal year has rolled on to its close on March 31, 1947? I suggest that the Minister of Finance, whoever he may be at that time, will have these three alternatives before him. In the first place, he can make an announcement of these reductions, or rather a reannouncement of the slight reductions which the present minister has announced this year. The minister at that time can reannounce them and take double credit. In the second place, he might withdraw them. There is nothing in them binding beyond March 31 of next year. In the third place, he might ignore them and announce similar reductions, not to come into force until the following year. He can do that inasmuch as precedent has been established for announcing reductions that shall be postponed a year.

With the present mind prevailing, it is hard to see the end of what I call a fantastic farce in budgeting. It is mere window-dressing, trying to dress up the fact that there is no tax reduction this year, and that all the hopes which this government, by its rash and lavish promises, conjured up in the minds of the taxpayers, who were looking forward to reductions in store for them when the war was over, will be dashed to the ground. The government is not making these reductions, so that these phantom, deferred reductions are so much window-dressing.

The year 1947 will be closer to the next election than 1946 and, if the same mind prevails in 1948, then as that year will be still closer to the election, we may expect the budget reductions of that year to be also postponed. The Minister of Finance has admitted the house to a fleeting glimpse of these slight reductions and has then hustled them away into the refrigerator, keeping them in cold storage until the next calendar year. I can liken that action to that of a mother who, when the children open their toys on Christmas day, thinking that Johnny has received too many presents for his good, decides to put them away until a later stage in the year, or until next Christmas.

The Minister of Finance, I say, has offered this fleeting glimpse of phantom reductions. But surely, Mr. Speaker, in this year of grace and this year of taxation it should not be necessary in the Canadian House of Commons to put in a word for the hard-pressed taxpayer. Apparently, however, it is necessary because very little has been said, by those who sit to your right, by way of a plea for an understanding of the plight of the Canadian taxpayer. The Canadian taxpayer has carried and is still carrying a crushing burden. He is round-shouldered carrying it—yes, and he is the man who has been cajoled into thinking he might now expect a lightening of that heavy load.

The Canadian taxpayer in many cases is living on a fixed income under a wage ceiling or a salary ceiling. He has had no increase in income, no opportunity to put anything by during the war years. Indeed, great numbers of our taxpayers have been living in the red because taxation and the cost of living have taken more than they have been able to earn under ceilings. The cost of living has been going up, and I am not in the slightest degree impressed by the government's babbling about the way they have held down that cost, because the official cost-of-living index is so much nonsense. It is eyewash. There is not a housewife in this country who is prepared to accept the statement that the cost of living since the war began has increased only twenty per cent. She knows better because that cost of living index does not take into account deterioration in the quality of the goods she has to buy and the fact that she has to pay a higher price for goods of the same quality which, previously, she was able to buy at a lower price.

That same round-shouldered taxpayer has been burning himself out during the war. There are tens of thousands of men throughout the length and breadth of the country whose lives, and certainly the period of whose earning power, have been greatly curtailed by the exertions they made during the war. Everyone, or nearly everyone, has been doing his best, and many a man working under these ceilings has shortened the period of his earning life.

The Minister of Finance keeps coming back to the statement—in fact, it has become almost a fetish with him—that there is more money in the banks than before the war. I do not know who the people are who have all the money in the banks, but I should like the minister to know that it must be in the hands of people I do not know, because the people I come in contact with are people who have been on low frozen incomes during the war, on whom the burden of taxation has been grievous. They have not any larger bank accounts, and, in fact, great numbers of them have hardly any bank account at all. But, as I say, it has become a sort of fetish with the Minister of Finance. He has persuaded himself that a duty rests upon him to relieve the people of these great surpluses which they are supposed to have in the banks. That has been carried too far. Whoever planted that idea in the mind of the Minister of Finance has done him no great service, and it is a pity that by reason of the heavy burden he has been carrying he should be misled in that way. I should be the last person—and I say this in all frankness—to minimize in any sense the size of the load he has been carrying, but it is a pity that he has not been freer or has not taken the opportunity to go around and get into closer contact with the people who are paying the taxes that he imposes. It would have a beneficial effect on his approach to these problems.

Unfortunately, the Minister of Finance has become a prisoner of the bureaucrats. It is a pity that a little refreshing contact with the people who have to pay the taxes is not possible for him. Such a contact would have a salutary effect in restoring a perspective which I fear the right hon. gentleman has lost.

The Minister of Finance has trumpeted the fact that next year about a quarter of those who now pay income tax will not be doing so. Well, there will still be about 1,750,000 people left paying income taxes and sharing that burden with their families. Is that the whole story? It is far from the whole story. I wish some of those eloquent spokesmen for the government, including the Minister of National Defence, who made his maiden speech to-day as Acting Minister of Finance, would give the house some inkling as to how the burden of hidden taxation has been reduced by one copper in this budget. There is no hope of a reduction as long as the government continues in its present frame of mind.

What is the situation? There are taxes that are borne in this country by everyone, the whole twelve million of us. Is there any relief for them? Not a word in that regard. The budget still soaks everyone of them, and this government keeps on professing to be the government of the people. The Minister of National Defence this afternoon spoke about the government being the government of the people.

Mr. ABBOTT: I never used that phrase. I would think of something newer than that.

Mr. FLEMING: They are posing as the friend of the ordinary man, but this budget has exposed them. They are exposed out of their own mouths. This, I suppose, is a sample of the Liberal idea of a budget that meets the needs of the masses. But what about the masses? What about the tax on sugar—a cent a pound on a price of eight cents a pound still going on? It is still in full force and effect, a load borne by every one of the twelve million people of Canada. On such harmless things as soft drinks we still have a tax of twenty-five per cent, plus a cent for the bottle, which means that the youngsters pay seven cents instead of five cents for ordinary soft drinks. It means, too, that the movie, the poor man's recreation, is still subject to a twenty per cent tax; it means that candy, even when consumed by children, is still subject to a thirty per cent tax. Everybody in the country bears it. How about a little relief for these people? How about the twelve million people who are still waiting in vain for some semblance of reduction in taxes?

I am not a smoker; therefore I can make my next observation, I trust, with complete dispassionate objectivity. Consider cigarette papers. I suppose they are used chiefly by people who cannot afford to buy packages of cigarettes. A man or a woman pays thirteen cents for a package of 100 cigarette papers of which eight cents represents tax, eight out of thirteen cents. Then there is a tax on cigarettes in packages. The tax is two cents on every five cigarettes, and that affects every smoker throughout the length and breadth of the land. I suggest that if the Minister of Finance is looking about for opportunities to grant some tax relief he had better think about the rank and file of people from coast to coast.

I turn now to a subject which affects every man, woman and child in Canada, namely, reconversion from wartime to peacetime economy. At the outset I should like to emphasize the crucial importance of the time factor. Even the Minister of Finance recognized that in what he had to say on June 27. If we are to give any assistance to this reconversion process it must be given right now, not next spring, not in next year's budget, but right now, and there is no time to lose. This is what the Minister of Finance said in his budget speech of June 27, as reported at page 2905 of Hansard:

> . . . the action we take now in regard to taxes should provide whatever stimulus is possible to increased production. If we can encourage hard work and efficient production at this critical time, we shall be assisting greatly the effectiveness of our other actions to overcome the inflationary influences left behind by the war.

An ounce of effort now to assist in the reconversion process will be worth a pound a year from now. The solution depends on the action that we take right now, and it depends far more on this budget than many hon. members have given any indication that they yet realize. Let me quote what the right hon. gentleman had to say at page 2904 of Hansard:

> Production then should be our primary objective both for its own sake in a world that needs goods so badly, and as a safeguard against the present danger of inflation. We should aim now at high volume production for civilian purposes. . .

A little further on he said:

> No longer must civilian production be restricted in order to conserve resources for war. It can now receive first priority.

How are we to assist this reconversion process? I should like to recall the description of government wartime fiscal policy as outlined by the Minister of Finance in his speech on October 12, 1945, as reported at page 1002 of Hansard of last year. This is what he said:

> During the war, there has been built up a system of taxation which is discouraging to investment, to enterprise and to consumer expenditures. In many of its aspects it was designed to be discouraging and restrictive to all activities not necessary to the prosecution of the war. Some taxes were intended to restrict trade. Others have had the effect of increasing costs. I recognize that in the course of six years, war-time taxation has begun to blunt incentives and if continued indefinitely will paralyse the development of industry and trade.
> This is a consideration of the greatest national importance.

I should like to underline every word that the right hon. gentleman uttered on that occasion and recall to you, Mr. Speaker, that every moment the government fiscal policy as outlined by the Minister of Finance on October 12 last persists, these consequences, which he fully and frankly outlined on that occasion, will persist, too: the restriction on output, the discouragement of enterprise. To the extent that this budget carries on the same fiscal policy as was in effect then, it just accomplishes these things; the restriction of output, the dampening of incentive and the retardation of this whole process of reconversion from wartime to peace-time economy. There is no escape, and this budget unhappily carries forward just about—well, I shall be conservative with a small "c" if I say ninety-seven per cent of everything that was involved in government fiscal policy during the war as described by the Minister of Finance in the passage which I read from his speech of October 12 last.

Mr. JACKMAN: Managed economy.

Mr. FLEMING: Yes, managed economy, the fetish of bureaucrats; that is what we have been given. How on earth are we to accomplish or achieve the high production which the minister now claims to be so necessary to fend off the peril of inflation? How is he to do it; how on earth could it be done by the kind of budget proposals which have been introduced by the Minister of Finance? Look at them. First, look at the income tax rates; rates which were discouraging people in the factories, workshops and elsewhere from working overtime. They are still in effect this year.

Mr. ILSLEY: Less sixteen per cent.

Mr. FLEMING: That is what the government told us last October, that they were reducing taxes by sixteen per cent. Why did they not tell us quite frankly that last year the taxes were reduced by only four per cent? They did not say that. Is this some more of the two-in-one juggling of public finance, juggling of budgets? How about having one clear statement for one clear year at a time?

What is the next feature of this contribution of the budget to the increase in production that is so urgently needed? The minister proposes to increase the tax on married men by reducing the income the wife is allowed from $660 to $250, which is bound to have a discouraging effect on farmers' wives and all part-time employment by married women. It is going to affect a great many of them; make no mistake about that.

Let us have a look at the corporations. The Minister of Finance has indicated that he is putting his hopes on private enterprise. He made that abundantly clear in what he had to say in this chamber on June 27. How is he encouraging private enterprise in the corporations? Well, he says to them, I will reduce your corporation tax; I will reduce the tax effective January 1, 1947, and he says he wants production now. Is it reasonable to expect that corporations are going to take many risks in expanding production this year when, by waiting or withholding the marketing of their products until January 1 next, they can expect to increase their profits? Does that make sense? I say that it is most senseless when it is put alongside the minister's statement that we need expanded production.

Look at the partnerships and other proprietorships which are now subject to excess profits tax. The minister says, Oh, if you wait until January I next you will no longer be subject to excess profits tax. Is it reasonable to expect that many of them are going to take long chances in expanding production between now and December 31 when, by withholding products from the market until January 1 and after, they can benefit in the form of increased gains? The whole proposal of the minister has only to be stated to manifest its complete absurdity. What is needed is some relief now, and some encouragement to private enterprise.

In passing, I would suggest to the Minister of Finance that it is high time he took aside some of the hon. members who sit behind him and gave them a little instruction in government policy. If he does not do that he will find more and more hon. members running wild in respect of government policy, as the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Farquhar) did the other evening, as reported at page 3294 of Hansard, when he advocated the continuation indefinitely of the excess profits tax. The hon. member thought it was a pretty good tax, and that corporations should continue to be taxed under it, not only now but in future. In that connection, I should like to read just a remark and I shall give the reference later. It may be found at page 1004 of Hansard for 1945:

> The Excess Profits Tax Act is a war measure which has commanded overwhelming support as an important and necessary instrument of war finance. Unmodified, it seriously weakens the stimulus toward the investment of capital and the efficient operation of enterprises. In this period of reconstruction it is becoming a barrier to expanding employment.

Those are not the words of anyone on this side of the house. They are the words of the Minister of Finance. So I suggest that the hon. members who sit behind the minister either refrain from the discussion of forbidden topics of that kind or at least take the trouble to be instructed on what the Minister of Finance has already declared on previous occasions in the name of this government. Yes, we have had many samples of contradiction as between what the government talks about and what it actually does, but I dare say hon. members will look a long time before they will find a more complete example of contradiction than is to be found between the government resolutions on the one hand and the speech of the Minister of Finance on the other.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does my hon. friend take instructions on the party line before he makes a speech?

Mr. FLEMING: This is a party, Mr. Speaker, to which I am very proud to belong, led by a man I am very proud to follow. It is not a party ruled by an iron hand. It is a party which in the House of Commons stands on the principles of consultation one with the other and of freedom within the proper lines of policy as they have been laid down for the people of Canada, and on which the people of Canada elected those of us who sit here. We do not have to put ourselves in the unhappy position of being simply choristers singing the praises of a government sitting in front of us.

I wish to make one observation as to trade, Mr. Speaker, because in one of the earlier remarks I read from the address by the Minister of Finance you will find some reference to external trade. The fact of the matter is that the government, which is always ready to take credit to itself because this country stands in a leading position in the field of external trade, in which we are the fourth nation in the world, tells us in effect now that we are simply marking time until others are prepared to take some action in the international field. If we have reached this enviable status, I suggest that is not a good enough answer from the government. We should know precisely what this government proposes. We should know something about the plans this government proposes to lay before any conference called for this purpose. We have not been given the slightest inkling; in this case we have not even been permitted a glimpse of any phantom plans on behalf of the government. May I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that this summer two important conferences are being held to which this government will soon be sending delegates. They are conferences being held in London by the Imperial Economic Committee and the Imperial Shipping Committee. The Imperial Economic Committee has been assembling data on trade within the empire, making reports and fulfilling a useful function in connection with the extension of trade within the units of the commonwealth and empire. That conference this summer is to decide, according to what we were told in the external relations committee on July 9, whether or not the Imperial Economic Committee shall continue hereafter. I suggest that is a serious matter. If our external trade is so important—and it is important; it may be the lifeblood of this nation before we are through —we should know from this government immediately what instructions they are giving their delegates with respect to the views to be presented to the Imperial Economic Committee. Before this budget debate ends, I trust we may have an authoritative pronouncement from the government on this score.

In the limited time remaining, I wish to say a word about a subject which has been neglected in the budget proposals and in the budget speech of the Minister of Finance. That matter is income tax reform. I do not know whether hon. gentlemen opposite have forgotten quite what reform means; perhaps I shall have to speak in relatively simple terms.

In the first place, there is one reform which is long overdue. I suggest that it is about time we eliminated one particular word, one conspicuous word, from the title of this measure. It is called the Income War Tax Act. Enacted during the last war, in 1917, it has become a permanent part of the taxation and fiscal fabric of this country; so let us have some realism and get rid of the fiction of the word "war."

I turn now to the subject of the machinery of collection and assessment. Again I may have to refer to some remarks of the Minister of Finance on other and perhaps happier occasions. In his budget speech on June 27 of this year the minister had this to say on the subject of our personal income tax, at page 2914 of Hansard:

> Our personal income tax is now unnecessarily cumbersome . . .

That is a masterpiece of understatement. He added:

> Not only is the tax structure itself complex but as the house well knows its drafting leaves much to be desired.

Another masterpiece of understatement! I recall the remark of the right hon. gentleman in his budget speech last fall, at page 1006 of Hansard for 1945:

> There are clear and obvious reasons for as early a reorganization and simplification of this tax as is practicable.

You know, Mr. Speaker, we all expected after that speech, which the minister made on October 12, 1945, that he would seriously take in hand this problem of revising the income tax, eliminating all the complications and absurdities in the procedure of assessment and collection; but they remain. The minister has apparently been too busy, and all the house has been given this year is another apology for delay. Everything remains for another year. The 1946 returns, to be made out in April, 1947, will still be the same old returns containing the things with which we have become so unhappily familiar: the normal tax, the graduated tax, the surtax, compulsory savings, and all the other headaches. That return will be made out next year, as it has been made out in recent years, not only by all those who made it out this year, but it will now have to be made out by all the farmers and fishermen who hope to qualify on the new basis of averaging their incomes over a three-year period. Yes, all the complications remain; the complicated procedure is still there.

But the minister trots out for our view something that apparently is intended to dazzle the house. He has two proposals, the first for an income tax appeal board and the second for an income tax advisory board. Let us look at these for just a moment, taking first the income tax appeal board. We are told it is to be set up for this purpose:

Just what does that mean? This appeal board will go to work on assessments for the year 1946, and subsequent years. We may be sure this suggestion was not brought forward by the Minister of Finance until there had been a great deal of criticism of the existing procedure, an outcry from outraged taxpayers throughout the length and breadth of this country. The generality of taxpayers have been crying for years for some reform of the present procedure in connection with assessment and collection. But let us see how far this proposal goes. It begins with the 1946 assessment. Well, Mr. Speaker, you will make out your return on your 1946 income—and I hope it will be substantial—in April, 1947. If the slow-motion procedure now in full flower in the Department of National Revenue continues to flourish, assessments on the returns made in 1947 on 1946 income will probably begin to be issued in 1950. So that this appeal board will begin to go to work about 1950, or perhaps 1951. I am sure the taxpayers of this country will be grateful to the Minister of Finance for coming to their rescue with such a timely measure!

As the minister well knows, there has been strong criticism about the multiplicity of discretionary powers vested in the Minister of National Revenue under the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act. As a matter of fact, if hon. members have perused the report of the special committee appointed in the other place (the senate) to review the workings of the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act—and I hope they have, because they will find it a most interesting and valuable document—they will find at page 386 that the committee catalogues the discretionary powers vested in the minister under those two acts. The figures as I add them up total eighty-eight under the Income War Tax Act and twenty-four under the Excess Profits Tax Act.

These discretionary powers cover a variety of subjects, such as the allowance of reserves; limitation of expenses; determination of the true nature of transactions where lessening of tax may be involved with reference to companies and individuals; determination of the nature of income; determining the nature and effect of certain legal documents and reciprocal acts; approval of pension schemes; minor administrative discretions; regulations to carry the act into effect; waiving of penalties; determination of standard profits; adjustment of standard profits, and references to board of referees in the case of new or substantially different business.

The Minister of Finance offers, as an answer to this injustice, one which is crying for reform, a recommendation for an income tax advisory board. It will be recalled that the committee appointed in the other place recommended that those discretionary powers should not be final and absolute in the hands of the minister, but that there should be an appeal from them.

The officials of the department came before the committee and said, "No, we are opposed to that." The committee in the other place was not overcome by that opposition, and still made its recommendation. Of course, when it got to the department and the officials set to work advising the minister, hon. members will know what happened. Hon. members know what would always happen under those circumstances, with the present government in office. The officials won out, of course.

So we have the situation wherein the income tax advisory board is to have power only to advise the minister; and the minister in turn retains full power either to accept or reject that advice. In the second place, there is no appeal from the exercise of any discretionary powers. In the third place, there is not the slightest reduction in the number of discretionary powers; they continue in full number.

Mr. Speaker, my time has expired. I had hoped to touch upon dominion-provincial relations, but time does not permit. In closing let me add this thought. This is not the kind of budget the people of Canada had been led by the government to expect, in the light of the lavish promises the government made. In the second place, it is not the kind of budget the people of this country deserve, after the sacrifices they made in the war years. In the third place, it is not the kind of budget which will help the people of this country to carry on, to expand production, to increase employment and to convert to peacetime economy. Lastly, it is not the kind of budget the people of this country will approve. Indeed, in the light of this budget, so far as the taxpayer is concerned, the war is still on.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move that bills Nos. 254 to 298 inclusive be now read a second time.

Mr. J. W. BURTON (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to delay the second reading of these bills unduly, particularly in view of the fact that on a number of occasions both this session and in previous sessions serious objections have been raised against the manner in which these bills go through the house. There is nothing much that I can add, except that I recall that on the last occasion on which this question came up the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) gave in my opinion a good explanation of how these divorce cases might be disposed of in the future. I sincerely hope that the Minister of Justice will not delay unduly in bringing down a bill for that purpose, so that these divorce cases can be dealt with in a proper manner. Just to give an example of the position we are in—and this is another reason why I protest now against these bills going through in this manner—the printing of these bills is not all it should be. In one of them, for instance, the name "Burton" is mentioned; I believe that should be "Turton". I give that as an example of how parliament has got into the habit of passing these bills carelessly, and I wish to register my protest along with others that have been made previously against the manner in which these divorces are granted.

Motion agreed to, on division.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. MacInnis.

Mr. LUDGER DIONNE (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, in the budget speech which was delivered in the House of Commons by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) on June 27, I noticed a sincere desire to meet the conditions imposed on us by the reconversion from war to peace, but I failed to see a real effort to meet the wishes of the Canadian people.

In the first part of my remarks I shall deal with the unsuccessful results of the dominion-provincial conference. Has the federal government the right to tax the population to meet its obligations without asking the consent of the provinces? It would seem that the federal government has this privilege, if one may judge by the legislation which the minister is submitting for the consideration of the members of this house. If the federal government can tax the population without the consent of the provinces, why then consult the provinces? No doubt I shall be answered that the federal government is trying to avoid double taxation on the population, namely, taxation by the federal government and taxation by the provinces. This scheme is an economical and practical proposition, but as the provinces do not want to accept such an agreement, I do not understand the reasons for the federal government insisting so much.

The system of direct taxation followed by the federal government is disagreeable to the Canadian people. Why then insist on the provinces collecting their taxes directly from the people and then giving it back to them on the basis of $12 to $15 or $20 per capita? Why relieve the provinces of this unpleasant job? Why not let the provinces tax their own people in the manner they think fit and forget about this? In other words, why not mind our own business? I think we have enough to do here without doing the work of the provinces against their own will.

Personally, I am sick and tired of this bargaining with the provinces which, owing to the influence of the press in each province, is detrimental to the constructive ideas which this house has in mind. What have we gained to date with the provinces? Nothing practical. The federal government has been accused by the press in practically every province of aiming at centralization and monopolization of the privileges of the provinces, to their detriment. Our ministers have done a tremendous amount of work on this problem, but it has proved fruitless. I submit that we have devoted too much time already to this matter. On the other hand, if we do not have the right to tax the people under the heading of income tax, succession duties, et cetera, we should take some means to legalize this form of taxation or to enter other taxation fields so that we may obtain the results we are seeking.

I should like to refer now to the items of taxation which appear in the budget. I contend that our system of taxation is unjust and unfair to our people. In analysing our income tax legislation from a practical point of view I notice that only part of our population pay any income tax, namely, the working class and commercial institutions. Labour cannot escape this tax because it is deducted at the source, and commercial institutions who have to keep complete sets of books with accountants and auditors must pay it. But what about the thousands of other large and small businesses, those in the professions and many other classes of citizens too numerous to mention? How are taxes collected from these people? Most of them pay no tax. Those who do pay a tax are at the mercy of the income tax collector, or the inspectors must accept whatever they can get from them. It is a direct invitation to dishonesty. Most of these people are dreaming of nothing else but ways and means to hide their income. If they are successful in this they must live lives of fear of being caught and penalized. I know of no better way to educate our population to become professional scoundrels and rascals.

Is this the kind of people we want to have in Canada? Certainly not. If we want to avoid this calamity we shall have to change our methods of taxation. Remember that we have exacted enormous sacrifices from our people during the last five or six years. Are the people not entitled to fairness and equity from their leaders? This exploitation of the classes who do pay taxes, in favour of other classes who do not pay any, or pay only part, must cease. The present budget submitted to the house is inviting criticism and evading our responsibility. We must be honest with our people and with ourselves. We must be bold enough to tell them that we must get revenue to face our obligations and are prepared to enact whatever legislation is necessary to achieve this objective by fair and equitable means.

The mass of the Canadian people would like the exemption on salaries of single men raised to $1,500 and married men raised to $3,000. Why not accept this proposition? How many people earning $1,500 and $3,000 respectively do pay income tax honestly? I repeat, the workman because his tax is deducted from his weekly pay by his employer. How many other citizens are there who are earning similar amounts or more from whom the government collects nothing. Hon. members will admit the exactness of this declaration because their own experience tells them it is so. Is such a method of taxation fair and equitable? I leave the answer to them. If it is not, as every hon. member will admit, why not change it?

In most of the communities of this country we hear the same language, namely, that the cost of living has increased and is increasing; that labour is asking for increased wages, et cetera. This situation should not exist with the strict controls of the wartime prices and trade board. The increase in the cost of living is caused directly by the black market. Why not curb it? What is the use of having price control by the wartime prices and trade board if it does not achieve its purpose?

I understand that the wartime prices and trade board cannot control the situation alone. It needs support. Here is what I suggest to help them. Let us impose an additional sales tax of ten per cent on the retail price of goods. Such tax would be paid by the manufacturer and recharged to the retailer and the consumer. The manufacturer would buy stamps and stick, sew, or stamp them on the manufactured article itself. This stamp of ten per cent would be a sure indication of the value of the article bought by the consumer. Let me illustrate my thought by an example.

Suppose I am a shoe manufacturer. I know by experience that a pair of shoes which I sell to the merchant at $2.25 plus eight per cent sales tax, retails at $5, so that I will insert in the shoes a 50-cent stamp. I will charge this stamp to my customer in addition to the price of the shoes, namely $2.43 plus a 50-cent stamp. When those shoes are bought by the consumer he will have the assurance, in looking at the 50-cent stamp, that the ceiling price of the shoes is $5. No salesman, merchant, or peddler can overcharge or cheat him. Every consumer will act as a policeman. Recently I was in Washington with some friends of mine. A lady in the group wanted to buy a pair of shoes. She returned to the hotel with a pair of shoes for which she had paid $23. She was elated with her purchase because similar shoes in the shoe case were priced at $34. I examined the shoes and realized that they were similar to those manufactured in Canada to sell at around $2.50 by the Canadian manufacturer to the Canadian merchants. If these shoes had borne a 50-cent stamp the lady would have realized that they were $5 shoes and would not have allowed herself to be robbed of the difference, $18. What applies to shoes applies also to shirts, hats and other commodities of life.

Do you not think, Mr. Speaker, that the consumer would be satisfied and pleased to pay ten per cent more for the necessities of life and have the assurance that he is protected? It would cost the government nothing to collect this tax, with the exception of the cost of the stamps. On the other hand, look at the thousands of employees whom the government will have to hire to enforce the law as it is drafted and you will realize the saving the government will make. Do you not think we have enough bureaucrats in Ottawa? Many people talk of economy. I approve. But I am not satisfied with words only. I would like to get some action.

In accepting the increase of exemption of income tax on salaries to $1,500 for single men and $3,000 for married men, the government would, I will admit, lose many million dollars of revenue, but look at the revenue they would get from this ten per cent sales tax. The actual sales tax of eight per cent based on manufacturers' prices gave $404 million revenue to the government last year. A tax of ten per cent on the retail price of goods would yield at least one billion dollars and probably much more. This amount would certainly compensate for the loss the government would suffer in raising the exemption of single men to $1,500 and married men to $3,000. In accepting this suggestion the government would satisfy the Canadian people with fair and equitable treatment and would protect them from the black market which is spreading rapidly across our country.

This legislation should be enforced by drastic measures. In other words, if a merchant is caught selling goods at prices higher than ten times the amount of the stamps or selling goods without stamps, let him go to gaol. It would be better to put a few men in gaol for a month or two and protect our people from these exploiters. We may rest assured that not many people will risk being gaoled. If some are caught, they will take great care not to repeat the offence. Some will no doubt mention that this tax of ten per cent will be detrimental to large families. I am of the opinion that the family allowance and exemption granted in the present income tax for every child will more than offset this objection. Furthermore, these people will be so happy to get rid of the income tax that they will gladly accept the change. I had an opportunity of discussing the proposition outlined above with many prominent people around Quebec and Montreal this last week-end. After having thought the matter over, there was not one person who did not wish that this measure be accepted by the government.

There is only one way to handle the matter. We must protect our people against the black market by all means, and we must give the same fair treatment to everyone of our citizens without fail. If we forget this grave responsibility, I for my part, do not deserve to sit in this house any longer.

Mr. ALAN COCKERAM (York South): Like the member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), I had thought there would have been some question of economy on the part of the government reflected in the budget; and I was amazed this afternoon to hear the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott), who is to act as Minister of Finance in the absence of the minister, discard any thought of economy. The Minister of National Defence stated that no worth-while suggestion had been given or recommendations made from this side of the house and that only one question of economy had been brought up. I would suggest that since his department is one of the great spending branches of the government, it is a department that he might overhaul and economize, because I intend to give figures to show how ludicrous the expenses incurred by his department are at the present time.

When the hon. member for Lake Centre was speaking the other day the Minister of National Defence did a lot of interrupting, and at that time I thought it was time for someone to give figures showing the expenses of his department and ways in which they can be eliminated.

As of March 31 we find in the three defence services there were 29,824 civil servants. Compare that figure with 44,144, the total number of civil servants on the strength of the government on the same date in 1938. In other words, the Department of National Defence has approximately the same number of civil servants running its three branches to-day as conducted the whole government in 1938. I am going to give figures as to the relative strength of the forces.

As at June 30 there were 1,601 officers in the Canadian navy and 6,388 enlisted men, a great many of whom were petty officers. Therefore there is one officer to every four men in the service. But how many civil servants do hon. members think it took to run that combined number of men?—7,989. It takes 10,187; that is to say, one and a half men in the civil service for every one enlisted man in that branch of the service.

Let us now come to the army. The total army figures as at June 30, in the interim force, show 2,309 officers and 10,510 men. That is, one officer to every five men in the interim force. Apart from the interim force, there are 6,642 officers and 48,524 men, or in the combined forces a total number of officers of 8,951 and a total strength of 59,034. The total number of civil servants it takes to look after those 59,000 is 13,701.

Let us now come to the air force, which is in better shape than the other branches. There are 3,633 officers for 25,873 men, or about one officer for every eight men.

Surely there can be a saving in these departments. I have here an article discussing the United States army, in which the statement is made that some 300 generals are slated for demotion between "now and the 1st of July". We are not attempting to demote people here. We are still promoting major-generals, or were within the last few weeks. Recently an officer was promoted to major-general to take over the head of the military mission in Washington.

Before the war, there was one major-general in Canada and he was chief of the general staff. We know that with the expansion of services and the additional money that is being spent on those services we must have higher ranking officers. I would point to some of the statements that were made in reply to a question of mine which I asked in the middle of April. I asked how many generals, major-generals, brigadiers and colonels there were in the Canadian army. There were five lieutenant-generals as against one major-general before the war. There were eighteen major-generals, five of whom were seconded to other departments of government doing civil service jobs to a great extent at high rates of army pay, rates higher than those of other civil servants. There were forty-six brigadiers and 121 officers with the rank of full colonel, thirteen of whom were seconded to other departments of government.

I asked a question regarding Canadian military establishments in Washington. The reply was that in the army there were 141 army personnel stationed there, forty-six of whom were officers—and remember that this was a year after the war was over. In the air force there was a personnel of seventy-three, fourteen of whom were officers. I am speaking of Washington, of course. The navy had a strength in Washington of, I believe, fourteen. In other words, of a staff of 226 in Washington, sixty-nine were officers getting special rates of pay and having special income tax allowances. Yet the minister comes to the house and says he cannot save money.

In my opinion these figures are ridiculous. There should be a saving, because it is absurd that there should be that military establishment of this size in Washington to-day. I cannot see why there should be one officer in the navy for every four enlisted men, and in the entire force of the army one officer for every five men. I am reliably informed that even if they get 25,000 men for the interim force they will still have a surplus of 1,300 officers recruited for that force. Surely there can be economy here. I know that in the old days, if a district officer commanding wished to spend more than $250, he had to go to the treasury board to get approval. Is the minister's department not checking up on this colossal overstaffing? That is one thing that could be done to save the people's money. There is, in my mind, no question about that.

Some days ago an atomic bomb was dropped in the Pacific. One would have thought the department would have sent as an observer one of their bright young officers, one who is going to be in the service in the days to come. Whom did they send? They sent Major-General Luton, who had been director of medical services and is now retired. They sent this retired officer to check up and report on the dropping of the atomic bomb. I say that that job should have been given to a young soldier, somebody who is going to be in the service for years.

If the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott) wishes to do a job for this country he can clean out his department and do away with this colossal overhead for which the people of Canada have to pay. The Minister of Finance has some idea of what it costs to maintain an officer in the army, especially when there are so many higher ranking officers around. I venture to say that the members of this house have seen more major-generals and brigadiers at the Chateau and at various functions in the last few months than during the war. If the minister is serious in trying to keep down expenses—and I am sure he is—there must be some way in which he and his departmental officials can check this overstaffing of the force, because undoubtedly they are overstaffed; it is known to everybody. If you take the train to Toronto for the week-end you will find that it is still full of service personnel. I know the department will say that they are going to release from the services something like 20,000 men this month, but I venture to say that there will not be a corresponding drop in the number of officers dropped from the roll. Unfortunately, so far as the services are concerned too many officers are making jobs and trying to maintain them not only for to-day but for the future.

I wish to say a few words about the steel strike which has been called for Monday in spite of the fact that the government has placed a controller in charge. The minister announced an increase in the exemption for married men and single men which is to come into effect some time in the distant future. I suggest that many of our labour troubles to-day are brought about by the fact that the men want to keep their "take-home pay" with which we all agree. Would it not be wise for the minister to bring these exemptions into effect as from the first of this month? Perhaps it would prevent a lot of labour trouble in this country, and a great deal of our difficulties might be eliminated. I suggest that the minister give consideration to this suggestion. If that were done, the workers in the country would have a greater "take-home pay." We know it would cost money; but, after all, money means nothing if you have a contented people. The amount lost would come back in many ways. Again I suggest to the minister that he give consideration to bringing these exemptions into force as from July 1 of this year. There is no reason why this should not be done.

I now come to the Department of National Health and Welfare. I find it difficult to get true and honest statements from the government on governmental expenditures. Some time ago I asked a question with regard to the expenses of administering family allowances. The figure I received was that for the first six months of operation the total cost was $783,141.43. It was obvious to me that that figure was incorrect. I also asked the question as to how many men were employed administering the act. The reply that came to me was that on December 31 there were 417 temporary employees and thirty-five permanent. In a court case in Toronto on April 17, Mr. Jackson, manager of the Toronto office of family allowances, made the statement that he had 300 permanent employees in Toronto and 100 temporary employees. It was therefore obvious to me that my question was not answered correctly. There was nothing in the statement for postage. On looking through the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare, one can see that the department pays postage on everything. If one takes the number of cheques that go out—and they were sending out 1,378,128—according to my reckoning the postage would be approximately $60,000 a month. That amount, added to the $354,000 salaries and cost of living bonus, makes a total of $714,000 alone. Then there was the cost of printing the cheques, envelopes and all the other work that is incidental to the operations of the department. It is known generally that although the department of health did not take on men to operate the act the department of the Minister of Finance took on something over two thousand additional men to handle family allowances. The salaries on this account are not included in the figures of the cost of administering the act. When statements are given to hon. members there should be some degree of accuracy in them.

I should now like to touch on the subject of Canadian mining. It had been hoped by those actively engaged in the development throughout Canada that in introducing his budget this year the minister would have given some consideration to the future of the industry. The minister is aware that so far as the gold mining industry is concerned it is up against a fixed price for its product, and it is having to meet increasing costs to the point that much ore which was considered profitable in the past has now become waste rock and of no economic value. This has been accentuated by the new policy announced by the minister in regard to United States exchange. At this point let me say that I am not opposing the placing of Canadian funds on parity because, if it is good for Canada as a whole, then we must accept it as such. The minister knows that the industry is willing to accept it as such. With the increasing costs and the disappearance of the ten per cent premium, I estimate that at least twenty-five per cent of the ore resources of Canadian gold mines have been dissipated. In my opinion the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has a great knowledge of what this industry means to the country. Perhaps his knowledge is greater than that of the Minister of Finance because, when the prospectors' association were holding a meeting in Toronto, the Prime Minister wrote a letter to the president, Mrs. McMillan, which read as follows:

> I shall be grateful if you will convey my cordial greetings to the members of the prospectors and developers association of Canada, on the occasion of the annual convention of the association at Toronto, on March 11, 12 and 13.
> I am much interested to learn of the intention of the association to inaugurate a "Mining Day" for Canada so that all Canadians, young and old, may better appreciate the great importance of mining to our country.
> Mining is one of Canada's outstanding industries. The splendid development of our vast mineral resources was one of Canada's most important contributions towards the winning of the war. The further development of these resources, in the years following the war, can contribute greatly both to the national welfare and to the welfare of many lands.
> I send my best wishes to all attending the convention for a pleasant and profitable meeting.

In this house we have heard a great deal about the depression of the thirties. Let it be remembered that in those days the gold mining industry was the chief anchor of the Canadian economy. I believe this will be admitted by everyone. To show the importance of this industry, I would point out that during the years 1929 to 1932 the value of the production of all metals other than gold decreased from $114,000,000 to $40,000,000, whereas the value of gold production increased from $40,000,000 to $71,500,000. I would also point out that at present from 110,000 to 120,000 men are actively engaged in the mining industry of this country, receiving an average wage of approximately $2,000 a year. In other words, the mining industry is paying out in wages the enormous sum of roughly $240,000,000 annually. In these figures I have referred only to those directly engaged in mining. One would not have to stretch his imagination a great deal to realize how many citizens of Canada are indirectly dependent upon this great industry for their livelihood.

I have already stated that the industry does not oppose the plan of placing the Canadian dollar on a parity with the United States dollar if it is in the interests of Canada as a whole; but if we admit that it is in the interests of Canada as a whole, then obviously something must be done to take care of this one casualty that has been brought about in the national interest. This was recognized by the Minister of Finance in announcing the change in policy, when at page 3184 of Hansard he said:

> Moreover, this action is being taken at a time when the unfavourable effects will be minimized for practically every one of our great export industries with the exception of gold mining.

In this statement the minister recognized the great harm that would be done to this industry, and now he must give consideration as to how the damage may be offset. Before offering any suggestions in this regard, I should like to say that as far as I am concerned—and I am sure I am speaking on behalf of the industry—nothing in the way of subsidies is desired. Mining is too big and too important an industry to be looking for hand-outs. There are several ways in which the minister can help the industry get over these bad days, and I should like to suggest some possible measures. I know the minister has been approached by those connected with the industry, and no doubt he has a very good idea of what can be done. First, however, I would suggest that there is absolutely no freedom in the gold market where Canadian producers have to sell. The market for Canadian gold in the main is on this continent. It is a mistake to regard the new policy announced by the minister on July 5 as primarily an exchange parity policy. Actually it was a price control policy, and the mining industry has suffered because of it. In his announcement the minister hit the mining industry a body-blow which no other industry had to withstand. Why is that so? Simply because from the price Canadian gold producers were receiving he has taken away $3.50 an ounce, which must come out of the profits, and which means that in the main the low grade mines will be unable to operate. Gold mining, like all other industries, has been subject to Canadian price control, and has operated within fairly close margins of profit. As pointed out by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson), the average profit per ton of ore treated by the gold mines of Ontario in 1944 was $1.94, and in the province of Quebec it was as low as sixty-two cents.

Let us compare the mining industry with the other industry that could have been hit by this announcement; that is, the paper industry. We find that yesterday the newsprint industry was able to announce an increase of ten per cent in the price of its products, which would offset any loss it might suffer in connection with this exchange policy. How can the minister help the mining industry? That is what the industry is interested in and what I believe many Canadians are interested in. In the first place, he could give back to the mining industry in Canada the fifty per cent depletion rate for both the mines and the shareholders. In regard to this depletion allowance I would point out that, once the ore is taken from the ground, it is finished and cannot be replaced. Therefore the ore reserves of mines are a constantly wasting asset. Then, the minister could make arrangements with the Canadian mint to refine, handle and market the bullion of the mines at cost. In the next place, the minister could allow the mines to sell all their metals, whether base metals or gold, in such a way as to obtain world prices for their total production. I should like to point out to the minister that in spite of his arbitrary act in stating that the Canadian dollar is worth 100 cents in United States funds, Canadian money still remains at a discount in New York. Yesterday the rate was 1½ per cent and went as high as two per cent. I wonder if the minister would not let the mines have the advantage of that rate, so that at least they would get this extra 70 cents a ton. This is not very much to a government, but it does mean something to low-grade gold mines.

I should like to offer another suggestion to the minister, and it is this: In order to promote the discovery and development of new mines in remote areas, such mines should be exempt from all taxation for a period of ten years. When I refer to remote areas I mean those areas which cannot be reached other than by plane or by bush road, or by any means other than railways. Every time a new mine is developed in these northern areas it opens up wide possibilities in connection with farming and lumbering which are good for the country as a whole. I offer this suggestion, having in mind that the areas near the railways to a great extent are thoroughly prospected, and that in future the mines will largely be found in the more remote areas of Canada. They will open up vast new districts; and when I speak of the remote areas I refer to such places as Yellowknife, Red lake, Pickle lake, Chibougama and the new nickel mines in northern Manitoba. I would just say that these new nickel deposits in northern Manitoba may be a vital asset to Canada in the uncertain years to come. These deposits are at the present time approximately 150 miles from the railway. Unless this new area gets definite encouragement from the government, deposits are likely to remain undeveloped. A ton of rock is no asset to Canada unless it has had the metal extracted from it.

While I am on this subject, I should like to point out to the minister another way in which these remote mines are being penalized. The only means of transportation into the new areas is by aeroplane, and all hon. members know there is a fifteen per cent tax on travel. To go to the Red lake area, for instance, the fare is $40 return. The fifteen per cent tax adds $6 to that, which the worker in that area has to pay. If he travelled the same distance by railway he would pay a tax of only about thirty cents. The minister should immediately do away with this tax on air transportation to remote areas which have no other means of transport. This should be done to benefit those who are working in the mines because, when they come out for holidays, just that much more expense is involved.

The devastating effect of the minister's action at this time is bound to have repercussions in the future. If the mining industry is to survive, new mines must be found to-day. This was once recognized by the government, and I quote from the dominion proposals to the dominion-provincial conference:

The great export industries are agriculture, forestry, mining and, to a lesser degree, fishing. An accelerated resources development programme would provide alternative income to these great export groups if exports are low. Non-urban road development programmes will have the same effect as far as agriculture, forestry and mining are concerned, although it is not apt to help the fisheries industry directly to any great extent. Increased income of the primary export groups would greatly help the remainder of the economy by maintaining both consumption and investment outlay.

A decline in private investment expenditure releases workers of various skills from employment and lowers the amounts of producer materials used. The resources development programme would help provide employment directly and indirectly to many of these people.

Records show that the Canadian mineral production from 1907 to 1944, inclusive, according to figures compiled by the bureau of statistics, reached the staggering figure of $10,005,699,893. This sum represents two-thirds of the Canadian government's bonded debt to-day.

Just in order to give a little encouragement to those who sit to my left, I should like, if I may, to table a list of Ontario producing gold mines which ceased operations between 1939 and 1944, and which paid no returns to shareholders, and the total production value from commencement to date of closing. The total production of these 39 mines was $21,859,000. No dividends were paid, but production taxes of some kind were paid on all these mines.

Mr. ILSLEY: This would have to be with the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. COCKERAM: The table is as follows:

In the early days of the war, when gold was so necessary to enable Canada to buy goods and materials in the United States, the gold mines were asked by the then minister of finance to increase their production, with the result that gold production was increased from $166,205,990 in 1938 to $205,789,392 in 1941. This great increase in production was brought about as a general economic loss to the mines, because they mined their richest veins in order to get production.

Not only did they trespass upon their ore reserves, but they paid taxes on fictitious profits, because at that time they were unable to do the development work which normally a mine must do to keep ahead. The result was that the mines paid taxes on those profits, and did not get any relief from taxation at that time.

I say to the minister, in closing, that in spite of this body-blow which has been administered to the industry those engaged in the industry, management, men, prospectors and everybody else connected with it are still good Canadians with a determination that the industry will survive and that it will continue to play its full part in the Canadian economy.

I would ask the minister to give consideration as soon as he can to some relief for this industry, not by way of subsidies, but by some real and considered relief which would be helpful to the industry in these difficult times.

Mr. JOSEPH OMER GOUR (Russell) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take advantage of the opportunity which is now afforded me to congratulate you on your elevation to your distinguished post and especially on the efficiency with which you are discharging your duties. I hasten to compliment also the government and all the ministers, especially the Right Hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) about the manner in which they have directed this country's affairs during six long years of war. I commend them for having so well prepared this country for the post-war period, through trade treaties, and the loans that have been made and those which will probably be granted in the near future. Such action ensures us for many years to come a market that will mean good prices for our farmers and employment for all our workers, owing to the fact that we shall have an export trade greater and more profitable than ever before.

In no country of the world, not even in the United States our great and prosperous neighbour, has inflation been better controlled, and the middle class, comprising the majority of the people, better protected than in Canada.

I think it behooves me to congratulate all the cabinet members. I must first mention the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King, that great statesman, who is admirably leading our country in accordance with the high traditions set by our revered and lamented leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier; I must also commend our Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) who arouses the envy of all other countries on account of his ability and his unmatched talents; our Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), who organized his department so as to move through Canada and to Europe, more equipment, more soldiers and more civilians than even the most optimistic observer would have thought possible; our Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) whose ability, consideration and absolute frankness for the worker have gained their esteem and who has obtained for them wages in keeping with a high standard of living; the Right Hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) the pride of Canadians, for his personality, his ableness and his great sense of fairness which no one ever questions; our Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) who has so worthily represented our country abroad on various occasions and who, lately, has piloted through the house a bill of which our country is justly proud; our Minister of Health (Mr. Claxton) for all the social measures he has presented, especially family allowances, besides the numberless others he would so willingly support were our finances such as to warrant them; the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) who, due to his integrity, is so successful in the administration of his department and attends to the erection of public buildings and numerous works contributing to the wealth of Canada, in spite of the inadequacy of the amounts voted for these purposes; our ministers of National Defence (Mr. Gibson and Mr. Abbott) who have so well organized our war effort, have proceeded with demobilization with so much speed, and have implemented more measures benefiting our veterans than any other country and all the other members of the cabinet who are so well qualified and of whom I shall have more to say later for the work they have done.

I feel it my duty also to commend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) for the splendid budget he has brought down. He has shown evidence of unprecedented ability in thus balancing a budget of such staggering proportions not only without increased taxation but, on the contrary, allowing substantial reduction for people of modest means. We may therefore count on his finding means to repeat this performance in the future.

I should not want to miss this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to express to the minister my whole-hearted admiration for the splendid way in which he has managed the affairs of his department. His financial ability has been of great service to his country and his fellow-citizens. By his courage he has established and maintained price control thus protecting the bulk of our population, our farmers, our workers, and people of low income, against the abuse of trusts, so that the public shall not be exploited as they were during the first world war. I hope that price control will be maintained until the return of normal conditions when offer shall again exceed the demand for all the commodities essential to a high standard of living for all Canadians and in order that competition shall prevent profiteers throughout the country to take unfair advantage of shortages and of every opportunity to exploit the people and satisfy their greed.

It may however become necessary to raise the prices of certain commodities, as happened recently in the case of farm machinery, a measure which I cannot criticize because we have had ample evidence that the manufacturers could not produce at a profit. We may be sure also that they would not have taken steps to increase their production. They might even have curtailed their production, thus depriving our farmers from machinery they sorely needed in view of the scarcity of labour.

Our farmers have a greater need of equipment than in the past and a shortage of farm machinery would impair increased production. I take this opportunity of congratulating our farmers on their splendid effort during the war years when they intensified production while 400,000 of their number had left the land to serve with the armed forces or in various other fields.

May I remind my hon. friends in this house, Mr. Speaker, that if we do not grant the farmers all the means of production, the whole country will suffer. I confess that I find the price of farm machinery very high. A farmer needs a great deal of capital to secure everything he needs for profitable operation. If new increases raise production costs on the farm, the government must lend a helping hand as was done when the government increased the prices of bacon, eggs, butter and other agricultural products, or add to the farmers' revenue by grants of some sort.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the farmers want a more generous agricultural loan, similar to that extended to veterans by the government.

I compliment the government for the fine legislation implemented in favour of our veterans which does credit to our country.

Mr. Speaker, I would now ask hon. members to consider the riding of Russell, which I have the honour to represent, because it truly reflects the whole of Canada. In the first place, its population is made up of all creeds and all races, French-Canadians, English, Scottish, Irish and others, living in perfect harmony.

In think my constituency is one of the best agricultural districts of Canada, on account of its production of butter, milk, cheese, pork and eggs. A large part of our farm products is sold in the beautiful city of Ottawa, the capital of our country, of which we are so proud on account of its growth and of its attractions, and which is remarkable for its fine people and its distinguished visitors.

Although farming is the main occupation in my constituency, the district is noted for some very pretty small towns and attractive villages which hope for more industries. I take this opportunity of appealing to the government and to manufacturers and of informing them that they would receive a warm welcome in the county of Russell. To my mind, it would be beneficial to disperse our industries rather than concentrate them in large urban centres; since, in the event of another war, the atomic bomb could destroy a city in a few minutes, it would be advisable to scatter these industries throughout the rural districts where life is less expensive for the worker and where the farmer could sell his products closer to home.

In my constituency of Russell, one finds in Rockland, Orleans, Embrun, Russell, Casselman, Bourget, Clarence Creek, and elsewhere, ideal locations for any type of industry and capable workers who would certainly cooperate with any establishment set up in the district. The Rockcliffe and Uplands airports with which you are familiar are also in the vicinity, and you are well aware of the immense service they rendered the country in war time and of their present contribution.

I shall prove to you that we can rightly be proud of this fine constituency of Russell, because for 59 consecutive years, that is, since 1887, it has never failed to elect a Liberal member to the House of Commons in Ottawa.

We shall celebrate that diamond jubilee shortly and I wish to invite the Prime Minister and all the hon. members to join in with us in celebrating this glorious event and come back later when we celebrate the centenary. I do not think the representatives of Russell have taken too much of the time of the house and it is not my intention to abuse this privilege, as I believe that needlessly protracted discussions cost the country millions of dollars and tend to increase taxes.

The electors of my constituency feel that their interests are well taken care of by the Liberal party. A moment ago I congratulated the members of the cabinet for this unparalleled era of prosperity prevailing in my constituency and throughout Canada. This is proven by the fact that during the ninth victory loan the sum subscribed was higher than the total amount of all the loans launched during the first great war.

In order to thank Providence for the most prosperous era in the history of our country, which is unequalled in the whole world, I believe that the government could not find a better time to appoint an ambassador to the Vatican. We should be proud to do so, since ours is such a Christian country, and in view of the fact that forty other countries have already led the way, namely; France, Belgium, Great Britain, United States, Japan, China, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Argentina, Ireland, Colombia, Cuba, Haiti, Ecuador, Peru, Venezuela, Germany, Czechoslovakia, Roumania, Finland, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Luxembourg, Holland, etc.

Mr. JOHNSTON: When are you coming back to Canada?

An hon. MEMBER: You do not understand what he is saying.

Mr. GOUR (Russell): I will speak so that my hon. friends can understand.

Mr. Speaker, I must say again that our farmers are urgently in need of help from the federal government since we are not getting enough from the provincial government of Ontario, especially chemical fertilizer at better conditions, assistance in the draining of the lands, et cetera, in order to keep our farmers on the land and to encourage the veterans in settling on the land.

Good roads and electricity are also essential. The farmers cannot keep their sons on the farms, when it is a matter of seventy-five hours or more work per week, without offering them reasonable and necessary accommodations.

It is essential to the farmers, as well as to the workers, that a reasonable profit margin be established between production cost and sale price, the same as between the salary of the worker and the cost of living.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to state that the constituency of Russell has flourishing flax cooperatives. I would fail in my duty if I did not take a few minutes of the house's attention to congratulate the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Is it not a fact that it is due to his unpreceeded ability that he provided ways and means of stimulating our farmers, who replied splendidly to his call and have multiplied several times our production from coast to coast. Thanks to them, we are now the country which provides the most food to the starving people throughout the entire world.

As a result of the laws which the Minister of Agriculture has had adopted and the bonuses which he gave the farmers in order to encourage them to better their products, to-day we are offering products which are superior to those of every other country, and you will agree with me that this is all to the honour of Canada.

It is also due to his ability that our country and its products are better known and that we are getting more advantageous markets everywhere in the world.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have reasons to believe that we can never have a more qualified Minister of Agriculture. I sincerely wish that we shall be granted the envious privilege of keeping him in his present position for many years to come. The country is most fortunate in having such a competent minister at the head of this department. I would remind hon. members that if agriculture is not prosperous, Canada cannot be prosperous.

I want to take this opportunity to thank the minister for the precious help he has given all the cooperatives and flax industries which were of such great importance to our war effort. I feel certain that the flax industry will continue to render great service to our country provided that the government will continue to extend its assistance to its development until such a time when we shall have mills which will be providing work for thousands and thousands of workers.

I shall conclude by saying that we must thank Divine Providence for having given us such a glorious statesman at the head of our country, the most qualified man in all the world to-day, our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King).

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with hon. members in congratulating the Right Hon Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon having been selected to go to Geneva on an important mission for his country. I am sure people in all parts of the country will hope that the ocean voyage will improve his health and that in the near future he will come back in the best of condition. During the war I participated on many occasions in victory loan campaigns in my constituency. I always made it clear that while the C.C.F. did not have a mandate to conduct the financial programme of Canada, being a democrat I accepted the verdict of the majority. I told my constituents that I thought we were fortunate in having as Minister of Finance one who would not use his high office to improve his own personal position. I told them that if waste or inefficiency existed in government, those conditions did not prevail with the knowledge or the approval of the minister. I am sure that those factors had a great bearing upon making it possible for Canada to achieve such an impressive war effort.

During the war I felt that there were criticisms that should be made, and I made them from time to time. I think this peacetime budget deserves criticism and, before I conclude, I shall have something critical to say about it. After having listened to the Progressive Conservative members who have participated in the debate, I began to feel that there could have been a worse budget. When the financial critic for the Progressive Conservatives spoke after the minister had brought down his budget on June 27 he emphasized the word "economy", "economy", "economy". I submit that we could save quite a few million dollars in Canada but still could not improve materially the lot of the people. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) took us back a long time in his speech. As reported on page 3222 of Hansard, he took us back to the seventeenth century when he said:

> As I understand it, democracy as we have it really takes its roots from seventeenth century England, and if there ever was a place where they believed that people should try to look after themselves and have a sense of responsibility, it was seventeenth century Puritan England.

It is quite a long time since I have read about the seventeenth century. The remarks of my hon. friend created an interest in that period of history, and so I turned to Trevelyan's "English Social History". While the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario might like to live in Puritan England of the seventeenth century I prefer Canada of the twentieth. The period of Puritan England to which he referred was still 100 years before the industrial revolution. It was a time when the development of the coal mining industry forced the working of women and children, who were compelled to toil long hours underground. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has told us about conditions of the mines in the twentieth century, but conditions were much worse in the seventeenth. Hon. members may be interested to know something of what was done for the aged in the time of Puritan England. As a result of forty-five years of faithful service in the compiling of chronicles, James I awarded John Stowe of the city of London, in the year 1603, a licence to beg. John Stowe was given a royal licence to beg! Then there is an interesting statistical compilation here, Gregory King's Tables. I shall refer to it later when dealing with the budget of the Minister of Finance, to indicate that in some particulars we have not gone very far from the conditions that prevailed in the seventeenth century.

I would remind the house that there was a period, within the memory of most of us, when we did practise the word "economy" about which we have heard so often. From 1930 to 1935 we had a government here—

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, we had not.

Mr. NICHOLSON: —that had some of the stalwarts who are still in the house, and they did practise economy in those days. Let us see what the economy was. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario complained much about expenditures in connection with the civil service, but he has not made many concrete suggestions as to how the expenses can be cut down. His government, from 1930 to 1935, did indicate one means by which this result could be effected, for they slashed the salaries of civil servants ten per cent all across the board. Those receiving higher salaries had a ten per cent cut, and those who received $60, $70 and $80 a month had the axe applied equally to them, for they, too, had a ten per cent reduction.

Mr. MacNICOL: And members of parliament and senators too.

Mr. NICHOLSON: We find that certain relief settlement plans were drawn up, because an act was passed in 1932 whereby agreements were made with all the provinces, except Prince Edward Island, providing for non-reconvertible expenditures of one-third of the amount, not to exceed $600 per family, for the purpose of providing a measure of self-sustaining relief to families who otherwise would be in receipt of material aid, by placing such families on the land. Those were the days when my hon. friends practised economy. They said, "It is far cheaper to keep unfortunate people, who cannot find jobs, on the land. Give them 160 acres of bushland for $10 and make available to them the sum of $600 and they will no longer be a charge on the rest of society." That is not so long ago. That was in 1932.

Hon. members who have lived in other parts of Canada will have some difficulty in picturing what is involved when you leave a city like Regina or Moose Jaw or Saskatoon under the assistance of the federal government, the provincial government and the municipality and try to become self-supporting on $600. I happen to have returns for some of the veterans of world war I of 1914-18.

An hon. MEMBER: Were you one?

Mr. NICHOLSON: No; I was not one. These returns relate to some of my friends who are older than I. I have, however, the records of two who fought in this war and this is the sort of treatment we gave these people from 1930 to 1935. This is how my hon. friends allocated $600 to those who were in need of assistance; this is what was done by those who talk about economy. I will not mention any names, but this particular family is No. 225—they gave them numbers—and the date of this settlement was May 25, 1932. The family was supplied on July 7, 1932, with a team costing $50. No extravagance there! I may say, however, that the horses did not live very long; they survived only a few weeks. On August 10 they were supplied with groceries amounting to $10. That was for eight people in the family. That very economical government decided that $10 would be ample to supply these people with everything they needed in the way of groceries. That amount, I may say, was for one month. They got a set of harness costing $15. On August 10 they really went to town, because they bought a cow for $35, a wagon and plough for $10, and had their railway fares paid at a reduced rate. The cost of that item for five people was $30.80. On September 12 they had groceries to the amount of $10. Then they started buying building materials. Talk about the Veterans Land Act! There was no such extravagance in 1932, for building materials for this family cost $31.60. They had the logs available and that was the amount provided for construction. Then there was $10 for groceries and they bought hay on August 12 for $1.50. In October they bought two rolls of tar paper for $4.50, and on November 17 they had groceries to the amount of $10. Then, on January 10, 1933, they had groceries, $11.60.

Mr. SKEY: On a point of order, may I ask whether the hon. gentleman is opposing the budget of 1932 or the budget of 1946?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am making my position clear, that the people who now talk about economy had a chance of practising it at that time, and they did not improve to any extent the lot of the majority of the Canadian people.

To continue, there is an item on January 12, C.N.R. freight, amounting to $43.95. Then, on June 8, 1933, they bought a black gelding, the other team having died, and this single horse cost them $50.

Mr. FLEMING: Too much for a C.C.F. horse.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Then we find in 1933 sealers and sugar, $10.75. On February 2, 1934, there was an item of thirty bushels of oats for $8.30. The election was coming on and allowances then went up, because the family that had been expected to get along on $10 now received $18.20. That was for eight people. By the 20th February, 1934, they had exhausted their $600. But, of course, they were not self-supporting and assistance was continued.

I am speaking about Saskatchewan, but I would remind the house that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) was premier of Manitoba, the adjoining province, and they also participated in that sort of programme. They settled quite a large number of persons and at the same time carried out a programme to settle boys on farms at $5 a month, and if they continued on long enough there was a subsidy of $2.50 a month.

I do not wish to excuse the present government. I notice the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) is smiling, and I would remind him that in 1940, after we had been at war for some time, there were still several thousand young men working on farms drawing benefits of $5 a month.

I submit that the solution of the economic problems that confront the Canadian people will not be found by going back to the seventeenth century or to the thirties of the twentieth century, when we pared down allowances to veterans of the war who had committed no offence but were unfortunate enough to be carpenters, tinsmiths or plumbers who could not find jobs at any wage in the cities. It was costing a good deal to keep them on relief. It cost $70 a month to keep them on relief in Regina, and the Conservative government at Ottawa felt that if they got these people into the bush they could cut down the provincial and federal expenses and balance budgets. But the real costs will never be known—the toll of suffering in the way of undernourished children, broken-hearted mothers and fathers, and youngsters who, year after year, were denied the privilege of going to school. I would like hon. members to bear in mind that this is within the memory of all of us here. Those terrible years we had in Canada, when we could not provide a decent standard of living for the people, can be recollected by all of us.

During the war the Minister of Finance did some things that deserve commendation. He pursued a policy which proceeded on the basis that anything which was physically possible somehow or another would be made financially possible. If we needed ships, tanks, guns or materials of any kind, the question was, not how much money we had in the banks, or how much was in our gold reserves, but had we the raw materials; had we the man-power? Was it part of an over-all plan which would enable Canada to make her greatest contribution for the purpose of winning the war? During the war years Canada set high standards. We had more than a million of our young men and women in uniform. We gave large contributions to the united nations, and we kept for ourselves more of nearly every item of food than we ever had before in the history of the country. Is there not something radically wrong with an economic system which gives the people their highest standard of living during two wars, the war of 1914-18 and the war of 1939-45?

The performance of the Minister of Finance during the war should indicate that if he wishes he can organize our fiscal policy so that we can have full employment and rising standards of living in peace time. I wish to point out that the greatest waste in our time or in any country's time is the waste which takes place when able-bodied men are denied the chance to do useful work, and when machines remain idle when there are needs which must be filled.

When these settlers were going to the north country the sawmills in the midst of the bush were closed and the settlers could not get lumber to finish their houses because, we were told, we had no money in Canada. Under the pressure of war we found that if we needed lumber, mills were operated and those who worked in the mills deserved reasonable standards of living.

I come now to a criticism of the budget. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) sets out the fundamental criticisms of the budget. I should like to confine my criticism chiefly to the points raised last night by my deskmate, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The budget does not provide for the tax reductions in the calendar year 1946 by raising sufficiently the exemptions of those in the lower income brackets. In discussing the budget on June 27 the minister said, and correctly, as reported at page 2915 of Hansard:

> Secondly, we are all, I believe, agreed that the income tax is the fairest and best tax on which to rely for the bulk of our revenue. More than any other, it takes ability to pay properly into account. We must, I consider, rely upon it as heavily as we can, subject to the limits imposed by its effects on incentive and efficiency.

My quarrel with the minister all during the war was that he was too cautious, that he paid too much attention to the people in the higher income brackets, who are few in number but apparently quite powerful.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is eighty-five per cent not high enough for these fellows?

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. NICHOLSON: No, I think not, as I shall show a little later on.

Mr. KNOWLES: It was ninety-two per cent at one time.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The important consideration is, how much is left when the Minister of Finance takes away eighty-five per cent? My figures will indicate that the fifteen per cent which is left is more than adequate.

Let us go back to the seventeenth century in which the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario would like to live. We find a division of income at that time similar to what we have now. We start with the labouring people. There were apparently about 364,000 in this category. For my purpose I am taking the pound at $5. These 364,000 labouring people had an annual income of $75. The next class was common seamen; there were 50,000 of them and they received $100 a year.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What year was that?

Mr. NICHOLSON: That was back in 1688, in the seventeenth century. The farmers then as now were getting pretty rough treatment. There were 150,000 farmers who received an annual income of $212. Shopkeepers and tradesmen, of whom there were 50,000, received an annual income of $225. Then we come to the lesser clergymen, of whom there were 8,000—

Mr. GRAYDON: Here is where my hon. friend comes in.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, that is my category. I was up in the north country with the veterans of the last war. There were 8,000 lesser clergymen who received an annual salary of $250. The military officers were a little better off. There were 4,000 of these and they received $300 a year. The next class were persons in liberal arts and sciences. They had rough treatment then as now. There were 75,000 and they received $300 a year. The next class is eminent clergymen. There were 12,000 of them who received $360 a year. I would remind the house that the lesser clergymen received $250. Naval officers, of whom there were 20,000, received $400 a year. Lawyers were better off, but not as well off as they are now. There were 10,000 of them who received $770 a year. There were 8,000 lesser merchants and traders by sea who received $990 a year, and 2,000 eminent merchants and traders by sea who received $2,000 a year. The last two categories are the spiritual lords and the temporal lords. There were only twenty-six spiritual lords, but they had an annual income of $6,500. The temporal lords, of whom there were 160, had an annual income of $16,000.

Mr. BROOKS: What does it all add up to?

Mr. MACKENZIE: What year was this?

Mr. NICHOLSON: This was back in the period in which the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario would like to live, the good old days when we had some incentive, something to work for.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): May I interject that those were the days when there was a socialist government in England.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance some information which is contained in the national accounts income and expenditure 1938-1945. I am sorry the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario is not in his seat at the moment.

Mr. BROOKS: He is not missing anything.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It gives a pattern which has a remarkable similarity to what I have just given. On page 33 a table appears entitled "Estimated distribution of all income recipients in the armed services and non-agricultural occupations by income classes, Canada, 1942". This table gives the income classes from $0 to $250, from $250 to $500, from $500 to $750. The next page gives the estimated distribution of aggregate income in the armed services and non-agricultural occupations by income classes, Canada, 1942. I should like the house to follow me in a simplification of these two tables, where I indicate how we distribute the national income in Canada. It is rather hard to interpret this in terms of the incomes of individuals, but if we take 1,000 we shall, I think, accomplish our object. The table indicates that over four million people were taken into account in this compilation, but I shall use the figure 1,000. The table will then read as follows:

Basis=1,000 No. of persons	Average annual income
100	376
127	874
67	1,866

I should like hon. members to picture a thousand people living in one community in Canada, having in that community eighty-four families each with an annual income of only $142, in the year 1942, and with one family having an income of $32,000. If you distributed your national income according to that pattern and had the thousand people living in one community you would certainly have trouble. It appears, however, that when you have the people in the top brackets in Montreal or Toronto or Winnipeg and the people in the lower brackets in Glace Bay, Hudson Bay Junction and Humboldt, where they are not familiar with the way the wheels go round, then this condition is tolerated. I was talking the other day to a friend who is an importer of British woollens, who is selling high-priced materials here in Ottawa. He said he went into one of the stores in this city, and was afraid the high prices that must be paid for these superior goods would frighten the storekeeper. The merchant said, however, "Oh, that doesn't mean anything these days. We are selling men's pyjamas at $75 a suit." I do not suppose they are selling very many of them, but apparently we still have an income tax structure that leaves a few people in the highest brackets with sufficient to spend on that scale.

The minister has made some revisions in the rates, and again I have simplified the results so that I personally may be able to understand a little better just what the position is. Again for this purpose, as for the other table I mentioned, I have taken a year as 300 days rather than 365, in order to simplify the calculations. There will be nothing allowed for Sundays and a couple of weeks' holidays, but on the basis of 300 days a year this table shows the annual income of various groups, the daily rate remaining after payment of tax, and the increase that will result from the tax revisions:

Gross Income	Single Persons Yearly	Daily	Increase
$ 700	$ 700	$ 2 33	·03
1,000	945	3 15	·08
2,000	1,687	5 62	·19
3,000	2,407	8 02	·33
5,000	3,794	12 65	·82
10,000	6,962	23 21	1·95
20,000	12,100	40 33	4·54
30,000	16,600	55 20	6·71
50,000	23,909	79 70	10·77
75,000	31,485	104 95	14·80
100,000	37,984	126 61	18·22
200,000	56,559	188 53	21·12

Then I should like to give the same comparison for married persons without children:

Gross Income	Married Persons Yearly	Daily	Increase
$ 2,000	$ 1,882	$ 6 27	·25
3,000	2,617	8 72	·36
5,000	4,027	13 42	·61
10,000	7,277	24 26	1·46
20,000	12,512	41 70	3·82
30,000	17,012	56 71	5·56
50,000	24,359	81 20	5·15
75,000	32,009	106 70	11·36
100,000	38,509	128 36	13·39

I agree with the minister that the amount of revenue that would be obtained from the relatively small number in these higher income brackets would not be great; but after asking our people to tighten their belts during the war, I think an income, after all taxation, of over $57,000 a year for a married man without children is unnecessary. I remember that on a previous occasion the minister indicated that he did not really know what people did with such large amounts of money, that he had not had those amounts himself and had no particular desire to have them. It may be that I have peculiar views regarding these matters, but I think the prime minister of a country should have the highest income in that country. I cannot think of anyone who, in the minds of the people, should have a more adequate income than the prime minister of a country. I believe also the Minister of Finance should stand very high on the income list, and I think it must be very difficult for him to justify the "take-home pay" he has for himself, while year after year bringing in budgets which leave so much to the few in the higher income tax brackets. I believe that if the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario would compare the two tables I have just given he might feel that the minister has kept reasonably close to the standards which prevailed back in the seventeenth century, when it comes to rewarding people in these various groups.

Before I conclude, I should like to say just one word about the failure of the Minister of Finance to indicate a more positive programme in connection with dominion-provincial relations. Recently I received from the attorney general of Saskatchewan some comments regarding the proposals as they affect that province. He says:

> In Saskatchewan's case for example under the conference proposals we were to give up the right to impose income, corporation and inheritance taxes and in return were to share in the benefits resulting from:
> (1) per capita grants of $15 costing the dominion 198 million annually;
> (2) public investment and unemployment assistance and other grants estimated at roughly 150 millions annually·
> (3) health insurance and grants worth an eventual 165 millions;
> (4) an old age pension offer worth 220 million.
> All figures are taken from the Financial Post of July 6.
> In other words the dominion was prepared to spend 733 millions in return for exclusive rights in the three tax fields. Of this Saskatchewan would have received her share.
> Under the budget proposal Saskatchewan is required to pay the full price fixed for an expenditure by the government of 733 millions but what she gets in return is only a share of a federal expenditure of 198 millions.
> Under the new proposal the government is spending 535 millions less than offered at the convention. On a population basis Saskatchewan would have participated in that expenditure to the extent of approximately 40 millions.
> In other words, under Mr. King's proposal of April 29, 1946, Saskatchewan would have received her proportionate share of 733 millions or 53 millions. Under Mr. Ilsley's new proposal Saskatchewan will receive only 13·7 millions and we give up or lease or lend to the dominion exactly the same things, namely income, corporation and inheritance taxes and our statutory subsidies.

The government of Saskatchewan has taken the position that the offer is better than no offer at all, but it is not good enough considering the needs. The federal government is the one authority that can find funds for housing, for old age pensions, for social security, for health services; and if at this time we do not receive positive leadership from the federal authority, I very much fear that the trend will be accelerated under which the provinces will be unable to deal with these problems, and the municipal authorities will throw up their hands in despair.

After having demonstrated that we could defeat our nazi enemies across the seas, by making extensive efforts, it is strange if we cannot solve the problem of poverty in the midst of plenty in our own country. So I hope that before the resolutions have been passed we shall have some revision of the federal government's proposals to the provinces, and also that there will be some indication that the people in the lower income tax brackets will receive relief, while those in the higher income tax brackets, who are better able to pay, will have their taxes maintained at the high levels which prevailed during the war.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just taken his seat made some reference to woollens. Goodness knows it is hot enough to-night, without that.

(Translation):

I suffer from the heat to-night. I am sorry that Mr. Speaker is not in the chair at the present moment, so I could tell him how much

I sympathize with with him because he has to wear an additional garment in this period of hot weather. I have nothing to suggest for his comfort, but I have some suggestions which I shall make in English concerning the hon. members.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, this business of calling parliament late in the year is getting to be a habit, and it is perfect nonsense. Let us get down to work early next year—and every year—and not have to sit here until late in the year. But this practice of calling parliament late has become well-known government policy; it has been the same since I have been in the House of Commons. It has been a policy of, "Put everything off; put everything off; keep putting everything off". I say that is not a real policy, at all.

When one asks what the government's policy is he is told, "Oh, we will give it to you in good time." But it is always the same old story—"Put it off; put it off".

Before saying a few words about the budget, I should like to make some other observations. At this time of the year, Mr. Speaker, it gets hot. I sympathize with you, sir; I sympathize with the clerk; I sympathize with the assistant clerk; I sympathize with the sergeant at arms— all of you with your regalia. The only one I do not sympathize with is the deputy speaker, because he has not got his regalia yet.

I know we wish to observe decorum in the House of Commons. I know we want to do that, by being decently dressed. But it is very hard these days to get ice cream suits; in fact, one cannot get them, although I see one across the floor. He is a pretty lucky man.

Why should members of the House of Commons suffer in weather like this? Why should we not be allowed to sit here in clean white shirts?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Pyjamas?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): We would all be better off. All this business of having to wear coats, and things like that, in the House of Commons, is all very well; we want to observe the decorum of the house. But I put this down, too, to lack of policy on the part of the government.

An hon. MEMBER: You cannot call it extravagance.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Custom is a funny thing. In the old days soldiers were not soldiers unless they wore red coats, and had their buttons shined. But the last war taught us something different. As a Progressive Conservative and, as a matter of fact, as a darned good Tory as well, I say that if we are going to have to put up with the vagaries of the party in power to-day, then certainly the least they can do for us would be to give some attention to the health and comfort of members in the house by letting us take our coats off.

I like to see hon. members properly dressed. Indeed, I recall when Charlie Dunning came to the house to give his budget he was always well dressed, wearing his morning coat and his pin-striped trousers. He looked well in them, too. I should like to follow his example, and be well dressed, too. We had great respect for him.

But times have changed. I noticed that when the present minister gave his budget speech he did not wear a morning coat or striped trousers, but just an ordinary business suit. And, after having looked at the budget and having seen what is in it, I think it would have been much more appropriate if the minister had worn his mourning suit—spelled "m o u r n i n g".

I now address myself to the budget, and what I shall describe as a presentation for Canada. The author was the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, his assistants, the bureaucrats and the unrealistic brain-trusters. The name of his presentation is "The Government's Great Extravaganza. Continuous performance, at high cost to the taxpayers of Canada; come and be disillusioned!"

Mr. GRAYDON: No rain checks?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What I think of this budget is that it is a budget of remote control, so remote from the people of Canada who are in business that it is removed entirely from all realistic business and all life.

Making these few observations in the budget debate my thoughts go back to 1945, in the spring of which year we had no budget. Individuals who were in business had to wait until the fall of that year before they knew where they stood. Certainly it was not for lack of asking for a budget. Of course we know why it was not brought down in the spring of 1945. There was an election in sight, and the government was simply scared to death to declare its position.

Again this year we began to wonder if we were going to have a budget. Again it was not for any lack of asking when it would be brought down. Finally, we waited until June 27 before it was received. Everybody knows that, so far as business is concerned, it is necessary to have the budget brought down in the early part of the year. But it is becoming a habit—I hope it does not become chronic—to bring the budget down late. Delay is not good. This procedure simply goes to show the government's uncertainty of mind.

The budget, when it was finally brought down, has demonstrated a lack of determination on the part of the minister and his bureaucrats as to where the government is going.

Before I forget, while I am talking about bureaucrats, I wish to congratulate the minister upon the announcement that was made, and as reported in the press, respecting his having a bit of a holiday. I hope he has a long voyage, and that he gets as far away from those unrealistic bureaucrats as he possibly can. If he does, I know he will be a darned sight better man when he returns.

The budget shows a failure on the part of the government to face issues before us. They try to face them, but only succeed in facing them both ways. To my mind, the budget has been prepared by impractical theorists. I would ask the minister, what businessmen were consulted in its preparation? Is there anything practical in it? I am certain that no businessmen of any standing have been consulted in the preparation of this budget.

The minister may say that he could not bring down the budget earlier this year until such time as an agreement had been reached between the dominion and the provinces at the conference. That is no excuse. I am sure that the minister knew or he should have known or had a pretty good idea that the conference could not reach an agreement in view of his lack of give-and-take. The attitude of the dominion government has been uncompromising, rigid; there has been no spirit of compromise, no spirit of good will. How could there be, when everybody knows that the whole attitude of the government in connection with this matter was nothing more or less than political? The conference has not failed. Progress has been made, and another sitting should take place at the earliest possible moment. It may be, however, that the unwillingness to compromise and the lack of patience and the fact that the minister has now drawn the big stick may mean that the day will have to be put forward when an agreement can be reached.

As I said before, the budget should have been brought down earlier. It is unfair to business and unfair to individuals to make them wait to this late day in the year to make their plans and to have to carry on with a feeling of uncertainty.

But now that the budget has been brought down, and after all the promises and all the forecasting by the minister—it will be remembered how the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) made a big speech in Renfrew and told everybody how much of a reduction we were to have in taxation—after all that, what a shock this budget has been to the House of Commons, the members of parliament and to the people of this country; and after listening to the speeches which have been made by members opposite we know what an awful shock it has been to them too and what an awful time they are going to have defending it.

This budget is probably the craziest fiscal doctrine ever brought down in the history of this country—and I mean crazy. It is absolutely the craziest thing that has ever been brought down. That is its one outstanding feature. As one listened to it and read it, one fact could no longer be hidden, and that is the administrative ineptitude of this government. Evidence of this has been accumulating over a great length of time. The government can think of nothing but spending hundreds of millions of dollars, and they have no practical ideas about where we are going.

Another fact about the budget is that at the very time when boldness is needed it shows a remarkable lack of courage, the greatest timidity in any budget to which I have ever listened. It is full of political promises. The taxpayers are asked to accept a poor measure of relief which will be operative for only three months of next year. Never has parliament been asked to approve tax reductions such as these. They are inoperative in the fiscal year in which they are introduced. If anybody can tell me that that has ever been done before, I should like to know about it. Not only that, but parliament has no power to guarantee financial programmes beyond the period from April to March to give any further relief to the poor old taxpayer. We are not even sure that we are to have this relief next year, because the government has other commitments.

We have a deficit of $300,000,000, and proposals to pay the provinces some $414,000,000; probably further increases in the children's allowance, as well as government non-war commitments, and there is no endeavour on the part of the government to cut administrative costs. All this is reckless and unrealistic in the face of stern realities as we see them to-day. What hope is there when all these commitments which I have mentioned are taken into account?

Another feature of the budget, which, to my mind, is blind stupidity, is its failure to make the tax reductions operative now, particularly for the low and middle income groups. The budget should have allowed them more "take-home pay" and should also have given some relief now to business from the excessive burden of taxation. In failing to give this relief now, the minister has closed the door to the only important stimulus to insure production at reasonable prices and also to maintain a high level of employment and national income, which are so essential for sound reconversion and stabilization. Last year the Minister of Finance stated:

> During the war there has been built up a system of taxation which is discouraging to investment, to enterprise and to consumer expenditures . . . I recognize that in the course of six years war-time taxation has begun to blunt incentives, and if continued indefinitely will paralyse the development of industry and trade.

He went on to emphasize:

> . . . the great and harmful effect which our present high personal income tax is having in discouraging work and initiative in all groups at a time when we need a rapid expansion of employment and a willing mobility of labour.

Believing this, why has the minister not the courage to act on his own convictions? If he believes in production, why continue to blunt the incentive and aid in paralyzing the development of industry and trade, and continue the great and harmful effects of the present high income taxes?

The minister is so imbued with the danger of inflation that we have these timid proposals put forward in the budget. On the other hand, the minister thinks he is taking a great big chance, for in the final quarter of the fiscal year he is going to reduce taxation. Is it not true that the high taxes on corporations and the present labour unrest are a great detriment to production? That vital fact has been demonstrated in industries such as building supplies. Increased production means the use of more than one shift and possibly overtime. What industry is going to run itself into the ground, wear out its machinery and depreciate its assets by a two or three-shift operation under present circumstances? What industry is going to exhaust its resources for the sake of paying excessive taxes? What incentive has a workman to work full time when he receives so little extra "take-home pay"?

The excess profits tax may have been justified in war time when it was operative because of the patriotism and war spirit which then prevailed. In those days the people were not interested in making money; they were interested only in turning out goods because they knew that if supplies were not forthcoming for the allies they would not have to worry in the future about what would happen to them. As I say, the excess profits tax may have been justifiable in war time, but it is folly to encourage waste and to encourage extravagance. The minister knows that as well as I. If this habit of waste and extravagance is continued it will put Canada and Canadian manufacturers in an unenviable and disadvantageous position in the markets of the world when competing for foreign trade.

Furthermore, in a growing country like Canada such a policy hampers to a great extent young growing businesses. It is also grossly unfair to certain industries which put up with it during the war for patriotic purposes and who, through no fault of their own, experienced abnormally low profits during the basic period 1936-39. Is it not obvious that a sizeable reduction in the tax of the workers would mean an immediate increase in "take-home pay", which in turn would mean an immediate increase in the amount of pay that could be taxed?

Such a policy would have a tremendous effect in discouraging strikes. If there had been a sizeable decrease in the taxation on those men who are making reasonable salaries I doubt very much if the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) would have had to put the steel works under a controller.

The cost of living has been rising steadily, which rise stems from the withdrawal of subsidies. These subsidies have been paid for by the workers themselves; they provided the subsidies. To my mind, the tax proposals proposed for three months of next year would no more than balance the practical increased cost of living, not the theoretical increase. A sizeable decrease in taxation of workers would stimulate production. It would provide some incentive and give some hope to the workers of earning a decent living. It would increase the national income and the revenue therefrom.

I realize it has cost a lot of money to fight this war to preserve our freedom, and we must pay for it. That may take more than a generation; certainly it will be more than one short year before we can expect any great decrease in our taxes. But this is no time for timidity; bold action is required. The minister and his bureaucrats are imbued with the fear of inflation, or perhaps I should say the theoretical danger of inflation because there is still the law of supply and demand. The people of Canada are beginning to see the results of this two-faced product, the budget.

The answer to inflation is greater production, and our object in Canada should be to use every means possible to produce the goods that are wanted, to produce them in greater volume so that there will be more goods at reasonable prices rather than fewer goods at high prices. That was the advice given to the minister and it is sound advice. The minister contributed some advice for the businessmen. He urged them to do everything to hold prices down and get volume up. That is as far as the minister went; that is where he missed the boat. He should have spoken to a wider audience, he should have spoken to labour and given them some hope of an increased "take-home pay". The businessmen cannot do everything, but incentive can and there is no incentive in this budget.

Labour is the vital factor, often the dominant factor in determining prices. The attitude of labour and its leaders will have much to do in determining whether prices are kept down to reasonable levels. The attitude of labour will be the determining factor to a great extent on the action taken by this government in the way of tax relief now, not next year. What is the other factor? It is the consuming public. Already there are signs that the consuming public is far from satisfied with either the flow or the quality of goods which are at present being produced.

We may see again a repetition of what happened after the last war when the public went on a buying strike. Of necessity that was a detriment to business, a detriment to labour and a detriment to everybody else. A depression followed, and this may be the result of a budget that is timid as far as taxation is concerned. The budget is too little, too late. The ministers and their advisers could not make up their minds whether to pep up or pep down business. This is just another example of government policy—too little, too late.

We can see the results of this high taxation, both personal and corporation, upon the production of houses for the veterans of this war. Material is in short supply because there is no incentive to produce. Labour has no incentive to work beyond a certain number of hours a week because of the small amount of extra "take-home pay". What further folly is proposed? To my mind, this is just silly. I do not know who thought this up. When production is so necessary it is proposed that where a husband and wife are working, everything that the wife makes over $250 must be taken from the exemption of the husband. Those are the exemptions proposed, although it is true that they will apply for only three months of next year.

Most things are in short supply to-day, but there is something else that is very necessary and we have it if only we will take advantage of it. There is a tremendous potential buying power among the Canadian people, and certainly the incentive to produce should be provided.

One word about the housing situation. There is no doubt about it that as far as overcrowding in my riding in Toronto is concerned, it is the direct responsibility of this government. I have pointed out, time after time in this house, what would happen, and I suggested precisely that which did happen in regard to the obvious increase in the number of employees at Malton and the people on the outskirts of the city. I pointed out that there were upwards of 25,000 workers alone who had to be housed, not taking into consideration their dependents. Not only do these people have to travel from twenty to twenty-five miles to and from work every day, but the situation is so serious in that city, and more especially in my riding, that efforts should have been made to meet the housing shortage. Wartime housing was put up in other towns and cities, but we never got a five-cent piece unless we yelled for it. The people occupying wartime houses in other cities and towns are still occupying them. I submit that wartime houses should have been put up in the proximity of these plants; but, time after time, when I questioned the Minister of Munitions and Supply as to what he would do to relieve the situation, in view of the fact that these people had done the best they could, I got no satisfactory reply. We have a situation of overcrowding which is, to use a slang phrase, like nobody's business —fifty-three people living in one house, and all that sort of thing. As a matter of fact, I am sick and tired of talking about it, because nothing has been done to improve matters. There has been a lot of talk about what will be done, but that does not provide houses. When I brought the seriousness of this situation to the attention of the Minister of Munitions and Supply the answer I received was that Toronto ought to look after its own housing.

I now come to another important matter and that is economy, and the inability of the ministry to cope with necessary economy after the war. Some figures have been quoted as to the total number of employees of the government of Canada, including employees of boards and commissions appointed as of March 31, 1945, and March 31, 1946, and also as to salaries, wages and allowances paid to such employees in the month of March of each of those years. I want it distinctly understood that I am not talking about the regular civil service but about boards, commissions and so on. These figures are derived from sessional paper 98 and a sessional paper

I received last year. Having looked into them two or three times, I find omissions, so that I do not know whether they are correct. Certainly some of them are incorrect and that is why I wish to quote them again to-night, because some of these figures will shock hon. members.

Some figures have been quoted by other hon. members as well as by myself, in which a comparison is made of different years. I pointed out, as other hon. members have done, that there has been a reduction of only some 900 in the number of these employees. I noted that there was one omission. I do not know how many others there are and therefore I got a supplementary return to-day. In the last return, March 31, 1946, there is an omission. The national harbours board had 1,890 employees, and salaries and wages paid for the month of March were $289,429—quite a sizeable amount. This shows that, instead of a reduction of 900 from March 1, 1945, to March 1, 1946, there was an increase of 900, and an increase in wages of $1,080,691. This does not tell the whole story. There were others in the employ of another government company which will further swell the rolls. That is War Assets Corporation. As of March 31, 1946, there were 5,413 employees. I have not the monthly payroll and so I shall have to give an estimate. What does this all add up to? It shows that, instead of the meagre reduction which I stated in the house once before, of 900, there has been an increase altogether of 6,046 employees, or a total increase in payroll of $4,500,000 yearly. That, as I say, is an estimate. I understand that it is nearer $5 million, but I am putting it at the smaller amount. This brings the total number of employees to 156,657, and the total payroll for Canada to $245 million a year.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott) this afternoon spoke about controllable expenditures. He suggested that we had controllable expenditures of something like $200 million. But, Mr. Speaker, there is $245 million there in the payroll of Canada. What nonsense it is for him to say that there is only $200 million of controllable expenditures.

Not only that, but there seems to be no effort on the part of the administration to reduce rather than to increase. It means, taking an average of three in a family, that 475,000 people are being supported by the rest of the taxpayers of Canada. We cannot stand it. We have not enough people in Canada to pay these salaries. Economy must be practised, and there does not seem to be any reason why the government should not make an effort in this direction. But no effort will ever be made by this administration which is so inept at reducing salaries.

When one considers some of the departments of government and sees increases in so many, he can only come to the conclusion that no effort is being made by the administration. Let me run through a few of them. The minister says that some moderate increases have been made. Well, I do not think the increase there up to $245 million is moderate, considering all the other things that are going on at the present time. Take the Department of Agriculture. In March, 1945, we had 4,185 employees. I should think that in agriculture the country would need more people during the war to take care of the requirements, but we find we have now 4,606, or an increase of nearly 500. Take the civil service commission. In 1945 the figure was 586; to-day it is 713. Take the minister's department, the comptroller of the treasury. In 1945 it had 7,747 employees; to-day there are 9,232. I should say these figures are given as of March each year. In external affairs there were 340 employees in 1945, this year 625. In the finance department, another department of the minister, there were 765 employees in March 1945; there are now 827. In the mint there were 161 in 1945 and 286 in 1946. In fisheries there were 530 in 1945; there are now 620. In justice there were 1,023 in 1945; there are now 1,114.

I now come to the army, navy and air force. I shall take only some of them. Here we have the conditions which the hon. member for York South (Mr. Cockeram) described a little while ago. The air force had 12,524 employees in 1945. They have now only 5,936. The army had 16,683 in 1945, and there is a reduction of fewer than 3,000 There are now 13,701. The navy had 13,542 in 1945 and they still have 10,187 civilians in the Department of Naval Affairs at the present time. What in the world do they do with all these people? Of course, the Department of National Health and Welfare has gone away up.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I wanted to pay a compliment to one department.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Continue.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The department of printing has set a good example. With all the extra work that it has had to do it had only 759 employees last year, and in March of this year it had 774. Probably they need more.

I want it firmly understood that I am not criticizing the people who are in the employ of the government. Possibly some of the departments are understaffed. I know something of the conditions of work in the income tax branch in Toronto. They are packed in there worse than any Norwegian sardine. There is overcrowding which does not lend itself to efficiency. You cannot bring more people there and pack them in and expect to have anything done. They need decent conditions under which to work. I do not know the conditions under which they work, but I wish to see them decently housed. I do know something about the income tax department in Toronto but not anywhere else. These people have responsible positions and they deserve to be decently accommodated. It is an inescapable fact that if we needed 150,000 people in March, 1945, when the war was on, we do not need as many people in civilian jobs to-day.

This administration have become war-minded; they have been thinking in hundreds of millions and billions of dollars and they are now incapable of grasping the need for economy in an endeavour to give the taxpayers some relief. After all, the taxpayers need some consideration. It is beyond my comprehension why, now that the war is over, a reduction of staff does not take place. A great number of these employees, good employees, could be returned to productive employment.

On motion of Mr. Sinnott the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 10.40 p.m.

Monday, July 15, 1946

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. FLEMING—REFERENCE TO REPORT IN TORONTO "DAILY STAR", JULY 13

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In the Toronto Daily Star, the issue of Saturday, July 13, on page 11, in a report of the budget debate of July 12, there appears this paragraph, affecting myself.

Donald Fleming (Prog. Cons., Toronto-Eglinton) declared present income tax collection methods "educate our people to become professional scoundrels and rascals." He demanded exemptions for single persons be raised to $1,500 and for married persons to $3,000,—

[Mr. D. G. Ross.]

I interject there, Mr. Speaker, that I never said any such thing. The remainder of the sentence is:

—and called the tax reductions in the budget "phantom" cuts.

Mr. Speaker, I did call the reductions in the budget "phantom cuts", but that is the only accuracy in the entire statement which I have read. The criticism that I offered of tax collection methods was on a quite different point; and I should be the last person in the world to say that Canadians were, even in spite of these methods, being educated to become professional scoundrels and rascals.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

TABLING OF FINAL REPORT OF COMMISSION OF INQUIRY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table copies of the final report of the royal commission appointed under order in council P.C. 411 on February 5 to "investigate the facts relating to and the circumstances surrounding the communication by public officials and other persons in positions of trust of secret and confidential information to the agents of a foreign power."

There have thus far been three interim reports by the commission, all of which have been tabled in the house. These are as follow: first interim report, March 2, 1946, tabled March 14, 1946; second interim report, March 14, 1946, tabled March 15, 1946; third interim report, March 29, 1946, tabled March 29, 1946.

The final report, which I am now tabling, as hon. members will observe is dated June 27. I think I should make it clear that the physical work of printing the first copy of the report for presentation was not completed until July 12. It has been received only to-day by the governor in council to whom it is addressed.

I have gone through the report rather hurriedly and have noted some of the outstanding features. I have thought that the house would wish to have something in the nature of a resumé, but the report is a very lengthy one, with its quotations, appendices and the like, so what I am giving is not intended to be in any way all-embracing, but simply essential features.

The circumstances in which it was decided to appoint the royal commission of inquiry are well known. It is not necessary to review them to-day. The investigation has been completed; it confirms the seriousness of the situation which the government asked the commission to investigate.

In this connection, however, I should like to quote a paragraph from the report, page 87, which relates to the position of the Soviet ambassador. It is as follows:

The evidence before us is that those members of the embassy who were engaged in improper and inadmissible activities operated in special sections of the embassy the operations of which were quite distinct from the official and legitimate activities of the Soviet embassy, and that the Soviet ambassador, representing in Canada the government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, had no part in them.

As a result of findings contained in its interim reports, proceedings have been instituted in a number of cases and four persons have been convicted and sentenced. Other cases are awaiting trial, and I shall not refer to them.

When the inquiry was undertaken, I said that prosecutions would be instituted where the evidence warranted it. This has been done, but prosecutions and punishments are essentially secondary matters. Publicity, education and full understanding are better preventives of any recurrence of any such state of affairs as that disclosed by the report of the royal commission. In that process of education and understanding, the report itself is a very important instrument. It deserves the thoughtful study of all Canadians who feel that there is no place for espionage and underhand activities in the public life of our country.

I shall not on this occasion attempt to comment on the contents of the report. With appendices it runs to over 700 pages. It requires and will repay careful study. I desire however to place upon the record a summary of the findings of the royal commission and the statement of their recommendations as set forth in sections XII and XIII of the report.

Section XII

I. We report that the following public officials and other persons in positions of trust or otherwise have communicated, directly or indirectly, secret and confidential information, the disclosure of which might be inimical to the safety and interests of Canada, to the agents of a foreign power:

1. Eric Adams
2. J. Scotland Benning
3. Raymond Boyer
4. H. S. Gerson
5. Israel Halperin
6. David Gordon Lunan
7. Allan Nunn May
8. Edward W. Mazerall
9. Matt. S. Nightingale
10. F. W. Poland
11. David Shugar
12. Durnford P. Smith
13. Kathleen Mary Willsher
14. Emma Woikin

II. We report that we have been unable to identify the following persons named under "cover names" in the documents and there definitely stated, to have been members of Zabotin's ring:

"Galya"
"Gini"
"Golia"
"Green"
"Surensen"

III. We also report the following facts relating to and the circumstances surrounding such communication:

1. There exists in Canada a fifth column organized and directed by Russian agents in Canada and in Russia.

2. Within the fifth column there are several spy rings.

3. We have been able to identify many of the members of one of these rings, namely, that of which Colonel Zabotin was the head in Canada.

4. Membership in Communist organizations or a sympathy towards Communist ideologies was the primary force which caused these agents to agree to do the acts referred to in their individual cases.

5. The persons named in paragraph I were members of Colonel Zabotin's organization.

6. Without documents such as Gouzenko placed before us we cannot identify any non-Russian members of the other rings.

7. There was an organization whose duty it was to procure false Canadian passports and other citizenship documents for the use of agents engaged in fifth column activities, in Canada or elsewhere.

8. Zabotin and his assistants were helping to supervise and finance the work of an organization of agents operating in certain European countries. At least one person temporarily in Canada as an employee of the international labour office was a member of this organization, namely, Germina (Hermina) Rabinovitch.

9. Members of the staff of the Russian embassy at Ottawa who were actively engaged in inadmissible espionage activities are named in Section II.7.

IV. The following persons who may not come within the category of "public officials and other persons in positions of trust or otherwise" were members of Zabotin's organization and took an active part in recruiting agents, acting as contacts and securing and transmitting such secret and confidential information:

Sam Carr
Fred Rose.

V. Many of the persons named in paragraph I hereof were also actively engaged in the organization of "cells" from which agents were recruited, and in addition the following persons were organizers of such cells, or media of communication between espionage agents, or both:

Agatha Chapman
Freda Linton
S. S. Burman
Henry Harris.

VI. The following were active in procuring a false Canadian passport for a Russian agent who was operating in the United States:

Sam Carr
Henry Harris
John Soboloff, M.D.
W. M. Pappin.

VII. The following persons named in the documents did not so far as the evidence discloses take any active part in the subversive activities, but would have done so if required;

Norman Veall
Fred Chubb
Jack Isidor Gottheil.

VIII. The names of certain other persons are mentioned in the documents merely because Moscow desired the names of all members of certain government staffs. Outside of those specifically named elsewhere in this report, there is no necessity for these names to be mentioned.

IX. The names of certain other persons were mentioned in such a context that it was considered advisable to examine them and to investigate their activities. In each case we were satisfied that their conduct has been entirely proper and that while the Russians designed to draw some of them into the net in future, having in anticipation of doing so actually given them cover-names, such hopes were in our opinion completely without foundation and the objects of those hopes were unaware that they were being considered. Among these we refer to Colonel Jenkins by name, because he has been mentioned by name in the public press.

X. The names of a number of persons, in government service and otherwise, who were members of secret Communist cells have been disclosed by this inquiry. These names appear in the volume of evidence. As there is no evidence that these persons were implicated in, or aware of, the espionage networks, we do not consider it necessary to mention these names in this report.

Section XIII

Recommendations

We respectfully recommend:

1. That, because of the introduction into the evidence, necessarily and unavoidably of secret technical data, the publication of which, according to the witnesses most concerned, would not be in the public interest at this time, none of the evidence or exhibits relating to any top secret, secret, restricted or confidential matters be published except with the approval of the government in consultation with the heads of the services, departments or organizations concerned.

2. That the proper authorities in each service, department and organization take such steps as may be considered desirable and effective, in the light of this report and of the evidence and exhibits, to prevent further unauthorized transmission of information and to set up further safeguards.

3. That all security measures should be coordinated and rendered as uniform as possible.

4. That the evidence and exhibits accompanying this report be placed before the proper persons in the various services, departments and organizations affected, for study so that a complete evaluation of the information and material handed over can be made in each case to ascertain in detail what has, and what has not, been compromised. That consideration be given to whether the findings so made should be communicated to the proper authorities in the United Kingdom and the United States.

5. That the Official Secrets Act, 1939, be studied in the light of the information contained in this report and in the evidence and exhibits and, if it is thought advisable, that it be amended to provide additional safeguards.

6. That consideration be given to any additional security measures which would be practical to prevent the infiltration into positions of trust under the government of persons likely to commit acts such as those described in this report.

7. That the practice and procedure in connection with the issue of Canadian passports be revised. While not elsewhere referred to in this report, we have had evidence indicating that naturalization and birth certificates have also been improperly obtained. We therefore suggest that the conditions surrounding the issue of these documents might be the subject of consideration by the proper authority.

In conclusion I should like to say a word of appreciation of the service to the state which has been rendered by the members of the royal commission, by the counsel associated with them and by the officers of the public service who have assisted them in their investigations. Their task has been long and arduous. They have worked at it unremittingly and with a high sense of public duty.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I notice that the name of Doctor David Shugar is included. Doctor Shugar has since been acquitted by the court. Should not that fact have been recorded in presenting this report to the house? Once a man has been tried and acquitted, I think a note should be made of the fact in order to clear up the situation.

Mr. HOMUTH: He was not tried. He was not even sent up for trial.

Mr. COLDWELL: The case was dismissed.

An hon. MEMBER: He was not even committed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am unable to say at the moment whether the reference here covers all that relates to Doctor Shugar. It is possible there is another connection to which this may have reference. I am sure, however, the public will be happy to take notice of what my hon. friend has said.

STRIKE IN STEEL INDUSTRY—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to standing order 31, I beg leave to move the adjournment of the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, namely, the threat to the whole Canadian economy which now exists due to the unsatisfactory relations between management and labour, accelerated as it now is by the present strike in the steel industry.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Calgary West courteously notified me of his intention to make this motion. I have had the opportunity of considering it and will not need to delay the house further by examining the motion. The hon. member is asking for leave to move the adjournment of the house to discuss an urgent matter. I must draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that this question is already before the house in the debate on the budget. During that debate, as he knows, it is the privilege of every hon. member to make any suggestion or recommendation to the government that he sees fit, and to discuss any matter which comes under government responsibility; therefore I do not see any urgency to adjourn the house to discuss the matter, and I cannot allow the motion to be proceeded with.

Mr. BRACKEN: I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that no debate is permitted on the decision you have made, but with all deference I must appeal against Your Honour's decision.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I respectfully point out that a large number of members who are interested in this question have already exhausted their right to speak on the budget, and therefore Your Honour's ruling will deny some hon. members the right of expression.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope that I have explained my position clearly to hon. members. The object in moving the adjournment of the house under standing order 31 is to give hon. members an opportunity to discuss an urgent matter. During a session we have two debates, the first one on the address and the second on the budget, during which every hon. member has an opportunity to discuss any matter which comes under the jurisdiction and the administration of the government. In a few minutes the leader of the house will call the order to resume the debate on the budget. When that is done nearly all hon. members will have the opportunity to discuss this matter.

The leader of the C.C.F. party has called my attention to the fact that many hon. members have already spoken and will not be able to take part in the debate. I would answer him by pointing out that only forty-two members out of 242 have spoken thus far on the budget. Moreover, there is an amendment and a subamendment to the motion before the house. As the house knows, hon. members have an opportunity to speak on the subamendment and the amendment, and when that is disposed of they will have another opportunity to speak on the main motion. I believe therefore that it is my duty to refuse the hon. member leave, since, according to the rules of the house there is no urgency to adjourn the house to discuss the matter.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that either it is an urgent matter or it is not. If it is an urgent matter, then Your Honour should allow it to be dealt with now. I have already exhausted my right to speak on the budget, but I should certainly like to speak on this matter, because it is urgent. It cannot be put off on the basis that there is an opportunity on the budget to discuss it. This is an entirely different matter, and hon. members should have an opportunity to express themselves on it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I rise to a point of order—

Mr. HOMUTH: There are five thousand employees in my riding who are threatened with unemployment.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I refer to a decision of Mr. Speaker Black of February 19, 1932? On that occasion Mr. Speaker Black ruled that there was no appeal from the Speaker's decision under standing order 31, and he was sustained by an open vote of this house.

Mr. CASSELMAN: He was wrong then.

Mr. KNOWLES: Which way did the minister vote on that occasion?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It was done by a Tory Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. May I quote from Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, page 747. On February 19, 1932, Mr. Ralston appealed from the Speaker's ruling on that occasion and he was not sustained. The house sustained Mr. Speaker when he ruled that there was no appeal from the decision of the Speaker under standing order 31.

Mr. MacINNIS: Did the Speaker rule that the matter was not urgent?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The Speaker ruled that there was no appeal from his decision.

Mr. MacINNIS: How did he rule in the first place?

An hon. MEMBER: Address the Chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE: In the first place the Speaker ruled that it was not a matter of urgent public importance. Mr. Ralston and I appealed from that ruling and we were not sustained.

Mr. KNOWLES: For once the minister was right.

Mr. SPEAKER: Hon. members know perfectly well that a ruling of the Speaker is not debatable. I have given some hon. members the opportunity to speak on this question because I wanted to have their views, but I must say that the Minister of Veterans Affairs is right. I would ask hon. members to turn to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, at page 747, where they will find the following:

February 19, 1932

Honourable George Black, Speaker.

The Speaker's refusal to permit an appeal from his decision that it is not urgent to adjourn the house for the purpose of discussing an urgent matter of public importance being appealed from was confirmed by the house.

I would therefore ask the house to proceed with its business.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The ruling of Mr. Speaker Black and the ruling of Your Honour to-day are on a different footing. Mr. Speaker Black's ruling was based on something which is not comparable with the motion now before the house; the circumstances are altogether different. This is a question of urgency.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask hon. members to proceed with the business of the house.

Mr. BRACKEN: Mr. Speaker, may I have the privilege of making an observation with respect to your ruling? The Minister of Veterans Affairs has referred to a ruling of the Speaker on February 19, 1932, and you have used it as an argument in support of your present decision. I believe the house should be allowed to have that earlier decision read to them. It is as follows—page 747, Beauchesne, third edition:

Mr. Ralston, from his place in the house, asked leave under standing order 31, to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, and stated the subject to be:

The recent dismissal of between 200 and 300 officers and men of the Royal Canadian Air Force without regard to their families, their overseas service or their period of enlistment for service, and the embarrassing situation which may arise if they were forced by the necessity for employment to accept service with another nation.

Mr. Speaker ruled that the statement was not in order and that the matter was not one of urgent public importance and moreover that there was no appeal from his decision.

Mr. Ralston appealed from the Speaker's refusal to permit an appeal from his decision.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is the point.

Mr. BRACKEN: That is the appeal I am making now—an appeal against Your Honour's right to make such a decision. The fact that the house supported the Speaker fourteen years ago on an entirely different matter is no reason why the house should support the Speaker to-day on this important matter.

An hon. MEMBER: No doubt that will help the steel strike.

Mr. GLEN: If I may be allowed a word, Mr. Speaker, subsection 3 of standing order 31, which the hon. member has quoted, reads:

He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to the Speaker who, if he thinks it in order and of urgent public importance, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the house.

On several occasions when I occupied the chair the same question arose, and I had occasions to refuse to allow an appeal, basing my ruling upon the decisions already quoted by the Minister of Veterans Affairs that it is a matter lying solely within the discretion of the Speaker himself whether there is that urgency which should compel the house to discuss the matter. The Speaker now has given his ruling, in which he is supported by the ruling given by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black) when he was Speaker, and by another ruling appearing on page 752, given by Mr. Casgrain when he was Speaker. The rule and practice, and I think the intention of the standing order, has been that the Speaker shall be the judge of whether or not there is that urgency which would justify an appeal to the Chair. On several occasions I must say I ruled that there was no appeal from this decision, and that no appeal should be granted.

Mr. SPEAKER: I should like to put on record the ruling just mentioned by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen), that given by the Hon. Pierre Casgrain, then Speaker, on March 10, 1939, appearing at page 752 of Beauchesne:

The Speaker's opinion that a certain matter is not urgent and cannot be discussed under a motion to adjourn the house in pursuance of standing order 31 is not subject to appeal because it is not a decision on a point of order.

I ask the house now to proceed with its business.

Mr. BRACKEN: Then I must rise to appeal your decision that there can be no appeal, and I do so on the ground set out by Colonel Ralston, in which he was supported by the Minister of Veterans Affairs fourteen years ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We were turned down by the free judgment of this house.

Mr. BRACKEN: We may be turned down again to-day.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry, but I must refuse the hon. member permission. I have cited the two authorities, the rulings by Hon. Mr. Black and Hon. Mr. Casgrain.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no appeal.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, are we to understand that this house is not in control of its own rules, that we are bound by one Speaker for the next? I think this is wrong.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say one word in regard to my understanding of the Speaker's decision in this matter? As has been pointed out, the rule requires that His Honour the Speaker be given notice of the motion in advance. That is to enable His Honour to ascertain whether the matter is one which in his opinion should be discussed at this time in the manner indicated, namely by a motion to adjourn the house. In order to reach a decision on that matter Mr. Speaker asks himself whether there are other opportunities for hon. gentlemen to discuss this matter at this time; and His Honour has stated to the house that the debate on the budget which is proceeding at the present time affords hon. members opportunity to discuss the question and that therefore there is no reason for adjourning the house at this time to permit of its being discussed as a matter of urgent public importance. Those are the facts; that is the sequence of the procedure. The rule which says there is no appeal in the matter follows logically because of the discretion given His Honour the Speaker in the first instance to say whether or not the house has an opportunity to discuss the matter apart from the motion to adjourn. The Speaker has decided that this opportunity is afforded in the debate on the budget which is now in progress.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): As the humble creator of this difficulty may I say just one word; and I speak with the greatest respect and deference to you, Mr. Speaker. I think you have gone astray. Surely the whole point of this rule is to give precedence to the matter because of its urgency. That is the basis of the right to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 31. As for the budget debate, no doubt someone adjourned it when we last met, and no doubt others are ready to proceed with it; but I think it is on the basis of that urgency that all such motions must be entertained by this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Questions.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SUBSIDIES ON SOY BEANS

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East):

What was the amount of subsidies paid on soy beans in each of the years 1941-1945 inclusive?

Mr. MAYHEW:

(a) Domestic subsidies

Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Limited has paid the following amounts by way of domestic subsidy on soy beans during the periods listed below:—

April 1, 1941 to March 31, 1942...	nil
Aripl 1, 1942 to March 31, 1943...	nil

April 1, 1943 to March 31, 1944	62,589 30
April 1, 1944 to March 31, 1945	171,571 50
April 1, 1945 to March 31, 1946	42,978 36
April 1, 1946 to May 31, 1946..	55,954 00
	$333,292 05
Accountable advances.....	506,113 62*
Total	$839,405 67

* This figure represents accountable advances paid against subsidy claims, to be adjusted following determination of actual oil and meal yield from soy beans imported and depending upon the profits position of each applicant at the end of his fiscal year.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK—LOAN TO ACADIA COAL MINES

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. Did the Acadia Coal Mines Limited, of Calgary, Alberta, during May, 1946, apply to the Industrial Development Bank, Ottawa, for a loan of $100,000 to improve its plant and expand coal production?
2. If so, was the application rejected, and for what reason?
3. What action has the federal government taken to provide financial assistance to coal producers in order to increase coal production?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

BAIE COMEAU, FORESTVILLE AND GRANDES BERGERONNES AIRPORTS

Mr. DORION:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, reports and other documents in the possession of the Department of National Defence for Air, relating to the construction, development and maintenance of the airports at Baie Comeau, Forestville and Grandes Bergeronnes, Quebec?

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENT AS TO LOAN PROVISIONS CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the National Housing Act, 1944, and more particularly:

(1) to provide for changes in the administration of the existing housing legislation, consequent rewording of definitions and references throughout the Act;

(2) to provide for His Majesty to join with approved lending institutions in the making of loans for the construction of homes for home owners who have a leasehold interest only in the land upon which the home is to be built and to take security in such form as may be deemed necessary to protect the interest of His Majesty and the lending institution;

(3) to lengthen the period within which a joint loan to home owners may be repaid from twenty years to twenty-five years;

(4) to authorize Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation on behalf of His Majesty to enter into agreements with builders who will undertake to build a specified number of houses to be financed under the National Housing Act, 1944, and to offer each such house for sale first to veterans and then to others, at a price not in excess of the selling price fixed in the agreement in consideration for the undertaking of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to purchase such houses from the builders within one year from their completion if they have not been sold;

(5) to authorize Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to make direct loans in outlying areas to borrowers engaged in mining or lumbering, to assist them to provide low or moderate-cost housing for rent or sale to their employees and others in the area of the operations of the borrowers with a view to making possible increased employment in connection with the said operations;

(6) to authorize Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to hold, operate and manage and lease on terms satisfactory to the minister, real or personal property owned by His Majesty and made available to the corporation for such purpose, and to authorize the corporation to collect the revenues from such properties and to pay such revenues to the minister, less expenses incurred in connection with such properties and less such compensation to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as may be agreed upon by the minister;

(7) to provide greater facility for the making of joint loans for the construction on farms.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES

ALLOWANCES TO CERTAIN VETERANS UNEMPLOYABLE THROUGH DISABILITY—WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE BOARD

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to make provision for the payment of allowances to or in respect of veterans of a prescribed age and veterans permanently unemployable or incapable of self maintenance through physical or mental disability and widows and orphan children of veterans. Provisions of the bill apply to veterans of the North West Rebellion, the South African war, world war I and world war II. Provision is made for establishing a war veterans' allowance board to administer the Act and for the payment of the salaries of the members and pensions on retirement.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

REPARATIONS

INTER-ALLIED AGENCY—CANADA'S REPRESENTATIVES —ALLOTMENTS TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): On Friday last the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) asked me a question with regard to the distribution of reparations from Germany, as to the channels that would be used for that purpose. At the time I said I was unable to give an answer offhand but that I would give the hon. member a reply at the earliest possible moment. The answer is as follows:

The question of the distribution in Canada of reparation which may be received from Germany is at present under consideration by the interdepartmental committee on reparation. Information has been sought as to the procedures employed in other countries for the distribution of the proceeds from German reparation, but the committee is not yet in a position to make firm recommendations to council on this subject. As regards German industrial equipment, a subcommittee of the interdepartmental committee on reparation has been set up to deal specifically with this problem. The Canadian Manufacturers Association is represented on this subcommittee, and a close liaison is being maintained with Canadian industry in order that the government may be in a position to bid for German equipment most necessary for Canadian economy.

The final disposal of the German ships Huascaran Tiefland, and Weserwehr has not yet been decided, but the authorities in the Department of Transport are arranging for preliminary inspection of these ships.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE IN STEEL INDUSTRY—DUTIES OF CONTROLLER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour, of which I have not been able to give him notice. Has the controller in the steel dispute the duty of negotiating a reasonable settlement between the parties to the dispute—both parties—or, in the alternative, of negotiating on behalf of the companies an agreement for submission for approval of the war labour board or boards?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in replying to the hon. member I am speaking from memory but I shall do my best to answer his question. In the first place, a controller was appointed as I announced in the house last Wednesday. Prior to that we had appointed as commissioner Mr. Justice Roach of the Ontario Supreme Court. He was to act as conciliator. In this case the controller is the employer. The department felt—and I think most hon. members agree—that this was the rational approach to a most difficult situation. This was the form of conciliation which has been peculiar to Canada in these days. It was the form which worked successfully in the packing house dispute, in the dispute connected with the American Can company in Vancouver, in the lumber industry of British Columbia, in the Montreal street railway company dispute, and in the dispute on the inland lakes which took place recently. Unfortunately in this instance however the commissioner did not have a chance to conclude his labours, because the strike in question took place this morning at seven o'clock.

That is a bald statement of the facts. I believe an agreement could have been made. If I might say so, you cannot have things all your own way; everything is on a basis of conciliation. As I have said before, I think we shall live to regret the attitude which has been adopted by certain people. I am not calling any names. There are properly constituted boards composed of employers and employees to settle disputes.

Mr. COLDWELL: I asked my question for the purpose of clarification. The order in council states in section 3 that the controller shall have the authorities and rights of the board of directors of each of the said companies. In section 11 it says that the controller is hereby authorized to apply on behalf of each of the said companies to the appropriate war labour boards for an immediate increase in the wage rates of employees. There seems to be some misunderstanding of method. Does it mean that the controller will negotiate with the employees as the directors would, or that on his own initiative he has to go to the board with a proposal for an increase in wages? That is what I am trying to get at.

Mr. MITCHELL: The judge is commissioner. You must have two things.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am talking about the controller.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am talking about the duties of the judge. He conciliates. This may seem complicated, but it is simple. In the packing house dispute the controller ran the operations of the packing plant. But Mr. Justice Richards of Winnipeg was the commissioner who conciliated the dispute. After agreement they made the necessary recommendations to the regional board in that instance, and an agreement was consummated. The same thing happened in the lumber dispute in British Columbia, and in other disputes.

Mr. MacINNIS: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Has it been drawn to the attention of the Minister of Labour that spots have been taken on the radio to announce penalties in connection with this order in council? Does not the minister consider this a form of intimidation of employees?

Mr. MITCHELL: We are still living in a free country.

An hon. MEMBER: Are we?

Mr. MITCHELL: I hope we are—sometimes I wonder whether we are. However, the order in council is a public document. What objection can there be to its being printed in Hansard or in the newspapers, or to having it announced over the radio? It is just a matter of information.

MASSEY-HARRIS—SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTE IN TORONTO AND BRANTFORD PLANTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, it might not be amiss at this time if I advised the house that another industrial dispute involving several thousand workers in Toronto and Brantford appears to have been settled as a result of the efforts of Mr. Leonard W. Brockington, K.C., C.M.G., Ottawa, who had been appointed by me last week as an industrial disputes inquiry commissioner to deal with questions in dispute between the employees of the Massey-Harris Company Limited in its Toronto and Brantford plants. The employees were represented by the united automobile, aircraft and agricultural implement workers of America.

The commissioner recommended that the dispute be settled on the following basis:

1. A general wage increase of ten cents an hour effective July 1, 1946.

2. The parties to enter into negotiations for a general adjustment of wage rates if there be an advance of four points or any multiple thereof upon the cost of living index for September, 1946, as prepared and published by the dominion bureau of statistics; if the parties are unable to agree on such wage adjustment after thirty days' negotiation, application may be made to the regional war labour board;

3. Two weeks' vacation with pay, effective in 1946, for employees with five years' service.

The company and its employees had previously agreed on a reduction of the work week from 48 to 45 hours, with payment of time and one-half for hours worked in excess of 45 per week.

I understand that the recommendations of the commissioner have been accepted by both the company and the union.

I do not know why this form of approach could not have been carried out in connection with the steel dispute. Might I say again that I am the last man to run away from a dispute but, as I have said before, I do not think industrial disputes can be settled in the House of Commons. It has been my experience for a good many years that it sometimes makes things worse. So far as the record of my department is concerned, I am prepared to defend it in any general debate with anyone, and particularly as to its stand with respect to the question of the settlement of industrial disputes.

In the very nature of things we must follow the basic principles of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. In my judgment it has been the finest piece of legislation ever adopted by any country, because it is predicated upon conciliation, a willingness to give and take between parties in a dispute. If anyone knows of a better way of doing it, let him say so. I should like to learn from any member, or indeed from anyone outside the house, who has a better approach to industrial problems than that which is exemplified in the basic principle found in the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act.

VETERANS LAND ACT

AGREEMENT RESPECTING UTILIZATION OF PROVINCIAL LANDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Will he kindly inform the house of developments in the signing of an agreement between the government of British Columbia and the federal authorities on the utilization of provincial lands for settlement under the Veterans Land Act administration?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): An agreement was signed to-day. I shall table it at the earliest possible moment, and send a copy to my hon. friend.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Friday, July 12, consideration of the motion of Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. MacInnis.

Mr. J. S. SINNOTT (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate you on the manner in which you keep order and decorum in this chamber. Sometimes your tasks are arduous and difficult, and your patience is tried to the limit. Therefore I think a few kind remarks along this line are in order. I wish also to congratulate those who have spoken before me, as I know they have contributed much towards the wisdom of building this great Canada of ours, Canada a nation which is only a child in age compared to what other nations are and has the distinction of having achieved a most enviable record in obtaining results in the winning of the war, a record more outstanding than that of any other country with a comparable population. Canada's achievement in this respect has won not only the support of the Canadian people but the admiration of the whole world. I cannot say too much to compliment those responsible for that magnificent effort, a mighty large share of the credit for which should go to our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King).

Up to the present time I have felt that I should sit back and listen to the more experienced speakers carry on, but after listening to speeches for almost eight months I feel that I have profited sufficiently from the example of my fellow members to be able to contribute something myself. While the budget brought down by the right hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) does not show—

Mr. PROBE: I should like to ask the hon. member what he is quoting from; or, alternatively, I should like to ask you, Mr. Speaker, if the ruling about the reading of speeches still applies.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member knows that according to the rules of the house a member is not supposed to read his speech. I assume he is consulting his notes.

Mr. SINNOTT: I am following rather extended notes. While the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance does not show much of an over-all reduction in taxation, there is one feature of it that the government is emphasizing, and that is, keeping employment at a high level. I was more than pleased on July 5 to hear the Minister of Finance announce several important steps which were being taken in the economic and financial field to prevent undue increases in the cost of living and the cost of production, to improve the effort for price control, to encourage a greater supply of scarce commodities, and to facilitate a stabilization programme which will be orderly and will give the nation protection against adverse developments outside of our borders.

I was pleased to hear the Minister of Finance announce the equalization of the Canadian and United States dollars, but most important of all was the control of rents. I believe many rents are too high, and I urge that the wartime prices and trade board make a strict revision of all rents and continue the controls.

Early post-war developments have been quite favourable, and there has not been the unemployment during demobilization that many were led to expect. Reconversion has proceeded with comparative smoothness and rapidity, and the evils of inflation and deflation have largely been avoided. Interruptions which have resulted from labour troubles have seriously delayed the production and distribution of articles which so many of our people are desirous of obtaining. It is recognized that it would be dangerous to the Canadian economy if price controls were not continued for at least another year.

I particularly wished to emphasize this afternoon the unfailing efforts of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). It has been said by many in this house that most of the time of the house is taken up by agriculture, but I must say that I consider this as one of the most important subjects for discussion. If it were not for the farmer, the fisherman and our primary producers generally, the rest of the nation could not exist. For those who have never milked a cow or done the many chores of the primary producer this may be a joke, but let me say again that without those most important people our economy would falter into oblivion.

Nothing would be a finer gesture than for those who have never done this class of work to take a week after the house prorogues and go through the trials that the primary producer goes through, especially those of the dairy farmer. Some would certainly change their minds as to what he has to go through to make a livelihood for himself and his family. There are two types of farmer, the grain grower and the mixed farmer. The grain grower in these modern times, with all the modern machinery at his disposal, is living a life of leisure in comparison with the mixed farmer. Most certainly he has not the trials and tribulations of the dairy farmer who has to work 365 days a year. Certainly all the dairy farmer earns should never be begrudged and should be encouraged by continuing government subsidies.

In my opinion the Minister of Agriculture has one of the most important positions to fill in the cabinet. It is hard for an outsider or for one on the street to realize just how important this portfolio is, and just how many departments are under his guidance. I am sure every hon. member of the house, on the opposition as well as on the government side, will agree with me when I say that the Minister of Agriculture has carried on his work diligently and sincerely, and has advocated a stabilized price control which will secure and guarantee the primary producer a market which he can depend on for some years to come.

Let me mention some of the divisions of the Department of Agriculture to give you some idea of the magnitude of the minister's task. They include the agricultural food board, price board, agricultural supplies board, meat board, special products board, science service, division of animal pathology, disease research division, bacteriology, botany and plant pathology, chemistry, entomology, division of plant protection, experimental farm service, prairie farm assistance, production service, live stock and poultry division, marketing service, and prairie farm assistance consumers service. I could go on almost indefinitely. All these are run efficiently to the benefit of the whole country under the guiding hand of the Minister of Agriculture. I believe it would be far better for the country as a whole if some of his critics were to go back to their constituencies with the real story of the outstanding contribution that that same Minister of Agriculture is making to the whole of Canada.

There has been a drive by the Winnipeg grain exchange to defy the government's price control policy. They have spent money like water spreading propaganda in every newspaper entitled, "Who dares speak for you, Mr. Prairie Farmer?" advocating higher prices to be more on a par with those in other countries. How long would the price remain stabilized if they had control? How long did they remain controlled after the last war? It would seem that they are making a definite challenge to defy the stabilized long term agreements which the government is advocating. I hope the western farmer will see the real facts behind this propaganda which has been distributed, and I hope that those who have marketed their grain through the Canadian wheat board realize what an effort has been made by the wheat pools and other cooperative agencies to establish a stabilized market. Furthermore I hope the western farmer has not lost sight of or forgotten the equalization payments which he has received and is still receiving from the present government.

I should like to give a few items from a table which I have here to show what the western farmer has received since 1943 in wheat acreage bonuses. These payments were as follows:

	1943	1944	1945
Manitoba	$ 5,053,000	$ 706,000	$133,000
Saskatchewan.	17,091,000	5,341,000	262,000
Alberta	8,872,000	2,934,000	427,000

The payments for prairie farm assistance were as follows:

Manitoba	$ 17,000	$ 164,000
Saskatchewan	6,907,000	2,639,000
Alberta	2,533,000	2,815,000

That is quite a contribution that the government has made to those provinces, but some of those provinces do not appreciate it. No one would like better to see higher prices on all produce and grain than the present government, but in order for our customers to buy over a long period we must make the price attractive enough to discourage the countries from producing grain so that we may accept their commodities.

Let us look at the inflationary trend in other countries. Take even the United States or even England. Those in the lower income brackets are having a terrible time to survive.

Through you, sir, I would like to say a word about the dominion-provincial conference. Some three years ago a plan was submitted to all provincial governments and municipalities for the post-war reconversion period. This complied with plans, and preparations were made accordingly. Then came the first meeting of the dominion-provincial conference, ending in failure; then the second meeting without any further results, and then a third meeting with two of the nine provinces in agreement with the dominion's proposal.

I have in my hand a report from the Winnipeg Free Press that Manitoba has now accepted the dominion's proposal, and Mr. Garson's comment is that he is sorry that an April meeting was not agreed to by all parties. As he says:

> Canadians should understand, however, that the budget speech proposal is much less advantageous than the modified proposal made by the dominion to the conference in April which was then accepted by Manitoba and some other provinces but rejected by certain provinces. The dominion's April proposal provided a plan for the coordination of dominion and provincial policies designed to maximize employment and income, and thus to reduce taxation as a percentage of national income.
> It relieved provinces and municipalities of the major portion of unemployment relief costs. It provided substantially increased federal aid for pensions, social welfare and public health. It gave definite assurance of dominion aid to the construction of national highways and access roads to undeveloped resources, and to provincial and municipal public works timed to stabilize employment and business conditions.

Had this been accepted in April, it was Mr. Garson's belief that it would have been much more beneficial. When I say that two of the provinces have shown their willingness, I should say that three have now agreed on the five year plan. Two provinces which are the most heavily populated believe they will be deprived of some taxation or taxing powers but on the other hand do not realize the tremendous amount of subsidies they will receive in return. Furthermore, the dominion government is anxious to advance the health scheme, reduce the age for old age pensions and put into effect a security programme. I therefore maintain that the time is now here to show the people of Canada that we are prepared to accept our responsibilities.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is hard to understand some of the opposition. They maintain that the government is not doing nearly enough regarding housing, old age pensions, mothers' allowance, hospitalization, and so forth. They are all advocating higher expenditure, and yet in the face of this their financial critic, the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) insists that all the government is doing is tax, tax; spend, spend; but never save. That in my opinion is the surest way to unemployment. On the other hand, we have here a good heading from a good Tory paper, which says, "Government is putting in a stabilized programme to hold prices down."

I wish, Mr. Speaker, to commend through you the Liberal party for their policy of allowing their colleagues to express their views without fear of being read out of the party as has happened in some parts of Canada in other parties. I feel that the only truly democratic way is to allow a man to express himself without fear of reprisals. I also feel that I must try to further the effort of my predecessor, the late John M. Turner, and other members who have expressed their views on dealing with banks and the banking system. In this connection I quote from a speech delivered in the session of 1944 by Mr. Turner, and reported in Hansard of that year, pages 2830 and 2831:

> I believe, sir, that everybody in this house knows that I am not a financial expert, nor do I ever hope to be one; neither am I a mechanical expert and I do not ever expect to be. Perhaps all I know about finance is that a dollar has 100 cents. Nevertheless, when I get in my car in the morning to start to drive I can immediately detect if there is something wrong, although I may not know what it is. That is the way I feel when talking on finance. There is something radically wrong with our whole financial system. The way it is set up it is like a gigantic octopus, choking the very life out of our Canadian nation through the interest system we have adopted. This certainly has to be changed.

Just as an illustration, I hold in my hand a copy of a brief prepared in February of this year by the city of Winnipeg to be presented to Hon. Stuart S. Garson, our premier. Attached to this brief is a statement of the interest paid on debentures by the city of Winnipeg from the year 1930 to 1943, a period of fourteen years, and the staggering interest total for that period of $40,319,694.20. This figure does not include the interest on the greater Winnipeg water district, which happens to run right through my constituency. The interest on this alone amounts to $800,000 a year. Now, Mr. Speaker, if I were to stand here to-day and tell the people of Winnipeg that between now and 1957 they are going to hand out again to the money-lenders an amount close to fifty million dollars for interest, they would think I was not stating the facts. Nevertheless, that did happen before and it can happen again. That city is urgently in need of slum clearance, new homes, hospitals, parks and other public projects, and if we could save only half that amount, say $20 millions or $25 millions, for those purposes, I am sure it would be welcome news not only to Mayor Coulter, but to all the citizens of Winnipeg.

The figures I have given for Winnipeg can, in proportion to population, be duplicated in almost every province, city, town and municipality in Canada. Interest has a stranglehold on governments of all kinds and acts as a hydraulic brake against any district progressing to its fullest extent. How can they be expected to progress, carrying this terrific load?

Let us take a look at our own financial set-up in the dominion. Before the war this nation's debt as of March 31, 1939 was $3,710,610,592.87 and interest charges on same were $127,995,616.75; to-day our national debt is $9,228,252,012.03, as of March 31, 1943, the interest charges being $188,556,249.39, better than $15 millions a month, an increase of over $60 millions a year, or roughly five million dollars a month. That is a staggering figure, and who can tell to-day that the war may not last for two or three years yet and the debt will be just that much greater? We are getting in deeper all the time.

I said before that I am not a financial expert, but I know there is something positively wrong with this whole business, and I envisaged the Bank of Canada as being set up to step in and lend money to public corporations, as I have already indicated, without any interest, but with just an operating charge or a bookkeeping cost. The present system cannot go on indefinitely. We should, therefore, be prepared to try another kind, and force the big banking houses to get out of government business entirely and operate in their own field,—

Then he goes on to say:

> I believe that the Bank of Canada is not operating to the fullest extent in the important matter of financing public debt and public corporations.

I have had considerable experience as head of a municipal corporation and as chairman of the school board, and I know how we finance. I can see the tremendous advantage which we could obtain by using the Bank of Canada to a far greater extent to further our education, our health schemes, mothers' allowances, hospitalization, road programme, and so on.

No one can say that the need was ever greater than it is now for hospitals in almost every small community. The town in which I reside has been pleading for one for the last twenty-five years and is still without a hospital. Let me say I am not in favour of the hand-out system, that is, one by which you can receive service for nothing; but I do believe that if the provinces agree to the present dominion proposals, it will then be up to the dominion to provide the necessary money through the Bank of Canada for the services I have just mentioned. Surely we do not want to see unemployment. It is useless to say that there can be a depression in a country where there is so much to be done. Then let those provinces who wish to accept the dominion government's proposal do so and obtain the benefits which they deserve. Let the dominion government accept the responsibility of taking care of its citizens.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, I have tried to confine my remarks to what I trust will be for the welfare of Canada as a whole. I have tried not to be personal. Furthermore, I have failed to mention many things which my constituents desire. This I believe can be done to better advantage with the responsible ministers than by occupying the time of the house.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): In rising to speak in this debate on the government's budget for 1946 and perhaps 1947—because few of us are going to realize any benefits from it until that time—I wish to make just a few observations. This is not of course the first budget that I have spoken to, and it was not the first budget speech I have heard from the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). But I sat in my seat for nearly three hours listening to Canada's finance minister as he brought down a perfectly orthodox financial budget, and I could not help thinking at the time that had there been a Social Credit government in office, a Social Credit finance minister could have made a speech in perhaps fifteen or twenty minutes. I do not know, but at least he could have made a much shorter speech and could have given the country the benefit of all that such a wealthy nation possesses. It would have been necessary only to put down the liabilities on one side and the assets on the other, indicate how much money the country needed for the coming year, and then say boldly to parliament and to the country that he was now issuing instructions to the Bank of Canada that has the power to issue currency and credit, by saying, gentlemen, you are the servants of the people. We need so much money this year. Write out a cheque, sign on the dotted line, and have so much money issued to this government in order that we may carry on the business of the country.

Instead I must confess that by the time the present Minister of Finance got through with his budget speech, I personally was left somewhat confused. In fact, I met a newspaper reporter in the corridors the next morning and when he asked me what I thought of the budget, I said, "Well, my friend, I am afraid I shall have to read it all over before I can answer that question, because the minister did leave my mind in a muddle as to exactly what Canada's financial position was and what will be required during the next year".

Right along that line, in the realm of money, there has been I believe a deliberate attempt to confuse the mind rather than to instruct, inform and clarify. I declare, Mr. Speaker, that there is no subject in the universe to-day that seems to be so little understood, that seems to be surrounded with so much mystery, as the subject of money and orthodox finance, and I came to the conclusion long ago that a deliberate attempt has been made to keep the people confused and in ignorance in respect to this matter.

I am a family man. I have brought up a family. My high school boys come home and they begin to instruct their father as to what they have learned in respect to the function and operation of money. They come home not merely confused but deliberately misled. They say things that are positively against the facts. Although I did not go into a deep study of finance; although I did not major in the field of economics, I am quite certain in my own mind that most of the university courses in economics tend to mystify rather than to clarify. This reminds me that a great man once said—and I quote from sacred writ:

> We wrestle not against flesh and blood but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of darkness of this world.

I am going to stop there. We wrestle not against flesh and blood but against the rulers of the darkness of this world, and if there is one subject that has been kept in the dark, if there is one subject upon which the people generally speaking manifest ignorance, it is the subject of the functioning of money. But throughout the past few years, particularly in the war years, when circumstances have forced the hands of finance ministers, that veil of mystery has gradually been torn away. The darkness has been gradually giving way as the light of newer economics has shone in upon it.

What happened a few years ago when this group stood in this house and declared that money was created out of nothing? We were laughed to scorn. It could not be so! When social credit first appeared upon the scene in Canada and made certain proposals, it received the reply: Oh, fountain pen money. What has happened? We have been issuing fountain pen money now to the tune of anywhere from half a billion to three-quarters of a billion dollars a year. That has gone on because of the expansion of credit; and the mask has gradually been torn away. The people are saying, where did all this money come from? I stand up and boldly declare that it came from the end of a fountain pen.

Mr. FAIR: The Minister of Finance agrees.

Mr. HANSELL: Of course he does; he knows his business. If he does not agree, let him rise in his place and say now that he does not. He does agree. The mask is being gradually torn away.

When some of us went out into the country and said that banks did not lend their depositors' money, we were laughed at again. I suppose there are hon. members in the house today who may even now believe that banks lend their depositors' money. The mask is being torn away from that too. It has been discovered long since that banks do not lend their depositors' money. They lend freshly created money, which has come out of the end of a fountain pen and which eventually becomes depositors' money. Will any one deny that? I see no one rising in his place to deny it, and yet when years ago we said that we were laughed at.

How often have we heard our proposals talked about as being printing press money. Whenever I hear someone say that I say immediately that they do not know what they are talking about. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) is an example, but I shall come to him later. When we rose in our places and said that money could be issued to the tune of at least equating it with our production, we were branded as inflationists. How often have I heard the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) tell the Minister of Finance that inflation could be controlled! There is a way of handling a situation of that kind, and there is no inflation until your money reaches above your total prices. How often did the hon. member for Lethbridge tell the house that?—but we were referred to as inflationists! The mask has been torn off that bogy too, because we have controlled inflation in Canada to a remarkable degree. I am going to give the Minister of Finance certain credit for that. What I am saying now is that he is doing what we said he could do and would have to do, and circumstances forced his hand to do it.

When we said that prices could be subsidized in the process of stopping inflation, everybody again cried out against this supposedly gross error. Was it an error? That is exactly what the Minister of Finance has been doing throughout the war. Therefore I say that the mask is being gradually torn away. The glorious light of a new economic philosophy is beginning to shine in. The one step that the minister must take is the issuing of money debt-free to the nation. When he has done that, he will have torn himself loose from the old orthodox financial order which is sinking this country deeper and deeper into debt and despair. We Social Crediters were the exponents of these things, and evidently the government listened to us when circumstances forced their hands.

May I return to the charge that what we propose is printing press money? We have heard it many times. We heard it from the predecessor of the present leader of the opposition. I judge from the speech made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) that he would regard it as printing press money. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) has ridiculed our suggestions along this line. No doubt he believes it is printing press money. I referred to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Judging by the remarks he has made he believes that it is printing press money. I come now to a very important point. The Minister of National Health and Welfare is responsible for the spending of more money than any other department of government; yet when we suggest to him that as an experiment he call upon the Minister of Finance to issue debt-free money through the Bank of Canada to the tune of the paltry sum of $10 million to see whether or not it would have an adverse effect on the Canadian economy, what does he say? He does not say anything. When I challenge him to do that, he sits there silent and tries to look wise. Sometimes I think this business that we are in is like a huge poker game, the rules of which are against you and you cannot win. Strangely enough this minister who spends more money than any other department of government also administers united nations relief and rehabilitation money which comes from Canada. Here is the man who cries out against any suggestion of changing the rules of the poker game.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Because he always wins.

Mr. HANSELL: But the people always lose. He is the man who is chosen to accompany the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) as one of his chief advisers at the biggest poker game the world has even seen. While I am on that subject may I say that the Prime Minister is leaving for the peace conference as usual without any instructions as to what to do. That is why I asked him the other day if an opportunity would be given to discuss external affairs before he left. The answer was that there was no time now. Of course a few items have been before the external affairs committee. It is the same old tale, the same old story; it can be San Francisco, it can be some other place, but never once does he go under instructions from the people of Canada. One of our press gallery friends labelled us on one occasion, and rightfully so, as the people's mouths. Did the people's mouths have an opportunity of expressing the views of the people, as their representatives, and sending our Prime Minister to perhaps the greatest conference the world has even seen or will ever see, with any instructions as to what to say and what to do on great and vital issues? No, sir. Furthermore, does the Prime Minister tell us what he is going to do or say? You see, this poker game is also surrounded with dark secrecy. There are vital issues to be discussed. Do we send our delegation there knowing they are going to make any pronouncements? We do not. The result is that they can make pronouncements when they are there, if they want to, without our advice, and commit the country to something about which we know nothing at all, and no one knows what is going to happen in this very complex world.

On such great issues, Mr. Speaker, as will be faced at Paris we should know what Canada's foreign policy is. Do we know it? I do not believe we do; there is no policy, so how can we know? I do not think there ever has been one. I often see that British statesmen have made pronouncements on certain issues. I often see that American statesmen have made pronouncements saying, "Thus far and no farther," or recommending this or that. But when did any such pronouncements come from Canada? When we want to find out what our foreign policy is, can we do so? Well, I am inclined to think the present government and the present Prime Minister have a greater power of evasion than power of pronouncement.

To get back to this dark secret about money, I said I often likened it to a huge poker game the rules of which are always against you so you cannot win. Under the present orthodox system of debt-creating money the rules are against you, and you cannot win. The rules are against the people, and you will never come out on top until you change the rules. That is one thing the Minister of Finance refuses to do—see that the rules are changed. I believe Canada's total net debt to-day is approximately $13 billion. Somebody has been losing in the poker game over the years. Sometimes I wonder at the people giving men power to deal the cards and handle the chips when every time they come back for more chips because they have lost. The Prime Minister bids for power to run the country. What does he actually say? Give me a chance, he says, to go to Ottawa again and play this poker game: if you give me one more chance I think I might be able to win. But he never wins; he comes back and wants more chips.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You had better raise the ante.

Mr. HANSELL: Instead of bringing us his winnings he brings us a sad story of having to sign a lot of I.O.U.'s to somebody else. Then at the next election he says: Well, give me one more chance; you see, I am getting more experience all the time, and perhaps I shall still be able to win.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You will never find a better man.

Mr. HANSELL: The Minister of Veterans Affairs says we shall never find a better man, but I want to know when we are going to start winning. Then, you know, a great man appeared upon the scene. His name was R. B. Bennett. He said to the people of Canada: If only you let me play that game, I think I can win—and he came out with a slogan which I remember reading. I was not so much interested in politics at the time, but the slogan stuck. He said, "It's time for a change."

Mr. MACKENZIE: The trouble is you put $25 a month into the jackpot.

Mr. HANSELL: The trouble is the present government will not permit us to put $25 into the jackpot.

Mr. JOHNSTON: They stole the ante and call it a family allowance.

Mr. HANSELL: So Right Hon. R. B. Bennett said, "Give me a chance. Of course you will have to give me some chips, too, but I think I can win." What did he do? He came back for more chips, but he brought the I.O.U.'s too. The I.O.U.'s were beginning to pile up; and they were I.O.U.'s somebody else held against us. So the people said, "No, Mr. Bennett. We guess we shall not be able to do it. We will try the other fellow again; he still thinks he can win." So Mr. Bennett left the country; and after he did all that playing the game and losing they made him a lord. I don't know why they did that. Well, they cannot win, yet somehow or other they refuse to change the rules. All we are saying to these hon. gentlemen, these fine gentlemen, these keen business minds, is: Change the rules and perhaps we will win. But they reply, "Oh, no; we cannot very well do that."

Now another gentleman has appeared on the scene. His name also begins with B but it is not Bennett; it is Bracken this time, and he says to the people: If only you will let me play the game, of course you will have to give me some chips too but I think I shall be able to win; you see, I have had experience for twenty years at this game—of course it was not in quite such a large field, and the stakes were not quite as high, but I have had that experience. But we say to him: What we want to know is, did you ever win?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Has my hon. friend ever played poker?

Mr. HANSELL: I played only one game of poker in my life—and I won. The strange thing about it is that I did not know the rules. Another fact, which is not so strange, is that I had sense enough to quit after playing the one game. That is one thing which hon. gentlemen who are playing Canada's poker game have not sense enough to do. They do not change the rules, and they will not quit.

Anyway, this other man, whose name begins with a "B", came along and said, "I know what you want. It is true that I left some I.O.U.'s to be paid; but if I get into the larger field and play the game on a bigger scale I might be able to win." But somehow or another the people thought another gentleman would be able to do it better, with the result that the Prime Minister was returned to office again—still playing the same game. He is still asking for more chips, and still piling up the I.O.U.'s.

The Prime Minister is going to retire soon to write his memoirs. I should hope the title of the book would be "Memoirs of the Great Canadian Poker Game". What we are saying over and over again is, "Change the rules; change the rules." We have been piling up these I.O.U.'s, but we have never yet won a hand. Yet they will not change the rules, and to-day Canada has sunk to a position where she is in debt to the tune of over $13 billion, net debt.

How on earth are we going to get out, under the same rules which continue to put us into debt, and which have continually failed? What stands behind Canada's bonded indebtedness? What stands behind a Canadian bond? I declare the only thing that stands behind a Dominion government bond is the ability of the people of Canada to pay taxes. I hear no complaints with that statement. Often I hear it glibly said, oh, well, Canada is wealthy; look at our natural resources. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that Canada's natural resources do not stand behind a dominion government bond. That is one place where the provinces have a little more collateral than has the dominion government. The only thing that stands behind a dominion government bond is the ability of the people of Canada to pay taxes. How on earth are they ever going to be able to pay enough taxes to pay off $13 billion in I.O.U.'s which leader after leader after leader in this country has been signing?

In his budget speech the Minister of Finance referred to the dominion-provincial conference. I shall not say much about it, except to throw a little more light on it, or perhaps I should say, a somewhat different light. Throughout Canada, editorially and in every other way, out went the propoganda that the dominion-provincial conference had failed. I wonder if it did. It is true that it failed to meet the suggestions of the federal Minister of Finance; but did it actually fail?

There is one place it did not fail: it proved to the country that the provincial governments had certain constitutional rights, and that when it came to a consideration of those rights the dominion government could not move without the say-so from the provinces. In my view that is an important point.

There is a move to divest the provinces of provincial rights. That is how Canada lies in extreme danger. In his budget speech the minister says, in effect, "Here is the way in which I can get the provinces to submit to my suggestion. I shall bring in a budget in which I shall stipulate certain things. I will say to the provinces, 'Here, you, sign on the dotted line. If you sign on the dotted line there will be so much coming to you; if you do not, you will have to suffer the consequences.'"

That is where the dominion government has the power. It is not now concerned with constitutional powers; it has the financial power. I believe it was Baron Rothschild who once said, "Permit me to issue the money of a nation, and I care not who makes its laws." That seems to be the prescription upon which the government is now acting: "Sign on the dotted line and you will get so much. If you do not, you will have to suffer the consequences." That is the financial power the federal government has over the provinces—and it is a tremendous thing.

While I am talking along those lines might I point out that the same Minister of Finance in the same administration, an administration which is able to supply billions of dollars in foreign credits, is not able to supply a paltry hand-out to our own provinces who, after all, are our own people. That, to me, is a strange thing.

Not only do we pour out billions of dollars in export credits, but the government brings in a bill known as the Export Credits Insurance Act. What is it for? It is to guarantee the chartered banks or the purveyors of credit against loss. I believe our foreign credits amount to something in the neighbourhood of $3 billion—and if my figure is not correct the minister will correct me. What does this mean? It means an export of three billion Canadian dollars; that is what it means; it does not mean anything else. We bring in a bill assuring the purveyors of credit, those who wield the fountain pens, that they will be protected if those dollars do not come back.

Here is another thing. We are doing that in a most uncertain world; we are doing that in a world of nations whose collateral is questionable. Yet when we come to deal with the provinces which administer health services, educational services and old age pensions, what is the answer? The minister says, "Go back; mind your own business; we are sorry; we cannot give you anything; we can export our dollars to foreign countries; but we cannot give our own people, and especially our aged people, the dollar security that they should have." That is a blight on our Canadian civilization, and that alone should be enough to condemn any powerful federal government.

There is another thing I should like to say right along that line. What stands behind these export credits if the dollars do not return to us? What collateral is behind that? We have our Export Credits Insurance Act to cover insurance against loss, but who is to pay the loss; what stands behind that? It is nothing but the ability of the people of Canada to pay taxes. So we export our dollars and we say to our people, if our dollars do not come back you will have to cough up by way of taxation. That is what happens. Yet when our people in the provinces want a few paltry dollars to raise old age pensions and help the indigent, we have not enough money for them. Surely our own collateral is good. Surely it should be good if our dollars remain within our country. You have a chance to get them back if they are in our own country; but, "oh, we cannot do that, gentlemen."

Who told the Minister of Finance that he could not do it? Is he refusing to do it on his own responsibility? Is he saying, "I cannot do it." We want to know why he cannot and we are looking for the answer.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): The hon. member has exhausted his time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. HANSELL: I was going on to another subject, but I shall do so at another time.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I am sadly in need of the lessons, both in finance and in poker, that the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) has given to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and other members of the house this afternoon. I do not know how much the minister is in need of the lessons in poker, but I am in need of them and I am grateful to the previous speaker for them. As to the lessons in finance, possibly the minister and I can both give them what is called in parliamentary language, due consideration.

The Minister of Finance is a notable figure in any House of Commons, possibly the most important after the Prime Minister. Most of what he does is in fact less subject to scrutiny than what is done by his colleagues. Finance is not something apart from policy, in reality it is an expression of policy. The Minister of Finance has told the house, that many hundreds of millions of dollars are required to carry out the government's policies during the fiscal year 1946-1947. He alone is not responsible for the amount. In criticizing a budget one is not criticizing the Minister of Finance alone, he is criticizing the policy which has made necessary the raising of such sums of money. Sometimes it happens that one does not criticize the amount itself but is critical of the way in which it is intended to be raised.

It is difficult in the second week of a debate of this kind, a debate which has followed so closely in the wake of public consideration of many questions which were discussed by the minister in the dominion-provincial conference, to say very much that has not already been said. The minister has pointed out that he has prepared his budget on the assumption that no general agreement with the provinces could be had, and he said that his task has been made extremely difficult by the fact that no general agreement was reached with the provinces. He has told the house that because no general agreement was reached he intends to seek special and private agreements with the various provinces. I note that in the speech from the throne the following appears:

> A meeting of the coordinating committee of the dominion-provincial conference was held in January. Progress was made in the consideration of proposals submitted by the dominion and provincial governments. The committee will meet again on April 25.
> As a result of the conference, there may be further legislative proposals.

Surely the legislation then contemplated was not the enactment of the budget resolutions.

I shall deal almost exclusively with this one aspect of the budget, the intention of the government to make private and individual agreements with the provinces. In substance the government intends to say to each province: "If you will desist from collecting taxes we will pay you a large amount of money. If you, the provinces, will not levy and collect taxes on personal incomes, will not levy and collect taxes on corporations, will not levy and collect taxes on successions or inheritances, we will pay you a large sum of money." I am not mentioning some of the details of that offer, because I wish to deal with the general proposition. That is what the government says to the provinces. And it says, "Furthermore we, the dominion government, as a return for that concession, will pay you $15 a head for your population as determined by the census of 1941 or at a later date; we will guarantee that that payment will be at least 50 per cent greater than the payments made to you under the wartimes agreements; and we will furthermore undertake to increase these payments as your population increases and as your production per capita increases."

The minister has placed on record a table which shows approximately what this means. It shows that the amount guaranteed as a minimum if all the provinces accept the proposal is $181 million, that it is likely to be $198 million per annum, and then of course there is the possibility and even the probability of increase.

I want to say here that I am not adverse to assistance being given to provinces, assistance based on need, and my party is not adverse to that principle. What I object to is the method by which it is sought to administer that assistance, and it is to that method and its result that I intend to direct my remarks this afternoon.

I do not understand that any province is adverse to a method whereby need may be taken into consideration in a reallocation of the revenues of the country. I find at page 221 of the records of the plenary session of the dominion-provincial conference this utterance by the premier of Quebec:

> The federal proposals are unacceptable for the very many reasons I have given and which it would be unnecessary to repeat. As stated by me the door is left open—if I may say so without offence to anyone—for Ottawa to come to a better sense of proportion. The door is left open for friendly cooperation and understanding, based upon the fundamentals of the constitution and taking into account the past, the present and the future.

At the time of confederation the chief sources of revenues were customs duties and excise taxes. They were indirect taxes, and they were allocated to the dominion. Since then, changes have taken place, and direct taxes, to which the provinces were restricted, have become a greater source of revenue, greater by far than the indirect taxes to which the dominion resorted at the time of confederation. I believe that these facts should be taken into consideration. I see no objection to a reallocation of the revenues available for purposes of government. But I do object, and I object with all the sincerity and with all the vehemence that I can command, to the methods by which it is proposed to bring about that reallocation. And here are some of my objections.

The province of Quebec, for instance, has an annual budget of something under $100 million: under this proposal it would receive from the dominion government just under $60 million a year. The province of Ontario has a budget of about $100 million, and under this arrangement it would receive something like $65 million a year. My suggestion is this, that we have received a constitution, and part of that constitution is parliamentary, representative and responsible government. At every moment of every day a government stands poised on the confidence of the house and of the people of the province or the dominion. It is the duty of government to raise the moneys which are required for the purposes of government. It is the duty of government to account to the house for every last penny that is raised and spent for purposes of government.

It is there that we find that the genius of those from whom we descend has expressed itself. It is in that series of balances and checks that a form of government has been evolved which gives protection to the property owner, and meets the needs of those who are in distress.

Now, what is the result here? We would find a province receiving, in the two instances that I have mentioned, something like sixty or possibly more, per cent of its revenues as—I was going to say—a hand-out. These governments would be receiving it from an agency to which they would owe no responsibility whatever; they would be getting it, not from those whom they had taxed, but from someone to whom they owed no duty to account. That would mean extravagance. Money from home is always money easily spent, and money that has come to one from a friend or money that one finds is never accounted for with the same care that is exercised in accounting for that which has cost effort to get.

Then we come to the other side of the medal. Here in this house there would be at least $200 million a year for which nobody would be accountable. The Minister of Finance would rise in his place and say, "I have paid $200 million to the provinces" and we would have to say, "how nice." If we asked how much of that money had been wasted in one province or another he could give no answer. There would be no check upon waste. This proposal is entirely subversive of our whole parliamentary system. Moreover, I submit, though I have been unable to find any case absolutely in point, that this proposal is entirely unconstitutional. Where is there in our constitution anything that permits the government of a province for instance, using the colourful language of the Minister of Finance, to lease a field of taxation, to sell a right of taxation? Where is there anything that entitles the government of a province to barter away its right of taxation, or a province or the dominion its duty to account to those from whom it collects the money?

I have scrutinized the British North America Act very carefully and I can find nothing in any of the subsections of section 91, which contains the powers of the dominion, and I can find nothing in the subsections of section 92, which contains the powers of the province, that warrants such an undertaking. Furthermore, wherever there is any intimation of one legislative body impinging upon the field of the other, it is very carefully and specifically stated. For instance, if one turns to section 94, which has to do with the common law in the provinces other than Quebec, one finds that it is competent to the dominion to enact legislation imposing the common law upon any of the provinces other than Quebec. That is a privilege of the dominion, but it is conditioned upon the province which is affected by such legislation passing concurrent legislation. One also finds that where the judges are appointed and paid by the federal authority, and where they come under the control, discipline and organizing power of the province, it is specifically laid down in the act that such divided jurisdiction obtains.

Further, we find in section 12—I think that is the section where all the powers which at one time were vested in the legislatures which preceded confederation, or which were conferred upon them by imperial statute were handed on to the parliament of Canada—that in none of the subsections is there anything that suggests a right whereby the dominion should purchase or enter into an agreement under which the constitutional function of a province should cease in order that the dominion might have greater taxing power than it would otherwise have.

It is perhaps of interest at this point to refer to the constitution of Australia, because in that country, under article 51, which is the counterpart of section 91 of our constitution, there does exist a right which would warrant, justify, enable and permit a transaction of this kind. It is found in subsection 37 of article 51 and is in these terms:

> Matters referred to the parliament of the commonwealth by the parliament or parliaments of any state or states, but so that the law shall extend only to states by whose parliaments the matter is referred or which afterwards adopt the law.

So we are embarking upon a course which is entirely new. We are embarking upon a course for which there is no direct legislative authority. We are embarking upon a course which no one would ever have thought of until the great necessities for money which are now upon us were felt. It is interesting to note how this tendency to increase the amount of money which is levied by this parliament, and which escapes the scrutiny of the house, is growing. On turning to the estimates for 1947, one finds that in a total budget of something like $1,566 million, something like $876 million is authorized by statute, of which $580 million represents interest on our obligations, while $285 million is charged to the Department of National Health and Welfare and includes cost of legislation which was enacted about a year ago.

Mr. CLAXTON: And family allowances and old age pensions.

Mr. HACKETT: And family allowances and old age pensions. I point out the tendency to increase these statutory amounts which, like the salaries of judges and officials, are beyond the power of this house to criticize effectively or to control at all. And here I want to make a point which I think may have escaped the attention of some. In 1937 a royal commission was set up, frequently referred to as the Rowell-Sirois commission. It is the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations. At that time the necessities which brought about the most useful examination of these problems were almost exclusively the necessities of a few provinces which had not sufficient revenue from direct taxation—especially since the invasion of the field by the dominion authorities—to carry on their governmental activities with any degree of comfort. The situation is now quite changed. While there is still a need for reallocation of the taxable revenue of Canada at large, the most necessitous of all these agencies is the dominion government. The one which cannot wait, the one which is insistent is the dominion. A strange aspect of the budget is this. In the royal commission report it was suggested that a reallocation of revenues might become necessary, and one finds the following at page 72 of the second volume of the report:

> One of the difficulties inherent in any federal system is the rigidity which marks the division of jurisdiction between the central and local governments.

A little farther along we find the following:

> Our instructions obviously contemplated the suitability of a reallocation of powers which would require constitutional amendments, and we are reporting as to what in our opinion will "conduce to a more efficient, independent and economical discharge of governmental responsibility in Canada."

Then farther on they say:

> We desire merely to emphasize the necessity that some procedure for constitutional change should be evolved.
> We think that the introduction of a measure of flexibility in the Canadian federal system should be considered. A number of provinces may on occasion be willing and may even actively desire the dominion to assume responsibility for a function which is beyond its constitutional powers. The dominion may itself be willing to assume the function but be unable to do so until public opinion has developed to the extent of permitting a constitutional amendment to be made.

I point out that it was at all times understood there could be nothing in the nature of a reallocation of revenues similar to those mentioned in the budget until there had been a constitutional amendment. To-day it is said an amendment is not necessary. It is well to remember that the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations made its report before the war. When the war came, agreements between the provinces and the dominion were entered into, and the dominion is now in possession of these so-called fields of taxation; the dominion is in possession of the territory.

In passing I may say, as an interesting feature, that the dominion was given these rights to tax for a definite period and for the purpose of winning the war, and that at a certain moment the dominion government diverted the proceeds of these rights to tax from the purpose of winning the war to the purposes of winning an election, which just shows one of the difficulties which will ensue from the prosecution of this centralizing policy. But let us go on. Under these agreements the dominion has the exclusive right for a time, and I am sure that my hon. friends will not argue that because under the peace, order and good government enactments of section 91 they were given, as a result, and because of the emergency arising out of the war, the right to occupy the provincial field, that right remains in them for any additional period. I believe that has been established by the passage of the legislation in December last when the transitional emergency was born. We produce emergencies with greater facility than we used to. It was never intimated, never suggested, that these powers whereby the dominion would exclusively collect moneys by direct taxation would remain. I am aware that judgments of highest authority have held that the dominion has the right to levy taxes of all types, direct and indirect. Nevertheless these private agreements which the dominion offers to the provinces—one by one—go farther. They would result in the suspension of the most considerable, the most elementary, the most fundamental function of government, namely, that of levying taxes and being called upon to account for them. But the dominion is in possession of the field. It collects from income and corporation taxes something like $1,550 million. The minister has said somewhere that he thinks it should be reduced to $1,200 million, because of some changes that are about to become effective; nevertheless there are $1,200 million, without considering succession duties, which the dominion seeks. It is going to spend these amounts and from them it undertakes to give the provinces about $200 million a year. It is going to do all this without amending or attempting to amend in any way the British North America Act.

Speaking at the plenary session of the dominion-provincial conference, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said, as reported at page 9 of the proceedings:

> In all its proposals, the dominion has assumed that Canada's federal system of government should be preserved and strengthened. I should like to repeat what I said at the plenary session on August 6, last.

I skip a bit, and continue:

> The only constitutional change suggested is the proposal, already mentioned, for the delegation of powers, and with this one exception under which the dominion is prepared to enlarge the powers of the provinces, none of the dominion proposals would require an amendment to the British North America Act, or involve any fundamental disturbance of the traditional pattern of confederation. In this unsettled period of world transition, it would be unwise to seek constitutional change, or to make irrevocable commitments. What we are now seeking is to meet urgent needs, on a temporary basis, by the simplest and most effective means.

To say that the constitution of the dominion may be so completely perverted, so completely uprooted, and to refer to it as a mere passing event reminds one of those incidents to which the newspapers gave some notoriety a few years ago, and which I believe they called trial marriages. The provinces cannot undergo for three or five years the experience of the type outlined by the minister and survive; the integrity of the fiscal organization of any individual province could never be revived. We know now the great difficulty the dominion is experiencing in returning to the provinces those exclusive rights it derived from them for the purpose and the period of the war. I think it fair to assume that if the federal government obtain these exclusive taxing rights for a period of five years they never will be returned to the provinces.

I want to make one further statement, and I hope my hon. friends will not think I am attempting to be unnecessarily disagreeable. My province has been torn and victimized for twenty-five years by a fear of something called conscription. The good people of that province were told—and if anyone here is anxious to hear what was said I have the newspaper clippings—that they owed no service in wars overseas; and they were told that upon the highest authority. As a result of that policy which was preached in one province but not in others, a parliamentary majority was obtained and maintained in this house for twenty-five years by hon. gentlemen opposite. War came and the nation was torn asunder. I pray that now hon. gentlemen opposite will not attempt in the economic field to convert the necessities of those provinces which at the moment have not the wealth which enables them to draw, from direct taxation, the moneys they need for their maintenance and self-support, into a party advantage. I ask that an end be put to dividing in order that one may rule. If it be competent to the minister and the government to make a special trade with a friendly province; if it be competent to go to a province and enter into an agreement which will deny it the power to tax and the power to scrutinize, I ask, what would happen to that province which happened to be in opposition to the party in power, whether it be the party now in power or another party, if that party should not like the economic doctrines or the political creed of the needy province? We all remember the day when something was said that there was not a five-cent piece for a Tory province. Much as I dislike referring to that incident, because I do not believe the statement was meant, it does show to what extremities a government might go to starve a recalcitrant province into submission if the pernicious doctrine enunciated by the minister were admitted.

Mr. ILSLEY: If I may ask a question, assuming that the dominion government were prepared to act on such principles, would there not be much greater danger of abuse if the hon. gentleman's programme of assistance on the basis of fiscal need were adopted than assistance on the basis of a formula or rule laid down in advance?

Mr. HACKETT: There should be a formula or rule laid down in advance; I agree with the minister. But when the formula and the rule establish a definite overlordship of the dominion and make a vassal out of a province, then the formula is a bad and objectionable rule. They should be replaced by something more effective and more equitable.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am afraid that does not answer the question.

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I do not want to cover the ground that has been covered already by my colleagues, but I agree with them that the exemptions in the lower income tax brackets are far from satisfactory. I welcome the consideration the minister has shown the fishermen and farmers in allowing them to average their incomes over a three-year period. That is only a partial step; but it is in the right direction.

There is one phase of the income tax to which I had hoped the minister would give some considerable thought, a matter I have brought to his attention before. On the farm the whole family works as one unit; yet when the income tax return must be made up the tax is levied only on the one income, that of the farmer. Previously the minister pointed out to me that other women and other families work, as well as the farmer's wife and family, but again I should like to draw his attention to the fact that the farmer's wife and family contribute more to his income than is the case in any other business. I do not want to elaborate on this point, or go into details, but generally speaking the farmer's wife adds more to the income of the farm than in any other case that can be cited. The same can be said of the farmer's family, who increase the income of the farm by their efforts in connection with milking, haying, harvesting, feeding live stock and the many other chores around the farm. But when the income tax form is filled out, the income of the whole family is reckoned as the farmer's income, and it is taxed as such. I should like the minister to give attention to this point and see if there is not some other way of granting relief where the entire family produces the income that is taxed.

I wish to go on record as endorsing what the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley) said regarding cooperatives. I do not want to repeat his argument, but I want the minister to know that I am wholeheartedly in support of what the hon. member said.

I regret that in this budget the government, through the minister's department is forcing the cooperatives into a profitmaking class, by this three per cent return on capital investment. The minister is classing two different things together in his taxation, two things which should be separated, namely joint stock companies and cooperative societies. One is a service for profit and the other is a service at cost. You can mix them, just as you mix oil and water; but they will not stay mixed. They are entirely different, and represent two different ways of doing business.

I was born in a cooperative home. I have been a cooperator all my life, and I cannot help thinking at this time that in putting cooperatives in this position the Minister of Finance is trying to destroy the principles for which they were formed.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member has said that he was born in a cooperative home. In the cooperatives to which his family belonged were not interest or dividends paid on the capital invested in the cooperative by its members?

Mr. BRYCE: No.

Mr. ILSLEY: None?

Mr. BRYCE: No. The minister will find on the records of this house for 1906 a description of the cooperative to which my mother belonged and which is operating in Glasgow, Scotland, to-day.

Mr. ILSLEY: In the Rochdale type of cooperative I thought it was usual for interest or dividends to be paid to investors, those who put their money in.

Mr. BRYCE: One share. I said I had been a cooperator all my life, and I am wondering if what I consider a cooperative, and the minister's understanding of the term, are the same. I know he must look at it differently from what I do.

I should like, through you, if I may, Mr. Speaker, to have permission to place on Hansard the contrasting features between a joint stock company and a cooperative society, as outlined by Mr. J. T. Hull of Winnipeg, when he presented a brief to the Canadian royal commission on the taxation of cooperatives at Winnipeg on February 5, 1945.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am sorry, but I cannot agree to that. If hon. members are permitted to put briefs on the record, I suggest we would be going too far. Up to now permission has been given to place tables on the record, or material the reading of which would be most inconvenient. But I must object to the insertion of briefs.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am in agreement, in principle, with what the minister has said. He is not correct, however, when he says that up to now what has been placed on the record has consisted of tables. A long brief was put on Hansard the other evening. I am not suggesting that that practice should continue, because I think it is a wrong one; all I say is that the line should be drawn impartially among all members.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not wish to deprive the hon. member of any privilege, but I ought to point out to him that the permission to place memoranda on the record is one which is granted occasionally by the unanimous consent of the house usually to members of the government to enable them to have certain official statements incorporated in the report. The privilege is one which, however, should not be taken advantage of generally. If the house were once to adopt the practice of placing documents and memoranda on Hansard, Hansard would soon become overencumbered.

Mr. BRYCE: I agree with what the minister has said, and with Your Honour's observations. However, to support my argument I shall read the contrast. It is as follows:

The Contrasting Features of a Joint Stock Company and a Cooperative Society

A Joint Stock Corporation	A Cooperative
1. Is a union of capital as an investment to earn a profit.	1. Is a union of persons to supply themselves with goods and services at cost.
2. Shareholding may be anonymous; shares are freely transferable and may be held by anyone.	2. Shares are identified by persons; the shareholder must be admitted to membership or transfers must be approved by the board of directors.
3. Is limited (as a general proposition) in the number of persons owning the business, i.e., the shares are limited in number.	3. There is no limit to the number of persons who may participate in the business within its range of operations, i.e., the number of shares is not limited.

The Contrasting Features of a Joint Stock Company and a Cooperative Society—Con.

A Joint Stock Corporation—Con.	A Cooperative—Con.
4. The shares being limited in number they will fluctuate in value according to the profits they earn.	4. Every shareholder must be a member, thus the shares are not limited and cannot exceed par value.
5. Control by the individual is determined by the number of shares he holds.	5. A member has one vote and no more regardless of the number of shares he may hold.
6. Surplus earnings, i.e., profits, are the property of the corporation.	6. Surplus belongs to the members, i.e., the customers.
7. Surplus is divided among the shareholders on the basis of the number of shares held.	7. Surplus is divided among the members in proportion to the amount of business each does with the society, except where a limited interest on capital is paid.
8. No limit to the dividend paid on share capital.	8. Fixed maximum rate set for dividends on share capital; in some societies no dividend paid on capital.
9. The joint stock company does business in a general way with the public; the buyers and sellers (the parties to the business transactions) are distinct and different.	9. The cooperative is organized to do business with its members; buyers and sellers constitute one body and are identical.
10. The selling price is normally above cost price and the surplus constitutes a trading profit.	10. The selling price is an arbitrary figure containing a margin of business safety above cost and the surplus constitutes an excess charge, or in the case of a marketing cooperative, an underpayment.
11. Business is done for the express purpose of realizing the trading profit which becomes the property of the corporation.	11. The business is organized and conducted as a mutual service for the benefit of the members and not for the benefit of the cooperative as a legal entity.

That is the difference between the two methods of doing business. Here to-day we have a discussion going on as to whether pools are cooperatives, or whether they are not. We have no yardstick to go by. We have no dominion cooperatives act. The government of to-day—and those of the past, both Liberal and Conservative—have failed to say what a cooperative is, and to-day we have people in doubt.

The minister says, in his budget, that the pools are subject to taxation for 1944 and 1945. There seems to have been a great deal of doubt about this. Had the government brought in a cooperative act there would be no doubt at this time.

I understand that a cooperative bill was introduced in this house in 1906 and referred to a special committee. It seems to have been received favourably at that time, because a special committee of the house was set up to look into it. In the Journals of the House of Commons, volume 62, for 1906-1907, I find on pages 70 and 71 the evidence given before the committee by Mr. Mackenzie King, then deputy minister of labour, who was a witness before the committee. From his remarks I quote the following:

> Leading economists of to-day both in England and the United States, men who have not at heart the interests of one class of society as against another, but who look impartially upon economic affairs, are pretty well one in the favour with which they view the cooperative movement as a movement exceptionally beneficial from a point of view of educating the masses of the people, from the point of view of enabling the masses of the people to improve their conditions, and from the point of view of the general betterment and welfare of the people of a country.

In the election campaign of 1911 the leaders of both parties promised cooperative legislation. To-day the organized farmers and cooperatives are still demanding a dominion cooperative act. It is another promise that was made and never fulfilled. Perhaps that is the first step, to put legislation on the statutes of Canada as to what a cooperative is. You would then not have this trouble. It must be remembered that if you assess this retroactive taxation against the wheat pools and other cooperatives you will take the money, not from the pool organization or the other cooperatives, but directly away from the individual farmer who has this money to his credit. This money is credited to him and would have been paid out to him had the government acted rightly in the matter. This constitutes nothing but a capitalist raid on the collective savings of working farmers.

Who will suffer the most? The farmer's wife and the farmer's children are going to suffer again. These farmers built up these cooperatives to have service at cost, to raise their standards of living, to have better education for their families, to provide better homes in which to live with more modern conveniences. I want to assure the minister through you, Mr. Speaker, that if the farmer's patronage dividends, when added to the rest of his income, bring him within the taxation brackets he will willingly pay. I have a press clipping from the Free Press of June 18. This is an article by Chester Bloom. I shall not take the time to read it all, but in part he says:

Manitoba farmers led the farmers of all Canada in numbers assessed with income tax in the fiscal year, 1944-45 according to a reply in the house Monday afternoon to a question put by G. H. Castleden (CCF-Yorkton).

The total number of Manitoba farmers assessed that year with income tax was 5,562. Next came Ontario with an even 4,000; Saskatchewan, third was 3,465; Alberta, fourth with 1,316, and British Columbia, fifth with 911. Compared with those numbers, the farmers assessed for income tax in the remainder of the provinces were negligible, as follows: Quebec, 251; Nova Scotia, 83; Prince Edward Island, 82, and New Brunswick, 44.

According to the Canada Year Book, the latest figures given for the numbers of farms in these provinces were shown as follows: Manitoba, 57,810; Saskatchewan, 138,370; Ontario, 175,749; Alberta, 98,985; British Columbia, 25,980; Quebec, 151,850; Nova Scotia, 32,401; Prince Edward Island, 12,144; New Brunswick, 31,731.

That shows that the farmers of Manitoba will pay their income tax if they have anything to pay it with.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BRYCE: To continue from where I left off before supper, perhaps I should touch on some material I have received from the Winnipeg grain exchange; at least it came in one of their envelopes, containing a number of advertisements, which appeared in the western papers, prepared by the grain exchange and putting their point of view before the farming population of Canada.

The first advertisement says, "Who dares speak for Mr. Prairie Farmer?" Well, I can assure hon. members that I have been speaking for the prairie farmer in Manitoba for twenty-five years. I have always spoken on his behalf, both when I was on the farm and when I was president of the Manitoba federation of agriculture, and to-day as member for Selkirk I am still speaking for the farmer. I have nothing but the good and the prosperity of the Canadian farmer at heart, and I am sure that the rest of my days will be spent in working for the advancement of the farmer.

The first advertisement outlines wheat prices in the United States and at Fort William, the two main trading centres. It says, "You get less than $1.55 in Canada. The United States farmer gets $2.18 a bushel for his wheat." I do not think very much of this argument. The grain exchange omitted to tell our farmers that the United States price must conform to the ceiling set by the United States authorities; it is said to be related to the American formula for parity with the things the United States farmer has to buy, and it cannot be considered a world price. Taking the general necessaries of life, the common things we need to buy, I think everybody will agree that a Canadian bushel of wheat at $1.55 will buy as much in Canada as a United States bushel of wheat at $2.18 will buy in the United States. No doubt the grain exchange or some individual can point out that automobiles and oil are cheaper in the United States; but if we take the necessaries of life which the farmer has to buy for his own family, the one bushel of wheat will buy as much as the other.

It is claimed by the Winnipeg grain exchange that the open market would bring the price of wheat up to the United States price, which they claim is the world price. I do not agree with that. Let us look at our experience of the past when the open market prevailed. Two years after the beginning of the war, to be exact, on February 2, 1942, hon. members will find that the Winnipeg May price was eighty cents and the Chicago May price was $1.29.

Mr. JACKMAN: How can you tell?

Mr. BRYCE: By the papers of that day.

Mr. JACKMAN: With the grain exchange operating?

Mr. BRYCE: A difference of approximately fifty cents. It is really only forty-nine cents, but there were fractions, and I am not quite clear what the fractions were. If the argument of this advertisement is of any value, why at that time was there a fifty cent spread? And the Winnipeg grain exchange did nothing about it when they had an open market to work on.

In the Searle grain report of Wednesday, April 13, 1946, it says, "The exchange does not make the price"; so why bring this argument in, and flood western Canada with it, when with an open market we could get no more for our grain?

I have been an advocate of a wheat board which could guarantee a steady price from year to year so that the farmer knows what he is going to get for his produce. In any other industry the person who has something to sell takes into consideration, in setting the selling price of his product, the cost of production plus a reasonable return for his labour. The farmer was forced to take what the grain exchange was willing to give him.

Mr. FAIR: What was left after the grain exchange got theirs, you mean.

Mr. BRYCE: That is right. He has had to sell his product in a market controlled by someone else and to buy the necessaries of life in a market controlled by someone else. There are many hon. members who remember the great demand by the private grain trade after the last world war that the wheat board be discontinued, and the farmer allowed to get the price to which he was entitled.

Mr. FAIR: And the same cry in 1932.

Mr. BRYCE: The same cry to-day by the same people. When the grain exchange came into the open market in August, 1920, wheat was $2.73 a bushel. But let us look at October of the following year; wheat was back down to $1.09. What benefit was the open market to us in those days? None whatever. Had the wheat board been continued, we at least would have had a steady price and an equal price for everybody instead of a fluctuating market.

Then, coming to December 16, 1932, with the open market still in full control, wheat dropped to the lowest record on record, 38½ cents, on the Winnipeg market. It has been stated that this was the lowest price for wheat in 400 years. And the Winnipeg grain exchange, which was enjoying an open market, could do nothing about it. No doubt that is when they found out that the grain exchange does not set the price.

Coming back to the advertisement again, it says, "Will you be satisfied with $1.25 for your wheat?" This statement was challenged and corrected by the press on June 19; but the grain exchange people and the private trade kept on using it because, no doubt, it suited their propaganda. Let me read to the house the statement of H. H. Hannam, president of the Canadian federation of agriculture, issued to the press on June 19:

> On returning to Ottawa I am amazed to learn that reports which are entirely erroneous have been circulated in Canada during our absence, about the stand taken by the Canadian delegation while attending the recent international farmers' conference in London.
> One statement at hand referring to the price of wheat says "the delegation stated that western farmers are prepared to accept a minimum wheat price on a long time contract at $1 a bushel with a maximum of $1.25." This statement is so completely untrue that it is ridiculous. No member of the Canadian delegation at any time suggested a long time contract at $1 a bushel or a maximum price of $1.25 a bushel.
> In the official presentation from our delegation to the conference, reference was made to the wheat price programme purely to illustrate the point that Canadian farmers will support the principle of a stabilized price on a long time basis, but no mention whatever was made of any price per bushel in that statement. And the statement was read to the conference without supplementary comment.

[Mr. Bryce.]

To answer the question further, "Will you be satisfied with $1.25 a bushel?" may I say that we have been forced to take a lot less in times past when the grain exchange was in full control.

In the future surpluses will become necessary reserves for the food and agriculture organization. If we ever have surpluses, let us trust our farmers' organizations and the Canadian wheat board, and not the Winnipeg grain exchange, which has failed us in the past.

Further down, this advertisement says that even the British farmer got $1.78 for his wheat this year and that the French farmer was guaranteed $1.78. Let us look at this. The Canadian farmer sells his wheat at Fort William for $1.55 a bushel. It takes approximately twenty cents a bushel to take it to seaboard; that is Montreal or Halifax. So that makes $1.75 for the wheat at seaboard, and to equal the British or the French farmer's price it has to be taken across the ocean for three cents. It must be obvious to any unprejudiced person, or any person who has any sympathy for the people in the countries that have suffered so much, that the price we are receiving over there must be around $1.90, or about all that they can possibly be expected to pay.

We can hope that negotiations now under way will announce a price suitable to both parties; and while agreements may be bilateral for the time being, it will ultimately lead to an international agreement. We must adopt the principles of the united nations food and agricultural organization whose policy is to live and let others live too, sharing the food of a bounteous world.

The grain exchange was opened in 1903 and had a laudable object in view in those days. That was a place where men went to sell wheat and other men went to buy. But that was in 1903 and we have made vast strides since then. The method, while suitable in 1903, is far from being suitable to-day. A farmer who might go and cut wheat to-day with a reaper as in 1903 would be laughed at. He does not do that. He goes with a combine to-day. He is employing more modern ways of harvesting his crop. But the grain exchange is still the same 1903 machine.

Operations on the grain exchange are closed now because they failed to function or were not needed during the war years. During the first war the wheat board was needed because the grain exchange system was found wanting. In the hungry thirties, when the price went to 38½ cents, there were cries all over the country to reestablish the wheat board, and again in the critical years of the second war the wheat board had to be made the sole marketing agency, since the out-of-date grain exchange system was not needed and could not fill the bill.

The wheat board has proved to be a modern way of marketing grain. Why go back to the old method now? In the forty years that the Winnipeg grain exchange has existed, I would point out to hon. members that there have been eighteen commissions in all which have sat and inquired into its operations. I know many hon. members admit that, but point out that the commissions never found anything wrong. But I am sure that when an organization needs a commission appointed approximately once in every two or three years to inquire into its business, there is an impression that something is very wrong; and looking over those commissions which have sat over the last forty years one asks who sat on them and how many farmers were on them. Had there been some bona fide farmers on those commissions, I am sure that some of the conclusions arrived at would have been much different.

One of the last times I spoke in the house I spoke of parasites in the grain trade, and I have been reminded by Major Strange, a prominent grain authority at Winnipeg, that he has never seen any parasites in the grain trade. I never thought that Major Strange would take my statement to mean the employees of the grain companies. Far from it; when I speak of parasites in the grain trade I am talking about the man who has the gambling instinct, the instinct to buy and sell to make easy money, speculating on the grain exchange.

I recognize the research work that has been done by the different companies, but that has nothing to do with speculation on the grain exchange. The man who has that gambling instinct in his blood can go to the horse races or to the greyhound track. I know from experience that when you go to the races you do not hurt the jockey; you do not hurt the racehorse; you only hurt yourself. But if a man starts gambling in the food of a nation, then he is harming others. He is creating false markets and is depriving the farmer of that steady market which should exist for twelve months of the year.

Look at rye to-day. It is a disgrace to Canada that this government ever allowed speculation to continue in rye. I have statistics from the Sanford Evans statistical service, and if you follow these figures through 1944, 1945 and 1946 you will find that when the farmer was unloading his rye it was always cheaper than when he had no rye to sell.

If the farmer sold his rye when the markets were high he would get a high price, but the market is high only when he has nothing to sell. Moreover, as my hon. friends know, taxes, mortgages, agreements of sale and other expenses generally have to be paid in the fall and the farmer is forced to sell at this time when the price has always been much lower.

It would be interesting to know how many bushels of rye have been sold in 1946—rye that never existed or was never grown. When the grain exchange was asked for this information it did not think it was in the best interests of the people to give it. We can rest assured, however, that the visible supply of rye was sold many times, over and over again.

In conclusion, I do not think I could express my views better than to quote from an editorial in the Western Producer of July 4, 1946:

> Public memory is notoriously short, but the farmer we believe retains his longer than the average. He will not yet have forgotten the tragic recurrence of slump and boom which has transformed the basic business of farming into almost a gambling venture. We do not propose to go into particulars here, but in the time-honoured tradition of the after-dinner speaker, we may be permitted to make a point by recounting an illuminating and absolutely true story. One of the giants of the world grain and milling business was recently discussing the future of wheat. He is a convinced believer in the "open market" and made no bones about it. One of his listeners ventured to suggest that if the grain exchanges were allowed to operate freely at the moment wheat would almost certainly advance sharply. He wondered whether this big operator with huge milling interests would welcome such an advance? He got his answer. "Three dollar wheat," said the operator, "is the quickest and the shortest way to fifty cent wheat."

That remark is one which every farmer should ponder long and deeply.

But why go on? The overwhelming majority of western farmers have, time and again, demonstrated their unanimity on certain vital points. Among them are these: they want the Winnipeg grain exchange erased, blotted out, done away with for all time; they want the wheat board recognized and accepted as a permanent part of the marketing system; and, to take the place of the madly fluctuating "open market", they want a negotiated, stable price fixed from time to time at a level acceptable to the producer and the consumer. These are the truths which the farmer holds to be self-evident and about which there is no argument.

In one of the last grain bulletins to come to my desk the editor refers to the so-called farm organizations being cooperatives and not representing the farmers. There are many farmers in the farm organizations who do not belong to the pools or other cooperatives—I am one of those who do not belong to the pool—but for the grain exchange to come along and claim to represent fifty per cent of the western farmers is too funny for words.

Let the record speak for itself. Since the days of the patrons of industry right up to the present time the grain exchange and private grain trade have fought against every move the farmer has made to improve his condition. Think of the fights that have been put up regarding: (1) The expulsion of the first farmers' grain company from the Winnipeg grain exchange for their announced intention to pay patronage dividends. (2) The lobbying by the grain trade for the discontinuance of the Canadian wheat board in 1920. (3) The bitter campaign of misrepresentation by the grain trade against the wheat pools in 1929 and subsequent years. (4) The violent opposition of the grain trade to the present wheat board established in 1935.

Oh, no, no farmer who has lived on these western plains and produced the grain by the sweat of his brow over the last forty years will ever forget these things. Speculation and gambling in food with two-thirds of of the world hungry and starving cannot and will not be tolerated. The grain exchange is doomed. The writing is on the wall; it is there in large electric lights. Orderly marketing is the modern way.

Mr. Speaker, my last words are, let us remember that in many farm homes, men and women, regardless of present prosperity, long for the day when stabilization and reasonable security will replace fear of the future.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): In rising to take part in this debate I am almost tempted to answer the remarks which I heard around me just before I rose to my feet. One hon. member said that this looks like Caledonia night. I say to the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce), do not be discouraged. I remember when I came to the house back in 1930. When I made my first speech I was told that there were only two languages permitted in the House of Commons, namely, the French and the English. I can tell the hon. member that since that day hon. members have understood, if not by words, at least by gestures, all I really meant to convey.

My first words are to compliment the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) on the budget which he has just brought down. I wish to compliment him not only on the present budget, but on his handling of the finances of Canada during six strenuous years of war. It has been my good fortune to sit in the house under six finance ministers. I recall each and every one of them, but I have one particularly in mind, who I now understand lives among the mighty in Montreal. I refer to the Hon. Charles Dunning. I well remember him as minister of finance, on being asked to expand the amount given to the old age pensioners, rising in his place and asking, where will the money come from? He is probably remembered to this day as the man who asked that question. The Minister of Finance has answered that question fully, because by his ability and the efforts of his officials he has raised the largest amount of money to be expended throughout the years of war that has ever been raised by any finance minister since confederation. We were disappointed when we heard rumours that the Minister of Finance would, perforce, have to take a holiday. All hon. members who know something of the work of the cabinet ministers realize that there has been no harder worked cabinet minister or one who has burned the midnight oil longer than the present Minister of Finance. However, I was not surprised when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) announced to the house that he would take advantage of the well earned holiday of the Minister of Finance by asking him to go to Geneva to represent Canada at the Geneva conference. I am not at all surprised at the Prime Minister doing that, because a more able minister he could not have chosen.

Since the Minister of Finance has consented to go to Geneva the country and parliament should have a statement from him on his return and from the Prime Minister on his return from the Paris conference regarding the many conflicting statements which have been appearing in the press in regard to conditions in Europe. I am going to draw the attention of the Minister of Finance to a statement accusing UNRRA of a grave charge. I shall ask him to investigate this and other matters as well in connection with UNRRA when he goes to Geneva. On his return I trust that in his official capacity as representing the government he will be able to inform the house just what is going on there. The statement to which I refer appeared in the National Home Monthly of Winnipeg, of May, 1946, and was written by Leonard Mosley. The magazine may be found in the reading room. Mr. Mosley writes:

> Any afternoon this spring, in the narrow streets behind Omonia square, in Athens, you can see large groups of pinched and ragged urchins slopping miserably about in the mud. All around them piled high on barrows and stalls are the shoes that should be on their bare feet, the coats that should be warming their ricketty bodies, and the tins of food they should be eating. But the shoes cost $160 a pair, the coats $240 each, and the meat, butter or beans $6 a can. Yet Canada and Britain and America paid for all those goods on these black market barrows. They are UNRRA goods sent to this country at our expense to keep these Greek urchins . . . and the story of how they got on to the black market is typical of what happens to UNRRA in a land like this . . .
> In the six months which ended last December UNRRA imported into Greece $18,000,000 worth of foodstuffs and another $56,000,000 worth of clothing . . . that, combined with internal resources, should have given every Greek 2,000 calories daily . . . and clothed all who really needed it . . . despite some magnificent work by Canadian, American and British personnel in Greece, the supplies that should have saved the lives of hundreds of people were diverted to the black market or blocked by Greek officials for political reasons.

Then Mr. Mosley goes on to tell the entire shocking story. If these statements are true I think it is time we reviewed the entire situation. What is everybody's business is nobody's business. If those conditions exist, in my opinion it would have been far better, and would be better now, if Canada handled the distribution of her own goods. The people of this country have contributed largely to the funds of UNRRA; yet the goods have not reached the people for whom they were intended. Then this writer speaks about surpluses in Denmark. I trust the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) will travel through these countries and, when they come back, tell the people of this country and parliament just what they have actually seen. These statements and letters which have been appearing in the newspapers from people who have held high official positions in these countries, are disquieting. Just a few days ago I saw that Right Hon. Anthony Eden in Britain had asked where all the wheat was going, and a blue paper brought down in the British House of Commons stated that some twelve million tons of wheat had been made available to Britain and to Europe. Is it any wonder that the people of Britain are beginning to get restless, the people who bore the brunt of battle for six long years and who now have to queue up for bread? It is not due to the fact that Canada has not sent enough supplies, because we have; but if the wheat and other goods are being used to play what are called power politics, we should be informed. I believe parliament should have a complete statement on the return of the Prime Minister and the other two ministers. We also read articles in which it is stated that American wives in Berlin, for instance, can obtain more goods there than can be obtained in the United States. I am not going to take up the time of the house by mentioning all the goods these American women found in Berlin only a month ago, but the article says plenty of butter, plenty of clothing and plenty of other goods can be obtained in Berlin. I do not want to labour the question, but if these statements are true something should be done about it, and if they are not true an official statement should be made by the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Health and Welfare or the Minister of Finance on their return to this country.

Leaving that matter for the moment and coming to the question of dollar parity, may I say that I for one was particularly pleased when the minister announced that our Canadian dollar would be equal in value to the American dollar. As a matter of fact the Canadian dollar is the best dollar in the world to-day. There are people in the United States who for some time have been coming to Canada whenever they wished to send funds to European countries. Why? Because the Canadian dollar is recognized in Europe as the best dollar in the world; yet for a number of years it has been at a discount in the United States. I happened to be in that country the day it was announced that price ceilings would be lifted, and I took it upon myself to ask both merchants and men on the street how they felt on the matter and if they liked the idea. I also inquired as to their views in regard to the reason for lifting price ceilings. Here are some of the answers I received, not only from merchants but from quite a number of others as well. "The black markets have got out of hand," they said, and they quoted the case of butter as but one example. The ceiling price on butter had been set at around sixty-two cents. You could not get any at that price; but one person said, "Give me $1.25 for each pound, and I will get you all the butter you want." Another person I met said there was a great shortage of nylon stockings, and asked if I knew where they were. I said, no, I did not. "Well," he said, "they are down in Mexico." Apparently higher prices are being obtained in Mexico for many products manufactured in the United States; hence the shortages that have existed in that country for some considerable time.

There is another matter I should like to mention. I do not know whether we can do anything about it, but I want to draw it to the attention of the minister. For some time past there has been excessive buying by Americans on the Canadian side, of goods which are not obtainable in their own country. Only the other day I had a letter from a dealer in tires, who told me it was impossible now to buy a tire, that for the last two months nearly all available tires have been bought and picked up by United States tourists. It is true that we like to have their money; it sort of balances trade; but, after all, if we are to be kept under strict rationing and price ceilings I believe we should keep our eye on the amount of scarce goods which are being taken across the line out of the country.

That brings me to a thought I had in regard to black markets, and for a moment or two I should like to deal with the accusations that have been made in regard to the black markets in lumber in British Columbia. Before doing so, however, in commenting upon the dollar parity I may say I suppose it all depends whose ox is being gored; but I believe it is best for the general welfare of Canada that this has been done. I am going to mention one or two articles in which we will benefit. We in British Columbia import our gasoline in the form of crude oil. Removal of the ten per cent discount will mean a lower price, unless of course there is a price increase in the United States; but in any event it should mean that we can purchase our crude oil for ten per cent less. Then the cities and municipalities whose bonds are still held in the United States, and on which a ten per cent premium had to be paid, will save considerable money. Money will be saved also on any machinery that must be bought in the United States. I know this change will affect gold mining. Here again, however, the entire industry of gold mining depends largely upon the fictitious price of $35 an ounce set by the United States; and whatever they do with the price of gold will affect gold mining in Canada far more than bringing our dollar to parity.

What I am a little perturbed about, however, is the great drop in the exchange value of the pound. When the United States dollar was at a premium of ten per cent the British pound was also at a premium of ten per cent; but when the minister announced the removal of the premium, bringing the dollar to parity, the British pound dropped almost out of sight. At least it dropped to $4.02, buying, and $4.04, selling. I suppose this has been done because the British pound in the United States has been set at that price. But that is going to affect us far more than the parity of our dollar with the United States dollar. Before the war, to a great extent we depended upon Great Britain as a market for our wheat, our lumber and our fish. I do not know about the lumberman, because he is not subsidized, but I do know that the Canadian farmer and the Canadian fisherman will probably not recognize that a change has taken place, because the government will pay the guaranteed price in Canadian funds. But when it comes to a question of lumber, I am just wondering what will happen to the lumbering industry. How are they going to get along? I know there are those who say, "It will be all the better for us, if no lumber is exported; we shall have more lumber." That may be true for the present, Mr. Speaker, but I am taking a long-range view. Before the war, sixty per cent of the lumber produced in British Columbia was sold on world markets, and we depended upon those world markets to supply us with the money with which to buy millions of dollars worth of goods in the protected markets of Quebec and Ontario.

I hope trade between Great Britain and Canada is encouraged. I hope it will be an incentive for us to buy more British goods; because, unless we do, I cannot see, after looking at the trade figures, just how Great Britain is going to continue to trade with this country. That is the way it strikes me, after examining the trade figures from 1939 to the present time.

Coming back to the United States dollar, I have all the trade figures of that country before me, and I know this is only one small aspect of the entire picture of dollar parity. We have an adverse trade balance with the United States of $1,668 million for the calendar years 1939 to 1945. This means in dollar exchange that we paid them over $166 million more than we should have paid them. No explanation has yet been given for the drop in value of the British pound. The value of the British pound was $4.64; it is now placed at $4.02. I wonder what that will mean to our people here, especially if there were no subsidy and no guaranteed price being paid. It would be just a little unfortunate. I remember the days from 1930 to 1935 when the pound went down to $3.63, and I remember the cry which went up from the prairie farmers about the great losses which occurred during those years when we got only $3.63 for each British pound's worth of wheat purchased from Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: The pound sterling dropped ten per cent, like the United States dollar. The hon. member's figures are not quite correct.

Mr. REID: I thought the British pound was $4.64.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, $4.45.

Mr. REID: Then I shall have to accept the minister's figures. I know they are correct, or he would not quote them. And, having those figures in view, the outlook is not just as dark as I thought it was.

To come to the question of lumber, the accusation has been made by legion bodies and by other responsible bodies in British Columbia that black markets in lumber are operating extensively. I do not know whether they are or not; but it should be the responsibility of the government to have the matter investigated. Such charges are serious, indeed.

There is no one but must admire the creditable task performed by the minister's department in holding down price ceilings. On July 1 newspapers were appearing in various places stating that rents would go up ten to twenty per cent in the United States, food $250 a year and clothing $100 a year for a family of four. That is only the beginning. I am one who believes implicitly that most lines under the ceiling should remain there until our shelves in Canada are stacked with ample goods for the people who require them and who now have the money to buy them. I support the minister to the utmost in the efforts made by him and his officials to hold down certain price ceilings.

May I offer one criticism, however, respecting some of the rental regulations. We in British Columbia feel that the officials are not too kindly disposed to us in that province. I have particularly in mind rental control. All hon. members know something of the scarcity of homes to-day. But in my opinion there are some landlords who are taking a terrific beating during these past six years. The regulations have been such as to prevent many people from opening their homes and taking in those needing housing accommodation. They realize that under present regulations, having taken persons in, it is impossible to have them removed.

It would seem that the rental regulations were made primarily for the eastern and central provinces, and perhaps for the prairies as well. Mind you, I am not advocating that a person should be thrown out indiscriminately, but under the regulations one cannot evict a tenant between September and April. Well, those who prepared those regulations must have known little about the salubrious climate we have on the Pacific coast. These regulations are for the benefit of climates running to twenty or thirty degrees below zero.

Some of the letters I have received are almost pathetic. For instance, only the other day I received a letter from a man who had been a veteran of both world wars. He bought a home for his daughter, who married a veteran. But, although he owns that home, do you think he can get the tenant out? No, he cannot. Under the regulations he is not permitted to do so. You cannot force them out, and some of them simply thumb their noses at the landlords. And, as has been suggested to me just now, some are doing that very thing, quite literally.

The argument is made that the regulation is to especially protect ex-service men. I have in my filing cabinet information respecting at least six ex-service men who have bought homes within the past year, but who cannot get into them. The tenants are simply saying that they will not move. I am asking the Minister of Finance to consider this matter seriously, because some of these owners are taking a terrific beating.

For instance, I have one case in mind where the tenant is making six times more money than the landlord.

Mr. MacNICOL: I know of the same kind of case.

Mr. REID: The landlord has to do all the repairs, pay the taxes and attend to the general upkeep of the building. Since the war began, the tenant has subdivided and sublet the entire building, and has been drawing five or six times more rental than the owner of the building. I draw this to the attention of the minister. It is all very well just to gloss it over; but these things are doing something to our people; they are doing a great deal of harm, something which will embitter them for many years to come.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What would you do about it?

Mr. REID: There is one thing I would do; I would take these rental appeals out of the hands of lawyer judges. I would get men who had a little more humanity in them, men who were not bench-trained in the law, men who did not cross every "t" and dot every "i".

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Humanity for the tenant or humanity for the landlord; which do you want?

Mr. REID: Wherever humanity was most required, I would have it administered.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Throw one out and leave another in.

Mr. REID: If you want any further explanation I shall be glad to give it to you after I am through, but I should like to finish my speech.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You cannot give it.

Mr. REID: My hon. friend is a great interrupter; he is one of those who can give it out but who cannot take it. I do not like rude interruptions. I have a speech that I want to deliver and some of the interruptions are almost impertinent.

I should like to come back to the question of lumber. I think the prices board did wrong in lifting the ceiling on the prices of logs. I can tell the minister the twofold effect this is having. First, taking the ceiling off the price of logs in British Columbia is forcing the small, independent mill man out of business and is gradually concentrating control in the hands of the large mill man who has his own woods operations. Second, taking the ceiling off has brought up the price of No. 3 logs to a point where it is almost equal to the wholesale price of lumber.

To-day No. 3 logs in the open market cost $25 per 1,000 feet, whereas the wholesale price of lumber is $27 per 1,000 feet. The prices of No. 1 and No. 2 logs are much higher. No. 1 logs, which cost $24.50 per 1,000 feet in 1940 cost $40 per 1,000 feet at the present time. No. 2 logs, which cost $19.50 per 1,000 feet at that time, are now worth $30 per 1,000 feet. Back in 1940 No. 3 logs cost $14.50 per 1,000 feet and, as I said, they now cost $25. I am going to suggest to the minister and the government that it is high time some real inquiry took place in regard to the entire lumber situation in British Columbia. On the one hand, wages, the price of logs and prices of material have gone up, while, on the other hand, there is a group saying to the government, "Do not allow lumber prices to rise." I am not going farther into the question this evening other than to draw the attention of the minister to the seriousness of the situation and suggest that it is high time it was investigated.

Coming back to the budget, I was pleased, and I suppose every hon. member was pleased, to hear the announcement made that farmers and fishermen would now be allowed three years over which to spread their income. That will be of inestimable value to our farmers. In answer to the criticism that this period should be five years, I would reply that the farmer can take any three years he wishes. He can take the next year, the fourth year or the fifth year and spread his income back over any three years. I think the announcement made by the minister will be well received.

I should like to say a word now with regard to what the government has done in the budget in connection with cooperatives. There has been a great deal of confused thinking and speaking since the announcement was made, in regard to the taxation of cooperatives and allowing patronage dividends to be free of tax. I listened to one speaker, a member of the C.C.F., who rightly said that cooperatives should be encouraged and that people should be encouraged who endeavour to lift themselves up by their bootstraps. Of course all these people should be helped. I doubt if there is an hon. member in this House of Commons who is not in favour of advancing and helping the cause of the cooperatives.

I am a little surprised, however, at some of the statements that have been made by members of the C.C.F., especially those who spoke so frequently against profits shortly after the inception of their party. It is a well known fact that there are cooperatives which are strictly profit-making organizations, and there is the true cooperative, the one where men band together, profitably to themselves it is true, but not with their eye on getting profits, the kind of profits so glibly connected with free enterprise or the capitalist movement. Under this budget, that organization which is a cooperative in the true sense of the word is actually helped.

I have the honour to represent a constituency in which is located one of the most successful buying cooperatives in Canada. This organization has 2,300 members and has an annual turnover of $2,000,000. They buy wheat and grain from the prairies and they charge just about the same as the other milling associations. Naturally they have a surplus or profit, but that profit is distributed among the members in the form of patronage dividends and so will not be taxable. Where in fairness, therefore, can any charge be made against the Liberal government that they are trying to keep down the cooperatives?

Some people again try to link the cooperatives with socialism. I well remember in the early days of my youth when our family was a member of the Scottish cooperative association, one of the finest in the world. Will any hon. member rise in his place and say that they are not a profit-making organization? They had a regular slogan in those days, "The more you eat, the bigger the dividend." The prices they charged were exactly the same as those charged next door, but with this difference. Instead of one man getting the profits, they were distributed among the members of the cooperative association as patronage dividends. Make no mistake; they are really profits as we know them.

There are cooperatives in this country which are just as capitalistic as any capitalist organization one could name. They are not true cooperatives in fact at all. To my mind, the action of the government will clarify the entire situation and at the same time help the true cooperatives.

I should like to deal for a minute or two with income taxation. I suppose the ideal state would be one in which we could carry on our business without the imposition of any taxes at all. However, I would remind hon. members that during the war, when the large budgets were being brought down, the only members who protested against borrowing money were the Social Crediters. We were all willing that the government issue victory bonds and no one rose in his place and said, "Mr. Speaker, I say to the Minister of Finance that we should not borrow; we should pay our war expenditure 100 per cent." The only ones who talked differently were the members of the Social Credit group who were against borrowing money.

To my mind, what the minister has done in this budget is outstanding. Starting with 1943, we had a deficit of over $2,500 million. We issued bonds for that; we borrowed for that deficit and no one was greatly perturbed. In 1944-45 we again had a deficit of over $2,500 million. From 1943 to 1946 the deficits of this country totalled $7,151,217,000. Now we have this budget showing a deficit for 1946-47 estimated to be not over $300,000,000. In addition, the Minister of Finance tells us that in the following year he expects to be able actually to balance the budget. I think that is sensational, and it is something which we can be justly proud of. I have listened to the wail of those who say that the income tax is too onerous; but if the bank deposits and the bonds held by the people of this country are any criterion, I am surprised that anyone would squeal about taxation. In 1939 the bank deposits of all individuals amounted to $1,678,363,561. Note what it is to-day? Bank deposits held in the names of individuals are up to $3,305,701,658. Further, take the bonds held by individuals; in the nine victory loans which we have issued successfully under the guidance of the Minister of Finance, they hold $12,355,000,000. As a matter of fact, if everyone agreed that what they own would be given to wipe off the debt we would have no debt left at all. That is a revolutionary idea, I know, but when people talk about a jubilee by wiping off the debt, remember, whether we agree with the idea or not, that there is as much money in the hands of the twelve million people of Canada to-day as would wipe out the dominion debt. When they get up and talk about taxation hurting I say for numbers of our people this is going too far. The thing just does not make sense.

I have just one word to say on the dominion-provincial conference, and then I will close, because I see I am just about through as far as time is concerned. I am one of those who was greatly disappointed at the lack of results of the conference. I want, however, to make one or two comments regarding the recent offer made by the Minister of Finance to the provinces. I should like to have seen the minister attach to these proposals the suggested social security measures. I think it is a mistake to allow the two central provinces forever to run this country. I say that openly, and I do not think it can be successfully contradicted. I am thinking particularly of the old age pensioners in British Columbia, who were looking for the acceptance by all the provinces of the proposals made at the conference; and I am going to ask the Minister of Finance to think over this point seriously. When the old age pension legislation was put into effect in 1927 the wage level, taking 1939 as 100, stood at 97. To-day the price level stands at 137, forty points up. If $20 were considered enough in 1927, what must the need be to-day, when the wage level has increased forty points? Reference was made by one of the ministers about freezing the cost of living bonus which has been given to civil servants and making it permanent. Well, I am all for it. But I do not know what answer I will give to the old age pensioners of British Columbia who ask me, "Why should these people who are working get more by way of a cost of living bonus than the small amount the government now gives us?" I say to the minister, give the matter of old age pensions some thought, and if he can, revise the proposal to the various provinces, because if he can get seven to agree to his financial proposals with the social security measures which were enunciated included, it will go a long way to bring the other two into line.

I have only time for one word more. I saw in the paper the other day a statement made by the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Bracken). It reads:

> New offer by the dominion government to deal with the provinces individually in making new tax agreements substitutes coercion for consultation and brings the danger of "Balkanization" to Canadian relations, in the opinion of John Bracken, Progressive Conservative leader.
> In a speech prepared for delivery over a national radio network Wednesday night, Mr. Bracken declared that if he had been in the position of Prime Minister at the recently indefinitely adjourned conference an agreement would have been reached.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that, holding the position he does as leader of the Conservative party and as leader of the official opposition, he should come into this house and tell the house and the country in what particular he would have offered terms to the provinces differing from or better than that of the Minister of Finance. He owes that answer to the country. I leave that suggestion with him.

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the concluding remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat, I would not presume to speak for my leader, but I will say I am sure that if the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) had been in charge of the dominion-provincial conference he would never have held a big club in the manner in which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) did over the provinces. I think it is well understood that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance really wanted the conference to fail, in order to get out of many of the social security measures which they had promised and which they knew they could not fulfil.

Mr. ILSLEY: I deny that.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): The minister may deny it, but he will find there are many people in Canada who believe that he and the Prime Minister were looking for an alibi to get out of their obligations.

In regard to the remarks of the hon. member with reference to rent control and rental regulations, I wish to say only a word. The hon. member referred to the manner in which these regulations were administered and suggested that they be taken out of the hands of the county judges. But I would point out to him that the judges did not draw up these regulations; all they can do is to interpret them, and those who practise law will, I think, agree with me when I say that these rental regulations are in many instances, both ridiculous and absurd. After all, what else can one expect when they are drawn up and put into force by this autocratic and bureaucratic wartime prices and trade board.

The hon. member referred to the difficulty of returning veterans who wished to buy a home or to secure rented accommodation. Every member who has had anything to do with them knows the restrictions under which the soldier has to operate. I remember that, speaking in this house some two years ago, I suggested that these rental regulations should be reviewed and that they should not apply to every little hamlet and four corners throughout the country.

The hon. member has just mentioned that many people who in normal circumstances would be willing to rent part of their houses, a flat or a room, when they are advised that once they let a tenant in he is in "for the duration", simply say, no. After all, in many cases one cannot blame them.

I only wish to deal with one item in regard to the budget, and that is the resolution which deals with the amendment to the Succession Duty Act, and which reads:

> That rates of tax upon or in respect of any succession upon the death of a person after December 31, 1946, shall be twice the rates presently in force and that the tax paid to the government of any province in respect of the same succession be allowed as a deduction from the tax payable under the Dominion Succession Duty Act up to but not exceeding one-half of the tax otherwise payable under the said act.

In this regard, I should like to refer to certain remarks of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mayhew), as reported in Hansard, at page 3259:

> The impression created by editorials and statements appearing in the press is that the dominion has doubled the rate of succession duties that will apply on estates in 1947. How such a gross misstatement of the facts could have been seriously advanced is beyond my comprehension. The dominion's proposal was simply that the rates of duty under the dominion act would be doubled and that any duty paid to a province would be offset against the dominion duty up to one-half the amount of the increased dominion duty. Since existing provincial duties are now generally as high as or higher than one-half the increased dominion duty, in general there will be no increase in total duty under the change.

I would emphasize the last line, that in general there will be no increase in the total duty under the change. In the budget speech of the Minister of Finance, at page 2905 of Hansard there is a forecast of the estimated amount of succession duties to be $24 million as compared with $21 million for the year 1945-46. That is an increase of $3 million for a period of only three months as far as the new rates are concerned, and for a period of twelve months the increase on the same basis would be $12 million. In the same budget speech, at page 2924, the Minister of Finance estimates that the succession duty collected in one full year under the new rate will be from $48 million to $50 million, less whatever amount is allowed for duty paid to the province.

If the succession duties are increased at least $12 million a year, it is hardly fair or reasonable for the Minister of Finance or the parliamentary assistant to say that there has been no increase. I contend that in the average small estate there will be the full increase of 100 per cent in dominion succession duties after the first of January, 1947, and the parliamentary assistant, at page 3259, gave two examples of how the double increase would work out. Unfortunately, however, he took only two large estates. He took one of $50,000 and one of $2 million, but he made no mention of the average small estate which would be exempt from provincial duty, except for the following remarks which are found at page 3259:

> There may also be individual cases where the dominion taxes a succession which the province does not tax or possibly taxes a succession in a manner different from the provincial practice where the duty under the dominion's proposal might be increased. In these cases, however, the increase would normally be relatively small in amount, and would not affect the general statement that the level of succession duties in Canada has not been raised.

That is very plain English; and, coming from the parliamentary assistant, I take it that the Minister of Finance contends that there will be no increase under the dominion succession duty rates except for the remarks about a relatively small amount which would not affect the general statement that the level of succession duties in Canada has not been raised.

I would refer the minister to the following example. In the province of Ontario, in all estates up to $25,000 which pass to preferred beneficiaries there is no succession duty payable to the province, and in estates passing to those in the collateral class there is no duty up to $10,000. My contention is that in all these estates up to $25,000 that pass to preferred beneficiaries, the heirs are going to be called upon to pay an increase of 100 per cent in succession duty to the Dominion of Canada.

The Minister of Finance and his parliamentary assistant may consider this increase, to use their own language, a relatively small amount, but I would point out that these small estates are the ones least able to bear any increase in succession duty. There may be some justification for taxing large estates; but in my opinion the imposition of succession duties on small estates is only legalized robbery; and I say to the Minister of Finance that if it is his contention that there is to be no increase in dominion succession duties, then he should see that some provision is made whereby this full 100 per cent increase will not apply to any estate which is not taxable in the province.

If I am wrong in my contention that there is a full 100 per cent increase in succession duty rates as I have outlined, I shall be glad if the minister or his parliamentary assistant will correct me. While I have not the figures before me, I am quite satisfied that it is the average small estate that makes up the bulk of the succession duties collected. The same thing applies to income tax. It is the average small taxpayer who makes up the great bulk of the taxes collected, because only last Friday, at page 3404 of Hansard, to show the enormous amount of income tax paid by the low income tax group, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott) said that if the exemption were raised to $1,200 for single men and $2,000 for married men there would be a loss of revenue of some $325 million.

There is the further point that if the Minister of Finance does make an arrangement with a province or all the provinces and the provinces give up their right to collect succession duties, the natural thing that will happen is that the dominion rates will rise, because I recall that during the last dominion-provincial conference the Minister of Finance made a statement to the effect, or at any rate I took the inference from what he said, that if the provinces vacated the field of succession duty the dominion would collect more succession duty taxes than are collected at the present time.

I would also point out to the Minister of Finance and the parliamentary assistant that no mention was made in the budget, as far as succession duties are concerned, about an improved method of making assessments or of speeding up the time in which final releases are granted to estates. The dominion allows only six months for payment of succession duties without payment of interest. The minister knows that in many estates it is very difficult within the six-month period to find ready cash to pay the duty without sacrificing certain assets of the estate. If only six months are allowed for payment of duty I contend that in any estate where the fault is the fault of the department in making the assessment there should be no interest penalty. I think the minister would be probably the first to say that that is only fair and reasonable. I should like to give him an example. In a small estate I filed the required papers with the inspector on October 28, 1944. With the papers I sent a cheque for the estimated duty. The assessment notice from the department was received on May 9, 1946, and it was dated the previous day, a delay of almost eighteen months. The assessment claimed a further payment of $846.14 for duty, plus a penalty of $60.29 for interest. I realize that that amount is small; but I ask the minister in all earnestness, why should this particular estate be penalized in the amount of $60.29 for interest when they had absolutely no control over obtaining the final release? The delay was entirely due to the department not making the assessment.

Further, in all cases where there has been an overpayment of duty no interest is allowed. In Ontario, at least interest is allowed where duty is paid in advance. The same conditions apply to income tax payments. Every hon. member has had many cases and knows of others where the assessments are held up for a long time. In some cases they are years late, and when the assessment is finally received the income taxpayer always finds there is a penalty added. But where the taxpayer has overpaid his tax and after a long delay he does receive a cheque he is not allowed any interest.

I regret that in his budget remarks the minister did not say that the income tax collection method would be overhauled and brought up to date. At page 2923 of Hansard the minister did refer to the necessity of having some change made in the method of appeals. At the present time a taxpayer may have a legitimate claim involving a small amount, but under the present complicated and expensive procedure the average taxpayer would be much farther ahead financially to pay the amount assessed.

In regard to the new appeal court announced by the minister, he said that it would have the power to review the discretionary powers now vested in the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann). I suggest that the minister should have no discretionary powers in regard to income tax. There should be one law for everyone and no case should be subject to the discretion of any minister.

The proposed separate board which the minister said is to be set up to advise the minister on the exercise of certain of his discretionary powers—and I emphasize the word "certain"—is far from satisfactory; for, after all, it is only an advisory board and is restricted to advise on certain of his discretionary powers. The minister also referred to the fact that the board was being instructed to explore carefully the possibility of reducing the number of discretions now vested in the minister. Instead of having them review the matter, I would suggest to the minister that he have them all abolished.

While the savings portion of the income tax was abolished on July 1, 1944, the taxpayer who had an income over $3,000, in making his 1945 return, was still obliged to compute the savings portion and then deduct it. So far as the 1946 forms are concerned—I am referring to form T-7 B, which is the form used for individuals who make more than one payment a year, March, June, September and December—I find that they are still obliged to compute the amount of the savings portion. I would think at this late date that the income tax department would have been able to issue a new schedule of rates in which the savings portion of the tax would have been eliminated.

With reference to the change in the rates of income tax for 1947, I say to the minister that it is unfortunate these rates were not set to apply from July 1, 1946, because he will recall that when changes were made in income tax rates during the war years they applied for the then current year. The reduction he has made is small in view of the statement reported in the press to have been made by his colleague the Minister of National Revenue. Speaking at Pembroke in the spring, he was reported in the press across Canada to have stated or suggested that there would be a reduction of fifty per cent in income tax. If the minister was misquoted I have never seen any denial in the papers.

Mr. McCANN: May I make that denial now, Mr. Speaker? I never made any such statement, and the hon. member knows it.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is after the budget.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): I can only say that the Minister of National Revenue has a very fine press agent, because the statement was displayed on the front page of every newspaper across Canada, and the minister must have seen it.

Mr. McCANN: On a question of privilege, this statement has been made on several occasions by hon. members, particularly the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken). I did not speak in Pembroke; I did speak in Renfrew on March 11, and I am not responsible for the headlines; they are written by somebody else. The statement which I did make, and which is reported correctly in the Ottawa Journal of Tuesday, March 12, is as follows. I said:

> I have no doubt that when parliament meets announcement will be made about bringing down the budget. We have reason to hope that the budget will be sharply reduced. I cannot say how much it will be reduced although some of us hope we can cut our expenditures by fifty per cent. I think we can look forward over the year to decreased taxation but this will depend entirely on public opinion. In recent years there has been a growing demand for increased social services, this is a democracy and as such must conform to the views of the people at large. It is up to the people what scale of taxation they wish. If social services are increased levels of taxation will naturally be higher than without these services.

There is nothing in the statement which I made, or in the speech which I made, that would justify the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) or other members who have spoken with reference to this matter crediting to me a statement such as he did, and a statement which I had not any occasion to make.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is that it is unfortunate the minister waited until after the budget and at this late day to make the correction.

In my opinion the income tax exemptions, which are now $750 and $1,500, are not sufficient. They should be at least $2,000 for a married person and $1,000 for a single person, with increased allowances for children. No one will dispute the statement that the cost of living has increased from 50 to 100 per cent over 1939; yet a married man with a family is permitted to deduct from his taxable income only $300 per child, while the amount allowed for the wife is also very small. During the war years the average taxpayer was quite prepared and willing to struggle along and pay these excessive taxes; but, now that the war is over, he is looking for some relief. He wants to be able to buy and enjoy some of the luxuries he was denied during the war years. The salaried taxpayers, often referred to as the white-collar class, have been under a decided hardship during the war, and the budget gives them little relief.

The minister has stated, or someone in his behalf has stated, that he needs this enormous income; but it has been very well pointed out by a number of other speakers in this debate that little if any attempt has been made to reduce controllable expenditures, despite the statement just made by the Minister of National Revenue that the government hopes some expenditures may be reduced fifty per cent. It would be interesting if the minister would indicate in the itemized expenditures which departments are being reduced to this extent. The postponement of the reduction until 1947 may have the further effect of reducing consumer goods. When one remembers the enormous production of clothing and mechanical equipment during the war years it is difficult for the average Canadian to understand just why he cannot buy anything he wishes for his home, why he cannot buy a new suit or a new shirt. It is true one can buy plenty of sport shirts at $5 or $10, but the ordinary white shirt just does not exist. Practically every householder is anxious to buy some type of electrical equipment for which he has been waiting for several years, but at present he has little chance or hope of purchasing an electric stove, a refrigerator or anything of that type. In the province of Ontario the hydro electric power commission has under way a large programme of extending rural lines, but the prospective consumer finds wiring material practically unobtainable, and he is simply out of luck if he tries to purchase electric labour-saving devices. I suggest that the minister review the whole situation, and that the reductions in the corporation tax, the income tax and the excess profits tax be made effective as of July 1, 1946.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I intend to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), reading as follows:

This house regrets:

(1) That the budget does not provide for tax reductions in the calendar year 1946;

(2) That the budget gives no indication of any serious attempt to eliminate extravagance or effect economies in the cost of government;

(3) That the policies of the government are discouraging much needed production.

Mr. RONALD MOORE (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) presented his budget a few days ago. I think we were all impressed by the manner in which he gave the financial picture of the Canadian economy. All sections of the house recognized the effort he put into the preparation of his budget. While, however, we appreciate the sincerity of the minister in dealing with this subject, it was difficult for many of us to see the financial picture of this country in the same bright colours in which it was painted in his statement. It is true, of course, that one must not be too critical at a time when we are entering the reconversion period. The rehabilitation of our servicemen is in itself a problem which will require a great deal of effort and a major plan if our service people are to regain their rightful position in civilian life. The problem of reconversion is another task which will require a great deal of effort. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) has informed us that in a number of industries reconversion has been already completed, but there is still something to be done in this line and until it is completed we cannot consider ourselves on a truly peacetime basis.

This is the first peacetime budget we have experienced in some seven years, and I think it fair to say that the Canadian people were interested to learn what the government intended to do to meet some of the serious problems which have confronted our people for the past few years. I believe perhaps the most serious problem with which our people are to-day confronted is that of housing. There can be no question but that the housing problem has put our people in a difficult position. I do not think it can be said that this problem has developed over the last few years. Housing has been a problem in Canada ever since 1930. We have a tremendous lack of housing due entirely to the fact that the people of Canada have not had at any time sufficient money with which to purchase homes for themselves. In this connection I should like to quote from a series of resolutions passed at a convention of the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities, dealing with housing and related matters, held in the city of Winnipeg in 1938:

Whereas it is demonstrable that many thousands of Canadian families in the lower income groups, in both urban and rural areas, are to-day housed in sub-standard, unsafe and unsanitary dwellings . . .

And whereas the vicious environment of such areas counteracts and offsets the constructive influence of education, public health, social service and religion and contributes to vice, delinquency, dependency and excessive mortality and disease, so that sub-standard housing areas are a source of heavy and uneconomic government expenditures . . .

And whereas it can be shown that the basic reason for the existence of such condition lies in the sheer inability ot many Canadian families to pay the economic rent required for adequate and modern housing accommodation, irrespective of periods of prosperity or depression . . .

And the resolution goes on:

And whereas this aspect of the housing problem being of a universal nature has been and is being handled on a national scale in other countries . . .

Now therefore be it resolved that this conference of mayors petition the government of the Dominion of Canada to introduce without delay an adequately assisted plan, aimed specifically at the provision of housing at low costs and low rents.

That was in 1938, approximately a year and a half before world war II broke out. I am not going to say anything about the conditions which developed after the outbreak of war, because we all realize that the government was too busy with other things to deal with housing on a national scale at that time. But I will say that during the war years the condition did not get any better. It got worse, and to-day we are faced with a problem which cannot be described as anything short of a national emergency. In fact, to-day the housing situation is a national calamity, and I think the government should have taken some steps during the present session of this parliament to deal adequately with that situation.

It is certain a great many of us do not fully realize the shortage of houses that exists in this country to-day. According to the Curtis report, we are short 500,000 homes in this country, and in addition we have another 250,000 which require repair to a greater extent or lesser extent. Other authorities have told us that the veterans returning from Europe alone will need an additional 200,000 homes. This is a situation which calls for action on the part of the government. It is true, of course, that several acts of this parliament have been passed to deal with this situation. The National Housing Act was passed in the late thirties. I think it is fair to say that act has not been able to cope with the situation. It has not been able to solve this housing problem, for the very good reason that the people who do not have homes in this country are those people who do not get a sufficient amount of the national income to permit them to build homes.

A most peculiar situation exists, if one cares to compare the income tax statistics of the country with the housing situation. I have before me a copy of "Taxation Statistics", issued by the Department of National Revenue. According to this government publication, in 1945 there were about 1,340,000 people in Canada earning $1,800 a year or less. According to statistics issued by civic bodies in various cities throughout Canada, it requires approximately $150 a month for a family of five to live under decent conditions, and to maintain a decent standard of living. Obviously, if it requires in the neighbourhood of $1,800 a year for a family to live in decency in this country, and if the total income is only $1,800, they are not going to have sufficient money with which to build homes. That is the crux of the situation to-day.

I have heard many people complain that they have been unable to get assistance, either under the National Housing Act or under the Central Mortgage and Housing corporation, with which to buy homes, for the very good reason that their incomes were not high enough to enable them to take advantage of that legislation. This is particularly true in Manitoba. Many people have mentioned to me that because their yearly wage was in the neighbourhood of $1,600 they were not considered a safe bet on which to lend money for the construction of homes.

As we view these statistics we find that in Canada we are short approximately a million homes, either new construction or homes which should be repaired; and this is about the same number as the number of people who come within these lower income tax brackets.

I submit that if this housing problem is to be solved it can be solved only in one manner, and that is by the government taking hold of the situation, the same as it did in the war years. During the war, if we required production for the army, the navy or the air force, the government simply estimated what was needed for the armed forces, acquired the raw materials and went ahead with the production. Early in the war the government found that they had to have additional plant and factory equipment in order to supply the materials of war. They did not consider how much money they had before they went ahead and built those plants. They simply acquired the materials, the man-power and the other essentials, and built the plants and factories required.

I submit the housing problem will not be solved unless we deal with it in a similar manner. This government should set up a crown company, if you like, to deal with the situation. The purpose of that company would be to produce in Canada the building materials necessary to build these homes. It might even be necessary for them to take over large sections of the forested areas of the country and erect sawmills so as to get the necessary lumber. In those areas of the country where it would not be efficient to build frame buildings, they could go into the production of brick and other materials for the building of homes.

The only difficult problem in this connection would be the production of plumbing equipment. Because of its dependence upon steel production, I admit it would be difficult to produce plumbing equipment in as short a space of time as it would be to produce these other commodities. However, the government should make a start on such a plan as soon as possible. So much for the housing situation.

There is something else which is going to be of some concern to the people of Canada in the very near future. I refer to the growing army of unemployed. The Department of Labour has issued some interesting statistics respecting unemployment in Canada. At present, according to the figures issued by the Department of Labour, we have approximately 210,000 unemployed people in this country. Out of a population of 12,000,000, it is possible that 210,000 unemployed may not be sufficient for us to say that we have an unemployment problem on our hands. But in all fairness I think we must also admit that when we are considering the condition of unemployment there are other factors which should be taken into consideration.

At the present time we have a six-year backlog in civilian production. According to the Department of Reconstruction, a large number of our industries have already been reconverted to peacetime conditions. Except for the odd strike, and for a shortage of materials in certain places, industry is going all-out to supply products used in civilian life. When this backlog has been overtaken, undoubtedly a number of our plants will shut down and men will be laid off.

The same is true with respect to our markets in Europe. We have sent vast sums of money to be invested in Europe, to enable those people to buy Canadian goods. I am not quarrelling with that; I believe it was the only plan to be followed under the circumstances. But we do not want to forget this, that the day is coming when Europe will be reconstructed, when her factories will be rebuilt and when she will be able to supply her own markets with those things she is now getting from Canada and the United States. When this situation obtains it will result in a further shutting down of Canadian factories and further unemployment of Canadian workmen. When such a situation does develop—and it might be within the life of this parliament—we are going to face an unemployment problem with which the government will have to deal.

Personally, I doubt very much if the unemployment problem of the future will be solved under our present economic system. I make that statement with a good many facts to substantiate it. Before the war began, a great deal of our unemployment was due to technological production in industry. We were applying more and more machinery to the production of goods. During the war years, an even greater advancement in technological production took place in the United States and Canada.

According to our war production board which investigated this situation in 1943, we are told that by the middle of this month in 1946, when our industries have been reconverted to peacetime conditions, 3,750 of our plants will have increased their productive capacity by some eighty-six per cent, with an employment of only thirty-three per cent more labour. Reducing those two factors to the same terms, this simply means that we enter the post-war world with plant and factory equipment capable of turning out the same goods which were turned out prior to the war, but with approximately forty per cent less labour.

So long as we can find a market for our production, we are all right; but just as soon as that market becomes restricted we are back again to where we were during the thirties. I venture to suggest that this government should act at the present time to decide what it is going to do to meet a situation of that kind.

I observed during the course of the debate that some hon. members to my right made the statement that members of this group were forgetting their application of socialism to our present economy. In other words, they said that we were forgetting our socialist policy and were more or less dealing in Liberal terms. I do not think that statement is quite true. That may appear to them to be the case, but I think a little consideration of the subject will make our position quite clear.

It seems to me that at the present time we must try to get as good a deal as possible from the government for the workers and producers of this country. I am not saying that we are the only ones who are trying to do that, but I think that is the position which private members of parliament should take. Outside of that I do not think there is any solution of these problems under our present system. The Minister of Finance during his budget address told us that we had to have foreign markets in order to have prosperity in this country. That is true as long as we are going to operate under a system of private enterprise. But if we continue to operate under that system we shall end up with the conditions that existed in 1929 when foreign markets just did not exist.

How can every country in the world have foreign markets? The system worked splendidly in England when it first began the capitalist economy with the use of the steam engine. If the steam engine had stayed in England the system might have continued to work. European countries were importing English goods; but they were not satisfied with merely doing that; they began to import English steam engines. They built up their own capitalist systems and then they raised tariffs against English goods to preserve their markets. The system spread all over the world, until by 1929 we found that every country was trying to protect its home market for its own manufacturers by raising a tariff against all others.

Where is there a foreign market for goods at the present time except the market that is due entirely to war conditions? It simply does not exist. Prior to the outbreak of the war, the United States could produce automobiles for nearly five worlds the size of ours, while Canada could produce automobiles more than sufficient for her own market. Where did the foreign markets exist before the war for those things? They simply did not exist.

As I see it, the only solution of the unemployment problem, if there is one to be found, is government ownership of the means of production, distribution and exchange in this country.

[Mr. Moore.]

Mr. KUHL: How does that solve it?

Mr. MOORE: It will solve it by doing away with what has caused the situation. It is the profit motive in industry that has caused the situation.

Mr. HOMUTH: In other words, if you do not want cars they will not make them and sell them to the other workers?

Mr. MOORE: You may think that, but if you have another solution I am quite willing to listen to it. If anyone can tell me how he proposes to solve the unemployment problem I shall be only too glad to listen to him. But I think it should be brought up in this house because from 1930 to 1939 it was not solved and we are doing nothing at the present time to solve our unemployment problem. The things that caused unemployment in 1929 are with us to-day. As soon as we catch up with this backlog of demand for consumer goods we shall be back where we were. Our solution is government ownership of the principal means of production, distribution and exchange, and I make this suggestion in the interests of the Canadian people.

Some believe that that will lead to a dictatorship, but here is something I should like to see considered. Irrespective of what government is in power, the tendency is toward government ownership. We see that with our hon. friends across the way.

Mr. HOMUTH: We do not think they are a good government.

Mr. MOORE: I shall not pass an opinion on that. I shall go a little farther back, to 1935 when hon. gentlemen to my right were in power. They introduced legislation which was regarded as being socialistic, and I refer particularly to the Natural Products Marketing Act. I remember reading Hansard at that time and seeing that the Liberals who were in opposition were viciously attacking the government of that day for introducing socialistic measures. I venture to say that when it comes down to the final battle between capitalism and labour those who are now the government will side with the big interests. I hope I am wrong, but I think they will. When it comes to that day, then it will be the group to which I belong which will go into power.

There is something else that should be considered. All those who believe in socialism do not belong to the C.C.F. All those who think the C.C.F. may take power in this country do not belong to this movement. I should like to quote what was said by the premier of one of our provinces, a gentleman who happens to be a Liberal premier and who expressed himself in no uncertain terms in connection with this matter. Here is what Premier S. S. Garson had to say with regard to the situation in the future when speaking before the Winnipeg board of trade on January 19, 1946, as reported in the Winnipeg Free Press; here is what he had to say about what might be done to solve our problems in the future:

> Canadian government and Canadian business are operating in a world environment in which in their own interests they must give a better account of themselves than they did in the 1930's. At that time we ineptly staggered through year after year of depression, only to finally achieve pseudo prosperity in war.
> If, in peace, we permit ourselves to descend again into depression, while the socialist states make progress toward prosperity, we shall have a hard time to convince the Canadian people that our system of free government and of free enterprise should not be replaced by some other form of government and some other arrangement for the production and distribution of goods and services.

That is the opinion of the premier of Manitoba with respect to this matter, and that is the opinion of a great many other people who are not associated with the movement to which I belong.

I should like to say a word in connection with the dominion-provincial conference. We had several sessions of that conference but they all ended in failure. I do not blame the government for this, because I think they did nearly all they could to make it a success. Nevertheless the problems it was fondly hoped would be dealt with by that conference are still with us. Allow me to deal with just one of those problems, that of labour.

We have a serious labour situation in Canada to-day, due partly to conditions arising out of the war and partly to the fact that we have a federal versus provincial problem in this country. One of the greatest problems confronting labour is due to the fact that there are nine different governments in Canada each controlling its own local labour situation. I submit that the government should seek amendments to the British North America Act so that we could have a national labour code.

The British North America Act was drawn up to meet the needs of a much less complex society than that in which we are living to-day. Great as were the fathers of confederation, in 1867 they could not foresee the needs of the Canadian people in 1946. I think the present government should do all in its power to seek amendments to the British North America Act. One of the first amendments should be the power to establish in this country a national labour code. I am not going to be dogmatic as to what the provisions of that code are to be, but a number of labour unions have informed me that they would be quite satisfied to accept P.C. 1003 as the basis of a national labour code. It is true, all labour unions are not quite satisfied with the provisions laid down in these regulations, but if they were accepted as the basis of a federal labour code the various labour unions and the government could get together and make it more acceptable to labour in the future. That is they could make amendments to the national labour code from time to time.

One other thing I should like to deal with before closing is in connection with agriculture. Our economy in western Canada is based very largely on agriculture. The war has done a great deal to bring Canadian agriculture to the position which it ought to occupy in our economy. I think it is fair to say that for the first time in the history of Canadian agriculture it has been accorded its rightful position as a national industry. It is the first time that those engaged in farming have received a fair share of the nation's income. If we want proof of that statement we have only to compare the income tax returns of 1935 with those of 1943. In 1935, according to the returns, only 416 farmers in the whole dominion paid income tax and the amount they paid was $24,083. But what a different picture the income tax returns for 1943 show. There is a little difference as far as the rate of taxation goes between 1935 and 1943, but the difference in the amount of tax collected is so great that I think it illustrates my point quite clearly. In 1943, going all out to supply a war-ballasted economy, Canadian farmers paid income tax to the tune of $440,212, just under 4,000 farmers paying taxes. It is particularly significant to note the position of Saskatchewan with respect to the payment of income tax in 1943. As I have already stated, in that year the farmers of Canada paid $440,212 to the federal treasury by way of income tax, and Saskatchewan alone paid $215,835, or almost half of this amount. This is a marked improvement over the conditions which existed during the thirties, when you could count on the five fingers of one hand every farmer who paid income tax in the western provinces.

Permit me to deal for a few minutes with income tax as it applies to agriculture. The Canadian farmer has felt during the last few years that he has been unfairly taxed on his farm production, and there is some reason for his assumption in that regard. The producing unit in western Canada is the farm, but the number of people employed in one farm includes more than the head of the household; there may be two, three or four persons working on that farm, and yet the farmer's income is assessed as if it were the income of one individual earning and paying the tax. This has caused considerable concern in the west.

There is another thing which should be gone into. I believe that the income tax branch should attempt to devise a different tax system, one which would apply to Canadian agriculture. At the present time grains are the largest production in western Canada; but the farmer finds, after producing his grain, that his income tax is up to a certain level and, if he accedes to the request of the government to produce such extra products as butter, eggs, live stock and poultry, his income is so increased that he is placed in another income tax bracket, so that when he weighs his additional labour against his very much increased income tax he is reluctant to produce these extra commodities. Of course it will be difficult to devise a system of income tax which could be fairly applied to agriculture, but if the government wishes to get this extra production of such farm commodities as I have mentioned it should exempt these things from taxation, at least for the time being.

As has been said, the economy of western Canada is based upon agriculture. There is practically nothing else to which the people of western Canada can turn. According to the dominion bureau of statistics in 1943 67·5 per cent of the people of Saskatchewan, 42·1 per cent of the people of Alberta, and 56·1 per cent of the people of Manitoba were engaged in agriculture. If you average these three you will find that 55·2 per cent of the population of the prairies are so employed. In addition to this, some 13·5 per cent of the population of the prairie provinces are engaged in transportation and trade. This latter group is certain to be affected by any recession in the agricultural industry. In other words, 68·7 of our population in the prairie provinces is dependent to a large extent upon the success of the farmer. There can be little question that the reason for this situation is the rapid development in western Canada after the completion of the first railroad, some seventy years ago. In fact, it was the great farming possibilities of this area which brought about this settlement. The experiences of the past have been such that we should realize the futility of basing the economy of any one section of this country upon a single industry. Western Canadians are anxious to see something done to bring about the decentralization of Canadian industry by the construction of industrial plants throughout the prairie provinces.

[Mr. Moore.]

The same situation which confronts western Canada also faces the maritimes. The maritime provinces of Canada are largely agricultural. Figures which I have also procured from the dominion bureau of statistics show that the number of people engaged in agriculture in Prince Edward Island is 62·7 per cent; in Nova Scotia, 24 per cent, and in New Brunswick, 34·5 per cent. Averaging the three, we have 40·4 per cent of the population of the maritimes engaged in farming. I have mentioned the maritimes because it seems to me that they suffer from much the same economic circumstances as do we in western Canada.

I know that when you talk about building industries in these sections of the country which are not so well developed as the old provinces of Ontario and Quebec the problem immediately arises, where are you going to get the money; who is going to provide it? I am willing to admit that in the past that was quite a problem. It was so because we were a debtor country. Vast sums of money were invested in this country from Great Britain and the United States. The Canadian National Railways is one example, and our great mining industry is another. But since the war I do not think it can be described as so much of a problem as it was before the war. Canada to-day is lending large sums of money to other countries. I think it would be a good plan if we decided to develop western Canada and the maritimes by investing in these provinces a certain proportion of the amount of money we are lending abroad.

By doing that we would be creating a market right at home for a small quantity of our production. I submit that if private enterprise fails in the future, as it has failed in the past, to accomplish this long overdue task, the government must go ahead and build industries in those provinces and operate them as public enterprises.

The other day an hon. member, I forget who it was, quoted figures from the James report, which stated that the government would have to provide for an expenditure of over $1,500 million a year to provide full employment in this country. I am not going to deal with that, but I think the government ought to reveal as soon as possible what they intend to do to maintain full employment in Canada. This is the time to do it. We do not have a large army of unemployed at the present time, but we should have our plans formulated whereby we shall meet this problem when it does arise, which may be before the present administration concludes its term of office.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Earlier to-night we had a speech from the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) which was similar in its main lines to speeches given by a number of members of the Progressive Conservative party. It was similar in that it described a condition in Canada which was gloomy and hopeless, which verged on a description of blue ruin, which spoke of scarcity, of taxes and of everything else that was harmful and sad, and which made me wonder, as I heard those speeches, what country those hon. gentlemen were talking about. Was it Canada, or was it some other country?

I ask this house and the people who follow the proceedings in the house to ask themselves, when they hear such criticisms of our country and of the conduct of its affairs: Is this true of Canada? Are they talking about Canada? Because my impression, from knowing something about conditions here, and something about conditions in other countries throughout the world, is that at the present moment there is no country in all the world where I would rather live than in Canada.

Mr. HOMUTH: Comparisons are odorous at any time.

Mr. CLAXTON: We are quite willing to stand comparison with any country in any respect. I would like to recall to hon. members the circumstances in which the budget was brought down. It was brought down on June 27. There was a delay of some days while other business was proceeded with, and in that interval two very significant things happened. Hon. members will agree that one way to test the strength of a country, economically and financially, is to see how its dollar or its money stands up in the markets of the world. During that interval an event of major importance happened, and that is that for the first time since 1939 the Canadian dollar was put at par with the United States dollar. This single fact showed, as does the whole state of our economy to-day, that with the single exception of possibly Switzerland, our Canadian money is the equal or the better of the money of any other country anywhere in the world.

Mr. HOMUTH: Is it at par to-day in New York and Buffalo?

Mr. CLAXTON: Is it not? The second event which happened during that interval was that the price control in the United States ceased to operate. At that time I was spending two or three days a week in New York attending sessions, first, of the economic and social council of the united nations, and, then, of the international health conference. As I travelled backward and forward from New York to Ottawa and from Ottawa to New York, I was in the unique position of being able to appreciate the effect of different methods of price control and, later, of no price control, in dollars and cents. To-day, in consequence of the removal of controls, it is estimated that their prices have advanced by twenty-two per cent since price control was removed some ten days ago; that is assuming that estimate to be correct, by an amount which is equivalent to the total amount by which our own price level has advanced since price control was introduced back in 1941—much more, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) says. That, I think, indicates to hon. members and to the people throughout the country something of the value of the administration which we have had in Canada during that time.

These economic policies did not come about suddenly. It was an action of the government of Canada supported by the Canadian people, but under the leadership of the Minister of Finance, whose record in the field of public finance is unequalled anywhere to-day. And it was under the leadership of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and of his administration.

At those conferences which I attended to represent the government I met the representatives of other countries, as have many other hon. members, and I think they will agree with me that as we move around and meet the representatives of other countries at such conferences or elsewhere we find them constantly amazed at the miracle of the way in which Canada's economy has been conducted during the war—amazed and full of admiration, admiration not only of the government and of the experts who advise the government but of the people of Canada who have so stoutly supported the administration—

With these preliminary remarks I should like for a moment to survey the scene in Canada, with sober good sense, against the sombre background of a world convulsed by war. We must, in considering our own position, regard it at this time in relation to the whole world situation, and we must also recognize that after six years of war it is not possible to reconvert and recover completely in nine months.

In making the statements which will follow, I do so on the best statistical information available to me, and I believe I can support every one of them. However, I will make those statements boldly and baldly, and I think they will stand in contrast with the statements made by the members of the Progressive party and other parties in the house who have taken such a gloomy view.

Mr. COLDWELL: You mean the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. CLAXTON: Of course, the Progressive Conservative party; I am sorry. As far as possible I should like hon. members to allow me to finish these statements and afterwards I hope to substantiate them as far as there is time.

1. The production of peacetime goods in Canada is at an all-time high.

2. We are employing 629,000 more people than in 1939, more people than ever before in peace time.

3. The Canadian farmers and wage-earners are getting more money than ever before in peace time.

4. We have to-day the highest production, the highest employment and the highest national income we ever had in Canada in peace time.

5. The savings of individual Canadians have tripled since 1939 and are at an all-time high. On the other side, debts shown by thirty lending companies alone have been reduced from $169 million to $66 million between the years 1937 and 1945, and it is estimated that during the last six years the total farm debt has been reduced by something over $400 million.

Mr. HANSELL: How about the national debt?

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member is still playing poker.

Mr. CLAXTON: Then 6. The ratio of net debt charges to the national income has increased since 1938 less than the United States or in the United Kingdom. I think this is one of the most objective and important evidences of the excellent way in which the economy has been managed.

7. The rates of cuts in taxes from their wartime high are greater in Canada than in the United States, the United Kingdom, Australia or New Zealand.

8. Tax exemptions in Canada are higher for both single and married taxpayers than in the countries where they have labour governments, higher than in the United Kingdom, higher than in Australia, even after the cut announced Friday, or in New Zealand; they are also higher than in the United States, and with the further exemptions which will be made effective from January 1, 1947, they will be very much higher than in those countries.

Mrs. STRUM: May I ask a question?

Mr. CLAXTON: I ask not to be interrupted just now, if the hon. member does not mind until later.

9. Prices have been more effectively controlled than in any country.

10. Canadian money is as strong as that of any country which fought in the war.

11. The Canadian government has fewer civil servants per capita than the governments of either the United Kingdom or the United States.

12. Repatriation and demobilization have proceeded expeditiously and smoothly, more rapidly, more smoothly and more successfully than, I believe, any one in Canada ever anticipated would be possible.

13. Canada's veterans' legislation leads the world.

14. Canada's work in international co-operation has given her a reputation second to no country in the field.

15. Never before has Canada's reputation for sound progressive government and for successful management of her economy stood so high among other nations.

I shall now be glad if the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum) would put the question she wanted to put to me before.

Mrs. STRUM: I decided to put it in my speech.

Mr. CLAXTON: This is a statement of the facts which we should bear in mind in considering the budget and in considering the position of Canada. It should not be thought for a moment that, because we are in so favourable a position, everything is going to go swimmingly for us. We have managed to achieve that position only because we have had a policy throughout the war of paying for as much as we could as we went along and of keeping up the value of our money. We shall continue to enjoy that position only if we continue to have similarly sound policies.

Broadly speaking, there are three conditions for prosperity in Canada. The first is a satisfactory arrangement with the provinces; the second, cooperation between labour and management with government so that we can keep on working and maintain and increase production; and third, the establishment of conditions abroad in which trade can be restored and expanded on a two-way paying basis. Provided that these three conditions are satisfied, we can look forward to the future of Canada with confidence, based on the experience we have had in the past.

In the amendments proposed by the Progressive Conservative party and by the C.C.F. party there are some points on which I should like to make brief observations in so far as time permits. The Progressive Conservative amendment regretted first:

That the budget does not provide for tax reductions in the calendar year 1946.

There we have a revealing statement by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell). Referring to the proposed tax reductions he said, as reported at page 3213 of Hansard:

And, indeed the individual taxpayer will not find any change in his situation until he begins to make out his tax return early in 1948.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario makes it plain that he is thinking of just one class of taxpayers, the smallest class in number, namely, the class who make out their returns and pay their taxes at the end of the fiscal year, and not the great class of taxpayers who have the cut now in force through this year, 1946, month by month, week by week, as they pay their tax in instalments and who recognize that there has been a cut of sixteen per cent.

Mr. FLEMING: Do they not all make out their returns in the spring.

Mr. CLAXTON: They appreciate it now.

Mr. ABBOTT: And they get and appreciate the reduction now.

Mr. CLAXTON: Hon. members may look at the figures which I would give in detail if I had the time. As I have said, the tax reductions from the wartime peak already in force in Canada are greater than those in the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, or the United States.

I come to the next point in the amendment:

That the budget gives no indication of any serious attempt to eliminate extravagance or effect economies in the cost of government.

An hon. MEMBER: We agree with that.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member is agreeing with himself. I am reading his amendment.

In his fine speech on Friday the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott) showed the house the full range of expenditures over which this or any other government would have control at the present time. It came down to a figure of $62 million more than the expenditures in 1939. That is the increase in the controllable expenditures on which this great cry of economy can operate. I think I can speak for every member of the government when I say that we are continuously alive to the need for economy. Over the past year the Minister of Finance has been supported in his efforts, which I can assure the house have been strong, to secure the application of the most rigid standards of economy in every department.

In that connection, I should like to deal for a moment with the situation concerning the civil service of Canada. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario quoted a figure of 150,000 civil servants, and then said there had been a reduction of only some 900 from that peak figure. I am not at all sure how his figure of 150,000 is made up. The figure given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), in reply to a question in this house on May 6 of this year, was 116,362, but obviously there must be some explanation for the discrepancy, and I assume the figure of 150,000 may be correct.

Mr. CLAXTON: Apparently there were two returns covering two answers to two sets of questions, which differed because of the way the questions were put—the returns are responsive to the questions. The figure of 150,000 is, I assume, larger than the figure of 116,362, because it includes employees of government agencies and also a considerable number of casual employees. Certainly in the case of the Department of National Health and Welfare, with which I am familiar, it includes all casual employees. Assuming the figure to be 150,000, let us, for purposes of comparison, contrast it with the figures for civil servants in other comparable countries. In the United Kingdom, for example, a command paper handed down in June, 1946, gave the strength of the civil service, as of April 1, 1946, at 695,950, and contrasted it with the picture for the same group of employees as at January 1, 1946. Those figures showed an increase of some 5,000 employees during that time, with an increase in every civil department with the exception of three, and it was explained in the return that these increases came about because the government was beginning to get back to normal conditions; they were having to restore peacetime services and make up the differences caused by six years of war. The United States figures showed a total of 2,961,000, or an even larger per capita number of civil servants. The figure for federal government civil servants alone in the United States was 2·12 per hundred of population, whereas the English figure was 1·53 and the Canadian figure, assuming a civil service of 150,000, would be 1·24. In other words, on the basis of the figures I have given, the Canadian figure was considerably lower than either the English or United States figures on a per capita basis. One would expect that a country whose density of population is much less than that of either the United Kingdom or the United States would need more civil servants to maintain its services; yet the differences are as I have described them to be.

In talking about economies as applied to the civil service, it would be interesting to learn from hon. gentlemen opposite who have been so critical whether they regard the rates of pay of civil servants as too high. My impression, and certainly every criticism I get, is that they are too low, not possibly in every range but as a general picture. I can assure hon. members that for every suggestion I have ever heard that the rates are too high I have heard a thousand that they are too low; and I must say I think every minister has been subjected to the most continuous pressure to increase the rates of pay. We now come to the second element. Are there too many of them? There may be in certain departments, and it requires some time in a large organization to make changes as we turn from a wartime to a peacetime basis. My experience is that a considerable group of civil servants are overworked, and that there is considerable understaffing in some departments. I do not know of any case where the opposite is true and where the situation when brought to the attention of responsible officers is not dealt with as promptly as is possible. Hon. gentlemen may be surprised to learn that at the present time there is a shortage of stenographers, trained clerks, statisticians, economists and almost every other kind of trained worker that one would want in a government service. So that there is no difficulty about transfers or anything of the kind. There just are not enough qualified people available to do the jobs that have to be done at this time.

If I am right in what I say about wages and about the size of the staff, the only thing left which may be cut is whether or not we are giving more services than the people of Canada want and are willing to pay for. That is the only other element in the picture. My experience, as I have handled estimates on two occasions and have heard other ministers handle them for some years, is that you never receive a suggestion that you cut down a service. It is rather the reverse. From one hon. member opposite after another you get suggestions for this additional service and that additional service; for more social security and more things that cost money in quantities totally beyond the most extreme suggestions of any savings that could be effected. That is the sort of thing which sometimes leads one to become a little irritated, perhaps, in the face of this constant talk about extravagance, without any particularization that can be supported, while all the time we are faced with additional demands for additional services, not only from every part of the house but from every part of the country.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It does not come from this corner.

Mr. CLAXTON: Oh, doesn't it? I'll say it does.

Mr. BLACKMORE: But we show you how to pay for it.

Mr. CLAXTON: From that corner we have had suggestions for additional old age pensions that would cost $850,000,000 a year.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, but we show you how to pay for them.

Mr. CLAXTON: Not to the satisfaction of anyone in this or any other country. That is the situation in regard to the civil service. Then we get on to the other things, such as the purchase of materials. I have not heard any hon. member opposite or any people throughout Canada say the federal government pays too much for materials or for supplies or for office space. On all sides I hear criticism that we are too tough a bargainer, so much so that sometimes we are charged with being unfair. I can assure the house that the requests for concessions being made here, or being made there, come just as often from hon. members opposite as they do from members of this party—and probably a good deal more often. That is, I think, a just appreciation of the situation.

Yet we have suggestions that there should be cuts here and cuts there, without any specification; and then at the same time increased demands for social services. We are told we should stop deficit financing—a point made at great length by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. How could we stop deficit financing if at the same time we carried out his suggestions for increased reductions in taxes, and increased interest rates? Why, he would get us into a spiral there that works out exactly the opposite.

Suggestions involving additional expenditures which have been made in the house are being totalled by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott); he says he has someone working on it. Additional expenditures suggested by hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party alone, during this session, would total far more than the largest possible sum that anyone could possibly raise by additional taxation at this time—and that would be just keeping the deficit where it is.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Could the Minister of National Health make a statement as to the requests which have been made to various ministers by members of his own party?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I can, for my department: it is an additional $50 million.

Mr. CLAXTON: I believe the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Casselman) was asking for the total of suggestions from hon. members in this party, as compared with those from the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh, I thought it was a request for information respecting additional expenditures suggested by the opposition.

Mr. CLAXTON: Now, as to this question of economy—and it is an important one. Of course it is. We must be eternally vigilant, and we look to hon. members in the opposition to assist us in that vigilance. We look to the public to assist and to support the government in cutting out every possible wasteful expenditure. Of course we must do that. And having done that, as we try to do, then also give us some support when we are faced with requests for things which would cost far more than any possible saving could effect.

With regard to an item in which I am directly interested, namely the administration of family allowances, we have just completed a year of that administration. Our estimates, made before we ever began operations, and based upon the best experience here and elsewhere in respect of similar operations, have been bettered in every respect.

In the last year I believe there have been just three criticisms in the House of Commons made with respect to the administration of family allowances, and I should like to say just a word in reply to each of those. The hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Gariepy), speaking on Friday, said that there have been some delays in attending to correspondence, and he suggested the establishment of an office in Three Rivers. We have considered the question of opening local offices; indeed that point was considered long before the administration was set up. It was felt it would be much wiser to try to administer the whole operation from offices located at provincial capitals. By and large this has worked successfully, as hon. members from all parts of the house in other debates have been good enough to testify. So far we have seen no reason to open a large number of local offices. It may be that, in one or two centres in Canada, we shall open inquiry offices, but we hope that those will be kept to a minimum.

The hon. member for York South (Mr. Cockeram), speaking on the same day, referred in critical terms to the fact that he had not been able to get information he wanted about family allowance administration, and added on this rather sweeping statement:

I find it difficult to get true and honest statements from the government on governmental expenditures.

The statement given by the Department of National Health and Welfare in reply to his question was completely accurate. It showed the cost of administration of family allowances to the department for the first six months of operation. It is completely in accord with the statement I later made in the house, and there is nothing about it to explain or to correct. In so far as this department is concerned, the hon. member's statement is not accurate. Figures on expenditures in connection with the operation of family allowances have been given by me in various forms in discussion of the estimates, when we gave the actual costs for the fiscal year. Also I gave estimates showing the cost to every department of the federal government of family allowance administration. We believe we shall keep well within those costs, and hope that hon. members will assist us in doing so.

The third point was made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, as reported at page 2981 of Hansard for June 27, where he made reference to a subject which had been discussed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) when my estimates were before the committee. Reference was made to our estimate of $300,000 for investigation, where we had spent only $6,000 in the last fiscal year. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario was good enough to say that this was no doubt due to the fact that this was partly—"partly"; I draw attention to that word—a new expenditure.

Well, the word "partly" there is put no doubt in an effort to be fair. But I should explain to the house that the "partly" is just about one-fiftieth right. In other words, to the extent of forty-nine fiftieths, or more, this was a new expenditure. The expenditure of $6,000 made in the fiscal year 1945-46 was for one province, representing one-twentieth of the population for three months, or for one-quarter of the year. Therefore the amount of the expenditure of $6,000 or thereabouts was about, let us say, one-fiftieth, one-sixtieth, or perhaps one-eightieth of what would be required for the full year. And on that our estimate was based.

Mr. HACKETT: Depending upon the province?

Mr. CLAXTON: Depending upon what arrangements we are able to make with each province, as I have said several times.

Mr. HACKETT: Whether it would be one-fiftieth would depend upon the province involved.

Mr. CLAXTON: It was Nova Scotia. Those were the only three criticisms wa have had in the whole year respecting family allowances, and I hope we shall be able to give as good an account of ourselves in the year ahead.

Mr. FLEMING: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. CLAXTON: Go ahead.

Mr. FLEMING: Could the minister give the house the amount required for the first three months of the present fiscal year out of the appropriation of $300,000 which he advocated?

Mr. ILSLEY: Ask that on the estimates.

Mr. CLAXTON: I shall be glad to answer that when the estimates are being considered. But it is very little more than at the rate I mentioned before, because of the difficulty of having arrangements established, as I have said.

There is one other matter I should like to mention before I close, and that is the speech made by the leader of the Progressive Conservative party over the network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on July 10. In that speech he referred to the budget of this year, and then said:

> And in addition—
> we are being asked by the government—
> —to go into debt another thousand million dollars—what for? Not to buy things for ourselves—but—think of it—to pay for our own exports to ship away to other countries.

Mr. Speaker, if I may say so, this is a most extraordinary statement to come from the leader of the Progressive Conservative party. Does this mean that he is opposed to the credits to the United Kingdom and to the other countries to which we are lending money or advancing cerdits in order to enable them to establish themselves and put themselves back in a condition where they can buy our goods? If it means that, why was that statement made over the air when just five days before a bill to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act was introduced in this house and received the support of the Conservative party? The facts regarding export credits were given to the house, and that amendment, like the bill last year, was carried without division, with the full support of the Progressive Conservative party. Was that speech given to cast some reflection upon the use of money for this purpose? Was it intended to have some effect outside the house which could not be sought inside the house? It would be interesting indeed to have this statement fully explained in the light of the support given, by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario for example, and by others to this whole field of assistance by means of this legislation. Where does the Progressive Conservative party stand?

The leader of the opposition ends up with a statement about the dominion-provincial conference when he said:

> There are two dangers inherent in this method. The first is that it is a Balkanization procedure.

I should like to ask: Who is being coerced by this procedure? An offer has been made to the provinces. That offer is based on the original proposals first put before the provinces on August 9, 1945, discussed during four separate sittings of the dominion-provincial conference, worked over by the economic committee, discussed at the final sessions between April 29 and May 3, modified repeatedly to the advantage of the provinces and now put before them. Why was that done? It was essential that certain provinces at least know what they could expect. They were given this opportunity without coercion, without any Balkanizing.

I venture to say that it is a wider and broader proposal that even the leader of the opposition envisaged when he so stoutly fought for the province of Manitoba and for a general arrangement between the dominion and the provinces in 1941. I am sure the leader of the opposition would not object to the federal government agreeing with the province of Manitoba or any other province on those terms. If so, It would be most interesting indeed to find out on what terms. It is a remarkable thing that during all the time these proposals have been before the provinces and before the country there has not been any adverse criticism so far as we know by any federal party. The only alternative proposal put forward and seriously discussed at all was that put forward by the province of Ontario, the details and full weight of which we learned only two days before the conference adjourned.

As I said, I submit that there are three conditions which must be satisfied if the people of Canada are to have the prosperity I believe they could have. First, we must have a satisfactory arrangement with the provinces. Having worked hard at these dominion-provincial arrangements for three years, like everyone else I hoped that it would be possible on the basis of these terms to arrive at an agreement which would be in the interests not only of the provinces and of the dominion but of the people of Canada as a whole. Here I should say a word in reply to the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett). If there is anything unconstitutional in these arrangements, then it is strange because we have been paying subsidies to the provinces since 1867, and surely that is legal. Second, we have been working under a tax agreement similar to that proposed since 1941.

Mr. HACKETT: That was a war emergency.

Mr. ILSLEY: The war emergency has no bearing on the point made by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CLAXTON: Is there any reason why a similar arrangement should not be continued by agreement if the parties are willing to agree? We have never failed to carry out any agreement that has been made with the provinces or with any country, and we believe we should be able to rely on them to do the same.

Second, I suggested that our prosperity depends upon the cooperation of management and labour with government in working out conditions under which it is possible to carry on work. Third, the prosperity of Canada depends, as we all know, upon our establishing through collaboration with other nations, conditions abroad under which we can have prosperity at home. Those conditions are not impossible; they depend on good will here and good will abroad. I believe that all hon. members, as well as all the people of Canada, above everything else want us to work together to construct out of the world in which we find ourselves that better world we know we can build.

On motion of Mr. Menary the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, July 16, 1946

The house met at three o'clock.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Nineteenth report of the special committee on veterans affairs.—Mr. Tucker.

CIVIL SERVICE

ENLISTMENTS IN ARMED FORCES—RETENTION OF SALARY AND SENIORITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): I would like to ask the Secretary of State if the article appearing in the Evening Journal of July 9, to the effect that civil servants who resigned their positions to enlist in the armed forces are now all eligible to return to their positions without loss of salary or seniority, is correct.

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State): That matter is now under careful review.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

PRINTING OF FINAL REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I tabled yesterday the fourth and final report of the royal commission established to inquire into violations of the Official Secrets Act. I intended at the time to ask the house for permission to have copies of that report printed so that they might be distributed, and as there is likely to be a demand on the part of members for such copies I would move, seconded by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent):

That 2,500 copies in the English language and 1,500 copies in the French language of the fourth and final report of the royal commission established by order in council P.C. 411 of February 5, 1946, laid on the table of the house yesterday, be printed forthwith, and that standing order 64 in relation thereto be suspended.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION

EXTENSION OF ADMISSIBLE CLASSES TO CERTAIN RELATIVES OF CANADIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources. Under order in council 2071 listing additions to admissible classes under immigration regulations, what evidence must an orphan nephew or niece produce to show that his or her parents are dead?

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): The hon. gentleman sent me a copy of the question. The requirement of the order in council was that there should be evidence of a document establishing the identity of the holder. I am informed that it would be impossible to lay down a firm procedure with regard to that. Each case will be considered in the light of the circumstances obtaining. The present state of Europe and the destruction of official documents and records may make it hard for individual applicants to establsih their identity. The officers will be instructed to take whatever steps are necessary, either by way of affidavit or by the word of some relative, friend or someone in authority who knows the party, to establish the identity. Each case, of course, will depend very much on the circumstances.

Last week the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Skey) asked me a question in regard to inspectional facilities which may be set up on the continent to deal with intending immigrants. One of the officers in London has been over in Paris dealing especially with the matter and he has now given me a report.

In my statement to the house on May 29 regarding changes made in the immigration regulations which extend the admissible classes to certain relatives of legal residents of Canada, I referred to the fact that owing to the shipping situation it would undoubtedly be the end of the present year before much accommodation would be available, and that inspectional facilities would be resumed in Europe as quickly as circumstances permit. As the immigration branch is being literally flooded with requests from residents of Canada for the immediate admission of their relatives overseas, I have concluded it would be proper to inform the house of the present situation and by this means assure those interested in the matter that the apparent delay in the movement of immigrants to Canada is unavoidable. There are two factors, both beyond the control of government, that determine when the immigrant movement will commence; they are: (1) shipping facilities and (2) travel conditions in Europe. Owing to the destruction of ocean tonnage during the war, there is an acute shortage of passenger vessels. Those operating to Canada from the United Kingdom are still bringing service personnel and their dependents, which means little accommodation will be available to the ordinary traveller for several months. There are, as yet, no passenger sailings from continental ports to Canada. In continental Europe travel from one country to another is still extremely difficult owing to lack of railway facilities and frontier controls; therefore a resumption of an immigrant movement under pre-war conditions from central European countries to ports of embarkation is not possible at this time.

The immigration branch has been conducting a survey of the situation with a view to reopening some inspectional points in northern Europe as quickly as possible. This involves consultation with the governments concerned, and appropriate action is being taken. Unless unforeseen difficulties develop, I hope that two or three months from the present, immigration inspectional facilities for the civil and medical examination of immigrants will be available.

The situation with regard to central and southeastern Europe is still obscure. I regret it is not yet possible to furnish a definite statement with regard to immigrants from central and southeastern Europe. Regular steamship services are not yet in operation and I have already mentioned the difficulties of inland travel. If it becomes possible for immigrants to move to northern embarkation ports as before the war, the immigration staffs in these areas will conduct the examinations and grant the visas. That is, of course, when inspectional facilities are set up. If this is not possible, some other solution to the problem must be found, this being dependent upon steamship routes and schedules as yet not in operation.

I fully appreciate the desire of residents of Canada for an early reunion with relatives in Europe and elsewhere who are eligible to come to this country, and I can assure the house that everything possible is being done to accomplish this without any unnecessary delay.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I ask the minister a supplementary question? In a compassionate case would the person from southern Europe be permitted to make the necessary arrangements through the London office if transportation could be secured?

Mr. GLEN: All I can say is that if the intending immigrant from Europe is able to get to London and have the medical inspection there, and if accommodation on vessels to this country can be obtained and the immigrant is admissible under the regulations, there will be no trouble.

Mr. HOMUTH: Have any representations been made to the Russian government with regard to immigrants from the Russian occupied zones who wish to come to Canada?

Mr. GLEN: That matter is not dealt with by the immigration department.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA HARD ROCK MINERS—APPOINTMENT OF MR. JUSTICE SLOAN AS COMMISSIONER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Does the strike of the hard rock miners in British Columbia come under the jurisdiction of the federal Department of Labour? If so, has a commissioner been appointed to replace Chief Justice Gordon Sloan who, I understand, has resigned?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): My hon. friend's question is divided into two parts. One is whether the strike comes under the jurisdiction of the federal Department of Labour, and the other is whether an appointment is to be made to replace Mr. Justice Sloan. The answer to the first question is that Mr. Justice Sloan was appointed on the recommendation of the Hon. George Pearson, Minister of Labour of British Columbia, after failure on the part of the conciliation service to bring about a settlement of the strike. The answer to the second part of the question is no. I am hopeful that Mr. Justice Sloan will be able to continue, if we can give him some departmental assistance, in an effort to conciliate the dispute.

PALESTINE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT AS TO CANADA'S ATTITUDE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. HARKNESS (Calgary East): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. It arises out of a considerable number of telegrams which the hon. member for Calgary West and I have received in the past few days. Will the Prime Minister make a statement as to Canada's attitude toward the situation in Palestine?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend sent me a copy of his question, and I shall give him what I believe to be an appropriate reply. I do not believe that any useful purpose would be served by a statement on the situation in Palestine by the Canadian government at the present moment. Representatives of the United Kingdom cabinet, the foreign office, the colonial office and war office are discussing in London with representatives of the United States state department, war department and treasury, the recommendations recently submitted to the governments of the United Kingdom and the United States by the Anglo-American committee of inquiry which examined the problems of European Jewry and Palestine. The Canadian government hopes that the conversations now in progress will lead to a decision which will do justice to the various groups having a legitimate interest in Palestine.

My hon. friend will notice that I have placed emphasis on the present moment. I believe there are times and seasons for all things, but this I submit is not the moment, while these negotiations are on, for the government of Canada to take a particular part by way of making a statement such as the hon. member suggests.

SERVICE PERSONNEL

PASSAGE PRIORITY FOR DEPENDENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the recent press announcement from the office of the high commissioner in London correct, to the effect that passage priority for servicemen's dependents has been discontinued?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): I have not seen the press announcement referred to, but passage priority for servicemen's dependents has not been discontinued. The report may have arisen from the fact that the passage priority committee which existed in London, consisting of representatives of Canada House and the armed services, was discontinued on July 1, and the handling of priorities, so far as servicemen's dependents is concerned, rests with the service authorities.

The question of passage priority for what we refer to as non-entitled persons, namely, other relatives, fiancées and so on, is handled by a committee of the various shipping companies.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Monday, July 15, consideration of the motion of Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. MacInnis.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended taking part in the budget debate, but owing to incidents of the last few days I wish to discuss one subject, and one only, namely, that which was the occasion for your ruling of yesterday. May I express to you in your official capacity the greatest deference and respect, and in your private capacity a liking amounting almost to affection; but Your Honour forced me into the position of taking this opportunity of bringing to the attention of the house—I hate superlatives—one of the most important situations that has confronted this country in my time; and I have lived a considerable number of years during many of which I have been able to read and write and have some small understanding of the problems of this country.

At the outset may I say that I shall make no criticism of anybody—capital, labour, or government. I deliberately choose this course, first because of the seriousness of the situation, and second that no one may allege, in derogation of what I have just said, that there is any political motive in the remarks I am now making. The steel strike in Canada must focus the attention of thinking men and women on the broad question of industrial relations. We have had many troubles recently. Some have been settled and some have not; but underlying all these I am sure it will be apparent to you, Mr. Speaker, and to all hon. members of this house that we cannot have that full employment without which there can be no high standard of living if peaceful industrial relations continue to be interrupted from time to time by strikes or lockouts. In the recent past we have been flying from one crisis to another. Finally we adopted the method of appointing controllers. That worked on two occasions, but on this occasion it has not worked. I am not for a moment going so far as to say these men in the steel business are striking against their government. Technically that may be right, but I know perfectly well that in their honest inner consciousness they are not aware that they are doing any such thing. I think no one with any breadth of view or any understanding can just sit back and say here is a pattern which has come from the United States. Others may say here are the communists, endeavouring to create difficulty here and there. These may be very self-satisfying things for some of us to say, but no one who is honest with himself can doubt that all this agitation and unrest result from some cause, and it is this. It is the natural and proper seeking of the persons generally classified as labour to improve their standard of living, their living conditions, and to obtain for themselves some luxuries and comforts. I know there are exceptions to that; there is no doubt about it. All strikes cannot be justified, nor can all lockouts. At the bottom, however, is an effort on the part of many of our citizens to improve their position and their condition.

I do not know how much thought many of us have given to it, but I am quite sure at least the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) knows the extent to which the steel industry is the foundation underlying our economy. I am not a prophet of doom or ill or anything of the kind, but I do know that unless this thing is straightened out and a broader pattern set, while anyone's guess is as good as that of anyone else we do not need to peer far into the future to see our economy slowed down or perhaps brought to a standstill. It may be said that parliament is not the place in which these things should be dealt with. I disagree with that suggestion, for reasons which I shall give. It is not merely the fact that so many men are out in the steel industry. Nor does it do us much good to compare that number with the total number of workers in Canada, because I am quite sure most hon. members of this house, certainly those who come from industrialized areas, have already received telegrams and letters, as I have, though I do not live in an industrialized area, with respect to the present difficulty and its portent, and perhaps commenting gloomily upon its conclusion.

What is the situation in the steel industry to-day? In this I confine myself to the Stelco plant in the city of Hamilton. A few days ago an order in council was passed and tabled in this house. To-day, according to the newspapers, there are some 2,000 men in this plant and probably some 3,000 outside, those on strike being assisted in picketing by dissatisfied members of the typographical union and others. The gates through which the trains pass have been locked both from within and from without. An air strip has been constructed within the plant, and apparently they are going to call in the airborne troops, or at least the men in the plant will be supplied by air with the necessary food and clothing.

How can anyone here regard a situation like that without concern, where the least incident might touch off an explosion which would be the shame of Canada and I am sure the shame of everyone of us sitting here if we did not do all we could to see that it did not occur? That is the situation in Hamilton; and as we already know, if these things are prolonged they get worse before they get better. I hope the Minister of Reconstruction will correct me if I am wrong, but I have been credibly informed that he requires a considerable amount of coke from these steel plants to help keep the people of Ontario and Quebec warm this winter. I have heard that either he or Mr. Brunning has given the percentage that is required, but in any event we are told that coke is an urgent necessity in this province. What for? Not for manufacturing; not for turning the wheels of industry, but to keep the people warm, knowing as we do of the great shortage of fuel in the central provinces at the present time. I am also informed that if maintenance is not kept up, if these ovens are allowed to cool, some destruction may result, and that in any event it will take approximately a week before they will be in condition to produce coke. Again I wish the Minister would correct me if I am wrong. He nods his head in assent. I say these things to you, sir, and to hon. members, not because I have any special information, but in the hope that you may join me —and I am serious about it—in a realization of the crisis we are facing.

Now I turn to the suggestion I intend to make, but I think first I should give some reason for that suggestion. I said at the outset that I had no criticism of anyone. I hope the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) particularly, and the government, will not regard this as being critical. It is a simple statement of fact—that in this instance, affecting as it does our whole economy, whatever measures we have taken have failed. I make that simple statement of fact, not for a moment criticizing the measures which were taken. From there where can we go? In my judgment the only place we can go is to parliament.

For some reason unknown to me I was chosen as chairman of a committee of members among whom I sit, and as such I have had the opportunity of talking to a good many labouring people. Whether their complaints be true or untrue, this runs pretty much through the piece, that under our present set-up they have been unable to meet those who can definitely settle their problems. I am making no comment whatever as to whether that be true or untrue; but I know they believe it. It is a conviction, just as real, whether it be true or whether it be not true.

My suggestion is this, that this house should immediately set up its industrial relations committee. To that committee should be invited—yea, brought, if necessary—those persons who might not like to come. I think I am not saying anything very unusual, because there, and only there, can meet the big three, so-called—the three important people, the consumer, labour, and management in industry. I am not suggesting that that committee will immediately settle the strike; but I am suggesting that it will devise machinery of procedure, backed by a statute passed by this parliament, not so much to settle strikes as to prevent them. That may be considered a criticism; the inference may be so regarded, but I trust it will not be taken in that way.

Then it seems to me to these people on strike, and those who are talking strike, such as the meat people, the railway people and so on, this parliament should say:—We have given you the last and best tribunal this Dominion of Canada knows. Come there with your problem. Meet your opponents face to face in the presence of that great referee, the consumer of Canada, as represented by members of parliament. And so may I say with a great deal of hope, and even more faith, that if we do something of the kind, certainly any union or any management which does not concur in that view will get very little sympathy from me. We have brought them to the place they have been asking for all this time. No one can do more. If they do not care to accept that, then I for one will question the motives they so loudly proclaim at the present time.

Sir, I close with this. The matter is extremely urgent. I have endeavoured to make a helpful suggestion. I have criticized no one. But unless some major step be taken I fear very much for coming months. And I know that with labour interruptions, lockouts or strikes, coming as they are in series, there can be no peace, no prosperity, no happiness in this country. Development of governmental action means this, if it means anything, that while years ago we had small responsibility, now the first business of government has become the happiness and contenment of its people.

With respect I make this humble suggestion, trusting that even though it be not concurred in by all, it will be considered in the spirit in which I have offered it, in the fervent hope, and with some faith, that it may bear fruit in bringing peace to industry in Canada.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) will be the first to recognize, I have not had an opportunity to discuss with my colleagues the suggestion which he has made. But may I say at once that I would have no hesitancy at all in seconding the suggestion, and doing my utmost to have it carried out.

I have always taken the view with respect to industrial disputes that there were not two parties only, but that there were three. In fact, I have spoken of four, because to my mind the function of management is quite distinct from that of capital as a party in industry. But certainly industrial disputes do concern and affect more than capital, labour and management. They affect the community at large.

I believe I might go so far as to say the community in this instance is the entire Dominion of Canada. Perhaps I should not confine it to that, because I believe a serious strike, and particularly a strike in the iron and steel industry, might have repercussions which would be felt in lands beyond Canada. Anything which will adversely affect transportation and which will occasion loss in production of those articles which the consumer needs might have a grave effect upon conditions in Europe as well as in Canada. Therefore I for one would strongly favour any measure which has in it the promise of bringing out the truth with respect to differences in industrial disputes. I hold strongly that an agency qualified to bring out exact information is the most effective instrument by which to attain that end.

Now, what I think the parties to industrial disputes, both labour and capital, should not forget is that neither of them can hope to achieve the end they have in view in production except for what the community does. To begin with, the community has the ultimate ownership of resources of the country—or should have. It has the ownership. It may part with it for good and sufficient reason. Private property has its justification in that unless opportunity is given to individuals to risk by investment what they have in the way of savings, but very little in comparison will be obtained in production. There is justification in the greater efficiency to production as effected in many instances under private direction compared with what would be effected under government control. I believe in government control and in government ownership in certain industries and at certain times, but, as I have said over and over again, there are times and seasons for all things, and I believe that in this country there is still a place for individual initiative and private enterprise, which in the interests of all may well be carried much further than it has been.

May I say, coming a step further, with respect to the position of the community in these matters, that if it were not for the community as represented by parliament and its enactments—and here I am in full accord with my hon. friend who has just spoken—there would not be the preservation of law and order; there would not be the rights controlled by patent that there are with respect to invention; there would not be the agencies of transportation and communication which have to obtain their charters from parliament; there would not be the facilities for export; there would not be the agencies to conduct diplomatic relations between one country and other countries; international commerce would not be carried out on the scale on which government alone makes it possible to be carried out; there would not be the vast industrial and commercial organization essential to trade, for the sale of commodities and the obtaining of raw materials. All these things and many more are made possible by what the community itself does as represented by its representatives in parliament and through the laws which they enact. The time has come when we cannot emphasize too strongly the rights of the community in all matters of this kind.

Also I do believe that publicity is a much more effective remedy than penalty in bringing about justice in the settlement of an industrial dispute. Justice, as Burke has said, is the common concern of mankind; and the one way in which justice can be made to prevail in any relationship is that it should be based on known facts, known conditions, and known circumstances. I believe that there is one court, a court which will ultimately settle these matters fairly, and that is the court of public opinion. But public opinion has to be informed. Up to the present such agencies as we have had for dealing with industrial disputes have been those that would serve or tend to serve that particular end. We enacted our Industrial Disputes Investigation Act in order that the parties to industry might have full opportunity to have their case or their side of the case fully presented to the public. I recall very well when there were not in this country any laws framed to that particular end, not so much as a conciliation act; and I also recall that the first step which was taken by government—that is, the federal government—in Canada was taken as far back, or perhaps I should say as recently, as the year 1900, when this parliament enacted the Conciliation Act and made provision for conciliation and mediation in industrial disputes. Conciliation, I believe, is the very essence of the process which is most needed in settling industrial difficulties. But when conciliation does not succeed and mediation does not succeed something further is required, and the great handmaid of conciliation and mediation is a process of investigation,—of investigation under methods contrived by the state to bring out the truth, if it is at all possible to secure it, and the maximum of truth in regard to the existing situation. The next forward step following that of conciliation and mediation under legislative enactment was the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, which gave to both capital and labour opportunities to have their representatives on a board. But the main feature of that measure was that it provided also that the community should be represented on the board; and it had a further provision, a most important one, namely that having regard to the large part which the community plays in serving the interests of the other parties, those other parties should refrain from disturbing the activities of the community or injuring the community until at least there has been an investigation and inquiry into the facts and the public fully informed.

Now, all these particular measures have been adopted and in this dispute applied up to a certain point. Recently another step has been taken in industrial disputes, which has been to appoint a controller either immediately after or before a dispute has developed into a strike or a lockout. This I believe is the first time that the government has appointed a controller a day or two in advance of the time at which a strike has actually taken place. I need not say that the government gave very careful consideration to that particular step. I am reminded by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) that in the case of the packers' strike a controller was appointed before any strike took place. I think I was absent in Europe at the time that that appointment was made. At any rate I can say to the house, in connection with the present dispute that the government considered very carefully the wisdom of appointing a controller when we did, which was a day or two before the strike took place, or whether we should wait until after a strike had taken place. The case which was made out for the desirability of appointing a controller at the earliest moment was precisely that which has been put forward by the hon. member for Calgary West this afternoon. It was that a strike in the steel industry in Canada at this time, at this particular season, and with conditions what they are in this country and abroad, would be one of the most devastating happenings or might develop into one of the most devastating situations which it would be possible to imagine as growing out of an industrial dispute. The government decided to appoint a controller a day or two in advance of what it seemed would inevitably be a strike unless some further step was taken, and I believe we were right in so doing. That step was not taken without knowledge on the part of the administration that we would be told that we, the government of the day, were the ones who had the chief responsibility to see that the strike was ended. The government has responsibility for everything that affects the community, and we are prepared to take our full measure of responsibility for the step we have taken in that regard. I believe that had we not taken it, we would have been asked to-day why we had not appointed a controller a little in advance and given him the chance to exercise his good offices.

Now the controller has been appointed. There are also other agencies at work. I should hope that they will all continue earnestly to do what they can in helping to bring the parties to this dispute together and to effect a settlement. But I welcome and I am sure that this house as a whole will welcome the suggestion that a committee, composed of members of all parties in this house, should meet as soon as possible, bring before it the representatives of the parties to this dispute, and seek to get at the facts so that the public may be fully informed. Fortunately the industrial relations committee is already a standing committee of this house. Its chairman has been chosen. I have just been informed that the chairman is not in the house but that he is likely to be here at any moment; but if he should be absent from the city another chairman should be appointed. I for my part would suggest that before this afternoon is over steps be taken to have the committee on industrial relations called together at once, and that the committee arrange with the utmost expedition to have brought before it those who are the responsible leaders or representatives of labour and of capital and of the management of the industrial concerns affected, and that the committee be given powers of full investigation, under oath if so desired, of the whole situation, with a view to enlightening the Canadian people upon where responsibility for any continuance of the dispute most rests. I have no hesitation in saying that the Canadian people will wish justice done in this matter. They will also wish that the will of the people as a whole be respected over and above that of any party to a dispute.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, the very fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has intervened in this discussion is confirmation of the view expressed on this side of the house yesterday that the present situation in the steel industry in Hamilton and throughout the country is one of grave urgency. Like the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) I had not intended to speak this afternoon, but the situation having developed as it has, I feel compelled to say something about it. Unlike the hon. member for Calgary West I shall in all probability be critical at times, but I shall give praise where I think praise is due. This is a time when we must face facts. If those facts involve criticisms, or if they are disagreeable to any particular person, that should not prevent us from stating them.

May I also comment on the suggestion made by the hon. member for Calgary West and concurred in by the Prime Minister. I too accept that suggestion, but in the present circumstances it comes too late to deal with the situation that has developed. It is true that representatives of capital and labour could be called before a parliamentary committee; but bear in mind the fact that this dispute, which affects the steel industry particularly, is not a new dispute. Ever since last January we have known that a difficult situation was developing; and going back beyond that, we have known that the men in the steel mills at Sydney, Nova Scotia, felt they were discriminated against because their wage schedule was lower than that of men in the steel industry generally throughout Canada.

Mr. MacINNIS: Ever since 1943.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, since 1943. They have been waiting for three years to get a settlement, to get what they considered to be but elementary justice.

The Prime Minister spoke of capital taking risks. May I suggest to him that the welfare of the people should in no wise be dependent upon any corporation or any organization taking a risk. The welfare of the people is of too great concern, it seems to me, to be a matter of risk on the part of any individuals for the sake of private gain or private profit. There is, of course, when that occurs always another sort of urgency, the necessity of obviating that risk, and that sometimes leads to further injustice.

I should like to say a word about the rights of the community. I am in whole-hearted accord with the Prime Minister when he says that these disputes between labour and management go far beyond the two sides to the dispute, that to-day the community is so deeply involved that when a struggle develops between a giant industrial organization and a great trade union the community is immediately affected. It seems to me that one of the things we have to emphasize as members of parliament, no matter where we sit, and we should emphasize it here in parliament, is that there is a social responsibility upon the leadership of industry and upon the leadership of labour, and this social responsibility can be exercised only when those who are obligated to discharge it understand the direction in which they are going. One of the difficulties in all these labour disputes, and in modern labour disputes particularly, is that on one side you have capital thinking in terms of profit, the protection of the industry, the dividends that will accrue, and on the other side you have the men, who say that the urge on the part of the industry in which they are employed is not the welfare of all the community or of the people engaged in the industry but to a degree the matter of making private gain. It seems to me that that is a matter which parliament and the people must consider in relation to a subject such as this.

I think we all wish to see something done to prevent a recurrence of those unhappy labour disputes which arose after the first great war. As a westerner I have a vivid recollection of the Winnipeg strike of 1919. Yesterday I noted that one of the men, the late John Queen, who for over twenty years was a member of the Manitoba legislature and for seven years mayor of the city of Winnipeg had passed away. He was one of those who were arrested, and with three of his colleagues he was elected to the Manitoba legislature immediately after the strike, John Queen and two others being elected while they were in gaol. The leader of the movement for which I have the honour to speak this afternoon, the late J. S. Woodsworth, was himself arrested in connection with that strike. Passions ran high, and the men were condemned at the time, but let us not forget that in the years that immediately followed, four of the leading figures in that dispute were elected to the Manitoba legislature and continued to sit there for many years, while the late leader of this movement, who was also arrested at the time, found, as did one of his colleagues of that day, a seat in this parliament a few years later.

The steel industry is a focal point in post-war industrial relations, and because of its importance, unless this dispute is settled I believe the strike will spread to other industries and in a few weeks we may be in a much more difficult position than that in which we find ourselves to-day.

I regret exceedingly that when the men decided to walk out, their offer of cooperation to the steel company at Hamilton was not accepted, as similar offers I understand were accepted by the Algoma Steel company and by the steel company at Sydney, Nova Scotia. The men offered to cooperate in banking the fires and maintaining the industry in good shape so that when the dispute was settled production could be resumed immediately. What I most regret, if I may say so to the Minister of Labour, is this. The offer, I understand, was made to the controller, and the controller also ignored it. When offers of this kind are made in good faith, it indicates at least an attempt on the part of the men to come to an understanding and agreement. Groups of men to-day are no longer in the position in which they were years ago. They will no longer accept with equanimity a refusal to take the proferred hand of assistance or of friendship.

I think it is greatly to be regretted that every conceivable method has been used not only to keep the plant in Hamilton operating but to take steps which are provocative to the men who have gone out on strike. According to the Montreal Gazette of to-day, the men who have remained in the plant and are working eight hours a day are in receipt of pay for twenty-four hours a day, and not only that; they are in receipt of a rate of wage ten cents an hour higher than their normal rate. If this be true, that in itself is provocative. We are told by the press that telephones have been installed for the convenience of the men who remain in the plant; that in addition to their wages they are receiving food and free cigarettes, and rumour has it that they are receiving free beer. They are there twenty-four hours a day. I do not say that they are getting beer twenty-four hours a day, because things would have been much worse than they are if that were true. I would ask the minister, when he speaks on this matter, as I presume he will, how these payments of wages and so on conform to the government regulations regarding wage rates. Surely this is a flagrant disregard of the rates of pay that have been approved. I suggest to the minister that section 44 of chapter 194 of the revised statutes of Ontario for 1937 forbids persons to eat and sleep and lodge in a factory or plant without special permission. Has such special permission been given? Who has applied for it? Was it applied for by the federal authority? If not, if the permission has not been granted, is the federal authority not condoning a violation of the laws of the province of Ontario?

We understand of course that the order has been issued to the controller to maintain maximum production, but immediately prior to this walkout, 2,000 of the workers in the Hamilton steel plant met in the Playhouse theatre and there the officials of the union gave a complete story of the negotiations over the last six months. I am not going to recount them, but I feel that the story of those negotiations shows undue delay. In addition to the trouble in the steel industry in Hamilton, there is other tension in that city. The united rubber workers of Firestone have been on strike for three weeks; the united electrical workers at the Westinghouse plant, and the typographical union employed by the local newspaper, the Spectator, have been out for some time. Hamilton has become as it were a strike centre, and that of course is bad not only for the city and that community but for the country.

I am going to say this to the Minister of Labour. The steel workers feel, rightly or wrongly, that the Department of Labour has not kept its pledges during these recent months, indeed these recent years, that the results of discussions have been unsatisfactory, and sometimes promises have been made that have not been carried out.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let us have the details.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes; I have some details. I say, that is the information that the men give me. The government's reluctance, if I may mention this, to expedite the negotiations, and then of course the maintenance of the differential to which I referred a few moments ago as between Nova Scotia and the Ontario mills, are some of the factors. These are provocative of trouble, and now we have some of the trouble. The minister will remember that widespread wage spreads existed during the war between steel rates and those of the secondary industries—for example, the automobile industry. Many hon. members of this house were in steel mills during the war and saw the operations in those mills. They know that in many instances the heavy, hot work in a steel mill is one of the most exacting forms of labour that a man can undertake.

The minister asked me a few moments ago what the details were. Well, the present dispute was first discussed in January of this year.

Mr. MITCHELL: I may say to my hon. friend that they have never been before a regional board.

Mr. COLDWELL: Just a moment. Negotiations were opened at that time with the steel companies—Stelco, Algoma and Dosco. The delay here, was on the part of the companies. There was no immediate response from the companies, and now we shall touch upon some government responsibility. In April an increase in the price of steel was authorized to the extent of $5 a ton. A similar increase was authorized in the United States, but in the United States one of the conditions of agreeing to the increase was that the working force should receive an additional 18½ cents an hour in wages. No such commitment, however, was demanded from the steel companies in Canada.

Let me point out what the increase in the price of steel means. We are told by the steel companies themselves that their modern machinery and modern methods have enabled them to increase their output by four tons a week in the case of Stelco, 3¾ tons in the case of Algoma. In other words, at $5 per ton the increase would be $20 per week for Stelco and $18.75 for Algoma.

Mr. MITCHELL: Per man?

Mr. COLDWELL: Per man. The 19½ cents an hour demanded would mean this. They are working a forty-eight hour week, and on the basis of a forty-eight hour week, at 19½ cents an hour, there would be involved a wage increase of $9.36 a week, in other words, one-half of the amount represented by the increased output of steel at the increased rate that one man would produce in a week. What the workers are really asking is not quite fifty per cent of the increase that the government of Canada granted unreservedly the steel companies themselves in April of this year.

There have been repeated discussions with the deputy minister of labour. On June 11 Mr. Justice Roach was appointed commissioner under P.C. 4020, and here came one of the delays which I think is regrettable, a delay which I understand was caused because Mr. Justice Roach was overloaded with judicial duties. But no meeting of the parties was arranged until June 28, seventeen days after the appointment. May I add that it was long after the three plants had carried strike votes, not by small but by overwhelming majorities. At the beginning the Minister of Labour quite properly hoped that there would be one set of negotiations covering all three plants, but Stelco, the Hamilton concern, objected to that and wanted separate hearings. Their request was sustained. During these negotiations certain admissions were made which are to be found in the statement made by the companies. In particular a significant admission was obtained from the Algoma Steel corporation. Labour costs have actually decreased since 1939. From 1939 to 1945 its payroll increased 133 per cent. Part of the increase was due to higher wages, and part, of course, to the larger working force employed. In the same period, tonnage produced increased by 221 per cent, so that the labour costs per ton declined from $18 to $13. In this debate the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) gave other figures which confirm the statement which I have just placed on the record. This happened, of course, during a period when all costs increased, but prices of steel were also increased. In spite of the improved output per man, the government granted a further increase of $5 a ton in April of this year.

Mr. HOWE: May I correct my hon. friend there? The price of steel was frozen in 1941 and did not change until the recent increase of $5 a ton.

Mr. COLDWELL: I shall take that correction, but it does not affect my argument. If we examine the company's statements of this year we find that in every year except one their profits increased. The exception was between 1941 and 1942, and when I looked up the record I found that the obvious reason why the amount available for profits and dividends had decreased was that there was a large increase in the amount provided for their depreciation fund in that particular year.

An hon. MEMBER: A million dollars.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes. Let us not forget that there have been other strikes and controllers have been appointed. These strikes have been settled. In the British Columbia strike which was settled recently, Chief Justice Sloan recommended an increase in wages all across the board, overtime after forty-four hours for six months of the year, and overtime after forty hours for the other six months of the year, this being a seasonal occupation. But in connection with the wage dispute in this industry, while some increases of fifteen cents an hour have been granted recently in other industries, the appointment of the controller—I will not say deliberately, but certainly unfortunately—coincided with the minister's statement in the house that increases of ten cents an hour were as much as our economy could permit. He told the house that that was the advice of his experts.

Mr. MITCHELL: Of those best able to judge.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have to take their advice.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to know just who they are, how they arrived at that figure, and why it was arrived at after larger increases had already been granted in other industries. That is material to the point.

I do not want to attack the companies, I have not been attacking them, but I am going to point out to the house that the history of Steel Company of Canada, of Hamilton, indicates clearly that throughout the years it has opposed every attempt at unionism. Whenever a union was in the process of formation it consistently endeavoured to break it up, and in most cases it was successful. It is a powerful company, making great profits and dividends. Its own statement shows that last year it made a net profit, after all taxes had been paid, of over $4 million. Let me again say to the government that that profit of over $4 million last year was made before the company was allowed to increase its price by $5 a ton. It is estimated that a minimum of $5 million may be added to the profits of the company because of the price increase—I should not say the one company, but the steel industry, because of the increase granted. With the cost of living as high as it is, surely the union demand for a basic wage of $33.60 a week in this industry at this time, a forty-hour week and two weeks' vacation with pay, is justified. Indeed when we look at the government's own statements as to the necessary income to maintain a reasonable standard of living, this is low. That is all the workers are asking for, and when we recall that all during the war these men were toiling in that industry to turn out the steel for munitions of war—and they did it willingly all during these years—it is not unreasonable. They contributed out of their earnings to the victory loans campaigns; many of them and their sons were overseas, and they were promised that when the war was over Canada would become a country in which they would be given the opportunity to earn decent and adequate wages.

Before I close I wish to say one or two other things. I wish to speak for a moment about the order in council passed under the authority of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act. This order, which has been emphasized in this dispute as it was not emphasized in former disputes—and because it was not emphasized it was not raised specifically—is in some respects even more drastic than the order of President Truman which the congress of the United States turned down almost as soon as it was announced. Let us look at it for a moment. Section 12 provides:

> Any person who (a) interferes with the exercise by the controller or any deputy controller of any of the powers, authorities and rights conferred upon him or (b) interferes with any employee or other person seeking to comply with the terms of this order or (c) counsels or procures any person to violate this order, shall be guilty of an offence and liable upon summary conviction to a fine not exceeding in the case of (a) five thousand dollars or imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years or to both such fine and such imprisonment, and in the case of (b) or (c) to a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars or imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or to both such fine and such imprisonment.

That is a pretty strong penal clause, stronger than appears in most acts of parliament dealing with violations of our statutory law. To the average worker reading that penal clause it certainly looks as though the intention of orders in council of this description is to illegalize strikes altogether. In our democracy the strike in the final analysis is the only weapon the worker has. As long as labour is sold in the market place, as unfortunately it is, so long will it be that the only possible method of protest the worker has is to refuse to sell his labour. That is the strike. Under this order in council I think the penalties are excessive in the case of the worker. As far as a rich corporation is concerned, or a wealthy officer of a corporation, these penalties mean little. To the humble worker, however, they spell ruination; and I am told these penalties are being broadcast continuously over one or perhaps both of the Hamilton radio stations. It is true the Minister of Labour said yesterday this was to inform the men of what the penalties were; but has the minister thought also that in effect this is an intimidation?

Now may I refer to just one other point. The hon. member for Calgary West raised the question of supplies being taken into the Hamilton plant by plane. There is no landing field in that plant. I understand that a strip has been put down, and that surrounding this plant and the field on which the planes land are tall buildings so that landing is a hazardous undertaking. I believe the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply has certain authority. You cannot prevent a plane from landing, in an emergency, on a field where landing is hazardous, but it is the minister's duty to see to it that a practice is not made of landing on an unlicensed and hazardous field. I call upon him to use his authority to see to it that this hazardous plane landing is not used for the breaking of a legitimate strike.

Mr. HOWE: Will my hon. friend quote the legislation?

Mr. COLDWELL: I have not the legislation before me.

Mr. HOWE: I wish you would look it up.

Mr. COLDWELL: I will not say legislation, but you have regulations.

Mr. HOWE: A private flyer can land where he likes.

Mr. COLDWELL: But he must not make a practice of landing on an unlicensed field under hazardous conditions. Is that not correct?

Mr. HOWE: I have never seen that regulation.

Mr. COLDWELL: Have you no regulations about safety?

Mr. HOWE: We have.

Mr. COLDWELL: My advice comes from someone who looked it up for me this morning. I am not quoting the exact phraseology of the regulation, but I am giving a summary of its intent. I should be surprised if the minister has not a regulation concerning matters of this sort. If not, it is time he had.

Mr. HOWE: In any event I suggest this is minor law breaking in view of what is involved at the present time in that dispute. Far more serious offences against the law are taking place.

Mr. COLDWELL: That may be so, but two wrongs do not make a right.

Mr. HOWE: We may as well clean them all up at the same time.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have said what I wanted to say, Mr. Speaker. I believe we as a parliament not only have to take cognizance of a situation of this kind but have to do what we can to amend it. I do not believe we shall have satisfactory labour conditions as long as we leave the two parties in industry to struggle along between themselves. I believe, with the Prime Minister, that the community, the third party, has some interest in this; and from time to time in this house some of my colleagues and I have suggested that the time has arrived when in order to deal with matters of the kind we should have a national board or committee—whatever you like to call it; in the final analysis it means the same thing—representative of organized labour as such, of the employing interests as such, and of the community as such. When I say it should be representative of the community I do not mean in any narrow sense, but I believe interests in the community such as the consumer and the farmer have to be taken into account. So I suggest to the Minister of Labour that he qualify the statement he made last week regarding the ten-cent an hour increase. I suggest to him and to the boards considering the matter of wages in dispute that if they examine the statements of these companies and the wages of the workers—

Mr. MITCHELL: May I say to my hon. friend that the board never had a chance to do that in this case.

Mr. COLDWELL: Why? Because the conciliator was appointed on June 11 and did not get in touch with the men until seventeen days later.

Mr. MITCHELL: May I say to my hon. friend that there is a concerted move across the country to go around these boards, and I used the new technique of appointing a commissioner in an endeavour to stabilize the situation. These boards were made up of just the people my hon. friend speaks of, nominated by labour and by the employers, with an impartial chairman.

Mr. COLDWELL: An impartial chairman?

Mr. MITCHELL: As far as my hon. friend and I could be impartial.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, I am urging the minister to see to it that in view of the profits being made by these companies; in view of the fact that the government itself allowed them to increase the price of steel by $5 a ton, the wages of the workers be sufficient to maintain them and their families in ordinary decent circumstances, and that the hours of work and the necessary holidays for recuperation be granted to the workers as they have requested at this time.

Mr. MENARY: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Monsieur l'Orateur—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier).

Mr. JOHNSTON: On a point of order, if we are going to have a list, we should follow it. There are other hon. members who wish to speak.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It makes no difference to the debate. You are not controlling the debate. It is a debate on the budget.

Mr. PIERRE GAUTHIER (Portneuf) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the three distinguished speakers who have addressed the house this afternoon, I feel doubly daring in rising after them and using one of the official languages, the French tongue, the noblest, the purest and the most delectable, even if it is not understood.

I shall add but one word on the very ticklish question of strikes. I followed with the greatest attention the previous speakers. They kept cool and refrained from resorting to unfortunate language. Allow me, however, to state my personal opinion. I do not believe, when a strike has been declared, that either the employers or the employees may benefit by the opening and the continuation of a debate on this matter, in view of the divergent convictions held by the various parties represented in this house. We should have greater confidence in those who are entrusted with the settlement of such disputes, in the hope that there is left a little humanity in the heart of employers and a great deal of common sense in the mind of workers. I understand that in the past, some hon. members have intervened on behalf of workers and sought to bring into line companies whose treatment of their employees lacked all trace of humanity. To my mind, instead of making a great number of speeches on the present strike, we ought to devote our efforts to the enactment of fair legislation dealing with the settlement of these disputes. We should also trust the Minister of Labour now in office (Mr. Mitchell) who has shown that he has plenty of grit as well as a sound judgment and the other qualifications required from a minister of labour imbued with principles for which all good Canadians should stand. The meetings dealing with the adjustment of these disputes should be conducted by those who are called to handle the settlement of these strikes. Let us trust the workers, the employers, and the mediators appointed by the government; let us trust those who will be chosen to represent the communities, as previous speakers have urged, and I feel sure that if we leave well enough alone, refrain from adding fuel to fire and show reasonable understanding, strikes will disappear and we will not witness the continuation of what we might term a baseball game. When there are more "strikes" than are necessary to put a man out, it is to be feared that a continuation of such strikes will be detrimental to the country. I do not wish to enter upon a field in which I am particularly interested; I do not wish to have my utterances misunderstood and especially misinterpreted. However, the Minister of Labour has sounded a warning during the seamen's strike, and more than ever before we must be on the lookout and fight the spread of certain subversive ideas which thrive when feeling runs high as it does during strikes. I did not say anything about communism, but everyone knows what I mean.

I have listened carefully to the budget speech. Even when I was sitting opposite I never doubted the competence of the present keeper of the treasury. He has a degree of resistance and patience rarely seen in a public man. His work is a thankless task and I am sure that all hon. members will agree that he has the required patience to do his work without complaining.

The budget mentioned a tax on cooperatives. In my constituency there are fourteen cooperatives with a membership of 850, according to the report of the province of Quebec. I wonder how my electors will react to the new budget and particularly to the proposed tax on cooperatives. Following the request of our local cooperatives I wrote to the department asking them to be careful and not be too hard on cooperatives, but that if cooperatives are to be taxed the proposed tax should not endanger the cooperative movement, not only in my constituency, but in the whole province.

I understand that the federal treasurer, the Minister of Finance (Right Hon. Mr. Ilsley), followed the recommendations of the investigation commission on the taxation of cooperatives. As I told you, I shall await their reaction. I took part in the foundation of the cooperative movement and I would not like to see its efficiency and strength undermined by dangerous taxation. I have not been able to get a clear picture from the figures that have been quoted, but I hope that the cooperatives will not suffer too much. I would like to see them escape altogether. Particularly, I would not like to see the cooperative movement lessened in its scope, nor that the proposed taxation should prevent farmers, whether they produce milk, butter or cheese, or are engaged in horticulture, or ordinary or truck gardening, from being conscious of the strength or the efficiency of the cooperative movement. I am awaiting the reactions, before raising the matter again, should the directors of cooperatives find that there is a threat to the interests of that wonderful movement which has so much helped the farming community.

Another matter with which I am allowed to deal in the budget debate, has to do with those who were called and have answered the call issued under the National Resources Mobilization Act. Articles appear about them in many papers. Members discuss the subject and even include it in their speeches; the matter comes up in committees and is being dealt with by the civil service commission.

In my opinion, those who answered the call, who complied with the laws of their country should not be discriminated against by anyone. I understand that they did not enlist voluntarily, but it does not behoove me to pass on their present attitude or to search their motives at the time. To my mind, it is high time that we should stop treating them as outcasts, heaping opprobrium upon them, holding a sword of Damocles over their heads, and casting the word "zombie" in their faces when they request jobs. They should enjoy all the advantages to which volunteers are entitled.

I realize there is a difference; however, they have complied with the law of the land and I fail to see why they should be maintained in a situation of inferiority and, especially, why we should make them feel it more than is necessary.

I shall not ask for an amnesty for fear of irritating those of my colleagues who jump in their seats every time this word is uttered.

It seems to me, that the time has come for Canada to assume a rank equal to that of the other countries of the world, with the exception of Russia, whose place I do not envy for Canada. All political prisoners have been released in every country except Russia where democracy is of a special kind. Therefore, I see no reason why we should not pass a regulation, an act of parliament or an order in council for the purpose of rehabilitating those who are at variance with the Department of National Defence.

To my mind, this state of affairs has obtained long enough at a time when farmers have no help and timber operators have to do without lumbermen. Why not settle this point, instead of letting the farmer run the risk of leaving his crop on the field, as he has done before? And why expose the lumber operator to the risk of being unable to fulfil his contracts to supply the domestic or foreign markets, especially at this time when, in all countries, reconstruction is in full swing?

Speaking of reconstruction, I should like to comment briefly on a project which, though not originating in my constituency, has developed considerably in my locality since the war's end. The belief is held in my constituency, a belief which incidentally is shared by many municipal officials and members of the clergy, that the best way to foster the reconstruction of our economy, and to do so in the most efficient manner, is to interest young men in developing initiative, by helping them to build up strong healthy bodies and providing them with the required knowledge, even those who do not plan to take up long special courses leading to the professions.

It is a plan that is clearly taking shape in my own constituency and for which the government should provide in its reconstruction programme. Several municipalities are planning to establish what they call social or recreational centres, comprising community halls that could be fitted with a complete gymnasium, a reading room and library, and, in the more populous centres, even a swimming-pool. Besides developing our young people's taste for worth-while books and teaching them physical culture, such projects would teach them to make better use of their leisure and increase their enjoyment of their rural environment. By thus learning to appreciate their environment, they shall grow fonder of it and thus feel less inclined to seek in the city the entertainment they can find in their home town.

I think that this problem deserves the government's consideration and that its solution would help solve another of equal importance, the exodus from rural districts.

I was a member of the Quebec legislature when it first considered this problem and I recall that even in my student days, our debating societies would tackle this problem even if it was not as acute as now. Statistics show that, at the present time, sixty-nine per cent of the population of my province live in the cities. That is an abnormal and undesirable situation, in view of the fact that urban centres depend on the land and its workers for the garden produce they consume in such quantities. Let us keep in mind the need of reestablishing the balance between the urban and rural populations. Let us concentrate our efforts in order to ward off disaster. This project, which I would call a reconstruction project, involving financial assistance for the opening of social centres, is most certainly an excellent way of helping the solution of the problem I have just mentioned, which has but too long existed and on which responsible authorities do not seem willing to concentrate their efforts.

I understand that the carrying out of such a plan would be easier if dominion-provincial agreements had been entered into. I have no doubt that the people are anxious that those agreements should materialize, and they can be concluded without any interference with the proper autonomy of the provinces. The constitutional aspect has been discussed, examined and scrutinized by the learned lawyers and notaries who sit in this house. I dare not deal with it, but I wish to quote a few excerpts from a letter which Sir Wilfrid Laurier wrote to the hon. Léon Mercier-Gouin on July 18, 1918: It expounds an idea which I wish to commend to this house and to the public. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said in that letter:

> You have grasped that difference in pointing out that in our constitution everything that was not expressly assigned to the provinces belongs to the dominion; while in the case of our neighbours, it is the opposite. Under the United States constitution, everything that was not assigned to the central authority is retained by the states. And you add "Is it not indeed more logical, more liberal and more equitable?"
> On this point—said Sir Wilfrid Laurier—I am constrained to differ in toto from your views. I consider as quite superior our system which assigns to the federal authority all unenumeraated powers. The object of the federal system is to form a distinct unit out of heterogeneous elements, while guaranteeing to each of the latter its own existence, that is to say without any amalgamation. The new state will then necessarily be more solid and stronger if final authority is vested in the power which unites all those elements. The idea is still more obvious if the object of the federation is to create a new nation out of various elements formerly quite separate.

Switzerland came into being only when it assigned supreme authority to the federal council. Until then, the German Bernese, the French Genevan, the Italian-speaking man from Ticino, were first of all citizens of Berne, Geneva or the Ticino district.

Now each preserves the traditions, language and pride of Berne, of Geneva or of the Ticino, but paramount over them all is Switzerland, one and inseparable.

Daniel Webster, of all American statesmen, is the one who best and most forcibly showed the path finally taken by his country after much groping and an acute crisis. He tersely closes his finest address by saying: "Liberty and union now and forever, one and inseparable."

In my judgment, it cannot be questioned that, unless based on this principle, any federal association carries within itself the seeds of inescapable disruption.

The truth of this is exemplified by the Achaean league and all other attempts at federation in Italy and elsewhere. All perished through the same cause: weakness of the central authority.

The man in the street would reflect: "How can we expect provincial governments to be strong when the central authority is weak?"

We were given yesterday English copies of the Taschereau-Kellock commission on espionage.

Mr. Speaker informed us this afternoon that copies in French would be distributed; I wish to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for having given orders to that effect.

When this matter first came up, some persons, most of whom were opponents of the party now in power, contended that the latter was playing politics, and that the quest for spies was mere eye-wash. In this very house, some hon. members considered that the government's intervention was too harsh. The right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) was even taken to task in this respect. I then took the floor to defend those who believe that we must not beat around the bush when it comes to espionage; that we must take the situation in hand and mete out just punishment to those who break the laws of our country. I do not believe that the sentences were severe enough. If the same thing had happened in Russia, where a special brand of democracy is prevailing, I wonder whether the government of the very democratic generalissimo Stalin would even bother to launch an investigation.

I fail to see why the government should be charged with over-harshness. I believe they have been too lenient. Pravda itself, official organ of the Russian government asserted that the liberal administration was simply indulging in a bit of window-dressing to sway public opinion and make political capital by diverting attention to one group in particular, to a part of the world blessed with a sound democratic system, to wit the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. While hunting, Mr. Speaker, one need not ask wild beasts their permission to fire in self-defence. The government should remain constantly on the alert against the danger of communism. Every organization in Canada and in all other countries must take a realistic view of the present situation. They should count the number of nations under the heel of communism, subject to its influence or suffering the first inroads of its propaganda. We are not sufficiently aware of such a contingency. In Canada, more than anywhere else, we should keep our eyes open. I am not advocating, at this time, the banning of the Labour-Progressive party, but I strongly urge that every means at our disposal be used against the expansion of the communist ideology and of every other nefarious, subversive, dangerous theory which eventually will kill true and sound democracy in the world.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would give some advice to hon. members by quoting a prayer which is recited in the American legislature in Wisconsin. I found it in a well-informed newspaper of Quebec district, Le Soleil. I leave it to the consideration of this house.

God Almighty, Lord of all governments, help us in the opening hours of this legislative session to realize the holiness of political affairs.

Deliver us from the subtle temptation of sin, when the voices of parties and interests are raised in this house.

Prevent us from thinking about future elections, instead of future generations.

Prevent us from discussing personalities instead of principles.

Grant that we may not think too much of securing majorities instead of considering the merits of required legislation.

Prevent us, when debates reach a decisive stage, from speaking for effect instead of telling the truth.

Grant that we derive no pleasure from seeking to coin witticisms instead of searching for facts.

Prevent us from considering the party an end in itself rather than a means to an end.

That, I believe, is a Liberal principle.

We not only beg for Thy protection against temptations which beset us in these legislative chambers but also ask that we may more fully understand the meaning of government in order the better to serve the interests of those who have entrusted into our hands the government of this republic.

Help us to remember that future generations are part of our electoral body, although, as yet, they have no voice in the elections.

Grant that we respect truth more than the past. Help us to make a servant rather than a master of our party.

May we understand the futility of winning elections were we to lose our energy.

Help us to remain independent of tyrannical majorities and argumentative minorities when the truth is with neither of them.

May our motives be inspired by sincerity and our methods enlightened by science.

Help us to serve the masses without flattering them, to believe in them without bowing to superstition.

To this advice, Mr. Speaker, I shall add another. Some hon. members, during the war, urged the government in power to spend billions of dollars, or as much as possible, to make a superhuman effort, to spare neither capital nor manpower, for, to their minds, the expenditures were never large enough. To-day, these same hon. members, who are still sitting in this house urge the government to reduce taxes and expenditures. I ask them to cast a look back and tell us frankly whether they do not believe that someone is bound to pay for the debts made during the war.

They should also remember that those debts should be paid by those taxpayers who can afford to pay them, and not by the small wage earners. Even though our treasurer's efforts disappointed the small wage earners and those who look after their interests, and although the budget did not fulfil all our hopes, we must admit that he has tried to reduce the burden of income tax which rests upon the shoulders of persons in the lower income bracket. Those who approved of billion dollar expenditures and took pleasure in putting the heat on the government, as they said, should now apply that same heat to their own way of reasoning and admit that although the excess profits tax has not been abolished the treasurer tried to alleviate the burden of the small wage earners, upon whom rests the entire economic set-up of a nation. It should be remembered that when France lost the war of 1870, under Napoleon III, it was saved by the well-lined stockings of the thrifty French people. In my opinion, the administrators of finance of every nation should remember that sound economy is not based on daring, but rather on good old fashioned thrift, on that kind of wisdom that prompts the small wage earner to think twice before risking the fruits of his toil.

Mr. W. GARFIELD CASE (Grey North) (Text): Mr. Speaker, I think I should say at the outset it is a source of regret that I do not understand the beautiful language of my French brethren. I try to follow them and to listen to the various emphases so that I may appreciate the translation the next day. The hon. member who preceded me mentioned the name of Daniel Webster. I remembered that there was a Webster who found a meaning for everything, and I then thought I was following very closely the remarks he had to make.

This afternoon we have listened to remarks made by hon. members with regard to a serious situation currently in existence in our country; and while it is not necessarily my purpose to comment upon or to add to what has already been said, I feel it shows what the desire is on the part of the government when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) rises in his place and endorses a suggestion made by the member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), a member of His Majesty's loyal opposition. I say that because it gives me possibly a greater appreciation of the responsibility of this chamber and the desire of the government to seek advice from those who are sincere in their efforts to make some contribution to the common weal.

It is interesting for those who, like myself, have not been very long in this great House of Commons to think back to the days when we were travelling up and down the concession lines of our various constituencies appealing to our electors and presenting to them the policy which we believed would be in the best interests of the country; and on the great day of days, election day, when we were endorsed by our constituents, those who were selected to follow the majority leader were charged with a greater responsibility in a sense than those whose policies were not endorsed. Yet the opposition, according to our system of government, is in a sense not entirely relieved of responsibility. The responsibility which I feel is mine and my colleagues' is that of being reasonably critical of the policies presented by the administration; that is to say, I do not believe that the opposition is necessarily expected to agree, where you have a two-party system of government, with the policies which the government advocates. Then, too, I feel that an opposition member might be expected to state his personal views. As far as I am aware, there are no restrictions upon a member stating his personal views or indicating to the government some method whereby he believes the administration could be improved. We had evidence of that to-day and evidence of the government's willingness to accept from the opposition some suggestions which, if given effect to, might improve a serious situation that now exists in the country.

I have grown to appreciate more and more the House of Commons. In common with many other members, I was quite disillusioned after my experience in the first special session following the famous by-election. I learned that an individual, like individuals throughout the land, counts as an individual; yet within this chamber he is provided with certain protection and is privileged to state his views, which can be interpreted by those who are willing to listen to his remarks.

I arrived just about the time the high office of His Majesty's representative was being changed, when we were in a sense saying farewell to those who had so graciously occupied this position with distinction to themselves and credit indeed to the British isles. Then we welcomed a great soldier. At that time I thought that in our wisdom it would be well if we could determine that at all times in the future the governor general of Canada would be a representative from some other part of the British commonwealth of nations. I do not say that in any sense belittling the talent we have in Canada or those who would indeed lend dignity and honour to this high office. But it is a link with other parts of the empire. In my opinion any part of the empire would be proud to have as a governor general a man of the ability of Field Marshal Smuts of South Africa. When I think of the great men of my day and generation, particularly of my day, I can think of no greater man in the British empire than Field Marshal Smuts, one of the world's greatest scientists, an intellectual, a student of world affairs, a scholar. I am not making any comparison with other men, because I think we all recognize that during the trying and difficult days and dark years there was in the centre of this great empire a voice which lent determination and courage to all within its range. Its range was great, because by modern science radio carried this great voice from the heart of the empire to inspire us to greater effort. Indeed it played a great part in the winning of the war. I am referring now, of course, to the Right Hon. Winston Churchill.

I should like to go one step further and offer a suggestion which I have had in my mind for some time. In fact I have been a constant advocate of this matter, namely, the appointment of lieutenant governors to the various provinces. While I have just said that I hoped we would never change our system—but I should like to see our future governors general selected from the various parts of the British commonwealth of nations —I believe there is much to be said for the appointment of lieutenant governors from the various provinces to the various provinces. I have always felt that there is something tangible in the spoken word, and a governor general who is appointed from some other part of the empire can come to us from some other land and tell us about their problems, and the methods they employ, which would give us greater appreciation of them. Then, when he returns to his native land or to the place whence he came he could tell something about Canada and its many advantages. So with the provinces; if we had a citizen from British Columbia appointed lieutenant governor of Ontario or a citizen from Quebec appointed lieutenant governor of Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Ontario, he would have an opportunity to tell the citizens of this province something of the advantages that his particular province has to offer. At the same time a citizen of Ontario would be telling something of the advantages that Ontario has to offer. In this way we would probably become more united than we are at the present time. I see no reason why such a plan should not be seriously considered by the authorities who would make a decision of this kind. I want it understood, of course, that I am speaking for myself and offering this personal observation without any weight of policy or anything of that kind behind it.

I now feel that I should say something about the budget. I can think back to that memorable night when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) presented the budget and outlined the fiscal policy of the administration for the supposedly ensuing or current fiscal year. The galleries of the House of Commons were loaded to the gunwales; people were here in large numbers expecting something which would give them a sense of direction, a hope that the government was awake to the problems of the nation; indeed, they anticipated something which never occurred.

I have not had a great deal of opportunity to study the budget carefully. It involved a huge volume of comment, and was a notable address. There was some degree of showmanship evidenced, which, up until that time, I had not given the Minister of Finance credit for possessing. As he proceeded with his presentation, he said that "presently I shall announce substantial reductions in the personal income tax," or words to that effect. That kept us on the alert, anticipating what the reductions would amount to. Shortly we were to learn, and then I began to realize that the Minister of Finance must indeed have had his tongue in his cheek because the reductions were more or less a myth. I then began to think things over and to ask myself if the budget was an abortion or an illegitimate child; certainly it was premature. By its very terms it is not due to be born until January 1, 1947, and it will be nurtured by the revenues and increment from the calendar year 1946. What does this mean? In effect it means that for the first time in history, to my knowledge, we have had presented in the House of Commons a budget, the effect of which was not immediate. As a matter of fact the budget has always been looked upon as a secret document. Its contents are held closely and rigidly guarded, because therein is contained a matter of policy to which the government intends to give immediate effect. Therefore, in reality we now have a budget that is not in effect until January 1, 1947, and is currently to be in effect for a period of only three months, or a matter of one-quarter of the year.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is incorrect. That statement has been made several times, but it is incorrect.

Mr. CASE: The minister says it is not correct, but in the main it is correct. I am not going to deal with the matter of schedules, the effect of which may be current in some instances; but in the main there are no exemptions for the income taxpayer until January 1, 1947.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. I was dealing with the question of this three months' theory; that parliament has the right to legislate only until the end of the fiscal year, and that therefore any reductions in the budget end on March 31, 1947. That is a completely erroneous and groundless theory, and an incorrect statement.

Mr. CASE: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this parliament has no right to legislate beyond March 31, 1947, when a new budget will be brought down. In that I am supported by the best constitutional authorities outside the house. All we have before us at the present moment is a promise of what will be in effect until this administration is prepared to give effect to some other change. That does not necessarily mean that it is in effect until—

Mr. ILSLEY: In the last budget, which was brought down on October 12 last, we legislated for the whole year 1946.

Mr. CASE: The minister is now bringing down a budget, the terms of which do not become effective until January 1, 1947; and I am told by those who should be able to speak with some knowledge about constitutional procedure that it has always been an accepted practice that the current session can legislate for the fiscal year; that in reality the budget is in effect until March 31, 1947, and that when a new budget is introduced its terms may be made retroactive to the beginning of the fiscal year. This places industry and businessmen in a difficult position. They find it hard to make plans, because they have no definite advice and no reason to believe that changes will not be made. As a matter of fact, if no changes are anticipated that puts the budget in a worse light than ever. Certainly, if this administration would introduce that measure of economy which has been advocated and urged by the opposition, they should be able to lower taxation during the coming fiscal year. If they are unable to do so that makes the position even worse than I thought.

I have had an opportunity to consult with many citizens of this country, and I can tell the Minister of Finance that they think they have been flim-flammed by this budget. I think it will go down in history as the flim-flam budget, because I have failed to discover in it anything constructive, anything that would give industry any incentive to plan, or any measure of relief for the overburdened taxpayers. It contains nothing which would help us compete in the markets of the world, which we are so fond of claiming as our definite objective and which we must achieve if we are to bring about that industrial production by means of which we hope to maintain our internal economy. Great as the home market is, Canada is in the unusual position that she must anticipate tremendous export markets. I am asking myself whether there is in this budget any yardstick that can be used by those planning for the future to determine their security. It would seem to me that we are constantly moving, without any definite guidance from the administration and without any hope of relief which would put us in a better competitive position. As a matter of fact I think we are becoming more handicapped.

I said there is no evidence of economy on the part of the administration. A good deal has been said about this subject, but I should like to refer to one department in particular. I have in mind the public information service. I am quite ready to admit that perhaps this was necessary in war time, when news of a privileged nature had to be given out with a good deal of discretion, but to-day the public information service is doing nothing more or less than disseminating party propaganda. To-day the taxpayers of Canada are paying a great deal of money to be told how good their government really is. I do not wonder that hon. gentlemen want to keep that propaganda before the people, because there is a feeling abroad that the government is in great difficulty. I do not mean that in the sense that they have not a great many loyal supporters, but among their followers there are those who are very much in doubt. The central government can set an example. We now find regularly on our desks another sample of propaganda entitled The Saskatchewan News, a weekly information and news bulletin issued by the bureau of publications, legislative buildings, Regina, Saskatchewan. They are simply following the lead of this government. If we have reached the point where each party in power feels it can use the government printing presses and legislative machinery to tell all the good things about itself, then I think democracy is in great danger, because it will become more and more difficult—and we see the situation developing in connection with radio—for the opposition to make itself heard, though I do not suppose the government worries a great deal about the opposition.

Apart from the budget, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that in a sense I can appreciate some of the difficulties of the government. I realize that I can stand here and tell the government where in my opinion they are going wrong; yet they may reply that in doing so I am assuming no responsibility. However, if I can bring home a picture which would indicate that I have at least an appreciation of their difficulties, and if I indicate my belief that those difficulties can be solved, then I think I may have made some contribution to the councils of the nation. It was regrettable, of course, that the government failed—and I say that advisedly—at the dominion-provincial conference, when they sought to obtain tax adjustments. But it must be remembered, and I think it only fair to say, that it was the federal government alone that was creating double taxation. It cannot be said that the conference failed for any party reasons, regardless of the fact that the two central provinces were represented by premiers who would not be considered kith and kin of the Liberal administration. I can think back to another day and another conference, when the delegation from the province of Ontario was headed by that greatest of all Liberal thinkers, Hon. Mitchell Hepburn, and when no common ground could be agreed upon even to commence the conference. So that the latest failure cannot be charged to the parties represented at that meeting.

In common with other hon. members, I was privileged to sit in the gallery of the senate chamber and view the scene below. My mind went back to another day, of which I have learned in history. I am thinking now of those who met together and became the fathers of confederation. The last conference presented a great object lesson of the tremendous difficulties that were faced by the fathers of confederation. Yet they did not dare to fail. Under the most trying conditions they brought about in Canada the birth of a great nation. How was this accomplished? It was accomplished by a series of compromises. It has often been said that, after all, confederation is nothing more than a compromise, and that it is held together by a delicate thread. I believe in days gone by the Prime Minister has had high regard for that delicate balance which has maintained confederation, and some standard of unification in our country.

I do not know whether he departed from those feelings, but the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) has said he felt that if the Prime Minister had been ten years younger he could have saved the conference. I would not prophesy. Perhaps I might say that if he had been ten years older he would have saved it. But the fact remains that the conference failed, and its failure is the responsibility of someone. I do not think we can charge that failure entirely to one group, but rather to a combination of them. There was a group, however, which sought to give leadership. The type of leadership evident on that occasion now appears in the budget, and it is set out in a take-it-or-leave-it proposition.

Since sixty per cent of the population of Canada is in Ontario and Quebec, I am wondering what the effect on confederation will be if certain provinces accept the minister's proposals. What will be the effect if those provinces which accept constitute only twenty per cent of the population? In my view, the great danger is that Canada will be divided, that it will set the west against the central provinces or the central provinces against the east.

The situation is indeed serious. As a matter of fact it is so serious that no one should seek to make political capital out of it. My hope is that the Prime Minister and his administration will seek to reconvene the conference; that it might meet in a spirit of compromise and better understanding, resolve its differences and arrive at something which would offer some advantage, so far as unity in Canada is concerned. I believe that our national unity hangs in the balance at this critical moment, and that we must encourage our government to do everything in its power to follow those principles of unity it has professed in the past. While I do not endorse in toto the practice the government has followed, I know it has always contended that it has sought greater unity in Canada.

More recently we have had brought about parity with the United States dollar. I do not know what the administration proposes to do; but I do know that our natural resources which have been developed, those which remain undeveloped and others in process of development will suffer most. I am one who believes that this generation has a right to exploit to the full the natural resources of this great land. But I say that by careful planning we should seek to replace all replaceable natural resources, so that those who are yet to come will enjoy some of the advantages we enjoy.

Our lumbering, mining and fishing industries will be affected by parity with the United States dollar. I believe I might properly ask where the pressure came from which caused the government to take action, apparently without consultation with anyone. It must have known that these vital industries would be critically affected.

We have before us the problem of maintaining price ceilings. That could have been a reason for the change—perhaps a good one. It is possible the government felt that parity with the United States dollar would help maintain the ceilings on our goods. But I am wondering if we are going to succeed. I am not demonstrating any lack of interest in this vital problem, because I know very well what would happen if the dam gave way. I think of a nation's purchasing power as a constant source of pressure against a resisting force, a force which one might compare with an obstruction across a stream. One will notice that if the water ever goes over the top of a dam the structure is destroyed; and in my view that is the problem we face to-day. If we are to maintain price controls tremendous self-discipline must be exercised by the people of Canada.

Let me place on record some of the figures involved so that hon. members may have a greater appreciation of the situation. I shall not mention the authority for my figures, but I can assure the house that it is a thoroughly reliable one. I accept the challenge of anyone who doubts it. These figures show that personal individual holdings in liquid resources, made up of bank deposits and government bonds, amount to about $1,025 per capita. I give this figure in comparison with that of 1939, at which time we had about $300 per capita, and with that of 1926 with a per capita of $185. To-day we have a total of six and one-quarter billions in bank deposits alone, and six billions in bonds held by Canadians. These are bank deposits, and currency in the hands of individuals. This is money in the tills of merchants, money that is hoarded or hidden. Even our bonds must be considered liquid resources, because every Canadian bondholder understands that if he wishes to realize on his bonds he is free to cash them.

This serves to increase the pressure upon the limited supply of goods. If I were to remind the house that we financed the speculative bubble of 1929 on about two and a third billions of dollars, I believe hon. members would appreciate something of the courage of the Minister of Finance and his colleagues when they seek to continue to give effect to this method of controlling prices. There was an incentive during the war period to pass things by; people were willing to do without. People were willing to conserve their resources in the hope of winning the war. But there is at the present time the tendency—and the debate to which we listened this afternoon in relation to labour and their tendency to strike for higher wages provides all the evidence necessary to substantiate the statement I am about to make—on the part of our citizens to feel that unless they make their purchases now, increased costs will push the price of products beyond their reach. They do not know what may happen. We have that as well to contend with. So that I feel that we have in this budget all the elements which will make problems greater for the administration in controlling prices. There is no incentive for industry to produce, which is the only thing that, in my opinion, will avoid inflation. More goods is the one remedy which would help to stem the dangers of inflation. Yet we find a tendency for labour to be seeking higher wages. Higher wages mean higher costs. This discourages industry; it discourages capital investment and it reduces production; yet no one is satisfied. That is one of the problems we face in the matter of subsidies. Those who receive them feel they are not getting enough; those taxpayers who are paying the subsidies feel that the recipients are receiving too much. It seems to me that the more government regulation you have, the more restricted our production will be. As a matter of fact, if we continue with price ceilings on natural products for a great while longer we shall live in an economy of scarcity in what has always been recognized as a land of plenty, because incentives are needed to produce.

I am reminded that my time has nearly expired. I shall take only a moment or two more.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. CASE: I say to you, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion that I believe the real challenge to labour to-day is to seek to share the responsibilities of industry. Industry should be alive to the possibility of having labour represented on its boards of directors, so that they will know more about the problems of industry and will be able to appreciate better those problems. After all, labour is making an investment as well as capital, and each should share to some extent the advantages and the profits which result therefrom.

I will conclude by saying that the privileges we enjoy as a democratic country have been dearly won; let us seek to measure up to our responsibilities.

Mr. PATRICK H. ASHBY (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, the Social Credit group warmly and heartily endorses the recommendation which has been made by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith). We feel that if the industrial relations committee of this house is set up at once, and if both parties to the present steel strike and all pending and threatened strikes are required to present themselves before the committee to give evidence and to attempt to iron out their difficulties, great good is sure to come of it. We believe that the people of Canada will welcome such an action on the part of this parliament. It is undoubtedly the wish of Canadians everywhere that this body do all it can to bring about industrial peace in Canada. But let it be understood that the setting up of this committee should in no way relieve the government from its responsibilities. I trust that the readiness of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to accept the proposal of the hon. member for Calgary West does not mean that the government will attempt to shift its responsibility to an all-party committee. The government will be expected by the people to get busy in a real and determined effort to remove at the earliest possible time the basic reasons for labour unrest. It will be expected also to do all in its power through the use of present machinery to prevent further strikes and to reconcile differences between capital and labour.

I have not brought down with me the many hundreds of letters which I have received, complaining about the excessive taxation that has been imposed upon the people of Canada. But from just one day's issue of papers that I received I clipped out enough clippings to fill up the whole of my time if I read even half of them. Here are some headings: "The burden of taxation", "Protests high taxation", "Income tax on the salaried man", "The cost of living index above wartime peak", "The high taxes"; and so on all the way through. I am not going to burden hon. members; I notice most of them have gone out; they are so sick and tired of listening to all these speeches that I do not blame them, and I do not want to add to their trials and tribulations. But I was interested in taxation and I thought I would go to the library and find out something about it. I obtained a book the name of which is, "The Principles and Methods of Taxation", and I read in it a definition of what taxes are:

> Taxes are a portion of private wealth exacted from individuals by the state for the purpose of meeting the expenditures essential to carrying out the functions of government.

The writer of that statement did not know what he was talking about. He had not the faintest idea of what he was saying. Yet he was the president of a great university, a great economist, lecturing to students. Imagine it! Another great university president a short time ago made another statement which was absolutely imbecilic. What the man said was, "We must devise ways and means to provide full employment for all."

Mr. JOHNSTON: That sounds like the Liberal party policy.

Mr. ASHBY: Let us analyse what the man said. What is full employment? Employment is a means to some end. If I had a pile of stones on my lawn and I wanted to get rid of them I would have either to hire somebody, giving him employment, or to employ myself and remove those stones elsewhere. The object of employment is to obtain a result. So what that poor imbecilic university president said in effect was, "Ways and means must be found to provide ways and means", which is pure, unadulterated insanity. No wonder we are in such a terrible predicament. We have passed through the stone age, I am told; I was not living in that age. We have since passed through the iron age and various other ages; we have reached the economic age, the age of money, and now we are getting into the age of illusions. It does not matter to whom one speaks; if they have been through these training institutions that we call universities, although they are no longer really universities at all, but just training institutions, elaborated barber schools, where human minds are moulded to a pattern, they are incapable of thinking clearly. I had a friend, a university professor. I know many of them, and they are all fine fellows, but they cannot help their training. This man told me that the tariff was a result, that it was not a method at all. He said, "You can vote for a high tariff, or you can vote for a low tariff." The man did not understand that a tariff was a means to some end. He could not distinguish between means and ends, between methods and results, and a great many other people have the same difficulty. Let me read a paragraph from a clipping I have here. Listen to this poor fellow. I pity the poor soul. He is perfectly honest but he just does not understand, and he is not alone in that; it is universal. He says:

I am a white collar worker and not making any more than in 1941. Before the war I paid no income tax. All during the war and now, I pay $400 to $500 a year. We are supposed to be exempt $1,200. Yes, if you don't make more, but if you make, say $2,000, even though married, you are taxed on the $2,000. No exemption except $125 allowed off the taxes for your wife. Try and keep her on it!

What struck me about that was this. We are living in an age of illusions. This man says: "But if you make more than $1,200, say $2,000." Do you get the idea? Does that man make $2,000? Yet everywhere you will meet people who will say: "I made $50 on that deal." Did he make $50? A man came to me in my office only the other day and was complaining. He said: "I make so much a week and have to pay so much out for taxes and all that." I asked him, "Do you really make that much?" "Yes," he said. Then I asked him, "Why don't you make twice as much?" He said, "I would if I could." "Why can't you?" I asked him. "If you know how to make so much money, why can't you go ahead and make more?" Of course, what the man meant was that he received so much money. I can turn up almost any page of Hansard and find where members have been speaking of the terrific costs of government. But does it cost money? No, it does not. Then why use that word? The war did not cost a cent. The prices we have paid for things used in the war are something else entirely. Let us get down to sane reasoning. What does anything cost? What is the true cost?

A man, by the name of Christ, lived some two thousand years ago, and it seems to me that that individual had the greatest mind of any man who ever lived on this earth. What did Christ say? "Seek ye the truth." Is it true that it costs money for things? This chair did not cost money. The price paid for it is something else entirely. I tried to explain that to a friend of mine a while ago. I said, "You have a ton of coal and I have the price of the coal, $10, we will say. I want the coal to keep me warm, and so I give you the $10 for the coal. You accept the money and I accept the coal." But did that coal cost $10? "No," I said, "you have the $10 and I have the coal. I take the coal and burn it in the furnace." Then in the spring of the year we meet again and I say, "Now what did the coal cost? It did not cost $10, because there it is, you still have it—or someone else has it. The cost of the coal was what was consumed in producing it." The cost of keeping me warm was the coal, for it has been consumed; we no longer have it.

If we went into the bush and built ourselves a shack, what would be the cost of the shack? We can perhaps say that the true cost of production is the consumption of all that is produced over a given period of time, but let us briefly say that the cost is what is consumed in producing it. So what is the cost of building a shack? The cost is what has been consumed in building it. We no longer have the trees growing that went into it in the form of lumber. We no longer have the rock in the soil. These things have gone into building the home. The home did not cost money to build but it cost the things that went into making it. If we can only get away from some of these illusions that so many people have, we shall begin to make some real progress.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ASHBY: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was discussing this age of illusion and was dealing with costs. One hon. member told me that he did not follow me, that he was confused regarding the difference between price and cost of goods. I should like to use this illustration in that connection. If I had $10 and required a pair of shoes I could use that $10 to obtain the shoes. Money is a means to an end and not an end in itself; all that I would do would be to hand the $10 to the retailer; he would transfer the shoes from his possession to mine, and I would wear them if they fitted me. The shoes did not cost $10. That was the price paid for them.

For the benefit of the hon. member who asked me the question, may I use this other illustration? If we had, we will say, a sack of wheat which we wanted transported from a granary to a feed barn and we used a wheel-barrow for the purpose, would it cost the wheelbarrow? Of course not. I would suggest to anyone who is confused about price and cost that he repeat to himself when eating soup, for example, "The soup costs the spoon." That would be just as insane as it would be to say that it cost money.

I mention this age of illusion for this purpose, because we are finding it more and more difficult to convey our thoughts from one to another, and this matter of costs and making money and so on is all the result of the infiltration of an alien agency which is trying to undermine the whole democratic system of life and all the institutions which we have developed, or rather which have naturally evolved in the course of the ages.

The British commonwealth of nations is the greatest united nations organization ever known in human history, and the British commonwealth of nations, this great united nations organization, is under attack. It is being attacked not directly but indirectly. We see it all the time; and this is one method of attacking it, by means of the great illusions that are created in the minds of people, as though our systems are wrong, whereas our systems are not. What is wrong is the abuse of these systems. There is nothing wrong with automobiles, but there is something wrong with the improper use of them, and it is exactly the same with our financial institutions.

I wish to congratulate the Minister of Finance on holding on to this system, because if he ever gives way to all the pressure brought to bear upon him, we may lose it and this money system is the greatest system that has ever been devised by man. May I read a brief extract to illustrate that contention:

> Remove the abuses, and the more one understands of our systems, the more beautiful and subtle and delicate and appropriate do they appear, and the more desirous and pledged one becomes to see them administered correctly, and according to their nature, and the less one itches to destroy.

Let us be careful. Never destroy until we have a better system or structure which is tested and tried and which will take the place of that which we seek to destroy. The writer says:

> I do not believe that anyone in the least susceptible to natural beauty in its less obvious and picturesque guises, studying dispassionately the intricate and nicely-adjusted system of balances and checks that operate in the different departments of the money system, could reasonably refuse it their admiration. Take any of them—the investment market; bank clearing house; particularly the foreign bill market and exchange regulations, so unjustly blamed as the prime cause of the restriction of international trade, and consider how well designed they are to fulfil their genuine purposes. Yet it is this growth, resulting from centuries of well-directed traditional husbandry, that the monetary reformers would ruthlessly hack at, fracturing vital connections and displacing fine adjustments, to substitute something which they imagine they personally will be better able to manipulate; something artificial and quite alien and unresponsive to human reactions. For your planner is the congenital enemy of nature, because she is not susceptible to manipulation, and when she is manipulated hits back with a ruthlessness on a par with his own.
> What it amounts to really, is this; that the impulse behind wholesale reform, what we call social planning, the planned economy, is the impulse to alter and break up nature . . . It is precisely "management" not "money" that has brought society to the pass in which it is. Our trouble lies, not in the monetary system, but in the abuse and exploitation of the system for their own ends by those in control of it, and the failure on the part of all of us to control the controllers.

I think that illustrates the point I wish to make. I was greatly disappointed in the budget when it was brought down. For weeks we had talked about it. It did not matter where one went one heard comments about the budget, and as the weeks passed on my hopes began to rise. I became more expectant every moment, and finally the time arrived when the budget was to be brought down. The bell rang; I rushed out of my office and rushed back to comb my hair. I was so excited and expectant that I had to go back again to get my coat. However, I finally arrived in my place prepared to see the budget brought in. But what a disappointment it was. I am not an old political war horse; I am just—

Mr. MacINNIS: A new one.

Mr. ASHBY: I am a newcomer, and perhaps my hopes were too high. I looked for too much. I heard but little that went on. My eyes were glued to the door, for I expected that any moment the doors would open; there would be a blast of silver trumpets followed by a couple of drum majorettes and then a long procession of sober-faced dignitaries, followed finally by the budget carried aloft on a golden platter, looking for all the world like a great suet pudding decorated with cabbage leaves and a sprig of spring onions. But instead of that, all I saw was a weary looking Minister of Finance and a couple of sober-faced deputy ministers who looked as though, if they had a good farm dinner, they would develop flatulent colic. I am not blaming the Minister of Finance at all. I get letters—I would not dare to read them—blaming the Minister of Finance for everything.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Give an indication of what they are.

Mr. ASHBY: I am not blaming the Minister of Finance, but I shall have to explain to my constituents that the minister is but the representative of the people, although I presume they must hold him responsible. I do not think the Minister of Finance drew up the budget. I believe it was drawn up by the technicians, the civil servants behind the scene who are ruling Canada to-day. I was speaking to one of my friends—I have many in the civil service. I went down to see them one day and one of them said: "Members of parliament come and go but we live on forever." A few days ago I paid another visit to him. I was not watching the time, and when I read an article here it reminded me of it. I shall put it on the record later. As I say, I went down to his office least expecting the welcome I would get when the doors of the prison on the corner here called the Confederation building opened. I just got to the doors when a bell rang or something happened. The doors flew open and out flushed the greatest flood of humanity I ever saw in all my life. They were mostly members of the fair sex. I was swept half a block down the street before I was able to get hold of a barber's pole and swing into the door. The barber said, "You are next," and would have had me in the chair had I not told him it was a mistake. These girls were so happy to get away from their prison, as they call it, that they were singing, "Give me a home where the buffalo roam." The tune that I sang had a mournful air. I sang, "Why can't every man have two or three wives?" I think I shall have that stricken from Hansard because if my wife sees it, she will be down here in a day or two. However, there is more than one way of calling to one's mate, anyway.

The other day I attended the meeting of the marine and fisheries committee. A bill was brought before us for approval. I looked at the bill. It occurred to me that there was no name on it and I wondered who drew up that bill for us to pass. The next question which occurred to me was, who gave the individual the authority to draw it up? I asked to be informed but I never found out. The point I want to make is that we are working upside down, as it were, wrong end to. Instead of us as representatives assembling here and giving instructions to the civil servants, the experts, as to what results the people want and the experts devising ways and means of producing these results, we merely assemble here and pass bills, some of which we know little or nothing about, and we are actually given instructions by the civil servants. That is entirely wrong, and until we rectify it we are going to get nowhere. Some of the people in the United States are going to get ahead of us unless we "step on the gas", as it were.

I should like to read two short paragraphs from the American Magazine of July, at page 39:

> Congress has enacted—and the president has endorsed—legislation designed to plan for permanent prosperity. Furthermore, any actions taken under the law will be taken within the framework of our own free enterprise system—

Let us remember that.

> —and through our existing democratic processes. We have committed ourselves to a goal. Here it is:
> "The congress hereby declares that it is the continuing policy and responsibility of the federal government . . . to coordinate and utilize all its plans, functions, and resources for the purpose of creating and maintaining . . . conditions under which there will be afforded useful employment—

Useful employment, not employment such as we see here in this city, where thousands of people are merely shifting bunches of paper from one place to another and making marks on them, but useful employment. I continue:

> —opportunities, including self-employment—

That is what we call the leisure state where human beings may employ themselves at the kind of work they like to do best. I continue with the article:

> —for those willing, able, and seeking work, and to promote maximum employment, production, and purchasing power."
> That, in a mouthful, is the goal. You will note, in the last clause, that congress recognized it is futile to expect everyone to have jobs unless our industries have a full supply of orders and unless all our people have enough money in their pockets to buy all the goods our farms and factories can produce.

That is the greatest forward step our sister nation to the south of us has ever taken. I am making this direct recommendation to the government, namely, to see to it that something of this kind is introduced immediately, and that means without delay.

The solution of our problems can be found by simplifying government.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I should like the hon. member in his own inimitable and fabalistic style, to give an illustration of his simplified form of government.

Mr. ASHBY: I shall be indeed pleased to comply with the hon. member's request. It is a well known fact that historians have great difficulty in obtaining detailed data regarding some of our early parliamentarians. It requires years of work, of probing into attics, cellars and archives to obtain this information. In the first place, in the olden days they spelled badly; in the second place, they had no parliamentary reporters, and in the third place, they did not keep any records anyway. But I should like to take hon. members back to one of our early sessions of Parliament. There must have been a time in past political history when we switched off the main road which by this time would have led us into an era of blessed prosperity and happiness, on to a side trail which has brought us into our present state of dissatisfaction and unrest. We have to go beyond the crossroads where we turned off; we have to go beyond the early days of confederation; we have to go beyond Westminster.

I have in mind one of the greatest sessions of parliament in British history, a session presided over, it may interest the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) to learn, by an ancestor of his; at least they were both men of Sussex. I refer, of course, to that illustrious prime minister, that most potent of all potentates, his high and mighty self the Right Honourable Sir Bonehead Piltdown, whose thick but noble skull was discovered buried in the gravel of the Sussex downs where for thousands of years, in death as in life, it defied all comers, the forces of nature, the elements and time itself, to emerge at last triumphant and again become a world-known character. I can picture a brief session of parliament in that period, when they were not bothered with figures of billions and billions and billions, but just went about their business in a natural way. I can visualize the members of parliament in committee. I can visualize the prime minister himself walking up and down the floor of his apartment as he pondered the perplexing problems that were probing his pericranium. I can see that great man make up his mind and give a few lusty scratches on the floor of his cave with his great feet, sending bits of bones and small stones clattering in the general direction of his wives, and testing the the thongs which bound a five-pound rock to the end of his knobkerry; then, girding about his loins an Aberdeen sporran, stride forth to parliament in all his glory, just as the bell rang. I can visualize that great prime minister smite with his stone hammer his official boulder which he used as an altar, calling the assembled members of parliament to order.

If hon. members will permit me, I should like to quote the whole of his speech at that time. I could quote from almost any Hansard, because every great prime minister from that day to this has repeated the same address. Our own Prime Minister spoke to us last December 13, I think it was, or about then, on the same subject. The address was: "Members of parliament are here to represent the people of their constituencies." That is all there was to it; brevity was his keynote. In other words, it was not really a speech at all but a warning that members of parliament should attend to their business, which is not making long and windy speeches. If I may disgress for just a moment, I have learned why we come here and sit around month after month, accomplishing nothing. It is because whenever a problem is brought before us we immediately make up all the words we possibly can, assemble them into lengthy speeches and completely bury the problem under an avalanche of words. Then, when we can not longer see the problem before us, we go on to the next one.

This brief session of parliament went right through without let or hindrance. The prime minister was a stern man, but on occasion he was very tender-hearted. At this moment he turned toward his page girls. I see hon. members are interested, and I should point out that this great prime minister was an expert judge at all beauty contests, the winners of which were honoured by being made page girls. By the door were beautiful blondes and lovely brunettes, their hair hanging over their smooth shoulders clear down to—well, down to here. Turning to the page girls the prime minister said, "Open the doors. Bring in the deputy ministers." The doors were opened. The policeman outside could be plainly heard saying, "Right! Right! Right!" You will notice, Mr. Speaker, there were no leftist movements in those days. In marched the deputy ministers. "Halt!" The doors were closed behind them. The prime minister then delivered his usual speech; facing them, he said in a stern voice, "Hear ye!" That's all. No sooner had he uttered those words than the deputy ministers cupped both hands behind their ears. No excuses were accepted; either they heard what was said, or the prime minister found it necessary to send his knobkerry to the cleaners. Next the prime minister turned to the members of parliament and asked this simple question: "What results do the people desire?" They should know; they are representing the people. There was a little commotion; finally one member was pushed to the front, and then and there gained the honourable title of Mr. Speaker, a custom which has been followed to this day; and Mr. Speaker stood up and said—

An hon. MEMBER: Order!

Mr. ASHBY: Mr. Speaker, glancing behind him to see that his supporters were still standing there, said in a clear voice, "The people demand that all taxation on incomes of $2,000 for married persons and $1,500 for single persons be immediately abolished, with no increase in the price of goods and no lessening of social services; that all women who survive to the age of fifty years shall be paid their rightful allowance of $50 a month; that all men who survive to the age of sixty years shall be paid their rightful allowance of $50 a month, and that there shall be no spying or prying into their private affairs, either, by guess, by gosh and by golly, so help me, amen." And he collapsed into the arms of his staunch and loyal supporters who held him up on his feet.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that he has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. W. A. ROBINSON (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I shall have considerable difficulty in following the hon. member who has just spoken; but if he can convince the coal dealers in my vicinity that a ton of coal cost nothing, as he attempted to convince the house this afternoon, I should like him to pay me an extended visit next winter.

Mr. ASHBY: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member misstates what I said when he assumes I said a ton of coal cost nothing. I said it did not cost money.

Mr. ROBINSON (Simcoe East): If I can get a ton of coal without money it is the same thing to me.

It is with some diffidence, Mr. Speaker, that I rise to offer a few remarks at this late stage of the debate, and I only hope I may be able to make a worth-while contribution. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the previous speakers, and I shall try to avoid anything of a repetitious nature. I cannot, however, avoid making some reference to what appears to be the main criticism of the budget by hon. members immediately opposite, namely, the charge of lack of economy in public expenditures. This charge was levelled very briefly by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) in the words, "spend, spend; borrow, borrow, but never save, save," as they appear at page 3215 of Hansard. This has been repeated in various forms, but unfortunately at much greater length, by many hon. members on the opposite side of the house.

It is extremely difficult for me, and I know it will be extremely difficult for the people of this country, to place any credence in a charge of this kind, when it is directed at the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). I recall clearly the first occasion upon which I heard him speak. It was some years ago, before he had assumed his present position, at a meeting of service clubs in my own constituency of Simcoe East. His subject at that time was a comparison of municipal and governmental financing. I can still remember the homely reference he made on that occasion to a rural municipality in his native Nova Scotia. There each taxpayer examined each item of municipal expenditure with an eagle eye, and could calculate to the last penny the effect of such expenditure upon his individual tax bill. Woe betide the municipal council which made unnecessary disbursements. Those who heard the minister speak on that occasion were convinced that he would apply the same principle of careful scrutiny of expenditures to the broader field of national finance. I am happy to say the people of Canada have given him an opportunity to do so, and in the last few years have entrusted him with the raising and spending of sums of money such as have never before been dreamed of in this country. I do not think there is present in the house, or outside it, anyone who would dare say that the minister did not do a magnificent job.

As I said before, I put no credence in this type of criticism, and I feel sure the people of the country still look to the Minister of Finance as the watchdog of the treasury.

Mr. HOMUTH: Have you read the auditor general's report?

Mr. ROBINSON (Simcoe East): If the hon. member wishes to ask a question I wish he would rise.

Mr. HOMUTH: If you will sit down, I will. Have you read the auditor general's report?

Mr. ROBINSON (Simcoe East): I do not know what that has to do with my present remarks.

Mr. HOMUTH: A great deal.

Mr. ROBINSON (Simcoe East): I can assure the hon. member that I have read as much of it as he has.

There is another trend in criticism of the budget to which I should like to refer. I have detected a tendency on the part of critics of the budget to consider it as a thing unto itself rather than as merely one link in our progressing economy. Less than a year ago we concluded the most disastrous war in history. In that war, to the everlasting credit of the people of Canada, we pulled our full share, or more than our full share if considered on a per capita basis. Following that war, and again to the everlasting credit of the Canadian people who submitted to every restriction and accepted every sacrifice, we find ourselves in Canada in a favoured and enviable position.

No one on the treasury benches in front of me has attempted to take unto himself any credit for this fortunate result. That credit has been and will be left to the people of Canada, where it belongs. But, from my secluded seat under the somewhat improved lights, I want to say it is high time that some of the gentlemen in front of me who directed and planned this great effort of the Canadian people should be given some small measure of approbation, rather than constant criticism. Further, not only did they plan and direct our war effort, but similarly they laid the foundation, well in advance, for our transition to a peace-time economy.

The present budget is, in my opinion, not a thing unto itself. It is in its essence merely one link in a far-reaching plan of transition for Canada, tempered by the exigencies of a devastated world where we must in all humanity go to the help of people less fortunate than ourselves—starving peoples, homeless peoples, naked peoples.

In this light I cannot agree with those critics of the budget who complain, for instance, that the income tax exemptions are not sufficiently high. I think every hon. member would like to see the tax exemptions greatly increased; but at the same time I should like to think there is no hon. member who would espouse such a proposal to the detriment of the national economy.

I have indicated previously that I consider the present budget merely a part of a continuing phase of our Canadian economy. I have no doubt that the minister has already fitted this budget to its proper place in this phase of transition, and is now looking to the future. I should like to commend to him at this time one aspect of the Canadian picture which I hope will have his serious consideration, and which I trust will fit easily and naturally into the Canadian economy. In this I refer to shipping and shipbuilding, and I hope I may be pardoned if I make somewhat extended remarks in reference to my own riding. In the riding from which I come we are proud, and I think justifiably, of our position in the shipping and ship-building industry. We are similarly proud of other things—our productive farms, our factories in Orillia, Midland and Penetanguishene, which helped so much, as the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) well knows, to create the goods necessary to the winning of the war. We are proud of our historic past and our scenic beauties, our lakes and islands and beaches, which attract so many visitors to the province of Ontario.

(Translation):

Allow me, at this time, to point out with pride to the fact that the northern part of my constituency is dotted with villages inhabited by worthy French-Canadian families who contribute to the prosperity of the district.

I hope my constituents and hon. members will forgive me if I do not dwell at too great length on the beauties of my riding, but rather confine myself to the subject I mentioned earlier. Shipbuilding in my riding is centred in the town of Midland on Georgian bay. Our experience in this industry goes back many years, in so far as the building of wooden ships is concerned. In fact, I think even today there may be on the great lakes hulls built half a century or more ago by Ganton Dobson. We commenced the construction of steel vessels during the first great war, and launched at the Midland shipyards a series of vessels such as the War Fiend and certain sister ships with similar ferocious names. Following that war, the yard constructed a number of cargo ships, such as the Ashcroft, the Stadacona, the Gleneagles and the Lemoyne. I cannot allow this occasion to pass without paying a well deserved tribute to the Lemoyne. Launched at Midland in the middle twenties, she was then and still is the queen of the great lakes. Built to carry huge cargoes of grain, being 633 feet in over-all length and the only ship on the lakes with 70-foot breadth, she has been unapproachable as a record carrier of wheat. Some of her records are as follows: wheat, 1929, 571,885 bushels; corn, 1938, 534,000 bushels; rye, 1927, 538,817 bushels; soft coal, 1944, 18,116 net tons.

During the thirties the yard which produced such magnificent vessels was unfortunately closed, and it was only with the coming of war that we returned to something of our old position in the shipbuilding field. Then the big yard came to life again and we saw on its ways corvettes, mine-sweepers and powerful ocean-going tugs. Also, our smaller yards, which had previously been engaged in the construction of small pleasure craft, expanded rapidly to turn out Fairmiles and wooden mine-sweepers. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, we felt very close to one important phase of the war effort. We saw these vessels in course of construction. We saw young Canadian officers come to Midland, commission their ships and sail away with their first command. We took into our homes young English boys, made old by fatigue and strain, whose ships had sunk beneath them and who only remained with us until a new one was launched and they could return with it to duty on the high seas. Yes; we felt very close to the war effort and I think we did a job. Here is the record:

Hunters Boat Works at Orillia produced seven Fairmiles.

Grew Boat Works at Penetanguishene constructed eight Fairmiles and two wooden mine-sweepers.

Port Carling Boat Works at Honey Harbour launched ten Fairmiles and two wooden mine-sweepers.

Midland Boat Works at Midland produced eight Fairmiles and two wooden mine-sweepers.

Midland Shipyards Limited delivered five Western Isle trawlers, eleven ocean-going tugs and eleven corvettes.

I should like to give the names of these corvettes, although they are already well known in Canadian naval annals. They are the Midland, Brantford, Strathroy, Thorlock, LaMaria, Willowers, Lindsay, Cobourg, Whitby, Parry Sound and West York.

I wish now to turn for a moment from shipbuilding to shipping and to indicate our intense interest in the grain trade, which is the backbone of Canadian lake shipping. We have at Midland and Port McNicol five modern elevators with a combined capacity of 20,750,000 bushels. The individual units can handle grain at rates ranging from 12,000 bushels an hour to 40,000 bushels an hour. Our elevators play a large part in the annual grain movement. To illustrate, I have before me some figures for 1945 on the destination of the major grains and soy beans at ports in Canada and the United States, which customarily receive grain in large volumes. These are as follows:

	Bushels
Grain received at ports in United States	343,111,905
Grain received at ports in Canada	331,168,647
Total	674,280,552
Grain received at all Georgian bay ports	172,123,052
Grain received at Midland and Port McNicoll	131,297,923

In other words, out of a total of some 331,000,000 bushels of grain received at Canadian ports in 1945, two ports in my riding received some 131,000,000 bushels.

These immense cargoes were carried in our great lakes fleet, of which Canadians can be justly proud. This fleet consists of 226 vessels with an aggregate gross tonnage of 611,795 tons. Even at the risk of boring the house with figures, I should like to give a picture of the make-up and disposition of that fleet among the various trades. According to the annual report of the Lake Carriers' Association, at the close of the great lakes navigation season in 1945, commercially employed vessels of Canadian registry were as follows: First, we had bulk freighters in the iron ore trade, including nineteen steamers in ore, coal and grain trades, and nineteen steamers in grain and coal trades. Second, classified as bulk freight, self-unloading vessels, we had nine steamers, self-unloading conveyors in the coal trade, and two steamers, self-unloading conveyors, in the cement and coal trade. Third, classified as bulk freight vessels in mixed trades, we had five steamers of the upper lakes fleet in coal and grain trades, eighty steamers in the lower lakes fleet in coal, grain and paper, and twelve other ships in various trades, including paper. Then we had twelve barges in coal, grain and pulpwood. Of package freighters we had twenty. Of oil tankers we had thirty-four. The remainder of the fleet was made up of car ferries, three, and passenger vessels, eleven: a total of 226.

I think this presents an impressive picture of Canadian lake shipping, but there is another side of the picture which should be told. Some of our ships are very old. To quote a few at random: James B. Eade, of the vintage of 1894: Algorail, 1901; Laketon, 1903; Bayton, 1904; Westmount, 1917; Matthewston, 1922, and Royalton, 1924. In other words, the average age of our fleet, and especially our upper lakes fleet, is high, and this means, at the least, increased cost of operation and, at the worst, actual obsolescence in some cases.

Although my remarks have been directed primarily at the role of my own riding in shipbuilding and shipping, I hope that two general points will have emerged. First, I think it is clear that we have in Canada shipyards which are ready, willing and competent to build ships of all kinds. Second, we have in Canada a great lakes fleet of which we can be very proud but which is in need of new blood. The inference seems to me to be obvious, and I commend to the minister and to the government that in any deliberations as to our future economy these two points be kept well to the forefront. Let us see to it that these related industries, shipping and shipbuilding, play an increasingly important part in the national scene.

Mr. E. L. BOWERMAN (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that my remarks regarding my constituency will not be quite along the lines to which I have just listened from the hon. member who has just spoken.

I rise to take part in this debate because of a sense of responsibility to my constituents who will expect me to present to the government, through the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) in this budget debate, their reactions to his proposals as well as their pressing and immediate needs.

At this time it is not my purpose to deal in detail with the budget proposals, because I understand that we shall have an opportunity to do that in committee and my colleagues have also presented in an able manner our views as a group. My purpose this evening will be to present the views of my constituents as I see them in relation to pressing problems of a constituency nature.

First, may I express my support of the amendment which has been moved by my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). I believe that by far the greater majority of my constituents feel as I do about this amendment, that it sets forth clearly and concisely their objections to what the Minister of Finance is pleased to call essentially a peace-time budget providing for the financial requirements of the first post-war year which is wholly a year of peace. I am quite sure that all the socialists and most of the Liberals and Conservatives of the riding of Prince Albert feel as I do, that the minister's budget does not provide as it should and could for the peace, happiness and prosperity of our citizens. While I am sure that these are the views of my constituents, I am also sure that they would, as I do, want to express appreciation and admiration for the manner in which the Minister of Finance has so conscientiously and unhestitatingly given of his energy and talents to the winning of the war. True, it has been our privilege to view most of his efforts from a distance. Nevertheless we feel that we can say, and say it sincerely, that no one in the government is more worthy of the honours bestowed upon him than the present Minister of Finance.

I should like at this time to thank all other hon. members of this house for the kindness and consideration that I have received from them, especially from the various ministers of the government when I have sought information from them or their departments on behalf of my constituents; also the senior members of the house who have in so many ways assisted us newcomers to this parliament to find our way around, as it were. During my first session here there were times when I sat in what seemed to me a maze of formalities that tended rather to hinder than facilitate the business of the house. I say that it seemed that way to me. Then there is a certain book in which the precise way for members of parliament to get in and out of difficulties is set forth, but what has puzzled me and still does is that there are times when its citations are to be considered in the light of one or more other books and previous rulings, depending, as I see it, on which side of the house the difficulties arise. Then the Speaker is called upon to rule on the matter.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is reflecting on the action of the Speaker.

Mr. BOWERMAN: I am very sorry that Your Honour is taking that position, and I am sure that if you will wait for a moment you will be satisfied with what I intended to say. It was not my intention to reflect in any way upon the Speaker; but may I say with all deference and respect that I have not been at all times sure that the rulings given could be found in any of the books mentioned. However, let me hasten to add that the gracious manner in which the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker have given their decisions has gone a long way toward dispelling from my mind any thought but that their desire was to fulfil, in a fair and impartial way, duties of the high office placed upon them by this parliament. Having said that in all sincerity, I return to the amendment to the amendment.

We in this group look with grave concern and with a measure of regret upon the failure of the government to implement their pre-election pledges and to fulfil the promises made only a year ago to the Canadian people from coast to coast. By no stretch of the imagination can I agree with the minister when he refers to this year as being "wholly a year of peace." There is no peace, either abroad or at home, and there can be no peace in our land until this government, or some other, recognizes the fact that the labourer is worthy of his hire, be he farmer, artisan or what-not, and that he is entitled to a fair share of the national wealth and a voice in determining his hours of labour and the conditions under which that labour shall be performed.

It is, in my opinion, absurd even to think of calling this a year of peace, when at the very time of the preparation of this budget thousands were out of employment and thousands were out on strike, because that is the only means they know by which their demands are heeded. Further, thousands are homeless because this government has failed to plan for peace as it planned for war. Even as we continue this debate, thousands have just gone out on strike who have patiently and consistently for months, yes, all during the war, given of their best, hoping against hope that the conditions under which they laboured and the "take-home pay" they received might be improved to a point where there would be an assurance of a decent standard of living. In the face of all this, the government brings down a budget that leaves the burden of taxation upon the backs of those who can least afford to pay while, practically at the same time, it brought down a measure increasing the pay of all members of this house and of the other place, with tax exemptions for us in this chamber.

Without any hesitation, I affirm that every married couple are entitled to at least $2,000 a year tax-free income, and every single person to at least $1,000 tax free. We have every reason, because of the pre-election promises, to expect jobs, housing and rehabilitation plans to a far greater extent than we have at present, and promised for the distant future, in this budget.

Mr. Speaker, because I have not had the opportunity or availed myself of the opportunity if I had it, I wish to say, in the light of this budget, a few words regarding the constituency I have the honour to represent. Prince Albert, a news commentator has said, and I quote:

> . . . is the rightful electoral heir of the old federal district of Saskatchewan, Northwest Territories, and it was in the federal electoral district of Saskatchewan, Northwest Territories, in the year 1896, that a political leader by the name of Wilfrid Laurier was elected to parliament on a protest vote. The handful of Canadians in revolt against the double talk and double-dealing of the government that had been in office too long for its own honour or its country's good, did the job then by a majority of 44, and after forty-nine years Prince Albert has got back at last to pioneer form.

The territory of this constituency is as wide as from Ottawa to Montreal and stretches northward from the North and South Saskatchewan rivers to the Northwest Territories, a distance as far as from here to Toronto. Within this vast territory are some of the finest agricultural lands to be found in Canada. In the northern parts are to be found hundreds of lakes and streams teeming with fish, and its forests are a hunter's paradise. Gateway to this vast area of unlimited, potential mineral, water and forest wealth, indeed to much more of the Saskatchewan great northland, is the city of Prince Albert, located on the banks of the North Saskatchewan river. All that has kept this enterprising little city and the surrounding territory which comprises the constituency from taking its rightful place as one of the leading industrial and recreational centres of western Canada is the fact that for ninteen years it has been tied to the apron strings of the Prime Minister and a small group of Liberals, so-called. Lest it may be thought that I am alone in this opinion, and just to keep the record straight, I should like to quote from others who, both from a distance and closer up, have viewed the situation. First, may I read from Maclean's of July 15, 1945:

> Prince Albert is a city of about 13,000, a bustling and ambitious little place with a Rotarian civic pride. But newcomers arriving by train would conclude, from looking at its railway station, that it was a none-too-enterprising village. Prince Albertans are acutely conscious and ashamed of this eyesore.
> Prince Albert is also on the North Saskatchewan river, a navigable stream which used to be the sole transport artery of the region. Bridges over such streams are a federal responsibility. Prince Albert has a bridge that looks like a museum specimen of the late Victorian era; it's ugly, grimy, rickety and inadequate to the traffic it bears.
> Worst grievance, though, is the Prince Albert airport. Other western cities of comparable size and status have good, modern air fields with hard-surfaced runways. The Prince Albert airport looks like what it is, somebody's cow pasture. Two days' rain converts it into a swamp on which no plane can land or take off. But nobody ever persuaded Munitions and Supply to release the asphalt, or Transport to release the money, that would have made this piece of prairie farmland into a modern air station. Clamour on all these grievances met the reply, "now don't embarrass the Prime Minister."
> This neglect has been rooted, of course, in Mr. King's honourable reluctance to give any favours or preference to his own riding. But resentful Prince Albertans, even Liberals, will tell you that he carried this policy much too far.

Next, I wish to quote from the Prince Albert Daily Herald of April 1 of this year. By the way, the Prince Albert Daily Herald editorially is Liberal, but in spite of that they publish a paper of which, for world, national and community news, any constituency might be proud. I quote:

> For twelve days now Prince Albert has been cut off from the rest of the world by air mail. The Canadian Pacific Air Lines has been forced to by-pass the city because of the quagmire conditions at the landing field. Prince Albert is the only sizable place in the province in the unenviable position of not being able to provide a safe landing field for wheel-equipped planes at times of the year when water lies on the field.
> Throughout the war the field was used under the commonwealth air training plan for the training of pilots for the war. It so happened that the type of training given in Prince Albert did not require hard-surfaced landing facilities. It was only because of this that the facilities which are essential if a city is to be of any importance on the air map of the country are lacking in Prince Albert.
> During the election campaign, when Minister of Reconstruction Howe visited Prince Albert, he declared that if Prince Albert wanted hard-surfaced runways at the airfield, these facilities would be provided. The election did not go the way that Mr. Howe no doubt hoped it would when he made this promise, but a promise is a promise and now seems the opportune time to remind Mr. Howe of his pre-election commitment.

There are good arguments with which to support a request to the dominion government for the construction of hard-surfaced landing facilities here. One is that these facilities have been provided in Saskatoon, Regina, North Battleford and elsewhere out of dominion funds and it is not unreasonable to expect the dominion to place Prince Albert on a footing of equality with these other centres.

Further, I wish to place on the record the fact that a delegation from Prince Albert did come to Ottawa, and briefs were presented to the Prime Minister and the ministers concerned regarding the airfield runway. In this brief they say:

The council of the city of Prince Albert and the board of trade respectfully request the immediate construction of hard-surfaced runways at the Prince Albert airport, and they further request that the Department of Transport take over the operation and maintenance of the airport.

The city of Prince Albert is located at the extreme north of the populated area of the province and is the starting off point for flying in the north.

During the war airports adjacent to small centres were hard-surfaced. We point particularly to fields at Davidson, North Battleford, Mossbank, and Dafoe, etc. In many instances we understand that these fields are not being and will not be used for civil aviation.

In view of the actual use of the field and its possibilities for future development it is felt by the city that a modern airport with hard-surfaced runways is indispensable.

The city accordingly urges that the matter be given immediate attention by the federal government.

I said that this delegation did come. They received the same promises, only extended, that were received prior to the election last year.

In regard to the traffic bridge, I only wish to remind the ministers concerned that this matter is urgent and that plans should be made for the starting of this project without delay.

There is another urgent matter confronting the citizens of Prince Albert as well as those of many other communities in Canada. I have received letters in regard to this matter, and, because I can get it before the Minister of Finance more quickly in this way, I shall again quote from an editorial appearing in the Prince Albert Herald of July 3, as follows:

The Prince Albert citizens' rehabilitation committee in resolutions passed at a recent meeting has drawn attention to the acute housing situation in Prince Albert which requires the immediate attention of government authorities.

About a year ago Wartime Housing Limited commenced the construction through a contractor, of fifty houses in the city. At that time it was said some of the houses might be ready for occupancy by Christmas. Here it is six months from Christmas and not one family has been able to move in. Another fifty houses are to be built, but when? Wartime Housing Limited dwellings, in the meantime, have been completed in other cities. Some of them have been occupied for months.

The committee in its investigation found that there were approximately 275 veterans' families awaiting adequate living accommodation in the city. It is urgent that as many of these as possible be quartered as soon as possible in order to permit the occupants of the houses to obtain their winter's supply of fuel.

The situation will be made more acute this fall when additional vocational training courses are opened in the city.

The minimum demand should be that the fifty houses now being built and the additional fifty should be completed with the least possible delay. Wartime Housing Limited has priorities, but apparently these have been used for materials for houses in other cities.

I bring this to the attention of the minister, of the government and of those in charge of this particular project so that there may be some stepping-up of the completion of these houses for the benefit of the 275 families of returned men in Prince Albert. I also believe that the budget brings no peace or contentment to these 275 families. I have quoted and read at some length to place these matters before the house because, as I said in the beginning, Prince Albert feels that it has been neglected too long. I might add that now that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has found safe retirement in the vales of Glengarry he need not have any scruples or reluctance in seeing that Prince Albert receives just and fair treatment from his government after these long years of hopeful waiting.

I should like to thank the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) and the Postmaster General (Mr. Bertrand) on behalf of my constituents for the intended improvements to the national park and postal facilities. These improvements are long overdue. Nevertheless they are gratefully appreciated.

In conclusion, may I say, as I said at the beginning, that I am supporting the amendment to the amendment because I am satisfied that by far the greater majority of my constituents of every political affiliation from the farms, villages and cities find very little comfort or peace of mind in the budget now before the house, and that from their reaction I gather that the words of the amendment as proposed to be amended express their feelings when it says in particular:

That the budget does not provide for tax reductions in the calendar year 1946 by raising sufficiently the exemptions of those in the lower income brackets;

That the budget fails to provide for the investment of public funds to bridge the gap between anticipated private investment and the total national investment required to assure a high national income and full employment;

That the budget fails in the new offer to the provinces to provide for social security measures which will achieve a reasonable standard of economic security for all Canadians;

That the budget fails in its tax proposals to recognize the principle that cooperatives are non-profit-making organizations.

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay): (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I shall confine the brief remarks I wish to make in connection with this debate to a few features of the speech delivered by the Right Hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley).

However, before dealing with the problems I intend to discuss, I wish to mention an event which, to my mind, deserves to be stressed, I mean the appointment of the Right Hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) as acting prime minister.

That choice made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has been unanimously applauded by the house and I am sure of voicing the opinion of my Quebec fellow-citizens in tendering the Minister of Justice my heartiest congratulations.

I am convinced that his Quebec compatriots and especially his Quebec East electors have been pleased to note once again that he enjoys the esteem and the confidence of his colleagues. Even though one may not share his political views, one cannot but recognize his great dignity and his perfect integrity and it must be admitted that he is a credit to his French-Canadian fellow-citizens, in his public life as well as in his professional capacity; to a lawyer, this is always a prime consideration.

However, I wonder whether the pleasure felt by the people of Quebec at this announcement will suffice to erase the impression of pronounced uneasiness created by the speech delivered on June 18, by the Right Hon. the Minister of Justice in the debate on redistribution. I am sorry he is not present at this time, but I hope he will hear from this and will have some remarks to make on the subject.

Referring to Hansard of June 18, I quote the following from the speech delivered by the Minister of Justice:

The hon. member for Calgary West asked, what about section 133, which provides:

Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the houses of parliament of Canada and of the houses of the legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those houses.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order! I regret to interrupt the hon. member but he may not refer to a previous debate.

Mr. DORION: I am not referring to the debate. If I am not allowed to read from the record the exact words of the Minister of Justice, I am at least entitled to say this: on June 18 last, the right hon. gentleman stated that parliament could forbid the use of the French language in the debates of this house and the Quebec legislature. This statement has dismayed and deeply disturbed our people.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order! I called the hon. member to order a moment ago, not only because it is forbidden to read speeches made during a previous debate but also because it is not permitted to debate a motion which nas been carried or defeated in the same session. I must call his attention to standing order 41 and paragraph 293, sub-paragraph (a) of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition:

(Text):

(a) refer to any debate of the same session on any question not then under discussion . . .

(Translation):

Mr. DORION: Mr. Speaker. Are you referring to standing order No. 41?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have referred the hon. member to standing order No. 41, entitled "Decorum in Debate."

(Text):

In Beauchesne's Rules and Forms, second edition, citation 293 states:

Besides the prohibitions contained in this standing order, it has been sanctioned by usage both in England and in Canada, that a member, while speaking, must not:

(a) refer to any debate of the same session on any question not then under discussion . . .

(Translation):

The hon. member is referring to a previous debate, which is contrary to the standing orders of the house.

(Text):

Mr. MACKENZIE: Would my hon. friend permit me to intervene for a moment?

Mr. DORION: With pleasure.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

COMMITTEE EMPOWERED TO INVESTIGATE CAUSES OF INDUSTRIAL UNREST

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I have a motion I should like to have passed, but it requires unanimous-consent; and if it is adopted the committee on industrial relations will meet at ten o'clock this evening. The motion is:

That the committee on industrial relations be directed and empowered to investigate immediately all issues connected with and appertaining to the present industrial unrest in Canada, with power to call for and examine witnesses under oath, and with power to send for persons, papers and records, and to take all essential evidence, and to report their findings and conclusions to the house. And that the committee be empowered to sit while the house is sitting, and that the committee be further empowered to employ counsel to assist them in their deliberations.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Thank you very much indeed. The committee will meet at ten o'clock this evening. I want to thank my hon. friend for his kindness in allowing me to intervene.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. MacInnis.

(Translation):

Mr. DORION: Of course, Mr. Speaker, I accept your ruling. With no thought of referring to any previous debate of this session, I merely wished to comment briefly on a section of the British North America Act. It is section 133, which reads as follows:

Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the houses of parliament of Canada and of the houses of the legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any court of Canada established under this Act, and in or from all or any of the courts of Quebec.

The Acts of the parliament of Canada and of the legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both those languages.

I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that even those who hold the view that the constitution may be amended without consulting the provinces must admit—and I except no one—that there are sections of the British North America Act which cannot be modified without the previous consent of one or several of the provinces whenever such province or provinces are directly concerned by the provision whose modification is contemplated. Now section 133 specially and directly concerns the province of Quebec. It deals with the debates in the legislature of Quebec and with proceedings in the courts of that province. The claim that this house could amend this section would mean that the dominion parliament could compel members of the Quebec legislature to carry on their debates in the English language. The mere thought of it is so extraordinary that it verges on the absurd. Now, I have never seen any absurdity sanctioned by law and this argument is very often set forth in all courts of justice.

Mr. Speaker, there have been occasions, since 1760, where the French Canadian have had to complain of the treatment meted out to them in this country. In references to the settlement of past problems, the impression is often conveyed that all difficulties were adjusted through the magnanimity of the masters of the time.

If controversies arising out of the language and the rights of French Canadians were solved in former days it is mostly because French-Canadian representatives, either in the Union Parliament which lasted from 1840 to 1867 or afterwards insisted upon and demanded the recognition of our rights. I recall no chapter in history more inspiring than that which relates the 1842 session of the Union Parliament, when Louis Hippolyte Lafontaine took his seat as a member. The events to which I have just referred are narrated in page 36 of Hon. L. O. David's book "L'Union des deux Canadas." As I said a moment ago, these happenings occurred in 1842, and the excerpt reads as follows:

When the Hon. Denis Benjamin Viger had concluded his eloquent speech, Mr. Lafontaine took the floor.

A tremor of curiosity passed through the house and galleries as Mr. Lafontaine rose; people wished to see and hear the man whose name, for some time past, carried so much weight. For many, however, curiosity gave way to surprise and disappointment when he addressed himself to the chairman of the house in French. Mr. Dunn having asked him to speak in English, he answered:

"Has the hon. member forgotten that I belong to the nationality which was the object of such unfair discrimination by the Act of Union? He asks me to use for my maiden speech in this house a language other than my mother tongue. I am diffident about my ability to express myself in the English language, but even if I spoke it as fluently as an Englishman, I would nonetheless make my first speech in the tongue of my French-Canadian fellow-countrymen, were it only to protest solemnly against the cruel injustice perpetuated in that part of the Act of Union which tends to outlaw the mother tongue of half of Canada's population. This much I owe to my fellow-countrymen, this much I owe to myself."

As a result of this just, bold and courageous demand of Louis Hippolyte Lafontaine, in 1842, two years later, that is in 1844, the Canadian government requested an amendment to the Union Act to allow its citizens to express themselves in the French language in this parliament.

For this reason, I claim that it is absolutely true, in this circumstance as in all others, that the language and privileges of French Canadians have been recognized, mostly, if not entirely as a result of the efforts of our forefathers.

Reverting now to the matter under discussion, the budget, I consider it to be neither a literary work nor a problem in higher mathematics to be discussed by scientists or financial experts. It must be remembered that it is submitted to the people of the country. This is why I shall endeavour to express the views of the average taxpayer whose yearly income does not exceed a few thousand dollars and who belongs to the group making up at least 90 per cent of the total population of Canada. He, and he alone, the average taxpayer, should be the object of our thoughts, for what good are a few score millionaires when 90 per cent of our people are destitute?

For an appraisal of the policy we mean to adopt, we must therefore turn to the average taxpayer who cannot count on accumulating wealth, even if he wanted to, for it is known that a fervent aspiration of mankind is to set aside a certain amount of savings for the peace and comfort of old age. But no one will deny that, because he is burdened with the ever-growing responsibilities brought on by the high cost of living, the average taxpayer is now denied this legitimate ambition.

All the average taxpayer can now hope for, all he can demand, is to live comfortably, to marry and be in a position to allow his wife and children to have a comfortable life, free them from hardship and too much denial. He is the one therefore, who has first claim on the assistance of the government.

I have no fear for the rich and the mighty for experience has shown that, even in the worst depressions, they manage to get by and have the means to do so. See what is happening in the war-torn countries of Europe, in the grip of famine and of the black market. We all realize that the poor are still those who suffer and die. The moneyed classes manage very well.

I admit that low wage earners are somewhat relieved of income tax by the budget proposals, but these reductions are insufficient and do not live up to the average taxpayers' expectations. Exemptions should have been fixed at $1,000 for single persons and $2,500 for married persons. Other considerations than income tax must be taken into account. No one can deny that practically all taxes eventually press upon the consumers and the mass of the people.

In order to provide his family with food, clothing and living quarters, the ordinary taxpare pays so much more for these necessities of life as the higher taxes levied on the merchant, the manufacturer or the landlord raise the price of goods and the rent of buildings.

That is why the average taxpayer is directly concerned not only with the part of his revenue collected by the government but with the total taxes making up the national revenue. What stands out in the budget is the enormous debt of the country, a debt which is constantly increasing and may never stop increasing, to a point that we must pay nearly $500 millions in interest, a burden which will fall upon the taxpayer. Our enormous debt has resulted from the extravagant expenditures of the last few years when the government led us to think that our war effort was to be reflected by the amount of our expenditures, whether they be justified or not.

It is not my intention to discuss again the question of our participation in the war; this is neither the right moment nor the right occasion. However, now that the war is over, we have the right to ask ourselves what have been the results of the sacrifices that we imposed upon ourselves during the past six years, and we also have the right to examine the consequences of the policy followed by this government throughout those years. We were told that we were fighting to save civilization. Will anyone contend that civilization, which we sought to defend, is not at the present time in as great, if not greater, danger than in 1939? Will anyone contend that the sacrifices and hardships which we have endured in the last few years have brought us that peace and tranquility which we were looking forward to? Is it not true that the world situation is to-day just as insecure as it was prior to the war? This is the thought which is in the mind of the taxpayer when he is required to pay heavy taxes in order to meet the enormous war debt. If at least he could think that the sacrifices which he has made and which he is still being asked to make were of some use. On the contrary, he is being made the target for an ever increasing amount of pernicious propaganda. He feels surrounded, almost smothered, by communistic propaganda whose object is to provoke here as elsewhere internal difficulties which will weaken nations and make them an easy prey for the monster which threatens the world at present.

May I recall an incident which took place in Quebec about three weeks ago. We were having the visit of a Belgian officer who had been a prisoner in the notorious and hellish Dachau concentration camp, from which only about ten per cent of the inmates came out alive. That Belgian officer came to this country to raise funds on behalf of the Belgian war orphans. After relating the hardships which he had to endure in the Dachau camp, he spoke of the communistic propaganda being carried out at the present time in his own country as well as in France, and of the means used to spread this subversive doctrine in those two countries. In conclusion he could not help exclaiming: "As you know, there were two monsters in Europe. We have destroyed one and we are now wondering if we have destroyed the worse one."

We have abundant evidence of this pernicious propaganda here in Canada. I only have to refer to the report of the Kellock-Taschereau investigation which was tabled yesterday in this house. May I refer to an item which appeared in Le Droit of Ottawa, on the 11th instant.

It is a dispatch from Regina, Saskatchewan, which reads as follows:

His Excellency Archbishop P. J. Monahan, of Regina, has urged the delegates to the convention of the Saskatchewan French-Canadian Association, as well as the delegates of the French Canadian School Trustees Association and those of the Catholic School Trustees Association, meeting jointly, in the basement of Holy Rosary cathedral, at Regina, to oppose with the utmost energy the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation government's policy, which consists in appointing men who are publicly recognized as communists to high positions in the field of teaching and education in Saskatchewan.

"One of the greatest dangers which threaten democracy and all minorities, said His Excellency, is communism. To-day the greatest enemy of society, of religion and of Canada, he added, is communism. It is my duty, the archbishop continued, and it is your duty, as school trustees, to direct open protests to the prime minister and the other ministers of the Saskatchewan government, against the appointment of men who are not acceptable to us and whose philosophy is a danger to adult education in this province.

Now, at this time when we feel much concern, as we might as well admit, we must nevertheless note that during the war, notwithstanding the sufferings, and the hardships that necessarily accompany this scourge of mankind, some people have succeeded, in this country, in accumulating wealth for more than $12,000,000,000, and we must now pay them a tribute of many millions a year in the form of interests, in recognition of the ability they showed, when, at a time when our soldiers were being killed, those people were accumulating dominion bonds. Mr. Speaker, no one had the right to make money out of the war.

To-day, in order to give some relief to the taxpayers, to do them the most elementary justice, the government should have the courage to restore the balance in demanding the return to the common fund, that is to the state, of at least part of the wealth that was accumulated during the war. Instead of that, new sources of income are sought and, as the taxation field is almost totally covered already, organizations such as cooperative associations, which should always have remained exempted, are brought under the fiscal measures.

I do not intend to delve deeply into the matter of taxation of cooperatives as proposed, for we shall have another opportunity of dealing with this question when the budget resolutions are submitted to us.

I shall be content to state that, to my mind, the principle of taxing these associations is opposed to the proper management of public affairs.

Indeed, it is generally admitted, to-day more than ever, that one of the foremost duties of any government, is to prevent, by all means at their disposal, that our people be led into reactionary movements.

I submit that the best way to ensure our population against the dangers of supporting subversive doctrines, is to give them the means and opportunity of acquiring a measure of wealth and becoming landowners.

Since it is difficult if not entirely impossible to conceive of all citizens individually acquiring property, we may, as an alternative, encourage them to joint ownership; such is the function of cooperative societies.

To my mind, therefore, the fact that cooperatives are organized and carry on remains one of the strongest ramparts for society in general against the increasingly dangerous tide of communistic ideologies.

The budget, however, ignores this principle; that is why, among several other reasons, I cannot approve the financial scheme as it was brought before us.

In support of this contention, I take the liberty of setting forth a piece of evidence which I consider noteworthy. About two weeks ago, while listening to a newscast, I heard that the new French minister of food, passing through Washington, was on his way back home. Asked how he intended to deal with the crisis which is rife in France, as it is all over Europe, the French minister of food, Mr. Yves Farge, stated that he had definitely resolved to fight the black market relentlessly and that the expansion of cooperative societies in his country would provide the best means of putting teeth into his campaign.

It may be claimed that some cooperatives have, to a greater or lesser degree, become joint stock companies; that may be so, in certain cases, but we should have differentiated among the various types of cooperatives. I know, for instance, that in my riding, only two varieties are represented; they are the farmers' and fishermen's co-operatives. I am also convinced that these have never pocketed any real profits; if they set aside reserve funds, their savings will be applied to the purchase of required farm machinery or fishing tackle which they lack and will use on a joint basis. This is also true of fishermen's co-operatives which also happen to put aside small savings, but no one could call it a reserve fund since the few hundred dollars which they save and which will be used to buy the necessary fishing gear. That is why I say that in taxing those reserves we are not taxing capital but the savings of the co-operator. That is how I happen to know that this plan is causing justified resentment in the province of Quebec, and besides it is not the sole cause of discontent.

When for instance we realize how federal affairs are being managed and consider the status of French Canadians in the civil service, we can easily see that our people very often have good cause to complain of the way they are treated. Thus statistics will show that in 1918, before the creation of the Civil Service Commission under the federal administration, the proportion of French Canadian civil servants amounted to 21·58 per cent while in 1946 the proportion was down to 12·25 per cent. What is worse, with respect to salaries of $6,000 or more a year ,the proportion of French Canadians fell from 25 per cent in 1918 to 9·52 per cent in 1946. According to a return which was tabled in the house at my request, out of 37 employees holding a rank comparable to that of deputy minister—indeed there is not a single full-fledged French Canadian deputy minister—5 only are French-Canadians.

Among the deputy ministers and those holding a rank comparable to that of deputy minister, one gets $15,000, four $12,000, fourteen $10,000, seven $9,000 and eleven $8,000 or less. Of course the five French Canadians who appear on that list fall in the last class, those receiving $8,000 or less.

The Prime Minister has tabled to-day the report of the royal commission investigating civil service conditions. Although I did not have time to read the whole report, I glanced through the summary of the recommendations appearing in the first part of the report. I have failed to find any remedy to this situation which was forcefully outlined to that commission by the chamber of commerce of the district of Montreal. In this connection I wish to endorse the conclusions reached in a splendid report prepared by the latter, which was submitted to the commission in April, 1946.

It is not only the civil service, Mr. Speaker, that French Canadians are complaining about. For instance, in Quebec, in the district and city of Quebec, there are many unemployed for whom jobs will have to be found shortly. At Quebec there are thousands of unemployed who, at the present time are drawing unemployment benefits, but before long they will be without means of providing a living for their family. On the other hand, in Quebec, there are large plants, namely that of St. Malo, for instance, for which the country spent millions of dollars, that are now absolutely idle; at the same time we are receiving letters from farmers in our constituencies requesting our help in securing farm implements which they badly need, and contractors complain that they are unable to obtain building materials.

What is lacking then? The plants are owned by the dominion government and it would be easy for them to take the necessary steps in order to put them into operation and manufacture farm implements or building materials which are so urgently needed, and at the same time provide work for the unemployed.

I am no socialist, far from it. I have said before and I repeat that I am in favour of private enterprise, but when it has failed, it seems to me that it is up to government authorities to organize an industry, the need of which is admitted by everyone.

Another complaint against the federal government concerns the inactivity of Quebec harbour. It is generally recognized that since the control of national harbours has been centralized, the Quebec harbour is noted for its idleness by river travellers. In days gone by, as everyone knows, the harbour at Quebec was always doing big business and I well remember the time when the Quebec harbour commission employed many Quebec workers. If the Quebec harbour were to regain its former animation, I am convinced that the labour problem could be very easily solved in the city itself as well as in the whole district.

At present, the Quebec harbour is altogether idle. I am quoting statistics for the year 1943, published in the 1945 Canada Year Book which are, I believe, the latest available. On page 696, I find that in that year, 177 ships entered the Quebec harbour while 720 docked at Halifax, 593 at St. John's, 123 at Trois-Rivières, that is, almost as many as at Quebec, and so on. This is conclusive evidence that as long as the harbour administration is controlled by this central commission in Ottawa, the Quebec harbour will remain idle and Quebec workers unemployed.

The government might undertake quite a few work programmes in my riding, for the constituency of Charlevoix-Saguenay is known as the largest in the dominion. It extends on the north shore of the St. Lawrence river for 900 miles, from Quebec city to Blanc-Sablon in the strait of Belle-Isle. Of all necessity, means of communication should be provided to allow people in that vast district to get in touch with the outside. What we need most there is wharves and protective works, and it is obvious that we would have to do twenty times more than is being done at present. When our people consider the gifts of millions of dollars made to foreign countries—indeed I have always considered the loan which was made as a gift—while at home our people, our fishermen and our farmers, are awaiting various projects and the building of means of communication which would enable them to sell their products, I say that those people have reason to be dissatisfied and to protest against this state of affairs.

I trust therefore that the situation will be remedied so that these people may get the means of communication which are so urgently required.

There is another point to which I would only refer in passing, the offer to the various provinces contained in the budget speech. Obviously everyone regrets the failure of the dominion-provincial conference; everyone hopes that it will be resumed and that a fair agreement will be reached in the best interests of the country and of the provinces. But in this connection it must be remembered that if we may hold views on the position taken by the dominion government and that taken by the provinces, the people of Canada are entitled to their own opinions regarding dominion-provincial relations. I wish to recall to the government that a by-election was held recently in the constituency of Compton and that the people there were called upon to approve the position taken by the dominion government and that taken by the Prime Minister of Quebec. We all know the result. The voters of that constituency, which includes both French and English speaking citizens, endorsed by an overwhelming majority the attitude of the Prime Minister of Quebec.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has already spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. WILFRID LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at any great length, but I deem it my duty to rise in this house in order to submit to the Right Hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) a resolution that was passed at a meeting which I attended. It reads as follows:

Resolution passed at a meeting held in the parish hall of St. Grégoire de Montmorency, on June 10, 1946, which was attended by the federal member of the constituency, Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix, and more than 200 directors of co-operatives and credit unions of the district.

Mr. SPEAKER: Could the hon. member speak louder?

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Louder.

Mr. LaCROIX: The authorities of the House of Commons should rather improve the acoustics. I intend to speak in the same tone.

Whereas cooperatives are not profit-seeking undertakings but rather service organizations;

Whereas cooperatives are now a powerful factor of economic stability and social peace;

It is moved by Mr. Léo Lessard, president of the Loretteville cooperative, and seconded by Mr. Ernest Fiset, president of the Ancienne Lorette cooperative, and unanimously resolved:

1. That the federal member for Quebec-Montmorency constituency, Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix, be urged vigorously to oppose any new legislation which would bring the cooperative associations under the income tax and especially to oppose taxation of:

(a) patronage dividends either actually paid or credited to members;

(b) reserves of cooperative associations which are absolutely necessary to them for the maintenance of the value of their equipment as recommended by commissioners Arnason and Nadeau;

2. That copies of this resolution be sent to the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, Minister of Finance and Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent, Minister of Justice.

Passed at Quebec, June 21, 1946,
30 Hebert street,
Quebec, P.Q.

François Jobin,
Secretary of the meeting,

I understand that pressure is being brought to bear on the Right Hon. Minister of Finance, by a large number of hon. members to urge him to accept certain amendments before the resolutions are submitted to the committee.

I gathered from a statement by the Right Hon. Minister of Finance, that patronage dividends will not be subjected to income tax. If I am wrong, I ask him to correct me when he makes his speech to close the debate. I also believe that reserves of cooperative associations will not be subject to taxation provided they are distributed to the membership. I would be delighted to know the views of the right hon. minister on this matter.

Allow me to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that our co-operative associations are very important, since they are such that they do away with the middleman and establish direct relations between the farmer and the consumer.

The cooperative associations are non-profit organizations, making it possible for the farmers to buy collectively what they need. At home, in the old province of Quebec, they are the only means of fighting trusts, chain stores and large business enterprises.

I believe that the farmer cooperative associations now existing constitute the surest way of ensuring economic independence to our population. I wish to protest strongly against taxation of reserves which are so essential to the maintenance of the value of the equipment of our cooperative associations and also against taxation of patronage dividends either actually paid out or credited to the membership.

We have already met the Right Hon. Minister of Finance on several occasions in this connection and I dare hope he will take into consideration the views of hon. members of both sides of the House who seem unanimous on this matter. Any other course of action would constitute an encouragement to the trusts and would lead our people into the most thorough socialism, so earnestly desired by the C.C.F. party.

Mr. Speaker, may I therefore make a final appeal in this connection to the Right Hon. Minister of Finance? I must also register a strong protest against the fact that the small taxpayer was not granted relief by increased exemptions on small incomes.

May I ask the Right Hon. Minister of Finance that, when those resolutions are submitted to us, he consider granting full tax exemption to all who earn less than $3,000 a year.

I appreciate what difficulties may stand in the way of tax exemptions in view of the many billion-dollar gifts to Great Britain and of certain interest-free loans of other billions. I hope that common sense will finally come into its own and that due regard will be had for the fact that we should first look after our own welfare.

It seems ridiculous to me how Conservative, C.C.F. and Social Credit members, having endorsed billion-dollar gifts to Great Britain and interest-free loans of other billions, should now complain in this house that taxes are too high. They are the ones who, in constantly outbidding the financial policy of the government, drove us into the present chaos.

If the government is to blame, all parties must share equal responsibility for our present plight.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): It had been my intention to devote the forty minutes of my talk on the budget to War Assets Corporation and its workings throughout the past two or three years because, in my opinion, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has missed a great bet. I believe we could wipe out the entire estimated deficit of this year's budget by a proper distribution and proper use of the assets held by Canada at the close of the war and as a result of the sudden cessation of hostilities.

The story has been pretty well told in one of Canada's magazines. There is, for example, the story of an employee of Research Enterprises who tried to buy some of this material after it had been reduced to junk and was told that he could not do so because he was an employee of the concern. A couple of years later he went back to the same man in the same position and asked whether he could buy the same material at a price twice as much as was charged for junk, and he was informed that he could not do so because he was not an employee. There is the story of a typical case of a war veteran and his efforts to obtain machine tools to reestablish himself in his industry. We have the story of War Assets and their 15,000 cars and trucks resold to dealers and manufacturers. There is the example of 48 four-wheel drive trucks which cost the government $11,350, which were sold back to the assemblers or the manufacturers at about $4,801 each and were resold to priority claimers at from $6,800 to $7,200 each. There is the story of an enterprising aeroplane dealer from New York, Charles Babb and Company, who bought 185 Finch aircraft from the Canadian government at a price of $302 each when a private individual had a hard job getting anything. There is a report on how not to buy an aeroplane. I believe another article is going to appear, but at this time I would congratulate the Maclean Publishing Company on the work they are doing in exposing what, in my opinion, is one of the black pages of Canada's war record, and that is War Assets Corporation. I know my own efforts over a couple of years are a story of complete frustration; for I have tried in vain to get questions answered, even on the order paper, and in the committee I have tried to get information, but one is smothered under an avalanche of words. Big business and the junk dealers are in the saddle, while soldiers, farmers and poor people in need of clothing cannot get hold of any material.

This is part of the price we pay for war. These goods were bought from the manufacturers at high prices, under cost-plus contracts, and another price is being paid to-day, when these goods are denied the Canadian people and, instead, are passing out in the form of junk, leaving the hands of the ordinary trade and getting into the hands of the junk dealers. The price we are paying is tremendous—

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order. I would remind the hon. member that that is a matter which is before a committee of the house, and it is not in order to discuss that question now.

Mr. FRASER: Oh, go on.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): There is no "go on" about it.

Mr. FRASER: I think it is absolutely in order.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): No; it is not.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: This is a speech on the budget.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): It is not in order to discuss any matter that is before a special committee of the house. That is a well established rule.

Mr. FRASER: Parliament might as well go home.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): I would ask the hon. member to withdraw that remark. The rules of the house are clear. If hon. members wish to have the rules changed, that can be done, but we must abide by those rules. I hope the hon. member will withdraw that remark.

Mr. FRASER: I will withdraw it, Mr. Speaker, but I certainly still feel it.

Mr. HANSELL: I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that there is some element of truth in your ruling, but I maintain that if we were to follow that out completely in the budget debate there would be very little that we could speak on, because all committees on all subjects are meeting at the present time. I believe that in a budget debate certain liberties are taken in this respect.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I rise to a point of order? I ask the right to be heard on a point of order, if I may. Do I understand the Speaker's ruling to be that in the budget debate, because a special committee of the house is dealing with war assets corporation, no reference can be made to that subject?

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): That is not a point of order. I am quite sure that every hon. member knows very well the rule which prevents a discussion of any matter that is currently before any special committee. It is a well established rule and I hope the hon. gentleman will abide by it.

Mr. GRAYDON: If that is the case, this is simply a parliamentary blockade—

Mr. FRASER: Absolutely.

Mr. GRAYDON: —so far as the budget is concerned. I am quite sure that no rules of the house were ever intended to be interpreted in the way in which they are now being interpreted by Your Honour, because as the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) has so well said, we shall not be able to discuss anything on the budget if a special committee is dealing with any phase of the subject which is under discussion by an hon. member. That applies also to questions on the order paper. One of these days the House of Commons will have to have a showdown with the government with respect to the matters which are referred to special committees. In my opinion there is no justification for such an interpretation. I believe that His Honour himself would be the first one to agree in all fairness, as he has through the years, that it is not fair to the House of Commons to throw the tarpaulin of parliamentary rules over free house discussion in respect of matters which may be for the time being before a committee, and which may not have even been discussed in the committee. At some time we must either alter our rules or adopt a more reasonable interpretation of them.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): I would say to the hon. member that if hon. members do not wish particular items, such as the war expenditures committee is now dealing with, referred to special committees they can at all times have an opportunity to discuss the matter in the house; but, once the matter has been referred to a special committee, it is not in order to discuss it until the committee has made its report.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, if that rule were carried out in a general discussion of ordinary business in debate it might be all right; but with regard to a budget debate in which opportunity is given to members to discuss any matter before granting money to His Majesty to carry on government, which is a right that has rested with members of parliament for generations, it should not apply. If Your Honour rules that I cannot speak on war assets, then the same rule would apply to other matters and I would not be permitted to speak on labour, veterans affairs, defence or any other subject. What am I to speak on? If it is Your Honour's ruling that I am not allowed to speak—

Mr. ABBOTT: Why cannot the hon. member speak on defence?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: —on these matters, then I must challenge the ruling.

Mr. HANSELL: The hon. member cannot speak on the budget because the banking and commerce committee is meeting.

Mr. FRASER: We are just gagged and hog-tied.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should like your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): I should like to call hon. members' attention to citation 303 at page 100 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Form, second edition, which reads as follows:

> Until the committee reports, it is irregular to refer to its proceedings in debate in the house. For instance, in the session of 1873, Mr. Huntingdon was proceeding to refer to certain papers and letters relative to an important matter under the consideration of a select committee, but the Speaker decided in accordance with English precedents that they could not be read in the house.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I was not referring to anything being brought up in the committee.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): I should like to say to the hon. member that that is my ruling. If the house wishes to permit the hon. member to discuss the matter I am agreeable.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: With unanimous consent.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not think unanimous consent is needed.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I had just about finished anyway. I did not think the rule preventing the member from saying anything was to be extended to the budget. I have been trying to get information about War Assets, but I did not think the rule was going to be applied to this extent. I could have spent forty minutes on that particular story which would have brought us up to date on where the present government stands. It would have added to their record of 1944 when the Liberal administration, by order in council, handed over to the Imperial Oil, a subsidiary of the Standard Oil Company, the tremendous oil resources of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. I could have spent forty minutes of my time on the budget in discussing the matter of farmers' income tax, if it is not before a committee. I could have discussed with the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) the fact that, although the budget allows a farmer to average his income over a three-year period, it has not yet tackled the problem of the farm income tax, because basically it differs in many ways from the ordinary business proposition. The ordinary business man carries on his work in his little business. He leaves his home and goes to his business place. He hires people to do his work and he is permitted, as deductible from his profits, the income that is paid as wages to those who assist him in earning that income. In the case of the farmer, his wife and children work on the farm, but there is no allowance for wages that might be paid because no wages are paid. The largest army of unpaid workers in Canada are the workers on the farms. To face up to this problem in all fairness, the minister should grant exemption of at least $3,000 for the woman and the family who work on the farm. That would permit the farmer to bring the earnings of the family into equity and make it possible for him to carry on. Something has to be done in that regard to bring back into the minds of the Canadian people the proper place that agriculture has in our economy, to encourage the people to come back into production, to entice the young people particularly to go and work on farms. To-day they do not want to come back to the farms, and something is needed to rectify that situation.

But when the minister completed the reading of that part of his budget dealing with the taxation of cooperatives I recognized at once an attack on the cooperative way of life. After reading the budget through a couple of times, I came to the conclusion that this resolution is designed to go deeper at the roots of the cooperative way of life than would possibly be imagined on first reading. I should like to warn the government that when it sets out to cripple the cooperative movement in Canada and destroy the very basis of the principles of cooperation it is aligning itself against the masses of the people, and putting itself by the side of those who stand in special privileged positions, monopolistic industry, the grain exchange, and so on. Apparently the campaign of the taxpayers' association which must have cost hundreds of thousands of dollars has worked so far as the government is concerned. The minister has started out on a road which will be filled with thorns. He is on a road which will be filled with opposition. This group to which I belong, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, which believes basically in the cooperative way of life, are going to fight with everything they have.

When the budget speech informed us that section 4 (p) of the Income War Tax Act would be repealed we knew that the lid was off. Here is the government, returned by the people in 1945, cutting at the very roots of the cooperative movement, which plays a valuable part in the economic life of all countries. Big business is showing its hand to-day. It is a mailed fist, and it is out to render the cooperative movement in Canada useless as a weapon by which the small man, the person in the lower income group, can protect himself against those who would establish a complete monopoly, either in services or in commodities, and compel the rank and file of the people to pay their price because they can maintain it in scarcity. I charge this government with aiding and abetting that movement. I should like to refer to pages 29 and 30 of the report of the royal commission on cooperatives, where they outline the public interest of cooperatives in the life of any country. The report says:

> The representatives of cooperative associations advanced two main grounds upon which they sought to be freed from tax. They urged, in the first place, that their associations performed certain public services for people in receipt of low incomes which ordinary companies did not attempt, or at least not to the same extent . . . Secondly, it was alleged that they were not profit-making institutions by intention or practice; that their object was to perform services for their members at cost, giving rise to the argument that, in fact, they did not derive profits from their members.

The social and economic advantages to the people of Canada are not small. Again on page 30 they say:

> The commission is in no doubt that the cooperative associations can and do perform services which are valuable not only to their members but redound to the advantage of the community in general. . . In particular, the cooperative form of organization, especially in rural areas, affords an opportunity to individual members of outstanding capacity to obtain an experience in management, administration and leadership which, in the ordinary course of events, they could not obtain in any other way.

Further they say:

> Some representatives of the cooperative associations argued, and it was repeated on many occasions, that the methods of cooperation resting, as they say, upon the self help motif, appealed to and developed a higher set of principles than the individual and purely selfish pursuit of gain.

Cooperation is an essential part of democracy. In Scotland and England, allied with the labour movement the great Scottish and British cooperatives have fought a battle for a hundred years to maintain their existence. Apparently the battle is to be joined here too. In Sweden, in the United States, in Canada, in China, in Denmark and for a while in Germany, progress in almost every country has been in direct proportion to the extent the people have the ability to democratically organize and completely work their cooperative organizations. Is it not a significant fact that when fascism comes in, the ultimate of monopoly enterprise, the first things that have to go in any country are the cooperative movement and the labour movement. Hitler did it in Germany.

Mr. GARDINER: The cooperative movement was operating in Saskatchewan before you ever heard of it.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: We shall talk about that later on. I was there when it was born. I was born there too.

Mr. GARDINER: No new cooperatives have been established there since your day.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: They will have to look out, or this administration will fix them.

Mr. GARDINER: They were all put in by the Liberal party.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: You can go on with your little speech when I am through with mine. I have had enough interruptions for to-night.

Mr. GARDINER: I just wanted that in the middle of your speech, so that it will go out with it.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am sure the people of Saskatchewan will appreciate that. The Minister of Finance has used the report of this royal commission as a screen from behind which he can attack the cooperatives. Yet he claims that in general he has followed their recommendations. Where the commission does not recommend that the government go farther, however, the minister goes the rest of the way himself. The hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley) and the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) have outlined the democratic basis of this great people's movement. They have told the story of the early fight of the grain growers in the west to organize their cooperative movement. Cooperatives are not profit-making organizations. Their purpose is to provide the people who patronize them, whether producers or consumers, either with commodities at a proper cost, or with services, which services have not been available to them in the past unless they paid exorbitant prices for them. Cooperatives have grown up as the only means whereby the rank and file, the common people, can protect themselves against the vagaries and vicissitudes imposed upon them by those who get control by monopolies.

There are three points with which I want to deal briefly. The first is the legislation passed by the Liberal government in 1930, which this government claims was ambiguous and perhaps doubtful. I am going to point out that in the present legislation the government is striking at the very basis of cooperative principles, and that if this taxation goes through on the basis at present advocated it may not kill but certainly will cripple the cooperative movement and prevent it from growing. I claim further that this government has extremely weak grounds for going after the cooperatives and taxing them retroactively. For that purpose I will refer to the stand of the Liberal party as set out in Hansard for May 24, 1930, when the then Minister of Finance, Hon. C. A. Dunning, brought in the legislation. Here is his budget resolution as it appears at page 2505 of Hansard for 1930:

2. That the income of cooperative companies and associations be exempt from income tax.

Then at page 2507 I find this discussion:

Mr. Hanson: Does this arise out of the litigation in relation to the wheat pool?
Mr. Dunning: No.
Mr. Hanson: There was litigation, was there not, between the department and the wheat pool over the question of payment of income tax?
Mr. Dunning: Yes.
Mr. Hanson: What was the decision?
Mr. Dunning: It was decided against the department by the Supreme Court of Canada.
Mr. Hanson: That is exactly what I thought was the case. Is the litigation ended?
Mr. Dunning: The litigation is ended.
Mr. Hanson: If that be so, and you have the decision of the highest court of appeal in this country, why the necessity of this legislation?
An hon. Member: There are other cooperatives.
Mr. Hanson: I know, but the principle is there established.
Mr. Dunning: Oh, no; it was a question of contract, and the interpretation of a contract. It did not bear specific relationship to the nature of the organization.

And listen to this, by Mr. Dunning:

The intention here is to exempt bona fide cooperative associations and companies from income tax. I can better discuss the details when the bill is presented, and hon. members will have the proposed sections before them. It is difficult to make a statement when the bill is not before the house, but I may say that a bona fide cooperative organization shall be exempt entirely from the provisions of the Income War Tax Act. I may read what is contained in the bill, although hon. members will understand that the bill cannot be introduced until the resolution has been adopted by the house.

Then he proceeded to read section 4 of the act, which was to be amended by adding thereto the following paragraph, and here is paragraph (p):

(p) The income of farmers', dairymen's, livestockmen's, fruit growers', poultrymen's, fishermen's and other like cooperative companies and associations whether with or without share capital organized and operated on a cooperative basis, which organizations—

(a) market the products of the members or shareholders of such cooperative organizations under an obligation to pay to them the proceeds from the sales on the basis of quantity and quality less necessary expenses and reserves;

(b) purchase supplies and equipment for the use of such members under an obligation to turn such supplies and equipment over to them at cost, plus necessary expenses and reserves.

Such companies and associations may market the produce of, or purchase supplies and equipment for non-members of the company or association provided the value thereof does not exceed 20 per centum of the value of produce, supplies or equipment marketed or purchased for the members or shareholders.

Then followed this statement by Mr. Dunning, and I should like to emphasize it:

That means that any cooperative organization falling within the groups there mentioned or other like groups may do business for its own shareholders provided that the arrangement of the business is to return all proceeds less the necessary reserves and expenses to those who contribute the commodities or, in the second place, in the case of the purchasing association, to those who purchase the goods.

I read this to show the house that what was intended by the legislation was clear beyond doubt. That was the Liberal party in 1930. What has been brought down to-day is a complete reversal of that. At the time the resolution was brought in, there was no question of doubt as to what it was for. There was no question in the house, and no question in the mind of the minister. Still we now have a doubt raised. The matter is not even brought to the courts.

The minister bases his argument upon some pretence that this is ambiguous, and that the intention was not clear. Then we have the commission being set up.

Mr. ILSLEY: On a point of order, it is not in order for one member to say of another that he is basing his action upon pretence. My submission is that it is not in order for one hon. member to say that of another.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I accept that, and withdraw. The facts herein do not prove that there was any doubt in the mind of the government or the ministry when they put that legislation through.

I will take the report of the commission itself and deal, first, with what the minister says. The minister's statement to the government was carefully phrased in his budget speech, and he gave the impression that what the government was doing was accepting the commission's recommendations. I will point out that in that report and in the recommendations there were statements which are somewhat different from the interpretation one could make of the minister's remarks in the budget.

In effect what he is doing is this: He says, "The commission does not go far enough. We are accepting so much, and we are going the rest of the way ourselves." I think the minister would accept that, because he says in his speech:

> I am now in a position to say that in general the government accepts the commission's report as the basis of its proposals with respect to the taxation of trading cooperatives, credit unions and mutual insurance organizations.
> The first recommendation of the commission is that we should repeal section 4 (p) of the Income War Tax Act, the section which was inserted in the act in 1930 to authorize an exemption for specified classes of cooperatives under certain conditions.

Mr. ILSLEY: Right.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think they were practically all cooperatives with the exception of those which did more than twenty per cent of business with other organizations.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: With that exception—

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not want to interrupt, but the hon. member is making a lot of statements with which I just do not agree.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I have taken the minister's words right out of Hansard, and I shall continue with the rest of it. The minister says further:

> The government accepts this recommendation and, accordingly, proposes that section 4 (p) be repealed.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: And it continues:

> Apparently the section has little or no value in any case, for whatever the original intention of parliament may have been, the methods of doing business followed by our ordinary types of cooperatives are not such, in the opinion of the law officers of the crown, as to enable them to secure exemption under this section.

Mr. ILSLEY: Right.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should like to take the minister back to page 40 of the commission's report. These are their words, in defence of what they said when they were advocating the repeal of section 4 (p). At page 40 we find this:

> In suggesting the repeal of section 4 (p) of the Income War Tax Act, we do in the consciousness that enterprises which are truly cooperative in organization and operation have no need of the exceptive provisions thereof.

Mr. ILSLEY: Right.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: And it continues:

> If they make no profit they are not taxable.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct. Nor do we do anything to make them taxable by anything that we are doing here.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I beg to differ, because I think you do.

Mr. ILSLEY: We certainly do not.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The commission advocated the repeal of section 4 (p) because they felt that cooperatives do not make a profit.

Mr. ILSLEY: Certain cooperatives do not make a profit. If a cooperative does not make a profit, and if my hon. friend's contention is correct that they do not make a profit—an income within the meaning of the Income War Tax Act—that cooperative is not taxed by anything proposed here.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: But you do not allow them to distribute tax-free dividends, beyond three per cent interest on their capital; is that correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not accurate, no. If a cooperative has no income to begin with, it bears no tax and the three per cent provision does not apply. It has not anything to apply to. It is only if it has an income within the definition of "income" that the three per cent provision has application—if it has profits.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Are those profits? We maintain they are not.

Mr. ILSLEY: If they are not profits they are not taxable. Let my hon. friend get that through his head.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: All right; in other words, if there is no return, it is not taxable?

Mr. ILSLEY: No "profit".

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I believe the commission could have defined what a cooperative is, and put it on the record. That is one of the difficulties, that there is no accurate definition of a true cooperative.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would you like to have one?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It requires an act respecting cooperatives on the statute books, so that there would be no dispute about it. If the commission had said that a cooperative is an organization which is operating on the basis of one man, one vote; that it would allocate all its surplus to members in proportion to the business they are doing; that all surpluses must be reported to the government as part of income, and that they do not do more than one-third of their business with non-members, I think we could get a basis upon which to define a true cooperative.

I will say this, that any time a cooperative does business with non-members, and shows a profit, such cooperative—and all cooperatives across Canada—would be quite willing to pay an income tax and a profits tax on such moneys made out of doing business with non-members.

The next step the minister took was one where he went a little farther, because at page 2921 of Hansard he says:

> After careful consideration, the government has therefore come to the conclusion that it should accept the commission's recommendation that patronage dividends and similar payments be treated as a deduction from income subject to one relatively minor limitation designed to avoid at least some of the discriminatory effects I have mentioned. The limitation is this: that no company or association shall be able to go so far in its distribution of tax-free patronage dividends as to reduce its taxable income below a reasonable return on capital employed in business.

Mr. ILSLEY: Right.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: You are going to compel them to declare returns on capital. Many cooperatives do not do that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Only if they have income.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Many of them, although they have income, do not declare any interest on capital.

Mr. ILSLEY: Why?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Because they do not believe in a return on capital; they do not believe in interest on capital.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would not be to avoid taxation, would it?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It is not profit. They are not out to get profit.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let my hon. friend get this through his head, if he can, that if there is no profit a cooperative would not be taxable on anything now proposed.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: You define any return as a profit, and a cooperative does not accept that.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I do not say "any" return is a profit.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Any "reasonable return" were the words you used. These are the minister's words:

> This reasonable return will be defined as three per cent on the capital employed, including borrowed capital, less the interest paid by the company or association on borrowed capital that is allowed as an expense in the computation of the taxpayer's income.

This compels true cooperatives, which recognize no interest on capital at all, to violate one of their basic principles, namely that they are not operating for profit, and that they are not looking for a return on their capital. They put money into the business whereby they can carry on business and provide themselves with service at cost, without getting a return on money invested.

This is the point I think the minister might find difficulty in understanding, and I do not blame him. Perhaps he does not understand that people can come together and try to do some good for one another without looking for returns for themselves. These people believe that there is some other motive in life than trying to make gain out of somebody else. There is such a thing as doing service to one's fellow man and helping the little fellow who cannot put a great deal together.

Mr. MARTIN: May I point out that there is perhaps no man in this house who knows more about public service than the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley).

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There is not any argument about that. But I would not say that he knows more about cooperatives than other members of the house.

Mr. ILSLEY: This remark is probably not in order, but I have been the recipient of much sympathy because of my ignorance of cooperative principles. Now I thank the hon. gentleman for that sympathy, but I want to say that I think I have been acquainted with cooperatives as long as any person of my age in this house, because when I was growing up we belonged to a cooperative, and I think I know all about it.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I will accept the minister's word, but I find some difficulty regarding that statement. I should like to ask him if he invited these cooperatives, cooperative unions and the rest of these people around and suggested that there might be some legislation like this which has been brought in to tax cooperatives, and asked them if they thought it was O.K.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have certainly had many conferences with representatives of cooperatives over the last few years. We appointed a royal commission after one of these conferences, and after the report of the royal commission came in we were also in touch with them. But we did not submit the budget to the cooperatives any more than we did to the trade.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Apparently the minister has also had around him, close to him, some men from the private grain exchange, for the past few years.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct; I have had representations from the grain trade and from other private institutions. But it is my duty, I think, to receive representations from Canadian citizens. I think a larger volume came from the cooperatives than from the other element. But I do not refuse to hear representatives from both sides.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Has the minister any representatives in his department whom he recently borrowed from the grain trade?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In the past five years?

Mr. HARKNESS: It seems to me that the question is not as to who understands most about cooperatives, but who knows best how to mount a soap-box.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I thank the hon. member very much for the valuable contribution of the Conservative party. I thought he might be kind enough to thank me for permission to make the interruption. I think the worst blow of this set-up is the blow which was aimed in retroactive taxation.

Mr. ILSLEY: What does the hon. gentleman mean by "retroactive taxation"?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I mean the effect of the budget. The minister says that he is going to apply taxation against the wheat pools in the west. He also stated, as reported in Hansard, at page 2923.

> Furthermore, the government is willing to allow as a deduction from taxable income patronage dividends, refunds of excess charges, and similar amounts actually paid in cash by the wheat pools in fiscal years ending in 1942 and 1943, but not in 1944 and 1945.

That is what I mean.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was not applied in the budget, nor is it proposed to have any legislation. The assessment was made years ago. My hon. friend is suggesting that we drop those assessments, discontinue our case, walk out of court. That is what he is proposing.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: No; I would like you to take your case to court.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are just saying, if you want to do it in this other way, all right; but if you do not want to,—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Why did you assess them in 1944 and 1945?

Mr. ILSLEY: Because we had an opinion of the Department of Justice that they were liable.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How about the decision of the court? If they had protection under 4(p) from 1930 to 1942 and 1943, they had it in 1944 and 1945.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, no. The method of business changed greatly, as the hon. gentleman well knows. After 1929 or 1930 the method of business changed completely, and there came a time when the Department of Justice gave the opinion that they were now taxable, whereupon we assessed them, as it was our duty to do in justice to the taxpayers of Canada.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Were you not challenged?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Well, did it go to court?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. We are—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Where is it now?

Mr. ILSLEY: We are in court at the present time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has exhausted his time.

An hon. MEMBER: Who exhausted it?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Mr. Speaker, it is not very often I question—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member knows perfectly well the rule that an hon. member who has the floor is not interrupted without his permission. He has answered questions; he put questions to the right hon. the minister, and whenever the minister rose to address the hon. member he asked his permission and the hon. member gave it. He has now exhausted his time.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I should like to point out that at the beginning of my speech ten minutes were lost over your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have said already that the hon. member has exhausted his time. Moreover, I must call to the attention of the hon.

member that we are not in committee and I should not have permitted a debate like the one we just had.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): —I do not think the minister or any other member of the house has the right to make speeches during another member's speech. Let us have the rules of debate observed in this house. The minister has no right to make speeches in contradiction of what another hon. members says.

An hon. MEMBER: Who is making a speech now?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. M. E. McGARRY (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, like a great many hon. members who have already spoken, I may say that I did not intend to enter into this debate, but always something arises to incite one to say a few words on an important matter like the bduget. I rise particularly for two reasons, and I can express them in a very short time.

First of all, I wish to associate myself with the hon. gentlemen who have given the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) such deserved compliments, and I wish to endorse the statements of some hon. members who designated the minister as the best finance minister this dominion has had since the days of confederation. That is one reason why I attempt to say a few words in this debate. Another is to make a few remarks as to what I personally think of this budget.

It is my opinion that it is a matter-of-fact presentation of our financial position. I do not believe that this budget could be expected to be very bright and cheery on account of the awful experience to which the treasury has been subjected. It was encouraging at least to see that the deficit was reduced so substantially from last year, but those who hoped for larger tax reductions were somewhat disappointed. To me it appears that the budget is a forceful reminder to the Canadian people that we have emerged from the most devastating war in history, and while we have achieved victory on the battlefield, we must continue to fight with sacrifice and determination against other dangers which threaten us. Our assumption of obligations in the remaking of the world and our obligations to those who fought for us are important factors in the budget. War was costly and produced only destruction; rehabilitation is costly but will produce good citizens of our land, and in some measure, repay the debt we owe to those who left home and loved ones to endure hardships and face death to protect our way of life.

The finance minister is making another effort to bring about a dominion-provincial conference. If we are ever going to get anywhere, we must face up to our national problems as Canadians, not as citizens of the maritimes, Quebec, Ontario or the west. Therefore we must earnestly hope that these last proposals will result in some amicable agreement between the provinces and the federal government.

The budget contains a clause allowing farmers and fishermen to pay taxes on a three-year average rather than on a single year's operations. It was unfair that a farmer or fisherman, so dependent on nature for success should be taxed on, say a $5,000 income this year if last year he actually lost $3,000. The fairness of this proposal, which has been long discussed here, will, I think, receive general applause.

While the step-up in exemption figures was not as great as was hoped for, it should be kept in mind that our figure here is higher than in the United States, Britain or New Zealand. The exemption limits under the present tax are $660 for single persons and, in effect, $1,200 for married persons. As a major part of the present revision, it is proposed that the exemptions be raised to $750 for single persons, and $1,500 for married persons without dependents. This measure, taken in conjunction with the proposal regarding allowances for dependents, will remove entirely from the income tax roll between 550,000 and 600,000 taxpayers, or about one-quarter of the present number. The proposed exemptions will be in the form of deductions from income in the manner of the pre-war exemptions, and the $1,500 deduction will replace the combined income deduction of $660 and the tax credit of $150 granted to married men under the present law.

Consideration was given by the finance minister to suggestions made by persons who may not be familiar with all the facts, that the exemption limits be raised to $1,000 for single persons and $2,000 for married persons, and even that the exemptions be $1,200 and $2,400 respectively. After careful examination of these and other suggestions, the minister came to the conclusion that exemptions of $750 and $1,500 respectively are as high as can reasonably be proposed under present circumstances.

In the first place, we must still raise very large amounts of revenue. Even if no tax reductions were made, our revenues will fall considerably short of our expenditures and far short of our total financial requirements for the current year. Moreover, there is already a great excess of purchasing power and we must not add unnecessarily to it. In addition to these immediate considerations, we must bear in mind that the government and parliament face a post-war period in which events are likely to move swiftly, and in respect of which we have accepted a large measure of responsibility for maintaining high employment. Under these circumstances we cannot afford to reduce our revenues too drastically.

Second, we are all, I believe, agreed that the income tax is the fairest and best tax on which to rely for the bulk of our revenue. More than any other tax, it takes ability to pay properly into account. We must, I consider, rely upon it as heavily as we can, subject to the limits imposed by its effects on incentive and efficiency. This applies as well in the lower backets as in the higher. We cannot secure proper equity and fair treatment if exemptions from income tax are so high as to exclude most of those receiving incomes. It is just as important to be fair in the distribution of taxation between persons earning $1,500 and $2,400 a year respectively, as it is to be fair in the distribution of taxation between these persons and those earning $5,000 or $10,000 a year. I have said that we cannot afford to reduce our revenues beyond reasonable figures. In these circumstances, if we raised unreasonably the exemptions for the income tax, or lowered the rates of income tax too drastically, we would only make it necessary to impose other less equitable, even regressive, forms of taxes.

Comparison of our proposed exemptions with those of other countries indicates clearly, I believe, that the figures now proposed are as high as Canada can reasonably go. The suggested exemption of $750 for the single person compares with one of $700 in Australia and New Zealand, of $500 in the United States, and of $490 in Britain. Similarly, the proposed exemption of $1,500 for a married person compares with $1,077 in New Zealand, $1,000 in the United States, $931 in Australia and $800 in Britain. In addition, Britain, Australia and New Zealand have substantial social security taxes which apply at much lower levels than the exemptions I have given for income tax alone.

On motion of Mr. McGarry the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, July 17, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. MAURICE LALONDE (Labelle) presented the first report of the standing committee on industrial relations, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Third report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Breithaupt.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS—CHANGE IN PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. Howe be substituted for that of Mr. Brown; that the name of Mr. Beaudoin be substituted for that of Mr. Beaudry; that the name of Mr. Mitchell be substituted for that of Mr. Ferguson and that the name of Charlton be substituted for that of Mr. MacNicol; that the name of Mr. Skey be substituted for that of Mr. Ferguson and that the name of Mr. Adamson be substituted for that of Mr. Daniels on the select standing committee on industrial relations.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE

MR. FRASER—REJECTION OF QUESTIONS SUBMITTED FOR ORDER PAPER

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege which affects not only myself but other members of the house. In accordance with the ordinary practice, yesterday I submitted the following questions for the order paper:

1. How many motorcycles have been declared surplus by the Department of National Defence (Army)?

2. What are the departmental numbers of the surplus declaration forms in each case?

3. On what dates were declarations of surplus motorcycles made?

4. How many of these motorcycles have been disposed of through War Assets Corporation?

5. How many of these motorcycles have been disposed of by sale to ex-servicemen in pursuance with the policy which grants them priority of purchase?

6. In what province or provinces are the remainder of these motorcycles now located?

I also submitted the following questions:

1. How many motorcycles have been declared surplus by the Department of National Defence for Air?

2. What are the departmental numbers of the surplus declaration forms in each case?
3. On what dates were declarations of surplus motorcycles made.
4. How many of these motorcycles have been disposed of through War Assets Corporation?
5. How many of these motorcycles have been disposed of by sale to ex-servicemen, in pursuance of the policy which grants then priority of purchase?
6. In what province or provinces are the remainder of these motorcycles now located?

I had other questions in regard to this matter—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. FRASER: I shall not read them at present. These questions were returned to me last night with a notation that questions dealing with War Assets cannot be placed on the order paper while the special committee on expenditures and economies is still sitting. I am not a member of that committee and am therefore not permitted to participate in its deliberations. If I am to be blocked in my move to place questions on the order paper on behalf of my constituents, then my rights and privileges as a private member of this house are in my opinion being seriously interfered with. I therefore ask you, Mr. Speaker, to rule that not only I but all members of parliament shall have the right to seek information through the normal channels of the house, and that the questions which I have just read, and the other questions I have here, be permitted to appear on the order paper and be answered in the ordinary way.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have noted the observations made by the hon. member, and I shall give him an answer later.

INCOME TAX

AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED KINGDOM—AVOIDANCE OF DOUBLE TAXATION

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 300, respecting an income tax agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom, signed at London, in England, on the fifth day of June, 1946.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The Minister of National Revenue will, in my absence, be in charge of this bill, and the following one, and I would ask him to give the house the necessary explanation.

Mr. McCANN: The purpose of this bill is to give legal effect in Canada to the income tax agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom which was signed in London on June 5, 1946. The purpose of the agreement is to avoid double taxation in respect of trading profits and dividend, interest and royalty payments flowing between the United Kingdom and Canada. It systematizes taxation imposed on other types of income including salaries, pensions and annuities which might be taxable in both countries. Provision is made for each government to credit its nationals for taxes paid to the other and for the exchange of information.

Mr. HACKETT: Does this apply to succession duties?

Mr. McCANN: No; the next bill does.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUCCESSION DUTIES

AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED KINGDOM—AVOIDANCE OF DOUBLE TAXATION

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 301, respecting a succession duty agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom, signed at London, in England, on the fifth day of June, 1946.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. McCANN: The purpose of this bill is to give legal effect in Canada to the succession duties agreement between the United Kingdom and Canada, which was signed in London on June 5, 1946. The purpose of the agreement is to avoid double taxation on the estates of deceased persons with interests in the two countries. The agreement provides that the situs of the property of the decedent will be determined in large measure by the general law of situs. The convention systematizes the taxing rights of the country of domicile and the country of non-domicile. The agreement also provides within certain limits for the crediting by the country of domicile of taxes paid on estates situated in the country of non-domicile and for the exchange of information for the avoidance of fraud.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

MERCHANT SEAMEN

PROVISION FOR PAYMENT OF WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION BENEFITS

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 302, respecting compensation for merchant seamen.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The object of this bill is to make statutory provision for the payment of workmen's compensation to merchant seamen, particularly those employed on ships engaged in foreign trade as well as those plying in home waters, and more particularly those not now covered by provincial legislation. The principle of workmen's compensation has been recognized in the Government Employees' Compensation Act, 1925, and that principle was extended during the war years to cover war workers and other groups. On August 1, 1945, it was extended by order in council to cover merchant seamen. The object of this bill is to give statutory authority to those regulations, which are now in force.

Mr. BROOKS: Has this anything to do with gratuities and reestablishment credits for seamen who served during the war?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Nothing at all.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE

JURORS IN CRIMINAL CASES IN SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 303, to amend the criminal code.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There are only two points dealt with in this bill. One is to establish for Saskatchewan, at the request of the attorney general of that province, that the jury to try indictments will consist of twelve persons instead of six as heretofore. The second is to implement my undertaking to the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) to ask the house at this session to deal with the situation in respect of jurors in criminal cases in the province of Alberta. Heretofore the matter was regulated by the terms of the Northwest Territories Act, as it existed in 1905. It is proposed that it shall now be regulated by the code, but that so long as Alberta retains a system of six jurors instead of twelve, the number of persons called who may be challenged peremptorily and the number of those who may be requested to stand aside by the crown shall be half the number which prevails when a jury is to be made up of twelve persons.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PROVISION FOR MINISTERS AND DEPUTY MINISTERS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 304, to amend the Department of National Defence Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is necessitated by changes which will have to be made in the Department of National Defence Act, as it was amended to meet the situation which arose during the time of war. Now that the war is over, other provisions will have to replace those inserted during the war.

Before the war, the Department of National Defence was an administrative as well as a legal unit. However, early in the war, it was found that the magnitude of the problems that faced the defence services necessitated an administrative division of the department into three parts to look after the needs of the army, the navy and the air force respectively. This was made possible by an amendment to the Department of National Defence Act in 1940, which provided for the appointment of an Associate Minister of National Defence, a Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, and a Minister of National Defence for Air. It similarly provided for additional deputy ministers.

The need for the present bill arises mainly out of the fact that the 1940 amendment limited the provision for the appointment of additional ministers and deputy ministers to the period after the issuance of a proclamation under the War Measures Act to the effect that a state of "war, invasion or insurrection" exists. In addition, it is provided that the department must revert to its unitary condition within six months after a proclamation stating that "the war, invasion or insurrection no longer exists." While the need for division of the department is most likely to arise in time of war or of acute danger of war, nevertheless it may, on occasion, be found desirable to have such division of the department for purely administrative or other reasons. The present bill accordingly removes the restrictions which I have referred to.

Another effect of the present bill will be to enable additional deputy ministers of national defence to function even though it is not felt desirable to appoint more than one minister. This is not possible under the act as it stands at present.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL—OUTSTANDING CONTRACTS WITH EXPORTERS

Mr. McLURE:

1. At the time when the Canadian dollar was put on a parity basis, how many foreign exchange contracts were outstanding between the Foreign Exchange Control Board and Canadian exporters?

2. What are the names of exporters holding such contracts, and what length of time did each such contract cover?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. At the time of the recent change in the exchange rate of the Canadian dollar there were 963 forward exchange contracts outstanding between Canadian exporters and Canadian banks acting as authorized dealers of the foreign exchange control board.

2. It is not desirable to disclose the affairs of particular individuals or corporations by giving detailed information regarding the contracts outstanding.

INCOME TAX—AMOUNTS REFUNDABLE UNDER SECTION 93

Mr. DORION:

On what date will the amounts refundable under subsection 1 of section 93 of the Income War Tax Act be payable?

Mr. McCANN: The provisions of the Income War Tax Act require these savings to be refunded as follows: (a) For the taxation year 1942—not later than 31st March 1948; (b) For the taxation year 1943—not later than 31st March 1949; (c) For the taxation year 1944—not later than 31st March 1950.

WHEAT BOARD—1944 CROP YEAR

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

What is the total amount of wheat from the 1944 crop year still held by the Canadian Wheat Board?

Mr. MacKINNON: The wheat in the 1944 crop account is all sold excepting that amount required under order in council to be held by the Canadian wheat board to meet domestic requirements until July 31, 1946, estimated at 3½ million bushels.

OPTOMETRISTS IN PRAIRIE PROVINCES—FEES FOR ARMY SERVICES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many optometrists in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta received fees from the army for services rendered during each of the years 1940 to 1945, either by way of direct payment or indirectly by deduction from the individual's pay?

2. What are the names of the said optometrists, and how much did each receive during each of the said years?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1 and 2.

Military District No. 10 (Manitoba)

The number of optometrists who received fees from the army for services rendered was three, during each of the years 1941-45. Information for 1940 is not available. Names and amounts received are as follows:

VETERANS LAND ACT—MIDDLESEX COUNTY

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East):

1. What is the total cost to date of the twenty-eight Veterans Land Act houses being constructed in London township, and of the seventy-two being constructed in Westminster township, county of Middlesex?

2. What are the annual administration costs for these one hundred homes?

Mr. MACKENZIE:

1. Total construction costs: $407,745.51.

2. Annual administration costs of these houses cannot be segregated from the overall costs of administration.

BROOKLANDS, MAN.—WATER MAINS AND SEWERS

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Has the Department of Reconstruction and Supply received an application from the village of Brooklands, Manitoba, for assistance in the installation of additional water mains and sewers?

2. Has the government made any offer to the village of Brooklands to contribute to the cost of such installations? If so, to what extent?

3. What is the present status of negotiations between the government and the village of Brooklands with reference to these matters?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Yes. At the request of the municipal authorities of Brooklands a resident of the village called on the department in May of this year to find out whether such assistance could be secured.

2. No. However, the representative of the village was informed that in the proposals made to the provinces by the dominion government there was provision for planning and timing grants for such undertakings which, of course, were contingent upon agreement being reached between the dominion and provincial governments. This information was confirmed in a letter dated May 18, 1946.

3. No negotiations are being carried on.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

DISTRICT JUDGES IN ADMIRALTY

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. What are the names of the district judges in admiralty?
2. How much is each judge paid annually for such services?
3. What sum was paid for expenses for each court in the last year?
4. How many writs were issued in each district in each of the last five years?
5. How many trials were there in each district in each of the last five years?

COMMISSIONER OF YUKON TERRITORY

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. Who is the present commissioner of the Yukon territory?
2. When was he appointed?
3. Where is his present residence?
4. Is he required to give his full time to his duties as commissioner?
5. What is his annual salary?
6. Is he granted any other allowance because of his office?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CHATHAM, N.B., AIRPORT

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

For a copy of all correspondence since the beginning of the war exchanged between the Department of National Defence for Air, Department of Transport, Department of Munitions and Supply, Department of Reconstruction and Supply, and the town of Chatham, New Brunswick, the county of Northumberland, New Brunswick, the Honourable T. P. Burchill, Lockhart Woodworkers Limited and Miramichi Allied Industries Limited, regarding the utilization of the Chatham, New Brunswick, airport for the establishment of industries.

2. Also a copy of all correspondence, agreements, expense accounts or statements in connection with the disposal by sale or lease or for use for storage purposes of the Chatham, New Brunswick airport and equipment or supplies, by the Crown Assets Allocation Committee and War Assets Corporation.

REGIONAL RECONSTRUCTION COUNCILS—REPORTS TO DEPARTMENT

Mr. GREEN:

For a copy of all reports submitted by regional reconstruction councils to the Department of Reconstruction and Supply or the Department of Reconstruction.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, this motion refers to interdepartmental correspondence, which has always been regarded as privileged. I suggest that the motion is out of order.

Mr. GREEN: May I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, that this is a motion for a copy of all reports submitted by regional reconstruction councils to the Department of Reconstruction and Supply. Those are honorary councils serving without remuneration.

Mr. HOWE: There is a paid staff.

Mr. GREEN: There is nothing secret about their activities. Moreover they are representative men from various walks of life in each province. The minister explained the type of work they do when on March 20, as reported at page 115 of Hansard, he said:

> It is the work of these councils to keep in touch with conditions in the provinces, to keep the department advised of requirements of materials and requirements of any kind. It is also the duty of the councils to give every assistance to those engaged in reconstruction work in the province.

In other words it is their task to inform the government of requirements in the provinces, and to listen to the submissions made by different groups.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. These motions are not debatable. I have given the hon. member sufficient latitude to put his question to the minister, but I cannot allow debate.

Mr. GREEN: I submit that this does not come under the rule at all. There is not the slightest possibility that the production of these reports would be contrary to public interest. I would therefore ask that Your Honour put the motion to the house.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Green) which was negatived on the following division:

MILITIA PENSION ACT

AMENDMENT TO REVISE AND ENLARGE EXISTING PROVISIONS

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence) moved the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Militia Pension Act to bring up to date the existing provisions of the Act and to provide that time served on active service be included in the pensionable term of service of persons appointed to the permanent force prior to the first of April, 1946; and also to add a new part to the Act, respecting pensions, allowances and gratuities, applicable to all persons joining the permanent force after the 31st of March, 1946, and to those persons coming under the present Act, who may, instead of remaining thereunder, elect to come under the new part.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION

PROVISION FOR ADDITIONAL COMMISSIONERS, TRANSFER OF CERTAIN JURISDICTION, AND GRANTING OF MONEYS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Federal District Commission Act, 1927, to provide for the appointment of fifteen commissioners (in lieu of ten), also for the transfer to the president of the privy council of certain jurisdiction over the commission and to provide further for the granting of moneys by the payment of grants or otherwise, for the purposes of the commission.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

ESPIONAGE—INQUIRY AS TO CERTAIN PERSONS CONNECTED WITH A FOREIGN EMBASSY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. The final report of the commission on espionage named certain persons connected with the embassy of a foreign government. I wish to ask the Prime Minister who, if any, of these persons are still here, what is the recognized diplomatic procedure in such cases, and is the government invoking such procedure in these instances?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend gave me notice of his question. The report names seventeen persons, I understand, as members of the Soviet embassy staff who were engaged in inadmissible activities. This appears under section II(7) of the report of the royal commission. Of those seventeen I understand eleven had left this country before the report itself was published. I have assurances that the remaining number will be leaving immediately at the instance of the Soviet government.

Mr. HOMUTH: Is there no prosecution?

EMPIRE TRADE

REPORTED MEETING THIS AUTUMN ON QUESTION OF PREFERENCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. HOWARD GREEN (Vancouver South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. A Canadian Press dispatch published this morning indicates that a conference may be held this fall to consider the whole question of empire trade preferences. Will the minister make a statement in that regard?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I received just as I came in the house a notice of the intention of the hon. member for Vancouver South to ask this question. I have not had an opportunity to have a word with the Prime Minister or any other colleague of mine. Personally I have no official information regarding the proposed meeting.

Mr. GREEN: Perhaps it can be answered further to-morrow.

Mr. MacKINNON: I will look into it and see.

PACIFIC COAST SERVICE

CONSTRUCTION OF PASSENGER AND FREIGHT VESSEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. G. ARCHIBALD (Skeena): I wish to ask the Minister of Transport a question of which I have given him notice. Is the new passenger boat which the Canadian National Railways is reported to be negotiating to have built for the Pacific coast service to be built in the Canadian National dry dock at Prince Rupert; and if not, why not?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): I received notice of the hon. gentleman's question, and made inquiries of officers of the Canadian National Railways. I have been informed by them that tenders have been asked of all shipyards in Canada for the construction of a new vessel for passenger and freight service to be operated by Canadian National Steamships on the Pacific coast.

Prince Rupert Dry Dock and Shipyard is not quoting, inasmuch as the staff of technicians and workmen at that plant has now been reduced to a peace-time basis. Now that the war-time emergency has passed it would be uneconomical to maintain at that plant the necessary technicians and staff that would be required for shipbuilding operations. It is anticipated that work at the yard will in the future be limited to ship repairs and overhaul.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the ship be built in the shipyards of North Vancouver?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Consideration will be given to that.

THE MINISTRY

PRESS REPORT OF RESIGNATION OF THE MINISTER OF LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my attention has just been drawn to an item which appears in an evening paper in the city. I am unable to gather whether the news editor had run short of news, or whether the item was intended as humour. The first paragraph of the article is as follows:

> Labour Minister Humphrey Mitchell is believed yesterday to have resigned from his cabinet post.

It goes on to say:

> The resignation was not accepted by Prime Minister Mackenzie King, and Mr. Mitchell's office to-day denied the report.
> The labour minister agreed to continue as head of the federal labour department after talking with the Prime Minister, it was said.

The article then proceeds to give the alleged reasons. I have had no conversation with the Minister of Labour concerning resignation or anything resembling resignation. I am perfectly sure that Mr. Mitchell has had nothing of the kind in his mind.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, July 16, consideration of the motion of Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do not leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. MacInnis.

Mr. M. E. McGARRY (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned last night I was attempting to draw a comparison between income tax exemptions in Canada and those of other countries of the commonwealth, and I think all will agree with me that the contrast is very favourable to the Dominion of Canada.

I do not think it is fair to argue that there should be a drastic reduction of the staff of the civil service at this particular time, particularly when so many restrictions yet obtain and will obtain for some time, and when we consider the number of civil servants who are needed to administer the social and other legislation which has been put on the statute books since 1939. I need mention only the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, and the Family Allowance Act of about a year ago.

While mentioning the Family Allowance Act, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I may be allowed to make a few remarks with regard to this piece of social legislation. It has been in force for about a year, and I am sure that all will agree that it has rendered a great deal of benefit to the children of Canada. And that was the hope, because when the measure was brought before the house parliament favoured it and was unanimous in adopting it. Certainly some abuses have arisen, but compared with the benefits afforded our children the abuses have been almost nominal. The government has paid family allowances to 1,420,233 families in respect to 3,330,763 children. The average allowance per family was $14.04 per month, and the average allowance per child was $5.98 per month.

In regard to the size of families, eighty-one per cent had three or fewer children, and a check-up and verification of the original registration has revealed very few abuses. As a matter of fact there were only two prosecutions in the whole of Canada. A bill has been passed in the British House of Commons providing for family allowances to come into effect in August of this year. This shows that the great country which we were always asked to follow in respect of legislation and otherwise has this year followed a precedent set by us. Thus we have in this great commonwealth Australia, New Zealand, Great Britain and Canada all participating in the benefits which go with this family allowance.

This government has accomplished much during this year of demobilization and reconstruction; but after all the government can do has been done, it remains for the people of Canada, the individuals, as usual to do the planning and to contribute their support in the occupations in which they have knowledge and skill. Governments may make plans. Some of them are practical, and sometimes they are necessary, but most of the planning must be devised and carried out by whom?—by farmers, fishermen, manufacturers, traders, merchants, and all others in the various fields of endeavour. It is encouraging to discover, however, at this particular time that many of these plans have been put into practical operation.

It is generally realized that in Canada employment conditions are dependent to the extent of twenty-five per cent at least on our export trade. It is also true that to sell on a basis of quality and price in an export market under competitive conditions it is necessary that a well-organized Canadian manufacturing system be maintained in the domestic field. International trade is, and should continue to be, a great cooperative enterprise between dominion and provincial governments, their trade commissioners, agencies, farmers, manufacturers, miners, lumbermen, fishermen, importers, bankers and transportation men. All are consumers and all should work together continuously.

In my effort to conclude my remarks before eleven o'clock last evening I refrained from making brief reference to certain remarks made by some hon. members on the other side of the house. Since it was necessary for me to adjourn the debate at that time I shall now take a few minutes to make these brief references.

First I wish to refer to the gloomy diagnosis or prognosis of the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) as to the effect of the legislation dealing with taxation of cooperatives. I, like the hon. member for Yorkton, am sympathetic with the cooperative movement. I was one of the first to become a member and to take shares in our local cooperative. The officials of the wholesale cooperative located at Sydney, which supplies forty-seven retail stores on the island of Cape Breton, can vouch for my cooperation in their efforts to improve and expand their business. I may not be able to explain in detail all the intricacies of the policies and objectives of the cooperatives, but there is one reverend gentleman, Doctor Coady, who no doubt has full understanding of the entire set-up, its aims and intents.

Doctor Coady has been the organizer, the initiator and the developer of the cooperative movement throughout the maritimes. He is now and has been for many years the director of that movement. What does Doctor Coady say of the legislation dealing with cooperative taxation? He has said it over the radio; he has expressed it in the press. This is what he said: "I am well satisfied with this legislation." After hearing the comments of the director of the maritime cooperative movement, who should know the facts of this legislation better than any other person in the maritimes at least, what attitude should I take? Common sense should dictate the answer.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer. I consider the criticism of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) in dealing with matters of taxation, economy and expenditures, most inconsistent to say the least. He urged tax reduction, greater economy and greater expenditure. This is what one might call a paradoxical miracle. The Progressive Conservative proposals in the resolutions which issued from the recent Ottawa meeting of the dominion association are examples of this paradoxical miracle, and rather than offer my own criticism directly, since I have such a high regard for the hon. member, I shall read, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, what the Financial Post had to say about these resolutions. Every hon. member in the house knows what political party has the sympathy of the Financial Post. This is an excerpt from that paper:

> Spend more public money and cut taxes is the paradoxical miracle that Progressive Conservatives propose in the resolutions which issued from last week's two-day Ottawa meeting of the dominion association. It is sheer nonsense to promise in the same breath big tax cuts and big increases in government spending. It is just irresponsible to set down a long list of grandiose new expenditures and to foster the already rampant delusion that government has some magic pool of money to draw upon for bestowing painless pleasures on the voters. The fact that this batch of resolutions is so evidently designed to catch votes does not excuse it. The Progressive Conservatives are Canada's official opposition. That gives them a responsibility and a job to do. But what sober notice and informed respect will the opposition command when it comes to the debate on the esimates? What will be the force of opposition queries when, in its own platform, it devotes all its attention to where the money goes and none to where it comes from? It is time the Progressive Conservatives figured out the basic political beliefs for which they stand. Attempts to be all things to all men never succeed. With taxes as they are to-day, the old political hocus pocus of trying to win power by promising to spend more money than the opponents won't work. The Progressive Conservatives would do well to repudiate their Ottawa pronouncement and draft a new one.

In closing may I observe that on our confederation birthday, July 1, we found our political system unimpaired despite the fact that the strains through which we have passed may have led outside observers to believe that they would disrupt our economy. Our economic system has given us unexampled prosperity at a time when most of the world is destitute. Our capacity to produce wealth exceeds the utmost hopes of the men who founded our state a lifetime ago, and millions of people beyond the seas depend upon us for their daily bread. Moreover, we have learned much in the management of our society, in the fairer distribution of its wealth, so that despite the outpouring of treasure and resources in the war and in the rehabilitation period, the average Canadian and his family live better to-day than ever before, and I would be safe in saying better than any other family on the face of the earth. No nation of our population anywhere at any time in history has equalled the material achievements of Canada in its brief lifetime of three generations. For bringing about this happy condition much credit must be given to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley); much credit must be given to this government. In carrying on the war and in applying measures to deal with rehabilitation in the peace period they have exercised foresight rather than hindsight. They showed that three hours after war was declared by passing the wartime prices and trade board regulations. What effect has it had? In the first place it has cut out profiteering and has prevented our prices from rocketing to the dizzy heights of the period following the last war, after which they dropped to a subnormal peace-time level which was followed by a period of depression, which brought with it hardships and horrors almost as great as those caused by the war itself. So I say if we find ourselves in the happy position that the outside world looks upon Canada as an example, much credit is due the man who presides over the treasury, and a great deal of honour and respect should be accorded this government which, through the strain and trials of war and the additional worries of rehabilitation and reconstruction, has brought this country to a position, economically and financially, that is unexecelled by any other country in the world.

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, when I last spoke in the house, in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I mentioned that I thought a dominion-provincial labour conference was almost as necessary as a conference on taxation. Before I proceed with what I wish particularly to say I should like to express the hope that our committee on industrial relations will be successful—perhaps as successful as a dominion-provincial labour conference might have been—in bringing a measure of relief in Canada's labour problems. I should like to say also that I hope the committee will be given all assistance and full cooperation by both labour and management, and that no obstructions will be placed in its way by any political party or by any action of the government or the opposition.

In rising to take part in the budget debate I should like to again place on Hansard the amendment moved by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), which I support. It reads:

> This house regrets:
> (1) That the budget does not provide for tax reductions in the calendar year 1946;
> (2) That the budget gives no indication of any serious attempt to eliminate extravagance or effect economies in the cost of government;
> (3) That the policies of the government are discouraging much-needed production.

It seems to me that very well sums up the inadequacies of the present budget.

I should like first to call attention to housing. This is one way by which we could provide employment, improve our standard of living and produce an asset for the country the cost of which would be paid off in time, without increasing the national debt. In 1945, according to the report of the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) about 44,000 houses were built in Canada. As yet there has been no official estimate for 1946, but the industries which produce the fixtures necessary for houses have said that 35,000 houses is the most that can possibly be constructed if they are to be completely fitted out, and that with more strikes and more labour difficulties in the country we shall be lucky to get 25,000 completed this year. Back in May, 1945, this government was campaigning for reelection to office. They had some very fine advertisements in the newspapers, one of which I hold in my hand, appearing in the London Free Press of Tuesday, May 15, 1945, headed, "Liberal policies create post-war opportunities for all." Item No. 8 in a list of twelve contained in the advertisement states:

> The Liberal government's new $400,000,000 National Housing Act enables hundreds of thousands of Canadians to own their own homes. In the first year after Germany's defeat, at least 50,000 dwellings will be built. Low rental housing schemes are included. This means hundreds of thousands of jobs for the building trades and allied industries—many thousands more for people who make furnishings and home equipment.

Well, I would call attention to the fact that according to the figures of the Minister of Reconstruction, this promise has not been fulfilled. That was on May 15, 1945. Now we come to June 6, 1945, when the campaign was getting a little warmer. In the Toronto Star of that date appeared this advertisement:

Just plain sense! . . . The Liberal administration can say with honesty and justice: This is the government which has directed Canada's war effort at home and abroad. This is the government which during the war worked out a programme of full employment and social reform . . . Let the Liberal government finish its work.

Then item No. 3:

The family's choice . . . Fifty thousand homes immediately . . .

Not just this year, but immediately—and this is five days before the election.

. . . one hundred thousand houses each year for ten years. Instalments as low as $9.58 per month under the new national housing plan.

Mr. GRAYDON: Heaven on earth.

Mr. SKEY: Well, it was only five days before the election. I mention this because a day or so ago we heard the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott) call the attention of the house to a speech by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) entitled, "John Bracken's charter for a better Canada." The minister endeavoured to show that we were now advocating economy, but that our present stand was not quite in accordance with our election platform. The minister took part in the debate, and his constructive contribution was "John Bracken's charter for a better Canada." The hon. gentleman presented it very well and gave us some good advertising, showing what this party would have tried to do had it been in power. The minister also endeavoured to show that of the total amount being requested by the government only $170,000,000, approximately, represented controllable expenditures while all the rest was composed of fixed charges, and he said he could not see any place for economy. That same evening the hon. member for York South (Mr. Cockeram) presented figures which appear at page 3420 of Hansard, showing that in the minister's own department the navy now has 1,601 officers and 6,388 men, or one officer to command four men. Any military man will know that this is an uneconomic military organization. The incredible thing, however, is that the minister also has 10,187 civil servants to administer the affairs of this force, totalling 7,989; and he rose in this house to say that economies were not possible in the government at the present time.

One other subject to which I should like to speak before I come to the budget proper is the recently published report of the royal commission respecting public officials and other persons who might have communicated information to agents of a foreign power.

Some weeks ago when the crown companies bill was before the house I took the opportunity to suggest to the government, through the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, that additional measures be taken to ensure that Canada's crown companies, especially those dealing with secret war materials, crown arsenals and matters connected with atomic energy—the plant at Chalk river—should be protected in relation to the personnel employed by them. As was stated in a press report, I was brushed off by the minister. I am pleased to see however that my views as expressed at that time are borne out by the recommendations of the royal commissioners, whose third recommendation is that all security measures be coordinated and rendered as nearly uniform as possible.

The press report indicates clearly that the Labour Progressive party in Canada was used as an instrument for the recruitment of red cells for purposes of espionage against the Canadian people. Shortly before the report was published the annual meeting of the Labour Progressive party was held in Columbus Hall, Toronto. Here is what the national leader of that party said on June 3 of this year—I quote from the Globe and Mail:

"We want 10,000 new members this year. We want a mass Marxist party, a party of communists." Premier Drew of Ontario, Prime Minister King and Premier Duplessis of Quebec were the particular targets on which Tim Buck directed his fire.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. SKEY: I am glad I have a little support on the other side of the house. Then, an editorial which appeared two days after that meeting stated:

Thus easily did Mr. Buck cut the lines with the party's recent past. No longer is it necessary to travel in the convoy of a Liberal party alliance. That union which consummated in the North Grey by-election reached into the Ontario legislature and lasted through the provincial and federal elections of last year. The emphasis has now shifted from political to industrial trouble making.

I have not put this on the record to make difficulty or trouble but rather to place it before the government, because there is now a clear duty placed upon them to tell the country whether it intends to give consideration to the advisability of allowing the communist party to continue to spawn red cells in Canada.

I now have a somewhat milder recommendation to make to the government, and it is that the Minister of Finance, who through five or six years has borne the difficulties of finding money for Canada and who, as the Prime Minister said the other day, needs a well-earned working holiday at Geneva, be relieved of some of the difficulties and responsibilities now placed upon his shoulders. I make this recommendation in the light of the budget now before us. It seems to me that of necessity some controls must continue for some time. It must follow from the budget that for many months there will continue to be a scarcity of goods in Canada. As a result of that there is no doubt that the wartime prices and trade board must continue to function; and, as stated by the Prime Minister, it will continue. Therefore I recommend to the Minister of Finance that his colleague, the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, be brought into the cabinet and the House of Commons, where he can bear the load of questioning, accept a share of governmental responsibility, and take that measure of load from the shoulders of the Minister of Finance. I believe this would relieve the minister of many onerous responsibilities he now carries, and would also place the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board in a cabinet position, where hon. members who, on occasions, have had reason to complain that they did not get all the information they wanted, would be able to question him directly.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Would the hon. member give him his seat?

Mr. SKEY: I should like to respond to the request of the Postmaster General (Mr. Bertrand), but I happen to represent a constituency in which the leader of the Labour Progressive party was a strong candidate in the last election. However if the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board would like to contest that seat, he will be welcomed at the next election.

For a moment or two I now address my remarks to the income tax branch. I have received from many employees of that branch a letter expressing clearly their dissatisfaction. They state that there are small opportunities —indeed, practically no opportunities—for promotion or advancement, that they suffer from crowded working conditions, and that the low wages they receive are causing them financial worries at home. I do not know whether they are different from any other public servants, but if they are being paid at a lower rate I would recommend to the minister that their positions be investigated, and if possible, their quarters improved.

I now turn my attention to the budget. I have received a letter from a constituent of mine in which I believe he has stated some things which should be put on Hansard. This letter, from Mr. Ivory of Toronto, states:

> Regardless of the fact that voters at the last election returned some 190 Liberals and Progressive Conservatives as compared with fewer than 30 C.C.F.'ers, the cabinet and the Liberal party generally appear to believe that we want socialism in Canada. Evidently they think that if socialism is introduced in the guise of social security under Liberal sponsorship it will be O.K. But smallpox by any other name is just as deadly; and no matter who gives it to you, it is still smallpox.

During the dominion-provincial conference the Premier of Quebec went on record as saying something which is remarkably similar to the statement made by my constituent. Mr. Duplessis said:

> We all remember the old saying: "A rose by any other name would smell as sweet." Well, centralization by any other name would smell as bad and be as dangerous. In my opinion, if we accepted the proposals of the federal government, confederation could not endure.

My constituent goes on to say:

> Now, if Mr. Ilsley allowed those in the middle income groups who carry the major part of the income tax burden a "respectable" income tax reduction now, they would have more "take home pay," there would be little reason for strikes for more take home pay, goods would continue to be produced, and since wages would remain more or less stable prices would not have to be increased—hence inflationary pressures would be reduced.
> The reasoning of the government, however, is just the reverse of this, and since they will probably, as usual, get their way, they should accept the responsibility for the inflation, unemployment and hardship which may well follow the passing of his budget.

Continuing the discussion of the budget and endeavouring to prove that what I have already put on Hansard is a reasonably accurate estimate of what this budget will do to Canada, I should like to quote what was said by the Right Hon. Minister of Finance during his budget speech as reported on page 2904 of Hansard, as follows:

> Production then should be our primary objective both for its own sake in a world that needs goods so badly, and as a safeguard against the present danger of inflation. We should aim now at high volume production for civilian purposes despite shortages, strikes, delays and uncertainties—

I am of the opinion that my constituent is right, that some greater relief in the income tax field would have a tendency to reduce the number of strikes, and that this is the field that should have received attention this year. The income tax this year will be the same as it was last year, and there will be no relief until 1947. This is the sort of thing that leads to strikes. Every housewife in the country knows that prices are rising and that as a result of these higher prices their standards of living will drop during the year. I quote again from page 2905 of Hansard, where the minister is reported as having said:

In the first place, the action we take now in regard to taxes should provide whatever stimulus is possible to increased production.

I contend that if you tax a man to the point where he is incited to strike for higher wages you are not providing a stimulus to increased production.

Turning now for a moment to the dominion-provincial conference, we find in the speech an analysis of what the government offered at that conference. To summarize, there were three categories of agreements discussed—public investment, social security and taxation. Under public investment there was an offer to the provinces to cooperate, first, in attempting to level off booms and depressions; second, in the conservation of their economic resources and, third, in the timing of planned public works. That is essentially a long-range programme designed to prime the Canadian economy when necessary and keep it on an even keel. I contend that that is a matter which could have been considered separately from any tax agreement; it was not necessary that it should be tied up to any tax agreement. It was a long-range programme; it was a programme of economic cooperation more than one of taxation cooperation.

The second government basis for discussion was in the field of social security, and had to do with old age pensions, public health, preventive medical activities, health insurance, and so on. The government's contention was that this was an integrated offering to the provinces, that it could not be broken down, and in this connection I should like to put on Hansard a statement made by the premier of Ontario as reported in the Globe and Mail as follows:

Mr. Drew further emphasized that the dominion financial proposals had nothing to do with its proposals for extended health and social services.

He went on to say that these were to be financed by a new superimposed income tax and a poll tax payable by every one over sixteen years of age. I shall not go into this contentious matter at the moment, but I should like the house to note that the Premier of Ontario said that this was not an integrated programme. In fact, he emphasized that the extended health and social services were a separate thing and should not have been tied in with any taxation agreement.

The dominion-provincial conference broke down because the provinces were offered an integrated proposal. The eastern provinces might want one kind of help, while the western provinces wanted another. I think I am right in saying that both the central provinces are on record as being in favour of a fiscal need policy for all parts of the dominion. Fiscal need would not necessarily be the same in the east as it is in the west, yet the provinces were offered an integrated programme without opportunity to adjust it to their own particular sectional needs. I contend that had they not been offered an integrated programme agreement could have been reached then with all of them. The man on the east coast does not necessarily need the same kind of service as the man in the prairie provinces or the man on the west coast.

This is what the minister in his budget speech says about the provinces, and this is the only place where I come fairly to grips with the minister. At page 2909 of Hansard the minister in his budget speech says:

Provincial expenditures have expanded greatly. Over-all provincial budgets, brought down for the current year, call for expenditures higher by about $200 million than in 1940.

That is not such a tremendous over-expansion, Mr. Speaker, when compared with the expanding budget of the dominion government, which is now increased 5 times.

This is an increase of roughly two-thirds. If the provinces again become dependent on income and corporation taxes, some will be forced to adopt taxation expedients far more drastic than those employed before the war. Financial pressure on the less-favoured provinces will give rise to increasingly arbitrary and discriminatory taxation, will lead to interference with inter-provincial trade and to the extension of government ownership and operation of business merely in order to obtain additional provincial revenues which of course would mean loss of revenues to the dominion.

I do not think it is fair of the federal government to say that the provinces, which kept their taxation agreement one hundred per cent during the war, might employ taxation expedients far more drastic than those employed before the war.

Mr. ILSLEY: One of the provinces intimated that they would be compelled to do so.

Mr. SKEY: One of the western provinces?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. SKEY: I must have missed that part in the report of the conference, which I have read with great care. If it is the only province which has adopted socialism, then the remarks of the Minister of Finance would be correct when he says that such might lead "to the extension of government ownership and operation of business." The Minister of Finance went on to say, on the same page of Hansard:

> Moreover, the arbitrary and discriminatory provincial taxes would come on top of dominion taxes which, while substantially less than at present, would still be considerably higher than before the war.

And so the government comes to the rescue of the provinces to prevent all of them except one from taxing themselves out of existence. The minister went on to say:

> The dominion cannot stand aside and allow such a situation to develop.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that it is the dominion government that has caused that situation or is allowing it to develop in those provinces where these wicked provincial governments might start out to tax their people out of existence. In all fairness I do not think the Minister of Finance should say that the dominion government stands here to protect the provinces from being taxed out of existence.

Mr. ILSLEY: There was no implication of wickedness, but rather of necessity.

Mr. SKEY: I was using the word emotionally. The minister said:

> The dominion cannot stand aside and allow such a situation to develop.

It is my contention, Mr. Speaker, that it is the dominion government's taxes that are causing that situation. The minister went on to say:

> It would seriously impair the capacity of private enterprise to provide high and expanding employment. It would weaken and perhaps destroy our federal system.

I have been very critical of the federal government's attitude towards the provinces. I say again that it is unfair to imply that those provinces, every one of which kept its taxation agreement with the dominion government one hundred per cent during the war, might be so hard on their own people as to tax them out of existence. It would be less than fair of me, however, to go on criticizing the conference without offering a possible solution of the present problem.

More than one provincial premier who attended the conference last May advocated the establishment of a standing committee on dominion-provincial affairs. I think it was Premier Drew of Ontario who said that we must have a committee on taxation so that we could start to do what the United States government is now doing so successfully, in connection with which statistics are published such as are to be found in the booklet I have here entitled "A post-war federal tax plan for high employment." Such a committee would study how Canadian taxes could be so imposed as not to cripple our economy, and in fact impose them in such a way as to try to be a stimulus to business. The premiers I believe were all in favour of the establishment of some kind of permanent committee to assist in ironing out dominion-provincial affairs. Such a committee has been established in the United States and is operating successfully.

I would like to quote from the April 1946 issue of the New York State Bar Association Bulletin, in which appears an article by former Republican Senator Lawrence G. Williams. At page 86 he says:

> The joint legislative committee on interstate cooperation of the state of New York was created by joint resolution of the senate and assembly and its rationale, and purpose was to encourage greater uniformity between the states, and the states and the federal government, both in the field of legislation and administration. . . The subjects dealt with fall into eighteen divisions and assigned to as many subcommittees.

Then at page 89 he says:

> Every state in the union to-day has either a committee or a commission as a counterpart to the joint legislative committee on interstate cooperation in the state of New York. The states are the principals and their agent or clearing house and loyal servant in the counsel of state governments, the main office of which is in the city of Chicago.

I happen to know that this committee has been a tremendous success in promoting interstate trade and harmonious legislation. We in the central provinces should long ago have sought ways and means of buying from the maritimes and from the west the things we need: we should be mining our own coal instead of importing it, developing our economy from within, supporting and assisting one another, rather than operating as disjointed parts of one whole body. Therefore I propose that some form of harmonization committee be formed such as they have in the United States, a committee consisting of non-office holders, civilians, selected by the provinces and the government jointly. I propose that such a committee be appointed immediately to look into all dominion-provincial affairs in an attempt to straighten out the impasse to which we have come.

It seems to me that the dominion-provincial conference should be reconvened. In the light of what has happened, in the light of the replies that have been made to the offer contained in the federal budget, in the light of the views of the provinces in the west and in the light of some of the silence in the east, I think it would be wise to reconvene the dominion-provincial conference rather than just sit and wait it out as the government is doing at the present time.

There is one other matter with regards to taxation to which I should have referred earlier when I was speaking about discriminatory taxation. Hansard, page 2910, left-hand column, contains the following statement by the minister, proviso (a):

> The agreeing provinces would agree not to levy any taxes on personal income nor permit their municipalities to do so.

Then further down:

> . . . the dominion would be willing to give a tax credit to the individual taxpayer of the amount of the tax he had to pay to the province, up to five per cent of the tax payable to the dominion by such taxpayer.

I take that to mean that the provinces, if they impose a five per cent income tax, will be allowed to keep that five per cent. Now on page 31 of the dominion-provincial conference proceedings the Premier of Quebec had this to say on just such an agreement:

> I do not say that is a good example, but we were entitled to a dollar and we were getting five cents according to the 1942 tax agreement. The dollar was given to Ottawa and we got five cents. I do not think that the Ottawa statement here is fair.

I do not see how permission to tax up to the point of five per cent can be considered a fair taxation agreement with any province.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mrs. GLADYS STRUM (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is to be congratulated, not only on the clarity of his presentation in giving the budget to the house, but on the endurance record he has set for this debate. It is no easy thing to sit for hours on end day after day and listen to your youngest and, no doubt favourite financial offspring being chastised constantly by the opposition. If there had not been a serious omission like the failure to deal with old age pensions I should have taken pity on the minister and resisted the urge to speak at this time. However, this omission is of so serious a nature, that I feel that I should not let this opportunity pass to speak for these people who are not able to speak for themselves.

In spite of the rising living costs over the war period, there has only been one small adjustment in the payments made to old age pensioners. In 1943 the federal government agreed to add its $3.75 to the $1.25 to be paid by the provinces in order to make an increase of $5 a month on the basic $20 a month payment. However, this does not mean that every old age pensioner gets $25 a month; it depends on the province in which he lives and the generosity of the administration carrying out the act. The iniquitous means test works out so that, if it can be shown that you are living in the home of a relative and that you do not need to pay so much for rent or for other accommodation as you otherwise would, the pension is reduced accordingly. The old age pension inspector advises his office of this fact or of any other fact for which he can have an excuse to reduce the pension, and less is paid. If the old age pensioner has any laudable and worthy ambition to earn some money and has the health and strength so that he can add to his pension, and the inspector finds out about it, the man's pension is reduced until, it is assumed, he will have used up the amount of his earnings to reduce his income so that he shall not have more than $425 at the present time, including the pension.

Mr. IRVINE: That stimulates the "free private enterprise."

Mrs. STRUM: This sum has been fixed by the federal government by order in council under the War Measures Act. It was formerly $365 a year, or $1 a day.

I find in the "Canada Year Book", 1945, that the average pension paid province by province is as follows: Prince Edward Island, $18.59; Nova Scotia, $22.53; New Brunswick, $22.11; Quebec, $23.96; Ontario, $23.89; Manitoba, $24.50; Saskatchewan, $24.70; Alberta, $24.18; British Columbia, $24.45; and in the northwest territories, $24.44. It will be noted by the figures that Saskatchewan pays the highest average of any province in Canada, and is also gives every old age pensioner a health card that supplies him and his wife and dependent children with complete health services. That is, the card covers medical care, hospitalization, surgery, X-ray and any other treatment, all drugs and medicines and appliances, and, in addition to this, optical care and glasses and dental care, of course, completely free to the old age pensioner. The Saskatchewan government has added $3 out of provincial funds which the federal government has not matched on the basis of its initial payment; that is, $1 from the provinces and $3 from the federal government. If the federal government had done this the old age pensioner in Saskatchewan would have an extra $9, or an old age pension of $37 a month. In addition to this, the Saskatchewan government gives property exemption of $2,000 against which no old age pension can be charged; that is, the old age pensioner has the right to hold a house or property up to the value of $2,000 without its affecting his old age pension in any way, and it is only that portion over $2,000 which is liable to any claim that may be registered for recovery of old age pension payments by the government. The old age pensioner must have been very much disappointed last December when the members of the House of Commons saw fit to take care of themselves and only promised to deal with old age pensions at the next session. Their hopes must have risen considerably when, on Monday, June 24, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) said, as reported in Hansard at page 2793.

> It is proposed that during the session, despite its possible length, legislation will be introduced to carry that into effect.

Their hopes no doubt suffered a severe setback from frost on Friday, July 5, when, as reported in Hansard, at page 3160, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said:

> I should like to ask the Prime Minister if in giving the list of additional bills he forgot the promise made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) that legislation would be introduced respecting old age pensions. This promise was made on June 24 and will be found reported on page 2793 of Hansard.

And the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) answered:

> I should like to just look at the promise and then perhaps give my hon. friend a word in relation to it a little later.

No doubt the poor old age pensioners had hoped against hope that something would be done about their food, their clothing and their rent before another year had rolled around. Imagine their surprise on July 12 when the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 3394 of Hansard:

> The hon. member referred to a statement made on June 24 by the Minister of National Health and Welfare in which it was indicated that it was proposed, during the present session, to have legislation introduced. Obviously a bill will have to be introduced at some time to continue in force the changes made in old age pensions under the War Measures Act. It had been the intention of the government to introduce a bill at this session.
> In view, however, of the great amount of business still to be concluded at this session of parliament, the government suggested that the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, should be extended for an additional forty-five days after the opening of the next session in order to make it unnecessary to reenact a considerable volume of emergency legislation at this session. It is the intention of the government to avail itself of this amendment and to delay the introduction of the necessary old age pensions bill until next session.

I wish to submit to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister, and, indeed, all members of the house who supported the rise in their own indemnity that, if it is necessary and desirable that members of parliament should be free of debt and financial worry, by the same token old age pensioners should not be forced to beg, borrow or cheat in order to keep body and soul together.

It has been said that good men cannot afford to be members of parliament. By the same token I should like to ask hon. members if anyone can afford to be an old age pensioner? Let us ask ourselves, who are these old age pensioners? They are the people, now seventy years of age and over, who were the pioneers of this country. What was Canada like when these people were born seventy years ago? Canada was a very scraggly infant indeed at that time.

We hear a lot about the value to this country of the people who are willing to take risks, and we have many hon. members on both sides of the house who are willing to justify the risk of capital for the sake of development. But the people who believe that we owe much to those who risk their money should have no trouble in admitting that we owe even more to those who risk their lives, those who invested not only their money but their life itself in building a nation. It is just fifty years ago since the period of development began which made this country into a nation. According to the Sirois report, this development took place from 1896, which is just fifty years ago. That year is taken as the landmark in our Canadian history. The people to whom I refer were twenty years of age when the inflow of settlers began. According to the Sirois report, at page 67 of Book I:

> The inflow of settlers began in earnest soon after the opening of the century and during the subsequent years of the period the land was taken up with amazing rapidity. An area larger than Vermont was entered in free homesteads in 1909; twice the area of Connecticut in 1910; more than Delaware and New Hampshire in 1911; nearly the area of Maryland in 1912; and more than Massachusetts in 1913. By the end of 1913, the rapid phase of western settlement was over. In so short a time, the frontier was pushed to its limits in almost all directions.

The people who are now seventy were twenty in 1896. In the years following 1896, thousands of them married and took their brides to homesteads. According to the Sirois report, at page 68:

> The settlement of the northwest was largely accomplished by 1913, and for the time being, at least, both the dry and the more humid areas had been brought into profitable production. Between 1896 and 1913, one million people moved into the three prairie provinces and the population increased from seven to twenty per cent of the total population of the dominion. The area of occupied land increased from about ten million acres to seventy million acres and the production of wheat from approximately twenty million bushels to 209 million bushels. At the end of the period, the value of agricultural production reached a total of $300 to $400 million annually.

Many of these people who are now without personal savings or personal investment, invested heavily in the future of their country. Most of them started to work early in their teens. Most of them married and raised families. They were the parents of the soldiers of the last war and the grandparents of the armed forces of this war. They built the schools and the churches; they paid the taxes; they were the outlets for the mortgage and insurance companies and for the banks. This is plainly set out at page 73 of the report as follows:

> While the value of agricultural production rose by leaps and bounds—the value of the exports of wheat and flour alone in 1913 was greater than the value of all exports in 1896—the value of the manufactured goods produced for the home market increased at an even faster rate.

The families of Canada were the home market; they bought the output of the great factories. In fact, as the report so well puts it on page 79, they realized the dream of the fathers of confederation by filling in the vast open spaces of Canada and building on this settlement the economic structure which developed into the Canada we know to-day.

The report states:

> The wheat boom had finally brought the realization of the economic objectives of the confederation scheme. The northwest was settled and the federal government was able through its policies and projects, to ensure expansion in the older communities of Canada on the basis of that settlement. These communities, restricted by the exhaustion of their own frontiers and confined to a precarious dependence on their own foreign outlets, received a new stimulus from the highly specialized exporting industry on the prairies which had become the country's principal economic contact with the external world. Wheat transformed the static and isolated regions into an integrated and expanding national economy. The rising prosperity which accompanied this growth in interdependence fortified the political structure of confederation with a common material interest and a national spirit such as had never existed before.
> In this atmosphere of large plans and their successful execution, Canadians began to believe themselves to be a great people. Thir work in creating the west gave them that sense of common achievement which marks a nation. They were proud of what they had done, and this gave them confidence in the future. Sir Wilfrid Laurier merely echoed a widespread conviction when he proclaimed that the twentieth century belonged to Canada.

[Mrs. Strum.]

These people who made Canada into a nation, who built the great structure, the financial structure, the economic structure which opened up the agricultural lands and established Canada's great export markets are to-day the old age pensioners. These are the people to whom we are now saying we cannot afford to give more than this miserable pittance of a few dollars a month.

We must remember that seventy years ago we had no transcontinental railway. The expansion of Canada and its great economic, financial and transportation systems took shape in this period. To me it is inconceivable that we should deny that the pioneers of this country have the right now to honourable superannuation. It is unthinkable that we should take care of the members of the House of Commons through a tax-free raise of $2,000 a year and of the incomes of the members of the Senate through a raise of $2,000 a year without tax exemptions and at the same session deal with an increase in the salaries of judges, and then accept the mere assertion of the Prime Minister, the leader of the Liberal party, that we have too much business and that it is now too late to deal with this until next year.

Coming to another matter, I should like to reply to the statement of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) in reference to income tax exemptions, at page 3480 of Hansard:

> Tax exemptions in Canada are higher for both single and married taxpayers than in the countries where they have labour governments, higher than in the United Kingdom, higher than in Australia, even after the cut announced Friday, or in New Zealand; they are also higher than in the United States, and with the further exemptions which will be made effective from January 1, 1947, they will be very much higher than in those countries.

I wish the minister were in his seat at the moment. The other evening he gave me an opportunity to ask a question, but I declined in favour of making a more complete statement during the course of these remarks. There is no doubt in my mind that all hon. members are proud to be members of the Canadian parliament and citizens of Canada, but that should not blind us to what is going on in other countries. Nor is it sufficient reason for indulging in statements to the effect that we are the wisest, the greatest, the most politically sagacious country in the world. It is very easy to tack "in the world" on the end of every statement; you are almost sure nobody will have time to look it up, but I submit it is a dangerous practice. On other occasions I have felt that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has attempted to compare our position with that of New Zealand on a basis that does not permit of comparison. For instance, to me it is meaningless to compare a country the size of the province of Saskatchewan with a country the size of Canada, because that is what you do when you compare Canada and New Zealand. The whole Dominion of New Zealand comprises an area comparable not with Canada but with Saskatchewan; and out of that you must take a mountain range which runs the length of the southern island and which they call the southern Alps. The whole of New Zealand is just a pocket edition of the Dominion of Canada. It has a population of 1,500,000 compared with our 12,000,000. We have rich mineral deposits. We have aluminium, iron, gold, silver and asbestos, to name just a few. They have practically no mineral wealth at all. We have great resources of oil still undeveloped in the Alberta tar sands, in addition to the Turner valley development. They have no oil at all and must import every drop. We have rich deposits of coal in Cape Breton, soft coal in Saskatchewan and hard coal in Alberta, to mention just three instances. They have very little coal. Their one abundant source of power is hydro power; but again with our great power resources and our potential hydro development we have a very great advantage. We have great timber lands in spite of the waste and lack of conservation measures. They burned their timber in the first days of settlement in order to clear the land for agriculture. When I visited there in 1939 they showed me with pride their great housing projects, and I blushed when they told me they were built with Canadian timber while we were doing nothing of the kind here.

Not only is the basis of comparison ridiculous, but there is no comparison in social security benefits. I should like to read into Hansard a statement with regard to the taxes and benefits enjoyed by the people of New Zealand, as at July 2 of this year, coming from the office of the high commissioner of New Zealand. I want to preface this with a statement of the benefits they enjoy under their social security tax, because, while they have two kinds of taxes, income tax and social security tax, they really do get something for those taxes. Here is a list of the benefits they receive: free treatment in public hospitals; free treatment in mental hospitals; free treatment in maternity hospitals; free medical attention; free medicine and surgical appliances; a sickness benefit of £4 weekly if the husband is ill or £2 weekly if the wife is ill; an unemployment benefit of £4 weekly for a man and his wife and an additional £1 if there are two children; universal superannuation at sixty-five years of age at £50 yearly for man and wife without means test, increasing by an additional £5 every year until it amounts to £4 weekly or £208 yearly, or alternately £4 weekly for life at sixty years of age for a man and wife with generous means test; permanent invalidity benefits to the husband of £4 a week; permanent invalidity benefit to the wife of £2 a week. If the husband dies the widow receives £2 a week; and in all the above instances the payment of family allowance of 10s. a week for each child continues.

I must say that according to the figures coming from the office of the high commissioner, the statement of the Minister of National Health and Welfare that our family allowance payments are the highest in the world is hardly correct. In New Zealand, evaluating their pound at $3.60, the amount paid for two children in family allowance payments is $187.20, as compared with $144 in this country for two children. That does not bear out the statement that our family allowances are the largest in the world. Then, if both parents die, the orphan children are entitled to receive up to 15s. 9d. weekly, and there are other benefits too numerous to mention; massage, X-ray and so on, to which a family of four would be entitled in return for their payment of social security tax. In addition, every family of four is guaranteed by the state a yearly income of not less than £260, or $936. That is interesting, because there they have put a floor under family income.

Then all social security payments received by the family are exempt from taxation; and here is an interesting statement. Again and again we have been told that our price control is the best in the world, but that is not so according to a statement released by the international labour office. They say the cost of living is considerably less in New Zealand than in Canada, that the cost of food and other necessities would give New Zealand an index figure of 100 and Canada a figure of 170. Those are the figures of the international labour office, which is a non-political, completely impartial organization.

What do the people of New Zealand pay for this blanket social security programme? When I was there in 1939 they were just beginning to enroll every man, woman and child for purposes of registration. No matter what happens to you, whether it is illness, accident, unemployment or any other disaster that may overtake you, in New Zealand you are not now an object of charity. You are not a beggar, because your income is not allowed to go below the minimum standard of $936 for a family of four, regardless of what happens to you. Of course you pay. No one has ever said that anyone can get something for nothing. But the first £300, or $1,080, is exempt from income tax. The man or woman who receives that pays a social security tax. As a matter of fact, he or she pays various items in social security taxation. He pays 7½ per cent to the social security fund, and this amounts to $88.20. I have worked this out on the basis of $3.60 to the New Zealand pound. Then he pays another 2½ per cent levy to the national security fund, making another $27. This means that he pays $115.20 for his social security benefits. But he does not yet begin to pay income tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member is referring to a married person.

Mrs. STRUM: Yes, with two children. Let us take the £500 wage-earner who is married and has two children. At $3.60 to the pound he now earns $1,800. He begins to pay income tax on the portion over £300. On the first £100 he pays $45 income tax. On the next £100 he pays $49.50 income tax. He pays his social security tax. His total of all taxes amounts to $306.

He gets his family allowance payment of $187.20 for his two children. Out of his $1,800 earnings, after the payment of all taxation, and after adding on his family allowance payments, he gets $1,681.20. I think hon. members will agree that to get that much protection for the cost I have indicated is a pretty good bargain.

By the same token I have always felt it is unfair to make a flat statement in regard to Australia or Great Britain on the basis of our position at the end of the war. The great continent of Australia suffers a natural disability in that it has a fringe of settlement around the edge of a great and terrible desert. The settlement in Australia along the fringe, where 7,000,000 people are scattered along the rim of coast line, makes a terrific problem in connection with the building of railways, transportation, government and national unity. The fact that Australia followed the lead of New Zealand in electing a C.C.F. government—they call it a labour government—has brought them, too, into the orbit of criticism. The distance from markets suffered by both Australia and New Zealand is a natural disability we are apt to forget. Our wheat crosses the Atlantic ocean to reach the European market. But let me remind the house that the cheese, butter and frozen mutton from Australia and New Zealand must pass over the equator and across the Pacific. It is nineteen days by boat from Victoria to Auckland. They come by way of the Panama canal, which makes the time of passage somewhat shorter. The fact remains, however, that they must cross the equator, the Pacific ocean and the Atlantic ocean if they are to put their goods on the markets of the world.

To compare Canada with Great Britain at the end of the war is to reach the height of absurdity. Great Britain not only proved to be a haven for thousands of refugees—a responsibility, by the way, which we refused to undertake—but was also a target. We are told that a third of all the homes in England suffered during the war either partial or complete destruction. Their lands have been heavily damaged by enemy bombing. They have had many millions of pounds worth of assets destroyed. They are forced to seek loans and credits abroad, and must recover their export trade as best they can.

How can we compare Canada with Great Britain at this time? Yet, in spite of their difficulties, in spite of their losses, they are now planning to build 4,000,000 homes. They are planning to cover their people with a complete programme of social security, which will start with the cradle and end with the grave.

I have referred before to the speech of Sir Wilson Jamieson given in this building, when he outlined the plan of health services for the people of Great Britain. Every man, woman and child, regardless of ability to pay, will have everything that science and medicine can offer, including the services of specialists and of blood transfusion units. Surely it is beside the point to make these comparisons.

In this whole problem we must remember that the government of Canada has not yet decided to raise money by any means other than taxation. We cannot blame the Minister of Finance for regarding taxes as the only source of income because, as he has said, and as other members of the government have said—and correctly—that is the method the country chose when this government was returned to office.

But the governments of Australia, New Zealand and Great Britain, countries, in which the people love democracy in the same way that we love it, have decided to carry democracy one step farther. In England they are going to take over the great utilities and sources of wealth for the benefit of all the people, not just for the bondholders and shareholders. In this way they are using social ownership as a means of obtaining revenue to supplement taxation. So that they are able now to launch these great housing projects and social security schemes

We have not yet decided to do that. In the Ottawa Journal of July 4 we find a glaring example of government policy. This press clipping tells about the discovery of a great iron deposit, a rich find to be developed by a United States company. To me this part of the article is most interesting:

Mr. Babcock explained that the iron deposits which assayed from 52 to 60 per cent in richness, were of a freakish nature, as a result of volcanic eruption and he gave full credit of the initial discovery to Dr. T. L. Tanton, of the Department of Mines and Resources in Ottawa.

And so the people of Canada pay to have these iron deposits hunted out. Then we hand it over to United States capital! The report says:

There was no Canadian money involved. Private money from American capital was being invested, and there would be no stock put on the market.

So that our Canadian deposit of iron, discovered and paid for in its initial stages by the Department of Mines and Resources, is now to be turned over to United States capital, and no Canadian will hold even a share. That is a typical example of Liberal policy—and of Conservative policy too, because the Tories have advocated consistently that the government should have nothing to do with the operation of mines, utilities, resources or industry of any kind. Their attitude is that as soon as possible the government should retire from this field. And, of course, the government is retiring as fast as possible. This was pointed out yesterday by the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) when he referred to the liquidation of holdings of War Assets corporation which had been acquired through the operation of industry in war time. We have been accused of having dropped our socialist principles and being absorbed by the Liberal party because we support some government measures.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mrs. STRUM: Of course that is a Tory idea, but neither the Liberals nor the C.C.F. are fooled. They know and we know that the great dividing line between the C.C.F. and the two old parties is this problem of social ownership; they know that is where we part company. We believe that the wealth of the country should be owned by the people of Canada and that this social ownership should take three forms.

First, there should be social ownership through cooperatives and, second, social ownership through municipal bodies. One of the best examples of this that I know of is the city of Regina which owns its own power company, streetcar lines, bus lines and water supply. If you go to Regina you can ride on the streetcar for a five cent fare. If you studied the financial statement of the city you would find that these utilities put a million dollars into the treasury last year. That is money that will not now have to be raised by a levy on the taxpayers of the city.

In addition to cooperative ownership and municipal ownership, we should have provincial ownership and federal ownership of the great facilities which extend from coast to coast. We shall have it because the people of Canada are not stupid; they are learning from the other members of the commonwealth how government can serve the needs of the people.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I have not prepared a speech, but there are a few remarks I should like to make with reference to the budget and to some of the things that have been said by previous speakers. I shall not attempt a financial analysis of the budget but will leave that to the experts. There are one or two things for which practically everybody in Canada condemns this budget. According to my own correspondence, the first is the taxation of low incomes. I think all Canadians agree that there should be a taxation exemption of $2,000 for married people and $1,200 for single persons.

According to my correspondence, which is quite heavy, another bone of contention is the taxing of private business and cooperatives. According to what the C.C.F. say, apparently we should discriminate against private industry becaue it is being carried on for profit. What in the world else does anybody carry on business for? Show me a farmer who says that he is not farming for profit and I will show you a farmer who has escaped either from a lunatic asylum or a penitentiary. I have farmed myself for thirty-five years and I do not think I am much below the average where the question of morals is concerned.

If it can be shown that cooperatives are being carried on without profit, then I agree that there is nothing to tax. But if it can be shown, that cooperatives use their profits—I do not know of a better term—in order to expand their business, then I cannot see why private business which does the same thing should be discriminated against, merely because of a sophistry that the one carries on for the benefit of the people while the other carries on to make a profit.

I have pointed out before in this house that the whole idea of profit is based upon a hope that an undertaking will be profitable because it will supply a public need. Unless a business is supplying a public need, it is not likely to be profitable unless it is in the nature of a monopoly. We social crediters are absolutely against the idea of monopolies and we do not see that the cure for private monopoly is to create public monopoly. To my way of thinking, both are evil and both should be avoided at all costs.

I think all Canadians will agree with what was said so eloquently by the previous speaker about old age pensions, not only for the old but for the blind and unfit. I have not the time to go into this matter in detail, but I wish to say that old age pensions should not be fixed on the basis of money. To me the whole question is: Can we or can we not produce sufficient goods in Canada to supply the old, the infirm and the blind with enough properly to feed, clothe and shelter them? If we cannot do that, then it is time we stopped talking about the marvellous richness of Canada. Personally I do not think there is any question that Canada can produce ample food, clothing and shelter to look after our old and infirm people in a decent and proper manner.

Before we export goods to foreign countries by means of long-term credits, we should look first to the old and needy in our own country. Exporting our production under long-term credits is pure inflation. If the government's object is to defeat inflation, why do we have such propaganda as is carried on by the Canadian soviet friendship council to encourage the exporting of goods to Russia on long-term credits?

I have not the time to deal with more than one or two items of unnecessary government expenditure. I should like to refer, first, to the film board, which, I understand, has 700 employees and whose sole purpose is propaganda. I take it that the people of Canada, the grown-ups, the adults, like the people of any other country, want to be amused, entertained by the radio. They do not need to be educated, they do not need to be instructed, and of those who say they do I would ask: Who is to do the teaching? Who is to do the instructing? I believe that the film board and the Canadian Broadcasting corporation have for years been the means of spreading communism, and that is very largely owing to their propaganda that we have the situation that we undoubtedly have in Canada at this time. Do not let anybody make the mistake of thinking that when we have rounded up the last of the spies, that is the end of communism and the end of traitors in Canada.

[Mr. Jaques.]

With regard to the C.B.C.—I have already referred more than once to its red network—I should like to quote a letter from a constituent of mine:

Dear Sir:

We are to-day registering our very great disapproval to the Prime Minister of the allocation of time by the C.B.C. to the different parties, especially to our own social crediters. The idea of putting social crediters in the same category as these "adjective" communists burns us up.

I want to make the strongest possible protest against this time given to the Labour Progressive party. Here we have an organization which has been identified by the royal commission as a spy network, beyond question working to undermine and destroy this country, the Labour Progressive party. They have not a member in this house. The one member they did have is now in prison for treachery. They do not run a single provincial government. The social crediters have thirteen members of this house, and for ten years they have conducted the government of the province of Alberta. Yet we get only the same amount of time as is allowed to the communists, the fifth column Labour Progressive party. There is something wrong somewhere and I want to make the strongest protest I can make against that. It is about time that we cleared off the C.B.C. speakers like Raymond Arthur Davis, Elmore Philpott and others and put on a few patriotic Canadians, instead of the agents of Moscow. It is not altogether fair to blame the spy ring—and they have not all been caught either. For years there has been propaganda, advocating the surrender of Canadian sovereignty. I have brought attention to it myself in this house. I can remember the film, "Mission to Moscow", which was introduced by the Prime Minister of this country (Mr. Mackenzie King) as the truth at a mass meeting in Maple Leaf Gardens, Toronto. That film has since been proved to be a lie from start to finish—pure propaganda from Moscow. That is one instance of it.

This Canadian soviet friendship council is another. That was identified last February, I believe, by the police as part of the spy ring, and I wrote a letter of protest against the council. But since then they have held meetings in the various provinces for the purpose, as they say, of promoting friendship with Soviet Russia, but the real purpose, of course, is to sell communism to the people. Not only that, but those meetings have been sponsored by the leading people of the provinces, from the lieutenant-governor down to the local mayor.

Coupled with that is the Canadian Zionist league. I say, coupled with it, because the directors of one are the directors of both. One begins to see the real aims of the Canadian Zionist league. Personally I have never been able to see the difference between communism and fascism, and I do not believe there is any fundamental difference between them. Let me quote Friedrich A. Hayek on that point. In his book, "The Road to Serfdom," he says, at page 184:

> And, undoubtedly, not merely the ideas which in Germany and elsewhere prepared totalitarianism but also many of the principles of totalitarianism itself are what exercises an increasing fascination in many other countries. Although few people, if anybody, in England would probably be ready to swallow totalitarianism whole, there are few single features which have not yet been advised by somebody or other. Indeed, there is scarcely a leaf out of Hitler's book which somebody or other in England or America has not recommended us to take and use for our own purposes. This applies particularly to many people who are undoubtedly Hitler's mortal enemies because of one special feature in his system. We should never forget that the anti-Semitism of Hitler has driven from his country, or turned into his enemies, many people who in every respect are confirmed totalitarians of the German type.

Put into plain English, I take that to mean this. Fascism you can describe as Gentile communism, and communism you can describe as Jewish fascism. I believe that is as near as you can get to it.

So far as the socialist ideas expressed by hon. members to my right are concerned, may I say that I have been familiar with socialism for thirty years or more, and I have not in the slightest degree altered my opinion that private enterprise, when it is not controlled, when it is not allowed to become monopolistic, when it really is private enterprise, has and does and will produce a far higher standard of living than any planned production that has yet been thought of.

Mr. MacNICOL: You are correct.

Mr. JAQUES: The whole case of socialism to-day is based on the false picture that is being painted of Russia—I have not time to go into it—but communism is the logical end of socialism. Communism is Marxism, the ultimate achievement of Marxism. As somebody has said, communism is merely socialism in a hurry. The information I get from my relatives in England—and I am happy to say that I have quite a number of them still living—is that they are not at all satisfied with the treatment they are getting at the present time from their Socialist government. I happened to read in the paper just this week that thousands of housewives paraded to parliament to protest against bread rationing.

Mr. BRYCE: Blame the Winnipeg grain exchange.

Mr. JAQUES: No, I will not blame the Winnipeg grain exchange, not in the slightest. If you want to know whom I blame, and whom I think the world will blame and, in fact, is now blaming, I will tell you. The basis of the protest of these people in England is this. They do not mind tightening their belts to feed starving people, but they are beginning to doubt in their minds as to who is getting the food which would otherwise be theirs. They do not trust the distribution; they begin to see that there is a lot of Strachey communism mixed up in it.

In closing, I cannot let this occasion pass without a reference to the late General Mihailovich, who was shot this morning. I made reference to General Mihailovich when I spoke on March 25 of this year. I then said as reported in Hansard, at page 238:

> I am going to say a word on behalf of General Mihailovich, who, I am sorry to say, has been captured. I know the stories that have been told; I know the other side, too. Let me quote a statement of the British ambassador to Yugoslavia, which is good enough for me.

I then quoted the ambassador as follows:

> All the accusations of the partisans that Mihailovich is a fascist, collaborating with the occupational forces, are completely unfounded, and spring entirely from the efforts of the partisans to blacken Mihailovich among the Serbian population, and frustrate him when the moment comes to seize power in the country. General Mihailovich from the beginning of the struggle has loyally collaborated with the allies and no one can doubt his loyalty as an ally or as the representatives in the country of the Yugoslav government.

The statement then was doubted by some, but Tito has condemned himself by speaking the truth at last. In a Reuter dispatch from London, dated July 15, he is quoted as saying this:

> The trial showed there is not only unity among the reaction but also among all democratic forces. Mihailovich associated with all forms of reaction at home and abroad. He did not shrink from having connections with the Catholic church, with the Croat peasant party. It was a coalition of reaction, and this coalition was defeated.

Yes; it was a Christian and a nationalist who was shot this morning; and my answer to Tito and all the rest of the bloody murderers is this: I will quote a little Christianity to them, not that I think it will do them any good. It applies as well to all totalitarians, to people who, when they meet opposition, have only one remedy, and that is to liquidate it, as millions have been liquidated in Europe since the war started, as they are still being liquidated, and as we shall be liquidated if those devils ever get the upper hand in this country.

I saw something of these "Reds" in the United States a week ago. I was guest speaker in the city of St. Louis at a mass meeting called in the interests of Christian nationalism. It took 700 policemen to keep order and preserve freedom of speech in the city of St. Louis. The deputy chief of police came to our hotel and told my wife and myself that he would afford a proper escort for our car between the hotel and the auditorium. We had four police cars, and when we arrived at the Kiel auditorium there were 3,000 communist pickets outside the building trying to get in to break up the meeting. It took 470 policemen in uniform and 200 in plain clothes to restrain them, and the deputy chief of police told us that in reserve they had a gas-bombing squadron in case the thing got out of hand.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. JAQUES: It is no laughing matter. We were told that the communists had sworn that this meeting would not be held. Thanks however to the police of St. Louis, we held our meeting of 800 people without a single interruption.

But let me finish by quoting, for the benefit of the Titos, the 44th verse of the eighth chapter of the Gospel according to St. John:

> Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do. He was a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth, because there is no truth in him. When he speaketh a lie he speaketh of his own; for he is a liar, and the father of it.

On motion of Mr. Jaenicke the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, July 18, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. FRASER—REJECTION OF QUESTIONS SUBMITTED FOR ORDER PAPER—STATEMENT OF MR. SPEAKER

Mr. SPEAKER: The question of privilege raised yesterday by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) is very important as it bears upon one of the main privileges of members of parliament, namely the right to seek information on matters of administration for which the government is responsible to the House of Commons.

The hon. member sent in for the order paper a series of questions inquiring as to the number of motorcycles declared surplus by the army and air departments and asking how many of these vehicles had been disposed of through War Assets Corporation. The officer of the house whose duty it is to see that such questions are in order pointed out to the hon. member that the information sought could be obtained from the special committee on war expenditures and economies which was appointed on March 22 by the following resolution:

> That a select committee be appointed to examine the expenditure defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament for national defence and demobilization, and for other services directly connected with the war, including the disposal of surplus war assets, and to report what, if any, economies consistent with the execution of the policy decided by the government may be effected therein . . .

It seems, therefore, that the committee is the proper authority from which the information should be sought in connection with expenditures for defence, demobilization, and —please note—"for other services directly connected with the war, including the disposal of surplus war assets." The hon. member's questions come within the purview of the committee's powers. It is a well known principle in parliamentary procedure that the house cannot deal with matters referred to committees until those committtees have completed their work and reported to the house. I see in "May's Parliamentary Practice," 14th edition, recently published, the following as a type of question enumerated as being out of order:

> Dealing with matters referred to a royal commission or with matters before a parliamentary committee or with matters within the jurisdiction of the chairman of a select committee or the authorities of the house. No question can be asked regarding proceedings in a committee which have not been placed before the house by a report from the committee.

Moreover the chairman of this committee on war expenditures and economies, the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) has invited all the members of the house to ask questions dealing with matters referred to the committee. On March 26, as reported in the minutes of the proceedings of that committee, he said that the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) had asked to appear before the committee and follow up a question placed on the order paper; and he added:

> You are all familiar as to the answer given by the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) yesterday, that Mr. Fleming would have the opportunity of asking the question before this committee. I have given this matter some thought, and I am just offering this to you as a suggestion, not as a ruling. I am going to suggest to you that you give Mr. Fleming an opportunity at once to place his questions on file here with a view to having them answered, but in the future I am going to suggest that other members of parliament who are not members of this committee should pass along their questions either to the chairman or to another member whom they may select to place them before the committee. I think that in fairness to the members of this particular committee, Mr. Fleming and others should follow that suggestion so as to give our own members an equal opportunity to have questions answered which they have in mind and have had in mind for some time. There are some questions that Mr. Probe, Mr. Stewart and Mr. Shaw had before the committee last year that have not as yet been dealt with. I feel in fairness to them that my suggestion should be followed. Is it your pleasure that we hear Mr. Fleming to-day with that understanding as to future members?"

The motion was carried; the hon. member for Eglinton thanked the chairman and submitted a series of questions. This was good parliamentary practice. A matter cannot be before a committee and before the house at the same time; and the proceedings of a committee should not be interfered with by answers to questions and reports laid on the table of the house.

In disallowing for the time being the hon. member's questions, I fully realize that his right to seek information is unimpeachable, but I am merely pointing out to him that he is following the wrong procedure. It is his privilege to file his questions with the chairman of the war expenditures and economies committee. I would therefore ask the hon. member for Peterborough West to try the committee, and if he does not succeed there, he will be free to adopt any course which will be open to him under the rules of the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think perhaps there is another matter to be considered. In view of the importance of the decision which Mr. Speaker has just rendered, may I be permitted to say one word with respect to it, before seeking to appeal to the house with respect to Your Honour's ruling?

Mr. SPEAKER: I must say to the hon. member for Peel that the hon. member for Peterborough West rose yesterday on a question of privilege. If the hon. member will look at standing order No. 12 he will find that it states this:

12(1) Mr. Speaker shall preserve order and decorum, and shall decide questions of order, subject to an appeal—

And so on. I have made a statement in answer to the hon. member for Peterborough West respecting his question of privilege. It was not a ruling on a point of order. Since no point of order was raised, there is nothing before the house. The hon. member knows very well that when the hon. member for Peterborough West rose yesterday it was on a question of privilege. Therefore I do not believe any debate is permissible, and moreover, there can be no appeal.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was seeking to say a word in this connection, with Your Honour's consent, because it is an important matter. I shall try to be constructive in what I say. I should like very much to be able to say a word about it.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question? Did you make a ruling, or did you make a suggestion to hon. members in the house as to what would be good procedure?

Mr. SPEAKER: I tried to be very clear. I said that I was not making a ruling, because no question of order was before the house. The hon. member for Peterborough West rose on a question of privilege, and I told him that I would answer his question to-day. As a consequence of that I made the statement to the house as to what would be good procedure. Now, if the hon. member for Peel wishes to say something I might listen to him, but I give no guarantee that I will let him enter into a debate on the subject.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, I wish only to make a constructive suggestion. In our opinion this is a very important matter, one which goes to the very root of the rights of hon. members of the House of Commons, namely that of asking a question at the proper stage. I point out to Your Honour, with great deference, that in applying common sense to the rule affecting questions asked in the house respecting proceedings before a committee I believe Your Honour should not go so far as to rule out any questions asked in the House of Commons just because a committee might have jurisdiction to deal with a wide variety of subjects. There is a vast difference between the proceedings currently before a committee, and the jurisdiction such committee may exercise, which may never reach the points of questions the hon. member for Peterborough West or other hon. members may ask here.

The other point is this, if I may say so, that if that ruling were adhered to—and I am hopeful that Your Honour, with your usual fairness, will not hold us too closely to it—

Mr. COLDWELL: He has not ruled.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think he has, if I may make that reply to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). Such a ruling would mean that I as a member of the House of Commons, but not a member of the committee on veterans affairs, could not ask a question as to the number of overseas men still to come back to Canada. If this ruling were followed, I could not ask such a question. The same would apply to questions respecting the Department of National Defence. Every question respecting veterans affairs would fall into the same category.

While I do not wish to take up too much time, this is an important matter and I hope that what I say will be accepted by Your Honour as a constructive suggestion. If this ruling were followed no question could be asked on the whole matter of industrial unrest in Canada until the committee brought in its report. In all fairness to hon. members who are not members of that committee, surely we cannot go so far as to adopt a rule which would debar them from asking such questions.

The other point is that perhaps some day the estimates of all departments will be referred to standing committees. That has been suggested, and it may be that the rules committee will follow the suggestion in its report. But if that is done I would point out to Your Honour that from that day forward you might as well wipe the order paper clear of all questions, because an hon. member would never be permitted, as an ordinary member of the house, to ask a single question if he were not a member of that committee. It seems to me that this interferes with the rights of hon. members who are not serving on committees. If one is a member of a committee he can ask questions; but one cannot attend before all committees. If an hon. member has five questions to ask, he cannot be on five different committees at one time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: Before sitting down I should like to say one word further.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, if the government is going to take the position that you cannot—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I object to the hon. member's charging the government with having taken a position. The government has not taken a position on this.

Mr. GRAYDON: The government is taking a position. The very fact that you are standing up in the house is an indication that you are taking a position.

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. GRAYDON: I will not sit down for you or anybody except His Honour.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: And you are one of the worst offenders, too.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member will admit, I think, that I have given him plenty of latitude.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Until he was railroaded.

Mr. SPEAKER: That statement is unparliamentary. Order.

Mr. IRVINE: We cannot hear what you are saying, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. IRVINE: Disorder!

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member will admit, I believe, that a ruling by the Speaker is not a matter of giving Mr. Speaker's own interpretation, or his own ruling, to the house. Rather it is a matter of following the practice and the rules of the House of Commons, as laid down. In my statement I took the trouble to quote May. I do not believe any hon. member will doubt the authority of May on these subjects. In his 14th edition he states:

> Dealing with matters referred to a royal commission or with matters before a parliamentary committee or with matters within the jurisdiction of the chairman of a select committee or the authorities of the house. No question can be asked regarding proceedings—

Mr. GRAYDON: "Proceedings".

Mr. SPEAKER:

> —in a committee which have not been placed before the house by a report from the committee.

So far as this question is concerned, I have read also to the hon. member part of the proceedings of a committee where the chairman of the committee gave permission, not only to hon. members serving on the committee but to every hon. member in the house, to put questions before it.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker, have you given a ruling?

Mr. FRASER: Mr. Speaker, I think you have suggested what I should do. May I now ask you if I may place these questions on the order paper?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have told the hon. gentleman what he should do. I consider the incident closed, and we should carry on with the business of the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are we to be permitted, sir, to appeal from your ruling on this matter?

Mr. FRASER: Mr. Speaker, the reason I asked—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have been very generous with hon. members. I told them at the beginning that the statement was not debatable and that there could be no appeal. I have given an opportunity to the hon. member for Peel to make a statement, despite the fact that this is not debatable. I think my generosity might be taken into consideration, and I would ask—

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, I desire to appeal from your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: Presenting reports by standing and select committees.

Mr. GRAYDON: We desire to appeal from your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have decided that no member can appeal, because it is not a decision, it is a statement. It was not a ruling that I gave, because I had no point of order before me.

Mr. FRASER: I cannot get satisfaction—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FRASER:—from the committee, and that is why I inquired whether I could place them on the order paper.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: We are bound by British parliamentary practice. We shall soon need a police force in here.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member knows the rules of the house and understands perfectly well the difficulty the Speaker may have in enforcing them. I hope no hon. member will act in such a way as to oblige the Speaker to use the power that he has to keep order and decorum in the house.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. FRASER: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: There can be no point of order because there is nothing before the house.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to appeal your decision.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a question of privilege. On several occasions during this session I have submitted questions to the Clerk with the idea of getting certain answers from War Assets corporation. They have been returned to me with the statement that these matters must come before the committee. These matters have not been brought before the committee, because you have no chance with the present government majority.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I will ask the hon. member to resume his seat.

Mr. CHURCH: Parliamentary government is now at an end here.

MR. STEPHENSON—ANSWER TO QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. C. E. STEPHENSON (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege with reference to the accuracy of the answers given to certain questions which I placed upon the order paper. On Thursday, July 11, an order of the House of Commons was tabled in answer to questions which had been standing in my name since May 27, 1946. Two of these questions were as follows:

1. How many houses are being built on No. 2 highway near Port Hope under the Veterans Land Act?
2. When will they be completed?

The answers tabled were as follows:

1. Four.
2. Houses are completed except for hardwood flooring, which is now being laid, and electrical connection with the hydro-electric power line.

My question of privilege is this: We in this house should be able to rely upon the accuracy of answers tabled in the house; yet a personal inspection of the houses in question made on Sunday, July 14, after the reply was tabled, showed that the houses are by no means complete, having nothing inside them except the studding and sub-floors. The following yet remains to be done: Wallboard, with the exception of one house, has not been completed; no plastering, painting, cupboards, doors, plumbing, trim and many other items necessary to make the structures complete. I would like an explanation of these inaccuracies and a proper reply to my question tabled.

Mr. SPEAKER: Presenting reports by standing and select committees.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has asked a question and he has a right to an answer.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will realize that we have not yet arrived at the period for questions.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker, this is not a question that is on the order paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to resume his seat.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STEPHENSON: I would like to ask the responsible minister, or in his absence the Secretary of State if he has any comment to make on the question I raised previously, with regard to the inaccuracy of a return brought down in answer to a question of mine.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): The hon. member for Durham is well aware that the minister responsible for the veterans housing is not in his seat, nor is his parliamentary assistant. I shall be very glad to call the attention of my colleague to the remarks that have been made to-day, and I am sure that he will make a statement at some later date.

[Later:]

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak to a question of privilege. I was detained on other duties at three o'clock when the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Stephenson) raised a question regarding certain replies to questions he had asked in the house. I made an immediate investigation of the situation, because my right hon. friend who sits to my left (Mr. Howe) said he would refer the matter to me.

I find that there was certain justification for the hon. member's complaint. Officials of the department in making reply confused the Bowmanville project with the Port Hope project, and the reply to question 6 in regard to the Port Hope project was incorrect. I apologize at once to the hon. member and the house for the misinformation inadvertently conveyed by the officials of the department.

MARINE AND FISHERIES

First report of standing committee on marine and fisheries—Mr. Reid.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. SPEAKER: Questions.

Mr. HOMUTH: In view of the fact that when the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Stephenson) criticized the answers he had received you referred him to the question period, I would ask you, sir, —

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. member that it is the practice in the house for members to ask questions of ministers before the orders of the day are called.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker, you—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. HOMUTH: —asked the hon. member—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to resume his seat, and I hope it will be the last time.

DEATHS FROM CANCER AND OTHER DISEASES

REVISED EDITION

WAR ASSETS—SALES OVER $4,000 TO FIRMS, CORPORATIONS OR INDIVIDUALS

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. To what firms, corporations or individuals in (a) Ottawa; (b) Montreal; (c) Toronto; (d) Winnipeg, have surplus (1) scrap metal; (2) plumbing fittings and fixtures; (3) electrical equipment; (4) trucks; (5) passenger cars; (6) tractors; (7) machine tools and equipment; (8) aircraft engines; (9) non-ferrous metals; (10) clothing, been sold by War Assets corporation or War Assets Limited in excess of $4,000?

2. What is the value of the sales made to each of such firms, corporations or individuals as of April 1, 1946?

3. Which of the above firms, corporations or individuals are classed as "recognized dealers" by War Assets corporation?

Mr. SPEAKER: Stand.

Mr. FRASER: This question has reference to War Assets corporation, and it appears on the order paper. Why not mine?

Mr. SPEAKER: Stand.

Mr. FRASER: May I have an answer?

Mr. SPEAKER: Stand.

RADIO BROADCASTING—STATIONS CKY AND CKX

Mr. THATCHER:

1. Have the licences of radio stations CKY, Winnipeg, and CKX, Brandon, been cancelled or relinquished?
2. If so, at what date?
3. If not, what is the present status of these Stations?

Mr. SPEAKER: Stand.

Mr. FRASER: This concerns the Canadian Broadcasting corporation, which is before a committee too, Mr. Speaker.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

PATENT INSTITUTE—REPRESENTATIONS TO SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. During the past year has the Secretary of State received a memorial from the council of the Patent Institute of Canada?
2. If so, upon what date was the said memorial received?
3. What steps have been taken by the government to institute any or all of the reforms outlined in the said memorial?

CANADIAN INFORMATION SERVICE

COORDINATION OF AND ASSISTANCE TO GOVERNMENT INFORMATION SERVICE

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to establish a Canadian information service for collecting and distributing abroad information concerning Canada and to coordinate and assist the information service of the government and to provide for payment of salaries of staff and expenses of the service from moneys appropriated by parliament.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Mr. CHURCH: The department should be abolished. It is an expensive luxury.

Motion agreed to.

EMPIRE TRADE

REPORTED MEETING THIS AUTUMN ON QUESTION OF PREFERENCES

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): May I be permitted to answer a question submitted yesterday by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). The question was as follows:

I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. A Canadian Press dispatch published this morning indicates that a conference may be held this fall to consider the whole question of empire trade preferences. Will the minister make a statement in that regard?

The answer is as follows: There have been no arrangements made for a commonwealth conference on empire trade preferences this fall. The conference scheduled for this fall is that to which the Prime Minister made reference in his answer on July 5, which is to be found at page 3205 of Hansard of that day, to the question addressed by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), namely, a preparatory committee meeting of the economic and social council in London on October 15, the purpose of which is to explore the general principles of the proposals for the expansion of world trade and employment put forward by the United States.

It is expected that negotiations on tariffs and preferences will be held in 1947 and that these will include commonwealth discussions on preferences.

Mr. HOMUTH: May I ask a supplementary question? In view of the fact that the United States loan to Britain has been approved by congress, with certain considerations attached respecting tariffs—between Britain and other countries, have they any effect at all on the tariff situation between Canada, Britain and the United States?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The matters of tariff arrangements and preferences are scheduled for discussion at the conference which was originally called by the United States government and which has now been taken under the aegis of the economic and social council of the united nations.

BEEF

REVISION OF SCHEDULE OF PRICES AND GRADING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MARK C. SENN (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, under whose department the wartime prices and trade board operates. The daily newspapers of yesterday carried an announcement that a revision of the schedule of beef prices and grading allows an increase in the wholesale ceiling prices on red and blue brand beef, effective July 22. Has any provision been made to allow those with slaughter permits where no official grading is possible to enjoy these increases in price? This is urgent, Mr. Speaker, because the changes go into effect on Monday next.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I received no notice of the question and therefore am unable to answer it at the moment. It will be necessary for me first to make some inquiries, but I shall try to see that the answer is given to-morrow.

WHEAT

ONTARIO WINTER WHEAT POLICY, 1946-47

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a brief statement on the Ontario winter wheat policy.

During the crop year 1945-46, Ontario winter wheat was sold at a ceiling price of $1.26 per bushel for No. 1 Canada eastern winter wheat, basis delivered at Montreal. There was an appropriate flour ceiling. Producers were also given the proceeds of an Ontario wheat equalization fund, arising from collection of an equalization fee on the exports of Ontario winter wheat flour. To place a floor under these prices, the Canadian wheat board was empowered to buy No. 1 Canada eastern winter wheat at $1.25 per bushel, basis delivered at Montreal. No purchases by the board were necessary, because commercial interests bought the wheat at the ceiling price.

It had originally been intended to raise the ceiling on Ontario wheat to $1.35 per bushel for the crop year beginning July 1, 1946, and to permit a corresponding increase in the domestic price of winter wheat flour and the products thereof, but in view of recent developments in price control policy this step is not being taken. Instead producers will receive at time of delivery an additional nine cents per bushel which will be paid by the Canadian wheat board on behalf of the government.

In addition, the wheat board will pay to producers at time of delivery an amount of five cents per bushel in lieu of any payment from the equalization fund that will be operated as before with the government absorbing any profit or loss therein. By this payment at time of delivery, the difficulties and expense of making a subsequent small payment will be avoided. It is felt that this system will be more satisfactory to the producers.

The net effect will therefore be that producers of Ontario wheat will receive, in addition to the price paid by the purchaser under the existing price ceiling, an amount of 14 cents, nine cents of which represents the equivalent of an increased price and five cents of which represents a fixed and final payment out of the Ontario wheat flour equalization fund. The Canadian wheat board will continue to maintain a floor at $1.25.

I should perhaps add, for the sake of clarity, that no adjustment is being made in the price ceiling on Ontario wheat or products made therefrom.

Mr. HOMUTH: The minister in his statement referred, I think, to a ruling of the wartime prices and trade board. What was that ruling? Perhaps the minister would clarify that part of his statement.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): There was no reference in my colleague's statement to a ruling by the wartime prices and trade board. There was a reference to recent developments in price control policy, and the reference there was to the statement I made recently that having already made a number of changes and taken a number of articles out from beneath price ceilings, and having also made an adjustment of the Canadian dollar in terms of the United States dollar, we intended now to hold the line and did not feel that we could do it if we permitted an increase in the ceiling on Ontario flour, but that rather we would adopt the subsidy method to bring about the same result.

Mr. WRIGHT: In view of the increased domestic price just announced by the minister for Ontario winter wheat, has he given consideration to increasing the price for western wheat used for milling in Canada?

Mr. MacKINNON: That and other matters relating to the production of wheat in Canada are at present under discussion.

CIVIC HOLIDAY

INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT STATUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): In view of the new order in council respecting holidays, may I ask the Secretary of State what is the present status of civic holiday, the first Monday in August? Is it to be just a provincial holiday?

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State): That is a civic holiday.

IMMIGRATION

FIANCEES OF CANADIAN SERVICEMEN SEEKING TRANSPORT TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Mines and Resources. Has an office of the Canadian wives bureau been opened at The Hague? If so, is it not possible for this bureau to assist the fiancees of Canadian servicemen as well as brides who are seeking to come to Canada?

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): There is a Canadian wives bureau stationed at The Hague, under the jurisdiction of the Department of National Defence (Army), which deals with the wives and dependents of servicemen. There are a great number of them still over there, and as I indicated on Tuesday last we are endeavouring to speed up the facilities in order that these dependents may be brought to Canada. I hope that will be in a very short time. It is also true that a number of Canadian servicemen have become engaged overseas during the war, but I would point out to the hon. member that it would not be possible, without the creation of hardship and hard feelings, to give the fiancees a preference over the wives and children of servicemen who are still over there. As a matter of fact, just before I came down to the house I replied to a letter of one hon. member who had asked about the wife and children of one serviceman who wished to get them over here, and pointing out the difficulties. The department is very anxious indeed to relieve the anxiety of any Canadian citizens who are in the position indicated by the hon. member.

Mr. CHURCH: I hope the minister will give consideration to immigration from Britain, as he promised to do a month ago.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

[Mr. MacKinnon.]

MEDICAL INSPECTION OF IMMIGRANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources. By what definite dates do the government expect to set up medical inspection facilities in Europe for immigrants and fiancees, with special reference to Holland and Italy?

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): I cannot give any definite date. I have had an officer in Paris inspecting with regard to accommodation there. I am also informed that there is great difficulty in obtaining it, and I made a statement on the subject in answer to a question which the hon. gentleman asked me before, with regard to the facilities, which will be found in Hansard of Tuesday last.

Mr. CHURCH: What arrangements is the minister going to make with regard to immigration from Great Britain?

Mr. GLEN: We have no objection to persons coming in who are medically inspected and satisfy the requirements of the regulations and will not be a charge on the country.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION—SOUTHAM NEWSPAPERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct to the Minister of Labour a question with respect to the dispute between the international typographical union and the Southam newspapers? Is the minister taking any further steps to bring the parties together? What are the prospects for an early settlement of this dispute?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): As the hon. member has said—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I rise to a point of order. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that on the ruling made a moment ago, that question cannot be asked or answered, because there is a committee sitting.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that you did not make a ruling; you made a statement to the house and requested hon. members to be governed by your advice. Is that understanding correct?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is correct. I have said two or three times that I did not give a ruling. I made a statement.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the Minister of Labour answer my question?

Mr. MITCHELL: Certainly I will answer the question.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I hope the hon. gentleman will help the Speaker to keep decorum and dignity in this house. It is the privilege of a minister to answer an oral question or not to answer it if I permit the question to be put by the hon. member; yet if the minister does not want to answer it he does not have to do so.

Mr. HOMUTH: He is out of order if he does so.

Mr. GRAYDON: If the minister answers this question we are going to ask to have our question answered. You cannot make fish of one and flesh of another.

Mr. MITCHELL: If I—

Mr. GRAYDON: At your own risk.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let us for once act like grown-up men.

Mr. SPEAKER: I suggest to the hon. member that he prepare his question for the order paper, and we shall see then if it can be put.

Mr. KNOWLES: Apparently the minister is ready to answer the question. I suggest he be allowed to go ahead.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to accept my suggestion. I have asked the hon. gentleman to prepare his question for the order paper and submit it to the proper officials, and if it is in order it will be put on the order paper.

Mr. KNOWLES: We might as well go home.

Mr. FRASER: You can see how ridiculous the whole thing is now.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Wednesday, July 17, consideration of the motion of Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. MacInnis.

Mr. F. E. JAENICKE (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues in this group have covered practically all our objections and the particularly weak points in this budget, as far as we view these points in the light of our platform and in the light of the economic and social principles which we believe will lead to security and the happiness of the vast majority of the Canadian people.

I wish to deal particularly with the budget proposals as they affect the farmer, and particularly the farmer in the west. It seems to me that in most countries, in most civilized countries in any event, the farmer is always the forgotten man, at any rate if we consider the broad principles of economics as contained in the national budget. The only provision in this budget concerning the farmer as such is the resolution that the farmer shall be allowed to average his income over a period of three years. While I am thankful for this concession, it is but a small dose of relief. The constituency which I have the honour to represent is purely an agricultural area. In my business and profession as a lawyer I represent farmers exclusively, and during the long years of practising my profession I have acquired an intimate knowledge of the farmer's business and especially of his financial and economic difficulties.

I may say that there are a large number of farmers in my constituency who are paying income tax, and it is a matter of very vital importance to them, especially during the last two years. During the parliamentary recess last winter I had occasion to talk to my constituents, my farmer constituents, about income tax in general. I heard numerous complaints and suggestions about farmers' income tax, and I have compiled these into six points which I shall place before the house and upon which I shall elaborate. I may say that these points, although I endorse them fully, are not my own but are those of the farmers in my constituency, and I deem it my bounden duty as their representative to place them before this house and before the minister.

Here are the points:

1. The farmer does not mind paying his share of the national tax load by way of income tax, provided that it is fairly, justly and equally imposed.

2. He thinks that, because of the whims of nature—his is a very hazardous business, giving him a bountiful crop one year and practically nothing another year—his income should be averaged over a period of at least five years.

3. The form of income tax returns which is required to be completed needs the employment of a bookkeeper and should be simplified.

4. The actual assessments are delayed too long.

5. Additional exemption should be allowed to a farmer who has the help of his wife and of his children, without whose help he could not have the income on which he is taxed.

6. Some of his old debts should be allowed as deductions.

The first point I mentioned was that the farmer does not object to bear his fair and equitable burden, provided that he is satisfied that everyone else carries his load. The fact is that the farmer is not satisfied that everyone bears his fair share. A farmer who makes his return every year, because he has been requested to do so, has a feeling that some of his neighbours escape the arduous duty of filling in that form and of paying the tax. Of course he does not know, and often his suspicion is unfounded and the neighbour whom he suspects of delinquency may think the same of him. But in our province of Saskatchewan I am sure the tax-paying farmer knows that some persons are not making returns and are not paying their taxes, because they boast that they are not doing so; and some of these persons are the Saskatchewan taxpayers association—not to be confused with the income tax payers association. So far as I can gather, the officers of this association, and especially the secretary, claim that under our constitution as it stands, or as it should stand, according to his contention, the dominion has no authority to collect income tax. I offer no opinion on this question, because, I mention later, the matter is sub judice, and being a lawyer I have the greatest respect for judicial decisions. So far as I am concerned the question has already been decided. It was decided in 1924 by the privy council. The fact remains, however, that many people, especially farmers, because of the feeling that the tax is not fairly and justly borne rather than because of the intricate constitutional question, have joined the association. This has gone on now for almost two years, so far as I can find out, and only within the last month has action been taken against the secretary. He advised me that he had been prosecuted last month and was defending the case on the constitutional ground. Yesterday I saw a clipping in the Saskatoon Star Phoenix reporting that his case came up last Friday and was adjourned again because apparently the attorney general for Canada had not yet acknowledged his notice that the constitutional question was to be raised, although he had received an acknowledgement from the attorney general of the province. This man is defending himself. I do not know whether he is without the means to retain a lawyer, or whether he is unable to get a lawyer to review the matter and give an opinion. In any event, as I say, this man is defending his own case and his defence should be facilitated by the Department of National Revenue to bring the issue to an early conclusion.

I do not know this gentleman personally, and have never approached him by letter—that is the secretary of the association, Mr. Smith. But he saw the press dispatch in the Saskatoon Star Phoenix dealing with the answer I received from the ministry to a question I placed on the order paper three months ago, pertaining to the refusal of persons to file income tax returns on constitutional grounds. The question and answer will be found at page 421 of Hansard. I did not refer to the Saskatchewan Tax Payers Association in that question, by the way. However, he wrote to me, after seeing that press dispatch in the Saskatoon paper, and he states in part:

> Just to keep the record straight, the Department of National Revenue have not to date proceeded against any member of our association. Numerous threats have been received. No action has been taken. We requested that the department produce its source of authority. They seemed reluctant to state.

Before I had time to reply to the letter, I had another from Mr. Smith dated April 8, 1946, in which he stated in part:

> As the income tax division here in Saskatoon have been sending out multigraphed forms threatening to sue our members, it was necessary for us to get a form letter multigraphed to answer them. Enclosed is a copy.

The multigraphed letter form, of which the department must have received scores, perhaps hundreds, reads:

> The inspector of income tax, Federal Building, Saskatoon, Sask. Attention Mr. W. S. Mackenzie.
> Dear Sir:
> Re Income Tax
> I am a member of the Saskatchewan Tax Payers' Association which was organized last year to bring to the attention of the legislature the advantage and desirability of the province repossesing all rights to the collection of income tax. The dominion-provincial conference adjourned February 7 last without reaching a decision on this question. Prime Minister W. L. Mackenzie King in a letter to us states "that this matter has been referred to the Department of Justice for consideration and attention."
> As the premiers are to meet again this month I am awaiting the results of this conference before making returns to your office.
> I am, sir,
> Yours truly,

I repeat, I offer no opinion on the constitutional question involved. I complain, however, that this matter has been allowed to drag along for almost two years, creating doubts in the minds of people, especially the farmers. In view of the publicity which the association has received in the Saskatoon paper about its contention, without action being taken to decide the issue, these doubts were reasonable doubts and I cannot blame any layman for joining the association if it offered some relief in respect of a tax which he feels is not justly and fairly borne by all the people. Likewise in one large area in my constituency the feeling of unfairness is particularly strong. It will surprise some members of the house to learn that there are several farmers in that portion of my constituency who were subject to excess profits tax, and they may still be in that category, although in last year's budget some relief was granted them by the amendments to the excess profits tax legislation. These cases, I admit, are rare. However, here is an example. One farmer had an income a few years back of a little over $19,000. This is not excessive, because he farms over six sections with a cultivated area of over 4,000 acres. The minister took everything from him except $5,000. That is, on an income of a little over $19,000, he paid more than $14,000. He is one of the finest patriotic gentlemen I have ever had the pleasure of meeting. He did not complain because the tax was high, but he said in discussing his plight with me that he would not object if industry, especially monopolistic industry, bore a like burden, and he pointed to concessions by way of accelerated deductions in depreciation given to the Aluminum Company of Canada and other monopolies which are mostly foreign-owned corporations. He referred me to the capital gains made during the war by large industrial corporations after payment of taxes. No wonder the farmers are bitter about income tax.

I admit that this farmer is a fairly large operator, but being unable to replace worn-out machinery and to make depreciation deductions for machinery because it is too old, he is now faced with the necessity of acquiring new equipment as soon as it is available. But he was not allowed to set up a reserve in order to purchase the new equipment he now needs.

While this feature of the excess profits tax was eased somewhat, the feeling persists, and I believe rightly so, that the farmer, after many years of crop failure and disastrous economic conditions, is not fairly treated as compared with industry.

My second point is that the farmer should be entitled to average his income over a period of five years instead of three, as proposed by the minister. That period of three years may be sufficient to meet the needs of the farmer in the east, where the weather is not as capricious as it is on the prairies. Let me give one concrete example. A farmer in my constituency, who did not think he was liable for income tax because according to his bank account he was going into the hole, was finally requested to make returns for 1942, 1943 and 1944. It took us a period of several months to get all the vouchers and accounts ready. The matter is now settled and this is the position. In 1942 he operated at a loss of $1,160.28. He is a fairly large operator. In 1943, when most of his 1942 crop was marketed and when his 1943 crop was completely hailed out, his net income was $2,591.81, and in 1944 his net income was $1,180.29. He was not taxed. He is a married man. The inspector did allow the 1942 loss to be applied on the 1943 income, which left a small taxable income of $1,431.56 for 1943. As I have already said, the 1944 income was not taxable. The big headache comes in 1945. In that year he marketed almost $11,000 worth of cattle; and he was obliged to do so, not by choice but rather by force of circumstances. In the fall of 1944, just when he had a bunch of cattle ready to take to market, a bottleneck developed in the packing plants and he was not able to sell his stock until early in 1945. Later that same year he had his regular allotment ready for market, and sold them. Then in the fall he found that because of crop failure in that particular district, resulting from drought, he had insufficient feed to carry all his cattle through the winter, and he was forced to sell a large number which he had intended to keep until 1946. So in one year he had to sell cattle which should have been sold over a period of three years. If you keep in mind his returns for the previous three years, it seems to me only just and reasonable that a farmer in this position should be allowed to average his income over a period of five years rather than three.

I venture to say that similar cases and similar circumstances can be duplicated a hundredfold. I can give the minister all the particulars and references in this case if he desires them. I dare say he has received numerous requests and resolutions from farmers and farm organizations asking for the five-year average. I sincerely believe the request is reasonable, and I trust the minister may give the matter further consideration and amend his resolution on that point accordingly.

My third point is the simplification of returns. I admit that the blue form on which a farmer computes his income is not complicated, and that with the records of his grain marketing permit book he can pretty well establish his gross income. The deductions, however, are a different matter. Very few farmers keep books; it just is not in them. It is not that they are incapable of doing so, but they simply do not have time. Usually the farmer buys practically all his necessary supplies, his main supplies which cost a great deal of money, during his busiest season, when he is seeding, summer fallowing, harvesting, working from sunrise to sunset; when he has to rush to town for the necessary repairs in order to keep his outfit going, and at night he is too tired to make bookkeeping entries of the amounts he expended during the day. Over a period of days and weeks I have spent hours assisting farmers to complete their income tax returns. I have asked them to gather up their vouchers, accounts and so on; then, after spending two or three weeks on it and getting the form finally completed, a little later the farmer finds this cheque or that receipt, the particulars of which he forgot to give me at the time. Some suggestions have been made to me in this connection. The farmer says he wants a simplified form, and there is at least one suggestion that I think has some merit. I should like to submit it to the minister in the hope that it might be applied at least to western grain farmers. Instead of itemizing his expenses, as he is now required to do, allow the farmer a flat reduction of a certain amount per cultivated acre, in which amount would be included all the necessary expenses and deductions which must now be itemized. I think with the assistance of organized agriculture and our agricultural colleges—that is, the departments of farm management of our colleges—the officers of the Department of National Revenue could arrive at some fair and equitable figure. It might have to be varied according to the size of the farm and the district or location, and according to the rise and fall of the cost of supplies the farmer has to buy, but I do not think any of these obstacles is insurmountable. I believe this suggestion is worth a trial on an optional basis at least, just as the "average" feature proposed by the minister is to be optional, if I understood his explanation aright.

The fourth point I have enumerated is the complaint that the assessments are too long delayed. I presume that is a general complaint and does not pertain only to farmers. I maintain, however, that it affects the farmer more than anyone else because of this lack of bookkeeping to which I referred a few moments ago. A person has a feeling of confidence when he has made his return and paid his tax, but this feeling is dissipated when three or four years later an assessment notice is received stating that large sums of money are still owing the Minister of Finance. In one case which has come to my notice, after some further assessments were made requiring the payment of several hundred dollars in addition, considerable correspondence ensued and at one stage the inspector asked this man to submit a statement of assets and liabilities from 1938 to date. Surely that is an impossibility for a farmer who keeps no books, at least as far as the earlier years are concerned. I would plead with the minister that if necessary a larger staff be employed in order that the assessments can be completed more quickly and the taxpayers may know exactly where they stand.

The fifth point concerns a matter that has been drawn to the minister's attention not only in this debate but in debates on numerous other subjects in this house; for instance, in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It refers to exemptions for a farmer's wife, at least in cases where part of the income is derived from dairying and poultry, and also where the children of the farmer are helping, without remuneration, in the accumulation of the income that is taxed. I endorse whole-heartedly and fully the very able argument presented a few days ago by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) in connection with this point. I think it is only fair, especially in view of the fact that agriculture is not yet receiving the share of our national income to which it is entitled.

The last point I enumerated concerned itself with the farmer's debts. In the first place I contend that he should be entitled to deduct in any year capital payments in respect of a mortgage or purchase agreement covering the half section of land on which he makes his home. I think it is pretty well agreed in western Canada that the smallest farm unit on which a farmer can make a decent living for himself and his family is 320 acres. I say that with the proviso that there should be parity prices, which the farmer does not have to-day. In some districts in the west even a half section would not be enough land.

Secondly, in view of the difficulties the farmers experienced prior to 1938, I think they should be entitled to deduct the old debts which they pay off. I believe it should be the policy of any government to assist farmers to get out of debt entirely. I know of no better class of consumers than the farmers, and a debt free agricultural class—and I mean just that, a debt free class—would be reflected in our whole economy by an increased home consumption of our industrial production, which has been emphasized by previous speakers in this debate. Let us do everything in our power to make agriculture debt free, though our present system of taxation is going a long way to prevent such a desirable end being achieved.

No doubt the minister and some hon. members will contend that my suggestions constitute a plea for special privileges for the farmers as a class. I do not admit the truth of this, but even if that argument should have some validity I think the suggestions made would work to the advantage of our whole economy; and I repeat that I know of no better way of distributing purchasing power than through the farmers. Furthermore I maintain that agriculture has been, is now and for some time to come will be the basic industry in our economy, and a prosperous agriculture will ensure prosperity for the whole of Canada. Then we must consider the uncertainties and hazards which agriculture has to face. There is the weather. In later years aviation has concerned itself a great deal about the weather, but the farmer has been battling and matching wits with the weather man ever since the dawn of history. There is hail, wind, frost and drought which are capable of destroying a whole year's hard labour. In the west we fight grasshoppers, gophers, sawflies, cutworms, rust, diseases of animals and diseases of plants. Nature seems to be full of these tricks, for no sooner have we built up a defence against these pests than some new ones come along. Then there is always uncertainty of the market and the future in general.

I think the farmer in his highly hazardous and speculative industry needs these considerations in relation to income tax liability. In addition he should have further protection of parity prices. I contend that these are not special privileges, but simply compensation for the extraordinary hazards of the farmer's highly important industry.

We had considerable discussion about parity prices at the last session, with everyone having a different idea as to what parity prices really meant. I confess the question has become confused. My rough idea on parity prices is that the farmer should receive his fair share of the national income. If the farming population of Canada comprises thirty per cent of the total population, agriculture should receive thirty per cent of the national income, or as near as possible to that percentage. I shall be frank to admit that this formula could only be a basis for computing parity prices for agriculture, but upon that basis I think the amount can be ascertained.

Of course the cost of production and the farmers' cost of living will have to be taken into consideration. In this connection I should like to mention tables contained in the Economic Annalist, which is a pamphlet received by all hon. members. It is sent to us by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), and upon it I wish to commend him highly. It is a splendid pamphlet, worthy of the study of every hon. member. In it is a table showing the rise and fall of agricultural prices as against the rise and fall of the cost of living and the cost of the goods and services the farmer has to buy. This table is confusing because the prices the farmer receives are based upon the index number 100 for the year 1926, while the cost of living and services and supplies the farmer has to buy are based upon the index number 100 for the years 1935 to 1938. But even at that, a close study of this table will convince hon. members that because of the rise in the cost of living and in the goods and services the farmer has to buy, his income is slipping, and he is not as well off to-day as he was a year ago. I have some interesting, indeed astounding figures to present, which prompted my making this plea on behalf of agriculture for consideration of their plight as income tax payers, and of their request for parity prices.

The 1945 "Year Book" goes back only as far as 1942 in its quotation of production figures. On the basis of 1942 figures the farmer received roughly eighteen per cent of the value of our national gross production, while the farming population comprised roughly twenty-seven per cent of the total population. Although there has been some increase in the prices of farm products since that time, I think the comparable percentages have not changed very much. The figures based upon national income are substantially the same, or perhaps lower, so far as the farmer's percentage is concerned, because of late he has received no advance in the price of the products he sells while, as I said, his cost of living and costs of production have undoubtedly risen.

One would assume that the per capita production in Canada by provinces would follow a similar trend, and that the provinces which are mainly concerned with agricultural production would all be on the lowest rung of the ladder. Such however is not the case. In fact the table at page 182 of the latest edition of the "Canada Year Book," the one for 1945, provides some startling information. This table shows per capita production in Canada in 1942, by provinces, and is as follows:

Ontario	$651 18
Saskatchewan	582 56
British Columbia	574 74
Alberta	566 77
Yukon	566 49
Quebec	491 25
Manitoba	407 79
Nova Scotia	297 24
New Brunswick	276 21
Prince Edward Island	237 83

It will be noted that Ontario stands first and Saskatchewan second. According to these figures of per capita national production one would imagine that Saskatchewan, which stands second on the list, would come pretty high in income tax payments, which give us an idea of national income. Rather the reverse is true. According to statistics supplied me by the dominion bureau of statistics, I have computed the per capita income tax paid by provinces, averaged over the last four years. The latest year for which I can get figures is 1944-45. With these figures we arrive at the following results:

Yukon	$202 90
Ontario	168 00
British Columbia	142 00
Quebec	118 00
Manitoba	72 80
Nova Scotia	56 10
Alberta	42 20
New Brunswick	45 10
Prince Edward Island	20 70
Saskatchewan	16 60

It will be noted that the Yukon stands at the top, and that poor Saskatchewan comes in last. While we are second in production, we are right at the bottom of the list when it comes to income tax. In this connection I think of the reference made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) when, as reported at page 3221 of Hansard, he said:

> I commend this particularly to the hon. friends to my left, many of whom come from Saskatchewan, because that province probably is the most individualist and the most capitalist province in the whole dominion, composed as it is largely of farmers.

In view of these figures I am sure the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario and I must differ as to just what a capitalist or a capitalist country is. Saskatchewan's production and income is over seventy per cent agricultural. Perhaps the percentage is even greater, because all of us live on the proceeds of agriculture. From the figures I have just placed on record one would conclude that Saskatchewan farmers pay less income tax than farmers in other provinces. Figures supplied by the bureau of statistics, however, prove the opposite.

A few days ago the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) read a newspaper dispatch which contained information similar to that which I now have before me. These figures are based upon the 1942-43 assessment of income tax, by provinces, paid by farmers. The rest of my figures are on the 1942 basis. The following figures, however, give the assessment of farmers for income tax by provinces:

[Mr. Jaenicke.]

	No. of taxpayers including farming corporations	Total Income Assessment	Total Tax Assessment
New Brunswick ..	11	$ 21,978	$ 459
Prince Ed. Island	12	38,333	1,539
Quebec	72	232,325	5,205
Nova Scotia	17	78,266	5,690
British Columbia .	240	644,999	43,876
Manitoba	392	679,600	34,661
Alberta	497	1,244,534	63,113
Ontario	784	2,152,823	79,834
Saskatchewan	1,544	3,585,810	205,835

Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island farmers paid a total of $92,727 as against Saskatchewan's $205,835. The case I quoted a little while ago of the farmer who had paid $14,000 in income tax illustrates the fact that one farmer in Saskatchewan paid more income tax than all the farmers of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec put together.

Mr. BROOKS: Can the hon. member tell us what prices were obtained for the products of the Saskatchewan farmer as compared with the prices in the other provinces he has mentioned? I think that is the only way to get a fair comparison of what income tax should be paid.

Mr. JAENICKE: I am not prepared to answer that question at the moment. Some figures were given a short time ago by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) showing that the price of Ontario winter wheat was just about the same as the price of wheat in Saskatchewan, with the exception that the Ontario farmer had less freight to pay. The farmers of Saskatchewan paid $205,835 as against $234,377 paid by the farmers of the other eight provinces. Out of a total of 2,025 farmers who were assessed, more than 75 per cent or 1,544 lived in Saskatchewan.

It seems to me that there is something wrong with our agricultural economics or with our treatment of agriculture, and that a bold approach to tackle the problem will be necessary to assure the farmer a just and equitable share of our national income. The suggestions which I have made are one little step in the right direction, if they are adopted. Outside of a few isolated cases our farmers, especially those in Saskatchewan, need better homes, better sanitation, better comforts, better schools and more of almost everything before they can be said to have the same standard of living as the average urban resident.

It is said that the farmer is a perpetual grouser, but since before the feudal system he has had a right to grouse. According to the hon. member for Renfrew North (Mr. Warren)

the eastern farmer apparently has no complaint. The hon. member said last year in a speech in the house, as reported on page 2560 of Hansard:

We eastern farmers have no expectation or hope of ever getting rich.

It is not a question of acquiring riches; it is a question of getting out of debt and having a decent standard of living as compared with the rest of the population. He had some disparaging remark to make about his brother farmers in the west and their "whining." The last Economic Annalist, to which I referred a little while ago, contained a table on page 44 which brought back to my mind the speech made last year by the hon. member for Renfrew North It gives the details of the subsidies paid by the Department of Agriculture during the calendar year 1945. When I computed the per capita figures for each province upon the basis of the agricultural population I found that the provinces received the following per capita subsidies during the last year:

Ontario	$45
British Columbia	40
Alberta	27
Quebec	26
Prince Edward Island	19
Nova Scotia	19
Manitoba	16
New Brunswick	15
Saskatchewan	15

In this instance I can tell the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) that Saskatchewan and New Brunswick seem to be on the same level. I am making no complaint about this apparent disparity and inequality in governmental paternalism, but I do wish some hon. members, including the hon. member for Renfrew North, would take these matters into consideration before they make speeches in and out of this house about the western farmer whining for this and whining for that when all he asks is a fair deal. I repeat: Direct your policies toward creating a debt-free agriculture, and a lot of our economic difficulties, especially those of consumption of our industrial output, will disappear.

Mr. IRENEE HAMEL (St. Maurice-Laflèche): (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have a few remarks to make in connection with this debate. The Canadian ratepayer is greatly disappointed with the 1946-47 budget. He had expected that, in view of the considerable increase in the cost of living, especially from 1941 to 1946, the income tax exemption would be made applicable to incomes of $1,200 for single persons and $2,000 for married people, effective from April 1st 1946. This has not been done. The government could have relieved the Canadian people much more than they are doing, by curtailing the expenditures of some departments. I am amazed at the way the estimates are apportioned between the various departments.

We have a $2,769 million budget; of which $1,500 millions are for demobilization and reconstruction, while 593 millions are earmarked for the Department of Finance. This amount of 593 millions includes 481 millions for interest on our public debt.

Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit that reforms are needed in our financial system. The interest paid on the cost of public works, that is if projects carried out by our governments, whether federal, provincial, or municipal or by our school boards, is too high. I am agreeable that capital invested in useful private ventures invoking some risk should bring a reasonable return, but when it comes to the financial requirements of the government, our country's economic system should enable the latter to obtain the funds needed for just about the equivalent of the administrative costs.

Another department where an inquiry is particularly needed is the Department of National Defence. The minister (Mr. Abbott) requires for the administration of his department during 1946-47 a sum of $488,600,000, which sum is, of course, quite apart from the 525 millions requested by the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Expenditures of $488,200,000 for the army and for demobilization in this second peacetime year! To me this seems too much, especially when I scrutinize the various items. Here is the approximate break-down of those expenditures: Salaries, wages, pay and allowances, over 200 millions; transport of personnel and goods, 41 millions; furnishings, food and medical services, 37 million dollars; munitions, weapons, vehicles, 100 million dollars.

Mr. Speaker, I have brought these figures to the attention of the house and the public to show what becomes of our people's money and to prevent that essential social reforms be blamed for the heavy burden placed on the weary shoulders of the disappointed taxpayers.

As for cooperative associations, the sound representations which the various interested parties have made to me show how touchy this problem is, since we are asked to referee a struggle between interests that feel they are both opposite and legitimate. A basic factor must be our guide in these matters, and that is the general interest. The function of the state, Mr. Speaker, is to endeavour through legislation, to ensure the people they are called upon to administer, the greatest possible degree of earthly happiness, and one of the essential elements of such happiness is the highest possible standard of living compatible with the economic possibilities of our country.

There are, without question, two ways of doing this: first, to raise the people's income; second, to bring down the cost of living. Now that is just what true cooperatives are striving to do. Through the elimination, as far as possible, of certain powerful middlemen who generally go in for speculation, the producer unquestionably gets better prices. For the consumer, on the other hand, and especially the industrial worker, increased buying power means that he is better able to obtain the necessities of life.

Mr. Speaker, cooperatives have prospered, especially among our people, because of the concern over the exodus of farmers to the cities. In 1937 and 1938, prominent sociologists made a survey of the exodus from the farms. They thus investigated 161 localities of the province of Quebec, and their findings are quite interesting even though alarming. Out of 161 localities they visited, the average family income was less than $600 in 126 municipalities. It was on the strength of those findings that our best sociologists urged the intensive development of our cooperatives.

What a sad and grave mistake it would be, Mr. Speaker, through arbitrary and meddlesome legislation, to interfere with the development of co-operatives which have been such a boon to our farmers and industrial workers. Besides, the various individuals who have submitted to us documents complaining of the cooperatives do not represent the mass of the people.

I have here a list of companies who sent briefs against the cooperatives to the royal commission. It includes 200 insurance companies, food trusts and corporations like the ABC Packers and the British Columbia Packers Limited. I humbly submit that only a few big speculators can suffer from the intensive development of cooperation. For that reason, any legislation which interferes with the expansion of cooperatives is objectionable.

My final remarks to the house bear upon the problem raised by dominion-provincial relations. On that score we are radical autonomists and we believe that any attempt by any federal government to reduce the prerogatives of provincial legislatures is a step towards the eventual disintegration of the federal compact. Our country cannot reasonably hope to become a unitary state. Two fundamental reasons will always prevent this, namely, the diversity of its population, and the vast expanse of its territory.

[Mr. Hamel.]

Since 1760 one has found in this country citizens of different racial origins, different philosophical ideals, different religious convictions, that is a state of things which will last for all time. In order that legislation may adapt itself in so far as possible to the needs of these various groups, it must be passed and implemented by provincial authorities.

Moreover, it is extremely presumptuous to claim that this country may be administered from Ottawa since it is more extensive than Europe which numbers some thirty governments and since the United States require 49.

These two reasons, in evidence at the time of confederation, still apply and will hold good for all time. It is our duty, as was so aptly pointed out by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Dionne), to let the provinces look after their own obligations and sources of revenue. We have been given to understand that Ottawa seeks to centralize taxation so that it may meet dominion expenditures. This argument does not convince me since, looking over the budget now before the house, I find that out of $2,769 millions, a little over ten per cent, that is less than $300 millions are spent annually on the payment of family allowances, old age pensions and unemployment insurance benefits.

Mr. Speaker, if we wish our people to develop in a friendly and prosperous spirit within the scheme of confederation, we need fulfil only one duty, that is, carry out decentralization. On that condition only will life be tolerable for the various groups settled in this country.

Mr. D. S. HARKNESS (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say something about oil, not the kind that is frequently spread in this chamber, but the kind that comes out of a hole in the ground.

The only direct reference to oil that I find in the budget speech is on page 2919 of Hansard, where the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) said:

> Other minor amendments to corporation income and excess profits taxes will provide for the extension for another year of the tax credits now granted in respect of exploration expenses incurred in the petroleum, natural gas and mining industries, with an adjustment in the amount of the credit appropriate to the reduced rate of corporation tax and an extension of a tax credit for expenditures incurred in deepening an existing oil well.

I am afraid that the second word of that paragraph, "minor", is only too strongly indicative of the attitude which this government has taken towards oil development and exploration and oil taxation generally.

Canada has been described as an oil-hungry nation. We produce only fifteen per cent of our requirements of crude oil, which is less than one per cent of the world's production, and we possess less than one-tenth of one per cent of the world's proven reserves. At the same time we are great users of oil, coming second only, on a per capita basis, to the United States among all the nations of the world. In spite of these facts the present budget does not contain the provisions which have been recommended by the oil men of the country to encourage the exploration and drilling programmes which are required to maintain our present production and discover new oil fields in the dominion.

In order to make the oil situation clear I should like to give a brief review of production in Alberta which is and has been for many years the chief source of oil in Canada.

In 1945 Alberta accounted for approximately ninety-eight per cent of Canadian production, excluding the northwest territories. In Alberta Turner valley has contributed 97·6 per cent of all the oil produced in the province from the start of the industry up to the end of 1945. In passing I may say that I exclude the figures for the northwest territories, where they produced 351,000 barrels last year and about 1,250,000 the year before, because that production was really a defence matter. The oil produced in the Northwest Territories can only be used locally, but of course it is very valuable there, close to where it is found.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the hon. member mean at Norman Wells?

Mr. HARKNESS: Yes. In Turner valley, gas seepages had been observed for many years before the first oil well was drilled. There are stories of cowboys and cattlemen in the early days who, when their business took them into that part of the country, would poke a stick into the steep side of Sheep creek and light a match to the gas which came out and cook their bacon and beans over the resulting gas fire. It may be a matter of interest that only last year I saw a small fire of this nature burning on a hillside a few miles north of the Turner valley townsite. It was these gas seepages which indicated the presence of oil and led to the discovery of the first Turner valley well, Dingman No. 1, which was drilled not far from the site of one of these gas seepages. This well struck oil in a shallow horizon above the limestone, in 1914, and started the first Calgary oil boom, during which, for a short period, every place of business in Calgary, practically, was an oil office, and fly-by-night stock promoters were collecting money in wastepaper baskets. This wave of get-rich-quick stock selling was rapidly ended by the first world war of 1914-18, and oil development languished for ten years, until the famous Royalite 4 well was brought into production with a tremendous flow of wet gas from the limestone. This started a second oil boom and, what is much more important, a great deal of exploration work and drilling, which resulted in a steadily increasing production. This development work was given tremendous impetus when the Home well, some four miles south of Royalite 4, in 1929 turned out a large producer and thus extended the field away to the south. The next few years were ones of steadily increasing drilling and production, with constantly improved drilling equipment and methods, which enabled deeper holes to be sunk. In 1936 Turner valley royalties well, some four miles south of the Home well, struck crude oil in the limestone, and the final period of development of the Turner valley field, as a crude producer in quantity, started. Three years later, crude oil was found in the far north end of the field, so that now production has been secured in an area over twenty-five miles in length.

During the thirty years during which oil has been produced in Alberta, approximately 81,000,000 barrels have been recovered from Turner valley, and approximately 2,000,000 barrels from the rest of the province. During this period, there have been drilled some 654 miles of well in the Turner valley, and something in the neighbourhood of 484 miles of well in the rest of Alberta. I give those figures in miles, because in that way is more readily realized, I think, the tremendous amount of drilling that went on, than if they were given in millions of feet. This has involved the drilling of over 1,200 wells, of which 460 were producers, 560 were dry holes, or dusters, and the remainder were dry gas producers.

I should like the house to note particularly that only 460 of these 1,200-odd wells were producers. In other words, the oil business is a very risky one.

I think we may now properly ask, how was all this drilling financed? Who was responsible for it? Why was it done? The answer is very simple. Initial production and most of the extension of Turner valley and the discovery of other fields were due to small companies, financed by small men in the financial sense, who were willing to take great risks with their capital in the hope of making large returns. After Turner valley had been proved as one of the great North American oil fields, large companies came into the field, and are now engaged in an extensive geological and geophysical survey of the foothills area of Alberta, as well as the plains of that province and of Saskatchewan, and as a matter of fact in other parts of the dominion—the maritimes and Ontario. However, the start and much of the important development of the oil business in Alberta were due to the "wild-catter," as he is generally called. It may also be proper to look briefly at the returns received by individuals and companies responsible for Alberta oil development. The amount of capital risked has been in excess of $150,000,000 and the returns less than $130,000,000, so that the major part of Canadian oil production has been secured at a loss of over $20,000,000 to the enterprisers responsible for it. Furthermore, as nearly as I can determine from examining the figures, all this loss, and more, is due to government taxation in one form or another.

Just at this point I might mention something about the contention of my hon. friends on the immediate left, the C.C.F. party, who in Alberta have been advocating the taking over of these oil wells, and as a matter of fact the whole business of oil development, by a government. I should like to point out that if that had been done the government of Alberta, the dominion government, or whoever had done it would now be many millions of dollars behind, because, in addition to the taxes they have collected which, had they been operating the industry themselves, they would not have secured, they would have had this further loss.

Mr. LOW: It was just for campaign purposes.

Mr. HARKNESS: As the hon. member says, it was just campaign literature.

Furthermore, in connection with the development of oil by a government or a government agency, I should like to mention briefly a little crown company called Wartime Oils, which the dominion government set up to drill wells in Turner valley, at a considerable loss to the dominion in spite of the fact that they were operating in a proven field.

The point I am getting at there, once more, is that the oil business is an exceedingly risky one, and I think we are extremely fortunate that we have men in Canada who will take the risks involved in putting up the capital required to discover what has been discovered. In view of the loss which has been incurred in searching for oil in this country, is it any wonder that the oil men are discouraged and that a full-out drilling programme is not in progress?

[Mr. Harkness.]

To show it is not, may I illustrate from the situation in Turner valley? When this session of parliament began there were thirty-two large rotary drilling rigs in the valley which had been used to drill wells there or other exploratory wells in the foothills. All these rigs were capable of sinking wells to the depth of 10,000 feet or more required in that area. Of these thirty-two drilling rigs only four are in operation and drilling; the remainder are sitting idle. Each of these rigs represents an investment of $150,000 to $200,000, or the twenty-eight sitting idle means between four and five million dollars of idle capital, all of which should have been at work twenty-four hours a day drilling wells and attempting to increase Canadian production. In addition, of course, there is a considerable amount of employment which we might have had and is being lost. Every-one of these rigs would be working if the tax structure were such as to encourage the oil men to drill; but as matters stand at present, only the large companies, whose revenues come largely from refining, and selling and distributing the products, and who own a number of wells now in production, can afford to operate. This is so because present tax credits and depletion allowances cannot be used by the smaller producing companies, or by prospective new ones, to anything like the extent or advantage that they are used by the large companies.

To illustrate what I mean, assuming that the present budget resolutions pass, let us take a company which secures an income of $1 million from producing wells in 1947. It has a depletion allowance of 33⅓ per cent, which leaves a taxable income of roughly $667,000. The thirty per cent corporation tax on this bill will give a tax bill of roughly $190,000. This company during the year drill one deep test well in the foothills area at a cost of $400,000, which is the normal cost, and if this proves to be a dry hole they get no returns. They are allowed fifty per cent of the cost of this well under the deep test drawback regulations, which of course would be $200,000—$10,000 more than their tax bill—and as a result, the company would pay no taxes. Further, of course, it means that the cost of this dry hole to the company was only $210,000.

Let us take a new company which is formed and which drills a similar well costing $400,000, which proves to be a dry hole. The cost is $400,000. They have no way of getting out of it. Similarly, a small company with an income of $100,000 a year from producing wells would have done the same drilling at a cost of $381,000. From that example we see clearly that the present tax provisions work out to the advantage of the big company but do not help the little fellow.

The plain truth of the matter, put as simply as I can state it, is that no encouragement is given to new capital to go into oil drilling enterprise, and the tax provisions are such that small companies with a limited income from production, or none, and with a fair amount of cash, are not in a favourable situation. There are many companies of that kind, which have no producing wells or only a very small income from producing wells, but from their production in the past they have a fair amount of cash. They are not justified, however, in risking that capital in an attempt to get new production at the present time. As a result they sit there and the drilling equipment is idle. They are doing nothing. Of course the ultimate position is that only a fraction of the drilling that could be carried out is going on in Alberta.

I should like now to make some suggestions to the minister as to how the oil business could be stimulated by government action. These suggestions are essentially those of the Alberta Petroleum Association, which includes in its membership practically all the independent oil producers of Alberta as well as the large companies. When we refer to the independents in Alberta we mean the small companies apart from Imperial, Standard, Shell and so on.

The first of these suggestions is the matter of deep test legislation. A tax deduction of fifty per cent is allowed for expenditures made in drilling deep test oil wells. This deduction is allowed only for wells in the foothills area which involve drilling to a depth ranging from 6,500 to 12,000 feet or more. These are the depths necessary. The oil men would like to see this interpretation of the tax provision changed to include the deepening of abandoned exploratory wells. The question I should like to ask the minister is whether the statement he made does or does not mean that. I am not clear on the point and I should like to have him answer that.

In any event, a considerable number of these abandoned wells did not reach the oil producing limestone, for one reason or another, and their inclusion in the tax deduction provisions would result in some of them being completed, any one of which might, if successful, give us another Turner valley. The oil men are anxious that the fifty per cent tax deduction be extended to wells drilled in the plains area, most of which do not go deeper than 3,500 feet and, for the most part, less.

The adoption of this suggestion by the government would do much to encourage drilling in the Alberta and Saskatchewan plains area. Why such wells do not enjoy this tax benefit I cannot understand, because an oil well at 2,000 feet is as valuable as one at 9,000 feet. I suggest that the government should do everything possible to get a large drilling programme under way on the plains where production has already been undertaken.

In 1945, in the plains fields of Alberta there were produced 630,000 barrels of oil, which went a considerable way toward offsetting the decline of nearly 900,000 barrels in Turner valley in 1945 as compared with 1944. At this point I would point out that Turner valley has passed the peak of production. That occured in 1942, and since that year it has been steadily and rather rapidly declining as an oil producer. It is for this reason particularly that it is so essential to open up new fields.

At the same time I wish to make it clear that the valley will produce a large volume of oil for many years to come under a favourable tax structure, and many more wells could be drilled there which would prolong the life of the field. As a producer, Turner valley compares favourably with the major United States fields, and as a result of its performance Canada since 1939 has taken second place in the British empire as an oil producer, and has also taken its place among the oil producing countries of the world.

Let me get back to my suggestions. The first is that the extension of the fifty per cent tax deduction to wells drilled on the plains and to completing abandoned wells will at once materially increase the number of wells drilled.

Secondly, there should be a greater depletion allowance. At the present time operators are allowed a depletion allowance of 33⅓ per cent. In the United States they are allowed up to fifty per cent and in no case less than a depletion allowance determined by the rate of production to available reserves in relation to the time of investment. This means that a company having no net income in any particular year is entitled to a depletion allowance and may carry it forward or backward to apply against future or past profits.

Some of our mines were at one time allowed a depletion allowance of fifty per cent and I understand that they are pressing strongly to have that restored. I would press strongly that the provision be put in for oil drilling whether it applies to mines or not. Mining is surely not as hazardous or as risky as drilling for oil. A mine is usually developed only after a large body of ore has been found, but the only way that oil is found is by the drill and there is always the possibility of a dry hole.

As an example of what the oil men face, even in a proven field, I would read a short paragraph from an issue of the Calgary Herald which I received yesterday or the day before:

> Foothills No. 24, recorded a pleasant surprise for oil men when it came in on what was considered the eastern limit of the north valley field as one of the valley's best, and at latest reports was doing nearly 800 barrels daily under unrestricted flow.
> Foothills No. 25 will be drilled immediately a quarter of a mile northeast. Drilling these wells is like walking a plank blindfolded. You never know when you will step over the edge. With the east extension wells you never know when you will have overstepped the fault block. You are dealing with the dark underground mystery of the Turner valley limestone. You are gambling a quarter of a million dollars that it extends one step more. You will have to go over the edge before you can afford to stop drilling.

There have been drilled in Turner valley, since it was proven as a major field, plenty of wells that did not come into production, or that did not realize production which amounted to anything. Then, even when the well is a producer, no one knows how long it will continue, or at what volume. Under the circumstances, I should think the oil drillers ought to be given greater depletion allowances than they have been allowed in the past, and in any event they should get as good a deal as United States operators get in their maximum of fifty per cent.

The third point is that all drilling costs, permit and leasing expense, geological and geophysical costs, etc., be allowed as deductions for tax purposes and, further, that these expenses may be claimed as and when desired, so that large expenditures over two or three years may be deductible when production is secured, and spread over that production.

The fourth point is that present income tax regulations covering exploration and development, which when the present budget is passed will expire on December 31, 1947, should be made part of the permanent tax structure so that operators may be able to make future financial plans under definitely known tax conditions. In the past the existing write-off regulations, depletion allowances, etc., have been subject to renewal, or not, from year to year. This has made for uncertainty as to what the position might be in future, and has discouraged the small operator particularly.

The fifth point concerns the removal of the subsidies now being paid on crude oil imported into the prairie provinces. The Alberta Petroleum Association contends that to a large extent these subsidies were passed on to the railway companies, and that they have resulted in an artificial depreciation of crude oil prices. They believe that the subsidies should be removed and that Canadian crude oil should be allowed to reach its true economic level. Further, they contend that this will not result in any price increase to the consumer if at the same time the government removes the war-time tax of three cents a gallon on gasoline. In fact, some of the Calgary oil men insist that the price, in Alberta at least, can and would come down if free competitive prices were allowed. To support this, they point to the decrease in the price of gasoline in that province as Turner valley developed and small companies got into the refining business. The great example is the price of gasoline in the Coutts area in the southern part of the province. That price came down materially during the period of Turner valley's growth and development and as small refiners got into operation. About the time the war began the price of gasoline was around twenty cents a gallon. At the present time, owing to various restrictions that have been put on the oil business and the levelling of prices, gasoline now costs thirty-eight or thirty-nine cents a gallon in this area. Of course to a large extent that was due to the fact that one of the large oil companies bought a small refinery which had been established at Coutts and closed it up, and now gasoline has to be shipped into that area. The oil men further maintain—and I think they are right—that under conditions of free competition many small refineries would start up, and as a result the price of gasoline would be brought down.

In that connection they put up the argument, which I think is sound, asking why the government should control the price of gasoline in order to keep it approximately the same throughout the prairie provinces, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. They maintain that Alberta should be able to take advantage of its geographical position and the fact that oil is produced there. They say, if that is to continue to be done and Alberta farmers are to be penalized to whatever extent they are penalized, then the government should also take over entire control of the price of wheat, and see that sufficient subsidy is paid so that the same price can be offered for wheat at Didsbury or Olds or Lethbridge that is paid in the Red River valley. There is a considerable differential at present, owing to freight costs, and if that is to be allowed to continue, then gasoline should be treated in the same way.

The government seems determined to keep all information about the subsidies paid very secret, and as a result I am not in a position to say definitely or even to form a good, sound opinion, in regard to the effect on prices of the removal of the subsidy. I have been mentioning the contentions of the oil men; and I think they are right when they say it has been impossible to get from this government information on which a sound judgment could be formed. I placed on the order paper a question which was passed as an order for return on April 17. The information I was given amounted to exactly nothing. I need not bother reading all the questions I asked; they were in connection with the source of supply of oil imported into the prairie provinces, the amounts from each source, the delivery point, the subsidy paid, the cost per barrel and so on. The reply came back from the Department of Mines and Resources: "No information"; from the Department of Reconstruction and Supply: "No information"; from the Department of Trade and Commerce: "No information." From the Department of Transport comes this information:

> The board of transport commissioners advise no information can be given with respect to part 7 of this question because the shipping and destination points are not given.

Of course that is the information that was asked for. Finally, we come to the wartime prices and trade board, and here is what they say:

> Subsidy is payable by Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Limited where necessary on imports of crude oil from the United States to the prairie provinces in an amount sufficient to reduce the laid down cost to refiners to a level equivalent to the laid down cost of crude oil of comparable grade produced in the Turney Valley oilfields.

What actually happened was that the Turner Valley oil field price was set at a very low level. Subsequently it has been raised forty-five cents a barrel, and the price was just kept at that level. The present price is, I think, $2.08 or $2.11 a barrel, which is an increase of forty-five cents over the price some eight or ten months ago. Then they go on:

> In accordance with government policy as stated from time to time in the House of Commons by the Minister of Finance, it is not considered to be in the public interest to give information as to subsidies paid by Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Limited to individual concerns.

The rest of it contains no information at all.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is the total subsidy given?

Mr. HARKNESS: Absolutely nothing is given. I have read everything in this return and, as I say, it amounts to nothing. I might just as well not have it; it did not give me anything. Why the government should be so cagey about this matter; why they should keep it such a secret; why they will not give us the information in regard to really simple questions like this concerning matters about which I think the general public should know, and about which members of parliament especially should know, I do not understand.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have stated the total in the house.

Mr. HARKNESS: Well, here is the return and it gives absolutely no information at all, except the information that they will not give information.

Unless we can, and particularly in this house, get information along the lines I have indicated, how can we reasonably make up our minds in this matter? How can we form sound judgments? So far as I can see, the matter is on a par with the sort of thing we find concerning many other questions which have been asked, and about which members have been complaining. I am convinced that much of this information is denied in various governmental departments because of regulations and red tape which have been laid down, and which no one seems to have sufficient initiative to get rid of or to break. I should think that in many instances ministers do not want to deny the information sought. But three or four years ago, during the progress of the war, rules were laid down, and they have remained in force. A clerk who is asked for information will say, "Well, there is rule 464; no, we cannot say anything about that. No information is available." The time is long past due when departments should be cleaned out in this regard, and new regulations put into effect so that members of the House of Commons can get the information to which they are entitled.

In any event, so far as the oil subsidy situation is concerned, I am sure of one thing, and that is that the removal of the subsidy and the removal of the fixed price on Alberta crude would cause it to rise in price, and thus stimulate development in the oil business.

In closing, I earnestly request the minister carefully to review the whole oil situation, and to make those changes in the tax structure which will enable this industry to start on a full-out exploration and drilling programme. From the narrow viewpoint of increasing the dominion's tax revenues, alone, this would be good business, because the increased production which would result would materially increase the amount which the dominion government could and would collect in taxes. From the broad viewpoint of increasing our wealth, removing us from the position of almost complete dependence upon foreign countries for our oil supplies, and reducing our unfavourable trade balance with the United States, the benefits would be tremendous.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, on this occasion I propose to discuss the income tax as it affects farmers, and also to discuss briefly Canada's marketing policy and bread rationing in the United Kingdom.

In the presentation of the brief made to the federal government last March by the Canadian federation of agriculture it is stated at the outset that the federation recognizes that with the end of hostilities the problem of food supplies must move into first place on the world scene. They state:

> In fact, never before has the burden of responsibility rested so heavily upon victorious peoples of solving the problem of feeding humanity. Even if human considerations were not uppermost in our minds, there is the stern fact that millions of hungry, undernourished and starving people constitute an almost insurmountable barrier to progress.

Then it goes on to say:

> Canadian farmers would gladly respond to this urgent call for maximum food production, but without a more adequate labour supply and an immediate improvement in economic returns, they will find it quite impossible to produce to capacity.

That is the statement which appeared in the brief presented to the government last March by the Canadian federation of agriculture.

In addition to that, we have the statement made in the house on June 17 by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon his return from the United Kingdom. The Prime Minister repeats practically the same story which is told in the presentation of the Canadian federation of agriculture. At page 2530 of Hansard he is reported in these words:

> May I add that it does seem to me conditions in central Europe are deteriorating rapidly and greatly . . . Unless some means can be found whereby the new world and countries that have supplies of food and clothing, can furnish those supplies to the people of some of the occupied zones and other parts of Europe, there may be conditions of famine, of strife and of turmoil which will amount to something in the nature of the spread of a new revolution throughout Europe.

And farther on, he says:

> The last word I should like to say at the moment is that, as far as one can judge what will go farther than anything else in helping to meet present world conditions is increased production and more effective distribution.

He concludes his remarks with this statement:

> Anything that can be done in the world to-day to furnish the necessities of life to those parts of Europe which are in dire need will not only mean salvation for them, but may well be in the nature of salvation for the world as a whole.

After the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) had brought in his budget on June 27, and after I had an opportunity not only of listening to it but of reading it, I must say I was disappointed to find that it did not reveal any trace of a recognition of the problem of famine faced by the world to-day.

In the presentation of the Canadian federation of agriculture were eight specific requests respecting taxation. Before setting forth these requests, I should like to read one sentence from the brief, wherein it states:

> A number of features of the present act have proved unduly burdensome and in some cases quite unjust to our farmers.

In other words, the federation, an organization which more or less coordinates all farm organizations in Canada, and which represents about thirty per cent of our total population, tells the government that the tax structure of Canada is such that it proves unduly burdensome. Therefore the federation makes eight requests. I shall read them, leaving out the less important parts, so as to have on record what agriculture asked for, and what it received in the present budget. The requests of the Canadian federation of agriculture were as follows:

1. That the income of the farmer, for income tax purposes be assessed on the basis of an average over a period of at least four years. A moving average plan might be adopted which would assist the taxpayer in meeting payments in years of loss or low returns.
2. That breeding herds be recognized as a capital asset, and that a basic herd plan be adopted to distinguish between capital and income in live stock dispersal sales.
3. That the exemption for single persons be raised to $1,000, and that for married persons to $2,000.
4. That more adequate allowance be made for the labour of farmers' wives, sons and daughters in connection with production on the farm.
5. That farmers be no longer required to accept responsibility for collecting income tax from their hired help.
6. That the government provide a board of arbitration whereby taxpayers may have a simple and inexpensive means of appealing decisions of income tax officials.

7. That payment of arrears of interest and principal on the home farm, due before 1940, be allowed as deductions for income tax purposes.
8. That provision be made for final clearance to be given all taxpayers two years after the final returns have been made for any one year.

One would think that the Minister of Finance would have recognized the contribution made by Canadian farmers during the war; would have recognized and realized that Canadian farmers, particularly those in the west, faced ten years of depression just before the war; would have recognized and realized further that farm machinery just about broke down during the war years, that homes must be repaired and built, that fences must be repaired and built, that house furnishings must be provided, that everything needed in a home on a farm must be paid for at the present time. Yet the minister granted only partly one of the requests which the Canadian federation of agriculture placed before him, that is, the spreading of income tax over a period of three years, not the four-year period as was suggested by the federation. We need food at the present time when half the world is starving and when the British government has been forced to ration bread, but we are not encouraging the production of food by bringing in a budget of this sort and entirely ignoring the farmer. That sort of action discourages food production.

I understand that the Canadian federation of agriculture has been in existence for approximately ten years. I submit that it would be advisable for the government seriously to consider making an annual grant to national farm organizations like the Canadian federation of agriculture. I am quite certain that hon. members will agree with me when I say that Canadian farm organizations have played an important role in the economic life of this country, both during the war and during the peace. Representatives of agricultural organizations have been asked to sit in consultation with the various boards and branches of government, such as selective service. These organizations have been asked to make recommendations and appear as witnesses from time to time in connection with matters of great concern to Canada. These organizations do a considerable amount of valuable research and they print and distribute much valuable information. Hon. members often quote from material and statistics compiled by these organizations and their figures are usually regarded as being authoritative. Various briefs and press announcements dealing with the problems of agriculture are prepared by these organizations. In this way the farm organizations not only are rendering a great service to the farming population of this country, but are rendering a great service to the population of Canada as a whole.

An organization such as the Canadian federation of agriculture has done a great service to Canada by having remained non-political. That in itself constitutes a guarantee that this farm organization will serve a useful purpose in prodding the government in connection with matters affecting our economy regardless of which party is in power. In view of that fact I earnestly plead and recommend to the government that an annual grant be made to this most important farm organization to enable it to carry on research and publish material for the use of our Canadian people. It would be a worth-while investment and would enable our agriculturists to be well informed on matters on which they should be well informed. I make this suggestion and request in all earnestness.

Before I deal with marketing, I should like to say a word or two, more in connection with taxation as it affects our farmers. I have received a great many resolutions from organizations in my own constituency of Vegreville. I believe that farm organizations should be encouraged to send resolutions to their members and to the government in order that they may become more keenly interested in the various problems of agriculture. They should be urged to continue and intensify the representations they make to the government and to their representatives in the House of Commons. I should like to place on the record a list of the farm groups in my constituency which have sent resolutions to me requesting an adjustment in the income tax as it affects farmers. I believe that these resolutions were patterned on the one prepared by the Canadian federation of agriculture and presented to the federal government on March 28, 1946. This is the list:

Pine Knoll Farm Forum

The following Alberta farmers' union locals: Mundare, local 711; Victoria, local 386; Smoky Lake; Brody, local 92; Pakan; Toporetz, local 350; Smoky Lake, local 425; Lampburg, local 101; Chipman, local 75; Andrew, local 8; Mundare, local 145; Woodgrove, local 151; Hillock, local 340; Willingdon, local 1; Lamont, local 192; Sandy Lake, local 27; Errol, local 195.

Mr. Fred Stelter, of Lamont, also sent in a resolution on behalf of a large number of farmers in his district.

These resolutions should not have been ignored by the gentlemen who were drafting the budget. Most of these eight requests that were placed before the government could have been granted if the government was really and truly anxious to expand production in this country.

I now come to marketing. Over the past two years both the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) have been vigoriusly defending the government's policy of selling Canadian wheat in the neighbourhood of sixty-three cents lower than the United States farmers received who sold their wheat to the same customers. The Minister of Agriculture pacified our Canadian farmers by promising them, if they continued selling at that lower price, a steady market for their wheat in the future.

What are the facts? A Canadian Press dispatch, which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune of July 3, 1946, gives the following as the reason for the failure of the British food mission to reach an agreement with the Canadian government:

> High government officials told the Canadian Press the suspension (of the negotiations) had resulted from reluctance of the Canadian government to commit itself to large-scale wheat shipments which might in the event of a poor crop year in the future prevent her from fulfilling contracts with other customers for Canadian grain.

That dispatch gives what is generally regarded as the reason for the failure to reach an agreement with the British government. But on looking over another newspaper report which appeared in the Toronto Evening Telegram of June 25 last, I find this statement:

> Mr. Strachey agreed that it would only be proper for the British government to recognize what this country has done during the war in supplying wheat and to make a new contract, but he emphatically stated that it would not be of an exclusive character with the United Kingdom filling its entire requirements from this country.

That statement presents an entirely different picture from the one which the Canadian government gives in the first dispatch I quoted.

Mr. GARDINER: That statement did not come from the Canadian government.

Mr. HLYNKA: The dispatch says that high government officials told this to the Canadian Press.

Mr. GARDINER: That is the usual press way of saying they saw somebody.

Mr. HLYNKA: I take it that the second dispatch by J. H. Fisher appearing in the Toronto Evening Telegram gives the real reason. Yet the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce for years have been asking our Canadian farmers to sell their wheat below the price which United States farmers were getting on the same market in order that we might be able to hold that market for Canadian wheat. Now, according to the statement of Mr. Strachey, that theory has fallen down; it does not hold good any longer. So why should our Canadian farmer continue to sell his wheat below the price which the United States farmer gets if the former is not guaranteed a future market for his wheat? I feel that Canada can afford to sell her wheat to Britain at the price at which she is selling it to-day or even lower, but not at the expense of the Canadian farmer alone. The whole nation should help to bear the burden by means of a subsidy or whatever you wish to call it, and not footed by the Canadian farmer alone. The policy of this government may have been responsible for failure to reach an agreement.

Mr. GARDINER: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Is he making these statements on the assumption that there is not going to be any contract made with Britain?

Mr. HLYNKA: No.

Mr. GARDINER: Then why is he assuming that there is failure?

Mr. HLYNKA: I was just coming to the point which the Minister has in mind. In the Ottawa Journal of July 16, 1946, just the day before yesterday, there appeared this item:

> Indications last night were that the Anglo-Canadian wheat agreement would be signed before the end of the crop year, July 31.
> It will be for four years, it was learned, with a fixed price of $1.55 a bushel, basis No. 1 northern, at the head of the lakes for the first two years and no ceiling price for the second two years, but possibly a floor price.

It appears from that report that an agreement will be reached, but that is not the point I was making. My point was that the theory that has been advanced in this house for years by the government, that if the Canadian farmer sells his wheat at a lower price than the United States farmer he will be guaranteed a market for the future, no longer holds; it has fallen down. For that reason I personally believe that the Canadian farmer should demand a price for his wheat comparable with the price which the United States farmer receives, and if the Canadian government wants to sell our wheat below that price, it is up to the whole country to subsidize that price.

Mr. GARDINER: May I ask one more question? Assuming that the agreement when it is made and signed provides for the selling of all the Canadian wheat which any authority who is competent to judge thinks ought to be sold under such a contract in each year for the period of the agreement, would the hon. member still make the criticism he is now making?

Mr. HLYNKA: It depends upon the price.

Mr. GARDINER: Even if the price were $1.55 for the first two years and no ceiling on the price for the last two years?

Mr. HLYNKA: That does not get the minister out of the hole into which he has got himself by promising the Canadian farmer a guaranteed market for his wheat.

Mr. GARDINER: I have not got myself into a hole. I am simply trying to help my good friend—although we do not always agree politically—out of the hole in which he has got himself.

Mr. HLYNKA: I know the Minister of Agriculture is a good friend of mine, but I have many good farmer friends too, and I want to plead their case because I know they are being taken for a ride.

However to leave that for a moment, may I now refer to a press report about bread rationing in Britain. The title is:

Ration bread in Britain on July 21.

If the British government were so certain that an agreement could be reached, and that the British people would be sure to get all the wheat they want from Canada—of course, we may not be able to fill all their requirements—I am not so sure that the British government would have proceeded to ration bread. By the way, I find in the Evening Citizen of to-day an editorial in part as follows:

Housewives Ask the King

When 300,000 United Kingdom housewives petitioned the king last week asking him to abolish the rationing of bread, they exercised a right recognized as long ago as the Magna Charta and constitutionally confirmed by the Bill of Rights of 1689.

It just goes to show that even the housewives of Britain had to petition the king not to ration bread.

I want to quote a passage or two from a press dispatch:

London, June 27.—(CP)—The government announced to-day that bread rationing in Britain will begin July 21.

John Strachey, food minister, told the House of Commons that flour also will be rationed as from that date.

Further down in the article it is stated:

The ration of bread will be nine ounces a day for adults generally, 15 ounces for male manual workers, 11 ounces for expectant mothers and women manual workers, 12 ounces for adolescents from 11 to 18 years, eight ounces for children from 5 to 11 years, four ounces for children from 1 to 5 years, and two ounces for children under one year.

The basic ration is one onuce a day less than had generally been forecast.

Mr. Strachey said the cabinet decided on rationing—first bread rationing in Britain's history . . .

The last statement is this, in reply to Mr. Churchill:

Mr. Strachey: I assure this house and, I hope, the world that the fact that we have faced the necessity of introducing bread rationing is the best proof that we are concealing no stocks of bread or flour or wheat in this country . . .

That places the picture before this house as clearly as I can place it. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that it is in the interest of Canada to reach an agreement with the United Kingdom on wheat, regardless of the price which Britain can pay; of course she will not take it for nothing. If the United Kingdom buys our wheat the Canadian government should subsidize or make up the difference between the price which the British government will pay and the price which the Canadian farmer should get. Unless we do that, our Canadian farmers will be compelled to continue receiving less than the United States farmer does from the same customer. We all know that the Canadian farmer deserves to get every cent it is possible to get out of the sale of his wheat.

I notice that farmers were urged by the Canadian wheat board to deliver wheat as early as possible. Also the Minister of Trade and commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) rose in this chamber and lauded the attitude of the farmers; according to press clippings, "MacKinnon lauds prairie farmers." The prairie farmers can do pretty well without lauding, but they want a little cash, and I believe we should get on to a basis which would place the farmer in an economic position where he no longer would be forced out of his home by mortgage companies and so forth.

In addition to that, I want to mention the raising of prices on farm machinery. That is in addition to the refusal of this government to grant the farmer these income tax exemptions. I wish also to refer to freight rates. What about the freight rates which western farmers have had to bear for so many years? I believe the time has come when this government should take a bold stand and show that they are really concerned with the future of our agriculture. Then what about the price of gasoline?

All these things add up to the fact that the farmer is in such a position that sooner or later he will not be able to stand on his own feet, and will have to get into debt again.

I therefore appeal to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture to consider once again during this budget the position of the farmer and see if some amendments cannot be brought in to place our agriculture on a really sound basis.

Mr. W. R. AYLESWORTH (Frontenac-Addington): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I feel that I must speak on behalf of the forgotten man—the farmer. He has been carrying far more than his rightful share of the burden during the war years and is still being asked to carry on and produce more and more, and he is given very little consideration when it comes to price control.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has said that the thing which would prevent a depression would be greater production. I would say that this government has done nearly everything that could be done to discourage production.

For instance, the ceiling price which was put on meat has been wrong from the very start. I asked this government three years ago to raise the ceiling on beef two cents a pound to the farmer and to leave it as it was to the consumer. If that had been done we would not have had the black market experiences we have had. There was too great a spread in price from what the farmer received for his meat and what the consumer paid. When the ceiling price was set I warned the government that this spread of seven cents a pound was at least two cents a pound too much and that when meat got scarce it would cause a black market because, the retailer having a spread of seven cents, it would bring him a return, on a 500-pound carcass of beef, of $35 profit, which was too high when compared with the price the farmer had to take. For example, a 1000-pound steer would bring the farmer around $100. He had to take care of that animal for at least two and a half years—buy feed and provide other incidentals. Compare this with the retailer, who would cut and sell this carcass over the counter in possibly two hours for $35 profit. If the ceiling had been raised two cents per pound it would have given the retailer a profit of $25 instead of $35, and the retailer would not have had the $10 to pay the wholesaler over and above the ceiling in order to get meat to sell in his store. Also, if this had been done the farmer would have received $10 each more for his cattle and the consumer would have had his meat for the same price as he has been paying. Instead of this, we have had for the past year the greatest black market this country has ever seen. It has become a joke.

This government has set up many boards of control, and the result is that the farmer has to have a permit for nearly everything he wants to do in connection with the operation of his farm. First, he is forced to obtain a permit to kill, even if he wishes to kill his own stock; then, he is, if lucky, given a quota of the number of carcasses a month he is allowed to handle, which in the case of hogs runs from two to ten a month, and yet some permit holders have bragged that they have killed over two hundred a month. What is the board of control for? Thus the man who tries to live up to the regulations finds himself handicapped as compared with the man who carries on with little or no regard for government regulations, orders or control boards. This situation has caused more dissatisfaction and unrest among farmers than anything else. We are told by the boards that these restrictions have been put on so that we shall use less meat here and be able to send more meat to England. I am going to say that more meat is being used for our domestic market to-day than ever before; much of the meat is being sold at from three to twelve cents a pound above the ceiling, and yet the farmer is asked to sell at the ceiling price.

There is then the question of milk. A few weeks ago the farmers of Ontario asked the government for a raise in the price of milk. What did they get? Here we have something that has far more food value than any other commodity for the price. Compare milk with soft drinks, which have practically no food value. A quart, or forty ounces of milk sells to the public for twelve cents; forty ounces of soft drink sells to the public for twenty-eight cents. I am sure that the government is holding the price of milk far too low, or is allowing the other to sell far too high. I would ask the government to allow the price of milk to be fixed so as to ensure the farmer a fair profit on his investment and a fair return for his labour. In this regard as with respect to the ceiling on meat, it has worked to the disadvantage of the farmer.

Another class of people who need some consideration are the vegetable growers. They work long and hard to supply the consumer, but in many instances before they have had an opportunity of disposing of their vegetables, imported vegetables will appear on the market and their surplus remains unsold. I would ask the government to give this matter serious consideration and restrict the importation for longer periods each year.

I feel also that the policy of collecting income tax has worked to the disadvantage of the farmer. He makes out his returns and takes or sends them to an income tax office. He is called in and told that his feed bill is wrong, that if he fed that amount he is wasting it—this from some man who would not know a hog if he saw one, or scarcely knows that his morning bacon is part of a hog, let alone how to feed them. Not many farmers will buy feed to throw it away. In some other cases he has been charged with $125 for each member of his family for food used from the farm. I understand that this has been stopped. I know of some farmers who have been large producers who have gone home from the income tax office where they were called in connection with their return, and have sold most or all of their stock. Why? Simply because they have not enough left to make it worth while. This has adversely affected hog production and it will be felt in the dairy industry also. This is certainly not a time to do anything to cause a decrease in production; it is a time when everyone should be encouraged to produce more than ever before to help save the thousands in Europe from starvation and at the same time help to stave off a depression here in Canada. Production could be increased, for instance, by increasing the price of milk to the farmer. Milk should bring more than it did in the month of May, which was $1.60 per cwt. for 3·3 milk and is below the cost of production. I know some will say that this price is higher than in the past. That is true, but it costs more to produce milk now than it did before the war. Wages are to-day almost double what they were in pre-war days; feed is higher in price; farm machinery has been increased in price; steel has increased in price. In fact, almost everything the farmer has to buy for use on his farm is higher in price. Therefore it is unfair to ask the farmer to produce to-day at present prices. It cannot and, may I say, will not be done.

Labour and the farmer will rally to the request of the government for greater production, if given a fair chance. The farmer did it in the war years and he will do it to-day, if given fair treatment.

If this country wants more butter, the government should raise the price; more cheese, raise the price; more pork and beef, take off the ceiling price and let the market find its level. Take off the ceilings on all farm produce and do away with control boards. I know that all members of this house will agree that the production of food is the most serious problem facing this country and the world to-day. During the war years the Canadian farmer produced more food than had ever been produced in the history of the country, despite the short-sighted policy of the government, which had him fighting against labour shortages, price controls that were not in line with cost of production and many other controls. All Canada praised his efforts, but he cannot live on praise alone. There must be some action, some planning and some assistance to make the production of food a prosperous undertaking.

I contend that the prosperity of Canada depends upon the prosperity of the farmer. Why? Because the farmer is the greatest market in Canada for all the goods industry can produce. There are more than 700,000 farm homes in Canada, each one in need of the essentials of life and, in addition, in need of so many of the modern conveniences that have become a part of rural life, as well as of life in the cities and towns. We must convince the people of Canada who do not live on farms of this vital fact.

I believe that this budget should have raised the income exemption for married and single people. As presented by the Minister of Finance, it is a disappointment to nearly everyone. It is a fact that we have been carrying on in a piecemeal fashion for the first six months of this year, and no change for the next six months, a promise of some change for 1947—what a budget! The exemptions for married people should have been raised to at least $2,000 and for single persons to $1,000. If this had been done it would have helped the farmer and all others in the lower income brackets. I believe, too, that some allowance should be made for the farmer's wife who helps on the farm, because on many farms the wife takes the place of a hired man and the farmer is therefore entitled to an allowance on his income tax return.

The farmer is also entitled to a fair return on his investment, and once the people of Canada who live in towns and cities are alive to this fact they cannot but fall in line with the policy of putting agriculture in a healthy condition in order to improve their own living. Once a real standard of living is reached for the Canadian farmer, the standard of living as a whole will be on a much higher level. Then the worker will be busy making goods for the farmer; the farmer will be busy producing foodstuffs for the worker, and with people in full employment and earning good wages prosperity will accrue to all.

Suppose someone had said in 1939 that in the next few years Canada would produce annually, not $4 billion of wealth, but $8 billion, and that the government could spend not $550 million but $4 billion, or more than seven times as much, what would we have said? Yet this has been done. The $8 billion have been produced out of the same national resources of lands, forests, mines and fisheries, as were the $4 billion in 1939. Now that this seeming miracle has been accomplished, the answer is so simple. It is that everyone has been employed. It is true that we worked longer hours than in pre-war days, but the explanation lies not so much in the longer hours as in full employment.

One thing seems certain, that for two or three or perhaps more years following the war there will be an assured demand for all the peace-time goods that can be produced. The problem during these years will be to divert production into the type of goods most urgently needed, and that should be the policy of this government. But what have we? It is over a year since the end of the war, and because of the lack of a clear-cut policy on the part of the government we have labour disputes, strikes, work tie-ups, general unrest and dissatisfaction which, in the case of the farmer, is causing decreased production. To combat these strikes and work tie-ups, the government has set up a number of boards and controls, adding to the already over-large staffs in the employ of the government and putting a further load on the already over-burdened taxpayers. I believe there are some 150,000 government employees still on the payroll. This is nearly three times as many as before the war, and the cost to the government is about $20,000,000 a month. If the government had seen fit to release some of these employees it would have meant a tremendous saving to the country, and other economies could have been put into effect. Many of these people would then have been available for employment in industry and on the farms.

In connection with this budget another matter with which I cannot agree is making compulsory the acceptance of the family allowance, in respect of income tax. It was quite all right for those who wanted the baby bonus to apply for it and have it, but why should people be compelled to take with one hand in order to be in a position to give with the other? The minister says this has been done in the interests of efficiency. I suggest it has been done so that the government could claim they were assisting in the upbringing of some three million children. The fact is that it is merely confusion. There are many simpler ways of assisting the man with the large family. The most practical would be to allow a larger income tax reduction for each child. Let the father of the family keep the income he earns. That, however, would seem to be too simple a method for this government, notwithstanding that it would save the enormous expense of maintaining an organization to keep the additional records, send out cheques and so on.

I suggest that it is high time this government gave some thought to the matter of economy, and to easing the load on the taxpayer, especially in the lower income brackets.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Aylesworth.]

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. PAUL EDMOND GAGNON (Chicoutimi): (Translation): Mr. Speaker, before this debate is brought to a close, I wish briefly to acquaint the house with the reaction of my constituents to the budget speech delivered by the Right Hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley.) The people expected, and reasonably so, a general tax reduction. After having done more than their share during the difficult years of the war to help the government in bringing to victory the struggle undertaken, our workers were desirous of having enough money left out of their pay cheques to enable them to cope with the ever increasing cost of living. In my opinion, the tax exemptions in the case of married persons should have been brought up to $2,500 and in the case of single persons to at least $1,000; I believe the government should forthwith consider this matter. The working classes are over-taxed and they certainly deserve a little more consideration from the government.

Insofar as the proposed tax on cooperatives is concerned, I must say that the cooperatives of my district have been organized by far-sighted and honest farmers who combine their resources in order to obtain a higher price for their products; other cooperatives have been organized by various groups of small wage earners, who combine their moral and financial resources in order to secure necessities of life at a lower price. We should have more than sympathy for such organizations. In my opinion, they should be tax-free because they are only the representatives of the members to whom the directors must report and, after a strict auditing, refund any overpayments in proportion to each member's patronage.

The agricultural cooperative is, in our province, the necessary adjunct of the farm and serves those classes of society that need protection and help to survive. We cannot compare them with those monopolies and trusts that are cooperatives in name only. I therefore protest against that tax, which will not even bring enough yearly income to pay the interest on the billion dollar gifts made to foreign countries. The tax on soft drinks which, after all, is merely a nuisance tax, is another of the levies that directly affect the people, and which should be abolished as soon as possible. There are so many other sources of revenue to which the treasury could resort that we find it hard to understand the attitude taken by the government on the matter.

In concluding those brief remarks, I wish to say a few words about the flag question. It is my privilege to represent in this house a constituency which numbers among the most populous and the most advanced, from the industrial, ideological, cultural and social standpoints, in the province of Quebec. Important towns, perfectly developed, lie close to unmatched rural centres. The representations made by my electors, as well as the reports, resolutions, letters and telegrams I have received from individuals or public bodies lead me to believe that 98 per cent of the 80,000 people in the Chicoutimi district desire and want an absolutely distinctive flag. That is all to their credit.

No union jack, no fleur-de-lis, no camouflage, no old imperial fabric mended with maple leaves, but a new and distinctive flag, symbolizing a sovereign, free and independent nation. A flag we shall be proud to unfurl, which will appeal to our hearts and minds alike, which will be attuned to every patriotic aspiration of a country that has lived, that has suffered and that endeavours to free itself from all foreign servitude so as to give its own ambitions a broader scope, an ever nobler and loftier ideal.

You wish for national unity, you hope that all sections of our population may live in brotherly understanding and work in unison, under a common allegiance, to ensure our national future, well then, give us first a flag which every race represented in Canada may accept, as an emblem of strength, fame and achievement in keeping with the sentiments and wishes of the various ethnical groups making up our population.

A distinctive flag, essentially Canadian, will be a rallying emblem for all Canadians. A hybrid flag, were it named the Red Ensign, would be a symbol of disunity and misunderstanding. We do not want it.

Mr. J. W. BURTON (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, some hon. members may be anxious to have this debate closed, but I make no apology for taking the time of the house to voice, on behalf of the people I have the honour to represent, their objections to the budget as brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) on June 27.

From all reports I have received thus far, this budget is the most unpopular ever presented to the Canadian people. On the night the minister made his speech I venture to say there were tens of thousands of people, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, sitting by their radios waiting to hear what tribute they would have to render unto Caesar; or rather, I should say, to know how much less Caesar would extract from them. But what a disappointment! Seldom if ever did so many people in Canada expect so much from one man and get so little.

Before dealing with certain features of the budget, I should like to make a few observations. There are times when I find myself in the awkward position of having to defend the Minister of Finance from his own friends and party supporters out in the country. In the past I could do this conscientiously, because if—and I emphasize the word "if"—I were a believer in the capitalist system of so-called free enterprise, I would not know where to go to find a better Minister of Finance. Even the Tory members of the Progressive Conservative party seem to realize that. No doubt they have found it difficult not to receive this orthodox budget with open arms. Would they have done better if the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) had presented the budget? They might have put a different coloured coating on this bitter pill, but underneath it would have still been the same capitalistic formula: To those who have, more will be added thereto, and to those who have not, even that shall be taken from them.

In the matter of price control, I doubt if they would have done much better than the present administration except that in all probability they would have made more noise about the defrosting process. The Tories seem to have a knack for doing a lot of blasting. It will be remembered that in the early thirties they had the one and only R. B. Bennett who was going to blast his way into the markets of the world, but his powder got wet. They now want to blow the lid off the price ceilings; but, after listening to their financial critic reply to the Minister of Finance, I could not avoid thinking of the noise made by a harmless fuse on a first of July firecracker that failed to go off.

I should like to deal with the budget as it concerns the taxation of cooperatives. I want in the most emphatic way possible to protest against the—I was going to say retroactive feature but I know the minister has taken exception, on a number of occasions during this debate, to the use of that phrase. However, I would remind him that back out in the country the members of cooperative organizations, the farmers who have their little cooperative trading associations, look upon it as a retroactive feature regardless of what the minister calls it.

There is the other factor, the minister's attempt to force all cooperatives into paying a return on the invested capital. I ask: Where is their so-called free enterprise when they are forcing those who find good in the cooperative movement to accept their pagan philosophy that the wages of money must receive the first consideration? That is a vital question in so far as those of us who are in the cooperative movement are concerned. We in the cooperative organizations have endeavoured to build on true cooperative principles, but because of the shortcomings or neglect of the governments of the past there has not been placed upon the statute books of this country a real cooperative act that would give a guide to cooperatives as to what they should do in order to satisfy the government as to what a cooperative really is.

In these cooperative organizations we have one thing which, in my opinion, is the hope and salvation of people in democratic countries. By forming into a cooperative, people are given an opportunity to unite their efforts in self-help. While the Minister of Finance may clamp his finger down on only one section of the cooperative movement, we do not know but that his successor in another year will put the thumbscrews on another section. I should like to give a little illustration of this self-help idea, which is to be found in one form or another in all our cooperative organizations.

Back in 1919 there was started north of Humboldt a rural telephone line which I had organized previously. This line was constructed in order to provide telephone facilities to the people in that district. The company was incorporated under the provincial statute as a non-profit-making organization. Over 175 farmers are connected together by the system and we have day and night service for 365 days in the year at a cost of $9 a year. Throughout the years the board of directors have received no remuneration except a per diem allowance for the time spent in attending to the company's business. The shareholders who subscribed for shares have received no dividends, but from time to time money is placed in the reserve account.

It has worked out in this way. We could not wait until the end of the year to collect from our subscribers the money required to pay the operating costs. We estimated what our expenditures would be, and we made a levy that we considered would be ample with which to pay our linemen, our repair bills and so on. Naturally at the end of the year we had a surplus, but we did not pay any interest on the invested capital, nor did we pay any dividends. If the Minister of Finance wishes I can bring him a file to show that last year this company had considerable correspondence with the department in Ottawa. They had difficulty in getting the department to understand that the company was not a profit-making organization. For a time the department refused to allow them to buy war savings certificates, on the contention that they were a profit-making organization. How do I or any of the members of the other telephone companies in Saskatchewan know that the minister or the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) will not soon tell us, "You must pay interest on your share capital"?

I should like to quote briefly from a letter I received from a farmer in my constituency, and I can assure the house that this letter voices the opinion of the great majority in my constituency and, I am satisfied, also in the greater part of the west. Here is what he said in regard to the taxation of cooperatives:

> The people here are sore about the taxing of cooperatives. They look on it as a raid on the treasury of the cooperatives.

Then again:

> Every one knows that the farmers started the wheat pools to save on the costs of marketing, which were excessive. All that the farmer wanted was a fair share of the consumer's dollar and not a profit.

I should like to quote from a letter received, not from a person living in my constituency, but from a man who lives just across the line, in the constituency represented by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker). He is a personal friend whom I have known for many years. He addressed his letter to the Minister of Finance and sent me a copy, thinking no doubt that the minister would be so busy that he would not have time to attend to it. The letter reads:

Hon. J. L. Isley,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Ontario.
Dear Sir:

Re taxation of cooperatives

You are a busy man. In my own way, so am I. I have just read in Hansard that part of your budget speech dealing with the position of cooperatives in respect to income tax. If I read correctly and the House of Commons accepts your recommendation, it is your intention to take from me certain moneys that belong to me personally by way of taxing the wheat pools who are holding this money in trust to my account.

I take very strong exception to this action on your part and request that you give me good and sufficient reasons on common sense and moral grounds for your actions.

He goes on:

Let me put my position before you:

(1) In 1924 I, with my neighbours and other farmers in this province, grouped ourselves together in what was known as the Saskatchewan wheat pool. In that year our grain was handled under agreement with private elevator companies. In many cases this agreement was not lived up to in spirit, if in letter, by many of these companies and proved to be unsatisfactory.

(2) As a result of dissatisfaction, in 1925 we found it necessary to handle our grain through our own elevators known as Saskatchewan Pool Elevator Company. These elevators were to be operated at cost. Any moneys in excess of actual operation costs were, obviously, a part of the price of my grain and belonged to me personally and at no time were the property of the elevator company.

(3) In pursuance of this policy of operating at cost, pool elevators in 1925 made no charge for handling and storing of grain at the time of delivery, the policy being to deduct actual operating costs from the final payment to be made when all the grain handled had been sold, plus reasonable reserves.

(4) My recollection is that on some of the lower grades and mixed grades of grain handled, no final payment was available to make such deductions. The result was that members having such grain got it handled for nothing, which obviously was not fair to other members.

(5) As a result of this experience, the board of directors quite properly saw the necessity of making a charge for handling and for storing the grain at the time of delivery to the elevators.

(6) For reasons of safety, and because at the beginning of the grain delivery season it is impossible to accurately anticipate operating costs, handling and storage charges were set at a level greater than was necessary to meet the costs. In other words, part of the proper price of my grain was unavoidably taken from me at the time of delivery.

(7) This policy of charging an amount for handling of grain at the time of delivery has been followed in subsequent years and has proved satisfactory to me and in line with co-operative principles and sound business practice. The fact that any excess charge greater than operating costs belong to me as the grower of the grain and a proper part of the price of such grain has been accepted by the members through their organization and until just recently admitted and gone unchallenged by your and preceding governments.

He goes on:

Now, I am in complete agreement with you when you say that the profits of cooperatives should be taxed the same as private companies and believe that cooperatives themselves are also in agreement.

May I interject there, so long as we have or may have a cooperative act that will give us all a yardstick to go by, so that we shall not be subject to the whims of certain individuals or officials, changing from year to year. The letter goes on:

My question to you, Mr. Ilsley, is, by what process of reasoning do you find that the pools are taxable on moneys that obviously do not belong to them as organizations and which they hold in trust for their members? Obviously, and I think you must agree, such moneys are a proper price of the grain and should become taxable only when they get into the members' hands and they are found to be taxable under the provisions of the income tax laws.

I ask of you a plain and straightforward answer to this question. In closing, may I say that it does seem ingratitude on your part and on the part of your government and a lack of appreciation of the very fair and moderate stand the wheat pools have taken all along in the matter of grain prices at a time when the attitude of privately owned elevator companies must be a cause of considerable embarrassment to yourself and your government.

I wish to say a few words about that flood of postcards which some of us members have been receiving. Here are samples of two different kinds that I received. One of them says:

I respectfully urge:

1. That the government apply income taxation on exactly the same basis on all forms of commercial enterprise, including cooperatives, crown companies, municipal and governmental undertakings and mutual concerns.
2. That patronage dividends, and like payments, be disallowed as an expense before arriving at taxable income.

The other card is of a different colour and is worded a little differently. It says:

Dear Sir:

I respectfully urge that the government apply the same principles of income taxation to all forms of retail business, cooperative and otherwise. I further urge that patronage dividends should not be allowed as an item of expense before computing taxable income.

Yours sincerely

Very appropriately this card bears the name of Mortimer Snerd. That is the way I received it in the mail.

There were, according to the 1941 census, 43,292 people in the constituency of Humboldt. Up to date I have received 253 of these cards. That includes men, women and children, and even those bearing bogus names. Everyone of these cards received by me I acknowledged. A large number of my acknowledgements were returned with the postmaster's notation, "Not called for", or "Unknown here". I should like to read part of a letter I received from one man in reply to my acknowledgment:

Mr. J. W. Burton, M.P.
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Canada

Dear Sir:

This acknowledges receipt of your letter to me dated the 14th instant, in which you acknowledge receipt of a postcard purported to have been signed by me. In reply I would advise that I have not signed any of these "request" or "urge" cards that are being distributed through the mails to the taxpayers of the country. If any such card has reached you under my name it has been signed by someone else than myself.

If the paper shortage is as acute as our government would like to have us believe, why all this tommy-rot and cluttering of the mails in sending out all these cards, many of which may have never been seen by the party whose name is attached to them?

While on the subject of these cards, I want to say that I have always welcomed hearing from the people of my constituency, and I shall continue to look forward to hearing from them. But most of the people in the constituency have known Joe Burton long enough to know they do not need to have some smart aleck in Winnipeg or Toronto prepare their message to me for them. I have lived in the constituency for over forty years, and for thirty years I have been an active member of a number of cooperative organizations.

But those 253 cards were not the only communications I received on this taxation question. Over fifty wheat pool locals and other local cooperatives in my constituency expect me to protest vigorously on their behalf against the action of the government in this matter, I shall not weary you, Mr. Speaker, or hon. members by reading all their protests. I shall read only this one as an example, and may I remind the house that the total membership of the local cooperatives I have just mentioned in my constituency is many times greater than the number of cards I received, which were prepared evidently by the so-called income taxpayers association. This letter expresses what they are protesting against generally:

We the members of Quill Lake and Valley Plains Local, strongly protest this move by opponents of the cooperatives, and we wish to bring to the attention of our member of parliament the fact that the farmers of Humboldt constituency are definitely in overwhelming majority in favour of exemption from taxation of patronage dividends in the hands of cooperative organizations, and further, we respectfully request your full support of our views when this matter comes before the house.

May I say, when they ask for exemption from taxation of patronage dividends they do not want to have taxes applied to moneys which are being held for them in trust by their respective cooperative organizations.

I have here a notation that the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. McGarry), speaking during this debate, said, as reported in Hansard, at page 3540, in reference to Doctor Coady, who is connected with the cooperative movement in the maritimes:

Doctor Coady has been the organizer, the initiator and the developer of the cooperative movement throughout the maritimes. He is now and has been for many years the director of that movement.

From what I have heard, Doctor Coady is the director of the extension department of the St. Francis Xavier university at Antigonish. It is quite true that he has taken an active part in the organization of cooperatives, but as far as I can find out he is not listed as director of the cooperative movement in Nova Scotia. However, to come to what is more pertinent, the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond said:

What does Doctor Coady say of the legislation dealing with cooperative taxation? He has said it over the radio; he has expressed it in the press. This is what he said: "I am well satisfied with this legislation."

I do not know Doctor Coady personally, but I have heard a lot about his good work; and, having heard and read what the hon. member said in that regard, while I do not doubt his honesty of purpose, I do question the exact attitude of Doctor Coady, if that is the way it was expressed. Why would the cooperative union in New Brunswick, which is part of the movement that Doctor Coady helped build up, have already sent in a protest, as I understand they have done, against this new proposal? Why would the cooperative movement in the province of Nova Scotia, in the organization in which Doctor Coady, again, has been a main driving force, be worried about this and be considering sending in a protest against this legislation? The only explanation which I can think of as to the quotation attributed to Doctor Coady is that probably, on the night the minister delivered his budget speech, some newspaper man got Doctor Coady on long distance telephone or telegraphed and told him that the patronage dividends of cooperatives would not be taxable, without giving him all the other little details; and on hearing that, Doctor Coady possibly said that that would be fine; he was well satisfied. But I doubt if Doctor Coady will be satisfied when he has the full information before him.

One more thing while I am dealing with quotations. On July 10, when the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) was speaking, he said, after an exchange between him and my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and several others:

That, of course, is the length to which my hon. friend, the leader of the C.C.F. party, has gone in this discussion. I can say that he may not be a Conservative, but, as the head of one of the greatest cooperatives in the province, he has indicated the support he would give to my hon. friends of the C.C.F. who have endeavoured to make the cooperative movement in Saskatchewan or elsewhere an annex or an adjunct of the party they represent.

As a member of cooperative organizations in Saskatchewan throughout all these years, I emphatically deny that we of Saskatchewan have in any way endeavoured to bring in the cooperative movement as an auxiliary of the C.C.F. party. I will say this much, that many members of the cooperative movement support us; I as an active worker in cooperative movements have from time to time worked with Liberals and Conservatives, and at no time did any of us attempt to bring politics into our cooperative organization meetings or any of our work. About the best example of cooperation which the hon. member for Lake Centre might experience is when, a year ago last June, some Liberals in the constituency of Lake Centre joined with the Conservatives to elect him, and defeat an outstanding cooperator in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the people I have the honour to represent I express regret that not more consideration was given to those in the lower income brackets when the minister brought down his budget and announced a new schedule that is to go into effect six months from now. I have always contended, and so have all members of this group, that the first charge on the production of a nation is a decent standard of living for the people who make that production possible. The Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) know, as well as do all other hon. members, that $750 exemption for a single man and $1,500 for a married couple will not give a decent standard of living. When people earn enough to be able to pay the tax over and above having a decent standard of living the majority, it will be found, will be prepared to do so.

I see my time is going on, and there are a few other things I wish to discuss. I just want to say to you, Mr. Speaker, and all hon. members that some day I am going to take a little time out and tell you two things. One is what we in the C.C.F. mean and would do in so far as social ownership of property is concerned; and the other is, to give you a straightforward, clear-cut example of what a C.C.F. government in Canada, namely in the province of Saskatchewan, is already doing in that respect. But I shall have to leave that until some other time, because I have a matter here with which I think I should deal. I can assure the house that it is not wholly a pleasure in so far as one part of it is concerned.

Speaking on July 16, the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) took part in this debate. There is one part of his speech with which I can agree. When he was referring and objecting to the taxation of cooperatives he said this, at page 3519 of Hansard:

> I submit that the best way to ensure our population against the dangers of supporting subversive doctrines, is to give them the means and opportunity of acquiring a measure of wealth and becoming landowners.
> Since it is difficult if not entirely impossible to conceive of all citizens individually acquiring property, we may, as an alternative, encourage them to joint ownership; such is the function of cooperative societies.

Further on, he said:

> The budget, however, ignores this principle; that is why, among several other reasons, I cannot approve the financial scheme as it was brought before us.

I am sorry that the hon. member is not in his place at the moment because, while not agreeing with other parts of his address, I should like to congratulate him on that statement, and other hon. members as well who have spoken in the same vein. I assure them that when they speak like that, whether in the French language, in English or in any other language, that is language that we cooperators can understand. I regret, however, that the hon. gentleman considered it necessary to put on the record a dispatch from Regina as it appeared in Le Droit on July 11 regarding the address made by His Excellency P. J. Monaghan, Archbishop of Regina, wherein he is reported to have accused the provincial government of Saskatchewan of appointing communists to high posts in the department of education. The quotation used by the hon. member can be found in his speech at page 3519 of that day's Hansard.

I regret that I did not have an opportunity to learn French when I was young. That is my loss and no one's gain. However, I could understand enough to know that the quotation which the hon. member was using had reference to the provincial government of Saskatchewan, and therefore I made it a point to check on the question he raised. May I say to him—and I hope his deskmate will convey to him what I say in this respect and ask him to look it up in Hansard—that I have had the privilege of knowing His Excellency Archbishop Monaghan for many years, and I am sure that the archbishop will deplore the fact that the hon. member saw fit to bring this matter into the debate.

May I say again with all deference to the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay that he can rest assured that this question can be much better left to the good judgment and common sense of the people in the province of Saskatchewan. May I further point out to him and others that people who live so far away and know very little if anything of the situation should be careful about accepting newspaper reports, because they do not always carry the whole story. For example, I have a report taken from the Regina Leader-Post dated July 8, which, while not entirely conforming to the quotation used by the hon. member, is nevertheless close enough to it so that for the present I will not raise any objection. I have, however, a further report taken from the same daily paper, four days later, July 12, in which they again deal with the archbishop's address, and here is what they say in part:

> In a Leader-Post news report of the archbishop's address carried Monday afternoon and Tuesday morning, it was indicated inadvertently—

I should like hon. members to note that.

> —that the criticism was directed only towards the present provincial government, whereas actually His Grace was referring to a long-standing situation which the Roman Catholic church regards as highly unsatisfactory.

As I stated when I began, I regret that occasionally I find it necessary to deal with such matters, but once it becomes necessary I do not hesitate to do so; and since the question has now been brought into the house by the member for Charlevoix-Saguenay, may I take this opportunity to say that in my opinion no political party in Canada has gone as far as we have in the C.C.F.—and this is especially true of Saskatchewan—in our endeavours to prevent the infiltration of communists into the party. We have on a number of occasions used our right to expel from our organization members who belonged to the communist party, because we contend, and rightly so, that no person can be a member of two different political parties at the same time and be honest about it.

Instead of receiving credit for that action, we were from time to time ridiculed and abused, while the Liberal party openly flirted with communists for support. May I further say that while I have not had an opportunity to become fully acquainted with the question that is supposed to have been raised by His Excellency Archbishop Monaghan, I can say that when appointments are made by the C.C.F. government of Saskatchewan that government does not subject applicants to an inquisition as to their religious or political beliefs. I am sure the hon. member will fully agree with that procedure and will also realize that there are some people who will take unfair advantage of this. But I am happy to be able to inform him that when the C.C.F. government of Saskatchewan finds this to be the case, it does not hesitate to take the necessary action to rectify the situation. And it has done so on a number of occasions.

Before I conclude, may I say that I am informed that some serious objection has been raised to the Saskatchewan government allowing the adult education branch to use some material prepared by Dyson Carter, pertaining to atomic energy. I do not know whether he is a believer in communism or whether he belongs to the communist party, nor have I had an opportunity to read his work on atomic energy. I am reliably informed, however, that his work on atomic energy is of a purely scientific nature and makes no reference to religion or political philosophy.

In conclusion, I wish to say a few words on which I had intended elaborating. I can assure the Minister of Finance that it is not our purpose to try to make his difficult task still heavier, but we consider it our duty to bring to his attention and that of the government the feelings of the people back home. We wish to bring to the attention of the government the necessity of giving the people of our country an opportunity to have a fair and decent standard of living, and we say, "While we doubt that you can do it under your system, for goodness sake try to do the best you can and we will help you as much as possible." But sooner or later—I hope sooner, for the benefit of all—the people will wake up to the fact that, regardless of what government we have in power, so long as they allow monopolistic corporations to skim the cream off the production of the nation so long will there be high taxation to carry on the affairs of government. Not only in our country have we this difficulty, but throughout the world, for things are in a state of upheaval. Many people have been looking forward to the time when we could say we had peace. We have longed for peace, worked for peace and fought for peace, but we have no peace.

It is the duty of everyone of us to do his best to bring that peace about, and I should like to read a few quotations from a friend of mine who had something to say when times were hard and difficult:

> Keep alive your faith in the ultimate triumph of good by remembering this wise saying: "There is not enough darkness in the world to put out the light of one small candle."
> Each time we win a victory, we have lit a candle that all the darkness of this world can never extinguish, for that which is good will triumph and will serve as a light to others.
> If we must hate, then let us hate the evil and not those unfortunates who have committed it. Everyone holds a candle, but the wicks on some have not yet been charred. It is our duty to light those candles from ours, and so continue until the day comes when there shall be no darkness.

All this will come to pass when the brotherhood of man becomes a reality.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have had a long and at times interesting debate on the budget. The criticism has been pretty outspoken, and much of it has been severe. As I have listened to hon. members speaking, I have thought sometimes that they have failed to put themselves in the position of a minister of finance or a government trying to finance a country which has come through five or six years of the most terrible war in human history. Most of the speeches have been directed to the urging of measures which would help here and there, but few of the speeches that have come from the opposition parties in this debate have taken into account the necessity of keeping within our means.

This question was raised by the financial critic of the opposition in the opening speech, when he asked: "Do we or do we not believe in deficit budgeting?" Well, Mr. Speaker, I must say I cannot see how a responsible government or a responsible minister of finance could possibly advocate a system of continued deficits in the Dominion of Canada, that is, deficits year after year, year after year. Therefore the government must in some way, particularly at a time when our national income is as great as it has ever been in the history of Canada, try its best to equate revenue with expenditure. That is the reason we cannot be popular and generous in the fiscal measures we put before the country. If I wanted to popularize myself with the opposition parties in this house I could do so. I could recommend high exemptions; I could recommend large reductions in taxation all along the line; I could budget, instead of for a deficit of $300,000,000, for deficit of a billion or a billion and a half, or something like that. And judging by the tone of the opposition speeches we have heard during the past two weeks, my actions would meet with approval.

I cannot bring myself to do that, even though we have to take a hard course. I know my Social Credit friends think there is another way to do it; that is, by the issue of money. Surely, however, at a time like this even the members of the Social Credit party must realize that this country does not need more money in circulation, or more credit; that this is one of the great contributing causes to the inflationary trend which is so obvious at the present time. So we are brought back to this, whether we like it or not and whether or not it is popular; we are brought back to the necessity of equating revenue and expenditures when we have high employment and a high national income.

The Conservative opposition has attacked our expenditures. The C.C.F. opposition has shown no concern about our expenditures. Indeed I want to say to the C.C.F. opposition that I do not think in any of their speeches they have faced up to the real problem confronting the government of Canada at the present time. In many respects their speeches are highly intelligent. I do not want to be considered condescending or patroninzing in saying that, because I enjoy listening to them; but they never come down to this: How would they finance? That is the question they never answer. With regard to the Progressive Conservative opposition, they meet this problem by saying that we should cut our expenditures.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not in the committees of the house.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, well, no; and not in the house, and not in their preelection platform, and not in the country. When we have tried to pin them down to specific savings of expenditures in this house, the showing has been pathetic. There has been a tiny suggestion here and a tiny suggestion there.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Puny stuff.

Mr. ILSLEY: Puny stuff, as my hon. friend says. However, that point has been met during the debate by speeches from this side of the house, and I do not propose to go into it again. There has been some criticism of the fact that these cuts do not take effect until January 1 next, and it has been urged that our new income tax cuts should take effect on July 1, 1946. Well, what were the reasons why we proposed to institute these reductions in taxation on January 1, 1947, instead of July 1, 1946? To begin with, we legislated for 1946 in October of 1945. We made a sixteen per cent cut in our income tax and very heavy cuts in our other taxes in the October budget of last year. The cut for 1946 was provided for then. Some references have been made to promises implied, or something of that kind, by myself that any reductions in this budget would apply to the current calendar year; but no such promises have been read or cited or quoted, nor can any promises to that effect be quoted because I know pretty well what I have said. As I say, 1946 was legislated for by the budget of October 12, 1945; but there are other reasons. One reason is that had we instituted the reductions in income tax effective July 1, 1946, our deficit, instead of being $300,000,000, would have been very much greater than that; and the responsible critics of the budget in this house do not believe, and I agree with them, in deficit financing. Therefore we had to take into account our financial necessities.

It must be remembered that we changed our income tax system here in 1943. From 1917 to 1943 when income tax changes were made they were effective the current year, because the taxes paid in one year were taxes on the income of the preceding year. That is, in 1935, for example, a taxpayer paid taxes on the income of 1934. But that system was changed in 1943, at a very considerable price. We relinquished 50 per cent of our tax, or something of that kind, in order to get the taxpayers of Canada on the pay-as-you-go, pay-as-you-earn plan. So that now when the taxpayers of Canada pay taxes in a certain calendar year, they are paying on the income of that year, and therefore there is not now the traditional reason for making changes in the income tax system apply to the current year. But there is another very good reason against doing it this year. It is, I think, impossible to put a completely new pattern of taxation into force in the middle of the year. What we have done in the budget of this year is a radical thing, so far as income tax is concerned. We have immensely simplified it, to begin with. We have raised the exemption. We have dropped the normal tax. We have instituted a different method of fitting family allowances into the taxation system, and we have replaced tax credits with deductions from income when providing for dependents.

When you have a deduction at the source system, and when you have forms in the hands of thousands and tens of thousands of employers in the country who are making deductions from their employee's incomes and you come along with a completely new system in the middle of the year, you create immense confusion. As a matter of fact no government should make a change like that without giving several months' notice.

For that reason it was felt entirely impracticable to institute a new system of taxation during the current calendar year, and that it would be better to have the deductions start in January, 1947. I do not say that you cannot make any changes which affect a current year. You can make a percentage cut. For instance, you can make a five per cent cut on all taxes, or something of that kind. But I do not think any hon. member would have been in favour of another straight percentage cut. I do not think there would be a member in the house who would be in favour of that. A moderate cut is, I think, all right. We did that. But if you keep that up it is unfair to the low income groups. Therefore we could not attempt another percentage cut. There might be simple changes which you could make during the current year, but not the institution of a new system or introduction of a new pattern of income taxation.

Then there is the question of the provincial agreements. I am not here to put any authoritative interpretation upon these agreements, respecting our obligations to reduce taxation. But I think the relevant clause of the provincial agreements is open to this interpretation, that we must start with the taxes in force on December 31, 1946, and reduce the rate then in force for corporations by ten per cent and reduce the rate in force for individuals by a substantial amount.

If we took $155 million out of our present income tax and substantially reduced our corporation tax in the middle of 1946, we would be in a difficult position if a similar cut were necessary under the provincial agreements at the end of the year. I hope it will be fully understood by the house how important it was and how necessary it was that we should not make the alteration in the middle of the year.

Then there have been criticisms of the reductions in taxation to the effect that they were niggardly. Let us look at that. The reduction for 1947 is very substantial, judged by any responsible standard. In total, including the additional $12 million cost of family allowances it amounts to $155 million, or a quarter of our present income tax revenue. That is the personal income tax. I am under the impression that it is not fully realized that this reduction comes on top of the sixteen per cent reduction that is now in effect and that taken together they represent a total reduction in our personal income tax revenue of $270 million a year, which is over thirty-seven per cent of the revenue from this tax. And mind you, this is within a year and a half after the end of the war. Furthermore, some 550,000 to 600,000 taxpayers will be removed completely from the tax rolls in 1947, and for those remaining taxable the tax will be back to a level lower than the level of 1941. And when you just look at it you can see that certainly a reduction of that order cannot, with any justice, be termed niggardly, particularly when it leaves us in a deficit position.

Then the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) made a criticism of the budget and placed on Hansard a set of tables. I am not going to deal with the first three tables which he placed on Hansard. Whether his first table has any validity or not is a matter of political philosophy, more than anything else.

Mr. KNOWLES: Social philosophy.

Mr. ILSLEY: Social philosophy, perhaps. But I disagree so fundamentally with the whole basis of the argument he used that I do not think I need say anything further to indicate that fact. The second and third tables are difficult to understand, and they do not indicate that there have not been substantial tax reductions. They are very much more complicated than that, and I find them entirely unconvincing. I doubt whether anybody else would find them very convincing. Then, I wish to refer to the fourth table particularly, because of the rather striking statement by the hon. member as it is found at page 3373 of Hansard where it says:

> I have added the average amount of the national defence tax payable in 1941, namely 3½ per cent, to each of the rates in the different brackets. An interesting thing that develops from this table is that in the brackets from zero up to $3,000 of taxable income, the rates in 1947 are greater in all cases than were the rates in 1941. For example, in 1941, the rate for the first $1,000 was 18½ per cent. It is now 22 per cent for the first $250, and 25 per cent for the remainder of the first $1,000. So it goes right on up to $3,000; the rate to be applied under the new budget in each case in these lower brackets is greater than it was in 1941. But from $3,000 to $30,000 the rates to be applied in 1947 are in all cases less than those that were applied in the year 1941.

I said, when the tables were placed on Hansard, that I would not raise any objection to them, but that there was no admission as to the correctness of them. If they were incorrect, and if there were time to do so, an answer would be made, but the hon. member said he vouched for their correctness. However, there is an error in table No. 4, not an arithmetical error, but a more basic error The hon. member has applied the national defence tax only to the part of income over and above exemption, instead of applying the national defence tax to the whole income from the first dollar. Therefore his 18½ per cent is much too low, and the same applies to his other figures. That, I say, vitiates the table. My officials advise me that that is so. Indeed he says:

> I have added the average amount of the national defence tax payable in 1941, namely 3½ per cent, to each of the rates in the different brackets.

Mr. KNOWLES: I will not ask for time to argue my point, but we are trying to get clear as to the basis of this table. Is it not true that the first $1,000 of taxable income over and above the $750 or $1,500 exemption level —I gave as one of the reasons for comparing those two years the fact that the exemption levels are the same—was taxed at the rate of 18½ per cent in 1941, and was therefore comparable to the first $1,000 of taxable income in 1947, which is to be taxed at a rate of up to 25 per cent?

Mr. ILSLEY: This is not so, because the hon. gentleman applied the national defence tax only to the amount over and above the exemption. He would have to apply it all the way down in dealing with the tax on that $1,000. I cannot spend any more time on that. It has been gone into carefully by the officials of my department and that is the conclusion to which we have come.

I should like to say something about the taxation of cooperatives. Hon. members, particularly hon. members of the C.C.F., have taken a position that is surprising to me, that what we are proposing constitutes an attack on cooperatives. I want to deny most emphatically that the government wishes in any way to discourage the cooperative movement in the Dominion of Canada, or that the government had any intention by this proposed legislation of discouraging the cooperative movement in the Dominion of Canada.

Let me give a recapitulation of the course of events. In 1930 the Income War Tax Act was amended to include the present section 4(p), which apparently was intended to give exemption from taxation to certain types of cooperatives. Over a period of years most cooperatives were exempted from tax under this provision, but the law officers of the crown now advise—they have been so advising for the last few years—that in fact very few, if any, cooperatives are organized or operate on such a basis as to secure this exemption.

In the light of this highly unsatisfactory and unsettled situation, the government decided to appoint a royal commission to bring in recommendations. The members of this commission were selected with some care. The cooperative union of Canada was asked to name a member and put forward Mr. B. N. Arnason, deputy minister for cooperation in the government of Saskatchewan. The Canadian chamber of commerce suggested Mr. J. J. Vaughan, a retired business man. The government itself nominated Doctor G. A. Elliott, professor of economics, university of Alberta, and Mr. J. M. Nadeau of Montreal, who combined both economic and legal training, and as chairman, Mr. Justice Errol McDougall, of the court of king's bench, Quebec. I think the house will agree that it would have been difficult to select a more representative or more competent commission. We took great pains in the selection of that commission, because we knew the great importance of the work they were undertaking.

This commission heard evidence from one end of Canada to the other. Hundreds of cooperative organizations appeared before it, as did groups opposed to the cooperatives. They heard economists and lawyers; they visited the United States and they visited the United Kingdom. I venture to suggest that never before in Canada has the question of the cooperatives received such a thorough and complete review. After months of study the commission brought in a report which was unanimous on the important points. This was a remarkable achievement. The government would not have been at all surprised if there had been a minority report or reports, particularly from the members of the commssion who had been appointed at the suggestion of the various interests concerned. However, the main recommendations were unanimous, the only qualification being in the form of reservations.

Mr. KNIGHT: Was the report unanimous? Was there not a minority report?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; the recommendations were unanimous. There are reservations, these being by Mr. Arnason, Mr. Nadeau and Mr. Vaughan, which did not affect in any important way the central body of the report. Under these circumstances, the government would be assuming a heavy responsibility if it departed too far from the recommendations of that report. At least that was the view we took and we have followed the report in the main. Of course the government are under no obligation to adopt the report of a royal commission; they may adopt it, they may vary it, or they may reject it. But in view of the fact that this was a good commission and that the main recommendations were unanimous, the government felt that they should go as far as they possibly could in adopting these recommendations, which they did.

The main point at issue always was: Should patronage dividends be taxed or not? As members of this house know, there was an intensive propaganda against the report of the McDougall commission on that question. That was the main question on which this intensive propaganda took place. All these letters, speeches over the radio, postcards and all that kind of thing were on that main and central and important point, as to whether patronage dividends should be taxed or not. The government has adopted the commission report in that regard. The qualifications are quite small and I shall deal with them.

I can understand people who want to have everything 100 per cent their own way if they can get it, but there must be a little compromise when you have an acute issue of this kind before the people of a country. The commission came to the conclusion that patronage dividends should not be taxed, that they should be regarded as deductions from income. They recognized the fact that there are cooperatives which have no income within the meaning of the Income War Tax Act, that they market the goods of their members on behalf of the members and return everything to the members. In the case of cooperatives which have no income there is no suggestion that there be any tax imposed.

From hearing some of the speeches in the house, one would have thought that we were constructively creating income which was not income otherwise; that where cooperatives are involved we were saying that there must be at least three per cent. The three per cent provision does not apply at all if there is no income of the cooperative; if in fact there is no income, no profits, then there is no taxing at all.

Mr. BURTON: No profit to the organization, but certainly a return to the member.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am talking only about the tax on a corporate body. The only thing we are talking about here is bodies corporate and I am talking about the corporation tax. The commission said that this rule should apply throughout, that any body corporate, cooperative or otherwise, which paid out on the basis of patronage to its members should be entitled to deduct that from its income for taxation purposes. In that way it has the appearance of fairness.

The fact is, of course, that when you make a recommendation of that kind you are making a recommendation which benefits cooperatives but which really does not benefit to any substantial degree their competitors, private business. The great range of private business in Canada cannot practically pay out part of their profits on the basis of patronage. For that reason the cooperative reaction to the McDougall commission report was pretty favourable. Representations were made that we should not adopt this or adopt that or that we should not adopt it entirely, but it was far more favourable than the private trade reaction to the McDougall commission report, far more favourable than the reaction of the other camp. Even though hon. gentlemen opposite call us capitalists or say that we are leading a capitalist raid against the cooperatives and make many other wild accusations against the government, having appointed the commission we have adopted its report in its main recommendation, which is that patronage dividends be deducted for taxation purposes.

There was one qualification. That was the qualification of the three per cent. I think I have made it clear that that does not apply at all unless there is true profit in the organization. If there is true profit in the organization we felt that the organization could only have earned that profit by the employment of capital and that it should not be permitted to pay it out tax-free if by so doing it reduced its taxable revenue below a reasonable return on the capital employed. We are not proposing to stop any cooperative from paying it out as patronage dividends, or to compel any cooperative to make a return on capital employed. They can pay it out in patronage dividends if they wish; but they can only pay it out tax-free to the extent that it exceeds three per cent on the capital employed. That was the underlying principle in that regard, and I stated it this way in the budget speech:

> The principle underlying this rule is that amounts set aside out of taxable income to be distributed in proportion to patronage by a co-operative or company which does not pay at least three per cent on the capital employed in its business contain earnings which arise from the employment of capital and ought not to escape tax entirely. For many cooperatives which pay patronage dividends this modification of the commission's recommendation will have little or no effect, for they already recognize an obligation to pay interest or dividends equal to at least three per cent on capital or retain undistributed income on which tax will be payable. Share capital with a limited dividend and with limitation of voting to one share per member rather than one vote per share was a characteristic feature of the plan of organization of the Rochdale Equitable Pioneers Society, the real founders of the cooperative movement. Cooperatives of this character will usually be able to claim the full amount of their cash patronage dividends as a deductible allowance. Any cooperative which does not set aside as taxable reserves or pay as interest or dividends a total amount equal to three per cent of capital employed, will find itself subject to tax on a portion of the amount it had set aside out of its income to distribute on the basis of patronage.

The three per cent may be paid on loans, not necessarily on shares, and if it is paid on loans, then it is a deduction from income for tax purposes if the cooperative has income.

Mr. BURTON: If the minister will allow a question, he spoke of true profit. Would that be only in the case of dealing with non-members?

Mr. ILSLEY: The commission did not so find, and I cannot so find either. But please do not let us get into a discussion on this now, because there is a resolution coming before the house on which there can be a full discussion of the three per cent and of certain other qualifications and extensions of the commission's report, such as the three-year exemption for cooperatives, which the commission did not recommend except as the Minister of National Revenue might direct. I must say that we have tried to be so fair to cooperatives in this matter that I have been a little surprised at the fury of the attack of some members of the C.C.F. on our motives and on our acts in this regard.

One of the recommendations of the royal commission is that to qualify for exemption of patronage dividends all customers must be treated alike. Some exception has been taken to that. Certain members have said that it would be prejudicial to the development of cooperatives. Our feeling is that that danger is very much exaggerated, very much overstated. In fact, we do not feel that there is any substantial danger at all. But I want to say about all this legislation that we must do something in regard to the taxation treatment of cooperatives. We have had a commission which has been studying the matter for a long, long time, a fair commission, which has attained a degree of unanimity which is surprising in the circumstances. If this legislation that we are proposing as a result of the recommendations of the royal commission does not work well; if it turns out to be prejudicial to the development of cooperatives, which we do not want it to be, it can be changed. But I would appeal to members of the house not to take a 100 per cent position necessarily on everything, because this is one of the most difficult questions with which any government was ever called upon to deal.

With regard to the necessity of patronage dividends being paid on an equal basis to members and non-members, though the government does not consider that the rule requiring equal payment to all customers would retard the development or interfere with the operation of a cooperative, some of the cooperatives seem to have fears of this kind. Therefore the government is prepared to give consideration in committee to whether the rule can be made more flexible without departing materially from the basic recommendations of the commission.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think that is the most fundamental thing in the whole business, myself.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend says he thinks that is the most fundamental thing. The whole commission agreed on that unanimously without any reservation or qualification whatever, that members and non-members must be treated alike, and that is the way we prepared the legislation and are placing it before the house. But I have made the statement that I have just made here, and we stand by that statement.

With regard to the past, the taxation of the grain trade, let us have that put straight before the house. I do not know whether all members understand it or not. It has been referred to as retroactive taxation. We are not proposing to introduce legislation which will tax anything which was earned or accumulated in 1944 or 1945 or 1942 or 1943 or any other year. We are not proposing any retroactive tax legislation. The position we found ourselves in, and I think I have explained it to the house, was this. Between 1930 and 1940 or thereabouts, the pools were regarded as not subject to income tax. Shortly after 1940, doubts arose as to whether they were making a profit or not within the meaning of the Income War Tax Act. Their method of doing business had changed between 1930 and 1940, and doubts arose as to whether they were taxable or not. The opinion of the Department of Justice was taken as to whether they were taxable or not, and in 1941 the Department of Justice gave an opinion that one or more of these pools was taxable. It did not touch the question of patronage dividends. In February of 1943 the Department of Justice gave an opinion that patronage dividends could not be deducted from income for taxation purposes. The pools were so advised and their competitors, the grain trade, were so advised, because the grain trade had previously received an intimation that they could pay patronage dividends. So that during the years 1944 and 1945 the pools operated in the knowledge that it was the opinion of the Department of Justice that they were taxable on the amount of their patronage dividends. They were assessed, and three or four cases were taken to the courts on that. Now, the statement which I made in the budget was an offer of a compromise of the cases that are in the courts. In fact, to do something about these cases in the courts, we have either to abandon them, or to proceed with them, or to settle them, and we have to act responsibly and with a due sense of our responsibility to the other taxpayers of Canada. Anything else would be indefensible. Whether it would be popular or not, I do not know, but it would be indefensible.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Fortunately, the McDougall commission laid down certain principles which they suggested as a basis for treating cases in the past, back assessments. They laid down what they called the principle of good faith, that if corporate bodies had been led to believe that they were not taxable, that they had not been assessed and so on, and they had ordered their affairs on that assumption, that the income tax administration had given them grounds for that belief, the commission did not think it would be fair to go back and tax them. And we absolutely agreed with that.

But with regard to those that were assessed, different considerations arise. So I made the offer which I did in the budget. Now I want to make it clear to hon. members that this is not part of any proposed legislation, it is not covered by any of the resolutions; it is not something which we are voting on; it is not something that we are passing judgment on at all in this house. This matter of our suggested compromise with the pools is something as to which the government must take responsibility. But as we were dealing with cooperatives, and as it was so important, we felt it was a suitable place to make that offer to the pools, because so far as I know it is only the pools and the grain trade that are affected, that come into this at all.

I want to say just this, that while the language used in the budget may convey the impression that it is "take it or leave it", that is, either proceed with the case or do exactly as we say, I do not think that would be quite a reasonable position for a government to take. I think, and I have so advised the representatives of the pools, that if they consider there is anything unfair or inequitable about our offer and wish to make representations to that effect we will give consideration to their representation in discussing settlement of those cases. Any settlement, of course, must be on a basis that can be defended to the taxpayers and public of the Dominion of Canada. I am concerned in maintaining integrity in our financial and taxation administration, and that we must do, whatever happens.

I think that is all I have to say on the question of cooperatives. It is an endless subject, and of course in my remarks to-night I can only touch the high spots, I can only cover a few things which have been raised in the debate.

Mr. MACKENZIE: And you made a very good job of it, too.

Mr. ILSLEY: I wish now to say something about the dominion-provincial conference. It is one of the most important matters which ever came before the House of Commons, and I want the house to believe me that it took a great deal of work and a great deal of consideration to frame the offer which I placed in the budget speech. The attitude of the government has been described by one or more hon. members as the attitude of a person wielding a big stick. I deny that. I deny that there is any coercion in this offer at all, and I deny that there is any big stick in it.

I want to elaborate that a little. The only justification for an accusation that there is a big stick here would be a state of affairs like this, that we were virtually driving the provinces into this position, that there were undue differences in the aggregate level of personal income, corporation and succession duty taxation as between adhering provinces and non-adhering provinces. I do not know whether I have made that clear or not; but that would be the essence of coercion, that would be the only justification, I should say, for any claim of coercion, that we had so framed the thing that there were undue differences in the taxation burden, that there had necessarily to be undue differences in the tax burden in the adhering provinces and the non-adhering provinces. That is not so. We almost leaned over backwards to see that it was not so, so that this accusation of coercion could not be made.

In the case of personal income tax, a tax credit up to five per cent of the dominion tax is given to taxpayers in a non-adhering province.

In the case of corporation taxes we insist that adhering provinces levy a corporation tax of five per cent.

As for succession duties, while the dominion's succession duties have been doubled, there is a credit of the succession duty paid to the provinces up to one-half of the new succession duties. It would take a long time to explain just the reasons for those three provisions.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend is applauding that for some reason or another, but the reason for those provisions is to make sure that there would not be undue or important differences in the aggregate level of personal income, corporation and succession duty taxation in the adhering provinces and the non-adhering provinces. That is the reason for these provisions, and the reason we went that far is so that we could answer the charge that we are wielding a big stick or working any coercion here. I repudiate entirely the charge of coercion or a big stick. It is entirely unjustified.

Mr. CASE: Was there a promise made to the provinces in 1941?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not understand the hon. gentleman's question.

Then there is the criticism that we have not tried to reach unanimous agreement by having another general conference. I do not want to be too vivid in my language, but you cannot spend the whole year holding conferences, hoping that one may succeed; you cannot do that when your tax agreements are running out and when, if they do run out without an agreement of some kind, the most serious consequences follow. We spent nine months with the provinces and we had conference after conference. Our own offer was used as the basis of the discussions, up to the last minute, so to speak. Finally, we got one offer, one definite independent offer from one of the provinces, and it was far apart from ours; it was $134 million more than ours, when you put a valuation on the tax fields, and perhaps a great deal more than that, perhaps another $100 million. That was all proved by me in the speech I made in the dominion-provincial conference, and it is found in the records of the proceedings of May 3, 1946. While someone said my figures were wrong or absurd or something like that, they have never been proved to be wrong because they are correct. Now, the premier of the province that made that offer—and I do not know that even that was good enough for the premier of another province, because there was no indication that he would associate himself with it—said this:

> The government of Ontario has gone the very limit in making agreement possible, and when I say that it has gone the very limit I mean that it is prepared to make adjustments in detail, but not adjustments in principle or adjustments in regard to the net overriding amount which it receives.

I have a pile of editorials accusing the government of going entirely too far before that, because the total cost of our offers to the provinces when everything was considered was very great. When we found, after nine months of conference, that we simply got to the point where, unless we "upped" our offer by another $134 million to $234 million there was no chance of agreement—and budget time was approaching and the existing agreements were running out—we felt we had to take a different line, and so we put this offer in the budget. We hope the provinces will come in. It is doubtful whether they will all come in, doubtful at any rate whether they will all come in soon. However, we hope that the framework has been laid for an eventual agreement with all the provinces.

I wish now to say something about this great discouragement of production for which we are supposed to be responsible by our failure to take off the excess profits tax or to lower the corporation tax further. One of the speakers in the opposition advanced the argument that our taxes were so much higher than those in the United States that the United States would get the business, that goods would be made in that country instead of in Canada.

What is the comparative situation? Under this budget our corporation tax in Canada will be thirty per cent. The provinces who accept our offer—the adhering provinces, as I call them—will impose a tax of five per cent, namely a corporation tax; and the non-adhering provinces, I presume, will be obliged to impose a tax of five per cent, or perhaps more, though I doubt it. Corporate income is big, and five per cent was a fairly normal pre-war rate. There you have thirty-five per cent. That will be the corporation rate of tax on the great majority of corporations in the dominion. What is the comparable United States rate? The comparable United States rate is thirty-eight per cent plus such corporation state taxes as there are. That is the comparison with regard to companies not in the excess profits class.

With regard to the excess profits companies, this is the situation. Those which in 1947 earn more than 116⅔ per cent of standard profits will be taxed, under dominion legislation, forty-five per cent—thirty per cent plus fifteen per cent on the excess over 116⅔ per cent of standard profits—and they will be taxed, presumably, by the province another five per cent. That is to say, you will have a tax on that excess on the amount of profits exceeding 116⅔ per cent of standard profits, of fifty per cent. But taking the tax over the whole range of their business, they will have to have very large excess profits indeed for their excess profits tax and their corporation tax to be greater than thirty-eight per cent, plus state taxes in the United States.

What, therefore, becomes of this argument that by our short-sighted, ignorant way of taxing corporations we are going to drive manufacturing business from Canada to the United States? As a matter of fact, there is no justification whatever for the contention; nor is there any justification for the statement that is constantly made that we have a great deal of unemployment, an undue amount of unemployment at the present time, and that production is away down. One of my colleagues, in the course of this debate, made a statement which is quite true, namely, that we have the greatest volume of peace-time production in Canada that we have ever known, and the figures with regard to employment are very much more favourable than those given in the debate.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton), speaking on July 15, at page 3480 of Hansard said that Canada was employing 629,000 more people than in 1939, more people than ever before in peace time. That was the figure at February 1. Yesterday the dominion bureau of statistics issued figures indicating that since February 1 of this year an additional 390,000 people were employed in Canada. We had thus 1,019,000 more people employed on June 1, 1946, than were employed in 1939, a remarkably successful effort at reconversion. The dominion bureau of statistics also estimates that the number of unemployed here looking for work in the week ending June 1 had fallen to 126,000, or about 87,000 below the estimate for February 23, which was the last estimate given. The figure of 126,000 is considered to be below normal unemployment in times of relatively full employment. Even during the peak period of the war there were sometimes 50,000 and even more people unemployed. The figure of 126,000 represents less than three per cent of the civilian labour force of 4,828,000. There is, therefore, no basis for the contention that our fiscal policies are preventing production and creating unemployment—no basis at the present time and no basis for the foreseeable future.

I consider this budget, whatever may be said about it by opposition critics, to be the right type of budget. We can go ahead and incur huge deficits, and do everything that everybody wants for a while if we can get people to lend us the money.

An hon. MEMBER: Why borrow?

Mr. ILSLEY: Why borrow? I suppose the hon. gentleman suggests that we should print it, issue it. Well, whatever we did, whether we issued it or borrowed it, if we kept that up there would be inflation of the currency such as would eventually destroy the value of our money. It is not much fun living in a country when the value of your money is going to pieces. I do not say for a moment that it is going to pieces here; not by any means. I do not want that to be taken from what I say. What I do say is that inflation is a bitter thing, and inflation we would have if we did not maintain some degree of responsibility in our financing. People may think it is unimportant, but it is never unimportant. It has never been considered unimportant in the past, and it is not regarded as unimportant by the labour government in Great Britain, by the non-labour government in the United States—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Or by the Liberal government of Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY:—or by the Liberal government of Canada. There is one development in this debate which I was glad to see. I was glad to see members of the Progressive Conservative party, even in their feeble halting and ineffective way, struggling to criticize expenditures.

Mr. FRASER: We did not have to struggle very hard.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman's contribution was to produce an empty envelope. I join with them, but I do not for one moment admit the government has not done everything within its power under the circumstances to get expenditures down. We have made tremendous cuts in the expenditures; and unless we can get better suggestions than we got from the opposition in this debate, as to where to go from here, we shall have to think of other means ourselves. I do not mind saying that I wish a lot of this pie-in-the-sky business, such as we find in the Progressive Conservative platform, would be cut out for a while now, and I think it will be, inside and outside this house until we get our budgets balanced, especially in periods when our employment and income are high.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the house is to go into committee of ways and means to consider the measures by which the government is proposing to raise the funds necessary to carry on the government of Canada. The debate on this motion has come to be known as the budget debate. Whatever else may or may not be discussed in the budget, there are three things that always are; the question of expenditures, the question of taxes and the question of the government's attitude toward its increasing debt and caring for that debt. Any other matter may be raised during the budget debate, but to-night I propose to deal only with two points, because most of the other points have been dealt with by speakers on all sides of the house as well as by members of the party for which I speak.

I wish to refer to two of the points referred to to-night by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), namely, the question of dominion-provincial relations and the question of the taxation of cooperatives. Before I do that, I might comment upon the closing remarks a moment ago of the Minister of Finance when he said that if we did not show him how to reduce expenditures, they would have to go and do it themselves.

Mr. ILSLEY: I said we are doing it.

Mr. BRACKEN: The Minister of Finance says that they are doing it. The Canadian people will have their own opinion about that when they realize that the present budget in a peace-time year provides for the expenditure of $2,700 million, or five and a half times as much as was provided for in any peace-time year before the war. They will have their own opinion when they realize the size of the tax bill which, with the non-tax revenue, is now some $2,400 million, or five times as much as in any other peace-time year. They will give consideration also to the increasing indebtedness which this year is $300 million on current account and $1,000 million on capital account, and they will as well give consideration to the size of the total debt of this country, which now stands at nearly $16,000 million, or more than four times what it was in any peace-time year.

As I said, I propose to deal only with two questions, that of dominion-provincial relations and that of the taxation of cooperatives. In connection with the latter, the Minister of Finance has anticipated one or two of the things I had intented to say. Nevertheless I shall say what I intended to say in the manner I was prepared to say it.

The question of dominion-provincial relations was first set out in detail in the British North America Act, 1867. In that act the dominion government was given certain powers and the provinces were given certain powers. The dominion government was given certain responsibilities and the provinces were given certain responsibilities. These powers and responsibilities are set out pretty largely in sections 91 and 92 of the act. Dealing with the powers resting with the dominion, section 91 has this to say:

. . . the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say,—

I shall mention just two subsections:

(3) The raising of money by any mode or system of taxation.

In other words, the dominion government is not limited in the field of taxation.

(4) The borrowing of money on the public credit.

The powers of the provinces with respect to taxation and the raising of money are set out in section 92 which provides:

In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,—

2. Direct taxation within the province in order to raise a revenue for provincial purposes.

In other words, the provinces are limited to the field of direct taxation and cannot invade the field of indirect taxation. Subsection 3 reads:

3. The borrowing of money on the sole credit of the province.

So much for the relative powers of the dominion and the provinces with respect to taxation.

How were the responsibilities divided? The exclusive powers and responsibilities of the provinces are largely enumerated in section 92. They cover taxation and borrowing, already mentioned, the management and sale of public lands belonging to the province and of the timber and wood thereon; public and reformatory prisons in and for the province, and so on. In order to shorten my remarks, I shall not take the time to read these in detail, since any hon. member can read them in section 92. To summarize the responsibilities of the provinces covered, among many other things, education and social services and caring for the natural resources of the country. I could go on and give the details, but they are there to be read by anyone and I am sure hon. members are more or less familiar with them.

What were the dominion's responsibilities? In addition to the enumerated powers set out in section 91, they were given the general power and responsibility to make laws for peace, order and good government. I can summarize the responsibilities of the dominion as set out in section 91 by saying that they had to do with questions of trade and commerce; banking; peace, order and good government; criminal law and so on. A number of other items are set out in detail.

There was joint or double jurisdiction in connection with agriculture and immigration. Section 93 makes education a provincial responsibility, subject to certain remedial powers reserved to the governor in council of Canada. As I said, section 95 makes agriculture and immigration a joint responsibility of the dominion and the provinces.

We are thus living to-day under a federal system, a system under which the powers of the two sections are set out specifically and where the responsibilities of each are also set out. The relationship thus set out in 1867 and the other clauses of the act constitute the constitution of Canada.

In the seventy-nine years since then, several things have been demonstrated with respect to the federal system of carrying on our affairs. One is that the advantages of confederation have been inequitably distributed. Confederation tended to centralize business and industry more or less in the centre of the nation. In addition, the national laws tended to benefit—I am referring now more particularly to the tariff—the industrial sections. The result was that industry in considerable part left the maritimes and developed in the central part of Canada. Agriculture developed in the western part of Canada. And without much in the way of industry the western provinces and British Columbia became largely exporting provinces.

Since that time, seventy-nine years ago, the responsibilities of the provinces in confederation have increased. At the beginnng there was no government aid to hospitals, no mothers' allowances, not many social services. Social services as we know them to-day were scarcely known seventy-nine years ago, They have multiplied many times since then. Public opinion has demanded them and conditions have made them possible. The responsibility for them fell largely upon the provinces.

But the only source of revenue of the provinces, direct taxation, was never enlarged, and the small subsidies granted to the provinces in the beginning increased only very slowly. The public services which fell upon the provinces were increasing two hundred, three hundred and four hundred per cent per capita, while the subsidies granted to the provinces in 1867 scarcely increased at all, and in the early years there was very little resort even to direct taxation.

As a result of these conditions—and it was emphasized particularly during the period of 1930's—certain sections of Canada could not provide a measure of public service on anything like a reasonable standard without imposing excessively heavy rates of taxation on the people of the provinces affected. Under those conditions there arose a demand upon the dominion government to sit in with the provinces and arrange either to take over more of the responsibilities which fell upon the provinces or to raise additional funds and give them to the provinces on the basis of fiscal need wherever it was needed. These demands, of course, had arisen many times before 1930 and adjustments had been made for the maritimes, the prairies, for British Columbia, in fact for all the provinces. But the question became a major problem in the depression of the thirties, and accordingly the dominion government was prevailed upon to appoint a royal commission, which later became known as the Rowell-Sirois commission, to inquire into dominion-provincial relations. The order in council appointing that commission, P.C. 1908, had the following four instructions for the commission:

(a) to examine the constitutional allocation of revenue sources and governmental burdens to the dominion and provincial governments, the past results of such allocation and its suitability to present conditions and the conditions that are likely to prevail in the future;

(b) to investigate the character and amount of taxes collected from the people of Canada, to consider these in the light of legal and constitutional limitations, and of financial and economic conditions, and to determine whether taxation as at present allocated and imposed is as equitable and as efficient as can be devised;

(c) to examine public expenditures and public debts in general, in order to determine whether the present division of the burden of government is equitable, and conducive to efficient administration, and to determine the ability of the dominion and provincial governments to discharge their governmental responsibilities within the framework of the present allocation of public functions and powers, or on the basis of some form of reallocation thereof;

(d) to investigate dominion subsidies and grants to provincial governments.

Let me refer to that commission briefly. Hearings commenced in Winnipeg in 1937 and continued for more than a year. Eighty-five hearings in all were held across Canada. The commission's report was presented in May, 1940, after two and a half years of study. In January, 1941, more than three years after the commission had started its work, the ten governments concerned met in Ottawa to consider the report. I do not need to remind the house that that conference failed to agree on what to do about the matter. Let me only say again that the commission took nearly three years to study the question, and the dominion government, so it is reported, spent something exceeding half a million dollars in providing for it. A voluminous report was presented by the commission. If I may say so, it is the best study that has ever been made of dominion-provincial relations since confederation. The report consists of three published volumes and many exhibits. They and the exhibits submitted in connection with the report are, in my judgment, the best statement of Canadian political and economic problems that has ever been published.

As I said, the conference of 1941 failed. It is no use now going into postmortems with respect to it. It is enough to say that three provinces disagreed to proceeding to consider the commission's report at that time, and the dominion government dropped the matter. Well, it was a problem that could not stay dropped. Before I go on to say what followed, let me indicate to the house what that commission recommended. The commission had made a more exhaustive study of dominion-provincial relations and of the political and economical problems of this country than had ever been made before. What were their findings? A brief summary of them will be found on pages 81 to 110 of book II of the commission's report.

Briefly, the dominion was to do four things: (1) Take over all provincial debts; (2) take over the responsibility for unemployment relief for employables; (3) pay a national adjustment grant to certain of the provinces as recommended by an advisory board; and (4) pay an abnormal emergency grant if made necessary by some abnormal conditions. Those were the duties which the commission would have imposed on the dominion government.

As an offset to that, the provinces were to cease to use the following three forms of taxation: personal income tax, taxes on corporations or corporate income, and succession duties.

As I have said, the dominion government called the provinces into conference in January, 1941. That conference blew up. Since then, there have been three different approaches to this problem. The first of these we now speak of as the wartime tax suspension agreement. It was worked out late in 1941 and agreed to by the different provinces in sessions of their legislatures, most of them early in 1942. The wartime tax suspension agreement was for the period of the war and for a time after the war, and terminates in some provinces this fall and in other provinces next spring.

The government was now faced with what to do when the war-time tax suspension agreements end. The government called another conference last August and presented another proposal. That proposal was modified in several minor respects at different times, and finally the conference on the government's proposals failed once more. Then, as the Minister of Finance said to-night, facing conditions as they are, the government decided to bring in still another proposal, which is the proposal now before us in the finance minister's budget. So that, following the failure of the Rowell-Sirois commission recommendations there has been a continued attack upon this question, and as well a progressive programme of mounting costs in the plans advanced.

Let me give the house a little idea of the different approaches made in these different periods. The implementing of the Rowell-Sirois commission recommendations would have cost the government $40 million. Hon. members may find that statement on page 109 of book II of the report. Forty million dollars to implement the Rowell-Sirois report. The war-time tax suspension agreements cost the dominion for the use of the personal and corporation taxes $86 million a year. Forty million dollars, eighty-six million dollars. The government's August proposal last year was estimated to cost the dominion as a rental payable to the provinces a minimum of $138 million, or, for the year 1947, $185 million. That proposal was amended at different times and, as finally presented in January of this year, it was estimated to cost the dominion $180 million as a minimum, and almost $200 million for 1947. Forty million dollars, eighty-six million dollars, one hundred and eighty-five million dollars, nearly two hundred million dollars.

And that is not all; that is only the contribution of the dominion to the provinces. In the proposals of last August there were not only financial and taxation suggestions made, but also a huge programme of social services and another programme of public investment; and it has been estimated by different persons that the total cost of all these would have been, not $40 million or $85 million, or $186 million, or $200 million, but $600 million.

And even that figure did not include the charges which would fall upon the provinces if these agreements were proceeded with, because there would have been other taxes falling upon them of—some of these things have to be an estimate—approximately $200 million. So that proposal meant, when eventually completed—it would not all be completed in a year—additional expenditures for this country, both dominion and provincial, amounting to $800 million a year. That is what the government's 1945-46 proposal with respect to finances and taxes, and the increased social security programme and that of public investment would have cost the people of Canada.

As I have said, the dominion proposals of last year contain three types of activities, finance and taxation, in which the dominion would take three taxes—income tax, corporation tax, succession duty—and give to the provinces, in their final recommendation for the year 1947, almost $200 million a year—$198 million. But, in addition to this, there is a huge programme of social security and also a programme of public investment aimed to try to prevent or to lessen a possible depression. As I said, the proposal was loaded with a social security and a public investment programme as well as financial and taxation features.

Prior to that, the dominion had put into effect a $240 million per annum family allowance programme. Aside from family allowances, in which the dominion admittedly invaded a field which was probably of provincial jurisdiction, the government's August, 1945, proposals so far as dominion expenditure are concerned would add up like this: rental payment for the three taxes, $198 million; old age pensions, cost to the dominion treasury, $217 million; health grants and health insurance, cost to dominion treasury, $163 million; or a total of $578 million. But from that would be deducted the amount estimated as the dominion contribution to old age pensions at present paid of $45 million, leaving these new proposals estimated to cost $533 million.

But, in addition to that $533 million, there were five items of unknown cost in the outline of the dominion proposals. Those five items were as follows: planning grants for public investment projects; timing grants for public investment projects; grants up to fifty per cent of the cost of national resources service, production and development; unemployment assistance equal to 85 per cent of unemployment insurance benefits; and the recognition of provincial priority with respect to taxation of mining and logging operations. The total programme would cost the dominion government on ordinary account between five and six hundred million dollars. The Financial Post, in its issue of August 11, 1945, estimated that the cost would be not less than $600 million.

The latest statement I have looked at with respect to the estimated cost is from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) at page 234 in the Hansard proceedings of the dominion-provincial conference dated May 3 last. The minister in his statement brought the total of enumerated dominion payments up to $527 million; and as I have said, he indicated that there were other items to be added to that figure; independent students have estimated that it would approximate $600 million.

What of the expenditures which this programme would impose upon the provinces? The premiers would have to finance their share of the dominion's proposed health services amounting to over $100 million. There would be additional commitments for a programme of greatly increased expenditures for hospitals, nursing centres and large facilities for the training of medical and nursing personnel. The provinces and municipalities would have to pay eighty per cent of the cost of the dominion's public investment project, the dominion—except in the case of limited classes of work—paying only twenty per cent. If the dominion were serious in putting forward these public investment proposals, it is not unreasonable to assume that they would involve an additional expenditure of between $200 million and $300 million on the part of the provinces. This means a total bill that would be imposed on the taxpayers running to between $700 million and $900 million, or let us say, $800 million, depending upon what degree of seriousness can be attached to the dominion's public investment proposals and how rapidly the programme might be proceeded with.

The dominion was asked how its social security proposals of 1945 were to be financed. It was supposed to be exploring with the provinces the possibilities of financing its share of the cost of the social security programme by some special means other than that of the general tax system now in force in Canada. Later, it became evident that the dominion had fairly clear views on the matter, as far as raising money was concerned—much clearer than were their views as to the projects which the governments were invited to underwrite. In the report of August 29, 1945, of the dominion-provincial proceedings—at pages 9 and 10, will be found this statement by the Prime Minister:

> It is intended to meet a part of the dominion's share of the cost of the broad extension of social security, included in the dominion proposals by means of direct personal contributions.

So that what is contemplated is some other tax in addition to the taxes which we already have. The dominion wants to finance a substantial part of its social security programme by means of an additional three to five per cent tax on all personal incomes without any exception whatever. True, the rate was not definitely arrived at, but ministers—notably the Minister of National Health and Welfare—were quoting examples of New Zealand and Australia where the rates are 5 and 7½ per cent on income respectively.

The dominion also proposed that the provinces, to meet their share of the cost of this programme, should levy an individual tax or registration fee or, as some call it, a poll tax on every person of the age of sixteen or over. One province computed that such a levy would amount to $12 per head. Everyone knows that health services cost something, whether they are paid for publicly or privately; and while the government is talking about tax reduction through one side of its month, through the other side it talks about huge projects that mean vastly increased expenditures and taxes.

Let us take the example of a married man with three children, sixteen and over. That family, on the basis of $12 per head registration fee, would pay $60. If that man's income were $2,000 and the dominion rate were five per cent, they would pay another $100, or $160 would come out of that family to finance the dominion health programme—and that is in addition to the present taxation.

What the government did in August, 1945, what it has been doing for some months since, is trying to use the taxpayers' money to bribe and bludgeon the provinces into the surrender of their constitutional rights. It was not the objects sought that were bad; but the dominion's means and methods of trying to accomplish them were, I think, reprehensible. By offering large hand-outs without being too specific about where they were coming from, or the additional taxes they would require, and by vague general assertions that the dominion could make taxes less painful than the provinces, they sought to take from the provinces their great sources of taxation. And, as if it were an afterthought, they added, in effect, "You will finance your share of health commitments by individual taxes or registration fees or a poll tax."

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that it was my privilege to attend the closing conference in April or May of this year, and as a witness to that conference I wish to pay a tribute to all those who took part. I believe they were good Canadians. The premiers of the provinces, the representatives of the dominion government, all knew that they were facing heavy tasks. They all knew that they were facing serious problems. They all knew what their various problems were in the different sections of Canada and they stated their positions as well as they knew how.

Personally I was proud of those men, proud to be associated with them as a Canadian. They did not all agree. Some provinces felt that there were others more well to do. Those who knew they were in need did not have any difficulty in stating that they would like to get all they could. Those premiers who represented provinces which perhaps in the past have not been so much in need are still the premiers of their provinces. All those men, good Canadians as they were, were still the premiers of their provinces. The dominion officials were here trying to act for the whole country. I repeat, I was proud of those men as I listened to their deliberations. Naturally I was disappointed when the conference failed, but I do not propose now to attach blame to anyone. I think the groundwork of the conference might have been better laid. You cannot bring together men with different points of view in a nation like this and ask them to agree on complicated questions of this kind even after nine months. Why, even the Sirois commission took three years to study the questions submitted to them.

I do not propose to go into a postmortem. What this parliament has to do is to look at the situation as it is now and determine what is best for Canada. The conference failed. As the Minister of Finance has said, he was then faced with the preparation of his budget, and the provinces also were faced with the preparation of their budgets. And so on June 27 the Minister of Finance brought down his budget and submitted this new watered-down proposal. In it he is going to negotiate with each province individually, and he is going to offer the same total amount to the provinces of Canada as he did last summer and winter —$198 million, for 1947, on the basis of $15 a head. On the promise of $15 a head the government asks the provinces to give up to the dominion the sole right to the income tax, corporation tax and succession duties for the next five years, not three years as in the August, 1945, proposal; but the government is leaving out of this proposal the other feature it advanced last summer for social security and public investment. This proposal, which will require the dominion government to pay to the provinces $198 million next year, leaves out the other huge expenditures under the large programmes brought forward last fall. There is nothing in it now with respect to that social security programme—increased old age pensions, health insurance, unemployment assistance and so on—and nothing for public investment.

This means the abandonment, at least for the time being, by the dominion of that social security programme and the public investment programme. A very proper question at this time is, why does the dominion now abandon its social security and public investment programmes? If they were good programmes they should be put into effect. If they were not good programmes the dominion should frankly say so, instead of trying to make scapegoats of the provinces.

In his budget speech the Minister of Finance indicated a loss in revenue through tax reductions amounting to $266,000,000, to be effective next year. The government is now bemoaning the fact that it cannot make effective tax reductions because of the failure to reach agreement with the provinces. In that respect it is trying to ride two horses going in different directions. One of the reasons put forward in support of its proposals was that they would result in reduced taxation. Think of a government coming forward with a programme the burden of which, through the dominion and provincial taxes, would amount to $800,000,000 a year and then saying, "Put this into effect and we will be able to reduce taxation more than if it is not put into effect."

In the conference proceedings for Monday, April 29, the Prime Minister is quoted as having said:

> In respect to the personal income tax, as now levied, the government is prepared to say that once the dominion proposals are accepted, and the risk of having dominion policies nullified by provincial policies having contrary economic effects is thereby avoided, the government intends to make further reductions in the personal income tax.

Think of it; that proposal, involving as I have shown a burden on the Canadian people when it is fully in effect of $800,000,000 extra, and the government then saying, in effect, "If you sign that we will be able to reduce taxes more than if you do not sign."

Continuing, the Prime Minister said:

> In the same circumstances the government also intends to reduce the element of double taxation of corporate income with its tendency to discourage risk-taking enterprise.

As a matter of fact, in the contracts entered into in 1942 with the provinces the dominion government was required to reduce the corporation and income taxes; it had no choice if it was to carry out the terms of the agreement. The Prime Minister made that statement in face of the fact that if the government's programme were put into effect additional expenditures would be imposed upon the tax payers amounting to some $600,000,000 in dominion taxes and $200,000,000 in provincial taxes, or a total of approximately $800,000,000; that is, if and when the full programme were put into effect.

The government laments that without the programme we can have tax reductions of only $266,000,000. What, I ask, would the tax reductions be with the programme in effect? Is the money coming out of a magic well? If the programme were put fully into effect, instead of a reduction in taxes of $266,000,000 in 1947 we might look for an increase of at least that amount in dominion taxation, together with an increase of a couple of hundred million dollars in provincial taxation in the near future.

According to the conference proceedings for May 3, at pages 222 and 235, the premier of Nova Scotia made an answer to this attempt to blame the provinces for the likely failure of the dominion to make substantial reductions in taxes. He said:

> I should like to point out that there is more than one way of balancing a budget. There is more than one way of lowering income tax. Much has been made of that at this conference. That statement has been repeated again and again that if the income tax is to be lowered then the dominion proposals themselves—that is the effect of the statement at any rate—must be accepted. And the implication—I do not say that this is the implication desired by the federal minister—which will spread throughout Canada is that if this conference fails and income tax is not reduced, the responsibility will rest on those nine wicked men from the provinces who came here and refused to enter into an agreement.

That statement was made by the Premier of Nova Scotia, a former colleague of many hon. gentlemen opposite, who sat right over there and who is familiar not only with dominion problems but with provincial problems as well.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Would my hon. friend permit me to intervene on a matter of procedure?

Mr. BRACKEN: Certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I could not talk to the hon. gentleman personally because he was on his feet, but I consulted the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) as to sitting after eleven o'clock, and would like to move:

> That the house be not adjourned at eleven o'clock p.m. this day, and that the provisions of standing order 7 be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. COLDWELL: When we agreed to this half an hour ago, I understood that the vote would be taken at eleven o'clock. I heard the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) say he was covering two subjects to-night, dominion-provincial relations and the cooperatives. He has not yet concluded that part of his address dealing with dominion-provincial relations; therefore I am going to oppose extension of the time beyond eleven o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Very well.

Mr. BRACKEN: It is a matter of no importance to me, but I gather that if anyone objects to the suggestion offered by the minister, we have no choice but to adjourn. I might be finished in twenty minutes, but that is neither here nor there. Therefore I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Bracken the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, July 19, 1946

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Fifth report of the standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Cleaver.

Twentieth and twenty-first reports of standing committee on veterans affairs.—Mr. Croll (for Mr. Tucker).

PRIVILEGE

MR. FRASER—OMISSION OF QUESTIONS SUBMITTED FOR ORDER PAPER

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Yesterday afternoon at the hour of 3.30 I submitted in the usual way eight questions for the order paper, but to-day, in the Votes and Proceedings dated Thursday, July 18, 1946, these questions are not listed. I now ask for a full explanation, coupled with the request that an order do issue that these eight questions be listed in Votes and Proceedings of to-day as being questions for the order paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall take note of the observations made by the hon. member.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

CANADA-MEXICO AND CANADA-COLOMBIA

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to table copies in English and French of a trade agreement between Canada and Mexico, signed at Mexico City on February 8, 1946, treaty series 1946, No. 4; also a trade agreement between Canada and Colombia signed at Bogota on February 20, 1946, treaty series 1946, No. 7.

JAPANESE

PETITION FOR LEGISLATION PROVIDING FOR DEPORTATION FROM CANADA

Mr. J. L. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to lay on the table of the house a petition signed by approximately 8,000 residents of British Columbia, humbly praying that this honourable house may be pleased to enact such measures as may be necessary to ensure that all people of Japanese descent be deported from Canada at the close of the present war, and that provisions for their acceptance by Japan be embodied in the armistice or peace terms.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO QUESTIONS DROPPED FROM ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I direct your attention again, Mr. Speaker, to the matter of questions? Two questions that were permitted to stand yesterday have been dropped and do not appear on to-day's order paper. I think this will require some explanation to the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have noted the observation made by the hon. member.

Mr. STIRLING: May I ask the minister who is leading the house if he will be good enough to explain by what order or under what regulations a question which stood as No. 1 on the order paper for yesterday has been removed from the order paper of to-day? It was a question which had to do with War Assets Corporation.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not in a position to give an answer to the hon. member. The house is master of its own proceedings. It is not the government that makes up the order paper. I do not know the import of the hon. gentleman's question, but I understand it concerns a question which was on the order paper and which has been removed. It has certainly not been removed by any order of the government.

Mr. STIRLING: May I address a question to Your Honour as the chief officer of the house? By whose orders has a question been removed from its place on the order paper?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have noted the observation made by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will you kindly look over all the questions, Mr. Speaker? It seems to me that there are at least two questions that were not answered yesterday that do not appear to-day. One was in connection with radio, asked by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher), and another was asked by the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden).

Mr. HAZEN: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question for you to take under consideration? It is this: Can a question be struck from the order paper in consequence of a statement or suggestion made by the Speaker that does not amount to a ruling?

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAMME FOR THE SESSION—SUGGESTED POSTPONEMENT OF CERTAIN MEASURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): I should like to bring up a matter which I think affects all members of the house. I notice that there are thirty-one items on the order paper which still have to be passed, in addition to nearly all the estimates. May I direct a question to the leader of the house?—he is not in his seat, but surely some one will convey my message to him. Would not the government consider leaving over until next session some of the legislation that is now on the order paper? There are some measures which are not particularly important at this particular time of the session. Could not the government revise its legislative programme and leave some of the less important measures over to the next session?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I can give the hon. member assurance that the object he has in view is under constant consideration. It is not intended to ask the house to deal with anything which could be postponed until next session without injury to the public interest.

BEEF

REVISION OF SCHEDULE OF PRICES AND GRADING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) the following question:

> The daily newspapers of yesterday carried an announcement that a revision of the schedule of beef prices and grading allows an increase in the wholesale ceiling prices on red and blue brand beef, effective July 22. Has any provision been made to allow those with slaughter permits where no official grading is possible to enjoy these increases in price?

In answer to the hon. gentleman I would say that the wholesale price increases on beef authorized to go into effect on July 22 apply to red and blue branded beef in all zones, and also apply to commercial quality beef in all eastern zones. The special position of red and blue branded beef has been recognized both in the zone price ceilings established by the wartime prices and trade board and in the support prices established by the meat board. Apart from the authorized increases in wholesale prices for commercial beef in eastern Canada, no provision has been made to enable slaughter permit holders, where official grading is not possible, to take advantage of the authorized increases in wholesale prices of red and blue brand beef.

METEOROLOGICAL SERVICES

ARCTIC REGIONS—QUESTION OF ESTABLISHING WEATHER STATION ON MELVILLE ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to ask a question of the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of certain preliminary information which has already reached the public relating to the alleged request of the United States government that Canada establish a metorological station on Melville island, is the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs in a position to make a statement to the house respecting the matter?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): I thank the hon. member for letting me know in advance of his intention to ask this question. There have been discussions between the United States and Canadian authorities concerning the expansion of meteorological services in Arctic regions, and the suggestion was made that a weatehr station might be experimentally established as a cooperative venture in the region of Melville island in the Canadian Arctic. The proposal was that this should be a small civilian station. The government has not rejected this proposal, but has decided to defer its decision until later in the year.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is the minister aware that advertisements have already been authorized by the United States government asking for applications to work for tne United States in the Arctic regions of Canada? I have a copy of the advertisement upstairs.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: We have no official information about that, but it is quite possible there may have been some recruiting of personnel, because the matter of experimental work in the northern regions is one that has been under discussion for some time.

[Mr. Mayhew.]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA HARD ROCK MINERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): I should like ta ask the Minister of Labour a question with respect to the miners' strike in British Columbia, based on a message which I have received from the mine union in Wells. Is the minister aware that the negotiations now being carried on are on a local basis and therefore unsatisfactory? Will he consider instructing the commissioner to endeavour to have the negotiations carried on on a provincial basis?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): In the first place, the Minister of Labour does not instruct commissioners. I think that would be a bad procedure to adopt, because it cuts both ways. If the employers came to the Minister of Labour and asked him to instruct the commissioner there would be criticism from the other side. If I were to instruct the commissioner because of a request made by the miners, naturally there would be criticism from the opposite side. Frankly I do not know the import of the question, but I believe the hon. member is referring to negotiations on an industry wide basis.

Mr. IRVINE: Quite correct.

Mr. MITCHELL: I cannot instruct the commissioner. He is trying to conciliate a dispute, and I am sure we all hope he will be successful.

FLOUR

SHORTAGE IN VICTORIA CONSTITUENCY—EFFECT ON TOURIST TRADE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. HODGSON (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance under whose jurisdiction the wartime prices and trade board operate. In view of the fact that in my constituency of Victoria, Ontario, there are estimated to be over 40,000 tourists at the present time and we have had no flour for bread in that area for over six days, would the minister investigate the situation at once to see if something cannot be done? As the minister is not in his seat perhaps his assistant could reply, because I want something done about the matter this afternoon.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): If the hon. member will furnish us with a list of the bakers who are without flour, we will do our best to see that they are supplied, provided that they have not already used up their quota of flour. The quota is ten per cent less than they had last year. So far the average figures for Canada as a whole show that the bakers have gone over their normal quota. If the hon. gentleman will let us have a list of the bakers who are making this complaint we will see what can be done.

Mr. HODGSON: Is the parliamentary assistant going to look after the tourist industry in this country? I have many telegrams that I shall be glad to show him this afternoon.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

LIMITATIONS UPON IMPORTATION AND SALE TO GENERAL PUBLIC

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved the second reading of bill No. 252, to amend the Food and Drugs Act.

Mr. G. RUSSELL BOUCHER (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not like to delay the house at this late stage to talk about something that is diseased or putrid or rotten, but those words are within the nomenclature of the bill. I am rising to question the competency of the federal parliament to pass this bill. We all know that under section 91 of the British North America Act certain powers are given to the dominion parliament to deal specifically with matters apart from those given to the provinces under section 92. This bill, from the very best of motives, may seek to make a meritorious change in the existing law, but before making this amendment, which does go a long way, we should see whether this parliament has power to give effect to it. I have had the opportunity of referring to a number of decisions, and I think before we pass this bill we should have an opinion from the Department of Justice on the question of jurisdiction that it involves.

Briefly it appears to me that the only way in which the dominion parliament can have competence in a matter of this kind having to do with civil rights is by saying that this is not one of the specific powers delegated to the provinces by section 92 but is a specific power given by section 91 to the dominion parliament or a general power not given to the provinces by section 92.

In the case of Toronto Electric Commission v. Snider, 1925, 2 D.L.R. page 16, their lordships held that in approaching problems of jurisdiction in matters of this kind we should ask ourselves: (1) does the subject matter fall within section 92; and (2) does the subject matter fall within section 91 of the British North America Act? If it falls within neither of the enumerated heads, then the dominion has power under the general wording of section 91.

In the case of the Attorney General for Canada v. the Attorney General for Alberta, their lordships gave this decision:

> It is their lordships' opinion, now clear, that excepting so far as the power can be involved in aid of capacity conferred independently under other words of section 91, the power to regulate trade and commerce cannot be relied upon as enabling the dominion parliament to regulate civil rights in the provinces.

The same decision has been given in a number of other cases decided not only by the courts of Canada but in some cases by the privy council, and I mention specifically the famous Wharton case, 1914, 18 D.L.R., page 335; Rex v. Collins, 1926, 4 D.L.R., page 548, and King v. Eastern Terminal Elevator Company, 1925, 5 D.L.R., page 1. In these cases questions of this kind came specifically before the court, and it was held that as civil rights were specifically assigned to the provinces to deal with, the power of sale falls within that zone.

This bill seems to say that no one can sell or offer for sale certain commodities. It goes further than that and restricts it to food or drugs. In order to make this act effective I think the question of jurisdiction should be examined very carefully. In my opinion provincial enactments are necessary to give validity to legislation of this kind. By the act very wide power is given to the dominion to interfere with the sale of what are called drugs, and perhaps appliances, foods or materials. The meaning of "drugs" under this amendment will be greatly extended. Explanatory note 1 says:

> It is therefore considered desirable that such authority be given in the interest of the public. Any regulations made under this authority will, for the most part, deal with newly-discovered drugs.

That protection may be required, but I see nothing in the bill to restrict its operation to newly discovered drugs. It goes much beyond that. I would therefore ask the minister to indicate at least the scope of the amended act and the opinion of the Department of Justice as to the competency of this parliament to pass such an act, and state whether or not to infringe upon the rights of the provinces given under the British North America Act. We should be very careful about questions of jurisdiction.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this bill, which comes to us from the senate, has four sections. It makes what are intended to be technical and non-controversial amendments in the Food and Drugs Act so as to permit of its being administered and applied to the greater advantage of the people of Canada. The remarks of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Boucher) relate I think exclusively to the provisions of section 1 of the bill, under which the governor in council may have the power to pass regulations "defining the conditions of sale of any drug". The Department of Justice has been asked for an opinion on the validity of this legislation and has expressed the view that it is constitutional.

The Food and Drugs Act has a long ancestry. It dates back to the Adulteration Act of 1875, which was incorporated in the new Food and Drugs Act of 1920. The validity of the act and of the regulations passed under it was only challenged in one case as far as I know, that of Standard Sausage Company v. Lee, in which the British Columbia court of appeal unanimously affirmed the validity of the legislation.

The position taken by the hon. member for Carleton is, I understand, based on the proposed "defining the conditions of sale of any drug" being too wide and unrestricted. If those words were taken without reference to the general scope of the act it might well be feared that the federal government would seek to regulate conditions of sale of drugs in a way which related to property and civil rights and not to any of the powers of the federal government. We have considered that, and while it is never the intention to do anything beyond the general scope of this act or of the federal government—that of course is unquestioned—we have thought that in consequence of representations made on behalf of the pharmaceutical druggists of Canada it might be a good thing to limit this power, since it probably goes beyond anything which we might ever expect to exercise. In consequence I propose, when we reach the committee stage, to ask one of my colleagues to add at the end of paragraph (kk) the words "in the interest and for the protection of the public health", so as to make it quite clear that this additional power to make regulations would be definitely limited to the general scope of the act; that is, to regulations "defining the conditions of sale of any drugs in the interest and for the protection of the public health". In other words the Department of National Health and Welfare, as part of the duty conferred upon it by this measure, seeks to carry out the provisions of the act in the interest of the health and welfare of the people of Canada but not from the point of view of any commercial interest. Whether or not that could be done by the federal government does not enter into consideration here; that is not the intention; and in order to show more clearly what is the intention than was done in the bill which was put before the house I propose to ask a colleague when we reach the committee stage to move the amendment I have just read to the house.

I may say also that after the representations were made by representatives of the pharmaceutical trade we had a discussion with them, and I communicated the text of this amendment to them and they felt that that would take care of the situation.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, this is a very important bill, and I suggest to the minister that there are three or four matters he might consider in relation to it. We have a committee of this house known as the committee on pensions and health. How does it come about that, on the eighty-fourth day of this session, this bill has not been before that committee? When the bill was introduced in another place there was a two-line debate; it went to a committee on second reading without any debate, nor was there any debate on third reading; then it came here.

You know, Mr. Speaker, that after every great war there is a deluge of medicines advertised on the market. The principles of this bill are contained in two sentences of the explanatory notes, which begin:

> This is to permit of regulations being made for the protection of the pubic respecting the sale of any drug.

Nowadays most of the city papers are filled with advertisements of drugs, patent medicines, salves, and so on, any one of which is supposed to be a cure for ten or fifteen different diseases which have baffled the medical profession for many years. You can walk into a grocery store and buy them; you can buy them in departmental stores and elsewhere.

In 1927 the general Food and Drugs Act now to be amended evidently contained sufficient protection for the public, but, to quote the notes:

> The present act limits such power—
> That is, to sell drugs.
> —to a substance which may be injurious to health.

One of the clauses refers to a commodity which contains rotten or diseased animal or vegetable substance. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) complained for years about drugs in liquid form—gin—which contain injurious ingredients, and on one occasion, discussing the matter with the then minister of health (Mr. Mackenzie) as an amateur to an expert he said he had had a chemical analysis made and it was not Holland gin and not gin at all.

Since the close of the war the act as it stands does not provide sufficient protection——inasmuch as new drugs are being discovered which, until their full effect is known over a period of time, may . . . prove to be injurious to health.

Now, you have to read, with the sections of the act which the minister is amending, the regulations of the wartime prices and trade board. They passed absurd regulations which every drug store is compelled to carry out. What are those regulations? Well, if a medical doctor gives a man, be he rich or poor, a prescription, it can be filled only once; he has to go back to the medical man to get another order before the druggist will fill it. Sometimes these stores are closed at the week-end, and it reacts to the inconvenience of the public, particularly to people of the poorer classes in the cities and towns when a drug store is closed.

I cannot understand the present health act procedure. We have a committee on health; let us have a real committee on health, and do something, not come down to the house on the eighty-fourth day of the session saying: "Here is a bill; pass it." This bill should have been properly considered by our health committee. May I ask the minister whether the representatives of the drug interests or of the college of pharmacy were before the committee in the other place?—because certainly they have had no opportunity to examine this bill.

Mind you, I am not opposing the bill. I believe the restrictions to-day are not what they should be. Drugs are being sold as such which are not drugs at all. Various mixtures and chemical compounds have been prepared and advertised in the newspapers, in three or four-line advertisements, "Communicate by letter or telephone with so and so, who has got a cure." We need an act which is a real health act to protect the public from all this quackery.

Not only that; a lot of things have been placed on the market which are poisoning the people—all kinds of moonshine. From health officers and from the college of physicians and others complaints have come about the loose way in which this particular problem is being handled. The time has come for a drastic national health reform, so that the consumer public will be protected, so that the people will know what are proper or at least non-injurious remedies. Some companies in the olden days used to get out almanacs at Christmas time of drugs which were a cure for everything. If the Food and Drugs Act is to be properly administered there should be an attempt to deal with some of the offenders, and have an examination of some of the awful stuff people take which one hears about in the magistrates' and coroners' courts. The public are complaining about the different poisons which are put out—"hair tonics" and all that sort of thing; you can buy them right on the market. What is the department doing about it? The Department of Justice will not do anything. They refer complaints to the attorneys general of the provinces, and all they do is to refer it to the city and town and county police.

We need a reformation regarding the use of some of these drugs, the things which some poor people are drinking all day long, poisoning themselves. In fact many small children have been poisoned, because when the mothers and fathers are out some of them go to the cupboard and take a pill or something else of this kind.

Not only that, but I wish to say that if we are to have a department let us have a real one, not one which can do nothing more than say, on the eighty-fourth day of the session, "Pass this bill or leave it." Mind you, I believe the department may do quite a lot in protecting the consumer public. But there is no doubt that we should start on legislation like this early in the session. There are other measures which were placed on the order paper only yesterday. There are a large number of bills as to which we should have the opportunity of consulting professional men, legal men, physicians, dentists, veterinarians, and the college of pharmacy, but there is no opportunity of doing so here in the middle of July, when everybody is away.

So far as the principle of the bill is concerned I support it. Something must be done to curb the sale of the poisons which are now being sold, without proper control—I will not say in the drug stores, because the proprietors are good professional men who alike in peace and war have done laborious and efficient work—I do not know what we would have done without them—but considerable sales are made in some small corner general stores. Most of these remedies advertise in the papers, and you can get a bottle or two almost for the asking—three bottles for 50 cents while one bottle is "worth" 35 cents.

As I have said, the hon. member for Temiscouata started this discussion the year before last, to bring the Food and Drugs Act up to date, but nothing has been done to protect the public. I do hope we shall have drastic reform in this particular branch of health protection, so that the consumer public will be protected, while legitimate drug stores are free dfrom some of Donald Gordon's regulations. One is that a physician cannot fill a prescription available for more than one order; he has to write a new prescription. I tell you, the public are sick and tired of that kind of bureaucracy, a year after the war has ended.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1.

Mr. CLAXTON: The main purpose that we have immediately in mind in this section is to regulate the sale of penicillin. That is already done in the United States and in the United Kingdom. The reason for seeking that power is that we have not the power under existing legislation and it is considered desirable by a large proportion of the medical profession, as well as by representatives of the provinces and officers of the department, that for some time at least penicillin should be sold only on a doctor's prescription.

Penicillin, so far as we know, is not injurious in itself, but it can be used in a way which may be injurious to the user if not used under a doctor's control. The reason is this: It is a very powerful drug; it is popularly described as a miracle worker, as indeed it is, when properly used. But some people have the idea that if they go to a druggist and buy some penicillin they are almost certain to be cured of any one of a number of diseases, including particularly gonorrhea and syphilis. Penicillin, used in the right doses and in the right way and at the right time, is a cure for gonorrhea and has a powerful effect on syphilis; but used in the wrong doses or in the wrong way or at the wrong time, it not only does not cure the disease but may itself set up immunity against the proper used of penicillin. In other words, the improper use of penicillin may not only fail to effect a cure but may prevent the proper use of the drug as a means of effecting the cure.

There are a number of drugs that work in that way and penicillin is said to be one of them. Further, the use of penicillin without proper advice may lead to certain germs of infection being killed by bringing into operation others which have been kept under control by the germs which are killed off. That has been pointed out in medical journals and in medical experience, and for these reasons we believe it is necessary for the time being at least to regulate penicillin and require that it be sold under doctor's prescription.

It is not the policy of the act to name single drugs, and we have not named penicillin or limited this power to pencillin because of the fact that exactly the same considerations apply to some of the other new drugs and also to streptomycin, and other drugs that may be brought into use from day to day, since the development of these new drugs is exceedingly rapid.

For that reason we have sought this power, which is along the lines of similar powers exercised in the United States and the United Kingdom. However, in order to limit it in accordance with the suggestion of the representatives of the trade, I am going to ask my colleague the Secretary of State to move an amendment to section 1 of the bill.

Mr. MARTIN: I move that section 1 of bill 252, letter X-9 of the Senate, being an act to amend the Food and Drugs Act, be amended by adding at the end thereof, "in the interest and for the protection of the public."

Mr. COLDWELL: What control does the government exercise over the manufacture and distribution of penicillin? I am in agreement with giving the government control of these new drugs. It is essential, and the minister is quite right that the unguided use of penicillin may lead to some other difficulties after the drug has been used. People may use it to heal a cut or a wound or to get rid of a sore and then find that a disagreeable rash develops. I have knowledge of at least two instances in which this has happened. A physician has prescribed penicillin for the healing of a sore or for some other trouble of the kind, and afterwards there has developed a serious rash. I agree that the drug should be controlled. Many drugs are very simple things. They do not entail a great deal of expense in the manufacture and yet when people have to get them on a doctor's prescription they often find that apart from the cost of the prescription—no one objects to that, because the doctor usually does more than write a prescription—they are very expensive. Sometimes these things are patented; I do not know whether penicillin is patented or not. I see the minister shakes his head; I am glad to learn that it is not. What control is exercised in the manufacture and the distribution in order that the public may not be victimized by the price charged for this efficient drug?

Mr. CLAXTON: The question of price does not come under the control of this department, but under the wartime prices and trade board which has exercised close control over the price of drugs. However, I do know something about the situation and I shall give the hon. member the information as well as I can. The function of this department with regard to drugs is to control their potency and purity. We have standards, usually international standards, which are enforced rigorously through sampling drugs through purchase at retail as well as through obtaining them from the manufacturers and wholesalers. This is done by spot sampling as well as by taking whole shipments of certain drugs. They are analysed by the department's officials, and if anything is wrong with them or if they do not conform with the pharmacopoeia requirements, they will be rejected and appropriate action will be taken. Therefore we do control the purity and potency of drugs. We generally get splendid cooperation in that respect from the manufacturers and the trade.

Mr. HACKETT: When the minister says that the department controls, does he mean that it prescribes what shall be the potency?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. HACKETT: Or that it insists that the drug shall be accurately described?

Mr. CLAXTON: Both. The potency must be as laid down in the international standard pharmacopoeia, or as worked out by the department, and then the drug itself must conform to that standard and be pure within the standard laid down. We also control the labelling of drugs so as to ensure that where it is desirable that the content of the drug be accurately described, it is accurately set out in accordance with the regulations.

With regard to penicillin, this drug, as everyone knows, came into existence in consequence of the work of a great number of scientists and others, of whom the principal was Sir Alexander Fleming. It came into commercial production early in the war, in the United States first. In Canada it was and still is made, I understand, in three factories. The first is the Connaught Laboratories in Toronto. This institution is, as I recall it, the joint enterprise of the university of Toronto and the Ontario school of hygiene, in which the province of Ontario has an active interest. There the money necessary to put up the plant was expended by the federal government. The penicillin itself is produced at cost and was distributed at first for the use of the armed forces, and then more generally. The second plant in which it was made in Canada was that of Ayerst, McKenna and Harrison, at St. Laurent, near Montreal, where the federal government paid for the cost of the building and the company made the drug. The third place for Merck Incorporated, in their plant near Montreal. There the drug was made without any government assistance. At first the price was quite high, owing to the fact that while it is not patented, it is technically a very difficult thing to make, and the techniques of making it had to be worked out. That was gradually done and the price was rapidly brought down until now it is approximately the same in the United States and Canada. Perhaps owing to the change in exchange it may be lower in Canada. I believe it is a reasonable price for the product in present circumstances.

Mr. BOUCHER: Speaking to this amendment I wonder whether we should not commend the minister for it, but I object to the fact that it embraces much more than drugs. According to the minister's statement his object is to restrict and control the sale of certain drugs, or many drugs, but the amendment goes beyond drugs and includes foods and appliances. Apparently some protection should be given the public in that regard, but it seems to me that this section does not strike at the root of the trouble. If paragraph (KK) were worded to restrict the salability of drugs, appliances, foods and so on, a much better vehicle would be used to achieve the object the minister has in mind, and which I commend. But this amendment goes much farther than that. It gives power to define the conditions of sale of any drug. Then it goes so far as to say that any drug shall be considered to include foods and appliances. Under the amendment we are giving the department power to make regulations far beyond the purpose of the amendment. The amendment makes the general act deal with specific matters. I think the powers of this amendment go beyond what are necessary.

The constitutionality of the amendment could be raised here. I do not think the amendment proposed by the minister makes the act any more constitutional than it was previously. It still deals with civil rights, even though it purports to relate only to national health. Instead of tacking it on to the classification of trade and commerce under the British North America Act it is being tacked on to the rights of national health. You are going from one specific power given to the Dominion of Canada under the British North America Act to another. I do not think it achieves the aim behind the amendment at all. The bill should be referred to a committee which will not only appreciate the minister's intentions, aims and objects, but also the necessity of restricting the amendment to its intention. If we do that we shall be taking a step that will be advantageous instead of dangerous. I urge the minister to give serious consideration to this aspect of the situation. I know every hon. member of the committee feels that the public needs and deserves the protection that the minister wishes to give, but it does seem ridiculous to ask parliament to pass a bill of the scope and authority of this one, simply because of the explanatory note which says:

> Any regulations made under this authority will, for the most part, deal with newly-discovered drugs.

There are many old drugs, and the fact that this explanation is given in the explanatory note does not in any way limit the scope of its operation. I earnestly appeal to the minister not to rush this bill through. I do not think we have to pass it to-day, and I would ask that it be referred to a committee on health matters which would give mature and extensive consideration to the object the minister has in mind.

Mr. CLAXTON: I can assure the hon. member that I have given careful attention to his remarks, and to this point, as have the officers concerned. As I understand it, we cannot be very far apart. If I took his words down correctly—and I was careful in doing so—he said that this power should be limited. These are his words: "by way of restricting salability of any drug". The power here is that of defining conditions of sale of any drug, in the interest of and for the protection of public health. I cannot see any difference in substance between the words the hon. member suggests we use, and the words we have used in the amendment.

This has been given most serious consideration. The amendment I have suggested has been put forward following representations from the trade. Representatives of the trade have expressed their satisfaction with it as meeting their point of view. I have received no representations from anyone, although this has been before the senate and has been a matter of public knowledge for about a month. It was discussed by the senate committee on health, and, so far as I know, no representations were made there. I feel the matter has been considered adequately, that the section with the amendment I have proposed does what we want it to do, that it is effectively restricted, and that it is in the public interest to pass the measure.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I add a word of comment to what the minister has said? It is this: I have listened to what has been said by the hon. member for Carleton, and I would suggest to the minister that certain inquiries have been made. I know that—though why they were not made to the senate, I do not know.

[Mr. Boucher.]

This is a Friday afternoon, when many hon. members are absent. I have one in mind who I know would like to have been here. We have devoted only about fifteen minutes to this measure. Unless the matter is regarded as being entirely open and shut, and it is not worth taking another look at it for the purpose of trying to arrive at a view which would be satisfactory all round, I would support the suggestion of the hon. member for Carleton.

Mr. CLAXTON: As the hon. member for Broadview has said, this is the eighty-fourth day of the session. The bill has been before the senate for some time, and has been on our order paper for more than a week. I have received no representations regarding it from anyone. I do believe it is the kind of technical and non-controversial matter which, in the absence of serious objection from anyone on grounds of principle, should be disposed of.

I believe it is the wish of hon. members to dispose of these matters, unless there is some serious reason for not doing so. Apart from the representation we have heard to-day, I have not received any representations about this matter, nor, so far as I know, did the senate. So that in the absence of such views I do not feel it would serve the interests of the public or of this house if delay were permitted, unless some good reason is advanced for that delay. There is no disposition on the part of the government to push this through, but we believe it is in the public interest that the bill should be passed. In view of these points I would ask the committee to allow the section to carry.

Mr. HODGSON: The minister has said that he has had no representations from anyone. I have one that I should like to give him.

Mr. CLAXTON: Is that about this bill, or bill 55?

Mr. HODGSON: It is with reference to both.

Mr. CLAXTON: This bill, too?

Mr. HODGSON: Yes, this bill, too. Has not the minister received a letter about bill 55?

Mr. CLAXTON: I never had one about this bill from anyone, except the one I mentioned before.

Mr. HODGSON: There are references to the legality of it, and so on, in the letter.

Mr. CLAXTON: That is the point put forward by the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association, of which no doubt your correspondent was a member, and which I believe has been met by the amendment I have put before the committee.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the present amendment meet the wishes of the Canadian Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, it is my understanding. It was made in consequence of their representations.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 2.

Mr. HAZEN: Why is the word "disgusting" used in this section? It seems to me that in using this word a great deal is left to the personal opinion of some individual. What is "disgusting" surely should not be left to the taste or fancy of an individual.

Mr. CLAXTON: It is just because we do not want to leave it to anyone's taste that we put it in there.

Mr. HAZEN: I suggest there should be a definition of the word.

Mr. CLAXTON: I believe I can satisfy the hon. member by telling the house about a case which was one of several which led to our asking for this amendment. Last year we received an application for the entry into Canada of a large shipment of peanuts. At the time we would have liked to receive the shipment so as to turn the peanuts into peanut oil; we were short of oils and fats. We found however that the entry of this shipment of peanuts into the United States had been refused on the ground that in the peanuts was a large quantity of rat hairs and rat droppings. It was possible that through hydrogenation an oil which was chemically pure could be produced. We felt, however, and I think every hon. member would feel, that if the public knew they were eating oil cake or other foods made from oil which originally contained a large proportion of rat droppings, they would consider that "disgusting". A condition of that kind might not come under the words "filthy", or "putrid" or "rotten" or "decomposed" or "diseased". I believe, therefore, that we have made out a case for the use of the word "disgusting".

This was not the only case. There was a shipment of orange peel, and other shipments of foods from other countries. It became quite a stunt with shipments refused entry into the United States to try to get entry into Canada, perhaps after some process in the intermediate stage. We certainly do not mean to make our country a receiving centre for food which is found improper for human consumption in any other country. Our standards will be as high as those found anywhere else.

Mr. HAZEN: Is the word "disgusting" in the United States Act? It seems to me an inappropriate word.

Mr. CLAXTON: No, it is not in the United States Act. This section is offered to meet cases along the lines of those I have described; and it was felt that to remove any possible doubt we should use this "disgusting" word.

Mr. STIRLING: Under what wording in the United States were rat droppings refused entry?

Mr. CLAXTON: They have a wide general power in their act which we do not have, through the use of the words, "or is otherwise unfit for food." We are seeking that protection too. But in view of our particular experiences and the representations made to us by representatives of importers who asserted that these conditions would not fall under any of the other words, we felt that we should have this express power.

Mr. STIRLING: Would "free from impurities" be a proper expression?

Mr. CLAXTON: I understand that after the peanuts have been put through the process and converted to oil they are chemically pure. If no one heard that the product had been full of some disgusting material there would be no objection raised. We want to protect the people as far as possible.

Mr. HAZEN: In what condition does raw sugar enter the country? Would it not be excluded under this section?

Mr. CLAXTON: I would not think raw sugar comes in in a disgusting condition. This section must be read together with section 4 of the act, which states that food shall be deemed to be adulterated within the meaning of the act, and then these different things are set out.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN INFORMATION SERVICE

COORDINATION OF AND ASSISTANCE TO GOVERNMENT INFORMATION SERVICE

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to establish a Canadian information service for collecting and distributing abroad information concerning Canada and to coordinate and assist the information service of the government and to provide for payment of salaries of staff and expenses of the service from moneys appropriated by parliament.

Mr. FULTON: Is the minister going to explain the purpose of the resolution?

Mr. CLAXTON: I shall be glad to do that, either now or later. It was the hope of the government that we might have first reading of the bill and then have it distributed. We would then take up the estimates of the Canadian information service, at which time hon. members could secure full information about its operations, and proceed with the second reading of the bill at a later time. That seems to be the logical way to proceed.

In reply to the hon. member for Kamloops I would say briefly that the Canadian information service was established on September 28, 1945, by order in council P.C. 6300. It succeeded the wartime information board, which had been set up on September 9, 1942, by P.C. 8099. The wartime information board succeeded the directorate of public information which was brought under the Department of National War Services by P.C. 3333 on July 19, 1940. That succeeded the committee of public information which was established on October 7, 1939 by P.C. 2654 and by P.C. 4073 of December 8, 1939. The heads of these services were successively Mr. Walter Thompson, of the Canadian National Railways; Mr. Herbert Lash, of the Canadian National Railways; Mr. Charles Vining, of the newsprint export manufacturers association; Mr. John Grierson, Mr. A. D. Dunton, and the present head, Mr. G. F. Andrew, to all of whom we are indebted for distinguished service during war time.

The purpose of the Canadian information service is much more limited than that of the wartime information board or its predecessors. Its purpose as set out in the order in council is to provide means and facilities for distributing information abroad concerning Canada and to coordinate and assist the public information services of the government. That purpose was amplified by the acting Prime Minister, after P.C. 6300 had been tabled, when he said—

Mr. GREEN: What date was that?

Mr. CLAXTON: That would be immediately after September 28, 1945. He said:

> Those with whom we trade must know our country and its possibilities; those with whom we associate for the maintenance of world security must know with whom they are cooperating and what may be expected of our cooperation. In short, both trade and diplomacy to be carried out successfully need a background of understanding based on factual information objectively presented.

At a later date I will, if requested, outline the way in which information services were developed during and after the war, in other countries as well as in Canada. I know of no country in which a similar service is not set up under one form or another, and in every country that I know of the service is set up on a much more elaborate scale and at greater cost than is intended for the Canadian service.

The aim is to establish a small service as compared with the service in any other country, to be under the immediate administration of the director, Mr. G. F. Andrew, but with regard to matters of policy and major concern to be subject to the supervision of a supervisory committee. On that committee would be representatives of other government information services, as well as representatives of the Department of External Affairs and the Department of Trade and Commerce. There would be a staff at Ottawa and their first function would be to provide for Canada's offices abroad, wherever and whatever the offices may be, information about Canada. That was found to be necessary to keep them continuously informed during the war, and it has been found useful, desirable and necessary in the post-war period. The information service takes several forms. It includes the distribution of books as reference libraries, and publications. It prepares reference papers on matters of current interest, such as for example, the situation as to food, Canada's trade, Canada's financial aid to other countries; and it sends out descriptive booklets as well as a regular daily air mail service, a weekly summary of news, and a monthly publication. In addition it supplies our offices abroad, through or in coordination with the national film board, with films, still pictures, and so on. It also, of course, answers inquiries received from abroad, and tries in every way possible to make Canada better known in other countries, the need of which is agreed to by everyone.

This information is sent to the officers of the Canadian information service at New York, Washington, London, Paris and Canberra. The material also goes to our diplomatic representatives in the countries of the British commonwealth and in foreign countries where we have representatives. It goes to the trade commissioners and other representatives, and officers of Canada stationed abroad.

I noticed in the Montreal Gazette to-day a dispatch on the front page on the introduction of this bill which certainly is intended to give every appearance of being a news dispatch. The byline is from the Gazette's resident correspondent at Ottawa, July 18. Then follows what appears to be a news dispatch, but it has a serious misstatement of fact and several statements of editorial opinion. One of the things stated there is:

External Affairs has publicity men attached to many of its embassies and legations in other countries.

It states that therefore the Canadian information service is not necessary. The only publicity men, as they are called here, attached to embassies or legations are officers of the Canadian information service. External Affairs has no other public relations or information people in its service. When that is said it meets very largely the point which the Gazette correspondent or the Gazette itself tried to make.

Similar services are considered to be necessary by the United Kingdom, the United States, France, Australia, New Zealand and every other country that I know of. All the countries I have named have information representatives in Canada, at Ottawa or elsewhere. I have fairly full information about the size of the offices, the size of the staffs, and the amount of the expenditures of many of these information services of other countries. Of course we are anxious to set up this service as economically as it could be done having regard to the needs of the Canadian people. I can assure the house that I know of no more modest service than that which we seek to set up, and I know of none in which the salaries are more reasonable and the total over-all expenditure is as small.

I have dealt with the primary function of the information service. But it also has another function, and that is coordinating and assisting the other information services of the government in Canada. It has done that. Perhaps I should give a concrete example. There is an interdepartmental committee called the rehabilitation committee. It is furnished with a chairman and a secretary as well as with expert assistance by the Canadian information service. The food information committee is another example, and I could give others. That is the kind of thing that has been done by way of coordinating and assisting other Canadian information services.

The third function of the Canadian information service is to act in connection with Canada's attendance and participation in international conferences. It has been found by every country that it is desirable at all the major conferences to have attached to each delegation an information officer to arrange for press conferences, for the preparation and release of material to the press, for the preparation of background material, and that kind of thing, so as to ensure that so far as possible the reports of material of primary interest to the country concerned—in this case Canada and its citizens—are made continuously available by the delegation through the ordinary press agencies for distribution and dissemination at home. Such an information officer attached to a delegation is able to advise the delegation on presenting its material, on meeting the press, and on other questions sometimes quite technical, which things are necessary if a country is to secure an adequate dissemination of information about its position.

The fourth function of the Canadian information service is to act as the information bureau or supply the officers for the information bureau at international conferences held in Canada. I have in mind not only the two Quebec conferences but also the second meeting of the council of UNRRA, the meeting of the food conference, the meeting of PICAO and others, where the Canadian information service provided what was in essence the international staff necessary to discharge the informational needs of a great international conference.

Another function of the service is to arrange for foregin visitors to come to Canada and to see that as far as possible while in Canada they receive whatever facilities may be necessary to enable them to see what they want to see of our country. That kind of service is now furnished by every government. We have found it necessary to do it, and it is necessary that it should be done by a special service.

Finally there has been set up, as hon. members know, the united nations educational, scientific and cultural organization—UNESCO, as it is called—which was the result of meetings held at London in November, 1945. Canada signed the convention, and some sixteen countries have now ratified it. Canada no doubt will ratify it in due course, and it will be necessary then for some agency in Canada to act as the corresponding unit, the funnel through which there will be two-way communication between UNESCO and the proper agencies in Canada; and that will be partly the Department of External Affairs, and partly the Canadian information service.

The bill, which I hope will secure first reading, and will be distributed soon, is very much along the lines of the order in council setting up the Canadian information service, under which it has been working since it was set up some months ago. As I have said, it is the hope of the government that if first reading is secured for this bill and the bill is distributed, at once we shall move into committee of supply, and there I shall be glad indeed to deal with the estimates of the privy council which relate to the Canadian information service and answer all questions which hon. members may put.

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, the minister has given us a complete picture of the operation of the Canadian information service and has outlined in general terms the methods by which it is proposed that the service should function.

With respect to his suggestion as to the method of procedure from now on, with deference to the minister, and although we appreciate the anxiety to get through the business of the house, I feel nevertheless that our greatest anxiety should be to discharge efficiently our task here as an opposition to criticize measures brought before us and thereby to help the government more efficiently to discharge its task as a government. We do not feel that to accede to the suggestion put forth by the minister would in any great measure expedite the business of the house, and certainly it would not enable us to make that full and searching examination of this measure which we feel it to be our duty to make.

Speaking of the way in which this Canadian information service will operate, the minister said that its task would be to spread information of Canada to foreign countries, and in particular to spread information about Canada's efforts with regard to food and financial assistance to other countries.

Mr. CLAXTON: Oh, I did not say that at all.

Mr. FULTON: I understood the minister to say that.

Mr. CLAXTON: I gave food and financial assistance as examples of the kind of subjects on which reference papers were prepared in Canada and sent abroad. It is by no means limited to that.

Mr. FULTON: I was not suggesting it was limited to that. I was merely pointing out—

Mr. CLAXTON: That was by way of example.

Mr. FULTON: —that that was one of the functions, to assist in the dissemination of information on these heads. In this connection I should like to say that criticism has been voiced that this service it is not operating efficiently, is not discharging one of the legitimate functions which, if it is felt to be essential at all, the people would like it to discharge.

I want to make the reservation here that we do not accept the necessity or the desirability of having this service. We intend to question it, and to question whether it is discharging its duties efficiently. But if it exists at all we feel it should render some service, and we wish to find out whether we are getting value for the money which is being spent.

I have before me an editorial which appeared in the Sherbrooke Daily Record; and in order to save, possibly, somebody on the other side the trouble, I will say now that I avow quite frankly the paper is not friendly to the government. It does, however, reproduce some facts from independent observers and these should be brought to the minister's attention. It is in the issue of May 8 of this year and appears under the heading, "Canadian Publicity in England". It begins:

In spite of the expenditures incurred by the federal government to support the Canadian information service—

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not like to interrupt the hon. gentleman but I would raise a point of order. Some time ago I endeavoured to read from an editorial an extract with regard to some remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, and a point of order was raised by the hon. member for Peel that I must not read from a newspaper editorial. I thought it was a curious point of order, but I was told by the Chairman—we were in committee—that I could not read from the editorial. Having been told that once, I should like to ask Your Honour whether that is permitted or not.

Mr. FULTON: To save Your Honour the necessity of ruling. I will refrain from reading the editorial to which I have referred. I would point out, though, that we are not in committee at the moment, and further that it has been general practice to refer to editorials. However, the minister will probably say that if one side is prevented from doing it, so should the other be.

Mr. CLAXTON: I would rather see everyone do it.

Mr. FULTON: In any event, it is not necessary for me to read the editorial. The criticism is that of a newspaper writer returning from England and therefore it was based on personal observation. The criticism was to the effect that the British people were under the impression that they were still getting the bulk of their bacon imports from Denmark, whereas in fact the bulk of those imports were coming from Canada. The journalist remarks—and his remarks were quoted—that it was a pity that the Canadian information service, which was spending the people's money, did not tackle that problem in realistic fashion to bring to the people not only of England but of the continent of Europe the great part which Canada was playing in contributions to UNRRA by way of food and financial relief. If we have this service at all—and this is our first criticism—it is not discharging its functions in an efficient manner in the interests of Canada; in other words, the people of Canada do not get value for their money.

I hope the minister will not say that my suggestion means that we are urging him to spend more money. We are not, and we shall point out before we are through that we want a full explanation as to why it is necessary to spend as much as we are spending on this service and whether we need the service in its present form. However, that point is one that can be discussed later.

To our minds, the main question is whether the service is essential. We have various other departments of government with agencies in foreign countries, and we have departments of government here which operate bureaux in foreign countries, all of which spend money on advertising, public relations, and similar work abroad. This brings to mind the question whether we need to spend a large amount for a separate body under a separate minister to provide the same or a similar service. There are several general questions, and objections of a general nature which I think should be brought forward.

The minister listed several functions performed by the Canadian information service, some of them very unconvincing as arguments in support of the need of this service. I propose to mention several objections to and criticisms of the general idea of carrying on this service. In the first place, as the minister has pointed out, this is a descendant of a war-time service, the wartime information board, a service which was set up under emergency legislation and was presumed at that time to be intended to last only for the duration of the war. I suggest that the people of Canada were entitled to assume that the board would come to an end with the end of the war and that the money spent on that board would thereby be saved.

May I remark that the decision to continue this function, under the head of Canadian information service, is illustrative of the general trend which we have observed, whereby establishments set up to deal with emergency situations tend to become permanent. It is another illustration of the general trend of expenditures, instituted and justified on the grounds of emergency, becoming established, set and taken as a matter of course and so continued when the emergency has passed, and in fact even increased.

If we had in this country plenty of money to spend on old age pensions, plenty to spend on social security, and sufficient revenue to justify a cut in taxes, then the position would be quite different. But we heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) say that this group here had failed to suggest ways in which expenditures could be reduced. We heard him say that until we could reduce expenditures we could not reduce taxation. That in itself suggests the principle which the government should bear in mind in carrying on these services, and unless they suggest much more vital and important reasons than the minister has given this afternoon, we on this side will remain entirely unconvinced of the necessity of this service and of the justification for spending money on it.

I may interject here that the item in the estimates this year, at page 73 of the main estimates, amounts to $640,700. That is item 591. That means well over half a million dollars. On the face of it, we are not convinced that this service is essential or that the money that is spent can be justified. If it could be shown that the service bore a relation to vital policy which the government was concerned to put over in countries overseas, such as an immigration policy for the encouragement of immigration on any general scale, which could be called a policy, it would be a different matter, and still I should say that it would require careful proof whether a separate board was necessary under those circumstances. But we have had no proof that it is related to some specific purpose. We have had merely a general statement that it will assist other departments in the discharge of their existing functions.

In that connection, I would point out something in regard to which the house and the country should have some information. The Department of Trade and Commerce, as will be seen at page 51 of the main estimates, is spending $459,000 this year on trade publicity and advertising in Canada and abroad, and I should wish to be conclusively shown that there was no overlapping before I would suggest that we cease criticizing this large expenditure which we are asked to continue under this bill. The Department of Trade and Commerce is also spending $650,000 to assist in promoting tourist business in Canada. Possibly the minister can tell us how much of that is spent outside the country, for it is unlikely that all that money is spent in Canada. I should imagine that a good deal of it is spent in advertising abroad. However, that point can be covered later. Here at any rate we have $650,000 plus $459,000, or over a million dollars being spent by the Department of Trade and Commerce alone in advertising Canada or in assisting the tourist industry.

Then, in the Department of External Affairs we have an item for $2,436,325 for representation abroad. It may be that at present none of the persons paid by the money voted in that item is charged with responsibility for advertising Canada abroad, but I would suggest that these officials, together with the trade and commerce department, have an extensive programme in contemplation. It might be more efficient to give them the function of advertising Canada abroad, and we might discharge that function at the cost of a great deal less money than is involved in setting up a separate branch for Canadian information services and voting it over $600,000.

While we are on this matter, may I refer to a return which was tabled, being sessional paper 137 of March 15, 1946, in reply to a motion by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), who asked: (a) How much money was expended by us through the wartime information board, by years, while it was in existence? (b) How much thereof was paid to persons outside Canada, and for what, and who were those persons? The return shows that for the year 1942-43 the total spent by and through wartime information board was $1,473,524; in 1943-44, $759,000—I am giving the round figures—in 1944-45, $1,700,000; in 1945-46, up to September 28, when the board was transferred to Canadian information service, $754,000. That represents a total in those four years of $4,687,267.39, of which, in the same period, a grand total of $37,456.49 was paid to persons other than Canadians. I put these figures on the record to show what has been the scale of expenditures in the past.

I should also like to refer to another sessional paper in which the question was asked as to the estimated monthly expenditure of Canadian information service—that is, the present service—and of what items that expenditure consisted. The answer was that the monthly expenditure was $53,714. So that we are spending $53,714 a month on what would appear to be on the face of it a questionable service. The necessity for it is questionable, and it may well be that the personnel could be replaced by other bodies already in existence.

Another objection which we have to this Canadian information service is that it is another of those government bureaux concerning whose activities we have experienced great difficulty in obtaining information. We have had several instances of this sort in this house in the last day or two. I will not refer to them because they did not occur during this debate, but I can refer to something that took place in connection with this very service last year, when the hon. member for Eglinton moved for a copy of all minutes of proceedings of the committee supervising the Canadian information service. What took place is to be found at page 2118 of Hansard of November 14, 1945. The minister refused to produce the minutes of proceedings on the grounds of privilege. The hon. member for Eglinton said:

> I am not asking in the motion for the production of reports to the minister or for opinions given to him by this committee. What the motion asks for is a copy of the minutes and proceedings of the committee. If you look at the order in council referred to by the minister you will see that this is an administrative body. It is charged with carrying out the provisions of the order P.C. 6300.

I might point out, Mr. Speaker, that that order is in almost exactly the same words as the present resolution. The order read that the service was established for the purpose of providing "means and facilities for distributing abroad information concerning Canada and for coordinating and assisting the public information service of the government." I think the point made on that occasion by the hon. member was a good one. It was not a confidential document in the way of a report he was asking for; he was asking for minutes and proceedings of the committee after it had met in order that we might know what was the policy of this service. The hon. member went on to say at page 2119 of Hansard:

> My next point in reply to the minister is that parliament has the right and the duty to know what the Canadian information service is doing and is planning to do, and the minutes of the supervising committee contain that essential information. Therefore they must be available to parliament, if parliament is to be in a position to do its duty.

The minister, however, supported by the Minister of Finance, then Acting Prime Minister, maintained his position. The matter was put to a vote in the house and the motion was defeated by the usual government majority, the vote being 85 to 105. Therefore I say this appears to be merely another of these government boards with regard to which parliament is to be denied information. On that ground I question very much the wisdom of continuing it, certainly the wisdom of setting it up by statute, until we are assured that the policy of the minister and the government in that respect has been changed.

There is one further objection which we have, and which is of a general nature, namely, that this service must bring to this country inevitably the dangers inherent in all government information agencies. I should like to speak, and would be expected to speak, fairly carefully here, because I know the persons in charge of these agencies are persons of good faith, and persons who attempt to act in good faith. But I submit in all seriousness that it is impossible for persons charged with disseminating information about government activities to avoid colouring their information constantly with items and points of view favourable to the administration whose policies they are publicizing. That is inevitable. If they did not do that they could not be maintained in office. There might be hon. members who say that such a trend is not dangerous, but I think most hon. members on this side of the house—and certainly all in this particular group—feel that that trend is an extremely dangerous one. Probably even if this party were in office the same trend would be evident, because as I say, the trend is inevitable in connection with government publicity. That is why we think government should keep out of the publicity business, not only on the grounds of expense, but also on the ground, if you like, that it is not justified in spending any public money for political or propaganda purposes—and propaganda cannot be avoided in this sort of activity. That is another reason why we resist the proposal to set up this service and perpetuate it under a statute.

That just about completes the objections we have to this board. In conclusion, I should like to emphasize the first point I made. The service might perform a useful function though we are not convinced of that. It might perform a useful function in so far as disseminating information overseas is concerned—I certainly think that should be the very limit of its function; it should disseminate no information in Canada. But we want to be convinced that it is performing that service, because it is essential that the people of Canada get value for their money.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): The resolution of the minister states that it is expedient to present a bill to establish a Canadian information service. It is not expedient; it is a reckless raid on public funds. At the present time we have public ownership of railways; we have insurance companies, banks, departmental stores and other mercantile organizations, all supplying information abroad. They have their agents and all of that kind of thing. We have also Trade and Immigration, air and steamship lines.

When this information bureau started during the war it was used largely for political propaganda purposes. Information by the ton was sent out all over Canada, all over the world and on the seven seas. But what did the editors of the newspapers do with it? Many of them said they threw it in the wastepaper basket. The information was not information at all. As I said before, the service should not have been created.

The resolution says that it is expedient; if it is expedient, it is not necessary. Is it expedient to be spending a billion and a half dollars on civilian estimates at the present time? Think of all the trips abroad! I fancy this department started in a small way. It was a reflection on the press which did such great work in the war. First, they got one clerk and then they borrowed a few fellows from the civil service. Then they launched out. They said, as Israel Tarte, the one-time member for Montmagny-L'Islet, said, "Wait until you see us next year." Who are these people? Take up the main estimates and you find that every department of the public service has publicity agents abroad on the seven seas spending money like water with duplication and waste. There are all kinds of duplications. They are doing work that is largely the function of trade and commerce and industry. We have trade agents and immigration agents and all that sort of thing for eleven million people. We are overgoverned and overtaxed from one end of Canada to the other. No wonder the people are losing confidence in us as representatives. I said that when this matter was up a few years ago.

As John Hayden said in 1797, referring to the golden age:

> The press is now the only organ of public opinion.

Much more than the House of Commons is. I continue:

> This title it assumes; but it is not by usurpation; it is rendered legitimate by the defects of your parliamentary constitution; it is erected upon the ruins of real representation. The periodical press is the rival of the House of Commons; and it is, and it will be, the successful rival, as long as that house does not represent the people, but not one day longer.

These wise words were used years ago, and they are correct to-day. Our parliamentary system, erected by the people, now looks to the press for its information, and they represent public opinion more than we do. When the information bureau was set up during the war, it was, as I then said, a reflection on the press. Instead of utilizing existing agencies, the government assumed the functions of the press and it was wide of the mark.

The minister is fond of spending money and duplicating services. I do not wish to reflect on him because he is an able young man, likable and full of promise, and an old friend of mine, but I object in the public interest to certain things in this matter, namely, the duplication and the waste which is going on in the public service of Canada. The provinces have information bureaux and picture books which they get out and send all over the country and the world. The various departments of provinces and municipalities are all spending money on publicity, or at least some of them are. They cannot spend it like water in the municipalities because the taxpayers have a check on them every December or January first in the annual elections. If they spent money like that they would be put out of office. This spending of money is all reflected in the federal tax rate. This extravagance will go on just as long as the House of Commons stands for it. The suggested expenditure for this new service should be reduced to $1, and then you would be spending a dollar you do not need to spend. It provides no information; it does not bring a soul to Canada.

The work done during the war in the information bureau along these lines was done by civilians who were established in good fat jobs, complete with travelling expenses by aeroplane, hotel bills, drawing rooms, and all that sort of thing. And they can simply snap their fingers at the auditor general. No wonder the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is getting sick of it. The taxpayers are getting sick of it, too. People in the constituencies are wondering what kind of parliament this is, when it is so ready to spend money like water to maintain some of these useless institutions and services of no value.

This is not an expenditure in the public interest. We have seen the work done by the old government of Canada information bureau in New York, housed in a luxurious office, with all travelling expenses paid. They counted that day lost in the United States in which they did not spend at least $5,000 or $10,000 for fads and frills. Just look at the state of affairs in the United States, particularly in congress and in the senate when there was a debate about the loan to Britain. The Canadian information bureau was supposed to give information to the American people, to draw them away from their old type of history books which described a Britain of the Seven Years war, and all that kind of thing. That is the sort of thing the information bureau was supposed to be doing and to cure in New York and the United States.

Did the bureau change any of that information? No, they have the same old history books. I have seen them in Cleveland, Buffalo and other cities, with information in them equivalent to the days of Lord North. That is the kind of information they are still using and getting after this extravagant expenditure of money of ours there. The municipalities could not spend money like this, and the provinces have been curtailing their expenditures. There is no necessity for it, at all.

I believe it was in Cleveland, Detroit or Toledo—I am not sure which—where I saw a pamphlet and pictures of information describing those celebrated gentlemen of the Royal Canadian Mounted police, who are under the control of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent). Americans come up here in front of the parliament buildings during the summer and see our splendid mounted police wearing their red coats and their military uniforms in this awful heat and making a laughing-stock out of parliament which asks these brave men and the finest police service to wear them, in the idea that this sort of advertising is necessary to encourage people from the United States to come to Ottawa. We are spending money to advertise the mounted police, when they do not need advertising, at all. Their great record in peace and war alike does not need such publicity.

The time has come for a halt. Parliament is going to get a rude awakening at the polls when the next election comes along. If we look at the back of this book of estimates I have before me we find details of expenditures made in the public service. What right have we to open up new departments, when the war is over, and to extend this service? New Zealand and Australia would not stand for it; the people down there would not put up with it. I doubt not that if the people of Canada had an opportunity to vote on it they would vote it down.

We shall have to strike out all these unnecessary post-war expenditures, and let us get back to a consideration of the interests of the small businessman, the taxpayer, the farmer and the artisan. I have had occasion to take note of the kind of advertising done by large department stores such as Eatons and Simpsons. They do ten times more work in a day than this fancy department of government would do in all the years since its creation.

I have always been against this method of advertising our country. Canada does not need to be advertised along the lines mentioned by the minister. The quicker we get back to striking these expenditures out of the estimates, all these fads and frills, the better it will be for responsible government in this dominion. There is no such thing as responsible government here, anyway. We might as well pack up and go home, for all the control we have over expenditures. We have a comptroller of the treasury, but if he finds anything wrong under the War Measures Act we never hear about it. He is just holding postmortems after the money is spent.

There will be a day of reckoning after the next election. The undertaker will be there ready to provide accommodation for some of the politicians both in and out of the house who are willing to stand for expenditures like this.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is an ordinary practice to begin one's speech by saying that he did not intend to speak on the subject before the house. I should like hon. members to believe that in this instance that is true because, until I listened to the opposition to my right, I had not intended doing so.

At times some of us find ourselves in the difficult position of recognizing that there can be only two sides to a question. This means that frequently we have to take sides with one or other of the two old parties. Some get a good deal of amusement out of that fact. In this instance I find myself supporting the measure brought down by the government.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is nothing new about that.

Mr. KNOWLES: Well, when the hon. member says there is nothing new about it I would remind him that last evening the Liberals and the Tories voted together to defeat a proposal we were offering. So that, from time to time, we do get mixed up.

Mr. GRAYDON: Your amendment was so bad we could not do anything about it.

Mr. KNOWLES: It was an amendment which, among other things, supported the co-operatives, which my hon. friends voted against.

In expressing general support for this measure, I wish to make it clear that this does not mean that I do not agree with the contention of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) that we should get full value for our money. I agree with him that parliament should know as much as possible of what is going on in the Canadian information service, and it is our job to do everything we can to keep those who are operating that service on their toes so that they will do a good job.

I wish, however, to make the point that in the society of to-day we need all the light and knowledge we can possibly have. We cannot have too much of it. The hon. member for Kamloops referred to this service as one which had been initiated during the war under the authority of the War Measures Act, and expressed the opinion that it had been an emergency measure which should have ended with the end of the war. My view is that there were many things which had their beginning during the war but which did not come to an end at its close.

It is possible that we may have learned a few things in those bitter years, and one of the things we learned was the great need for public information, and for our own people to know as much as possible of what is going on, and for the rest of the world to be fully informed about us. This might be considered as being in the field of adult education. We do not oppose the idea of provincial or municipal governments sponsoring and providing education for our children. In our western democracies at any rate we have got past the stage where we feel that because governments are in charge of education of our children, necessarily such education is in the form of propaganda. Such is not the case.

Education does not stop at grade 8, grade 12 or with university. Surely it goes on throughout the whole of one's life. In a dynamic age, such as the one in which we are living, if we are to be able to live in it and to meet effectively the problems which arise from time to time, our people must continue to learn as long as they live. They must be supplied with all possible information about happenings in our own country, and trends and developments throughout the world. On that basis I feel it is one of the responsibilities of the government to organize an information service. Since this matter of public information is a new field I recognize immediately that the government is put in a difficult spot. I do not quarrel with the hon. member for Kamloops for pointing out the dangers of creating government information services. I do not agree with him, but I think it is well that the point was made, so that the government will realize that they must lean over backward, that they must be particularly careful, especially in getting started, so that the reputation of this service will not be ruined by its being just a propagandist agency; it should be set up to provide information in an objective way.

I remember a case in point two or three years ago when this matter was up in the house, I believe on the estimates of the wartime information board. At that time I joined in part with my hon. friends in complaining that too much of the material in some of the W.I.B. documents and pamphlets that were going overseas had to do with information about the government. I tried to make the point to the minister in charge—I believe it was the present minister who was then parliamentary assistant to the Prime Minister—that to give a true picture of the situation in Canada there should be some account of what the other parties in the country were doing as well as of what was being done by the party that happened to be in power.

There was a long battle and our request was refused on the floor of the house, but eventually we won to the extent that in the issue of Canadian Affairs published just before the election by W.I.B., the predecessor of the Canadian information service, there appeared statements which had been prepared by the national parties which were taking part in the election of 1945. I do not think anyone was sorry that this was done, because it was a presentation of the picture as it stood.

I was glad to see a move made in the direction of getting away from the fear that you must not talk about political parties. After all, they are a large part of our national life. If you are to tell the story of what is going on, the story of the political parties has to be told. I felt encouraged that we had made some headway a few months ago when I was overseas attending certain international meetings. At that time the Canadian delegation was supplied by the Canadian information services with information as to what was going on back home in Canada. When you are away from home it means a great deal to get these telegraphic dispatches. I have a vivid recollection of feelings that, while the coverage was necessarily brief, nevertheless it was quite broad. I remember that almost all of one dispatch was devoted to an amendment that had been moved and the remarks made on the floor of this house by the leader of the group to which I belong. While my hon. friends to my right might not like that, it proved to me that the Canadian information service was trying to give a true picture of what was going on back home.

It would appear to me that there is more to the job that should be done by an information service than was referred to by the minister. He may have overlooked part of it, or perhaps I missed it, but as I understand it the job of a public information service is not just to disseminate information abroad; it should also disseminate information within the country. We still receive a good many documents from the Canadian information service, although not quite as many as during the latter months of the war or, if I may say so, just before the election. That may seem to defeat the point I am trying to make, but in fact it does not. I am in wholehearted support of the basic principle, but naturally I want to see this service carried on in an objective way. When the minister speaks on this matter again when we are in committee I hope he will have something to say about the domestic phase.

We all recognize the importance of publicizing Canada abroad, and those of us who have had the privilege of attending international conferences will, I am sure, all subscribe to that. However, I am more concerned about the level of the information given to our people here at home. As I said, I think that should be the principal job of a public information service. I hope these people will be given all kinds of support. That will not mean that we will not criticize them if we think they are not giving full value for the money spent; it will not mean that we will not criticize them if we think they are giving too much publicity to what the government is doing and failing to recognize the other activities in the community. With these and other suggestions that we might make later on, I want to support strongly the idea of developing and strengthening a public information service.

We are all aware of the difficult and trying period through which we have gone in the last six or seven years, yes in the last ten or fifteen years, but my notion is that we shall have even more difficult times ahead of us. One of the ways to fortify our people and help them to understand and adjust themselves to changing social and economic conditions, to understand problems in the international field, is to have as much knowledge and information as possible. I contend that it is one of the responsibilities of a democratic government to organize an information service among its people.

I know that every time this kind of thing is brought up people say, "It is being done by the government of the day." I do not support the government of the day—I did my best in April, May and June of 1945 to see that they were not returned—but this is a democracy. Hon. gentlemen opposite are there by the will of the people of this country; while they are there, it is part of their job to let the people know what the various departments are doing.

Mr. FULTON: The C.I.S. does not do that.

Mr. KNOWLES: If it is not doing that, it should be. I hope we shall have some information from the minister on that point when we get into committee.

There is just one more question I should like to ask before sitting down. The way I have spoken will, I think, indicate that I did not intend to make a speech at this time, but I felt that the minister should have some support since members on his own side are few and far between and very quiet to-day.

When this service is set up by statute I should like to know under what minister it will operate. The wartime information board came under the privy council and I believe the estimates are still under that department in the demobilization section. Will the minister tell us who is to have charge of these functions and whether, perchance, they are to be related to such similar services as the national film board? While I intend to do all I can to correct any abuses and to make sure that we get our money's worth, nevertheless I support the principle of the proposal now before us.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, before this resolution carries I should like to make a few observations that occur to me as being important in connection with the Canadian information service. I was interested in what my good friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), just said with respect to the Canadian information service conveying to the public information concerning the work being done by the respective departments of government. I would not think so much of that except for this: In the minister's own department, if my arithmetic is correct, either the Canadian information service is not doing the job it was intended to do, or else the minister is duplicating that service on his own, because I find that altogether $518,000 is being spent by his own department on publicity and information.

It is difficult, Mr. Speaker, to criticize governmental policy and administration without seeming to reflect upon those who are employed by the government in carrying out its policy. But I want to make this clear, that in the Canadian information service are many exceptionally able men, quite a number of whom I know myself, but under the present set-up of the Canadian information service these men are simply being encouraged by the government to waste an important part and the productive part of their journalistic life. I do not think many people—I want to put this baldly in clear language—are going to be fooled by the set-up of the Canadian information service. There are some practical people in parliament whom it is not easy to fool. You can picture the Canadian information service in any way you like, but the natural trend of such a service is not simply to convey information about the departments of government. but in the last analysis it becomes a propaganda machine for the government that happens to be in office. Let us look that fact squarely in the face and not be fooled by any fancy language concerning it. Actually the Canadian information service should not be called the Canadian information service. It should really be called the Canadian government perpetuation service, because that is what the service eventually becomes in effect. Again I want to make it clear that it is no reflection on the men who are in this service, for many of whom I have the highest regard both personally and for the ability they so often exhibit. This information service is not even a fifth wheel to the parliamentary coach; it is an eighth or ninth wheel, and unless the minister is able to make a much better case than he has done up to the present, I cannot see how this money is being spent to good advantage in the interest of the public at large.

Take the matter of Canadian news in United States newspapers. We have excellent men in the Canadian information service at New York and other places in the United States, but the whole policy of this government with respect to information is, in my opinion, misguided. I would ask the minister this question. Is he satisfied that in United States newspapers we are getting a fair share of Canadian news? I ask that question because, if we are to spend money on a Canadian information service over in the United States, we have a right to ask for some results. I know it may be said that in broad matters of advertising it is hard to lay your finger on results, but the one thing that strikes every Canadian visiting in the United States is the great lack of Canadian news in United States newspapers. There is hardly anything about Canadian business or Canadian affairs at all. The United States is a great country which, of necessity, is interested in its own affairs, although it is interested in ours too. I do not think the minister will be able to show, even though we have this great Canadian information service covering the United States, that it is contributing to the spreading of Canadian news abroad any more than the ordinary newspaper services. Indeed, sometimes I feel that the setting up of this information service is a reflection on the regular news services which did such a good job in Canada and the United States in the war and in peace. If this Canadian information service is not for the purpose of duplicating the ordinary news services, then it falls into a category of its own, the category which I have suggested, where it must eventually become simply a perpetuation service of the government in power.

We have moved far away from the olden days when political parties used to try to get their own publicity across to the people. Now, if you are the government, you do not have to spend your own money for political purposes; you spend other people's, even the money of those who are trying to put you out of power. That results in an impossible situation.

You may have the very best kind of men in the Canadian information service; but, after all, everybody is human, and who is it that pays the men in the Canadian information service? Is it the opposition? Is it the C.C.F.? Is it the Social Credit Party? No, it is the government. And who is it that has the right to hire and fire these men? Is it the opposition? Is it the C.C.F.? Is it the Social Credit Party? No, it is the government. There is not a practical businessman in this parliament who does not know that those who have the right to hire and fire have some little say at all events in how you shall do your work. We might just as well tear the mask off this whole thing and show it in its proper perspective. In doing so, I suggest to those connected with this service that they take what has been said here as a warning that in the years to come they may find themselves drifting into a position which they do not desire, of finding themselves part and parcel of the government.

My good friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, a few moments ago spoke of the scarcity of information published other than that which has to do with the government. I remember that in the war, judging by what was published, one might get the idea that only those who supported the government had anything to do with the war at all. There was one exception, a pamphlet, which contained a symposium on education to which both the minister and the leader of the C.C.F. party made admirable contributions. I was not at all satisfied with my own contribution, but they published it, perhaps for that very reason. That was the only occasion in the whole war, so far as I am aware, on which a government information bureau even mentioned that the opposition and other parties were sharing in the war effort. I am not going to blame anybody for that, because human nature runs through all political parties. Sometimes it is said that human nature differs with different political parties, but I have never been persuaded of that; and having the money in their hands, having the power in their hands, and having such an instrument as the information service in their hands like the government had, it would be too much to expect of human nature that they would not use it. I point that out, because it seems to me to go to the root of this whole matter of publicity and information. The government are trying to sell themselves, and by artificial means. There is one sure way for the government to sell themselves, and I am not satisfied that they are doing it very well just now. Let them have a policy which meets the wishes of the people and carry it out, and they will not need all this information, which is paid for by people, many of whom do not support them.

In conclusion, I had hoped that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would not have supported the expenditure of this money, although I am, in a way not surprised that he did. I wonder whether the government realizes that the group sitting to my left regard them quite differently from the way they regard themselves. I believe the ideas of the C.C.F. are completely erroneous, and I hope and believe that what they have in mind will never come to pass. But they regard the present government as a sort of group of political John the Baptists, paving the way for something which is coming later, though let me add that there is no comparison of any sort between the two sets of circumstances. But I hope the government will come to its senses some time and realize what it is doing. In each one of the measures wherein the C.C.F. are supporting the government, they are doing so because they think it makes a little easier for them if, through a lapse of memory and judgment on the part of the Canadian people, at any time in the next fifty years, they should come into office in this dominion. That is one of the reasons why the C.C.F. on so many occasions are supporting the government.

So far as the Canadian information service is concerned, this party looks with grave suspicion upon the whole move which is now being made. Here was a board set up, the war information board, we were told, for war purposes. But, as has happened to a lot of other things established during the war, the government is now busy legislating to try to perpetuate in peace what they set up ostensibly for the purpose of the war. All over the country the people are asking, does the government know the war is over? With the evidence of the present proposal and of many other moves which have been made in this house since the session started, it is not to be wondered at that such doubts arise in the public mind.

I oppose the proposal for these reasons, and others which I will not mention now because I desire to see the resolution further debated, not in order to support the legislation, because we desire to reserve our rights to see whether in committee we can obtain from the minister some small shred of evidence which would justify parliament in setting up this new information service. I for one have not been convinced of its necessity.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have just a word to say on the resolution before it is put to the vote. I can quite understand the anxiety of the government at times to have information disseminated to the people, and I am in sympathy with the idea of furnishing to the people of this and other countries full information of what is going on in Canada. Democracy cannot work successfully unless it is informed of what is going on; furthermore, it is impossible for us to take our position in the world unless accurate and dependable information is available through which the people of other countries can properly and correctly assess Canada's position.

However, I am not so sure that the form of service which was set up during the war and as a result of the needs of war can possibly serve in time of peace. My mind goes back to a debate which was held in the latter part of the session of last fall, when Bretton Woods came up, and I suggested that, in an effort to get the information before the people, the government make use of the government-owned radio, giving time to the various parties in this house to place before the people their views respecting this most important measure, and asking the people to let us know what they thought about it before the matter was finally disposed of by the government. I did not see very much anxiety on the part of the government then to let the people know. As a matter of fact, it seemed to me that everything possible was done to prevent the people from understanding what Bretton Woods was about; and I may tell the government that if our people had been fully informed they would not find themselves in the embarrassing position they are in now with respect to Bretton Woods, where, having committed themselves unalterably, they found it necessary in their negotiations for a wheat agreement with Britain to disregard completely the terms of Bretton Woods, to which they had committed themselves. They are now embarrassed, and they are going to have some trouble in getting out of a peculiar position.

The people of the country ought to know, and are entitled to know, and if the minister will bring in a proposal which makes it possible for the people to learn what they want to know about what is going on, rather than what the government want them to have, the government will not have any trouble in getting my support. But if they bring in a facsimile or even something resembling the wartime Canadian information service they will not have the support of my group; we can assure them of that.

My mind also goes back to the time of the election, when I received out west an invitation to contribute, as the leader of a political group in this country, to the overseas information service to the troops that was being supplied by the Canadian information board. I was told that I must put my whole programme—that is the whole programme of the Social Credit Association of Canada—before the troops overseas in 500 words. I inquired how much space was being given to other groups. I found that the Progressive Conservatives were allotted between 1,600 and 1,700 words; the Liberals, of course, were given 2,200 words. Now, how much more important is it for the troops to understand the whole of the Liberal programme than the whole of the programme of the Social Credit party or the Progressive Conservatives or the C.C.F.? I say that all are entitled to equal treatment. It is the only principle upon which we can have justice. But, Mr. Speaker, we were forced to condense our whole programme, a vast philosophy, just as important and vast as the Liberal philosophy—

Mr. BURTON: They have not got one.

Mr. LOW: —into 500 words, to get it before these people overseas, who were thereby to make up their minds whether to support Liberals or Social Crediters or Conservatives or the C.C.F.

Mr. FULTON: The government would find it more difficult to explain theirs.

Mr. LOW: These are some things I have in mind when I think of a Canadian information service, and I warn the minister and the government that if they intend to bring in a measure which will perpetuate that sort of thing they cannot hope to get the support of the opposition, certainly not this part of it, anyway.

There is one other thing I should like to say. I do not believe that the minister should be commended at all for bringing in this measure at this stage of the session. Here is one more example of the government waiting until very late in the session to bring forward a most important and controversial measure. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) rose in his place the other day and said that it would not be very controversial I had to restrain myself from rising and asking him about Bretton Woods and suggesting to him that this might have just as many repercussions. But here the minister comes in, in the heat of summer, when we are burdened and battened down so thoroughly that we can hardly breathe, and asks us to pass a measure of this kind in a hurry. If we have to stay here until Christmas we are going to find out what it means, and we will determine to our satisfaction that it is a measure which is intended to disseminate factual information of every kind, whether favourable to the government or not, to the people of Canada. If the government brings in a measure of that kind it will receive my support. If it does not, I can promise active and dynamic opposition.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I have here a list of publications put out by the Canadian information service, starting with an airmail bulletin. This is practically of no use in view of the fact that news carried by it is carried by the press not only throughout Canada but throughout the rest of the world. Then there is an airmail bulletin in Spanish. Why Spanish I do not know. I had understood that the airmail service was wired to different parts of the globe and sent out through the consular service, but from what I can gather it always arrives too late to be of any value. Next we have the C.I.S. Weekly and the press survey. This, I understand, goes to the newspapers. I have read editorials and articles in newspapers, since the end of the war, with reference to the information service that goes to the press, and in every article it is stated that the material always arrives a day late and therefore goes right into the wastepaper basket and is never read. That is weekly. As far as monthly publications are concerned, we have "Recent poll releases." I do not know what that is and I would ask the minister to explain it. As regards occasional publications, we have the "Canadian Cook Book" for British brides. That is a very good idea, but I suggest that the cook book would be better issued by the Department of Agriculture. That department at present issues various folders on how to cook meats, chicken, this, that and the other thing; it gives recipes for preserving and so on, and it is therefore only right that the Department of Agriculture should do that work and not the information service. Why should we have different services in the government doing the same work? Then we have the "Canadian Handbook for Mexican Book Fair." I believe that some 250,000 copies were issued. This is not the sort of work that should be done by the Canadian information service. A book of that kind should be got out by the Department of Trade and Commerce. They know what they are talking about and Canadian information service does not. Then there are reference papers. We get these in our mail, but the information given in these papers is, in most cases, stale, because we have it in our own Hansard and other publications and in Votes and Proceedings. They have the same in French. These are the publications that are put out at the present time.

Besides all that, I understand the Canadian information service do a lot of work for the film board and other departments of government. I feel, as many newspaper editors across the country do, that this service should be discontinued at once, because it is a waste of money and any advertising or information that goes out should be sent out by the different departments of government.

Information service has also sent out speakers throughout the country and paid their expenses. That is something I am very much against. I tried to get some information in this connection and, while I obtained some, I did not get all that I wanted, because under wartime information service speakers were sent, I understand, as far as Mexico.

I suggest that the minister should drop the resolution right where it is. The people do not want it. It is a waste of their money and it should be done away with, and the sooner the better. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), said last night that if we cannot give him some ideas on how to curtail extravagance he will have to think of ways and means. I thought then it was about time he began thinking of ways and means, and I hope that the minister who has this legislation in charge will decide right now to drop the resolution.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. FULTON: As I intimated before, there are certain questions regarding which we should like to get detailed information from the minister. If he would prefer to have me state them one by one I shall be glad to do so. In the first place, we would appreciate it if he would give in some detail the position with regard to the relation between Canadian information service and, for instance, the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of External Affairs. We were hoping that he would give that information with specific reference to these two departments and later give some general explanation of the relation between the service and the publicity branches of government departments generally. I refer to these two departments in particular because of the large items for publicity overseas work in these departments—to be found at pages 8, 51 and 53 of the main estimates.

Mr. CLAXTON: Perhaps I might answer the question at once. In referring to the item on page 8 of the estimates, amounting to $2,436,325 for representation abroad, the hon. member is going a long way from the subject matter of this resolution. That item on page 8 reads: "Including salaries of high commissioners, ambassadors, ministers plenipotentiary, consuls, secretaries, staff", and the figure is $2,436,325. Of course this item covers all the cost of Canada's foreign service in external affairs and does not include anything for public information services. There is no duplication whatever.

Mr. FULTON: To make the point clear, I should like to repeat what I said in the course of my general remarks, namely that I felt it would probably be more efficient to charge these people in the Department of External Affairs or the officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce with the work which the minister intimated would be done by Canadian information service abroad. I drew attention to the item in External Affairs, because it indicates an extensive representation in the Department of External Affairs abroad, and I would say offhand that there is sufficient staff there to carry out this work.

Mr. CLAXTON: I shall be very glad to deal with that, and since it is probably the most important question that can be raised on this resolution, I should deal with it at some length. In the first place, I can assure the hon. member that it is not new to us to consider whether or not to institute this service. I hope I can lay it down as a general principle, agreed to, I trust, by all hon. members, that they recognize that Canada has reached the stage in her development and in her status, and the world has reached the position in which we are required to have instruments abroad for extending information about Canada. It must be accepted that everyone in Canada would like to see people abroad in other countries have more information leading to more knowledge, more understanding and more good will about Canada. I believe everyone will agree with that. I think they would also agree that, in view of developments in the machinery for intercourse with other nations and of the materials for public opinion, something more is needed than we had before the war. I believe it was the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who said that a good many things had developed during the war. I should like to supplement that if I may and say that perhaps war itself came about more because of a lack of understanding between nations than anything else, and this was due primarily to ignorance. It was due to prejudice; and the best cure for ignorance, prejudice and intolerance that we have is information and knowledge which may lead to understanding and good will. Therefore I believe that every nation and every international organization have found it desirable to increase the facilities which have hitherto existed for the interchange of information as the basis of understanding, good will, tolerance and, we hope, cooperation. To a very considerable degree that was a war-time development.

It was the absence of services before the war which certainly contributed to this lack of understanding. Therefore I believe it is recognized everywhere that something should be done. It is desired that it should be done as efficiently, as fairly and as economically as possible. The business that we have set ourselves to is to see how that can be done, and that is why the questions and observations of the hon. member for Kamloops are interesting on this point and must be taken seriously.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is it not true that there are some things that diplomatic representatives cannot properly do?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: But which can be done better by a service of this kind?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is our submission.

Mr. GREEN: Give us an example. Can the minister tell us in what manner this Canadian information service endeavours to place the Canadian viewpoint before the people of Russia.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, certainly. I shall deal with both of these questions.

To get back to the questions of the hon. member for Kamloops, the Canadian information service is planning to have a supervisory committee on which there will be representatives of the Departments of External Affairs and Trade and Commerce. They will be the only two government departments represented as such. They are the government departments primarily interested in seeing to the dissemination of information about Canada abroad. The reason why we believe it is better that the service should do the job rather than either External Affairs or Trade and Commerce is that in order to perform such a service you should have technical knowledges, skills and experiences which are not ordinarily to be found in the Departments of External Affairs and Trade and Commerce. That is, it is desirable that we should have a group of people who are journalists, people having journalistic experience, a group of people who have had editorial experience and who have general publicity or educational experience, as well as artists and writers. Ordinarily you do not find these in the foreign offices of the world, and you do not find great numbers of them either in trade and commerce, or anywhere else. But if you do find them somebody has to pay them, provide for them. From that point of view we have thought it desirable that the group of people primarily concerned with this in the foreign field should be collected together and put in one service, but that that service should be closely coordinated with the two government departments with which it ordinarily has to work closely, namely External Affairs and Trade and Commerce.

Second, a member of a Canadian mission abroad, either in a high commissioner's office, an embassy or a legation, has a diplomatic status which gives him certain amenities. It also means that he must conduct himself in certain specified ways. It is not easy for him to have easy relationships with the press in the locality in which he is accredited in the same way as it is for somebody who has not diplomatic status to have these relationships of easy social intercourse, business relationships and the like which ordinarily exist between the representatives of all information services and the press in the country to which they are accredited.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRESS REPORT AS TO DISCARDING OF SHOES AND SLIPPERS

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, by consent of the house I should like to answer a question asked on July 12 by one of the hon. members opposite with respect to boots and shoes reported to have been dumped in a public place in Montreal. If I can have that consent which is necessary, I should like to make my statement at this time.

As a result of joint investigation by the army and War Assets Corporation, I am in a position to inform the house as follows:

1. That no footwear was placed on the Point St. Charles dump by any army installation or by War Assets Corporation.

2. A check on army vehicles has revealed that nothing but ashes and garbage was carried to Point St. Charles dump between May 1 and June 10, 1946.

3. Mutilation of condemned footwear has not been army practice since 1941.

4. All surplus army footwear is disposed of through War Assets Corporation, and at no time has such material been disposed of otherwise.

5. That a major proportion of surplus army footwear is handled at the Valleyfield depot of War Assets Corporation.

6. Canvas shoes which are found by qualified inspectors to be fit for further use are reconditioned as necessary and sold in the main to international relief agencies.

7. Canvas shoes which the inspectors find are not fit for further use, and cannot be repaired, are sold as scrap.

8. Used leather boots and shoes are examined by the inspectors and repaired if at all possible, but if not repairable are sold as scrap.

9. No canvas or leather footwear which is received in a repairable or usable condition by the corporation is scrapped by the corporation.

10. It has been determined that the only surplus government footwear which could have been placed on the Point St. Charles dump was that sold by the corporation as scrap leather to private interests, who after investigation and examination of their purchase, decided that the cost of salvaging by separation of the various component material would be greater than the revenue that could be derived from the sale of these materials. Apparently the private interests decided to accept the initial cost as a loss and dumped the footwear.

Mr. FULTON: Are goods turned over by War Assets Corporation to private interests ever turned over subject to any conditions, or are they turned over with no conditions attached?

Mr. HOWE: Nothing that government inspectors consider is usable is sold to private interests. But if it is sold, it is sold as scrap at scrap prices, for such disposition as the buyer may wish to make.

Mr. FRASER: I understand that all these shoes on the dump were split or slit with a knife. Would War Assets Corporation sell them in that way? I should think they would sell them as good shoes. They would not do the splitting?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. FRASER: All the newspapers which carried the article said that the shoes were slit or split so that they could not be used as shoes or boots, but could be used as slippers.

Mr. HOWE: I am told that the inspection board, which are in charge of operations at Valleyfield for the government, on occasion have slit a shoe which is not repairable. It is not their universal practice; but to distinguish shoes condemned for scrap from shoes which are repairable, from time to time it has been the practice to slash a shoe. That is just to make sure that an attempt is not made to repair it.

Shoes that are repaired are sold to relief agencies, and must come up to a certain standard set by those agencies. It may be that the government inspection staff slit certain shoes; but that is the only agency which could possibly have done so.

Mr. FRASER: The Montreal Star of yesterday showed pictures of these shoes. On this one pair—and the article stated there were others like them—the sole was absolutely new. It had not been used at all, and it was stated that the uppers were the same, except that they had a slit in them. The government is investigating—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order; there is no debate on the minister's statement.

Mr. FULTON: May I ask this question, Mr. Speaker, subject to your ruling. Who classified the shoes as repairable or irrepairable? Are they classified by the services before they are received by War Assets Corporation, or by War Assets Corporation after they are received by them?

Mr. HOWE: They are declared surplus to War Assets Corporation. They go to Valleyfield, to the War Assets Corporation repair depot at that point. There they are inspected by the inspection board which—

Mr. FULTON: What department?

Mr. HOWE: The Department of National Defence. It is the inspection board that has inspected all purchases by the government for war purposes throughout the last five or six years. If any shoes are slashed, it is my intimation that that is done as part of the inspection system.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Private bills.

PRIVATE BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING

Bill No. 248, to incorporate Prescott and Ogdensburg Bridge Company—Mr. Croll.

CANADIAN INFORMATION SERVICE

COORDINATION OF AND ASSISTANCE TO GOVERNMENT INFORMATION SERVICE

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Claxton—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

That it is expedient to present a bill to establish a Canadian information service for collecting and distributing abroad information converning Canada and to coordinate and assist the information service of the government and to provide for payment of salaries of staff and expenses of the service from moneys appropriated by parliament.

Mr. CLAXTON: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose I was answering some of the questions that had been asked and some of the comments that had been made by some hon. members and was trying to show why it was considered necessary to set up an information service to do work which I think every one admits should be done in order to ensure that Canada shall receive adequate presentation abroad. I said that it had been considered that this should not be part of the functions either of the Department of External Affairs or of the Department of Trade and Commerce, first, because it needed people having special and particular qualifications and, second, because it had been found that the members of this service, not being members of the diplomatic corps, were able to maintain relations with members of the local press and others which enabled them to discharge their informational functions more effectively than could be done by members of the ordinary diplomatic services.

I would point out that the officers of the Department of External Affairs and of the Department of Trade and Commerce who are located abroad are already hard pressed and fully occupied with their own particular functions. It is quite evident from the examination we have made that it would not be possible for the offices of these two departments in the main centres to render additional service without the appointment of additional officers. Of course both departments do work along informational lines, and I think anyone who knows anything about the quality and calibre of the people representing Canada in External Affairs and Trade and Commerce will admit that they are doing admirable work. That is recognized by everyone and by the peoples of other countries.

We do not appoint special information service officers or set up a separate office unless there is a real need which cannot be met through these two departments. This has been found to be the case in New York, Washington, London, Paris and Canberra. In those places the officers of the Canadian information service are definitely subordinate to the senior officer of the Department of External Affairs and work very closely with him. I should like any hon. member who has visited New York, Washington, Paris, London or Canberra and who has seen what the representatives of the Canadian information service are doing in those places to tell us in what respect they have not done valuable work, work which needed to be done in the interests of Canada, work which should be done either by them or by the diplomatic representatives but which to be done by others would require the appointment of additional staff.

I should like to hear about that, because I have been concerned with this for two years and I have heard nothing but praise about the work these officers who represent Canada abroad are doing. I have heard no complaints except that they do not have enough money to do an adequate job and do not have an adequate staff.

These officers have been chosen solely with a view to their suitability for the positions they occupy. Some reference was made by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) to the luxurious offices in New York. I dare say that those so-called luxurious offices have been visited by many hon. members and by many representatives of the press. We have heard from them—when I say "we" I mean the Canadian information service for which I am speaking—nothing but praise. I have not heard of any complaint about the offices or services rendered. I think if anyone goes to those offices he would find that they are modest, that they are rather overcrowded but equipped to do an adequate job along the lines I have indicated.

The person who set up the office in New York in the first place was Mr. Harry Sedgewick, managing director of CFRB, a gentleman not known generally to be a supporter of this party. I think he did an excellent job there. He carried on through the years of the war and when the war reached a state where he thought he could return to his own business, he did do. In Washington we had Mr. Hugh Campbell, the public relations officer in Winnipeg for the Canadian Pacific Railway company, now public relations officer everywhere for that company. He did a notable job in Washington, not only for the Canadian information service but for the armed forces and the people of Canada. I have never heard that he was an active supporter of the Liberal party or of any party.

I should like to deny with all the vehemence possible the charges which are implied or stated by hon. members or by others outside that there has been any sign of political propaganda about any of these activities at any stage. I think it is remarkable that in the course of this debate there should have been such references and insinuations without a single, solitary instance being given of any case where it has happened. That a country should have carried on an information service through one means or another from 1939 to this date, with no proof of that kind of activity ever being brought forward and supported, is a remarkable achievement and a great tribute to the people who carried on that service. It is also a recognition of the reality of the position as described by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre; that is, that a responsible government, which ours is, leans over backwards to ensure that nothing like that could possibly happen.

Was there ever a better example of this than when the Canadian information service met the request of the armed forces for information about the election and distributed to the armed forces overseas the issue of Canadian Affairs which described the aims and objects of the political parties.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Does the minister approve the division of space as described by the hon. member for Peace River?

Mr. CLAXTON: I had nothing whatever to do with the division of space; no member of the government had anything to do with it, and no employee of the government decided it.

Mr. JACKMAN: Who fired the editor?

Mr. CLAXTON: There was no firing of the editor.

Mr. JACKMAN: He got thrown out of his job.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member is talking about something which has nothing whatever to do with this matter, and which does not come within the scope of the activities of the Canadian information service. I will tell the committee what happened.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, do. Tell the whole story.

Mr. CLAXTON: The armed forces felt that it was desirable in the interests of the men who wanted to vote in the election that information should be placed before them by the political parties. The Canadian information service, which published fortnightly Canadian Affairs, which ran through some fifty-six editions, and which did, I think, a notable job, was the vehicle chosen by which this might be done by the Canadian information service. The Canadian information service, looking at the precedents established in connection with the allocation of free time for political broadcasting over the CBC network, called into consultation, just as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation had done in connection with broadcasting, representatives of the political parties in Canada which came within the general scope of the white paper regarding broadcasting which was issued in 1939, as brought up to date in 1944. That included the representatives of the political parties which had national offices in Ottawa. They were called into consultation. I am sorry that the party represented by the hon. member for Peace River did not come within that qualification at the time. It was no decision of mine or of the government's. It was decided on the basis of the test that had been laid down, and representatives of the Progressive Conservative party, the C.C.F. party and the Liberal party met and agreed on an allocation of space which roughly approximated the allocation of time for political broadcasting. It was done on that basis. The parties cooperated and as far as I know, they stuck to the rules which their representatives had agreed to or laid down.

The issue went overseas. It required a tremendous feat of organization to get it into the hands of the troops in time. I can tell the committee this. I have heard from every side, irrespective of political affiliations, that the sailors, soldiers and airmen of Canada appreciated that service and regarded it as a fair way of treating them in the fairest election ever held in Canada in war time.

Mr. JACKMAN: The war is over.

Mr. CLAXTON: But I am answering a remark that has been made, and I am not going to allow the fact that the war is over to enable people to make charges without my being able to reply to them. I think the hon. member would want me to be allowed that privilege.

It was very interesting indeed to read that in the British House of Commons—I can give hon. members the reference—the question was raised why they could not do the same thing for the British forces because it had succeeded so well with the Canadian forces. I will tell hon. members that never, either in my capacity as a member, fairly active in the ranks of the Liberal party, or as minister charged with the responsibility to parliament for the administration of this service, have I heard of any complaint from any source about the way in which that operation was carried on.

Apart from vague and general remarks and insinuations, I have never heard of any established case where it could be brought out that this instrument of publicity and public information for the people of Canada has been used for partisan purposes. The hon. member for Peel, my very good friend, referred to the occasion when he, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and myself took part in a debate in Montreal. I must say that I thought, just as he did, that I got the worst of it on that occasion—

Mr. GRAYDON: I am quite sure I did.

Mr. CLAXTON:—because speaking as a supporter of the government as I was at the time I thought I had to stick closely to the constitutional and legal situation in which the federal government found itself. But I must say that, apart from that notice in Canadian Affairs to which he referred, I do not remember any issue of Canadian Affairs ever referring to the Liberal party doing this or to the Liberal party doing that. Also I do not think any official or officer of the Canadian information service thinks of his salary as being paid by the Liberal government of Canada. He thinks of himself as a servant of Canada; I think they all do and will continue to do so, just as we regard them. I think they have served the people of Canada exceedingly well during a difficult period.

So I feel that, in view of the fact that I do not know of any case which can be brought forward to support the assertions which have been made, this service has done an admirable work and done it in the interest of the people of Canada.

The hon. member for Vancouver South asked me to give an example of the way in which the Canadian information service worked, and then he wanted to know—and I wonder if he really regards his question as fair—how the Canadian information service endeavoured to place the viewpoint of Canada before Russia.

Mr. GREEN: What is unfair about that?

Mr. CLAXTON: It is recognized that it is exceedingly difficult for anyone to place any point of view before the people of Russia except through Russian agencies. I should say there that we send our representative in Moscow, our ambassador, Mr. Dana Wilgress, all the material there is. Also the government of the U.S.S.R. has in Canada its press agency which receives all the information that goes out to similar agencies.

Mr. GREEN: You mean, regular news agencies?

Mr. CLAXTON: Regular news agencies—Tass—and there is no other way that I know in which we could do it. I hope that answers the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I say a word? As a rule I do not speak very long. I was in Holland, a year ago this week, with the troops. They had just received a copy of Canadian Affairs. I was through the army headquarters, all the divisional headquarters and all around the various units there; and they were absolutely splendid in their appreciation of the issue of Canadian Affairs. I am not speaking now merely of Liberals, because most of those I met were supporters of my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. KNOWLES: Do not forget how they voted overseas.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They said that was the finest thing done, that Canada was able to send over from all the parties an expression of their political philosophies and political ideals.

Mr. GREEN: Of course we are dealing with a set-up that is to be made permanent and carried on into peacetime. If the Minister of National Health and Welfare thinks the question about Russia was unfair, will he explain how this information service carries on its work, say in the Netherlands, or in Norway, or in Brazil?

Mr. CLAXTON: With regard to Brazil, we have in our ambassador, Mr. Jean Desy, a person who speaks now the language of the country, who is well recognized as being a very good representative of our country. He receives from the Canadian information service every day the Canadian airmail bulletin; he gets our material weekly; he has been supplied with a library of books; he has his inquiries which are addressed day by day to the office in Ottawa, and promptly answered, and he has also outlets for the kind of information which is furnished. In the case of Brazil a considerable quantity of the publications are issued in Portuguese, and Mr. Desy himself has been, I think, one of the most effective people in ensuring that knowledge of Canada is distributed abroad.

Mr. GREEN: In that case is the purpose largely to promote trade between Brazil and Canada, or what is the purpose?

Mr. CLAXTON: Of course, to promote trade as well as to promote good relations in general. The trade commissioners who are there do their work in their own sphere, but they do not have the same opportunities of getting together information as have the people in Ottawa who are handling this service to send it to them and give them the means whereby they can carry on their work of representing us abroad. That applies both to the external affairs and trade commissioners in places like Rio.

Mr. LOW: With regard to this matter I brought up in connection with the election service, since the minister has mentioned it I think I should clarify one or two points. We appreciate the service we got, and I think it did good. But what I was trying to bring before him was the inevitable position which it puts us in and puts the government in to have a service of that kind sponsored by the government. Let me make that clear.

We were not asked to sit in with the committee that allocated that time. It was known perfectly well that we had an organization, just as it was known that we had an organization in the case of CBC and the allocation of free time for political broadcasts from the CBC. Whether our office was in Ottawa, or Toronto, or Hamilton, or wherever it happened to be, we had a head office and an organization there. Therefore we should have been brought in. The first thing I knew about the matter was just a few weeks before the actual polling day, when I was sent a letter saying, "We are allotting your party 500 words in which to place your programme before the forces." I found that the allocation of time was on the basis which I mentioned this afternoon—500 words for ourselves; I do not recall what the C.C.F. had; the Progressive Conservatives were given between 1,600 and 1,700 words, and the Liberals between 2,100 and 2,200 words. If the Canadian information service used a formula arrived at by the CBC for the allocation of free time, I will say this, that the CBC now give as an excuse for the formula which was applied the fact that it was drawn up in a committee of this house. When we had a committee meeting a short time ago composed of representatives of the CBC and of all the parties in this house we found that no one on the government side was willing to change the allocation, because they claimed that the government should have a priority on the time, that they should have more time in which to broadcast to the people their policies and make representations with respect to those policies. I cannot quite understand why the minister cannot see this, that the position that the government are in inevitably, when they bring in a service of this kind and set it up, is that the people who come to the government for pay must take the position that the government is preferred, and they will take that position and will give them more space and more opportunity than they will give anybody else. That is only natural, unless the minister himself says to his Canadian information service, "We want you to be fair about this thing." If freedom of speech is to be tolerated in this country it must be free to everybody and equally free to everybody. That is the position we take. I have seen this type of thing worked before and I know the weaknesses of it. I know the minister himself has to take some responsibility, regardless of what he now says, that he did not have anything to do with it. The government did have something to do with it. Had the government stepped in and said, "We want this thing to be fair; we want the space to be fairly allocated," that is what would have been done. They did not do that, so that the Canadian information service would naturally say, "We have to give the government some preference in the amount of space." I do not see that they deserve any preference. Surely every political organization in the country that qualifies as a national political organization ought to have freedom of speech and freedom of publicity on anything which the government undertakes to do to get information to the people. If they are not going to undertake a service to get information to the people, well and good; we will take care of it ourselves, but if we are instituting a service let us institute it fairly and let it be free to everybody.

Mr. GRAYDON: During the recess there was brought to my attention by one of the citizens of Ottawa a matter which I had entirely forgotten, and I want to ask the minister a question with respect to it. Is it correct that one of those persons convicted of espionage was with the Canadian information service or the wartime information board; and, if so, who was that person?

Mr. CLAXTON: As far as I know, there was no one actually in the employ of the Canadian information service or the wartime information board who was connected with the espionage case or the report of the royal commission. There were two persons who had been seconded for a time from the armed forces for services in connection with the wartime information board and who there performed functions which were common to the wartime information board and the armed forces, but neither of them was ever on the strength or on the payroll of the Canadian information service.

Mr. GRAYDON: What positions did they hold? The minister indicates two. I heard of only one. What positions did they hold and how long were they with the wartime information board and the Canadian information service?

Mr. CLAXTON: I should preface this by saying that in this case there has not yet been an adjudication by the court. As hon. members know, Squadron Leader Poland was seconded from the Royal Canadian Air Force to the wartime information board, effective November 14, 1944 and was engaged in duties in connection with the board and the armed forces in the production of the Canada Digest. In May, 1945, his duties with the wartime information board ended. Prior to his undertaking these functions he was on the ordinary staff of the Royal Canadian Air Force at headquarters. Captain D. G. Lunan was seconded from the Canadian army to the wartime information board on November 6, 1944. He was attached to the information to the armed forces section where he was engaged in the production of Canadian Affairs. His period of secondment to the wartime information board ceased on February 28, 1946.

Mr. GRAYDON: I used the word "convicted". I presume these men are both still on trial and have not been convicted. I am not sure of the names and was only seeking information. In view of the fact that the matter was before the courts, I thought we should not discuss it inasmuch as it would not be justice.

Mr. FRASER: The minister mentioned that the ambassador to Brazil receives the airmail bulletin and that is how he helps to build up Canada in Brazil. I have here a copy of Monday, June 24, 1946, and I do not believe that any of this information is of much use to them in Brazil:

New army R.C. chaplain named. Brigadier Gibson heads M.P. 6. Colonel Bogart heads M.P. 3. Canadian merchandise exports decline. Births, deaths and marriages increase.

There is a whole page of it and not a bit of it of any use to the ambassador there or to the people of Brazil. It is absolute bunk.

Mr. CLAXTON: The information contained in the airmail bulletin is not bunk. It is a report of events that happened that day, and of course different events take place from day to day. This bulletin is issued daily to all representatives of Canada abroad and its circulation totals 890 odd daily. It goes in Canada only to those who specially request it and have reason for asking for it. It is sent by air mail. The hon. member for Peterborough West suggested in his previous remarks that it is slow, that the ordinary sources of Canadian news are sufficient to carry the news contained in it. Well, this bulletin goes to fifty-two countries or colonies in which very little Canadian news is received. In none of them is there such regular news as that given in the airmail bulletin. It is sent by air mail because that is the most expeditious way of forwarding it without the cost of cable. Let me ask the hon. member whether in Brazil, for example, or in China, or in any of the other countries, except perhaps the United Kingdom and the United States, there is anything like the same news provided as quickly about Canada as is contained in the air mail bulletin. It is a succinct summary of news of each day. It contains no editorial opinions, nothing but bare news, and the news of course varies from day to day.

Mr. FRASER: This airmail bulletin is of use only to ambassadors or consuls in the different countries, the persons who really write and ask for it, and the information that is contained in the bulletin is not exactly what those people want. They would get better information from the Department of Trade and Commerce, and that department has its own bulletin and employs its own men to get out its information. Through the Department of Trade and Commerce information is supplied throughout the world and that is what these people want. They do not want the stuff contained in an airmail bulletin of this kind. This is only a sample. All the others that I have seen are exactly the same. The minister says that some are printed in French, but the people in France do not want them. Others are printed in Spanish. But who is going to read them in the Argentine, where Spanish is spoken, or in Chile, or Columbia, or Ecuador, or Peru.

Mr. CLAXTON: This bulletin is sent to Canadian representatives abroad so that they may keep continuously informed in a summary way about events at home and they get news much more quickly than through any other source. It is also for the convenience of those who wish to pass on the news to people who speak some other language. These bulletins are designed primarily for the information of the people who represent us abroad, but it is given in a form which enables them to use it in passing it on to others who may be interested in the particular subject. The hon. member says that he finds the particular number to which he refers of the character that he has described. I receive these bulletins regularly, and I know they contain as accurate and succinct a summary of essential Canadian news as it is possible to draw up. They go out and are appreciated by officers of the Department of External Affairs and of Trade and Commerce and by the Canadian information service officers and any other officers of the Canadian service abroad.

Mr. FRASER: In my opinion a bulletin of this kind sent out by the Department of Trade and Commerce in cooperation with the Department of External Affairs would give information that was worth while to people in those countries instead of giving local news such as we find here. For example, I saw this item in the Montreal Gazette of this morning with reference to this resolution:

> External Affairs has publicity men attached to many of its embassies and legations in other countries, and Trade and Commerce properly has such services to help promote foreign trade. There are Canadian publicity people in many parts of the world already, and there is no need for more.

I agree with the article in that paper.

Mr. CLAXTON: Earlier in the day I referred to the Montreal Gazette's news report from Ottawa with the editorial comment. The Department of External Affairs has no publicity officers abroad except those supplied by the Canadian information service. The Department of External Affairs and the Department of Trade and Commerce are represented in the advisory committee of the Canadian information service, and I should also add that they are represented on the working committee. There is a working committee set up with representatives of the publicity branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce. Its exhibition commissioner and its tourist bureau and the national film board and the CBC international service are on this working committee. They meet every week to work out the coordination of material which should be sent out and the coordination of activities. They work together in the closest possible way. Only to-day I was told that there are a number of communications by telephone and by personal interview between these three every day. If we did not have the Canadian information service providing the service for External Affairs, the Trade and Commerce officers and other officers of the Canadian government I feel, and I think the committee will agree, that it would have to be provided in some other way. It seems to us to be most economical that it should be done by one central service rather than by a variety of services. That does not mean that External Affairs do not send to their officers abroad special information related to external affairs. It does not mean that Trade and Commerce do not send to their officers abroad special information on general matters relating to Canada as a whole. The Canadian information service, working with External Affairs and Trade and Commerce, sends out the material.

Mr. GREEN: It might be cheaper to send out the Globe and Mail.

Mr. FULTON: I should like to follow that up in relation to the questions which I asked the minister and on which he spoke before six o'clock, namely, the relation between these services and the two departments of External Affairs and Trade and Commerce. In reply to that question, the minister said it was felt that we must have personnel abroad giving information about Canada. He said he thought the committee would agree with that general statement in the light of present circumstances and present development in the world. Perhaps I would be inclined to agree with that statement, subject to one important qualification, namely, that the object in mind in giving information about Canada was related to some specific government policy; as I say, policy perhaps calculated to encourage immigration into Canada. We see no evidence of such policy. If it be policy calculated to foster Canadian export trade with a certain country or groups of countries, then I submit that that policy could be better furthered by the Department of Trade and Commerce. Or if it be policy calculated to improve our ambassadorial relations with other countries, then I suggest that that policy could be better furthered by the Department of External Affairs. Unless the desire to disseminate information about Canada is related to some specific gavernment policy, we submit that this is an extravagance which Canada can afford to do without.

If the object of maintaining this Canadian information service is designed to improve our external relations or our export or import trade, what department is better qualified to do these things than either the Department of External Affairs or the Department of Trade and Commerce? Surely the minister does not suggest that the ambassadors, high commissioners and the first, second and third secretaries of the Department of External Affairs live in a vacuum and do not know anything about Canada and are not qualified to disseminate information about Canada; or that the Department of Trade and Commerce, which at this very moment is running courses particularly to train young men and women who have returned from overseas, to teach them about Canada, its people and its various provinces, and all its aspects—not just trade—is not qualified to disseminate information about Canada. The Department of Trade and Commerce is spending a lot of money on teaching these people these things, and the department has a publicity branch which surely is qualified—if it is qualified to do anything—to send information overseas to the trade commissioners who go there.

The work of carrying out the objects which the minister has put forward in justification of the setting up of this service could be done a great deal more cheaply by utilizing the media of the already established departments. It would be cheaper to do it in that way than to set up a separate service which must inevitably duplicate and overlap the services that are being carried on by the two departments I have mentioned. That is the whole point. If we want the Departments of External Affairs and Trade and Commerce to exist in a vacuum, then, of course, we should make an attack on their estimates; but if we do not want them to exist in a vacuum which we do not, then I suggest they should take over the function which the minister has outlined as being the responsibility of the Canadian information service, and which they can discharge a great deal more cheaply and probably a great deal more efficiently.

Mr. FULTON: With all deference, are there not some ideas in my statement on which the minister should make some comments?

Mr. CLAXTON: I have already dealt with it before and after six o'clock, and said that close considerations were very much in the minds of these people who had to decide on whether or not the Canadian information service should be carried on separately by External Affairs and Trade and Commerce, each working in its own way, or by some agency in which they were both represented. It seems to me that the hon. member for Kamloops has made out a very good case for doing it as a coordinated activity, and that is the way—

Mr. FULTON: Then cut down on the estimates of the other two departments.

Mr. CLAXTON: No, if you do not do it in this way you would have to add to the estimates of the other two departments if you wanted to have the service performed. We believe that there is a large desire to see that service performed; there is general need of seeing it performed. Somebody must do it and it seemed to us to be the most advisable way to do it. I can assure the hon. member that the supervisory committee with the representatives of External Affairs and Trade and Commerce, who are usually the under-secretary of state and the deputy minister, and the working committee with other representatives from each department—and the working committee meets at least once a week—secure the most effective coordination and cooperation. If they saw there was any better way of doing it they would be glad to do it—they would have done it. But neither they nor the government as a whole have seen a better way of doing it.

May I say just a word further about the cost of a service of this kind. The amount sought in the estimates this year is $640,700 for Canada. In the United States estimates for similar services have been passed to the amount of $24,584,778; in the United Kingdom, $30,598,107; in Australia, $1,419,380; in Brazil, $2 million; and in the Netherlands, $864,000. I do not mention these as indicating that we should necessarily spend the same sum. We are not spending anything like comparable sums on a per capita basis, particularly having in mind our widespread interests. But I mention it to indicate that in other countries people who are occupied with similar responsibilities have decided that very much larger sums, in comparison, should be spent on similar services.

If I might just answer an observation which was made earlier, namely that which suggested that these services should be on a fair basis within Canada, these services are designed primarily to extend beyond the boundaries of Canada. They are not aimed directly to do anything to affect public opinion in Canada. The services within Canada are those of coordination and assistance to existing government departments. The service is primarily designed for the dissemination of knowledge and information about Canada outside the boundaries of our own country.

[Mr. Claxton]

Mr. FULTON: Following up the question I asked before, if, as the minister has said, it is the desire to coordinate the external work of the Department of External Affairs and the Department of Trade and Commerce, why was it decided to put the work of this coordinating committee under a separate minister, namely the Minister of National Health and Welfare? Is it possibly because he is the minister of propaganda for the government; or what good reason can be advanced for that decision?

Mr. CLAXTON: I very much resent the suggestion that I am minister of propaganda for the government. I do not think the hon. member means that, seriously.

Mr. FULTON: I would not be surprised if he did.

Mr. CLAXTON: Well, then, I would ask the hon. member to withdraw it.

Mr. FULTON: I will not withdraw until I am proven wrong in making that suggestion.

Mr. HANSELL: I was on my feet once or twice, Mr. Chairman. You saw me, but I did not want to break continuity of argument. I agree to a great extent with the arguments of hon. members who have preceded me. Personally, I cannot see why the Department of National Health and Welfare should have to care for an institution known as the Canadian information service.

Mr. FRASER: They are looking after it because it is sick.

Mr. HANSELL: What is it that we have to make known through this information service? Surely we do not require it in Canada. We have our daily press and our periodicals.

Mr. MACKENZIE: And our pulpits.

Mr. HANSELL: We have radio stations, and our own Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Our pulpits and our pews.

Mr. HANSELL: These institutions disseminate all the information we need at home. What is the purpose? The purpose must be that we like to send information abroad, but what information do we have to send abroad? It is very nice to establish friendly relations with other countries, and I agree that that should be done, because we want to be friendly with other countries, and we have a short-wave broadcasting station at Sackville from which we give a world service for that purpose.

So far as I can see, the only thing we have to let other people know is what we have to sell. If we want to advertise to the world that we have a big wheat crop and are looking for customers, all well and good. That is something which would come under the Department of Trade and Commerce. If we want to advertise Canada as the happy hunting ground for tourists, that would come under the same department. If we have anything to sell, the same is true. I am not going to make any charges or accusations; but I am suggesting that the Canadian information service will go beyond making known what Canada has to sell to the rest of the world.

I was interested in the speech made by the minister, a speech which evidently was prompted by the hon. member for Peace River, the leader of this party. I was interested to note that when the minister was discussing matters requring the use of the expressions "divergence of views" or "controversial subjects", somehow or another he seemed to have the mentally cramped view that those subjects of a controversial nature all exist within the confines of political partyism.

That is not so. He seemed to advance the argument that the organization now to be known as the Canadian information service had no more interest in Liberal policies than in those of other parties. Personally I am not greatly interested in that, because so far as I am concerned there are only two philosophies in the world.

I do not care particularly what party a man belongs to; if he disagrees with some other party I will guarantee that that disagreement is on methods of administration and not on ultimate objectives, or deep-seated policies and principles. There are only two philosophies in the world, one of which is the philosophy of free men, always recognizing the freedom of the individual and the principle that every man should be established in his own right without interference from any other person, body or government. That is one principle. The other is the philosophy of world statism.

I do not know whether the minister would be prepared to make comment on this point, but I say that when any information service, public body or radio deals with ways of life it must deal with one or other of those two philosophies. As a Canadian people believing in British democratic institutions—and I use the term "British" because I believe we do hold to those great Christian virtues—will the minister guarantee to the house that a Canadian news service will not propagate anything to the contrary view? I do not think he will. Will he say that his Canadian information service will not at times give out information on Canada's foreign policy? Will he say that they will not? Let me say that you cannot write or think or speak foreign policy without advocating one philosophy or the other. That is why I wanted the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to make a few pronouncements the other day before leaving for the peace conference.

I am not concerned with Liberalism or Conservatism or socialism or social credit, but I contend that the minister holds one or the other of the philosophies I have mentioned, whether he is a Liberal or anything else. I will almost guarantee that the foreign policy of the Minister of National Health and Welfare individually is no different from the foreign policy of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell).

Mr. MACKENZIE: It must be a good policy if they both agree on it.

Mr. HANSELL: I am not debating the merits of the policy. You cannot say that one is a Liberal policy and the other a C.C.F. policy. I am not personally so much concerned over the Canadian information service boosting a party—of course I should like them to boost ours a little—but I do not think that is the danger; the danger is the propagation of philosophies for which the Canadian people do not stand.

Let me add one more word. This service is to cost well over half a million dollars. That may not sound so much since we talk in terms of astronomical financial figures, but half a millions dollars is a lot of money when you do not need to spend it. When the leader of the official opposition was speaking the other inght about cutting expenditures the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) asked where they could be cut. Here is half a million dollars. One of our biggest items of expenditure is in connection with the national film board and you could do away with that completely.

But I am not speaking only about cutting expenditures. We are setting up in Canada what I will call institutions for want of a better name, one of which is known as the Canadian information service. That is a nice name, but I am a little leery of nice names because so often we do not know what they really mean. This Canadian information service is being set up under a Liberal administration and it is gradually growing to enormous proportions. Then there is the Canadian Broadcasting corporation.

I am not going to be highly critical of these three institutions, provided that they are administered in the proper way. However, there is no guarantee that Liberal administration is going to be in power forever—I hope they are not. There is no guarantee that the Conservatives are going to be in power. There is no guarantee that the C.C.F. are going to be in power. The present administration will not be in forever because we are living in a changing world.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It has not changed very much in twenty years.

Mr. HANSELL: The Minister of Veterans Affairs has a habit of interrupting me. I would not mind that so much if he would only speak in English so that I could understand him. I said that the world is in a state of unrest, and so is Canada. The other night the Minister of Finance gave us a glowing picture of what the government were trying to do. I sat back and said to myself, "I did not think we were living in such a wonderful country. How is it there is so much unrest if everything is so lovely?"

We are living in a time of unrest. If another government should come into office, either through the process of our democratic form of election or in some other way—believe me that is not without possibilities to-day—if a government holding to the philosophy of dictatorship should come into office the machinery would already be there for them to take over. What would be a greater plum for a dictatorship administration than the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? The act governing this corporation would not need to be changed by one word. This new government would have this huge propaganda machine all ready for their own purposes. You would not be talking in terms of Liberalism or Conservatism or socialism or social credit then.

Another plum that would be ready to fall into their lap would be the national film board. This could be used to propagate what they would probably term the new order. Then we have the Canadian information service, one of the triplets of propaganda institutions which a government of that kind would find all ready for them. What would they say? They would say, "We did not bring them into existence; it was a previous government that prided itself on free institutions that brought these things into existence." How often have I heard the Prime Minister say over the years that he was here to protect free institutions.

That is the picture and we are spending millions of dollars on that type of machinery. I am not going to say that the national film board did not do some reasonably good work with certain films dealing with the danger of inflation and "Canada Carries On" and that sort of thing, but I want to say that if they think they can compete with the fine arts of the motion-picture business they have another think coming because it cannot be done.

I am going to ask the minister one question and I would request him not to make a long speech.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What about yourself?

Mr. HANSELL: I am making only the one speech, but the minister makes a speech every time he is asked a question. I want to know if he will place the names of all members of parliament on the mailing list of the Canadian information service for all their publications.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not expect the hon. member to read them all if he does not want to. I will confess to the minister that if he puts my name on and I get those publications I shall read them for one purpose only, and that is to check up on them to see whether or not they are propagating something that is not in accordance with our free democratic way of life.

Mr. CLAXTON: Until the Canadian information service was created out of the wartime information board all hon. members were always asked if they wished to be on mailing lists, but when the Canadian information service was set up with this changed orientation to provide for the dissemination of news abroad, the people on the mailing list were notified that their names would be cut off unless they wanted the information. In consequence of that, the mailing lists have been revised, but if any hon. member wants any information from Canadian information service he will certainly get in.

Mr. LENNARD: On looking over this copy of the airmail bulletin, my interpretation is that it is nothing more or less than a daily news column for the Canadian legations abroad. It is a glorification of that column in Time called "Milestones", which starts off with the births and ends with the deaths. It also reminds me of another well-known column in our daily and weekly newspapers, Walter Winchell's. It is in my opinion, a good Walter Winchell column.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have been looking over a question which was passed as an order for a return on Monday, July 8, in the name of the hon. member for Peterborough West. I have been looking over the various daily, weekly, semi-monthly, monthly and occasional publications of the Canadian information service, and the thing that struck me coming as I do from an agricultural part of the country—and remember that thirty-five per cent of the people of Canada are still on the farms or in our rural parts—was this. If this information service is going to do the great job the minister speaks of, I have two questions to ask. I notice a reference to field reports but I presume that does not refer to the kind of fields the farmer knows about. My first question is that: How many people competent to write of or deal with agriculture are connected with the Canadian information service? Second, what service does it give to that thirty-five per cent of our population who are on the farms?

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member has asked a question which presumably relates to the proposed information service to be set up in consequence of this resolution and to carry on the Canadian information service.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are carrying it on now under order in council.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes. That service, under the terms of the order in council and under the terms of the resolution, does not aim to disseminate information in Canada. It aims to disseminate information abroad and to coordinate and assist existing Canadian information services. The hon. member will appreciate that, since it is not designed to send information to the people of Canada, it is not designed to send any information particularly to the class that he mentioned, any more than to any other class in Canada. But I would add that in all its work the Canadian information service naturally seeks the cooperation and assistance of the government departments having experts on any subject, and that cooperation is readily offered. They all work together, just as would be done in any other joint activity, to get out the material. They seek the advice of the people who are competent to give it in the technical fields.

Mr. GRAYDON: I perhaps did not make myself clear. What I had in mind was that thirty-five per cent or more of our Canadian people are rural people, and if we are going to give a true picture of Canada to other countries of the world and we do not give a complete picture of Canada agriculturally coming from competent hands, it seems to me that we are falling down on the job and not carrying out the responsibility of the Canadian information service. What I wanted to know was how many people are there in the Canadian information service who are competent to write or give information about agriculture to other countries. That question links up closely with another question which has arisen in External Affairs. One of the main qualifications for men or women entering the diplomatic service in Canada is that they should be university graduates. To that I take some exception, but at present it is the rule. Men and women are chosen out of the universities of Canada to go into the diplomatic service, but not a single person has yet been chosen from an agricultural college in the Dominion of Canada for the diplomatic service, although one-third of our population are farm people. I do not want to plead sectionalism with respect to occupation, but when you completely eradicate the farmer it is time somebody spoke up on his behalf.

Mr. CLAXTON: We are getting away from the subject, but when the hon. member says that not a single person in the diplomatic service has been chosen from an agricultural college I think he overlooks the case of Doctor Riddell, who was himself a professor of agriculture and served Canada notably abroad.

Mr. GRAYDON: Since the war, the External Affairs Department has expanded greatly and new qualifications for entry into the diplomatic service have been set up. One of the main ones, to which I take exception, is a university education. Since this rule went into effect not a single person has been taken into the diplomatic service from an agricultural college. I would be the first to agree with the minister as to Doctor Riddell's high qualifications but he was chosen long before this rule came into effect with the great expansion of the external affairs department.

Mr. CLAXTON: I am informed that more than one-third of those engaged in the production of material for the Canadian information service were brought up on farms and that a considerable number have worked on farms or on farm weeklies. But when it comes to matters requiring technical up-to-date knowledge the service goes to the department concerned to get expert assistance from that department.

Mr. KNOWLES: First of all, as one who has already expressed support for the proposal before us, I want to say that I was disappointed to hear the minister state that in the reorientation that has taken place in W.I.B. becoming C.I.S., there is less being done now domestically than was formerly the case; that C.I.S. is mainly for the dissemination of information abroad. I want to say something about providing sufficient information abroad in a moment. But first I do want to put in a plea for the greater use of the Canadian information service in Canada. If nothing else, it seems to me that at least it ought to be noised abroad throughout this country that here is a place to which the people may write from any part of Canada to get information on any kind of subject in which they are interested. I suppose that the really effective Canadian information service at the present time consists of the members of this house. We are the ones who get requests from all over the country for information which we try to dig up. I think there is a job for the Canadian information service domestically to a greater extent than the minister has indicated.

However, I want to turn now and make a plea to the minister on the basis of the Canadian information service being at the moment primarily for the dissemination of information abroad. I dislike making frequent references to my own short experience overseas a few months ago; but on the basis of that, there is this I want to say on behalf of Canadians who are working in embassies in other countries, namely that they would like to have a great deal more information than they now receive. This was said to me by third secretaries and stenographers—I will put it down at that level if you like.

Mr. GRAYDON: You mean, up at that level.

Mr. KNOWLES: You are right—up at that level.

Mr. REID: And they need more in Great Britain, when a member of parliament brought a fur coat here in July, when we had a temperature of 100 degrees.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am sure he was not a member from Scotland.

Mr. REID: You are right.

Mr. KNOWLES: The way it was put to me several times was that Canadians abroad working in our embassies are called upon—it is part of their job—to collect all the information they can about the countries they are working in, to send that information home to Canada. They would like to be treated in the same way. So far as they are concerned, they feel that, even though the departments here think they are sending them plenty of material, they are somewhat stranded. The hon. member for Peel will remember that the employees in the embassy at Paris expressed that view to us, and they did so in other places we visited. I had the experience of being in Moscow during rather a dramatic week, namely when the Prime Minister made a certain announcement in this country last February. I experienced with our diplomatic people there the sense of being stranded, and they said to me almost every day, "We are being asked to send home all kinds of information, but we do not know what is going on at home at all"; and as a matter of fact I was clear back in Canada myself before I knew anything about Canadian reactions to that particular incident.

I quote my own experience, brief as it was, merely in confirmation of the kind of plea that some of these people made to me, that they be given more information. I recognize that the Department of External Affairs has interests which keep it from doing as much of that job as it should, but here is a field for the Canadian information service. I hope they will realize that it is not just a case of giving news to these people over there; it is a case of increasing the effectiveness of our Canadian representatives all around the world, if they are given more information about what is going on back in Canada. I suggest to the minister that he be not afraid to give to these people through the Canadian information service at least a summary of opinions in Canada, a summary of editorials in newspapers of various political stripes. Just to confine it to factual material of the kind that has been read from a few samples to-night is not good enough. I come back to what I said before; I do not think we should be afraid of the word "politics". Political parties are a definite factor in our country, and these people have the right to a complete picture of what is going on.

Mr. JACKMAN: I can only approach this subject from the way in which I think, the average voter in Rosedale riding would look at it. When one sees an appropriation of $640,700 for the Canadian information service the question immediately arises, do we need this service, and what does it do that would not otherwise be provided? When we remember that many a taxpayer is endeavouring to live out of his or her earnings—if single, on $750 a year before reaching the taxation bracket, or if married, $1,500 a year, and I defy anyone to live decently in the city of Toronto on either of these sums, whether he be single or married, for it would be quite impossible—I believe that we should curtail a lot of our expenditures, no matter how necessary they are, until we can grant exemptions from taxation so that the government does not become an agency for lowering the standard of living of our people below what must be considered a minimum of decency. Then we find that the tourist business is going to spend $650,000 in order to encourage tourists. That may be a justifiable expenditure because it brings in dollars and cents to Canada. But we find that this Canadian information service that is proposed to be set up is not concerning itself with trade and publicity, because there is an item in that department for trade, publicity and advertising in Canada and abroad of $459,000, or an increase of $306,860. And here may I just say, that the Department of Trade and Commerce publishes an interesting little booklet, called "Canada, 1946", or whatever the year may be, which is an abstract of the Canada Year Book. This is a valuable book which not only gives information to Canadians, particularly to students, but is also of extreme value to people from other countries who wish to get a bird's-eye view of what the industry and commerce of Canada is about. This book used to be made available to members at a cost of ten cents a copy. We had a man who looked after some economies, apparently, in this government. During the war years he took off the special rate to members, and if you want to buy a copy now to give away it costs you twenty-five cents. I believe that the government would be well advised to review some of the policies, even the policy of economy which in this case, I think, is false economy, and make this excellent and valuable book available to all hon. members, so that they may give it as wide a distribution as possible. I think I carry the judgment of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in this regard, but apparently no change has yet been made in the price.

What will my constituents think when they find that the rehabilitation information branch is to have $242,000 appropriated for it, and the national film board, $1,030,683, and that is charged under "demobilization and reconversion", just why I do not know, the same way as Canadian information service is charged. Why it does not come under the ordinary peace-time estimates is another question on which the minister might give us some information. Then the national film board, in addition to the million dollars it gets under demobilization and reconversion, gets $860,000 under the ordinary revenues. These are both items which many of my constituents feel to be of doubtful value.

In regard to the whole matter of an information service run by the government, it is my belief, founded on some observations and information which I have received, that the press generally in this country and abroad would much prefer to get their information at first hand, and not have the interposition of some special government department which "shades" the information and goes over it, censors it and dresses it up in the form which the department thinks is most appropriate, whereas trained newsmen are best fitted to give to the pubic that which the public wants to read about.

We have in this country, I believe, no ideology which we are trying to propagandize at the present time. The minister in fact resented the suggestion that, as being the responsible head of this ministry of information, he was in effect a minister of propaganda. That is another reason why I believe that what news there is about Canada should be left to the ordinary channels of publicity and not be given the imprimatur of the government or given any direction from governmental sources. Just where there is any actual dollars and cents advantage to be derived from an appropriation of $640,000 for the Canadian information service I do not know. It may be that it is an interesting and useful service to the department of External Affairs when our representatives are abroad, but it does not seem to me that having hourly or daily information about what is happening in the domestic field in Canada is exactly the reason why we send representatives abroad. They should have a knowledge of the broad problems of Canada, should know what the political trends are, if you like, and what the external policy of the country is; but who is in command of military district No. 3, et cetera, is not the type of thing which the taxpayers, in the constituency of Rosedale at any rate, are interested in funishing to our external representatives.

There is a limit to the taxpayer's burden, and he is already feeling that that limit is too high in view of the fact that we are no longer under the dire necessity of fighting a war for the preservation of our liberties. We think we are back in peace time, and we want to see some incentive restored to the people so that they can work, and work overtime if they desire, and in doing so obtain some benfit for themselves.

Canada's name has always stood high in the world and in the neighbouring republic to the south of us. It stood equally high if not higher in the days before we ever had an information service, and I fail to see how this particular department can be of use to Canada. If we are a first-rate nation and behave ourselves as we should toward our neighbours; if we are a good people, as we are, then our light will not be hidden under a bushel; it will come to the surface and the world will recognize us for what we are. We do not need, therefore, any artificial information of this sort sent abroad for the purpose of publicizing our country.

There is news value in many of the government departments and the press are always eager to have releases, and do not wish to have the interposition of some agency which will tamper with and possibly dampen the effectiveness of that news. Information which the government puts out under such a department as this almost inevitably tends to become propaganda. The department may start out with the very best faith in the world and conduct itself along the most scrupulous lines. But there is the inevitable human tendency to slant news a particular way in which one wants it to go, and it is my firm belief, and I believe the conviction of the majority of Canadians, that if items that are of news value in the country are given to our newspaper men—there are plenty of them; our press gallery is full of able men looking for news—that is the best way to publicize the merits of the country. I suggest, therefore, that an expenditure of this kind can be done away with, particularly when the tax burden upon the people is so high.

Mr. GREEN: I wish to direct to the minister two questions, one, having to do with service given abroad, and the second with the domestic service. With regard to the service abroad, am I fair in saying that this plan was hit upon early in the war to promote Canada's war effort, that we wanted to secure the greatest sympathy possible from the United States, and wished also to give the fullest information to Great Britain concerning our war effort and to inform other members of the commonwealth of that effort? Later on, it developed into the work of promoting the cause of the allies in the nations that were not at war. That was the genesis of the work abroad and, as hon. members know, the body charged with this work was called the wartime information board. It clearly was intended for wartime purposes. Now, having come to the end of the war, the government is trying to change direction, to find some new work for this information service to carry on, and as a result we have the plans that have been outlined by the minister to-day. With regard to the service abroad, it was designed primarily, in fact entirely, for the war, and now there is an attempt to build up something new for peace. I would ask the minister to say whether I am fair in summing up the situation in that way.

With regard to the domestic service, the minister has pointed out that the work is to coordinate the publicity of different branches of government. That means, it seems to me, that this information service must be the top-dog, that it must be in charge of publicity services given by the different departments. I should like to know whether that is so. Otherwise I do not see that the service can accomplish a great deal. It would be interesting also to know how many persons there are on the staff of the service at the present time, how many of them are abroad, how many in Canada, and what the plans are for the next year with regard to staff.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member for Vancouver South suggests that this activity was created in time of war. That is obvious; and, as he said, it was primarily designed to improve the knowledge of Canada abroad and to create an understanding among the allies and to cooperate to the best possible advantage. I think it did that very well and worked together with other information services to that end. But, the hon. member says, with the close of the war now, there is an effort to find some new work for this agency which was created in war time. May I say with respect that that is not so at all. It would have been very easy indeed to disband this activity, had it not been found that continuously during the period of conversion from war to peace, as the war ended and we entered the period of peace, the same need continued to exist, though in different forms and with the same object, namely, to spread abroad knowledge and information about Canada as the basis of international understanding and, we hope, trade and security. But, further, we found that we were getting from countries like Brazil orders which were traceable not only to the fact that we had the goods but also to the fact that there was an understanding of Canada built up in Brazil. That, as I say, was traceable, in part, to Brazil's information about Canada. There was that understanding and confidence built up in that way. It is impossible to say how much of any order is attributable to any particular source and what the cause of it is.

Mr. GREEN: Probably some of that information would come from the ordinary press of both countries.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, but you find little mention of Canada in the press of Brazil and vice versa.

The second question was on coordination and the hon .member asks whether the information service will be top-dog. That is not intended at all. The plan is to coordinate the activities of the government regarding matters in which a number of departments have an interest.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister give us some examples?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, on food information. Not long ago the government announced a policy regarding food which I think secured the general support of the people. In order to make that policy known and to secure the support of the Canadian people in restricting their own consumption of food, there was a publicity campaign which took different forms. That was done under the food information committee which was set up with the assistance of the Canadian information service.

Mr. GREEN: That really is giving publicity within Canada.

Mr. CLAXTON: Only in so far as coordination and assisting is concerned; but that committee, which was an interdepartmental committee, was responsible for the information in Canada. The Canadian information service acted as a coordinating agency, supplied technically equipped secretariat and assisted the committee in putting out material. It issued something itself, but rendered essential service to an interdepartmental body.

With regard to the final question as to the number on the staff, there are now on the staff 109, of whom twenty-five are overseas. It is not the intention to increase the staff in any substantial way. The peak of the staff of the wartime information board was 189, with some twenty people on loan from other departments. Therefore there has been about a fifty per cent reduction from the peak of the wartime information board.

Mr. GREEN: Are there any people on loan from any department at the present time?

Mr. CLAXTON: The figure of 109 includes them.

Mr. FRASER: With only that slight reduction in staff—

Mr. CLAXTON: Fifty per cent.

Mr. FRASER: Yes. According to a return I have here, during war time there were over fifty-two publications put out by the wartime information board. At the present time only nine are being published. There must be something wrong when so large a staff is required to put out so few publications.

Mr. CLAXTON: The answer is that in order to do the ordinary service of the information board it is necessary to have a certain basic staff. As soon as you add to that staff you can turn out much more in the way of printed and mimeographed material without any corresponding increase in overhead. But in order to furnish the basic services of information, answers to questions, reference materials and other releases, it is necessary to have a certain minimum staff.

Mr. FRASER: I inferred from what the minister said that the wartime information board and the Canadian information service have helped to create trade between Canada and Brazil. I do not agree with that at all. Canadians have been in Brazil for years. It is the Canadians who are there and the Department of Trade and Commerce that have created that trade and not the Canadian information service.

Mr. McKAY: Am I correct in saying that the minister said there were 107 members on the staff at the present time?

Mr. CLAXTON: No, 109.

Mr. McKAY: Of those 109, 105 are veterans, I believe?

Mr. CLAXTON: No, I did not say so.

Mr. FULTON: Twenty-five are overseas?

Mr. McKAY: Twenty-five are overseas.

Mr. FRASER: Are overseas now.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. McKAY: How many of the present staff are veterans of either world war I or world war II? I misunderstood the ministers' statement.

Mr. CLAXTON: The break-down I have is as of March 31, 1946. There was a total of 106 on the staff at that time. Of that number thirty-one are males and seventy-five females. With overseas service there is a total of twelve, and with service in Canada, five.

Mr. BRACKEN: Before this resolution passes may I ask two or three questions? Is it a fact that in all of the services of the government there are publicity branches?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: Is there a considerable publicity branch in connection with External Affairs?

Mr. CLAXTON: No, none at all, not a single man.

Mr. BRACKEN: In connection with Trade and Commerce?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We have one in our department.

Mr. BRACKEN: I have listened to this discussion to-night and I say frankly that the minister has not made out a strong case for the resolution before the committee. I should like to say to him that when the bill comes up for second reading, if he does not make out a better case than he has made to-night, this party will have to oppose the measure.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Claxton thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 305, respecting the Canadian information service.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

DEMOBILIZATION AND RECONVERSION

Privy Council Office—

591. Canadian information service, $640,700.

Mr. KNOWLES: There was just one question with respect to the resolution which has been passed which the minister did not answer, and this is the same item. Will the bill make the Minister of National Health and Welfare responsible for the Canadian information service?

Mr. CLAXTON: The bill provides that the Canadian information service shall have a supervisory committee which shall be composed of the following persons: "one member, who shall be the chairman to be appointed by the president of the privy council", and so on. That heads up the supervisory committee. Then the position of the minister is defined in paragraph (d) of section 2, which reads as follows:

"Minister" means the president of the privy council or such other minister as may be designated by the governor in council to be responsible for the administration of this act.

That essentially follows the pattern which has been in existence before, whereby the president of the privy council was the minister responsible. On my ceasing to be parliamentary assistant to the president of the privy council, because I had become familiar with the workings of the service I was named the minister responsible to parliament for the service.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is anticipated that will be the case.

Mr. CLAXTON: That will remain with the president of the privy council.

Mr. GREEN: What other boards or governmental organizations are under the president of the privy council, as this board is to be?

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not know of any. The items in the estimates for the president of the privy council are items Nos. 589, 590, 591, 592 and 593. I do not know of any other boards or services just in the same position.

Mr. GREEN: Then, this is really a new departure. For the first time we have a board of this type being put under the president of the privy council, rather than directly under the minister.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is not the first time.

Mr. FULTON: I rise to a point of order. I understood this afternoon that the estimates of the minister's department were to be called, but not this item for the Canadian information service. It was stated this afternoon during the course of the debate that if it was a matter of consent, we would not consent. From the order of business given yesterday evening we were entitled to assume that it was the minister's department which would be called in supply to-night.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The statement was made that the estimates of the Minister of National Health and Welfare would be called. Therefore this is properly called.

Mr. FULTON: This is under the privy council office; it is not under the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. HOMUTH: And if it were not for the opposition in the house, you would not have a quorum; do you realize that?

Mr. CLAXTON: I cannot see that there is any other way in which the leader of the house could have described me, except as Minister of National Health and Welfare. The estimates of the department have all been dealt with.

Mr. FULTON: The understanding was that it was the item dealing with the national film board, under the minister's department, which was to be called to-night. This item does not deal with the national film board.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No.

Mr. FULTON: I submit, further, that the privy council office comes properly under the jurisdiction of the Prime Minister, or the Acting Prime Minister, and not under that of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There was no understanding to that effect.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the item carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. FULTON: One moment; I should like to have your ruling on the point of order.

Mr. CLAXTON: On that point of order, let me point out that there certainly was not as regards myself, or, I believe, the leader of the house, any such understanding.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No.

Mr. CLAXTON: What he said was that the estimates remaining in the name of the Minister of National Health and Welfare were to be dealt with.

Mr. FULTON: But this item is not in the name of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Further, we want the bill before we deal with the estimate.

Mr. CLAXTON: As soon as that was said, it was indicated almost at once that we proposed—and there was no objection to it—that as soon as first reading was given we would go on and deal with this matter, in supply.

An hon. MEMBER: Where is the bill?

Mr. FULTON: With all due respect to the minister, I cannot accept his statement that there was no objection, because I was most careful to make objection this afternoon in the course of my remarks after the minister's statement, at which time I pointed out that we wished to have the normal procedure followed of having the bill distributed after the resolution was dealt with. We said we objected to the suggestion that the item be dealt with before the bill was distributed.

Then, with deference—and after all, we have to cooperate—we on this side took the understanding from the statement made last night that it was the item with regard to the film board which would be dealt with under the name of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. MACKENZIE: If we want to be meticulous about it, there is no such thing as a point of order in connection with supply. There is no such thing as insisting upon what item will be taken up. As a matter of courtesy, we endeavour to meet the wishes of hon. members. In the present instance the minister is expected to go overseas in a day or two. He is in control of this item, and I thought that as a matter of courtesy the house would permit him to deal with it at the present time.

Mr. FULTON: I appreciate what the minister has said respecting courtesy. I appreciate too, that it is a matter of courtesy when the government indicates what the business shall be. I simply pointed out that we took that understanding. I point out, further, that there is another item under the jurisdiction of the same minister which could be considered. If it would not be interfering too much with the government's plan of procedure we would appreciate it if that item could be called rather than this one.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I appreciate my hon. friend's point of view. But, after all, the government must remain in control of the order of business in the house. We shall now proceed with this item.

Mr. FULTON: Then, can we have the bill before the item is called.

The CHAIRMAN: I understand that the bill is not back from the printing bureau. As the minister has said, there is no point of order before the committee.

Mr. FULTON: There is a point of good faith.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There is no breach of faith, and never has been.

The CHAIRMAN: The Chairman of the committee does not decide what the business shall be.

Mr. BOUCHER: Let us consider this matter coolly. We are now being asked by the government to proceed with an estimate, when the bill is not before us. That is quite irregular. We were also informed by the Minister of Veterans Affairs that we would proceed with the estimates of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, or the estimates under his name. Certainly this item is not in the name of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The government may have made a mistake. They may have had one thought in mind, and proceeded with another. The leader of the house says that the government must decide what business is to be proceeded with. But the government must see that the opposition is in a position to cooperate with it in proceeding with a measure when the bill has not been distributed. So, let those who ask favours give favours as well. Let us play the game squarely.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: We do not want to have any wrangling over this. Neither do we want any reproaches which are unfounded to go unanswered. There is no necessity for having the bill distributed before considering the item, because there is in existence, under an order in council which is valid and operative, and which is designed to be replaced by this bill in the interests of permanency, this Canadian information service. The order in council placed the information service under the president of the privy council.

The hon. member for Vancouver South asked if that was the only agency under the president of the privy council. There is one other; the federal district commission is under the president of the privy council. There will be a proposal under a resolution now on the order paper to transfer it from the president of the privy council to the Prime Minister.

But if hon. members are not prepared to proceed with the item which has been called at this time the government is not going to insist upon asking them to do something they are not ready to do. There was no intention to mislead or to get anything through which the house does not desire to consider. If the committee prefers to consider item 244, there will be no objection.

Mr. HOMUTH: If the minister had risen at the beginning and given the same explanation, there would not have been this so-called wrangling.

Mr. MUTCH: We would have heard the same bunch of tripe, just the same.

Mr. HOMUTH: You can always expect some dirty remark from my little friend from Winnipeg.

Mr. MUTCH: You are the last man in the house who should use that word.

Mr. HOMUTH: Sit down; you can get up after. And don't think you are getting anything on me.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I would ask the hon. member for Waterloo South to resume his seat. And I must remind hon. members that their remarks should be addressed to the Chair.

Mr. HOMUTH: If I were doing that, Mr. Chairman, I would not make the remarks about the Chair that I did about the hon. gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN: Do I understand that vote 591 stands?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. FERGUSON: The Minister of Justice has just said that he did not want to have the opposition pass anything that they did not understand. I do not believe the people of Canada want the opposition to pass something which they do not understand or which has not been properly placed before them. That is why this opposition will not vote in that manner. It is not because we do not understand this, it is because we will not vote something that is not properly placed before us.

Mr. BRACKEN: I want to commend the Acting Prime Minister for the attitude he has taken on this matter. It is quite clear that those of us on this side did not expect this item to-day and we were not ready to deal with it. You have the power to go on with it if you want to, but in view of the fact that the resolution dealing with the bill relating to this matter met with a great deal of opposition I think the Acting Prime Minister has adopted the right attitude by leaving it over until the other items in the Department of Health are dealt with.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

General—

244. National film board, including the motion picture bureau—general administration, $94,369.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I wish to make some general observations about the film board before we proceed with this vote. First of all, I should like to say a word on the subject of economy, taking my text from what the Minister of Finance said last night when he spoke about the necessity of equating revenue and expenditures at a time when we have high employment and high national income. The minister spoke to us about taking our responsibilities in this matter seriously. I did not like very much that part of his speech where he said that the suggestions from this side of the house for economy had been pathetic, that there was merely a tiny suggestion here and a tiny suggestion there. With all due respect to the minister, I would point out that I made suggestions of economy which totalled $60,000,000. If the minister thinks that is tiny and pathetic I want to tell him that in the constituency of Muskoka-Ontario $60,000,000 is a lot of money.

I wanted to make one or two general observations about the film board. At the outset I want to be specific in saying that I believe the film board has done useful work and can continue to do useful work, but I want to say also that I think there is a danger that new and interesting inventions may sometimes get the bit in their teeth and run away with themselves and with us and our money in a way that we should be careful about.

I have in my hand a finely got up pamphlet called "Image". This was published by the film board and is an attractive piece of advertising for the work of the board. It is done on quite nice paper which I think most of us would find it difficult to get. It begins with a most interesting letter from a gentleman well known to us, Mr. John Grierson. I regret to say that in this letter he makes some reference to the Scotch race which I greatly deprecate and which I am sure the Minister of Veterans Affairs will deprecate. Mr. Grierson must be a renegade Scot, because he takes a loose view with regard to money. Mr. Grierson quotes a remark made by Mr. Winston Churchill at the end of the first war as follows:

One remembers Mr. Churchill's comment about armistice day 1918: "A new set of conditions began to rule from eleven o'clock onwards. The money cost, which had never been a factor capable of limiting the supply to the armies, asserted a claim to priority the moment the fighting stopped."

That was a quotation from Mr. Churchill, and Mr. Grierson added, "the results we all know". Then Mr. Grierson comes to that part to which I object, and he refers to the Scotch in the following words:

We may expect the worthies, particularly my fellow worthies of Scottish lineage, to recall their stern and frugal upbringing and dedicate themselves, with moral unction, to starving to death.

He apparently regards anything that is not spending wildly without limit as starving to death. He goes on to refer to the atomic age when apparently everything will be wonderful. In this interesting pamphlet certain references are made to the expansion of the board and I should like to refer briefly to these. I am not objecting to the expansion of the board, I am only saying that at a time when we are so heavily taxed, when we are faced with such deficits, we should count our pennies.

I want to say a little about the organization of the board, and in this connection I should like to quote from a page entitled, "Report from Washington". We have here an organization which I think is in danger of taking the bit in its teeth and running away with itself and with us. I feel we should take stock of it and make sure it is doing what we want it to do, in the way we want it to do it and in the way that other departments are doing. I quote:

The national film board of Canada has been an active agent in the Washington film scene now for well over two years.

It then goes on to refer to the setting up of the Washington office, and reference is made in the following words to one of the transactions which have taken place:

During the past year more than 400 American films produced by or for the United States have gone to Canada for deposit in the film board's preview film library.

I skip again and read from the bottom of the paragraph:

By reason of their larger share in the war information budgets the O.W.I., treasury, army and navy have taken the lead in the mass distribution of Canadian films, primarily orientation and morale subjects such as "Fortress Japan," "New Soldiers are Tough," and "The Peace Builders."

I do not know why these war-time films should go on now, but apparently they still like them in the United States.

I should like to read briefly from the public accounts for the year ended March 31, 1945, and I do this in order to bring to the attention of the committee a report of the auditor general in which, speaking of the national film board, he says:

The board does not invariably follow practices which regulate departments of government. In the course of audit it was observed that purchases of articles, costing $627.95, had been made from public employees without first obtaining the customary concurrence of treasury board.

After citing one or two other things, the report states:

Order in council P.C. 107/5547 of July 19, 1944, authorizes the board to pay a newsreel film editor a monthly living allowance of $40 while on an assignment in New York. Effect has not been given to this plan. Instead, in the period from August 1 to March 31 he was paid living expenses on the basis of a detailed accounting. Hotel and meal charges were $1,981.45. When converted into Canadian dollars, these payments average $275 monthly.

I am not suggesting that $40 a month is sufficient for a gentleman who has to live in New York, and I do not know why that amount was put in the order in council, but I am suggesting that it would have been desirable if it was to be changed that the change be made by the authorities who authorized the original amount. It should not have been left to the film board itself to multiply by about six what apparently the order in Council thought was sufficient for the purpose.

In making these preliminary observations and before coming to the details of the accounts, I just wish to emphasize what I said at the outset, that we should regard this new invention, this interesting tool, as something we ought to make use of, but I feel that there is a danger with these new inventions that they take charge of us and acquire a privileged position and are not subject to the same limitations as the less romantic and exciting and artistic government departments. I think we are entitled to look at the figures in the light of that, and also to ask the minister to give us a considerable amount of information as to the relationship of the board to the trade. Therefore I am proposing to ask a considerable number of questions.

I think the committee has already been told members of the board and the details of their appointment, the name of the film commissioner and the date of his appointment. I would ask now, what is the relation between the board and the various departments of the government? On what basis are films produced for or on behalf of the various departments of government? On what basis are they paid for?

Mr. CLAXTON: I did intend to make a brief statement at the beginning and also answer some of the questions which were put by the hon. member for Lethbridge, of which he was kind enough to give me notice when the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare were before the committee.

With regard to the quotation made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario from the piece by Mr. John Grierson in "Image", Mr. John Grierson, as he knows, as well as other hon. members, is about as Scotch a Scotsman as you can find anywhere on the face of the earth.

Mr. REID: It is a good job he escaped from here. He escaped just in time.

Mr. CLAXTON: He did not escape. His remark was not in any way unfavourable to the Scots, if taken in the light way he intended it.

With regard to the item in public accounts, I should tell the hon. member that the item was dealt with in a way which was authorized by the treasury board itself, and it was cleared up during the accounting period in question now to the board's satisfaction. The discrepancy between the living allowance authorized and the actual allowance required was taken care of by a submission to treasury board, which thereupon approved the living allowance which was actually needed, and which was established. The comment put in by the comptroller of the treasury was fully carried out and approved by the treasury board as soon as the matter was drawn to the attention of the commissioner.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That is the difficulty with these accounts; they are so far behind.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, There is no other way in which the public accounts can be dealt with. They have to be dealt with in arrears because of the size of the operations of government.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario asked what relation was there between the board and the departments of government which ordered films. The board produces films for other government departments, and in the course of its work it produces a very large quantity of films for other government departments. It is done in this way. If, for example, the army wants to have a film of, let us say, "Exercise Muskox", the responsible officers in the army get in touch with the officers of the film board and say: We want to get a film of "Exercise Muskox" for use in instruction. Or they may say: We want a film made for some other purpose. The film board then arranges to send with the expedition a film crew, the composition of which is worked out with the army, and the required quantity of moving and still pictures are taken, and then are subsequently edited into the kind of films that the army wants. I mention "Exercise Muskox" as a typical example. As a consequence of that, the army will very shortly have a film which will run for about an hour and be suitable for their purposes. In addition, as a by-product the national film board itself will produce a film this month in the "Canada Carries On" series, which will be shown through the commercial theatres of Canada on all commercial circuits and which will give a good picture of the kind of country and the kind of operation in which "Exercise Muskox" was engaged.

Mr. MERRITT: When that film is shown on the commercial circuits will the commercial circuits be paying commercial prices for it, and will the government of Canada make a profit or loss on the showing of that film?

Mr. CLAXTON: It will be shown at ordinary commercial rates, but the market for short subjects in Canada is such that ordinarily you cannot get a price for shorts produced in Canada which would enable the film to be produced at a profit.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): There was another side to my question. Are the films paid for by the departments which order them, and, if so, on what basis?

Mr. CLAXTON: They are paid for by the departments which order them on the basis of the cost of production. The film board itself has a cost accounting system which enables the cost of each film to be allocated to that film; and then a certain percentage is added for overhead. The total amount is charged to the department, which then makes the payment, covering the actual cost of that film.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If the film board are paid the full cost of all the work they do for the other departments, I take it that the direct vote for the film board must be for work they do for someone else?

Mr. CLAXTON: The film board actually produced in the period under review, namely 1945-46, a total of 310 films. It has a very large number of subjects. Of that number a total, which I estimate might amount to 120, were produced for other departments.

Perhaps I had better give a general picture of the board's operations. Because of the way in which they have developed during the war, it has been perhaps difficult for hon. members to appreciate their extent. I remember the hon. member for Davenport speaking of them with great knowledge and appreciation some time ago. Since then, there have been a number of developments to which I shall refer.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am going to suggest one or two in a moment.

Mr. MacINNIS: Even if the films produced by the board are paid for by the other departments or by commercial organizations, that would not affect the item in the estimates for the board?

Mr. CLAXTON: No.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is the point I wanted to know.

Mr. CLAXTON: The estimates for the film board for this year are found in three items in these estimates, votes 244, 245 and 246, in a total of $1,106,465, and three items, votes 581, 582 and 583 in the demobilization and reconversion estimates for a total of $1,030,683. The corresponding figures for the ordinary estimates for the previous year, 1945-46, will be found in vote 230, for $810,965, and the war appropriation is to be found at page 556 of Hansard, September 28, 1945, of $1,780,000, as well as vote 537 in the supplementary estimates for $335,000, making a total of $2,925,965. This amount includes a revolving fund of $500,000. Apart from the revolving fund, the amount sought for this year represents a reduction of $288,817, or twelve per cent, from the amount sought last year. The amount also that the board anticipates to obtain from other government departments will be substantially reduced, because a large sum was provided for war activities of the armed forces, the national war finance committee and other government activities which related particularly to the war.

The national film board filed its annual report covering the period ended March 31, 1945, in October, 1945. The annual report for the year ended 31st March, 1946, will be filed as soon as possible.

During the year, film board officials, in consultation with the auditor general and the comptroller of the treasury, have made a number of improvements in the system of accounting which have been designed to reconcile the situation brought about through the film board being in some respects analagous to a commercial undertaking and at the same time an agency of the government. To carry out still further the recommendations of the auditor general, the form in which the estimates are presented has been changed to provide funds for general and technical administration. These funds were formerly secured by assessing an overhead charge against each production.

During the year under review, that is 1945-46, the film board has carried on its activities in many fields. Altogether a total of 310 film subjects have been produced. I could, if hon. members wanted, put before the committee or place on Hansard a list of all the 310 titles produced during the year, with particulars of the government service for which they were produced, of their general nature, and such other information.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the minister permit a question? Has he any information about the number of films produced that have to do with developing industry through showing operations of industrial plants?

Mr. CLAXTON: There are quite a number devoted to that purpose, and I will give the hon. member full information about them as I come to it in my notes.

Mr. HAZEN: I think it would be valuable to have the names of these films put on record.

Mr. CLAXTON: I shall be glad to do that. I warn hon. members that it will be lengthy; it will take up several pages of Hansard, but if there is unanimous consent, and at the request of the committee, I shall be glad to do it. As I say, it will occupy several pages.

Mr. HAZEN: I should like to be informed at the same time what each film cost to produce, and what revenue was paid for it, or what amount was paid by some other department for it?

Mr. CLAXTON: The cost is on the list, and in cases where it comes from another department the revenue will be equal to the total cost. In the case of revenue from commercial sources the revenue is not shown; that would have to be worked out and allocated to each film, which might take some time, but that is relatively a small item in the total picture.

The tabulation is as follows:

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

ESTIMATES 1946-47

National Film Board Productions Completed in Fiscal Year 1945-46

NOTE: 1) The costs on theatrical newsclips include charges for 111 release prints.
2) An asterisk * before the production number indicates that a French version has been made and included in the costs.

During this year, as hon. members will see from the list of films which I have just filed, there were thirty-eight original films produced in French, and many of these films were distributed also in English language versions. The list will show which films were in French and which were in English. But, in addition, there were a considerable number of English-speaking films which were produced in French as well. Thirty-eight films were produced in Portuguese, Spanish, German and Dutch of such titles as "People of Canada," "Northwest by Air," "Trappers of the Sea," "Wings over Canada," "Fighting Sea Fleas," "Art for Children," "Toronto Symphony," "UNRRA," "Montreal," "Great Lakes," "Music in the Wind." In addition, the board prouced during the year sixty newsreel stories which were made available to the commercial newsreels for showing in Canada, the United States, South America, the United Kingdom, Australia and many other countries, in as many as twenty different languages. Thirty-four stories about the armed forces overseas were edited for international newsreel releases. The film board produced forty news clips to be attached to commercial newsreel releases, and twenty-eight ten-minute newsreel films in several series, some for use by the armed forces in Canada and some for overseas use, as well as some for the industrial and rural circuits.

Of the work for other government departments it will be noted on the list I have filed that there were many subjects for the armed forces—exercises "Eskimo," "Lemming," "Polar Bear," as well as a film to be produced this year, "Musk Ox," "Spotting Fall of Shot," "Hygiene for Health," "Guests of Honour," "Foot Research," "Psychological First Aid," "Road to the Reich," "Headline Hunters." For rehabilitation information and veterans affairs: "Back to Work," "Veterans in Industry," "Veterans in Industry (preface and trailer)," "Road to Recovery," "Limbs to Order," "Road to Civvy Street," "New Limbs for Old," "Good-bye Mr. Gyp," "Land for Men," plus a number of trailers. In connection with war savings and finance, "Inflation Dangers," and some eight other films. Also, among subjects particularly related to agriculture, "Business of Farming," "Soil for Tomorrow," "Certified for Seed." Miscellaneous films: "Tire Research," "Victorian Order of Nurses," "Food in Europe," "Caisses Populaires," "Ships and Men." There were, as I said, thirty-four news clips on various subjects for other government departments, and eighteen complete newsreel issues of "Eyes Front" for the armed forces overseas.

Another function of the film board in addition to the production of films is to secure the distribution of Canadian films in Canada and abroad. In Canada this distribution is effected through commercial theatres, one hundred rural circuits and from ninety-six film libraries from which community film groups draw films for their meetings. The "Canada Carries On" series is shown regularly each month in 400 theatres across Canada.

In addition, the film board has produced a very large number of still pictures and of these, altogether, 38,680 were distributed by the board during the year and 18,502 were distributed abroad, mainly through the Canadian information service. Another work undertaken is to assist in the design and layout of government publications, especially the publications of the wartime information board, the rehabilitation committee, the various government departments, and other agencies of the government. It has carried on a number of photographic displays which have been used by many government departments of Canada abroad, in the United States, the United Kingdom, Australia, Mexico and Brazil.

The film board is usually represented on government inter-departmental committees having to do with information service, such as the rehabilitation committee and so on. It has taken an active part in seeing that in the field of visual representation Canada does not lag behind any country. Its films have been widely received, with increasing commendation, throughout Canada, and it is interesting to note how widely they have been appreciated in other countries. For instance, an officer of the film board was asked to go to Australia to establish an Australian film service; in New Zealand the film service is being set up along lines suggested by the film commissioner; from India, China and other countries representatives have come here to see how the work was carried on.

The board has acted at international conferences in Canada making displays of films illustrating Canada to the representatives of the foreign countries, and it has also acted for international agencies such as UNRRA, for which it has made a film, and other international organizations. In regard to distribution abroad, it has seen to the distribution of the series "World in Action" throughout a large number of commercial theatres in the United States, totalling as many as 5,000, in central and south America, where it has been shown in a total of hundreds of theatres, as well as in other countries.

The film board has offices abroad which act as distributing centres, and it has furnished to the Canadian information service, in co-operation with it, films on Canada for our diplomatic representatives abroad so that they can show people in countries to which they are accredited pictures about Canada.

A number of libraries have been established in Canada. The hon. member for Lethbridge asked a question about the total number of films which are in the library at Ottawa. There are 1,700, and in ninety-six film libraries across Canada there is a total of 9,000 prints of many different subjects. During the year, 3,975 prints of the 310 films I mentioned were distributed to these libraries, and the number of libraries increased during the year from forty-four to ninety-six. It is estimated that in Canada, through the use of these film libraries, something like 200,000 people may see films each month, in addition to the very much larger numbers who see the films shown on the commercial screen.

Let me say, in conclusion, a word about the need of films. In almost every country, as hon. members will appreciate, there are government film units of one type or another, and governments are spending increasing sums in the interest of public information and education at home and abroad. In addition to the reasons which justify such action on the part of other countries, I think there are one or two which apply with particular reference to Canada. In the first place, Canada is adjacent to the United States, which at Hollywood produces the great bulk of films for entertainment. The magnitude of operations there, involving an expenditure of as much as $4,000,0000 on a single picture, makes it difficult for a small country like Canada to produce films for entertainment. It is probably common knowledge that this has not been successfully done in this country, and it is calculated that each week some 4,000,000 Canadians go to moving-picture houses. Each week more than 4,000,000 Canadians see from one to four American film subjects.

I do not say this by way of criticism but merely to state a fact. In the circumstances, it seems to be of vital importance that we should do what we can to give Canadians at least a chance to see films sometimes about their own country. To assist in this, the film board has played an important part in developing among Canadians an increasing knowledge of Canada, a better understanding of the points of view of Canadians in different parts of the country, and faith in the future of Canada which we believe will strengthen our determination to make our great country still greater and stronger.

The hon. member for Lethbridge asked a number of questions which I should like now to answer. In the first place, he asked the number of films and I have given that information.

He asked about lecturers using films of the national film board. The board does not employ any lecturers, but in the course of exhibiting to rural and industrial circuits, the exhibitor sometimes gives a talk in accordance with prepared material, kits as they are called, introducing the film. It may be that other talks by others are given when the films are shown.

Hon. members of all parties have at one time or another seen films shown at meetings which they have addressed, and over these the board has no control. The hon. member wished to know how many films have to do with biological subjects and how many with geological or other scientific subjects. In its preview library, the board has sixteen dealing with biological and seventeen dealing with geological or other scientific subjects. The most recent biological film was one entitled "Vegetable Insects", dealing with the life cycle of garden pests which destroy vegetable crops, and recommending methods for their eradication.

The hon. member asked how many of the films have to do with the subject of evolution and the answer is none. He wishes to know whether any of the national film board films are based upon the Bible and, if so, how many. The answer is that the film board does not produce films having to do with religious subjects.

I hope I have answered the hon. gentleman's questions. If there any that I have not covered sufficiently I shall be glad to answer any questions with reference to them. I have notes on all the subjects of films dealing with biological and similar matters, giving a description of their contents, and these I shall be glad to show the hon. member at any time.

Mr. MacNICOL: When I asked the minister a few moments ago a question about films illustrating the achievements of industry I had in mind that perhaps the estimates did not show what industrial results might come from the showing of films. I am sure that some industrial results have been achieved through the showing of films that I have seen. In that respect, I have been wondering whether the department has a line of films with regard to the large water powers of Canada: for instance, Grand falls and its watershed in New Brunswick; Shawinigan Falls plant in Quebec; the Shipshaw Power Plant, Beauharnois and Gatineau in Quebec; High falls in Ontario, west of Ottawa; Chats falls on the Ottawa river—when I say "falls" I mean power plants—the power plants on the Otonabee and Trent rivers in Ontario; the power plant operated by the city of Orillia;

the Niagara falls power plants; the Iroquois falls power plants in northern Ontario; the Spanish river power plants; Sault Ste. Marie power plants on the St. Mary river; the Nipigon river power plants in Ontario and the Winnipeg river power plants in Manitoba, and perhaps the Bow river plants in Alberta. Unfortunately there are none that I know of of any consequence in Saskatchewan. I hope the day is not far distant when Saskatchewan too will have cheap hydro power for development which must take place on the Saskatchewan river. Then there are the Powell river and Columbia river plants in British Columbia. My thought is that pictures showing the development of industry, either large or small, that have been achieved in Canada so far by these power plants which I have named would not only be intensely interesting but induce investors who wanted to come to Canada from other countries—and we hope many of them will come—to build plants in Canada. Perhaps someone in some of the United States, British or European cities, on seeing films covering something like that which I have described, would come to Canada to open up plants of some kind; I hope so.

I am not going to deal with any of the financial aspects to-night so far as the film board is concerned, because others are more capable of doing so than I am. I am interested in only one thing, namely, what the film board can do to induce the erection of industrial plants and through that provide more jobs for Canadians. I am convinced that if the film board can do one thing it ought to be able to do that. Recently we had a picture dealing with "Across Canada". It was not along the lines of what I have just mentioned, but I for one enjoyed it very much. It was shown in this building. I would hope that the board is equipped to send such films throughout the country. We have it, and we might as well make the best use of it we can with a view to developing industry and giving jobs. Others may have other ideas, but my life has been associated with organizing business to give jobs. Whatever the film board can do along that line I, for one, shall be pleased with it.

Mr. COLDWELL: Before the minister answers the hon. member may I be permitted to ask a question and thereby save time? What films are being developed for use in schools? It seems to me that films for visual education are of the utmost importance to the country at this time. I have had some experience in teaching, and I have found that it was much easier to teach some things through the eye than through the spoken word. I know that in some of the scientific subjects we get a film like "The Life History of a Frog". You can get the whole story of the development of the frog from the egg right through to the adult creature. It gives a good picture of a good many other things which might otherwise be slightly difficult to understand. What kind of library is being built up by the national film board for use in our schools, not only in science but in history, and in the teaching of even some phases of literature? The film is something that should be used more extensively than it has been.

Mr. CLAXTON: I shall be very glad to try to answer both hon. gentlemen. The hon. member for Davenport asked about what films we have showing the development of water powers in Canada. There is a very fine film called "Power from Shipshaw" which shows the development and use of that great undertaking on the Saguenay river.

Mr. MacNICOL: That was shown in the buildings; it is an excellent film.

Mr. CLAXTON: Another is "Power Valley," the St. Maurice valley which shows the development on the Shawinigan. Other power developments occur in other films, but in addition there are a great number of films which have a specific industrial purpose which were developed during the war in connection with the Department of Labour and which were shown on the industrial circuits. Then there are films such as "Ships and Men", dealing with the shipbuilding industry in Canada; "Western Oil", dealing with oil developments. There are others dealing with the great Canadian shield, mining. There is another one called "Northwest by Air", dealing with air transportation in the north. There is another one dealing with agriculture, "Certified Seed." These were produced during the current year. Among the 1,700 titles I mentioned there are dozens, if not hundreds, which relate specifically to the question asked by the hon. member for Davenport.

With regard to the films which are useful in connection with education, the film board has a considerable number of subjects of which I might mention those produced during this year which were prepared especially for school use. They are as follows: "Wealth of the Foothills"; "Early Start", "Life on the Western Marches", "Trappers of the Sea"; "Newfoundland, Sentinel of the Atlantic", and "Ballot Boxes". "Ballot Boxes" was a film which deals with education in citizenship. In that connection, a series is being worked out in consultation with the Canada-Newfoundland educational association, which has a committee which is advising on educational films. In that committee there are representatives of various provinces, as well as of the various educational organizations, so that work is being done to prepare films but only in accordance with and to meet needs expressed by those responsible primarily for education in Canada. The board acts as a producing agency, but does not force anything on anyone. It produces subjects which meet a need which has been expressed by others in the educational field.

Mr. COLDWELL: Before the item carries, are there any items now to be dealt with other than this in the minister's department? I was going to take this opportunity of asking the minister if he will tell the committee under what circumstances or why Doctor David Shugar has been dismissed from the public service in view of the fact that there is no charge against him now and counsel for the government was unable to substantiate any charge in a court? It seems to me that a man is innocent until he is proven guilty. I understand that he was engaged from February to November and has been dismissed to take effect at the beginning of August. In the meantime he has been given leave. I should like to know why this has been done by the minister's department.

Mr. CLAXTON: Though it does not fall under either the national film board or the Canadian information service, I shall be glad to answer the hon. member at once. It was in view of the report of the royal commission as tabled in this house last week. I think hon. members will notice that in respect of Doctor Shugar there is a considerable difference between the interim report and the report as tabled. It was in view of the report that the action was taken.

The Acting CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Shall the item carry?

Mr. FULTON: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: No.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Monday, July 22, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

(c) The salary of the managing director shall be $30,000 per annum. The fund shall also pay any reasonable expenses incurred by the managing director in the interest of the fund (including travel and transportation expenses for himself, and expenses for his family, and his personal effects in moving once to the seat of the fund during or immediately before his term of office and in moving once from the seat during or immediately after his term of office). The terms of contract of the managing director shall be five years.

(e) The maximum salary and expense allowance (including housing, entertainment and all other expenses except those specified in subsection (f)) shall be $17,000 for executive directors and $11,500 for alternates. It will be the duty of each executive director and each alternate to state how much of these amounts he intends to draw whether as salary or as expense allowance.

(f) The executive directors and their alternates are to be reimbursed, in addition, for all reasonable expenses incurred during absence from the seat of the fund while on the designated service of the fund. They shall also be reimbursed for travel and transportation expenses for themselves, their families, and their personal effects in moving once to the seat of the fund during or immediately before their terms of office and in moving once from the seat during or immediately after their terms of office.

(g) Where not specified, it is assumed that the director and alternate will be a full time director and alternate. Where it is intended that he shall not devote his full time, it shall be so indicated. Where an executive director or alternate indicates that he intends to devote only part of his time to the fund, his remuneration shall be pro-rated on the basis of a representation by him of the proportion of his time he has devoted to the interests of the fund. He may make such representation each month.

(h) Where an individual is serving both fund and bank, the aggregate of salary received from both shall not exceed the full annual single salary indicated above.

The Canadian director of the fund devotes only part of his time to the fund and, in accordance with the instructions given him by the governor for Canada, draws only sufficient of the maximum salary and expense allowance to which he is entitled to cover his expenses while away from Ottawa on the business of the fund.

(c) Eugene Meyer.

2. The remuneration to be paid to the directors and the salary to the president are provided for in the by-laws of the International bank for reconstruction and development as approved by the board of governors, as follows: Section 14—terms of service:

(c) The salary of the president shall be $30,000 per annum. The bank shall also pay any reasonable expenses incurred by the president in the interest of the bank (including travel and transportation expenses for himself, and expenses for his family, and his personal effects in moving once to the seat of the bank during or immediately before his term of office and in moving once from the seat during or immediately after his term of office). The terms of contract of the president shall be five years.

(e) The maximum salary and expense allowance, including housing, entertainment and all other expenses except those specified in subsection (f) shall be $17,000 for executive directors and $11,500 for alternates. It will be the duty of each executive director and each alternate to state how much of these amounts he intends to draw whether as salary or as expense allowance.

(f) The executive directors and their alternates are to be reimbursed, in addition, for all reasonable expenses incurred during absence from the seat of the bank while on the designated service of the bank. They shall also be reimbursed for travel and transportation expenses for themselves, their families, and their personal effects in moving once to the seat of the bank during or immediately before their terms of office and in moving once from the seat during or immediately after their terms of office.

(g) Where not specified, it is assumed that the direction and alternate will be a full-time director and alternate. Where it is intended that he shall not devote his full time, it shall be so indicated. Where an executive director or alternate indicates that he intends to devote only part of his time to the bank, his remuneration shall be pro-rated on the basis of a representation by him of the proportion of his time he has devoted to the interests of the bank. He may make such representation each month.

(h) Where an individual is serving both fund and bank, the aggregate of salary received from both shall not exceed the full annual single salary indicated above.

The Canadian director of the bank devotes only part of his time to the bank and, in accordance with the instructions given him by the governor for Canada, draws only sufficient of the maximum salary and expense allowance to which he is entitled to cover his expenses while away from Ottawa on the business of the bank.

SALES OF GOLD

Mr. ADAMSON:

1. To what other countries besides the United States of America did Canada or any agent of the government of Canada sell gold during the fiscal years 1943, 1944, 1945?

2. What price was obtained in each transaction?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. Any gold sold by the government of Canada or any agent of the government of Canada during the fiscal years 1943, 1944 and 1945 was sold to the government or central bank of a foreign country. As such transactions reflect the exchange policies and transactions of foreign countries or central banks, it is not considered desirable to give details regarding them.

2. All sales of gold made by the government of Canada or any agent of the government of Canada during the period mentioned have been based on the price of $35 United States per fine ounce in New York, with appropriate adjustments for transportation and handling charges.

INCOME TAX—MARRIED STATUS

Mr. GRAYDON:

How many income tax payers in Canada are denied the right to claim for married status while maintaining a self-contained domestic establishment?

Mr. McCANN: Information not available.

GREENWOOD, B.C., JAPANESE RELOCATION CENTRE—C. L. COWDRILL

Mr. STIRLING:

1. On what day of what year did Mr. C. L. Cowdrill become (a) assistant supervisor; (b) supervisor of the Greenwood, British Columbia, Japanese relocation centre?

2. What experience had he to receive such an appointment?

3. Have any complaints been received about him as assistant supervisor or supervisor?

4. (a) If so, how many were by (a) Japanese themselves; (b) native population; (c) what action was taken?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. (a) Assistant supervisor—September 1, 1942; (b) Supervisor—February 1, 1945.

2. Had previous experience in commercial life, more especially, in wholesale hardware, builders and plumbers' supplies.

Employed at Hastings Park assembly centre—April-August, 1942.

3 and 4. No complaints have come to the attention of the departmental officials responsible for Japanese administration.

RADIO BROADCASTING—STATIONS CKY and CKX

Mr. THATCHER:

1. Have the licences of radio stations CKY, Winnipeg, and CKX, Brandon, been cancelled or relinquished?

2. If so, at what date?

3. If not, what is the present status of these stations?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Negotiations have been initiated regarding conditions under which these stations might be transferred to the national system.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—INTERNATIONAL TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION AND SOUTHAM NEWSPAPERS

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Is the Minister of Labour taking any further steps to bring together the parties to the dispute between the International Typographical Union and the Southam and other newspapers?

2. Have any recommendations concerning this dispute been made to the government by the commission of which Brigadier Sherwood Lett, K.C., is chairman? If so, what are the recommendations?

Mr. MITCHELL: The Department of Labour has brought the parties together through commissioners and otherwise on several occasions and is still willing to lend the services of its conciliation officers if requested by the parties.

A short time ago on the request of the Honourable Mr. Pearson, minister of labour for British Columbia, I appointed Brigadier Sherwood Lett, K.C., as chairman of an industrial disputes inquiry commission to investigate the dispute between the Vancouver Province and its printers, members of the international typographical union. I am at present awaiting the report of this commission.

NATIONAL REGISTRATION CARDS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Are the registration cards issued during the war still in use? If so, for what purpose?

2. How many prosecutions under the law governing these took place in each of the provinces in 1946?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. The national registration cards (certificates) issued during the war are still in use.

The principal purposes for continuing the use of the certificates are: (a) So that the registration records from which much information is still being supplied may be kept as up to date as possible; (b) The certificates are still being used for identification purposes by the national employment service and other governmental agencies; (c) To assist the authorities in clearing up unfinished cases and investigations of desertions from the armed forces, defaults and delinquencies under the national resources mobilization regulations, the defence of Canada regulations and other wartime controls.

2. Very few prosecutions have been made or instituted since January 1, 1946. The exact total of such cases is not available as the provincial and municipal law enforcement authorities do not report all cases to the dominion authorities.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

BITUMINOUS COAL—IMPORTS

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. What is the tonnage of bituminous coal shipped to Canada from the United States for each of the years since 1939?

2. What is the tonnage of bituminous coal shipped to Canada from the United States for April, May and June for each such year including 1946?

3. What is the expected shipment of bituminous coal from the United States to Canada during July, 1946?

CIVIL SERVANTS EMPLOYED AS OF JULY 1, 1946

Mr. McKAY:

1. What is the number of (a) male; (b) female, civil servants employed by the federal government as of July 1, 1946?

2. How many of these (a) male; (b) female, are veterans of either world war I or II?

LOANS TO OTHER GOVERNMENTS—MARINE INSURANCE

Mr. WEBB:

When loans are made by the Canadian government to empire and foreign governments for the purchase of supplies in Canada, what steps are taken by the government to see that marine insurance is purchased in Canada?

VETERANS LAND ACT—PURCHASE OF FARMS IN CUMBERLAND COUNTY, N.S.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. How many farms have been purchased in Cumberland county, Nova Scotia, under the Veterans Land Act?

2. Where are these farms located, when and from whom were they purchased?

3. What is the acreage and what price was paid for each such farm, and what has been the total cost to the government of upkeep, improvements and equipment for such property?

4. What are the names of the veterans now established on these farms?

Mr. TUCKER: This can stand as an order for return, subject to the reservation that the price will not be given for each item of land purchased.

Mr. HOMUTH: Why cannot the price be given?

Mr. TUCKER: I have already given the reason to the house on several occasions. It is not considered to be in the best interests of the veterans that individual prices should be given in all these cases, because it would have an effect upon future purchases of land in the particular area.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order for return, subject to the reservation made by the parliamentary assistant.

VETERANS LAND ACT—PURCHASE OF LAND IN AMHERST AND SPRINGHILL, N.S.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Has the government purchased land in the towns of Amherst and Springhill under the Veterans Land Act or other government measure?

2. If so, from whom were purchases made and what is the area; the price, and the expenditures made for improvements since purchased?

3. Who recommended the purchases and were the Canadian Legion, the local boards of trade or town councils consulted?

4. Were the properties sub-divided, plans made for buildings and construction authorized? If so, at what cost and with whom was work contracted?

5. Has any portion of the properties been resold or offered for sale? If so, to whom and at what price?

Mr. TUCKER: Order for return, subject to the reservation made in relation to the preceding question.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

CORRESPONDENCE WITH FRED ROSE

Mr. IRVINE:

For a copy of all correspondence since June 1, 1946, exchanged between the Minister of Justice and Mr. Fred Rose, M.P.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MORNING SITTINGS

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Tuesday, July 23, 1946, until the end of the session, the house shall meet at 11 o'clock in the morning of each sitting day and that in addition to the usual intermission at 6 o'clock p.m., there shall be an intermission every day from 1 to 3 o'clock p.m.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in proposing this motion it is not the intention of the government to force its own views upon the house, but rather to afford to hon. members an opportunity for making known whether or not they feel that the time has arrived when we should have the house sitting three times a day. There still remains a lot of work to be done. Some of the measures yet to be dealt with seem to be non-contentious. Some of the legislation has already been very carefully considered in the sittings of standing or select committees and should not take up much more of the time of the house. There is, of course, other legislation which some hon. members will require to have further debated in the house. It is apparent that no matter how many hours a day the house sits it will still be a matter not of days but of weeks before we can get through the work that remains to be done, giving it that care which it is necessary in the public interest that it should receive.

The question raised by this motion is whether we should at once begin morning sittings and endeavour to give more time to the work of the house than has been given up to the present. I realize that that does not mean giving more time to the business of the session, because the committees have been sitting not only in the morning but even while the house is sitting, as we have noticed from the sparse attendance at times in the house. But a large number of hon. members have let it be known that they thought we should be apt to expedite the work of the house if we began now sitting three times a day. If it is the wish of hon. members that that be done, the adoption of this motion will provide for it. If on the other hand hon. members feel that we should still go on with two instead of three sittings a day, the government will be pleased to have those views expressed and will endeavour to have the decision made one that will appeal to the largest number of hon. members.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is not clear from the resolution whether it is the government's intention to have the house sit on Wednesday evening as well.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; there is a special rule which deals with Wednesday evening, and I have heard strong objections voiced to taking away the Wednesday evening—not that hon. members want to use it for social purposes, but they feel that they should have a break in the middle of the week to enable them to consider what they have done in the preceding days of the week and what remains to be done on the other days so as to be in better shape to deal with it.

Mr. BRACKEN: If the leader of the government feels that to have the house sit in the mornings as well as in the afternoons and evenings every day except Wednesday and Saturday will expedite the business of the house, this party will offer no objection.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in previous sessions this resolution has been introduced at a stage when the end of the session was pretty well in sight, but as I look over the order paper to-day and see the amount of business still to be done I realize that we are a long way from concluding the work of the session. The estimates have, I was going to say, scarcely been touched. That is not quite correct, but only two or three departments have been pretty fully considered; there remain fifteen or sixteen departments still to go into. I do not want to do anything that will delay a conclusion of the session's business, and I am not particularly opposing this motion, but I would point out that there are still a number of committees sitting and it is difficult for hon. members who are on committees to find time to attend the sittings of the house three times a day. But members of the house have been here now for a good many weeks; some who are married and have families would like to have at least one week of the summer free to enjoy it with their families, and therefore I shall not oppose the resolution.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, we are ready to support the resolution, but I think it ought to be understood that the legislative programme of the government has pretty well been brought in. I should not like to think that after we start to sit mornings in addition to two other sittings a day the government might bring in new legislation every day or two. The Acting Prime Minister should give us the assurance that the legislative programme of the government is now before us.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: On that point I have nothing to add, as nothing to my knowledge has developed since the statement made by the Prime Minister in the house when he enumerated the matters still to be considered by the house.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to prolong the discussion, but I feel that members have been sent here to do a job, and we are not in any more difficulties in working here than the rank and file of the people of Canada who voted for us are in pursuing their own particular vocations at home, wherever and whatever they may be. I believe there are other ways of expediting the business of the house besides rushing the members in three daily sittings. One would be for members to discipline themselves in the amount of time occupied in debate and discussion in the two sittings of the house; if we did that we would get more work done than by sitting three times a day. Many members of the house are on committees which are now sitting three times a day. I appreciate the way in which the Acting Prime Minister has put this matter to the house, and while I do not want to say that I am opposed to the motion, I wish to suggest that we should be careful to discipline ourselves when we come to deal with the business before the house.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE

REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON ADMINISTRATIVE CLASSIFICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister if he now knows what action is proposed by the government in respect of the report of the royal commission on the public service of Canada?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): The report of the royal commission on the public service was made available to the members of the government only a few hours before it was made available to the members of the house. Each one has been asked to consider it, but there has been no opportunity yet for an exchange of views upon it, and therefore I am not in a position to make announcement of any decision.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION ON RECOMMENDATIONS OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister in his capacity as Minister of Justice? I have not had an opportunity to give him notice of the question, and if he is not in a position to answer it now perhaps he will do so to-morrow. What further action is proposed by the government in respect of the recommendations and findings of the royal commission on espionage?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I do not think that I should be in any better position to answer the question to-morrow than I am now. The report went to the law officers of the crown. With the assistance of counsel they considered it and have already come to the conclusion that charges should be laid against five of the persons mentioned in the report. They are now considering the report and the evidence on which it is based in connection with the cases of one Doctor Shugar and one Miss Agatha Chapman, and they have not yet reported any conclusion to me upon their study.

WHEAT

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN BRITISH AND CANADIAN GOVERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he has any statement to make on the progress of negotiations for a wheat agreement with Great Britain? There was something over the air this morning concerning the matter.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I hope to have an announcement within the next forty-eight hours.

TRAVEL ABROAD

PASSPORTS TO EUROPE—CONDITIONS AFFECTING RETURN JOURNEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Mines and Resources. Some months ago there was a ruling that every woman applying for a passport to travel to Europe had to say that she would not return for a period of at least a year. The Prime Minister made a statement in the house and said that the ruling was off; but during the past week an applicant for a passport for travel across the Atlantic or Pacific, whether man or woman, has to fill in a form which states this:

> I fully realize the difficulty in obtaining Atlantic and Pacific transportation and that it is unlikely that I shall be able to return to Canada for many months.
> I recognize that the issuance of a passport to me does not obligate the government of Canada to undertake any responsibility with regard to my transportation either from or to Canada.

I wish to know from the minister why such a statement is required before one can get a passport. The information should be made public, because members are receiving letters on the subject.

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): The hon. gentleman is referring, I assume, to the period when exit permits were required. At that time there was no possible chance of anyone travelling from Canada to Europe being able to get back in the same year; therefore in view of the shipping situation an undertaking was given by those who did go that they did not expect to return for a certain time. I have no knowledge of a ruling of the passport office such as has been cited, but I assume the same idea is behind the requirement, that anyone going now cannot expect to get priority on return sailings. However, I will look into the matter.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO QUESTION DROPPED FROM ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I notice that the question asked on Thursday by the hon. member for Yorkton regarding "war assets—sales over $4,000 to firms, corporations or individuals", which was ordered to stand, did not appear on the order paper on Friday and is not on the order paper to-day. I respectfully draw that to your attention, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and hope that you will draw His Honour the Speaker's attention to the matter, so that we may receive an early explanation.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I can assure the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that Mr. Speaker has this matter under advisement. He is expected to return to Ottawa to-morrow, when I shall be pleased to bring the matter to his attention.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENT AS TO LOAN PROVISIONS—CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the National Housing Act, 1944, and more particularly:

(1) to provide for changes in the administration of the existing housing legislation, consequent rewording of definitions and references throughout the Act;

(2) to provide for His Majesty to join with approved lending institutions in the making of loans for the construction of homes for home owners who have a leasehold interest only in the land upon which the home is to be built and to take security in such form as may be deemed necessary to protect the interest of His Majesty and the lending institution;

(3) to lengthen the period within which a joint loan to home owners may be repaid from twenty years to twenty-five years;

(4) to authorize Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation on behalf of His Majesty to enter into agreements with builders who will undertake to build a specified number of houses to be financed under the National Housing Act, 1944, and to offer each such house for sale first to veterans and then to others at a price not in excess of the selling price fixed in the agreement in consideration for the undertaking of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to purchase such houses from the builders within one year from their completion if they have not been sold;

(5) to authorize Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to make direct loans in outlying areas to borrowers engaged in mining or lumbering, to assist them to provide low or moderate-cost housing for rent or sale to their employees and others in the area of the operations of the borrowers with a view to making possible increased employment in connection with the said operations;

(6) to authorize Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to hold, operate and manage and lease on terms satisfactory to the minister, real or personal property owned by His Majesty and made available to the corporation for such purpose, and to authorize the corporation to collect the revenues from such properties and to pay such revenues to the minister, less expenses incurred in connection with such properties and less such compensation to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as may be agreed upon by the minister;

(7) to provide greater facility for the making of joint loans for the construction on farms.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this legislation is to introduce certain amendments to the National Housing Act, 1944. The aim of these amendments is to make the National Housing Act as effective legislation as possible. The changes are suggested in the light of experience gained in administering the act under present economic and social conditions. The amendments are also necessitated by the transfer of the administration of the National Housing Act from the Minister of Finance to the Central Mortgage and Housing corporation.

This occasion, I believe, calls for a comprehensive statement on housing conditions in Canada and the principles that underlie the housing policy of the dominion government.

The housing problem during the first few years following V-J day is an emergency problem resulting from almost six years of war and the low level of house-building in the years prior to the war. The immediate task, therefore, is to increase the supply of shelter with the replacement and improvement of existing housing being deferred until the immediate housing emergency has been overcome. Overcrowding existed before the war and so did slums. The need for concentrating all available resources, manpower, industrial capacity and natural resources to the prosecution of the war made it necessary to postpone to the years of peace any large scale measures to alleviate these conditions.

Before proceeding to analyse our present housing situation and to indicate the goals which we have set ourselves, I would like to review some of the background for hon. members. The largest number of houses built during the inter-war years was in 1928, when some 50,200 units were built in urban areas alone. But five years later this number was down to some 14,000 units. The average number of houses built in urban areas in Canada during the years 1924-1939 was 32,000. This house-building activity was below that of the United States and England and Wales. If adjustments are made for differences in population, a comparable figure for the United States during the same period would be 42,000 units and for England and Wales, 63,000.

The lack of new houses in the thirties, the migration of munition workers to cities and towns during the war, an increased rate of family formation since 1939, and the impropriety of diverting labour and materials from the prosecution of the war even for housing, are the reasons for the present aggravated shortage of housing now.

During the first few war years, increased individual incomes had caused sufficient undoubling to do away with vacancies, despite large numbers of men enlisting in the armed forces reducing the number of families requiring separate premises. What has happened since then is familiar to all of us. Greatly increased personal incomes have reduced even further voluntary multiple occupancy. House building was at a relatively low level owing to the need for materials for essential war purposes. It was not until 1944 that there was an appreciable number of houses built. Then came demobilization with the very real need for dwellings for veterans who were reunited with their families. Already a need for housing units was being occasioned by the arrival of war brides in Canada. The continued high level of individual incomes was providing extra demands for housing. There was a continuation of the very high marriage rate with the result that net family formation was about twice that of 1939.

This, generally, was our position on V-E day, when we set a target of 50,000 housing units for the first full construction year after V-E day. Considering our needs for manpower and materials required for the prosecution of the war and the partial reconversion of industry, the target set was a formidable one for the house-building industry which had been accustomed to an average annual construction of about 32,000 units. The early conclusion of the war in the Pacific made it possible to aim at the completion of 50,000 units during the first year following V-E day, that is, from May, 1945 to May, 1946, instead of the first full construction year which would have been the calendar year 1946. According to a survey made by the dominion bureau of statistics, some 47,000 units were completed during the calendar year 1945. Present indications are that during the first year following V-E day we have substantially met the target of 50,000 units. This has been a creditable performance by the house-building industry.

As at March, 1946, our minimum immediate housing needs were estimated at 150,000 housing units. This figure is equal to the number of houses which under normal conditions would have been built during the war years to keep up with the increase in the number of families. It does not take account of our needs for the replacement of substandard homes, a certain amount of overcrowding that existed before the war and a desirable vacancy rate. This figure is supported by the results of a survey on doubling-up undertaken by the dominion bureau of statistics in the spring of this year. This survey showed some 210,000 single housing units occupied by more than one family. There is some voluntary doubling-up, and the figure of 150,000 units suggested represents the minimum number required to meet our immediate shelter problem.

Starting with an immediate deficit of 150,000 units in the spring of 1946, we must add 15,000 units for the needs created by men to be discharged and repatriated from the armed services. We must also allow for an extra demand of some 15,000 units on account of 30,000 war brides, all of whom will have come to Canada before spring of 1947. Experience has shown that about half the war brides create a need for additional housing units. We must also take into account the very high marriage rate which continues to exist in Canada. It is estimated that in 1946 there will be some 105,000 marriages. Family dissolution continues at a rate of about 25,000. Net family formation is, therefore, taking place at the rate of about 80,000, of which perhaps 60 per cent creates a need for new family housing units. From these new requirements over the next year, we can subtract some 50,000-60,000 units completed during the year ending March, 1947.

I believe that these figures and estimates, although approximate, are valid and that we can anticipate by spring, 1947, an immediate housing deficit of some 180,000 units, or a worsening of the situation by some 20 per cent.

Steps are being taken to keep this deficit as low as possible, and I will refer to them later in my remarks. I should be remiss in my responsibilities if at this time I painted a happy picture in the housing field or suggested that immediate relief was in sight. I anticipate that a critical period will occur in the late fall of 1946, when some of the relief now afforded by the occupation of summer residences will be lacking. Once again existing housing, particularly in urban areas, will be carrying the full impact of people returning to town. Already the sponge-like qualities of our urban areas are being taxed to the limit. Relief can come only from new housing units completed during the year.

What is a reasonable estimate of housing needs for the five years ending spring, 1952? Even over as short a period as five years, there are many contingencies and uncertainties which have an important bearing upon the estimate and indeed make any such estimate hazardous. The level of national income over the next five years will, perhaps, be a most important influence, not only on the probable level of new housing during that period, but also upon the need for new units. The rate of recognition of obsolescence and depreciation will be another important factor. The taste in housing of the average citizen will also have a bearing.

The advisory committee on reconstruction in its report, commonly known as the Curtis report, indicated that the desirable housing programme for the first ten years following the conclusion of the war would be 700,000 units or 350,000 units for a five-year period. But this estimate does not take account of all the doubling-up which we are experiencing and a desirable vacancy rate needed to assure flexibility in our housing supply. If account of these additional factors is taken, we estimate that we should build some 480,000 units during the five years ending March, 1952. About 80,000 units should be built during 1947-1948 and 100,000 in each of the following years. While this appears to be a very substantial target for the house-building industry whose present capacity is perhaps only a little more than half, I submit that such a target can be accomplished if we make an all-out effort on the housing front. As I shall outline, the dominion government is creating conditions favourable to a large housing programme by private individuals and companies in Canada. While the dominion government will continue to give as much assistance as possible, both financial and physical, it is necessary for industry itself to increase its capacity to meet the housing needs of the country in the years to come.

On April 29, the Prime Minister advised the house that centralization and coordination of our housing programme was to be accomplished by placing all matters relating to housing, with the exception of the strictly rural activities of the Veterans' Land Act, under the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. The effect of this change transferred the functions of the Department of Finance in the housing field to the Department of Reconstruction and Supply. It also occasioned an arrangement between myself and my colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs—an arrangement whereby new small holdings under the Veterans Land Act with any urban characteristics were cleared with my department. The purpose underlying this move was to bring within a unified operating group all dominion government participation in the field of housing.

Since the Prime Minister's announcement, we have moved towards further coordination. The housing problem resolves itself definitely into two parts—the supply of building materials, and the mode of operations. With respect to supply, an executive committee on building materials is now active. It is made up of the priorities officer, the coordinator of capital equipment and durable goods of the wartime prices and trade board, and the coordinator of housing. This committee is charged with the responsibility of coordinating with the building industry the increased supply of building materials, particularly those of a critical nature. They are busy on the reclamation of existing materials, as well as the coordination of priorities and controls. They are seeking to obtain the best use of the supply of building materials in the interest of housing as well as the industrial and commercial building required to maintain a high level of employment and income.

In the field of operations the dominion's activities have been centralized in Central Mortgage and Housing corporation. In addition to administering the National Housing Act, the corporation is responsible for emergency shelter and the home conversion plan. It also directs policy and activities of Wartime Housing Limited. These steps have been taken in order to create a unified operating group in the housing field. As such, it serves an immediately important purpose in that provinces, municipalities and individuals interested in housing will deal with one agency. In the same way, the activities of field representatives will be coordinated and they will be in a position to deal with provinces and municipalities and others. Already savings in personnel have been effected. It is not planned to amalgamate the personnel of Wartime Housing Limited with the Central Mortgage and Housing corporation immediately, but a coordination of policy and a single direction has now been accomplished. The changes do not alter the operation of the Veterans Land Act either in administration or policy, but they do coordinate the operation of the small holdings provision of that act in those areas in which Wartime Housing and the National Housing Act are active. These changes have assisted us in setting up an integrated administrative machinery which we believe will work well to administer the housing policy of the government.

Just as plant capacity was strained to produce the implements required for war, so now, in the interest of speed in meeting housing targets, it will be necessary to strain all available capacity to produce adequate supplies of building materials. Operating of building materials industries under forced draft will mean the difference between the success or failure of the programme this year. Extra costs may be involved in obtaining increased output and, if so, the government is prepared to consider meeting these costs. Where plant expansion is necessary to eliminate materials bottlenecks, the method used to stimulate expansion of war plants will be made available.

In this connection, I referred on April 29 to an order in council which extends to March 31, 1948, the period during which proposed plant expansion must be undertaken or new equipment acquired under the provision of the "double depreciation" method of financially assisting Canadian industries in their reconversion programmes.

The need for housing is so great that it is desirable that industrial projects should be limited to those which are urgent from the point of view of employment. The action referred to removes the possibility that industrial projects will be rushed forward to qualify for the double depreciation privilege. It is hoped that this will permit the postponement of some projects which involve extensive construction until the supply situation is less acute. Extension of the period for double depreciation is expected to have a salutary effect on residential construction.

Double depreciation certificates do not carry any priorities with respect to building materials or equipment, and they do not in any way interfere with the power of the individual municipalities to issue or withhold at their discretion building permits to cover such work.

This brings me to another important point. On April 1, I tabled a copy of order in council P.C. 1184, of March 27, which provided for municipal control of non-essential or industrial construction. Since then several municipalities have alleged that the government has tried to evade the issue on this score. I can assure hon. members that there was no intention of evading the issue. Rather it was looked upon as a logical approach to a complex problem. The government felt, and still feels, that municipal authorities are in a much better position to determine the essentiality of new construction in their own districts.

In this connection I should point out that all areas are getting their share of building materials under equitable distribution methods administered by the wartime prices and trade board in the same manner as that in which all other scarce supplies are distributed in Canada. Quotas are calculated on purchases during the base period and all distribution, whether to large or small towns, is on that basis.

In describing the supply situation on building materials, I can say that the first five months of 1946 showed a noteworthy performance on the part of the building materials industry. The extent to which the encouraging trend of increased production is affected, or will be affected, by prevailing conditions cannot be estimated at this time. If those conditions should continue for any lengthy period, with a consequent sharp effect on the supply of building materials, the housing programme in Canada would be set back to a degree, the gravity of which may only be appreciated in full during the coming winter.

I should like to acknowledge with appreciation the valuable and untiring help of a special committee on materials formed by courtesy of the Canadian Construction association. This committee has made a series of recommendations and observations. Officials of my department have taken these recommendations, designed to increase the supply of building materials, and, where it is feasible to do so, have already taken direct action or are carrying on discussions designed to bring about an increase in supply. I have a wholehearted appreciation of the task which is being assumed in Canada to-day by the building materials industry, and I should like to acknowledge publicly the appreciation which hon. members must feel toward this industry, which, on its own initiative, has generally succeeded in increasing its capacity. It is being asked to meet a housing target greater than the greatest house-building year on record, and is being asked to meet that objective under conditions not conducive to the attainment of record production. I feel that with certain exceptions, upon which we are concentrating, the industry is capable of accepting, and is prepared to accept, the task—and no one can have a warmer admiration than myself for the effort being directed toward the fulfilment of this task.

The increased production of building materials, particularly those of a critical nature, spells the difference between success or failure of the housing programme. With the solution of this problem, or with the maximum amount of relief capable of being given under existing conditions, the great proportion of other problems are in themselves brought closer to solution.

In brief, the government is now taking steps to increase the production of building materials, especially those of a critical nature, to reclaim to the maximum extent materials in government buildings, to encourage the import of such materials as are essential to the housing programme and are unobtainable in Canada, and to seek to obtain the best use of the available supply of building materials in the interest of housing and such industrial and commercial projects as are required to assure a high level of employment and income.

I am quoting the supply situation in terms of comparative percentages, since I believe that hon. members might find it simpler to appreciate the trend in the production of building materials.

The supply of cement and cement products is moving steadily forward. Production volume is the highest since 1931. Production of cement during January 1946 was 59 per cent in excess of the corresponding month of 1945 and was being produced at a per annum volume rate of approximately 9,000,000 barrels. By May 1946 the monthly production had again increased so as to raise the per annum volume to a figure somewhat over 10,000,000 barrels. Cement products were following a proportionate trend as instanced by concrete blocks, cement drain pipe, sewer pipe, water pipe and culvert tile.

Clay products are following an encouraging trend in regard to brick and structural tile. January 1946 saw an increase in the production of building brick of 73 per cent over the corresponding month of 1945. April 1946 shows a 100 per cent increase over January 1945. The month of May has continued this upward trend and itself shows a 50 per cent increase over the preceding month of April. Quite naturally this is a seasonal increase, but a 50 per cent production increase in one month is an encouraging position.

The position with respect to vitrified sewer pipe and flue linings has not offered the same measure of encouragement but is being watched closely and given the fullest attention. Conversations are now going on to facilitate the reentry into production of a plant, the capacity of which should be capable of providing extensive relief to this situation. Production of flue linings showed increases during April 1946 but declined in May and measures are being taken to hold the prior increase. Production of vitrified sewer pipe for the months of April and May declined slightly, but is still measurably in advance of production in January and February of this year.

Sand-lime brick production is also moving upward. Production in May 1946 shows a slight increase over April output but a 100 per cent increase over the 1945 monthly average.

Rock wool products are being maintained although May production showed what is hoped to be a temporary decline only. Generally speaking, production is keeping pace with shipments although it will be realized that the ability to create any stockpile under existing circumstances is well-nigh impossible. This latter statement is one which I might make applicable to the entire supply situation in terms of building materials. Domestic disappearance under prevailing conditions precludes now, and for some time to come, any likelihood of a stock position being created.

Granulated wool, bulk or loose wool, and industrial wool follow the same pattern of production as that described for rock wool batts.

Gypsum products are generally maintaining or exceeding the production figures reached during the war-time years. Production of wall board in March 1946 reached a figure which, on per annum volume, is equal to the highest annual production of gypsum wall board ever attained. May production, however, has in itself shown a 12½ per cent increase over that of March. The production of gypsum lath appears to be paralleling shipments, but has not yet permitted the creation of any significant stockpile position. The production of gypsum plaster is running steadily at a figure approximately 100 per cent higher than the 1944 average which is almost the highest year on record.

The output of asphalt products is either being maintained or increased, and appears to be meeting the required shipping demands, although fluctuations occurred in the various products within the group. The monthly production rate of asphalt shingles in May exceeded the 1945 monthly average by 70 per cent. There have been steady increases in smooth surfaced and mineral surfaced rolls, while the production of tar and asphalt sheathings remains constant.

The iron and steel industry has shown a substantially higher output of galvanized sheets and of steel pipes, tubes and fittings, and a slight improvement in the production of soil pipe and of nails. Taking these various items in more detail, I mention, first, cast-iron soil pipe and fittings. Production of cast-iron soil pipe and fittings has been mounting steadily, month after month, through 1945 and 1946. In the month of May 1946, the rate, when averaged over a yearly period, is 32 per cent above the 1945 average. There is every reason to believe that this upward trend will not only continue, but may show a sharper rise in the near future. The committee on materials has made recommendations designed toward the increase of soil pipe production. These recommendations are now actively under consideration and it is felt that their implementation should offer early relief to the supply situation, as it concerns soil pipe and fittings. Production of sheet steel is constant but limited to one mill on hot-rolled and one mill on cold-rolled, the product of the latter being largely applied to tin plate for food processing. Stocks of sheet steel have been declining steadily and the warehouses are practically denuded of both black and galvanized sheet. While the production of black steel sheeting declined during the month of April 1946, stocks at the end of that month were equivalent to more than two months' output at the current rate. At the same time, April production of galvanized steel sheeting increased considerably and stocks show a 50 per cent increase, although still not equivalent to more than a part of a month's production. The output of steel pipes, tubes and fittings almost doubled during the month of April, as contrasted with the month of March 1946, although May 1946 experienced a slight decline. The output on steel pipes, tubes and fittings represents a recovery on production from a sharp decline in March 1946. January of this year showed a very satisfactory upward trend and it had been hoped that the current production figure would show a return to the monthly output at the first of the year. Prevailing conditions may require a complete reassessment of this hope. Wrought iron pipes, tubes and fittings saw a January production more than double the December 1945 tonnage, which January figure approached the total production for the year 1944. February of this year saw a 30 per cent increase over the January figure. Production in March and April of 1946 has declined. The production of wire nails and spikes during the month of January 1946, was 23 per cent above the month of January 1945, and 10 per cent above the 1945 monthly average. Declining slightly in February and March of this year, it has now, in May 1946, exceeded the monthly output of the first part of the year.

Our early estimates of steel production and imports were altered considerably by the steel strike in the United States, which, followed by the coal strike, resulted in a fuel shortage which caused a reduction in steel production to make coke available for domestic use.

In the matter of plumbing and heating equipment, there is an encouraging trend in a forward direction. Production of lead pipe for water service has moved up sharply since the first of the year and showed better than a 600 per cent increase in March 1946 over January of this year. Most of this increase has been maintained in April and May. The production of copper tubing had moved steadily forward throughout the first four months of this year. This output, however, is necessarily subject to prevailing conditions and the effect of curtailment of production will inevitably be felt in the near future. Production of warm air furnaces is moving forward and is at present maintaining an average yearly production rate of some 44,500 units, which is 73 per cent above 1944 production, the latest annual figure available. Domestic heating boiler (both hot water and steam), is equalling all-time highs. Cast-iron radiation is being produced at an increasing rate since the first of this year and is now 30 per cent above the 1944 average monthly production, the latest annual production figure available. The same remark might be applied in general to the production of hot water storage tanks (range boilers), and all types of hot water tank heaters.

I shall speak now of the supply of electrical fixtures, or materials. As to wire, more properly known as non-metallic sheathed cable, the scarcity is founded on the shortage of cotton yarn which is used to cover the wire. This is a difficulty which has been known and which has been coped with from the outset, according to the best possible means. Consequently, our efforts have been devoted to a solution of the cotton yarn problem—yarn of a nature required to cover non-metallic sheathed cable. This involves diversion of cotton yarn from other electric wire but is being done—and has already resulted in 100 per cent May increase, over April, in the one main size on which production had lagged. Prevailing conditions with respect to copper and textiles production have affected a situation with respect to wire which should have been relieved considerably during the summer months and should have been overcome by Fall. Rubber coated double braided wire has shown a 77 per cent increase in production within the latter three months of 1946.

Rigid galvanized steel conduit is in short supply owing to our dependence on imports from the United States in the manufacture of steel pipe. Conditions beyond our control have had a serious effect on the supply of those materials required. In support of galvanized steel conduit supply, some substitutions may be necessary. The possibility of doing this is now under investigation and a source of alternative supply is presently visualized.

The production of switches, panels and receptacles moved steadily forward with each succeeding month through May 1946.

The production of sanitary ware finds shipments following production closely, with stocks at a relatively low figure. Over-all production is fairly stable, but in so far as the smaller pieces are concerned, is usually subject to peaks and valleys. Emphasis on the production of a particular line of small ware in any one month usually produces an adverse effect in the production of another type. The production of bathtubs remains generally constant. The government has already instituted action to increase the supply of bathtubs, sinks, wash basins and toilets, and there is reason to believe that a substantial increase in the production of sanitary ware can be expected with the expansion of facilities. The installation of facilities, many of which must be built in Canada and others imported from the United States, may see the lapse of quite some time before the full effect of the new facilities is felt. Action has already been taken that is designed to increase the current 1946 estimated production by a figure somewhere in the neighbourhood of 50 per cent. An additional supply factor offers the farther possibility of a substantial increase in that percentage figure.

In the matter of window glass, Canada is, with one exception, dependent upon imports. This import figure, which has been running currently at a monthly average of 2,500,000 square feet or slightly better, moved upward to almost 3,500,000 square feet in the month of April 1946—although May showed a decline. The only Canadian producer of glass suffered fire damage in 1944 and did not resume production until December 1945. Export control of glass has been re-imposed and covers plate, window and sheet glass, and cutlet (broken glass), including ground glass. Every effort is being made to increase the importation of window glass from the United Kingdom and from the United States, and at the same time, to bring forward as early as possible, exports from the European market, particularly Belgium. I am pleased to note that imports from Belgium, a traditional source of supply, are now scheduled, with appreciable amounts for delivery in July and August.

The situation with respect to paints, varnishes and lacquers appears to find production and shipment running according to a fairly normal pattern. (The dollar value of its product has increased steadily, through 1946, by fifty per cent). There would appear to be reason for suggesting that this part of the building materials industry is in a position to cope with the proposed housing programme.

The position with respect to builders' hardware has also been the subject of a special study. I have been advised that replies to the survey suggest Canadian manufacturing capacity is sufficient to take care of Canadian requirements for builders' hardware. The committee on materials suggests that it is unnecessary to recommend any additional manufacturing capacity. There are certain factors limiting production. Each of these will be considered in full, either by my department or with the department of government primarily concerned.

In the field of lumber and lumber products, production of sawn lumber in Canada during the month of April, 1946, amounted to roughly 283,000,000 feet board measure, which is 13 per cent below the March output of 324,000,000 feet board measure. May declined slightly. These figures represent 100 per cent production coverage for British Columbia and 56-65 per cent mill coverage in the remaining provinces. Regional reproduction through March to May showed a substantial improvement for Ontario and Quebec with a sharp decline in British Columbia production. The net effect of the production loss in British Columbia in terms of 1946 production still remains to be judged. Production of rigid insulating board (wood fibre) remains in line with demand with May production showing a 23 per cent increase over April. The production of panel board in May, 1946, shows a 30 per cent increase over the preceding month. The production of plaster base board shows a definite increase over the prior month. Roof boards and other rigid boards follow the same design in increased production.

I should now like to say a word about priorities. In December 1945 construction control was removed. It was felt, and I still believe, that when hostilities ended the difficulties of enforcing construction control as we knew it during the war would far outweigh any benefits which might accrue. In order to channel building materials in short supply into the housing field, and make the best possible use of available supplies, a formal priorities rating was established and issued as priorities officer's order No. P.O. 11, dated March 12, 1946. There still seems to be some confusion about this order. I wish to reiterate to hon. members that its prime purpose is to channel building materials which are in short supply into government or government-approved low or moderate cost housing projects, such as war-time housing, integrated housing, Veterans Land Act, housing enterprises, emergency shelter and prefabricated units for veterans, and to assist veterans to secure needed materials to complete houses owned by them which are well advanced.

Up to the present we have been using 75 per cent as the stage of completion at which we make priorities available to the veteran who will own and occupy the house. We will now issue priorities to veterans who have houses 50 per cent completed, which generally means roofed and ready for plaster.

In every instance priorities are made available only for veterans housing or for housing which is to be rented to veterans.

It will be noted that, with the exception of the completion of the veteran-owned houses, all priorities of materials are limited to projects controlled in respect to sale price or rental by Central Mortgage and Housing corporation or the Veterans Land Act. This, together with the veterans' preference, is the cardinal principle upon which this priority order functions. It would be wrong to take such steps to provide materials for speculative builders or others if there were no control over the sale price or rentals.

In 1946, we expect that approximately 20,000 housing units, or about one-third of the housing expected, will be assisted by priority regulations. At the present moment priorities are assisting in the construction of some 15,000 housing units.

As hon. members know, the problem of building labour is the responsibility of my colleague, the Minister of Labour, and his department. At the same time a review of the housing situation would not be complete without reference to this vital phase of construction.

Few of us realize what an important contribution a housing programme actually makes to a high level of employment and income. A research study just completed by my department indicates that a housing programme of 50,000 units of a desirable standard would employ 143,000 persons for one full year. Of these, it is estimated some 66,000 would be working on the building site, and the remainder in the mines, forests, factories and other businesses concerned with providing necessary building materials and equipment. These figures must be increased by 20 per cent for each additional 10,000 housing units constructed.

The importance of the large volume of employment provided by the construction of 50,000 housing units is perhaps best illustrated by the fact that it equals the total number of men working on the combined production of aircraft, guns, shells and bombs during mid-1944. Thus house-building, with its ramifications on the economy as a whole, can absorb many persons laid off since the end of the war. Of course there are difficulties, because the skills required cannot always be matched by the type of workman available.

Further, there may be an excess of skills in one area and a shortage in another, and the difficulties of transportation are too great to move applicants to the place of employment. To demonstrate this point: On March 30, 1946, the number of unfilled vacancies in the construction industry as reported by the Department of Labour was 9,496 while unplaced applicants numbered 9,802. But many of the unplaced applicants did not have the training or qualifications for the jobs that were available. We were, and still are, very short of bricklayers, masons, carpenters and plumbers, but jobs in these trades cannot be filled by men with little training or experience. I cannot emphasize too strongly the need for the young men of this country to learn a trade. It is true that at present they may earn more as common labourers than they would if they were to work as apprentices; I believe, however, that the position will be very different when the present squeeze in the labour market is over. When this time comes—we believe it will be the second half of 1947 or the beginning of 1948—the men who have a trade or are completing their training will have better prospects for employment than those who have no special skill to offer.

The government is very conscious of the need for trained personnel, particularly in the construction industry. Arising out of the depressed conditions of the thirties, and the interruption of training plans during the war years, our construction workers have been ageing substantially, with inadequate replacements for those who are leaving the labour market. Perhaps one set of figures will demonstrate this point: In Ontario, a province that has a very good record in apprenticeship training, there were 1,070 construction apprentices registered in 1929, but by 1933 the figure was down to 24, and by 1939 it had only reached 100.

To encourage training in construction trades, the dominion government entered into a ten-year agreement with the provinces in 1944. According to this agreement, the dominion government provided a fund of upwards of $1 million to assist the provinces in the expansion of training facilities. Special provisions were also made for veterans. By March 31, 1946,

6,785 apprentices were reported by the Department of Labour to be in training, about three-quarters of them being veterans.

While satisfactory progress has been made in the field of apprenticeship training, the results of the programme will not be felt for some time, because it takes several years until the training is completed. However, because of shortened training requirements for veterans with some previous experience, a continuous flow of trained building mechanics is expected, beginning in 1947.

While training of construction craftsmen is one important element in contributing to the efficiency of the industry, cooperation among the different groups in the industry is also important. To stimulate cooperation among management, labour and government in the construction industry, the dominion government established some time ago the national joint conference board of the construction industry. This board which came into existence during the war years, is continuing its operations, and has been able to do a great deal to foster cooperation in the industry.

Next I should like to deal with the activities of the various agencies of government which are making a contribution to meet the present housing needs. These agencies are the emergency shelter administration, Wartime Housing Limited and the National Housing Act, which are operated by the Central Mortgage and Housing corporation, and the Veterans Land Act.

Administration of the emergency shelter regulations was transferred from the wartime prices and trade board to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation by order in council P.C. 7502 of December 28, 1945. The principal functions of the emergency shelter administration, which is now operated by the corporation, are:

(1) To assist, promote and coordinate the efforts of municipalities, and in some instances, provinces in finding temporary accommodation for families suffering acute hardship and distress because of lack of shelter.

(2) To assist municipalities in obtaining surplus government buildings for conversion into temporary accommodation.

(3) To assure that all vacant houses in congested areas are put to use. There have been instances when the owner has persistently refused to cooperate. Under the terms of the order the administration has taken over these houses and placed them in the hands of a trust company for sub-letting. In such instances, the rentals receipts are remitted to the owner. As a rule, however, vacant houses have been brought into occupancy through moral suasion. The regulations also provide that no accommodation may be demolished without written authority of the emergency shelter administration.

(4) To maintain a close liaison with veterans' organizations and welfare agencies. The administration also is closely allied with Wartime Housing Limited in order to assure that the allocation of units completed by that agency is made to the veterans' families who most urgently need them.

(5) To operate housing registries in certain congested areas. The administration also bears the cost of room registries for veterans. These are supervised by the Department of Veterans Affairs.

From the time the emergency shelter regulations were established by order in council P.C. 9439, dated December 19, 1944, until February, 1946, the administration took action only when so requested by a municipality. As from February, 1946, a more positive approach was adopted. Although we still rely entirely upon the municipalities, we did approach all the larger municipalities to encourage them to attack their shelter problems in advance. Progress was made to provide a cushion of emergency shelter for May, 1946 and the administration is now working with many municipalities in Canada in an effort to build a similar cushion for the very substantial needs which can be anticipated in October, 1946. To this end, the corporation gives financial assistance to municipalities which have made or are making expenditures to provide shelter. The corporation also assists municipalities to obtain possession of surplus government buildings by purchase or lease. The corporation acts as an expediting agency between the municipality and the government departments concerned with the buildings required for emergency shelter purposes.

With the closer relationship between Wartime Housing Limited and the corporation, arrangements will be made in many municipalities to amalgamate similar functions being performed by Wartime Housing Limited and the emergency shelter administration. For instance, emergency shelter functions in Montreal have been consolidated with Wartime Housing Limited since July 1 of this year. Similar action is under consideration in other centres.

During 1945 some 2,400 family units of temporary shelter were created in surplus government buildings. From January 1 to July 1 of this year, financial assistance was provided to help municipalities make available 874 family units of shelter. The financial assistance provided by the dominion government amounted to $441,000. Before the end of 1946 this figure will be substantially increased. In addition, we have worked out an arrangement with Canadian universities to assist them to provide family units for married veterans. In such instances a financial grant is made to the university and the buildings are leased to the university at a nominal rental. To date, 529 units of married veteran students' shelter are being provided under this arrangement. Dominion government financial assistance under this heading totals $509,300.

In all emergency shelter projects, arrangements are made for the municipality or for the university to provide management. We feel very strongly that the only satisfactory management for emergency shelter units is at the local level. Our financial grants are to assist municipalities and the universities to meet the capital cost of the erection or the conversion of emergency shelter. Rentals received are generally set high enough to look after operating expenses, and in virtually all instances the operating expenses and the administration are the responsibilities of the municipality or the university.

The potential slum nature of some of these developments has been referred to on several occasions. I can give every assurance that these buildings will be removed when the emergency ceases and we will take every step to see that they are not allowed to deteriorate into slums areas.

It now appears that it will be necessary to continue emergency shelter into 1947. There will still be a number of evictions, bringing very real hardship in their wake. We are receiving the full cooperation of municipalities, and emergency shelter is making an important contribution to relieve the cause of the greatest hardship.

It is difficult for me at this time to estimate for hon. members the number of family units which will be created under the emergency shelter regulations during 1946. The actual number at the moment for which financial assistance has been given is 1,403, involving government commitments, for conversion only, of $950,300. Another 600 units have been created without financial assistance for conversion from the dominion through the provision of surplus buildings. I shall be surprised if the total number of emergency shelter units created during 1946 is not double the aggregate of the figures I have just mentioned.

With materials so short, I am willing to see essential materials used in temporary emergency shelter only where the housing needs are abnormal and cannot be met by construction of permanent units. Then, too, emergency housing must provide the maximum of accommodation with the minimum use of materials. It can be argued that critical materials can be used more profitably in permanent construction; I agree, and every effort is being made to keep emergency units to a necessary minimum. On the other hand, it is not possible to meet all of the need with permanent construction and, to some extent at least, I anticipate a continuation of the emergency shelter programme until the housing shortage is largely relieved.

I now wish to refer to the activities of Wartime Housing Limited, activities which are now directed by Central Mortgage and Housing corporation.

Wartime Housing Limited has been responsible for constructing and managing a very large programme of low rental housing projects. Hon. members are well aware that during recent years there has been very little rental housing built by private owners and virtually no rental housing which could be described as being in the low-cost field.

Wartime Housing Limited was incorporated in February, 1941, for the purpose of making available living accommodation for war workers in congested communities. During 1941, 1942 and 1943 an extensive programme was carried on, resulting in the construction of 17,218 war workers' houses, 97 staff houses, 30 schools and numerous other buildings. All this construction was part of our war plant and was as essential as the plants themselves. Virtually all of these war workers' houses are now playing an important part in providing accommodation in the low rental field.

In 1944, the activities of Wartime Housing Limited were directed to providing rental housing for veterans. During that year some 1,287 units were built and rented to men who returned from overseas.

In the summer of 1945 the need for additional rental housing for veterans became apparent, and in the latter half of 1945 a programme of some 6,500 units was undertaken. Owing to the late start, 6,200 of these units were carried over into 1946. This year we have continued the veterans' housing programme, and some 4,700 units have been approved for 1946 construction. Of the 1946 programme, some 4,000 units have been occupied and the remainder under construction have been coming into occupancy at a rate of 200 per week. Although construction schedules are dependent upon a restricted flow of materials, I believe that we can anticipate Wartime Housing units coming into occupancy at an even higher rate during the months of August and September. Our production schedules call for occupancy of about 1,200 units in each of these months. By the end of the year, all of the 1945 carry-over and failing unforeseen obstacles, most of the 1946 units will be occupied. In short, during the year 1946, Wartime Housing will have produced something like 11,000 low rental housing units for veterans' occupancy.

About two months ago I announced that we would consider applications from municipalities for Wartime Housing Limited units until June 1, at which time we intended to terminate the approval for projects for 1946 construction. The reasons for this announcement were that we are anxious to avoid the extra costs of winter construction. We feel that the programme of 1946 has taken as large a share of scarce building materials as is desirable. With the very great amount of private construction under way there is every likelihood that by October and November vigorous efforts will have to be made to find building materials to bring as many uncompleted units as possible to a state of occupancy. New Wartime Housing projects arranged late in the year would tend to interfere with any efforts we may have to make to see that a maximum number of houses are completed for winter occupancy.

Faced with the problem of providing living accommodation for veterans, many municipalities have turned to Wartime Housing Limited for low rental housing units. The problem was considered one of mutual responsibility, and towards that end a standard form of agreement has been developed. Under this agreement, the municipality supplies Wartime Housing Limited with fully improved lots at a cost of $1 each. It also enters into an agreement whereby Wartime Housing Limited will make payment during the life of the agreement in lieu of taxes of $24 per annum for each house erected with two bedrooms or less, and $30 a year on each house having three or more bedrooms, plus $1 per year per house for street lighting. On its part, Wartime Housing Limited enters into an agreement with the municipality providing that the houses will be rented to servicemen or their families for as long as there is a demand for rental houses by this type of citizen. Only after these families have been taken care of may the houses be rented to non-veterans. The rentals charged range from $22 to $30 per month, according to the size of the house.

In view of the fact that the municipality supplies fully improved property at a nominal price and is prepared to accept in lieu of taxes the amounts I have just mentioned, Wartime Housing Limited agrees to sell the houses as a whole to the municipality for $1,000 each at the end of a stated period. The period is determined by the cost of construction.

Wartime Housing Limited houses are constructed in accordance with national building code standards. The best materials available are employed. Houses are fully insulated for warmth in winter and the exclusion of heat in summer. Houses for veterans are placed on cement foundations. While they are considered to be semi-permanent, they are constructed to be as serviceable as any average frame house and should have a life of thirty to forty years.

During the last few months there has been pressure from the municipalities, both in respect to war workers' houses and veterans' houses, on the dominion government to make a payment additional to that which is now being made to the municipality in lieu of taxes. The dominion cannot and will not place itself in the position of being a taxpayer to a municipality. The payments in lieu of taxes were worked out and agreed upon between the municipalities and the dominion as being an amount which, in light of all circumstances, was reasonable. Any increase in revenue from Wartime Housing units to the municipality can only come from the tenants.

The municipalities make the case that the payment in lieu of taxes does not look after their normal services, including schooling. As a result Wartime Housing units are, from their point of view, deficit housing. Although the dominion is unwilling to make additional payments in lieu of taxes, Wartime Housing Limited is prepared to renegotiate existing contracts with the municipalities. Such renegotiated contracts would provide that the dominion shall receive the same net rentals as at present—that is, gross rentals less payments to the municipalities in lieu of taxes. Wartime Housing Limited would, without taking responsibility for payment, be willing in its regular rental collections to collect for and on behalf of the municipalities taxes which the municipalities might consider appropriate to be levied against the tenants of these properties. It would be provided, however, that the levy established by the municipalities must not exceed the normal taxes charged on a similar type of housing bearing the full tax rate.

For example, for a house rented at $30 a month under the present agreement, $2.50 a month is paid by Wartime Housing to the municipality in lieu of taxes. Wartime Housing are prepared to enter into a contract by which they will bill the tenant for a net rental of $27.50, and will be prepared in their collection procedure to bill as a separate item taxes which the municipality considers appropriate. It might be the case that the municipality would feel that it should be receiving twice the amount which it is now receiving from the dominion in lieu of taxes. In this event the tenant's monthly bill would amount to a net rental of $27.50, and taxes for the municipality of $5, making a total of $32.50. Wartime Housing is willing to renegotiate existing contracts on application from the municipality. I would like to make it perfectly clear, however, that the dominion is not willing to make increased payments in lieu of taxes out of the net rentals now being received.

As I mentioned earlier, the 1946 Wartime Housing Limited programme is now committed at some 4,700 units. It is not our intention to proceed with more of these units during the current year. Future operations of Wartime Housing Limited will be dependent upon the 1947 programme for housing and the extent to which it is deemed advisable for government directly to enter the field with low rental housing to be owned by them. It is also dependent upon the willingness of the municipalities to sponsor additional projects within their boundaries.

Next I should like to turn to the small holdings provisions of the Veterans Land Act as it relates to housing units which are not rural in all their aspects. Hon. members will recall that the purpose of the small holdings provision is to provide a place in the country for veterans who have regular employment, the land to make contribution to the veteran's livelihood. In some instances the regular employment is in an urban area, and in others it is in a rural area adjacent to the small holding.

With the very great shortage of housing there has been a tendency for the small holdings section of the Veterans Land Act to be used as a vehicle for supplying urban housing to veterans. Hon. members will recall that in the small holdings provision there is a conditional grant up to $1,400 for veterans who take advantage of it. The grant involves the veteran giving up his reestablishment credit, which for veterans as a whole averages somewhat less than $500.

Earlier in this statement I made reference to an arrangement between myself and my colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Under this arrangement we agreed that it would be advisable for approval for new small holdings which were not strictly rural in character to be cleared with the central operating group which has been established to look after all of the government's interests in housing. In our arrangement my colleague and I confirmed the policy of the government in that the director of the Veterans Land Act is generally not prepared to approve purchases under the small holdings provision within the boundaries of a municipality of over 5,000 people, and on the fringe areas of municipalities in excess of 15,000 people. The government is not prepared to extend this type of financing, involving a subsidy of some $1,000 over and above the veterans' reestablishment grant, into urban areas. We are very anxious to see the small holdings provision implemented to the full, provided it is implemented in the manner contemplated by parliament when the legislation was passed. My colleague and I have arrested a trend towards the small holdings section becoming a vehicle for financing veterans' urban housing.

I have outlined the working rule in determining the areas where we do not consider small holdings appropriate. There have been and will be exceptions on both sides of this general rule. For instance, we will not agree to the approval of a small holding within the boundaries of a municipality of under 5,000 people if that community in itself forms part of a metropolitan area. On the other hand there are communities of over 5,000 people which are distant from other urban areas and located in the centre of a large agricultural area. We have been prepared in such instances to approve a small holding, particularly where the municipal boundaries of the community are very wide.

Up to May 31 of this year, 17,359 ex-servicemen had qualified under the terms of the Veterans Land Act for small holdings. In the same period 4,885 land purchases were made by the director of the Veterans Land Act for small holdings. At the same date, 3,959 applications had been approved for small holdings.

I will not explain further the workings of the Veterans Land Act, because, notwithstanding the arrangement with my colleague, the responsibility remains with him. Our main purpose in entering into this arrangement is to coordinate the activities of his department with other forms of housing.

At this point I should like to refer to the National Housing Act, to which this resolution seeks certain amendments. The National Housing Act, as hon. members know, is designed primarily to finance and promote the construction of new housing, rather than to participate actively in the construction field as is the case of Wartime Housing Limited and the Veterans Land Act.

I wish to deal rather fully with the activities under the various sections of the act, since the legislation introduced by this resolution will, I hope, allow a wider application of the terms of the act and permit Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to extend its facilities. As I come to them I will indicate the nature of the more important amendments we seek. I do not intend, however, to explain them in detail. I would prefer to discuss them more fully when I move the second reading and after hon. members have had an opportunity to study the bill.

It might be said that the adequate financing provided for home owners by the National Housing Act at a time when mortgage money is plentiful does not result in one extra house being built. In some measure this may be true. However, the application of the act does have a very real influence on the types of houses being built, on who owns and occupies them, on the terms upon which they are purchased, on the quality of construction, and on the manner in which the mortgages are paid off by the owners.

I can assure hon. members that the National Housing Act is being vigorously administered. Operating techniques are constantly being improved, red tape eliminated. Loan approvals by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have been decentralized by the establishment of regional and branch offices throughout the country. Meetings are being held constantly with the lending institutions. Arrangements have been made for the handling of loan applications in all parts of Canada—city, town, village and rural areas. Lending values have been increased by eight to ten per cent. Amendments have been made to the minimum standards and specifications. Loan approvals are being cleared at a much faster rate. The integrated housing plan is being pressed forward and has been extended to include duplexes.

The National Housing Act is, in my opinion, a good piece of legislation which we seek by these amendments to improve and make more effective.

Under the National Housing Act the government is in the business of lending money on long tems for the construction of houses. Loans are of three kinds: joint loans made through private lending institutions; direct advances to limited dividend corporations up to 90 per cent of the lending value of a low-rental project, and home extension loans.

The first and most familiar of these is joint loans. Under part I of the act, loans are made jointly by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and approved lending institutions to prospective home owners or to builders of houses for sale to occupants.

Indicative of both the tremendous demand for housing and the fact that the National Housing Act is filling a definite need are the following statistics covering loan approvals under part I by provinces during the first six months of 1946, with comparative figures for the same period last year:

Part I

January 1-June 30

Province	1946 Loans	1946 $
Prince Edward Island	—	—
Nova Scotia	75	360,120
New Brunswick	39	189,000

Alberta	425	1,924,660
British Columbia	623	2,595,680
Total	3,929	17,853,520

Province	1945 Loans	1945 $
Prince Edward Island	—	—
Nova Scotia	17	79,940
New Brunswick	5	20,280
Quebec	200	1,026,200
Ontario	1,400	5,937,425
Manitoba	331	1,385,660
Saskatchewan	41	180,600
Alberta	116	521,000
British Columbia	307	1,187,180
Total	2,417	10,338,285

It will be remembered that maximum loans to home-owners are based upon 90 per cent of the first $4,000 and 70 per cent of additional lending value. By regulation loans may not exceed $6,400 because we are unwilling to lend any encouragement to large houses when the emphasis should be on small homes.

Present-day costs and sales prices present real difficulty. The $4,000 house of 1939 costs at least $6,000 and is often priced far above this figure. This has borne heavily upon the married veteran who, with so little rental housing available, has been forced to buy. He is faced with a larger down payment and larger monthly payments than he had anticipated.

Three steps could be taken to help meet this problem:

First, increase lending values to the current level of building costs which is of the order of 150 per cent of the 1939 level, with variations in different parts of the country. This has been done by the corporation increasing lending values by an additional 8 per cent-10 per cent as from April 29, 1946, so as to bring lending values into line with cost levels. We believe that present lending values are very close to the actual cost of building plus a fair builder's profit, but do not make allowance for extra costs such as delays in delivery of materials, inefficient labour and the very long profit being taken by some builders. We are unwilling to make loans on extra costs of this kind. Although there have been some minor increases in material and labour costs since April 29, I believe that our level of lending values is as high as is prudent at the moment.

Second, lengthen the period of amortization to reduce the monthly payments of principal and interest. This is being proposed in the amendments introduced by this resolution. We seek to give the corporation authority to extend the period of amortization from twenty to twenty-five years. This will have the effect of reducing the monthly principal and interest payments by 12·2 per cent on a loan of like amount. Here is an example of the increased lending value and the longer amortization period: A house with a lending value prior to April 29 of $4,550, a maximum loan of $3,980 and monthly payments of $25.03 for principal and interest would, under the change to which I have referred and the revision proposed, have a lending value of $5,000, a maximum loan of $4,300 and monthly payments on principal and interest of $23.80, a reduction even on the increased dollar amount of loan. I will deal with this amendment more fully when moving the second reading of the bill.

Third, we have considered, and are not prepared to recommend, increasing the ratio of loan so that 90 per cent loans can be made on lending values up to $5,000 instead of $4,000 as at present. This would have the effect of an additional loan of $100 on lending values of $4,500 and a maximum increase of $200 on lending values of $5,000 and over. A strong case can be made for such a change. It would help bridge the very large down payment generally required to-day. The increase in amortization period offsets increased monthly payments. In urban areas the $5,000 house is the cheapest that can be bought in to-day's market. The 90 per cent loan provision originally contemplated this type of borrower and house, if not the price. As against these arguments we feel that loans are already very high. The home owner should invest the present difference between lending value and loan even if he purchases at a price in excess of the lending value. We think that already the increase in loans approved since April 29 has had the effect of increasing sale prices. A further increase by this device is likely to cause a further increase in sale price, which if carried to its logical conclusion would result in the same down payment by the borrower and a larger debt by the amount of such increase.

I should like to mention one other phase of the problem of the high level of loans. In 1939 it was thought that the ratio of income of the home owner to debt service—that is, payments on principal, interest and taxes—should not exceed about 22 per cent. To-day 26 per cent to 28 per cent is more the range with some loans or sales to home-owners approved at 30 per cent. The dangers of this level of ratio of debt service to income are very evident but in light of to-day's conditions this increase is necessary. The longer amortization term will tend to decrease these ratios. It is however another reason why it is not desirable to increase the lending value upon which 90 per cent loans may be approved.

The case for sound home financing of a long-term nature makes it inadvisable to accede to the arguments for a change in the ratio of loans made but to continue with our present practice.

Part II of the act provides for joint loans for rental projects, such as apartments and duplexes, on much the same terms as under part I, and a maximum loan of 80 per cent.

The table which follows shows the number of units involved in loans approved under part II of the act by provinces for the first six months of 1946, together with comparative figures for the same period in 1945:

Part II

January 1-June 30

Province	1946 Units	1946 $
Prince Edward Island	—	—
Nova Scotia	14	56,000
New Brunswick	—	—
Quebec	279	1,030,800
Ontario	229	1,351,900
Manitoba	17	58,200
Saskatchewan	—	—
Alberta	38	140,000
British Columbia	171	625,900
Total	748	3,262,800

Province	1945 Units	1945 $
Prince Edward Island	—	—
Nova Scotia	—	—
New Brunswick	—	—
Quebec	105	398,400
Ontario	124	366,660
Manitoba	11	61,600
Saskatchewan	—	—
Alberta	—	—
British Columbia	36	124,400
Total	276	951,060

These figures are not impressive. They reflect the small amount of rental housing being built. The number of units in this category is so small that we are attempting to make good some of the deficiency through Wartime Housing Limited and Housing Enterprises of Canada, Limited.

Among the reasons for the dearth of rental housing are the substantial profits on residences being built for sale and the builder's uncertainty over being able to obtain large quantities of materials for this type of construction.

Units approved under parts I and II of the act during the first six months of the calendar year 1946 totalled 4,667 with loans amounting to $21,116,320. This compares with 2,693 units in the same period last year amounting to $11,289,345.

Mr. KNOWLES: Under which part?

Mr. HOWE: Under parts I and II.

Before we leave the subject of joint loans, I wish to discuss for a moment a few other points. The first of these is loan coverage. Since the inception of the National Housing Act, loans have been readily available in every city throughout Canada and in most of the larger towns. Until recently, however, some difficulty has been experienced with applications from residents of small towns and villages, especially those in outlying areas. In view of the desirability of making National Housing Act loans available on a national basis, and as a result of negotiations between Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the lending institutions, an arrangement has been made for the handling of applications in all parts of the country. The arrangement is working extremely well, and I am pleased to report that we no longer receive complaints from individuals whose applications cannot be serviced. I would also like to express the appreciation of the government to the eight or ten lending institutions which have taken on this important responsibility.

In the past there has been some difficulty over the lack of authority under the National Housing Act to make loans on leasehold land. This has been particularly true in national park areas, such as Banff and Jasper. The Department of Mines and Resources, quite properly, is unwilling to transfer in fee simple title to lands within national parks. We therefore seek an amendment to the act to authorize the corporation to make National Housing Act loans, under certain terms and conditions, for the construction of houses on land under leasehold.

My third point deals with cooperative housing developments. Under part I of the act, joint loans are available to cooperative housing groups formed for the purpose of building houses or apartments for occupancy by members of the groups. Under certain circumstances, loans for cooperative rental housing projects may also be made under part II (section 8), provided that the cooperative is already formed and has interests other than housing.

Applications are being received from cooperative groups for loans at 3 per cent for periods up to fifty years under section 9 of the act. This section provides for loans to limited-dividend companies for low rental housing projects.

Generally these applications are from groups of individuals being formed into a cooperative to build houses for their own occupancy with the equity being supplied by themselves. The form of the arrangement involves a lease to the member of the cooperative but in most respects the position of the member is that of a home-owner. These applications have been declined because section 9 was not designed for this purpose, its conditions cannot be fulfilled under such circumstances, it was never intended that the tenants of a low rental limited-dividend project should be its owners and the position of the tenant with respect to both his equity and continued occupancy is unsatisfactory.

An individual going into such an arrangement has no security of tenure because under the terms of section 9 he cannot continue to lease a unit in the low rental project if his income exceeds five times his rental. This condition exists to assure the low rental character of the project. Even if the tenant's rental—being paid in lieu of principal, interest and taxes—is current, he has no protection against foreclosure with loss of equity and tenancy if the project as a whole goes into default which might be occasioned by default of 5 per cent or 10 per cent of the tenants. In most of the applications we have received there is no indication of any reasonable measure of protection on this score. Nor are there funds other than the tenants' equity to assure completion of the project in a period of rising costs.

The position of the tenant when the loan on the project is repaid is not happy. Under the section he, as part owner of a limited-dividend company, or having an interest in it through a cooperative, may not receive more than his equity with 5 per cent interest. If the residual value of his house was greater than this amount he would have to make a corresponding payment to retain possession. If it was decided to sell the property as a whole the position would be even more difficult. To avoid this trouble it has been suggested that at this time we should provide that the units revert to the tenants at the end of the amortization period. This is not feasible in light of the intent of the act.

There are other reasons why we should not approve such applications. They, like the ones I have outlined, all add up to one conclusion. Section 9 was not designed for home-owners. Nor was section 9, with long term money at 3 per cent, designed as a substitute for part I of the act which provides loans to home-owners at 4½ per cent for a term generally twenty years but under some circumstances up to thirty years. If we provide cooperative home-owners with 3 per cent money, our position becomes difficult with other home-owners.

Our position is very clear. We will not approve applications for loans under section 9 to limited-dividend companies where the prospective tenants directly or indirectly are financing the equity of the project nor where factors exist which are not compatible to a limited-dividend rental project as defined by the act. On the other hand we are ready to approve such applications under appropriate sections of the act, such as section 4 (3) which makes provision for loans to persons incorporated for the purpose of instructing and managing a cooperative housing project.

I would now like to deal with direct loans made by the corporation to limited-dividend companies. Section 9 of the National Housing Act authorizes advances by the corporation up to 90 per cent of the lending value of a low-rental housing project. The term of amortization may be extended to fifty years, and the interest rate is 3 per cent. Three of these loans have been approved, and another ten of them are under discussion.

The rapid advance in the costs of construction has made it increasingly difficult for applicants under this section to meet low rental housing requirements since rents are set up on an economic rental basis. Present conditions, therefore, are not conducive to a large volume of loans to limited-dividend companies if economic rentals are to be obtained. While there is provision for the provinces, municipalities, social agencies, trusts or persons to contribute to a rent reduction fund, this government, as a matter of policy. is not prepared to introduce subsidies either in the form of a grant towards capital cost or subsequent contributions to a rent reduction fund.

All applications from limited-dividend companies are carefully examined by the corporation, and although I do not anticipate a large volume of this type of loan during the next year, I do feel that some loans will be made. Certainly we are anxious to have this type of construction undertaken and the corporation is making every effort to approve applications within the principles laid down in this section of the act. In addition I expect that in the future many loans of this type will be made upon land made available through the slum clearance provision of the act.

Mr. KNOWLES: Has the minister any figures on these sections with which he has been dealing for the last three minutes?

Mr. HOWE: No. I am simply explaining the principles. There has been very little construction.

Mr. GREEN: Where were these low-dividend projects?

Mr. HOWE: Chiefly in pulp and paper towns.

Next I would like to deal with the activities of Housing Enterprises of Canada, Limited. Hon. members will remember that at the last session of the house amendments were made to sections 9 and 11 of the National Housing Act whereby an institutional holding company could proceed with rental housing. Shortly after these amendments were passed, all life insurance companies operating in Canada joined together and formed a mutual institutional holding company in the name of Housing Enterprises of Canada, Limited. Housing Enterprises contemplated a two-year programme of about 10,000 units and planned to distribute the much-needed rental housing throughout the urban communities from coast to coast. The financial arrangement is that loans are made to Housing Enterprises under section 9, as I have previously described, and the 10 per cent equity of Housing Enterprises comes under the provision of section 11 of this act.

When this proposal was discussed with the life insurance companies in July, 1945, it was contemplated that rental housing units providing two and three bedroom accommodation could be produced for shelter rents of about $35 and $40. Since then there have been increases in cost and at present it would appear that the rental level for most projects will be of the order of $39 to $45 for the two and three bedroom units. This is a low economic rental in light of to-day's costs but it is not the low rental contemplated when Housing Enterprises was formed.

In view of the substantially increased costs as well as a shortage of building materials, the 1946 programme of Housing Enterprises will be limited to some 3,400 units. Of these 1,945, comprising seventeen projects, have been approved by the corporation and are under way or will be under way this week. Tenders have been or are being called on seven other projects involving some 739 units, and the 700-odd units forming the balance of the programme are being developed by Housing Enterprises as fast as possible. We anticipate that by August 1 work will be under way on virtually the whole 1946 programme.

The following is a list of projects by localities being undertaken by Housing Enterprises, together with an indication of their status, at July 15.

If I may I will have this table put on Hansard.

Mr. GREEN: Do these projects get priority for supplies?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: I believe it should be pointed out that the minister must get consent to place these tables on Hansard.

Mr. HOWE: After all, I am moving a resolution.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I was going to permit the minister to finish his remarks, and then ask that he be granted permission to have these tables placed on Hansard.

Mr. MacNICOL: Agreed.

Mr. HOWE: The table is as follows:

We are in great need of rental housing units. I have already mentioned the tendency towards the building of residential units for sale. Housing Enterprises and Wartime Housing are making the major contribution towards a new supply of rental housing units. I would like to express my appreciation, as well as that of the government, for the cooperation of the life insurance companies in entering into the rental housing field at this time when conditions are so difficult.

The resolution being introduced to-day seeks to introduce a new section dealing with loans to provide housing to primary producers in outlying districts, such as mining and lumbering companies. During the last year such companies have had great trouble in attracting labour. As a result production has suffered.

The day of the bunk house is over, and it is becoming increasingly apparent that if stable and permanent employment is to be provided in mining and lumbering camps, it is essential to employ a fairly large proportion of married men. Married men can be attracted only if housing is available for themselves and their families. Many instances have been brought to our attention where married men working in the mining and lumbering industries have left their families in urban areas. If such men were able to move their families to their place of employment, it would relieve a certain amount of urban congestion. I will not discuss in detail the proposed amendment at this time except to say that we hope to introduce an efficient, expeditious and inexpensive method of providing much-needed family housing units in outlying areas involved in the production of primary materials.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has taken over the administration of the National Housing Act in full, except for grants for slum clearance. In this instance, the corporation advises the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply but the grant itself is made by the minister, with the approval of the governor in council.

Slum clearance, however, is considered to be inopportune at the present time. The requirement for shelter is so great that the government cannot afford to permit the destruction of livable shelter of any kind. Slum clearance will come later when the pressing need for the occupation of every housing unit is lessened.

Part III of the National Housing Act, which provides for farm housing, has never been very successful. We believe that there are very serious deficiencies in the existing legislation. The resolution before the house to-day introduces an amendment which we feel will allow the corporation vigorously to promote the development of farm housing and to provide adequate financing facilities for this type of housing. I will make a fuller statement upon this amendment at the time of the second reading.

Hon. members will remember that part IV of the National Housing Act is a reenactment of the Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act of 1937. At the last session of the house an amendment was passed making it possible to proclaim that portion of this part which deals with home extension loans, and to leave unproclaimed the portion which deals with home improvement loans. It was thought inadvisable at this time to use materials in short supply for the purpose of improving homes. On the other hand, we are anxious to promote the conversion of large units into an increased number of family housing units.

This portion of the act was proclaimed in April, 1946, and seven loans have been approved to date. I would remind hon. members that under the Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act of 1937, some $50 million was loaned. However, only fifty-eight home extension loans, involving $192,000, were approved. The balance was on account of home improvement loans. It is not likely that the present home extension provisions of the National Housing Act will result in an impressive number of loans being approved, if for no other reason than the lack of houses suitable for the purpose. Many such houses have already been converted under the home conversion plan.

Under part V of the National Housing Act, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is empowered to carry on studies and investigations into housing conditions in Canada and to conduct technical research leading to improved living accommodation.

Research undertaken by the corporation along these lines since it was organized, at a cost of approximately $50,000, may be summarized as follows:

1. Financing the dominion bureau of statistics' studies on the number of dwelling units constructed in 1945 and being built in 1946.

2. Financing an investigation and report by the dominion bureau of statistics on overcrowding and multiple occupancy of dwelling units in Canada.

3. The corporation has also made arrangements with the dominion bureau of statistics to obtain comprehensive information respecting housing conditions in the prairie provinces when the 1946 census is taken in that area.

4. Jointly with the province of Ontario and the city of Toronto, financing an investigation and study by the university of Toronto into housing conditions in Toronto and a report of the estimated housing requirements in that city.

5. Assisting the architectural research group of Ottawa in study of a town planning proposal for a certain area in Ottawa and the preparation of an illustrated display of the proposal.

6. Investigation of construction costs in large-scale developments.

7. Studies of housing policies and plans in other countries.

8. A study of residential construction trends and the supply of building materials.

9. An investigation into site taxation methods and their significance in community development.

10. The operating records of Central Mortgage and Housing corporation provide information on housing conditions, incomes, construction costs and other data relating to new projects financed under the National Housing Act. To permit a proper appraisal of housing trends, the records of the corporation's lending operations are being set up on a machine basis of tabulation. It is intended to prepare monthly summary reports highlighting housing statistics indicating current trends.

11. Beginning on June 1, some exploratory work was started on research into housing finance as provided for in section 27 of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act.

In its administration of the National Housing Act, Central Mortgage and Housing corporation has established a research division to study land utilization and community planning. Provincial planning authorities have been consulted looking to the implementation of community plans. A research programme has been started with a view to obtaining economic, sociological and physical factual information pertaining to community planning. Through the facilities of the dominion bureau of statistics the corporation expects to gather factual data from the 1946 quinquennial prairie census sufficient to permit a complete study and analysis of existing community conditions. It is believed that from such studies, with the cooperation of both provincial and municipal planning authorities, it will be possible to establish basic community planning standards.

It is intended that this factual information, and studies based upon it, will be made available to all interested provincial and municipal authorities, either for public education or community planning use. The corporation also proposes to make public its findings.

Other research projects are to be undertaken in connection with regional planning and land subdivision. Advice is now being made available to subdividers. Methods are also being indicated whereby savings in service costs may be obtained without losing sight of the functional aspects of the subdivision which are so important to better social conditions.

In this connection I might add that on June 25 and 26 a community planning conference was called in Ottawa. Representatives of the provinces and of other interested groups were present and discussed mutual problems. At the conclusion of the meeting an organization to be known as the community planning association of Canada was formed. The object of the association will be to foster public understanding of and participation in community planning in Canada.

I now come to two specialized activities under the National Housing Act. The first of these is the home conversion plan which was established by a series of orders in council beginning with P.C. 2641 of April 1, 1943, under which authority was given to the government to lease buildings in certain cities, to convert them into multiple housing units and to sublet them to suitable tenants for the relief of the housing shortage.

Conversions completed at July 11, 1946, totalled 258, providing 2,097 housing units. Houses in the process of being converted on that date were two, providing eleven housing units.

The cities in which the plan is now operating are Vancouver, Victoria, Nanaimo, Fernie, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Toronto, Hamilton, Ottawa, Brantford, Galt, London, Windsor, Kingston, Montreal, Quebec and Hull.

It is not our intention to press further development at this time owing to the lack of suitable houses for conversion, as well as the shortage of materials and the very high costs involved. The term of the lease during which the crown recovered its costs was established at a time when costs were much lower. Were conversions to go forward at this time under present conditions, the length of the lease enabling the crown to recover moneys advanced would be too long, making the plan unsatisfactory not only to the crown, but to the owners of such houses.

The resolution proposes to put into statutory form the powers which were used for this plan under order in council. A small appropriation is included in the estimates for any new projects which seem suitable. The corporation requires the powers in statutory form not only to go forward with any occasional suitable unit, but also to continue to operate the existing converted units.

The second of these activities is the integrated housing plan which is a specialized application of part I of the act.

Its purpose is to promote the building of houses for sale, preference being reserved for veterans of world war II and their dependents.

By order in council we recently extended the terms of the integrated housing plan to duplexes which are defined as houses containing two family units, built one above the other, with separate entrances.

It is now proposed to bring the provisions of the plan, which is presently being administered under the Emergency Transitional Powers Act, under the National Housing Act, with a view to empowering the corporation to enter into contracts with builders.

The main features of the plan are:

1. A pre-determined maximum sales price.

2. Priority for materials under priorities order No. P.O. 11.

3. A government guarantee to purchase in the event of non-sale.

4. Sales preference to veterans.

As at July 5, of this year, thirty-five integrated housing plan projects, involving the construction of some 2,135 units had been approved. Of these, work has started on twenty-one projects of 1,680 units.

Projects approved by cities as at July 5, 1946, are as follows:

City	No. projects	No. units	Units in projects with work started
Fort William	2	135	135
Galt	1	20	20
Hamilton	2	334	334

This, Mr. Speaker, has been a summary of stewardship by this government of its activities in the housing field. The statement has been longer than is usual when moving a resolution, but I know that it is a subject of great interest and will, I am sure, occasion some remarks by my hon. friends on the other side of the house. In fact, there has been a considerable measure of criticism directed at the government because of the acute housing shortage. My statement to-day reveals, I think, that the record of the dominion government in the housing field is not inconsiderable. Let me review briefly a few points:

46,900 dwelling units provided in 1945; target for the year ending March 31, 1947, 60,000; for the twelve months ending March 31, 1948, at least 80,000 units.

Consolidation of all federal housing activities in Central Mortgage and Housing corporation which, in turn, reports to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply.

Streamlining of lending operations under the National Housing Act, both to individual borrowers and to limited-dividend corporations, resulting in a substantially increased number of loan approvals.

An eight to ten per cent increase in lending values making a present level of about 150 per cent of 1939 levels.

Arrangements for making National Housing Act loans available on a national basis by seeing that all municipalities in Canada are now covered.

[Mr. Howe.]

Proclamation of part IV of the Act with respect to home extension loans.

Revision and extension of the integrated housing plan.

Extension of housing research and community planning operations.

Introduction of a new priorities rating system giving preference to low-cost government-sponsored housing for veterans.

Extension of the period during which the double depreciation method of financially assisting Canadian industries applies.

Expansion, where possible and practicable, of manufacturing facilities for building materials.

Extension of operations under the emergency shelter regulations.

A stepped-up post-war construction programme by Wartime Housing Limited.

Expanded operations under the Veterans Land Act.

I commend this record of accomplishment to the attention of hon. members.

In the light of my remarks on the record of this government to date in the housing field, I would now like to take a moment or two, Mr. Speaker, to consider what the immediate future holds in store.

That a deficit of housing will confront us for some time to come is virtually certain. At the same time, I can assure hon. members that no effort will be spared by my department and by the government as a whole to meet the deficit, to relieve a critical situation.

The production of materials will be increased by every possible measure in order to assure the construction of a maximum number of houses this year. Failing major upsets, we shall see the completion of at least 50,000 units in the year ending March 31, 1947. Our target—which will be limited only by the flow of materials and supplies—is for 60,000. This will be accomplished in spite of increased industrial and commercial construction. Our aim for the year following—the twelve months ending March 31, 1948—is 80,000 units.

The legislative and administrative steps which I have outlined to-day give clear indication of a positive and integrated housing policy. This policy is designed primarily to see to the immediate shelter problem, but it does not neglect the long-term implications of the need of raising the standard of housing for people in this country. In conclusion, I would like to sum up the main principles underlying our aims and objects.

(1) High priority. Adequate housing for the Canadian people is one of the major tasks before us. The utmost effort will be directed towards meeting this need, and the resources of the country will be used to this end.

(2) Private and public housing. It is the policy to ensure that as large a portion as possible of housing be built by private initiative. The dominion government will lend every facility to private enterprise to build as many houses as are needed. Where private building is impeded by the lack of funds, we have made and will continue to make financial assistance available both in urban and rural housing. Where private housing construction is delayed through shortages of material or lack of trained labour, we have taken and will continue to take steps to improve both the material and labour supply. If, however, with all the assistance we can provide for financing, materials and labour supply, the houses required to substantially improve the housing standard of the Canadian people are not forthcoming, then the dominion government will take a direct position in the housing field.

Already we are engaged in such measures as veterans' housing projects under Wartime Housing Limited, the small holdings provision of the Veterans Land Act, and Housing Enterprises with the assistance of the life insurance companies. We are in these endeavours because in each instance housing of this type would not otherwise be forthcoming. We would be very happy to withdraw, but there seems no immediate prospect of housing of this type being produced by other means. I hope that the dominion government's direct participation in the housing field will reduce rather than increase, but we are determined to see that an adequate number of homes are built in Canada in the future.

(3) Housing standards. We believe that houses should be constructed soundly and be of a high standard so as to provide comfort to the people of this country commensurate with the high standard of living at which we are aiming. This will involve new houses for families with low incomes who cannot afford to pay economic rentals. The dominion government has made and will continue to make adequate provisions to make the financing of low and moderate rental housing projects possible. But subsidies to create uneconomic rentals are, in my opinion, a matter for provincial and municipal concern.

The dominion government has, on the occasion of the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction, invited these governments to consider such aspects as rent reduction funds, land acquisition and local taxes. While no proposals have been submitted in this respect to the dominion government, we will continue to strive for provincial and municipal cooperation in attaining the goal of bringing rental levels down within the capacity to pay of families in the low income group. Other measures to raise the standard of housing will be slum clearance projects and the insistence upon minimum housing standards to which each house built with federal assistance has to comply.

(4) Increased efficiency. Much of the success of the housing programme depends on the efficiency of the house-building industry, both management and labour, to reduce costs and tap markets hitherto untouched. Already we have taken steps to increase efficiency in the housing field. Our efforts have ranged from large scale housing projects to building material research and the stepped-up training of building labour. We will continue to pursue all possible avenues of endeavour which in our opinion will help to reduce the cost of housing to the consumer, while still leaving adequate remuneration to the builder and the construction worker for their efforts. This will require continued research and technical investigations in the field of housing activities. Part V of the act recognizes this need, and we propose to implement this section to the fullest extent of scientific and technical facilities available. Already a start has been made. But we can only encourage increase in efficiency. Industry alone, both management and labour, can achieve it.

(5) Community planning. Finally, we believe that the success of our housing programme is closely tied to an orderly and well integrated growth and development of our cities, towns and villages. With the help of provincial and municipal governments, professional and other organizations, we are embarking upon a programme of furthering community planning through financial assistance, research and education.

These broad principles will, we believe, take care of the housing needs of this country, not only in respect to the immediate emergency period ahead of us, but also, with appropriate adjustments in light of experience, in respect of our long-term requirements. Our housing problem is a major task and requires constructive cooperation from everybody in Canada. There is no royal road to a speedy solution. The road ahead is uneven with improvement in sight, but with many problems still requiring an answer. With a continuation of the cooperation we are now receiving from financial institutions, management and labour in the construction industry as well as from the industries supplying building materials, we will be able to achieve our aim. We must first overcome the immediate emergency task of providing shelter for everyone in the country. We must then make rapid progress towards our long-term target of improving the standards of housing and living for Canadians.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): During the minister's introduction of his resolution he referred to certain tables which he would like to have placed on the record for the benefit of the members. Has the minister unanimous consent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, it would be premature to attempt at this stage to comment on the features of the legislation proposed to be introduced by the minister in the light of the wording of the resolution before the house, but I think it is appropriate to make some passing observations on the lengthy statement which the minister has made.

I am sure that the house is glad that the minister has seen fit to make this statement. I point out that the last occasion on which the house was afforded anything approaching a comprehensive statement from the government on the housing situation in Canada was on March 20 last, when the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) spoke in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. This is July 22. Four months and two days have passed since the last statement from the government that could be said to approach a comprehensive statement on the housing situation.

When we speak of housing conditions in Canada we are speaking of the problem which is beyond question the most critical internal problem that we face in Canada to-day. I want to say with all the emphasis at my command that it is the duty of this house to keep itself fully informed on housing conditions in Canada, to keep its finger on the pulse of that great problem. It is not good enough to have statements from the government at four-months' intervals while the house is in session.

I have suggested before—I hope I am not tiring the house in referring to it again—that the housing situation in Canada is and will be for a long time to come so serious, so critical that there ought to be within the framework of the machinery of this house some continuing body which can apply its intelligence to the problem and receive information on a current basis. There is nothing revolutionary in that suggestion. I think it is a suggestion that the government ought to welcome. But the government does not act upon it. Would it not be of immense value to the house and to the country if there were a committee of this house which could obtain statements as it requires them, not at long intervals but from week to week or month to month, as occasion arises, and examine the officials of the various government corporations which are now charged with administrative responsibility in respect of housing, namely Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and Wartime Housing Limited. Members of the house have never had under the present set-up an opportunity of examining those officials and obtaining first-hand information from them. I think that is a distinct lack in the present framework of the machinery of this house.

The measure which the minister proposes under this legislation to introduce is the first housing legislation submitted by the government at the present session. It is well that there should be some new housing legislation, if this is to be the only opportunity afforded the house of discussing in a specific way housing conditions in Canada, because it just does not give members an opportunity to come to grips with the housing situation and have a specific debate on this problem to touch on it in such general debates as the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne or the debate on the budget. This resolution and the bill which will be introduced following the adoption of the resolution afford the first opportunity given to the house this year for a specific, direct debate on housing conditions in Canada.

I shall not attempt at this stage to deal with the features of the legislation proposed. There will be a better opportunity when the bill has been before us and has been scrutinized.

One had hoped that the review from the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply to-day might give encouragement to believe that the worst is over as regards housing conditions in Canada. The picture painted for us of those conditions by the minister is neither heartening nor encouraging. It is true that some features of the report which the minister has given the house are reasonably bright. Some parts of the report which he gave with reference to the production of certain building material the house will receive, I am sure, with welcome. But the over-all picture that is presented by the minister to-day as regards current housing conditions and the outlook for improvement over the next year and a half is not bright; on the contrary, it is discouraging.

What is the picture which the minister has presented to us? In the first place, he says there is at the moment a deficit of 150,000 housing units. That is measured in terms of the housing emergency, not in terms of the over-all need to improve housing conditions in Canada, or to eliminate substandard houses and slums, but is simply the immediate emergency need to-day—150,000 housing units. What is the outlook for the future?

The outlook is this, that by the 31st of March of next year, namely by the spring of 1947, not only will that condition not have improved but it will actually be worse; the deficit in respect of emergency needs of housing will by that date have increased to 180,000 housing units. The situation by the spring of next year will be, we are told, twenty per cent worse than it is to-day. Then, what of 1947 after the spring of that year? The government's objective is to be 80,000 housing units for the year which will commence April 1, 1947, and end March 31, 1948. It means this, that so far from catching up with that further deficit of 30,000 housing units and keeping abreast of the situation as it develops during the summer of 1947, we cannot expect, in the light of present government housing policies, any over-all improvement in the situation in comparison with it as we know it to-day, July 1946, until, probably, the end of 1947.

That, I say, is a very dark picture. The people of this country so far as housing conditions are concerned have borne a great many disappointments; they have suffered many hardships, and they had hoped for something better than this at the hands of the government. We see the government always ready to accept credit for any Canadian accomplishment, any construction of houses. The government must equally accept responsibility for failure.

The report we have heard to-day will deal a hard blow at the hopes of many thousands of Canadians living under conditions of hardship and squalor. If the picture is dark, if the best the government can do gives but a dark outlook for housing conditions, it is much better that the people of Canada should know it, that we should have a frank exposition from the government so that the people will not be permitted to go on conjuring up hopes which would only be dashed next winter.

But, having said that one commends frankness, one does not at all excuse the government for the darkness of the picture. While one approves frankness, one would like some evidence of that quality among members of the government who undertake to deal with housing conditions. The house has heard what the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply has had to say about housing conditions, and his candid admission that they are going to be worse before they are better. I turn by way of contrast to a speech made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) in Brandon on January 24, 1946. It bears the title "Aftermath."

Mr. MACKENZIE: The incurable optimist!

Mr. FLEMING: This speech—and I take it that the copy I have received is authentic, since it came, I believe, from the department presided over by the Minister of Veterans Affairs—contains these two interesting paragraphs:

> There seems to be a belief in some minds that housing is a problem peculiar to Canada alone, and one which could have been averted. It is a problem common to all nations to-day who unstintingly contributed their production to the sacred cause of Victory.
> There is discomfort, even hardship, at the moment, but through emergency measures by all levels of government, through energetic action by industry, and above all, through the warm-hearted hospitality of the people of Canada, we can truthfully say that in this country at least the worst is past.

In the light of the statements made in the house to-day by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply—to paraphrase this language, no one can truthfully say that in this country at least the worst is past—

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is a good speech.

Mr. FLEMING: —and in all charity to my hon. friend the Minister of Veterans Affairs one can only say that undoubtedly the minister's fidelity to reality was unable to withstand the torrent of his eloquence.

The over-all picture is not the only discouraging aspect of the report made to the house this afternoon by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. I do not profess to be able after his long review—a two-hour review—of housing conditions in Canada and government policy in relation thereto, to be able to make an analysis of it on the spot, but I comment on the fact, in relation to what I said earlier, that it is a sad situation when the first attempt to release that information is made now, after damming it up for four months. It would have been better to release the information in this long statement earlier, instead of attempting to hold it back until this two-hour presentation to-day.

The house will be disappointed, I believe, to find that while the minister speaks of the government's intention to encourage imports, he has not a word to say about trying to retain in Canada some of the building materials that are at present being exported. Not a word. We have been drumming on this subject in the house ever since the present House of Commons assembled in September last, and we have yet to hear the first word of encouragement on the question of retaining in Canada, for the use of Canadians constructing needed homes in the country, the building materials that are produced here.

But that is not all. I submit that we did not hear from the minister a presentation of any adequate policy for integrating the plans of the government now, whatever they may be, for construction to meet emergency needs with any proper long-range approach to the housing requirements of the country over a period of time.

It would be only a repetition of things I have said before to go into that situation at length; but it would be nothing but folly, nothing but a prodigal waste of public funds, if we did not have a far-sighted attempt on the part of the government to integrate our present efforts to meet the emergency aspects of the housing need with a proper long-range approach to the housing problems of the people. That means taking full account of the 325,000 sub-standard housing units in Canada which we were told by the Curtis commission two years ago existed and which unquestionably have increased in number since. I say, we have not heard anything in the way of a proper integration of effort or of a long-range approach to the question.

There is nothing but disappointment also for those people in Canada who have been looking for some provision of houses to rent. The minister said that the great bulk of construction in Canada carried on during the past year and at the present time has been the construction of housing for sale, whereas the present need in the country is the construction of houses for rent. What encouragement does he give to people who are looking for houses and who cannot afford to buy houses at present prices? There was not a word of encouragement from the minister, only discouragement.

Consider what the minister said in regard to Housing Enterprises Limited. The objective set for Housing Enterprises Limited at the beginning of the year was 6,000 units. That is what the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply said in an address he gave to the Canadian club of Toronto on April 15, 1946. He said:

> A new agency, Housing Enterprises Limited, sponsored by Canada's insurance companies, is now entering the field of low-rental housing, with a programme for 1946 of 6,000 units. This project will be most helpful towards meeting housing requirements in a field that has recently not been attractive to private investment.

[Mr. Fleming.]

He tells us to-day that Housing Enterprises Limited has reduced its objective to 3,400. It has slashed its programme by nearly one-half. We are not half way through the construction season of 1946, and already Housing Enterprises Limited has reduced its housing construction programme to the extent of nearly one-half. Not only is that a disheartening picture for those who are in need of houses to contemplate, but it is an admission of failure on the part of the government and in particular of the administration given by the Department of Reconstruction and Supply.

What is the national objective for the current fiscal year? The objective, we are told by the minister, is 50,000 to 60,000 housing units; toward the end of his remarks he said it was 60,000 housing units for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1947. He says that the number of units built in the first twelve months after V-E day, that is, ending May last, was 46,900, and the best that the government can ask the people of Canada to hope for is an improvement to the extent of 10,000 at the most, in the year ending March 31, 1947.

If that is the best the government has to offer the Canadian people, not only is it not good enough, but it is a confession of its own incompetence to cope with the problem. The sights of the government must be raised, because 60,000 housing units by March 31, 1947, will leave the situation much worse than it is now, and we shall have to face a deplorable condition before the coming winter has run its course. In the statement given by the minister to-day, this summary of stewardship, as he has described it, we have heard a confession of failure on the part of the government.

Mr. J. O. PROBE (Regina City): I listened for some two hours this afternoon to what should have been the report of the super-optimist who spoke to the House of Commons some time ago on the manner in which reconversion in this country was being effected to the satisfaction of Canadian citizens. I must confess that, after two hours of facts and statistics which I have no doubt eminently covered the subject of housing as it exists in Canada, I at least got the impression that we had been hearing, not the report of a super-optimist with regard to housing but rather an admission of the ineffectiveness of a plan that had been drawn up by some tired old gentleman.

It is not necessary for me at this stage to go into a large number of figures and statistics. They have been put on the record by all those who have spoken on the subject of housing. But the fact remains, regardless of statistics that have been presented here this afternoon by the Minister of Reconstruction on behalf of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, that there are not sufficient houses being built. That is the sum total of the criticism which citizens generally have to make, and which it is the duty of members of this house to bring forcibly to the attention of the minister, with every bit of energy they can summon.

I agree with the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) that the government was remiss in waiting four months after the session had begun before bringing down the report which the minister has presented to the house to-day. I suggest, however, that while the hon. member for Eglinton was drawing attention to the obvious fact that we are not building homes for the people of Canada, he should have gone a step further and indicated to the house just how the party to which he belongs would carry this ball. I do not think there was ever a more glorious opportunity for either the Liberal or the Conservative party in this house, the exponents of private enterprise, to demonstrate to us, who are simply socialists, how private enterprise could be made to work in this instance. I am sure that every member of this house and every person in the country must be in complete agreement on the necessity of constructing homes for the people of Canada. But how each individual could be made a little capitalist in his own little backyard, with a house which he could call his own, neither the policies of the present government nor those of hon. members to my right would indicate. They do not show how the individual can best become that private entrepreneur. As I say, that opportunity was missed. We are in definite agreement with respect to one thing. In every part of Canada we need more houses. All parties agree that we could use better houses than many of those in which citizens of this country live, including, by the way, members of the House of Commons, who are now living in Ottawa. I am also quite certain that most of us are in agreement that by some means or other we should be able to provide less expensive houses for the people who are expected to buy them and live in them. These are the points which I feel have been missed both by the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) and the hon. member who acted as critic for the Progressive Conservative party.

Once more I must draw this fact to the attention of the house. In spite of the fact that what the minister read was intended to be a glowing progress report, we have actually fallen behind on current demand for housing this year. We have fallen behind somewhere between twenty and thirty thousand units. According to the minister, we had the best building year since 1928. Even that statement would bear some inspection. I recall that last year I was interested in a project on Carling avenue in Ottawa which was sponsored by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie). There a project of veterans' houses was being undertaken. I remember that last fall we had a little difficulty in keeping one of the basement walls propped up. I went there recently to have a look at the houses. It is now a matter of ten months since the construction was undertaken and these houses are still not being used by the veterans for whom they were intended. On the basis of that and other projects that I have seen in other parts of Canada, I would judge that the 46,000 and some odd houses which were reported to have been built are definitely not finally completed.

While drawing attention to the fact that we have a large problem on our hands in providing houses for Canadian veterans, the Minister of Reconstruction, both in his statement and in the resolution which he has introduced for the consideration of the house, is, as I see it, not approaching the problem. To illustrate what I mean, I think we all agree that people in the upper income brackets are well able to look after their house-building under any financial or building supply difficulty. The people whose needs, whether for ownership of for rental, will not be met by any policy which the government is willing to undertake now are those in the low-income group.

Recently I had an interview with the president of Central Mortgage and Housing corporation where I acted on behalf of a housing group from my own city which wished to get moneys for the purpose of a fifty or sixty unit housing project in Regina, but they were definitely opposed to the present high interest rate of 4½ per cent which the terms of the National Housing Act demand. I went to the president of this government corporation to find out the reasons why a body which consisted of fifty or sixty wage-earners of the middle-income group, $2,000, $2,300 or $2,400 —persons who represent the better than average income group, certainly of my city, and who were equally responsible financially and as secure in terms of the bank as any of those puppets of the mortgage companies which have contracted to put up their three thousand odd houses this year—could not get loans. The president of Central Mortgage and Housing corporation told me that it was against the policy of the government, as he was instructed to administer it, to consider members of the cooperative housing association as being anything other than a group of individuals attempting individually and on their own security to secure loans under the National Housing Act. Therefore they could get no better terms than 4½ per cent.

I wish to draw the minister's attention to what they are doing across the border with respect to cooperative housing associations. Lest anyone think that the United States has gone socialist with respect to cooperatives, I desire to remind hon. members of the fact, which they already know, that the United States is still an exponent of private enterprise. Perhaps the difference is that they still believe they can put a little enterprise into this old machine. But they are willing to play ball with cooperative housing bodies. The housing act which came up last November, the Wagner, Ellender, Taft proposal provides assistance to non-profit corporations for mutual ownership housing, which would be eligible for ninety-five per cent of their loans with a forty-year maturity, and a maximum interest rate of 3½ per cent. The act foresees the possibility that the private mortgage companies might not care to play ball with cooperatives. Therefore it makes the provision that if private capital should not be available to mutual ownership corporations on these terms, then the federal national mortgage corporation is authorized to make the necessary loans. That is the way in which the mutual home ownership proposition is being handled in the United States. They have an interest rate which is lower than ours; they have an amortization period which extends to forty years. By their attitude toward cooperative home-owner groups they are adopting an attitude which has been recognized for years in Great Britain, Sweden, Denmark, the Netherlands and other enlightened countries.

If we are to build houses for our people—and I presume the minister is as sincere in that desire as any other hon. member—the minister must not let his personal or political prejudices blind him to the methods by which this can be done. If he is flexible, if he is a business man, when one procedure fails he should try another one which might have a chance to work. But I maintain that the present government are opposed to any cooperative form of building enterprise; they are definitely opposed to anything which is going to provide ownership to a low-income family at a decent, repayable amount. Of course the proof of the pudding is in the eating, and the fact is that the low-income people are definitely not getting houses.

[Mr. Probe.]

In the resolution the minister has brought in for the consideration of the house there are certain suggestions for the extension of the lending feature. For example, apparently he proposes to lend money for the construction of homes by those who have only a leasehold interest in the land, and his explanation this afternoon suggested that this would be for the purpose of building homes in public parks and elsewhere in the public domain. I venture to suggest that before the bill to be founded upon this resolution has run its course or is replaced we shall have a capitalist corporation lending its property on a leasehold basis to individuals who thereby may be tempted to build on corporation premises. Then, for one reason or another, this corporation eventually will have the down payment of the individual plus the property on which the home was originally constructed. It follows the old English practice whereby property was retained in the name of the landed aristocracy; I think it was called, "in entail".

Further, in the fourth section of this resolution the minister proposes to subsidize, again not the home-owner but large pulp and mining corporations, to perpetuate ghost towns paid for by the money of the people of Canada. I see several of these projects under way now along the Canadian Pacific main line between here and Fort William, and I venture to predict that if these companies are not already operating under some form of agreement with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to take over the risk of the projects, they will approach the minister after this resolution and the bill to be founded upon it are passed.

The minister has not shown, either by this resolution or in his address, that he has done anything to get the cost of materials down, or that he has taken positive action for the production of additional building material. I know this afternoon he gave us statistics showing that the production in April of this year was up some thirty per cent in some commodities as compared with April of last year, and so on all down the line; but the cold fact is that we are still not getting material in sufficient supply, that we still get letters from our constituents and others asking where the bottleneck is and what are the government doing about it. The right hon. minister gave no indication that he had taken any positive steps to remove any of these bottlenecks in supplies. Nor has he done anything to reduce the cost of these materials. As a matter of fact, material costs are continuing to increase.

In the two or three minutes remaining before six o'clock I should like to suggest to the minister that he extend the provisions of the National Housing Act in two important particulars. I am certain that a combination of these two extensions will bring about a considerable increase in the number of home-owners in this country. My first suggestion is that he permit cooperatives to be treated on the same basis as mortgage companies, so that they may borrow money at three per cent for construction purposes. The second suggestion is that he give the low-income groups an opportunity to become home-owners by combining a changed amortization principle with a reduction in the cost of money to the individual. The period of amortization should be extended to thirty or forty years. If we can lend money to Great Britain at two per cent, starting in 1949, there is no reason in the world why we cannot lend money at the same rate to Joe Doaks out in Regina or Vancouver or anywhere else. If we can do it in the one instance, if it is humanitarian and good business, then we can do it in the other instance.

I should like to give the house just one or two figures to indicate the approximate monthly repayment required on a loan of $3,000 at various rates of interest and over twenty-year, thirty-year and forty-year periods:

Approximate Monthly Repayments on $3,000 Loan

Interest rate per cent	20 years	30 years	40 years
1	$13 86	$ 9 69	$ 7 62
2	15 29	11 17	9 15
3	16 81	12 76	10 82
4	18 40	14 46	12 64
5	20 07	16 38	14 58

Three per cent is the present rate allowed to mortgage companies, and five per cent is just above the present National Housing Act rate. I want to warn the right hon. minister of what I am sure he must know, if he would only admit it and do something about it. That is, until you bring the cost of building materials down, by legislation if necessary, or by going into the business on a socialist basis as a government, and change the basis of amortization from twenty to thirty or forty years and at the same time reduce the interest rate, you will never have the citizens of Canada housed as they deserve to be.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. D. KING HAZEN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the amendments to the National Housing Act which are set out in general terms in the resolution which the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) moved this afternoon, in the course of his long and instructive speech, will result in relieving the housing shortage that has existed in this country for too long a time. The fact that these amendments are being made seems to me to be an admission on the part of the government that it has failed or has not been successful up to the present time in the efforts it has made.

It is not my intention to speak at any length this evening, but I want to bring to the attention of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply the fact that there exists in Saint John and vicinity, as well as in other urban centres in New Brunswick, an acute shortage of housing accommodation, which shortage works great hardship on the men who served in our armed forces and who are now endeavouring to reestablish themselves in civil life. A few days ago I received from Mr. L. W. Elster, secretary of the Saint John branch of the Canadian legion of the British empire service league a copy of a resolution which had been moved by Reverend W. C. V. Martin, seconded by A. E. Skaling, and carried unanimously at a meeting held on August 8. The resolution, which sets out clearly the situation that exists there reads as follows:

> Whereas Saint John branch No. 14 view with alarm the indifferent attitude of government bodies in providing low cost housing accommodation to fit the incomes of lower paid working men, among which are a large proportion of ex-service men.
> It is resolved, that we, the Saint John branch, do strongly demand that immediate action be taken by government authorities to relieve the appalling housing conditions under which ex-service personnel are now compelled to exist, which is poor compensation for the sacrifices they made, and the promises they were given for a better future for themselves and their children;
> And be it further resolved, copies of this resolution be forwarded to Prime Minister King, Reconstruction Minister Howe, D. King Hazen, M.P., dominion command, provincial command, Premier McNair and the mayor and common council, warden and councillors of the municipal council of the city and county of Saint John.

I recognize the fact that the dominion government cannot perform miracles, but it has held out certain hopes and made certain promises to our returned men and it is up to it to implement those promises.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, obviously this is a measure which can best be discussed in detail when the bill has been presented to us and we have had a chance to examine it before second reading, but it does seem to me that there are a few things that should be said at this time following the lengthy statement made by the minister this afternoon. In all fairness, it must be admitted that he did a good job of lining up the situation as it now stands, with respect to both the need that exists and the machinery that has been put into motion and amended from time to time by the present government to meet that need.

On the other hand, it did seem to me that the minister's statement was even a more hopeless one with respect to the future than even he admitted it to be. Certainly it was lacking in any vision and any sense of realization that this housing problem in Canada could be turned into a glorious opportunity to do something on a grand scale, something that would be really worth while for the people of Canada.

As I listened to the minister speaking this afternoon I made a good many notes, and as I looked over those notes afterward it struck me that the minister had made a good many admissions with respect to matters that are important and germane to this whole question. First of all, the minister recognized that there is in Canada an acute housing problem which at the present time, to use his own words, is worsening.

He recognized also that up to the present time, despite all the achievements for which he wished to claim credit, the problem has not been met. He was honest enough, as he went along with his speech, to refer to a number of points on which the machinery put into motion had not come up to the government's expectations or hopes. However, it was something to have had from the minister a frank recognition of a problem which requires the full-time attention of a minister who has achieved the reputation for energy which the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) has earned.

During the early part of his remarks the minister spent a good deal of time on the problem of housing materials and he indicated that he recognized the importance of materials in any programme for the building of houses. He indicated at least some of the steps the government had taken to try to improve the situation with respect to materials. In that part of his speech he dealt with the proposal to extend the time allowed for double depreciation and said that the government had taken action in other ways which would be indicated to us in greater detail at a later stage in the debate.

I strongly support the minister in his bringing to our attention and to the attention of the country the importance of the provision of housing materials in any programme of housing construction. It reminded me of an experience of mine, listening to a debate at Westminster on this housing problem. The government over there has taken really advanced steps to provide housing materials, recognizing that they are basic to the whole business of the building of houses themselves.

I was interested too in the minister's recognition of the important part that an adequate housing programme can play in providing employment. He gave interesting figures in relation to the number of men employed in certain sections of war industry and how it would require that number to carry on an adequate housing programme. As a matter of fact, it reminded me of things that some of us have had to say from time to time, namely, that this whole business of housing provides a glorious opportunity to the government of the day, to any government in power, to do two things: one, to meet the needs of our people for homes to live in and, two, to provide useful employment on a large scale.

I was interested in hearing the minister state his recognition of the need for training workers in the construction industry so that we might be properly prepared in the field of labour as well as in materials.

Another recognition that the minister gave us had to do with the necessity, to some extent at least, for the control of prices of houses. I believe that he made that point when he was referring in part to what appears in section 4 of the resolution before us. He made a statement to the effect that when one provides assistance for speculative building there must be control over prices so that the people of the country would not be exploited. It is good to have that need before us too.

The minister also, although very briefly, admitted to us—and this was one of the points where he admitted that the government's machinery had not done everything that it had hoped it would—that the needs of our rural population for housing somehow had not as yet received full consideration or attention. That was one subject on which the minister did not ask for unanimous consent to place any tables on Hansard, and we all have a pretty good idea why. Such tables, if presented, would show that there had been very little activity in that field, in fact almost none at all. The recognition of that leads to some of the proposed amendments in the resolution before us.

The minister also indicated that another bit of machinery instituted by this government had not fulfilled its purpose, namely, Housing Enterprises Limited, which represents the joint effort of the life insurance companies of Canada in the housing field. The minister's statement was to the effect that although a certain number of projects were under way and a certain number of units were being built—and he gave the figures—the rentals which Housing Enterprises Limited felt it necessary to charge were higher than one could regard as satisfying the demands of a low rental housing project. On that score the minister was frank enough to admit anxiety over a phase of the problem that concerns a good many of us.

The minister also referred to slum clearance, using a plausible argument, to the effect that nothing could be done about that now because of the need of retaining in use every housing unit that can be lived in at all. When some of us think of the conditions of some areas in Canada which are referred to as slums, we realize what a shameful admission that was for the minister to have to make, namely, that these dwelling units must continue to be used. It was an admission that there is a tremendous problem which thus far has not been touched at all by this government through its housing legislation.

Related to that, the minister had a reference in the closing part of his speech to the need for raising housing standards generally. He admitted that even after we overtake the actual deficit in the number of dwelling units which now plagues this country there is a real problem in terms of our desire for adequate Canadian standards of living, the need for raising the standards of the homes in which our Canadian people live.

So that we had set out before us in the speech of the minister, along with the analysis that he gave us of the present situation, a real target to aim at, not just a target in terms of so many units within the next one or two or four or five years, but a total target in the field of housing. As I was listening to his speech, I realized that here was a picture of a government being driven by force of circumstances to do something about housing. Here was a government, whether of its own volition or against its will, that was getting deeper and deeper into the housing business. For a moment I found myself thinking in terms that I sometimes speak in, that perhaps I could, in the course of this debate, refer in complimentary terms to the government for having moved along in this direction, even though only when forced to go there by the pressure of economic circumstances. But just when I was thinking in those semi-kindly terms of the minister I heard him say that all the things that he had spoken of indicated that the government had got deeply into the housing business, but that it was the government's desire to get out of it, that they wished to have less to do with it in the future than at the present time. That is the thing that annoys me most of all about the failure of the government really to get into this business with both feet and tackle this housing problem on the basis of a public housing authority giving proper assistance to the provinces and the municipalities.

I can sometimes forgive people and I might even forgive a government for not living up to things they never heard of, to ideals that never entered their minds; but here is a government that has come right up against the stark necessity of getting into the housing business, and that necessity has found the government willing to go into it to a certain extent in the machinery they have set up from time to time. They have moved along carefully, cautiously. As the last speaker said, this amendment and previous amendments that we have had from time to time in the government's housing policy are admissions of the failure of the government's initial proposals in the field of housing. Unlike my hon. friends to my right, who never would put the government into business if they could possibly avoid it, this government has got into the housing business because of the pressure of the needs of the people of Canada, and I suggest that, whatever its political philosophy may be, it had before it and still has before it, in this housing crisis and the dire need of our Canadian people for homes, a glorious opportunity really to go somewhere in raising the standards of our Canadian people.

The minister mentioned subsidies, but said: Oh, that must not be done. We get these proposals of assistance to the life insurance companies, these proposals for double depreciation, and all kinds of suggestions for government assistance in an indirect way; yet such a direct way as subsidies to make possible low-rental housing, such a direct way as all-out assistance to cooperative organizations or assistance to the provinces, the municipalities, or to public housing authorities—these things the government comes up against, sees them as possibilities, but instead of recognizing them as ideals to be pursued, shies away from them as though there were something poisonous about them.

I was interested in reading in one of the Ottawa papers to-day an editorial referring to our sister dominion of New Zealand and the ten-year plan which is now being presented in that country for a number of projects, including a house-building programme to be financed by the use of credit made available through the government-owned Bank of New Zealand. What interested me in that report was not just the means, the use of national credit which is to be employed, which I endorse whole-heartedly, but the whole appeal of a ten-year positive programme which looks toward many of the needs of the people. Our government, as I say, comes up against the ways and means of doing these things and then shies away from them. I hope that what the minister expressed as the desire of the government will not be realized, that they will not in the course of a year or so withdraw from such an extent as they have gone into the field of housing, but rather that as, during the past three or four years, they have been pushed by one economic circumstance and another into this field, they will go still farther, until we really have a public housing authority that is concerned, not about assistance to private lending institutions, to life insurance companies, and to private firms along the line of double depreciation, but rather with meeting the needs of the Canadian people in the actual business of providing homes.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, year after year since I have been in the house I have spoken on the subject of housing and the condition of houses in my riding in the city of Toronto, but I have never had much success, never had much sympathy from the government. Early in the war I saw what was going to happen. I remember bringing to the attention of the minister what should be done. We had big plants around the outskirts of Toronto, and at that time I suggested that we ought to have wartime housing put up there, but nothing was done about it. We had great numbers of people working in factories at De Havilland, Malton, Leaside, Dawes road and elsewhere, for whom housing was an urgent necessity. There was a great influx of people as a consequence. At the present time we find ourselves confronted with a crisis, and it is going to be difficult to do much about it. The lack of wartime housing in these places has accentuated the difficulties which we have in Toronto.

What I rose to comment upon was something said by the minister this afternoon to the effect that he had taken off the priorities in connection with certain types of building. He said he thought that was a good thing. Well, I do not think it is a good thing. What he actually did was to pass the buck to the municipalities. It is all very well to say that the city of Toronto have control as regards all the houses and other buildings to be built in Toronto, but they have not control to the same extent as the government has. The government knows what is necessary. We know we need houses.

Here is the situation. Permits for the city of Toronto are up some $2,898,000; at the end of June they stood at $7,982,000 as compared with $5,084,000. The building applications which have been received and on which construction has not been started cover 289 structures, of an estimated value of $10,067,000. What are all these? One thing the government can tell us is whether they are necessary or not. There is a plastics factory, $264,000; another factory, $125,000; and may I say it seems peculiar to me that, with all these surplus structures formerly used as war plants, it is necessary to have these new buildings. We have also another office building at $580,000; and I admit that we need office space. But there is a government warehouse at $850,000, with all these war buildings around the city going for a song. We have also a bank building, $3 million. I want as much as anybody to see a bank building put up in Toronto, but I want to see houses built first of all. Then there is another office building, $482,000. Then we have $920,000 for four theatres. All these buildings require material and workmen, and it is mainly the shortage of workmen which makes it difficult to get houses built. Yet another warehouse, $161,000. An apartment building—which we probably need—to cost $133,000. Another factory, $150,000—as I said before, with factory buildings all around the city being given away for a song. Two more factory buildings, at $350,000 and $150,000 respectively; a garage, $120,000; why? Another theatre, $140,000; yet another theatre, $115,000. There is no justification for this kind of building when people need houses to live in, and these theatres take considerable material and employ a good many men. Another factory, $140,000; an industrial building, $100,000.

The whole thing does not "add up"; that is all. What do we want more theatres for? We need houses. We want people to put those houses up, and the material which is going into theatres should be going into those houses.

I should also like to know whether these factories and theatres get priority on the wrought iron pipe which is so necessary for construction purposes. Is it to be understood that they can get plumbing fixtures, the necessary wiring, and the men to instal them when house-builders cannot? As I say, the thing just does not add up. The city of Toronto cannot control the situation; it is a bigger job than they can be expected to handle. It is true that a certain amount of material is allocated to the metropolitan district. I speak only for the city of Toronto, but I know also that in the surrounding district quite a number of theatre buildings are going up at the present time, though we do not need them, and the people need houses.

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I feel obliged to say a few words about these amendments to the various housing measures, because, like my colleague, the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross), whose riding adjoins mine, my riding is in the centre of the city, and we are divided by Yonge street. My constituency is on the east side and goes over as far as the Don river, and the area contains one of the most congested districts in the city. The hardship which exists to-day, the human suffering which results from this housing shortage, is quite sufficient to make the most callous-minded individual fight to the very last for anything that can be done to alleviate this crying need for houses. Not only does it affect the ordinary individuals, but it affects a great many veterans who were away from this country for five or six years, during which interval what vacancies there were were taken up by other people, munitions workers and others, who came to this city, and when the returned men came home they found there was no place for them to lay their heads, much less provide a decent home for their wives and children.

As far as they go, the amendments which the right hon. minister has suggested are probably very good. We have not yet had very much time to analyse them, but I assume, knowing his ability along certain lines, that they are undoubtedly an aid to the solution of this great problem. The question is, do they go far enough, and will they do even half a job? As he said, last year some 47,000 dwellings were built in Canada or reconverted. But that is a very small number considering the total need for housing, when there is a deficit throughout the country of about 700,000 units. Even if we cut that in two and call it 350,000, we still have an appalling shortage of dwelling units. As the minister said, the contribution last year was not inconsiderable. But these are not high words from any minister of the crown in describing the efforts of his department, and I feel very sorry to hear him say that in the fall of this year conditions will worsen, because people who can do with makeshift accommodation during the summer months, living in summer cottages and non-weather-proofed dwellings, cannot continue to live in such places during the cold winter months.

I should like to read a few cases reported in the Globe and Mail as at July 3, so as to give the house some indication of how the housing shortage is affecting people in cities like Toronto. An interviewer called on the welfare department, central bureau, in Toronto where the necessitous cases are listed, and at the present time there are some 6,000 cases listed there. There is no decent place for these applicants. This is the type of case that exists:

> Shortly after the office opened yesterday, a young man came in with his wife and three children. He had been almost five years overseas, and since his return they had been living in rented rooms. But the landlord had been objectionable and eventually had forced them out. They lived briefly in a tourist cabin, but could not afford to pay $6 a night. The husband appealed for help and a room was found for them in a Mutual street house.

That is in the Moss park area of the city where conditions cannot be described as at all good. There is overcrowding and the condition of the houses is little short of shocking in many cases, because most of them are extremely old and in want of repair.

> They will remain there until more permanent accommodation can be arranged.

When that will be, no one knows. Certainly at the present rate of progress it will be a very long time, and certainly a time which can well be measured in years for the typical case. Let us take another:

> A woman brought in her two young girls. They were without a place to stay and had spent the night in an automobile. They were given accommodation.
> A man with lengthy overseas service asked that some help be given him in finding rooms for his family. He, his wife and two children were in two rooms. One child was required to sleep in the hall. A moment later, he was followed to the inquiry desk by a family of four. They had been living in one room. Another man reported that the landlord was trying to force him out illegally by threats and abuses. He wanted protection and help in finding a new home.
> The day was not an exceptionally heavy one, explained Frank Dearlove, the department's housing director. There were almost fifty inquiries from people in desperate circumstances.

These are typical of conditions in the centre of Toronto and, I dare say, typical of conditions in many of our large urban centres. If the minister were attacking this problem in a way in which we could see some relief, if not in the immediate future, at any rate within the period of a few years, I should not feel called upon to take up the time of the house. But the suggestions which he has made, while worthy as far as they go, do not seem to me to reach the heart of the problem in any manner whatsoever.

I am interested, as I am sure the great majority of members are, in making sure that the economic system under which we operate, which we know can be extremely productive, as was proved during the war years, when we made such a notable contribution in materials and supply, shall function properly; and if there is an acute housing shortage at the present time, as there seems to be, that system cannot be said to be operating with that degree of satisfaction which the people have a right to expect. Indeed, I wonder that the people have stood for such hardships as they have had to bear through no fault of their own. They were willing and capable workers; and during the depression years, when the present government was in power, they put up with privations which I am quite sure, had I been in public life at that time, I should not have been willing to see them put up with. I should have done everything in my power, no matter what the financial cost might be, to make sure that they were given sufficient housing and food.

May I suggest to the minister that during the long period of the thirties, as he himself intimated this afternoon, there was little building going on. The building industry was starved during the depression. During the war years it was of necessity starved because we could not afford men for the building industry and for war production and we had men overseas at the same time. The result is that the building industry to-day is in decidedly low gear, and very little has been done to change gears, under any recommendations or laws which the minister has put on the statute book. Something more drastic needs to be done at the present time.

The building trades were likewise in an unsatisfactory condition. Work was exceedingly scarce. In my own riding, even in 1940, there were no less than 10,000 forced to accept relief; and on inquiry, going about the riding, one found that many of the men connected with these families were in the building industry. But there was no work for bricklayers, carpenters, plumbers, decorators, and so on. There was stagnation in the building industry, and nothing has been done since that time to arouse the industry out of that stagnation. I recall a case recently of an uncle advising his young nephew, who was about to embark on his life's career. The uncle had been a carpenter and he warned the nephew against going into the building trade. He said, "Don't become a carpenter; the work is too unsteady. See what happened to me during the depression. There is no assurance that work will be provided for a period of years." The result is that no young man will go into the industry in view of the hardships which those who were in the industry had to endure during the depression years.

Something should be done to make certain that the building industry, which is, of course, in this country a seasonal one, is put on a firmer basis than it has ever known; otherwise we are not likely to recruit enough young men to fill up the vacancies in the trade. And we must fill up those vacancies if we are to get on with the job.

Another problem to which I wish the minister would give some consideration, because it certainly calls for a solution as far as the long-range approach is concerned, is this: Even in the more prosperous days when workmen were steadily employed they did not find that they could afford to buy houses for themselves. One of the best reasons I have heard given for that is that, owing to the fact that the building trade is a seasonal one and the number of working days relatively short out of the total year, the rate of wages is of necessity high in order that the building tradesmen may get enough to live on during the entire year. If the rate of pay is high, then the ordinary workman who gets perhaps half or three-quarters as much per hour cannot afford to buy the product of the better rate paid building tradesmen. Some study should be given to this problem so that the ordinary workman may exchange his work for that of the building tradesman.

During the war other industries took from the building trades and the building supply industries all the available workmen they could get in order to build aeroplanes and to turn out the other necessary munitions of war. When the wage freezing order came into effect most of the workmen who were engaged in the building trades, such as brickmakers and others engaged in the building supply industry, had their wages frozen at low levels, whereas those who went into the war industries received new levels of wages, because higher wages were necessary to attract people from one industry to another. There have been some slight modifications of the low wages paid to some of these people in the building industries, but not enough really to attract a sufficient number of men into the building trades and the building supply industries to get these industries going at a rate which is necessary if we are to solve this problem.

May I point out that there are other industries in Canada, valuable industries, some of which are engaged in the export end of our economy, and which bring in valuable United States dollars. I refer in particular to the newsprint industry which has greatly expanded its production during recent years. In a clipping from a newspaper I find the following:

With Canadian newsprint mills operating at 92·8 per cent of capacity in March, compared with 92·8 in the previous months and 70·2 per cent in March, 1945, newsprint production expanded to a new high level, according to figures released by the Newsprint Association of Canada.

Further on, it has this to say:

This brought production in the first three months of 1946 to 970,923 tons compared with 768,203 in the first quarter of 1945, an increase of 26·4 per cent.

That is splendid increase, a splendid contribution to the Canadian economy and to the bringing in of needed United States exchange, but I do not think the newsprint industry should be given a priority of that kind. The industry was not badly treated during the war. The newspapers had adequate supplies of newsprint, particularly when one compares them with other countries, not the United States, but overseas countries and I do not think any of us suffered because of the size of our newspapers. The point I am making is that the same men who cut down the trees which are ground into pulp to become newsprint could also be used to cut down trees to make more lumber to help in the building of our houses. I believe that the government is derelict in its duty in allowing an industry of this kind, valuable as it is, to expand to a considerable extent when a great deal of the manpower required to turn out the raw product could be used to turn out more lumber, which is badly needed. I should be glad if the minister would point out any flaw in this argument, because it seems relatively simple to me. In most of the areas, not all, where wood pulp is found there are also trees which are also suitable for lumber, and the same lumberjacks could do the same job in cutting down the larger trees as they could in cutting down small trees for newsprint.

From my observations I believe that the effect of the income tax is a bad one so far as getting houses built is concerned. We find that building tradesmen will not work more more than a five-day week; certainly they will not work on Saturday mornings or afternoons because they get into overtime and into a higher income tax bracket. I believe that is one of the reasons why we have not as many man hours in the building industry as we should have. It would not be asking too much if I asked for the sympathy of the minister in this regard. I hope that he will endeavour to bring some influence on his colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and point out to him that we are not getting the maximum output from our present supply of building tradesmen that we might get, and goodness knows the supply of building tradesmen is scanty enough. The exemptions for income tax purposes of $750 for single men, and $1,500 for married men under the new provisions are not adequate to have a carpenter, a plumber or a bricklayer do his utmost to get houses built because the incentive is taken away from him.

The effect of the corporation tax is also not conducive to the greatest efforts in regard to building. Then salary controls enter into the picture. We have an industry which I have endeavoured to show has been in low gear for at least a decade, and the men connected with it who are employed by building companies were on a low salary scale because the industry could not afford them an adequate return or one which would ordinarily be considered fair. From my observations there is no doubt that if some of these men were allowed to get more, greater production would result, and what is more important, more men of executive capacity, foremen and up, would be induced to come into the building industry.

The minister has pointed out that double depreciation is available to certain of the building supply companies. That is a help. I believe he is not only on the right track but that he should do more along these lines for the next five years until we get over the hump in the building shortage.

I understand that under the Wyatt plan in the United States the building supply companies which exceed their production of the previous year are given a bonus on that additional production in order to stimulate them to work overtime and to think out plans at night to get production going in the best possible way.

I should like to ask the minister what happened to the appropriation which was mentioned by one of his departments two years ago under which a certain sum was set aside for the buying en masse of household utilities such as bathtubs. A supplier would be given an order for five thousand, and he could go ahead with the job, rather than be given an order for a few dozen of this type or that type of bathtub and not be able to get a real line of production going. There was an appropriation along these lines, but I have not heard anything about it for a long time. If more government assistance of that type is required it should be forthcoming, because it is the duty of the government to make the present system operate so that our people will not suffer from the acute housing shortage.

Another matter to which I should like to direct the minister's attention is the price ceiling on builders' supplies. Builders of Toronto tell me that they can get some supplies but not others. There is an acute shortage of some vital part because the manufacturer finds he can get some return on his investment if he makes X parts but cannot get any return on his Y parts, so that he concentrates on the X parts. Consequently these shortages and bottlenecks occur in the building supplies industry. The present price ceiling system has also given rise to black markets in the lumber trade. There are certainly black markets, and there are evasions which may not quite infringe the law but which come very close to doing so. These all make for needless work and difficulties in obtaining the necessary materials to go ahead.

I wish to bring to the attention of the minister another matter which certainly many hon. members might not consider to be politically expedient for anyone to mention, but it is this. In order to build houses, someone must put up the capital required. The man who does this naturally expects at least some return on his money; yet we find that under the rental freezing order of October, 1941, all rentals were fixed at the level then prevailing. If the dwelling unit had not been rented at that time a new rental was fixed which in most cases was substantially higher for the floor space involved. Let me give an example so that the house will understand precisely what I am aiming at. In some of the higher class residential districts of the city will be found apartments consisting of three rooms with kitchen or kitchenette and bath, available for $45 and $55 a month, which is a very low rate considering the residential area in which they are located. Then, in the poorer districts will be found dwelling units which were not rented prior to the freezing order—if I may describe what I came across as a dwelling unit. A veteran and his wife paid $30 a month for one room and the joint use of a kitchen. Compare that with the well-to-do person in the high-class apartment, and there is no fair relationship whatever. I am suggesting to the minister that inasmuch as landlords' costs have also gone up, some slight alleviation should be allowed, even though it be only five or ten per cent on the basic rentals under the freezing order. Otherwise those who have their capital invested in commitments of this kind find they are not getting any return. The increased cost of supplies, janitor service and so on is eating heavily into their rentals; and landlords, or those who might become landlords, are not encouraged to put their money into buildings.

I would also point out to the minister that while some of the suggestions I have made might result in higher costs, since they include higher wages to attract men into the building industry, and since in order to speed up the production of building supplies these tradesmen may have to get more, that is not necessarily the whole picture. We do not want the veteran particularly, or for that matter anyone, to acquire a house at the present time at an inflated level. Therefore I suggest that in addition to the financial measures the minister mentioned this afternoon the government might well give consideration to a further cut in the interest rate on the loans which go to finance these dwelling units. If the rate were cut to perhaps three per cent the minister would find that over a long period of years during which the cost of the house is amortized, with the lower interest cost which bulks as a large part of the total, the monthly cost to the purchaser would be substantially reduced.

I want the minister and the government to look upon the housing crisis at the present time just as they looked upon the war emergency. If it were a question of making tanks or aeroplanes or bombs to beat Hitler, with the ability the right hon. minister showed during the war—and, may I say, with an unlimited pocketbook—we must forget some of these financial considerations to some extent until we get over this crisis—if he would look upon this housing crisis as an emergency I have no doubt he would find the men and materials in fairly short order to solve the problem which faces our people at the present time. If he will go and meet the people who are up against it he will realize that this problem constitutes a crisis of the first order. Therefore I suggest, sir, that the proposals made by the minister this afternoon are not adequate; they are not of a sufficiently long-term nature really to solve this crisis. I suggest further that the government is not giving the forceful, immediate leadership required if we are to have any solution of this problem in the next one or two or three years. To wait five or ten years is to wait too long.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. FLEMING: There are some questions I should like to ask the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. First, in the target of 60,000 houses which he set for the current fiscal year, he did not indicate how that was broken down among the various agencies, private enterprise, Wartime Housing Limited, Housing Enterprises Limited, and so on, except that he gave a figure of 3,400 as the programme for Housing Enterprises Limited for the calendar year. Would the minister be good enough to indicate how the 60,000 figure is broken down, according to the estimates of the department? I might point out that when the minister gave his estimate last fall it was broken down in that way.

Mr. HOWE: I am sorry I have not before me a copy of my own figures; but, as I recall it, about 15,000 are under construction at the present time under one or other of the government-assisted plans and subject to priority. The other 45,000 are being built privately, without government assistance. I think that is about the proportion.

Mr. FLEMING: May we take it, then, that about 11,000 or 11,500 are to be built under government assistance other than Housing Enterprises Limited?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, at least that number; I would think more.

Mr. FLEMING: Of those to be built by Wartime Housing Limited, is the minister in a position to indicate how many are being constructed with cellars and how many without?

Mr. HOWE: I believe there are only three or four projects with full basements, of which three are in the city of Toronto and one in the city of Ottawa. The basement adds $7 a month to the rent, and there are not many cities that want to pay the extra cost. Wartime Housing Limited is just as willing to build a basement under a house as not, provided that it can get a return on the investment.

Mr. FLEMING: I do not wish to monopolize the floor, Mr. Chairman, because these questions are not interrelated, but if no one else has any questions to ask, perhaps I might continue. As to the figure the minister gave this afternoon of completed houses, is the committee to understand that those are houses completed and occupied?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. FLEMING: Sometimes there is some misunderstanding as to what the completion of a house consists of. May we take it that these are houses completed and occupied?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. FLEMING: And that figure of 46,900 includes reconversions?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, though I believe the reconversion figures for 1946 are very small. I think the figures I gave are practically all those of Wartime Housing Limited, which at that time had not been handling reconversions. According to this schedule, the house must be completed in every particular and the lag between the report of full completion and occupancy is seldom more than a day or two.

Mr. FLEMING: Is the government keeping any statistics of houses occupied? I asked some questions a while ago, and the answers seemed to indicate that the government is not keeping any statistics of actual occupation. The estimates of completion do not necessarily take account of occupation.

Mr. HOWE: Every week a report is put on my desk showing the position of each project in each locality, the number of houses completed and the number of houses occupied. I have been interested in observing that the lag between houses completed and houses occupied is quite small. We have full statistics and I shall be glad to bring them.

Mr. FLEMING: This afternoon the minister referred to priorities as regards veterans' housing and the reduction in the requirements as to progress from seventy-five to fifty per cent under a recent order. What additional priorities are in effect besides that type of priority and those which exist in connection with Wartime Housing Limited and Housing Enterprises Limited?

Mr. HOWE: There are the priorities in connection with integrated housing where a contractor proceeds under a government plan with a guaranteed selling price. There is a guarantee by the government that if he does not sell the house the government will buy it at the predetermined price.

Mr. FLEMING: What degree of cooperation has existed between the Department of Reconstruction and Supply and wartime prices and trade board with respect to the fixing of prices for materials? As the hon. member for Rosedale indicated to-night, this matter of price ceilings on building materials has been a thorny subject. I need not remind the minister that a great many producers have been complaining bitterly about the domestic ceilings on building products and have indicated that they prefer to send more of their products abroad where the prices yielded to them are not under ceilings. I should like to know what cooperation there is between the minister's department and the prices board, because to many people it seems that there is a divergence of policy between them.

Mr. HOWE: Wartime prices and trade board and the Department of Reconstruction and Supply work very closely together. I mentioned this afternoon that the building coordination is handled by a committee of which the director of priorities in the department of reconstruction is a member, of which the corresponding officer in the wartime prices and trade board is a member and of which the coordinator of housing is the third member. A great deal has been said in this house about pricing interfering with production, but I have never known of a concrete case and I think I am closer to the industrial life of this country than anyone in this house, or perhaps anyone outside the house. I wish someone would give me a concrete case where price ceilings have limited production.

Mr. MERRITT: It does not encourage greater production.

Mr. HOWE: Surely with his great knowledge of this business the hon. member will be able to tell me of one case.

Mr. MERRITT: I can give one case just offhand in British Columbia in connection with the making of lath. The profit in making lath is not as great as that to be made in producing other types of lumber, so that there is a shortage of lath and a black market has been growing up in Vancouver.

Mr. HOWE: Does the hon. member know of any lumber operator who is not producing all the lumber he can?

Mr. MERRITT: I know of no lumber operator who is not producing all the lumber he can, but I know of a large number of lumber operators who are making their cuts according to the different types of lumber on which they can make the most money.

Mr. HOWE: Is there anything wrong with that?

Mr. MERRITT: They are not producing other types of lumber which may be equally necessary in the construction of homes but which it is not economical to produce. As a general example, I would refer to a recent situation which has been created by a change in the price of logs and in the Canadian export quota of lumber. Certain mill owners would find it actually more profitable to sell what logs they have on hand at the higher price rather than to manufacture them into lumber.

Mr. HOWE: What would the man who bought the logs manufacture? Can my hon. friend tell me of a case where production is being curtailed by unbalanced prices?

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. MERRITT: If the minister will not interrupt me I shall complete what I was going to say. Under this new regulation we have the interesting situation where there is a price ceiling on lumber and no price ceiling on logs. A $6 increase in the price of logs would make it possible for the mill owner to sell what logs he had on hand and make a better profit than if he manufactured those logs in his mill and sold the product on the open market. I do not say that the mill owners are going to do that, because obviously they have their good will to obtain and must keep their mills going. They are not going to go out of business. I am not saying that the price ceiling is likely to reduce materially the present level of production, but the way the present system of price control has worked it will prevent any great increase in production to meet this emergency.

Mr. HOWE: I would point out to my hon. friend that never in the history of Canada has there been such an increase in the production in every line that is occurring from day to day. If he has followed the increase in the production of building materials during the last six months he will find that there has been nothing like it in the history of Canada. It is all very well to make sweeping statements that are reminiscent of the old days to which the hon. member who recently spoke is quite fond of referring, but it is another thing to give one specific example of curtailment of production which has been due to failure to get a fair price from the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. MERRITT: I was speaking only on the spur of the moment.

Mr. HOWE: I did not hear one example in my hon. friend's statement of an over-all lack of production. A man may buy logs from an operator who would rather sell his logs, but he must make them into lumber. I do not know what else he could do with them because he is not allowed to export them. I do not think it makes any great difference whether the first or the second man makes them into lumber.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Would that be true in connection with the manufacture of hardwood?

Mr. HOWE: As far as I know.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I was told by the manager of one of the largest lumber companies in the west that he was informed by the mills from which he was getting lumber that they were not going to produce any more hardwood flooring until they got a higher price and until the excess profits tax was taken off.

Mr. HOWE: I never heard of it. The production of hardwood flooring is quite satisfactory. It was down a few months ago but it is much better to-day. I know of no particular hold-up in hardwood flooring.

Mr. JOHNSTON: They tell me in Calgary that there is absolutely no $\frac{13}{16}$ oak flooring coming in at all, and there has not been any for nearly a year.

Mr. HOWE: Will my hon. friend tell me where $\frac{13}{16}$ oak flooring is produced in this country?

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am asking the minister if that is true in the case of oak flooring?

Mr. HOWE: Oak is imported. I do not know of any oak trees in this country.

Mr. GREEN: I have three or four questions to ask the minister. In his statement this afternoon he said on several occasions that he was trying to help private enterprise in every way possible to develop this building programme; that he relied on private enterprise primarily for the building of homes in Canada. I think in that he was quite sound, and that when this crisis is all over it will be found that the vast majority of the homes built have been built by private enterprise. But is there not a danger that the priorities in supplies as now set will greatly discourage the private builder? For example, the minister pointed out this afternoon that there is a priority for Wartime Housing Limited and I think he said also for Housing Enterprises Limited, and of course also for homes being built under the Veterans Land Act. The result of all that is that in Vancouver the private builder is under a great handicap in getting materials. There are perhaps hundreds of houses there that are not being completed because the builder cannot get the materials he requires. Is there not some way in which the priorities can be changed so that there will be a more even distribution of the supplies?

The minister said that later in the year he hoped to change these priorities so that the private builder could get more material than he is getting now. I think the present plan is working a hardship on the small builder. Take, for example, the small lumber yard. I know of several that have been closed up, practically put out of business. Whether that will be their permanent condition or not I do not know.

Mr. HOWE: Give me the names of one or two.

Mr. GREEN: I was told that by one of them when I was in Vancouver a couple of weeks ago.

Mr. HOWE: The retail lumber yards have never made as much money in their history as they have in the last year. I cannot imagine why they would close down.

Mr. GREEN: If the minister checks he will find that many retail lumber yards in Vancouver are doing practically no business at all, that they are practically out of business.

On the question of priorities, I think there should be a change made if we are to bring about the result we are all after, which is more completed houses. At the present time there are hundreds of houses that are only half built.

Mr. HOWE: The government gives priority to Wartime Housing Limited, to Housing Enterprises Limited and to integrated housing.

Mr. GREEN: The integrated business is a very small part.

Mr. HOWE: No, it is a very big thing. Any contractor building a group of houses can qualify for integrated housing, if he will limit the selling price of his house to a spread which the government considers fair. In return he gets a guarantee that if he cannot sell the house at the price agreed upon, the government will buy it from him. If he will accept that profit limitation, he can get priority. He must also accept the restriction that he will sell only to a veteran of the last war. If he will do that any contractor can come under the integrated housing plan and get the priorities under P.O.11.

Mr. GREEN: How many men have done that in Canada?

Mr. HOWE: I think between 4,000 and 5,000 houses are being built under that plan.

Mr. GREEN: By how many contractors?

Mr. HOWE. A great number of contractors. A contractor will put up perhaps twenty-five to fifty houses, and there are about 4,000 of these houses. It is a common method of operating. But of course a good many contractors will say: I will not take $300 to build a house; I want $1,000 or $1,500. If they do, they are on their own and do not get the priorities. Some of them do not like the restriction as to selling to a veteran. They want to sell to whom they like, and therefore they do not qualify. But I think the amount of material that is under priority is not sufficient to handicap greatly a man who has no priority.

Of course, if everybody had priority it would not be any good at all. It would be just like extending the civil service preference now applicable to veterans to everybody.

Mr. GREEN: I did not suggest that.

Mr. HOWE: No, I know my hon. friend did not, but I am simply pointing out that if everybody got priorities there would be no priorities. We are attempting to assist a class of people whose building will be most beneficial to the returned man; in other words, those who are putting up low-rental housing or housing to be sold with a profit limitation, all of which are for veterans exclusively. For these types of housing we do give a priority. They probably amount to twenty-five per cent of all the houses being built.

Mr. GREEN: Conditions may be different in different cities; I have no doubt they are, but I am sure most veterans would go to a contractor to have a home built. If they did that, they would not get the help of these priorities?

Mr. HOWE: Not unless the contractor was under the integrated plan.

Mr. GREEN: I can quite understand that many contractors do not want to be tied up with all the red tape involved in dealing with governmental authority, making all these returns, having inspections, and so on. Has the minister any plan in mind for changing the priorities later this year? I think he said something to that effect this afternoon.

Mr. HOWE: We have one other type of priority which I have mentioned before. That is, if a veteran goes ahead and makes his own arrangements, starts a house, gets it seventy-five per cent completed, and needs only certain materials to finish it which do not amount to more than twenty-five per cent of the cost of the house, he is placed under a priority for these items. I said that we hoped to lower the contents which would permit us to give priorities for the remainder, and we have now lowered that amount to fifty per cent. If a veteran has his house framed, and with a roof on, we will give him priorities for all material that he needs from there on. The reason we require him to have a substantial investment in the house, if he is proceeding on his own, outside any government plan is that we know from experience that every house that is started will be started by a veteran, and we want to make sure that it is bona fide owned by a veteran.

Mr. GREEN: I would suggest that the minister have his department look into this priority question again.

[Mr. Howe.]

My second point has to do with allotments of building materials. I understood the minister to say this afternoon that there are quotas for different towns, the idea being that Vancouver would get her share, Halifax her share, Ottawa her share, and so on. That, I think, is quite fair. But is there any plan for ensuring a fair distribution between contractors within the same area, say within the city of Ottawa?

Mr. HOWE: Contractors buy from dealers, and all we can do is assure reasonable distribution among dealers and a reasonable distribution between one area and another.

Mr. GREEN: What does the minister mean by "fair distribution among dealers"? How high up are they; that is, how far away from the ultimate buyer?

Mr. HOWE: The dealers?

Mr. GREEN: Yes.

Mr. HOWE: The lumber we work as of a certain date. If the sales of a yard in the trial period were a certain amount they would be increased proportionately if more material is available, and reduced proportionately if less material is available.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any plan whereby, say a lumber yard in Vancouver gets a certain proportion of the lumber available for that area?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; if he was in business in the trial period, which I believe was 1941, the allocation would be based on the amount allocated to him in 1941.

Mr. GREEN: Who does that allotting?

Mr. HOWE: The wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. GREEN: I am quite sure that that system is not working out in that way now in Vancouver. There is supposed to be an allotment among dealers in proportion to the supplies they were buying in 1941?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister have that checked?

Mr. HOWE: Would the hon. member have it checked? It is easier for him than for me. I have to check the whole country.

Mr. GREEN: The information I have is that it is not being done. I realize that it is the wartime prices and trade board that is to blame, perhaps, that it is not the Minister of Reconstruction, but I suggest that he find out just what is wrong in that regard.

The third question has to do with the types of houses. The other day in the special committee on veterans affairs Mr. Van Norman, an architect who has just returned from Great Britain, gave evidence in which he explained that over there they had worked out types of houses which could be put up most economically as regards both price and material. Is anything of that sort being done in Canada? It may be that we shall have to adopt some new type of house in order to meet the requirements; is any planning of that type being done in the provinces or here at Ottawa?

Mr. HOWE: Well, the planning of wartime houses has been under constant study and review from the day the first house was built. I think we have been exceedingly fortunate in the types of plan we have chosen for wartime housing. I think the Vancouver house has been altered six times, each time an improvement at lower cost. The hon. member speaks of Mr. Van Norman, the architect. Mr. Van Norman is one of the architects engaged in veterans housing.

Mr. GREEN: I do not mean, on the government projects; I mean, for ordinary building. Most of the homes in Canada are going to be built by private builders. Has anything been done to help find a standard type of house for them which can be built, perhaps, a good deal cheaper than houses are built now, and with less material? Mr. Van Norman explained to us how in Great Britain they have it worked out so that they have a standard cut of lumber, for example, which can be used in many different houses and brings about a great saving. Is there any branch under the minister which does planning of that type, that is, trying to work out a more up-to-date house for the Canadian people?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. The national research council have an active department. They have put out interesting publications; in fact I think they have a monthly publication which shows suggested improvements in housing. We have in Canada two or three pre-cut designs which are available to builders if they wish. Of course a pre-cut design is valuable only if a great number of units are to be built from the same design. The private builder is usually trying to carry out the wishes of his prospective purchaser rather than to work on a pre-designed plan. So that I think the pre-designed planning is confined largely to government agencies. But it is available to anyone who cares to use it.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Van Norman said, if I remember correctly, that we are still building the type of house that we had a hundred years ago, that the fundamental plan for a house in Canada is the same now as it was many years ago, that we are not really as up to date with houses as we might be.

The final question has to do with the price of lumber, about which there was some discussion a few minutes ago. Why is it that there is a ceiling retained on lumber when the ceiling was taken off logs? As I understand it, there is now no ceiling at all on the price of logs, whereas it has been kept on lumber. I cannot understand just why it has been worked out in that way, because I am told by different people who are in the business, and who are entirely reliable and know what they are talking about, that in some cases the logs are worth more than the lumber. They are able to make up for that to a degree by selling a portion of their production in the export market; that is the way they have been getting around the trouble. But what consideration has been given to lifting the ceiling on lumber? We are told that lumber is really a capital expenditure, not like the purchase of food or clothing, and there is quite a strong feeling that there would be far more lumber produced if the ceiling were lifted. I do not know whether that is correct or not: the minister has his own officials who, I have no doubt, have gone into this question carefully. But would he explain the position to us?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend advocates the lifting of the ceiling on lumber.

Mr. GREEN: Now just a minute: I did not advocate it. I am asking the minister a question.

Mr. HOWE: What the effect would be?

Mr. GREEN: What the department thinks about lifting the ceiling on lumber.

Mr. HOWE: The price would go up around $20 a thousand, at least fifty per cent. If the ceiling were lifted, the price of a house would go up perhaps $600 to $1,000.

Mr. GREEN: They say it might go up $100 or $200.

Mr. HOWE: It would go up much more than that if the increase in price is what I think it would be. Lumber is being sold freely for export at $15 to $20 a thousand more than it is being sold for in the domestic market.

The reason that we took the ceiling off logs was that we are not particularly interested in the price of logs. Logs are not a consumer article. The finished lumber is the consumer article. Frankly, it was reported to me that there was such a black market in logs that the ceiling meant very little in any event, the buyers being the mills. We can control the price of finished lumber, and we do that exactly in the same way that there is no ceiling on beef cattle; there is a ceiling on beef. It is quite usual in price control to put the control on the finished article.

Mr. GREEN: There is one very unfair feature about it, and that is that the big company which produces logs and also cuts lumber has an advantage over the small sawmill which has to buy the logs at a high price and then sell the lumber under a ceiling price; that may very well drive some of the small sawmills in our province out of business.

Mr. HOWE: Unless the logs are bought and sawn into lumber the price of logs will not be quite so high.

Mr. GREEN: But the big man has his own logs; he does not have to buy logs.

Mr. HOWE: But somebody pays these excessive prices for logs.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to ask the minister a few questions bearing directly on the resolution before us. First of all, with respect to section 1 of the resolution, may I ask if all matters relating to housing, except the matters coming under the Minister of Veterans Affairs, are now under the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: What about the orders in council relating to rent control and things of that nature? Are they still under the Minister of Finance, or have they been transferred to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply?

Mr. HOWE: Rent control is under the wartime prices and trade board. That has to do with housing, though not of the type that we deal with.

Mr. KNOWLES: With reference to section 2 of the resolution, may I ask whether the provision in the bill, foreshadowed by this section, clearly holds it to such cases as the minister pointed out? He referred to land in the national parks as an example covered by this section. Or does it provide for limited-dividend corporations building homes on property they merely lease rather than own outright?

Mr. HOWE: I can hardly imagine a government agency lending money on houses where the control of the land is not permanently in the government. It could do it in the parks, because the control of park lands is in the hands of the government, but I cannot imagine a corporation lending money to build houses on land merely leased from a private citizen.

Mr. KNOWLES: I could hardly imagine it either, but I felt that I ought to make sure of the point in view of the language of this section, which refers to the making of loans for the construction of homes for home owners who have only a leasehold interest in the land upon which the home is to be built. However, since the minister satisfies me on that point, that is fine.

With respect to section 4, which has to do with the integrated housing matter, is this the only case where the government agrees to buy back homes after a certain stipulated period of time?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. The integrated housing plan is the only plan under which the government takes an interest in the building of houses for sale.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I now jump to section 6 and ask whether it has to do only with the management of homes that come to the government under the operation of section 4, or is it wider than that?

Mr. HOWE: That includes houses which might be acquired under the integrated housing plan or houses which might be acquired by foreclosure under mortgage. Houses, however acquired, would be managed under the provisions of article 6.

Mr. KNOWLES: One other question. There are really two, but one of them had better wait until we get the bill, namely, what the provisions are under section 7. Under section 5, however, would the minister indicate in what way these loans to mining and lumber companies will make for the provision of moderate costing houses? Merely to provide a loan does not ensure that these houses will be in that range. Will the minister indicate what special provisions attach to the loans or under what section of existing legislation they come?

Mr. HOWE: Section 5 simply covers the objective. I suggest to my hon. friend that the means by which the objective is attained would be more properly discussed under the bill when the details are presented.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is fine. We shall do so.

Mr. FLEMING: May I come back to the last question I asked the minister a few minutes ago and his answer to it. Are we to take it that the minister and his department are in touch, through the arrangement he mentioned, with the prices of all building materials and that they keep a check upon them?

Mr. HOWE: Very much so.

Mr. FLEMING: In deciding whether the price is fair, reasonable and adequate, does the department or the committee to which the minister has referred take account of the profit made by producers in the export market, and of the differential between prices in the export market and those prevailing in the domestic market?

Mr. HOWE: It is the over-all profit that guides the wartime prices and trade board in fixing the price for that portion of the product which is sold in the domestic market. Very few building materials are allowed to enter the export market. In the case of lumber, forty-five per cent of all lumber goes into the export market, and the price of that lumber in that market is the reason why the domestic price can be kept at cost and sometimes below cost. In other words, the over-all profit position of the lumber producer is satisfactory.

Mr. FLEMING: Not long ago the minister appointed a coordinator of housing, Mr. Flahiff. Will the minister indicate this gentleman's precise duties, especially in relation to the expedition of construction materials, and how his duties relate to those of Mr. Mansur, president of Central Mortgage and Housing corporation?

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Mansur is president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and is responsible for policy in the field of housing. Mr. Flahiff's position is that of coordinator of housing. It is his duty to coordinate all agencies having to do with the production of houses. For example, Mr. Flahiff is in touch with the director of priorities in his branch and in touch with wartime prices in matters where price enters into housing, and generally he coordinates all the separate branches that work with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in the field of housing.

Mr. FLEMING: This afternoon the minister said that the government will help the producers of building materials to meet their cost. I believe he was speaking with relation to the means of expanding their production. Will he elaborate that statement in some detail. In that connection, he mentioned the double depreciation allowance made against taxes. Will he amplify that?

Mr. HOWE: I would need to have an official with me to make such statements correctly. We have offered inducements to builders to expand production, but I would not care to say from memory what the inducements were. However, I shall be glad to answer my hon. friend when the bill is being discussed and the officials are here to give information.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister referred more than once to-day to the report which was furnished to him by the special committee of the Canadian construction association who advised him with regard to bottlenecks in connection with building materials. Will he table that report so that it may be available for the information of the house?

Mr. HOWE: There was a series of reports. There was a separate report on materials. I shall be glad to take the question under advisement. At the moment I can think of no reason why it should not be tabled, but I shall examine into the situation and give my hon. friend a reply to-morrow.

Mr. FLEMING: This afternoon the minister referred to the arrangements made with the university of Toronto with reference to the occupation of Ajax and the buildings there. Is any of the housing accommodation at Ajax still retained for the use of any of the former workmen or any workmen engaged in the vicinity? My understanding is that all the housing accommodation did not go to the university; some of it was retained.

Mr. HOWE: As I remember it, Ajax is made up of some four or five hundred wartime houses and certain other facilities besides the former shell-filling plant. Many of the houses are rented to former employees of Ajax. In other words, the lease to the university of Toronto did not include the wartime housing development which is still administered by Wartime Housing. As houses become vacant, they are reserved for returned men attending the university of Toronto, but there have been no evictions of former tenants. Therefore I presume the majority of the inhabitants are former tenants who worked in the war plant.

Mr. FLEMING: When we have the bill before us and the minister brings down this additional information will he also give us a detailed breakdown of the 60,000 target for this year? He indicated earlier that he did not have the figures. I think the committee would be interested in having the precise breakdown between private enterprise and the various government agencies.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: Would the minister be good enough to give an answer to the suggestion I made? In view of the substantial increase in the export of newsprint, the labour involved in creating that newsprint might well be put to use in increasing the supply of lumber for the building industry.

Mr. HOWE: Would my hon. friend expand that suggestion? How could it be done?

Mr. JACKMAN: A little while ago the minister said that persons on this side of the house, probably myself as much as anyone, made sweeping statements. Here we have companies engaged in the newsprint business and in lumbering, sometimes the same company. Certainly in the same areas there are trees which are suitable for lumber and trees which are suitable for newsprint. The same lumberjacks who cut down the small trees, the products of which go over to the United States to enlarge the newspapers there which are already of ample size, might well be used for felling trees which would go to the making of lumber for houses which we are so much interested in at the present time. I do not think it needs any more explanation than that. I quite realize that newsprint machines are still not operating at 100 per cent capacity, but they are operating about as high as they ever get. What I am more concerned in is the use of man-power in the woods in the cutting down of spruce trees for pulpwood at a time when the same men might be used, sometimes in almost exactly the same areas, for the cutting down of trees for lumber.

Mr. HOWE: Let us assume for the moment that I agree with my hon. friend. How would it be brought about? Since he made the suggestion he should follow it through and help save us a lot of worry.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is not very often that the minister asks for suggestions, and I do not know that he has the right to ask us how he is to administer his department. Much as I dislike controls—much more than the minister does himself—it seems to me that to a large extent we are in a controlled economy; and while we have an emergency such as this one —and if the minister knew more about actual cases he would feel it more deeply—I believe that if necessary he should say, you shall do this and you shall do that in this particular regard until we are over the hump in the housing crisis. I believe the minister has all the power that he needs, and if he does not have it this house would give him the necessary power to see that fairness is done. For the time being, I am more interested in food, clothing and shelter for our people than I am in building up our exports, valuable as they are at the present time. I suggest that the minister is quite able to do what I suggest, and he knows the means much better than I do because he uses this power every day of his life.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Is lumber the limiting factor?

Mr. HOWE: I take it that the hon. member for Rosedale wants us to go back to the war period and direct labour to certain operations.

Mr. JACKMAN: If the minister has not enough regard for the people of this country to see that there are roofs over their heads—if he came to Toronto and saw some of the cases he would understand what I mean— if he prefers to let these people continue as they are at the present time than to have the products of our woods sent to the United States in the form of newsprint then I think it is time we had a change of government.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: You have thought that for a long time, but it has not done you much good so far.

Mr. JACKMAN: The people of Rosedale thought a change of government was desirable.

Mr. MACKENZIE: A magnificent fellow.

Mr. FRASER: In reply to a question of the hon. member for Vancouver South regarding veterans priorities the minister said that the veteran had to have the building only fifty per cent completed at the present time to get priorities for the remainder. Does that cover priorities on plumbing? I understood that they had to have the building seventy-five per cent completed to get priority on plumbing.

Mr. HOWE: That has been changed.

Mr. FRASER: I am glad to hear it.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Is the production of lumber the limiting factor in the construction of houses in Canada, or is it plumbing fixtures, electrical supplies and so on? I do not believe it is due entirely to shortage of lumber.

Mr. HOWE: No; lumber is hard to get, but certainly if fifty per cent or thirty per cent of the lumber went into housing we would have too much lumber for housing. In other words, a comparatively small part of our lumber cut is absorbed by housing, and it is not the limiting factor. I know of no cases where shortage of lumber has limited the production of houses.

Mr. JOHNSTON: That would probably be true of the rough lumber. But what about doors and finished lumber, plumbing, and things like that? Would that not be a limiting factor? There never was much difficulty with regard to the dimension stuff.

Mr. HOWE: No. There is little difficulty with it at the moment. There is no great difficulty with doors, but there is great difficulty in brass pipe. Our production gets out of step, but roughly it has marched together, and roughly it has improved in all directions. The finish is very much improved. We have taken one big aeroplane plant which was formerly making prefabricated houses and is now making trim. Gradually we are bringing up the spots that get out of step, but they will never be perfectly balanced. In other words, all the items which go into a house will not be in perfect balance but they are getting more that way every day.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Does this new set-up contemplate taking over the construction of Veterans Land Act houses from now on?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I want to know that because I should like to discuss it when the estimates of the Minister of Veterans Affairs are before the committee. I do not want to miss that opportunity. I notice that paragraph 4 of the resolution refers to what I believe to be a new venture. Under this paragraph the Department of Reconstruction is to finance these houses; at least the contractor is going to build them and offer them for sale. If he cannot sell them the government comes into the picture. Is that a new departure?

Mr. HOWE: No; it has been in force for nearly a year.

Mr. KNOWLES: By order in council.

Mr. HOWE: By order in council. It has been working very well. The government has not yet had to buy a house and probably never will. The cost limitation, which is a condition of entering the agreement, has been very valuable to the veteran who is the purchaser of the house.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I have never had a great deal of criticism of wartime housing or national housing. I think it would be wrong in principle to get away from the established practice the government has followed in handling housing under the national housing plan. As far as I know, the houses built under that plan were well built. I have not a great deal to say in regard to the wartime houses built by the Department of Reconstruction, mainly because I have not taken as much interest in them as I took in the veterans houses, which were very poorly built indeed, and we shall have more to say on that subject when those estimates come down.

I criticized the houses built under the Veterans Land Act. My criticism was that they were being hastily constructed, and poorly constructed; and later that proved to be the fact. I want to tell the minister that just before returning to Ottawa the last time I was home, about two months ago, I went to see the wartime houses being built down by the railroad track in Calgary. Those houses were being prefabricated. I forget the name of the company building them; I have it up in my office, but no doubt the minister will know who I mean, because I think it is the only company building wartime houses in Calgary. I went down to where they were doing this prefabrication, and I noticed one difference between the material used in the construction of those houses and the material used for the veterans houses. There was no comparison. In the veterans houses the lumber was exceedingly green; in some cases I think the leaves were still on it. The material I saw going into the wartime houses, however, was quite dry, and I think that was a great improvement. I saw them prefabricating the upstairs inside partitions, which were made with two by threes. I do not know why they used that size lumber; I am sure the specifications called for it or the contractor would not be using it. I think that is a little weak for that kind of construction. The minister may have a different idea, but I should not think an inside partition of two-by-three studding would carry plaster substantially; at any rate I have my doubts.

The other point I wanted to bring to his attention was that these were being joined with three-inch nails. The minister knows how these forms are constructed. They are laid flat on the floor; the studs are put in and the plate is put on, with the nails driven through the plate. As I stood there watching, I saw these three-inch nails being used, and in the first place I believe those nails are too small. I was doubtful as to whether or not the frames would stand much moving, because the two nails through the plate into the end of the studding were almost touching each other, which in effect meant that you had only one nail in the plate. I was dubious about that, so I walked over to where they had a number of these frames piled up, to see if that was just a mistake in that one instance or whether it happened in other cases. I found that a number of these frames had already pulled apart. They had not been transported, except to be carried from the platform to the pile; and unless a great deal of caution was taken in moving them by truck or however they were taken to the point of use, I am afraid the minister is going to be in for a great deal of difficulty.

Then I want to say that when I was looking over this work I could not find the man in charge, though I asked several of the fellows working there where the foreman was. I think this was also the cause of a great deal of trouble in connection with the veterans houses. There was no foreman at all. He may have been around the pile somewhere, but I was there for at least three-quarters of an hour and could not find him. I believe there was not competent inspection in connection with the veterans' houses, and I think that was the reason for a great deal of the trouble experienced at that time. When that matter comes up again I think I may be able to show more clearly that this is so, and I would suggest to the minister that more caution should be exercised in connection with the construction of these houses, otherwise he is going to have a great deal of trouble later on.

Mr. PEARKES: I should like to offer a few observations regarding section 5, the section dealing with the new policy of lending directly to operators in the lumbering and mining industries in out-of-the-way places, and to ask for a little more information. I am convinced from what I have seen that one of the great difficulties has been a shortage of labour in the woods, and in many cases that has been so because the men have been unwilling to go into the woods and leave their families in the cities. If houses can be built nearer the mills and in the logging areas where there will be a sustained yield for a number of years, I am quite certain production can be increased. Up to now the difficulty has been that none of the housing schemes has been considered by the operators to be sufficiently flexible; in fact they say they have been required to put too much of their available capital into the building of houses. I should like to observe that the operators have been put to heavy expense recently in order to develop their industry. It requires a great deal of capital to build the railways and roads up the mountainside, to purchase modern equipment and to build the new mills which have been constructed at many points. They have not a great deal of capital left. So I hope that when these loans are to be made the department will take into consideration the fact that the loans must cover a large proportion of the amount which will be invested. Before any houses can be built, sites have to be cleared; perhaps drainage must be put in, and water and sometimes light brought to the area. So that there is a good deal of outlay on the part of the borrower before he can actually begin to build houses. I do not believe the houses themselves will be a heavy item of expense in the development of these particular schemes. I wonder if the minister could give us a little more information with regard to what percentage will be lent; what interest will have to be paid; whether these houses will be reserved only for veterans or whether any employee may occupy them; whether they will be transferable from a rental basis to a purchase basis later on, and so on. Many of the employees would prefer to rent houses for a while and perhaps eventually buy them when they found themselves settled in the particular area. These are some of the points on which I would ask the minister to be kind enough to give us a little further information.

Mr. HOWE: From the remarks of my hon. friend I assume that he is in agreement with the objective mentioned in the resolution. It would be difficult to deal with the provisions of the bill itself, which his questions cover, until the bill is brought down. The resolution simply deals with the objectives of the legislation. If the resolution is carried the bill will be distributed immediately, and it will be much easier for my hon. friend and much easier for me if we discuss the provisions of the bill when all members have it before them.

Mr. LOCKHART: There is one bit of information I should like to get which I may not be able to ask under any clause of the bill. The minister has referred on numerous occasions to prefabricated houses and I wish to know if the prices of these houses are checked and approved before they are offered for sale to veterans and, if so, by whom?

Mr. HOWE: If a manufacturer of prefabricated houses desires priority assistance, as most of them do, the project is examined in detail, the prices to be charged are considered, and the recommendation for priority contains the information which must be satisfactory to the officers of the department. However, this does not prevent anyone who wishes to manufacture prefabricated houses without priority assistance from doing so.

Mr. LOCKHART: I can give one specific instance, although I shall not mention the name of the firm which has enlarged its output of prefabricated houses. A four-roomed unit measuring approximately twenty-six feet by twenty-seven feet six inches, with a flat roof, is being offered at approximately $5,400. Veterans are looking at these houses but they must have $1,400 as a down payment. I was just wondering whether these selling prices are checked, because this seems to be a lot of money for a flat-roofed four-roomed cottage with no architecture to it at all.

Mr. HOWE: As I say, any company desiring priority assistance would have the f.o.b. factory price checked. Of course, after the cost of foundation and the cost of the land are added to the factory price, the total cost might run up to $5,400. I do not know of any prefabricated unit that sells f.o.b. factory at anything like that price; the price is usually somewhere around $3,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. member for Bow River endeavoured to-night to repeat certain allegations which he made in this house on March 28 with regard to certain houses in Calgary.

Mr. JOHNSTON: On a point of order, if we are going to discuss the Veterans Land Act I want to know it. I have no objection to the minister carrying on this discussion, but I want to know what is going to happen.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I did not bring it up; my hon. friend brought it up. I want to say that I have abundant evidence from the settlers themselves of their complete satisfaction with these houses. I have an official letter from the city engineer of Calgary justifying these houses. This evidence disproves in their entirety the remarks made by the hon. member for Bow River.

Mr. JOHNSTON: That was never disproved in the committee. I shall be only too pleased to have this discussed and I hope the minister brings his evidence before the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I challenge my hon. friend to bring his evidence before the veterans affairs committee.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): It is not my intention to delay the committee at this stage, although this matter is the subject of considerable concern to the people in my constituency and to the people of Nova Scotia. I am at some disadvantage in entering into this discussion at this time because, owing to train connections coming to Ottawa from Nova Scotia, I was not able to be here during the early part of the discussion. There is a feeling in my constituency and in Nova Scotia that we are being discriminated against in connection with the securing of materials to complete the construction of such buildings as have been started. Certain materials have been available, but others have not and the whole operation has been held up. There is a great deal of disappointment among the people, notably the returned men. I should like to put on record a telegram which I received a few days ago from the president of the Canadian Legion, branch No. 10, Amherst, Nova Scotia. This telegram, which is addressed to me, reads:

> At a regular executive meeting of this organization the deplorable housing conditions of this town were discussed. I was instructed to contact you and ask you to intercede for us on this urgent matter. At this moment we have over forty veterans in desperate need of housing facilities immediately. Wartime Housing informs us that their facilities have been completely exhausted and that no further assistance will be forthcoming this year unless new houses are constructed. We ask that immediate action be taken by the government.
> J. Lorne McLellan, president,
> Canadian Legion, branch No. 10.

I could follow that up and give more detailed information with respect to conditions in my constituency, but I shall not do so at the present time. However, I want to point out that the citizens generally and the returned men in particular are interested in the resolution which is before the house at the present time. I hope that as a result of the passing of this resolution, material will be in greater supply and that the present needs in all parts of Canada, particularly in the parts to which I have referred, can be met and the situation relieved. I shall not say any more than to point out that the situation is urgent and the need is great. These people are very deserving and they should have all the assistance possible in order that they may secure housing.

Mr. HOWE: I suggest to my hon. friend that he is putting in his complaint at the wrong end. Before we can build wartime housing we must have a request from the city in question. I am quite certain that no request has been received for wartime housing from the city of Amherst.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I have on my file a copy of a letter dated April 11, 1946, from the town clerk of Amherst to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. It reads:

> At the last regular meeting of the town council held on April 8, 1946, the urgent need for additional houses for the town of Amherst was under discussion. Our present wartime houses are being taken up by service personnel and at March 31 they had fifty applications on their waiting list, further to this we have a new industry opening in Amherst that will employ some eighty-five men and they already have applications in for eight houses and the Standard Chemical Company, who are opening a salt mine in Nappan, anticipate some two hundred employees within the next year and have already asked for ten houses immediately.

In consideration of this situation we urgently request that one hundred prefabricated houses be erected in Amherst at the earliest possible date. Sites are now available for these houses.

We would appreciate you directing this application to the proper departments.

Yours very truly,

V. G. Fuller, town clerk.

I took the matter up and could not get an undertaking that Wartime Housing Limited was in a position to respond to the request. I do not take the minister to task for not being familiar with these applications, but he is in error because there has been a direct application from the town of Amherst to the minister himself personally for additional housing in the town of Amherst.

Mr. BENTLEY: There is at the present time quite a shortage of cement in Saskatchewan. Inquiry was made in the old country to find out if it would be possible to ship cement from there through the Hudson bay port of Churchill during the summer season. The minister told us last year that the port was open for only a couple of months, so that any shipment would have to be hurried. The reply from the old country was that they had been informed by the authorities that all requirements for cement in Canada had been adequately provided for by Canadian manufacturers. If that is correct, why cannot we get cement? I know the government is austere in its wartime housing building and thinks basements are frivolous, but there are still a lot of old-fashioned people who like basements and need cement to build them. In one village in Saskatchewan I know of a church, a store, and two or three houses which have the basements dug and are held up because they cannot get cement. Are Canadian manufacturers manufacturing all the cement that is required in Canada, or has Lord Beaverbrook forgotten Canada?

Mr. HOWE: The production of cement is slightly out of step owing to the concentrated demand in the early months of the summer. But in another month or two there should be plenty of cement. At the moment there are shortages. Nevertheless the production of cement is far higher to-day than at any time in our history. I suggest that before my hon. friend buys cement from the old country and ships it through Hudson bay he ascertain what the price is in the old country. It would stagger him compared with the price in Saskatchewan.

Mr. McKAY: There is a heavy demand to-day for small homes, particularly for veterans. Is there any ceiling on the amount of materials that an individual may use in the construction of a private dwelling? Travelling in the east, I have noticed in the west end of Montreal houses being built that I would classify as mansions. Is there a ban on homes of ten or fifteen rooms being constructed at the present time? If there is, where are these people getting the materials? Is there such a thing as a black market? I believe that in the United Kingdom there is a ceiling in the vicinity of $7,000 in order to ensure that building materials will be distributed around and that veterans and others needing small homes will be provided for. Yet in Montreal I saw these mansions being built; we see the construction of garages right in the city of Ottawa, and I believe recently a contract was let for the building of a theatre. That sort of thing is inexcusable when veterans are going without homes, and there are scores of them right here in Ottawa who are still looking for homes. I would ask the minister to state if there is a ceiling on construction costs in house building, and if so, just how is it applied?

Mr. HOWE: So far as I am aware, any man in this country can build anything he likes. There is no restriction on anyone.

Mr. McKAY: Is that a proper thing when veterans are going without homes?

Mr. HOWE: I was going on to say that priority assistance is given only for homes costing $6,000 or less. That is the only type of building in which the government is giving assistance. If anyone can buy the material he can build anything he likes.

Mr. BENTLEY: A contract has been let for the building of a theatre in Ottawa, and a lot of cement blocks are going in there. Are there no priorities on cement?

Mr. HOWE: Theatres have no priority. There is no priority on anything except housing costing $6,000 or less.

Mr. BENTLEY: Anybody can buy all the supplies they want?

Mr. HOWE: If they can get them.

Mr. BENTLEY: And houses must wait while theatres are built?

Mr. KNOWLES: How do they get the materials if there is a priority for $6,000 homes?

Mr. STEPHENSON: In my district Wartime Housing Limited have said that they might be held up in the near future for the lack of nails. I brought this question up in the house in May last and a statement was made which I think should be clarified. In the Toronto Globe and Mail appears this article:

Ottawa, May 30.—There is strong official suspicion that the acute shortage of nails reported to be holding up Canada's construction programme is being accentuated at least by smuggling operations across the border for black market sale.

Canada's nail production described in the Commons by Reconstruction Minister C. D. Howe as going at full capacity, should be quite sufficient to meet even the increased Canadian demand. In fact, in actual figures, Canada is consuming only a percentage of stocks which should be on hand.

One clue to the situation is the demand from the United States coming through the legitimate channels, a demand which is blocked by refusal to issue export permits to fill the orders.

One recent application was made for a permit to export a substantial shipment to the United States to be sold at $1 per pound. Other applications have quoted as high as $50 a keg. This compares with black market prices in Canada running to $24 a keg.

Retail price of nails on the legitimate Canadian markets is about 8 cents a pound—if available.

While investigations carried on by the steel controller have failed so far to unearth evidence of illegitimate cross-the-border operations, it is pointed out that it is extremely difficult to check a bootleg movement of this kind.

The present shortages are attributed to three main causes:

1. Stock-piling by Canadian producers and distributors who are holding out in the hope of increased steel prices and a corresponding prices board adjustment in nail prices. The last increase was granted in March. This is believed to be the largest contributor to shortages.

2. Black market operations in Canada, said to be quite extensive.

3. Smuggling operations across the border to take advantage of American prices.

May I ask if that is true?

Mr. HOWE: The production of nails in Canada is easily checked. It is running at a very high figure, practically equivalent to the nail-producing capacity of the country. We have been trying to check the disposition of these nails. After a thorough check we can find no evidence of export operations or any evidence of stock-piling. If anybody knows where there is a warehouse full of nails, I wish he would tell me. We have been unable to find anything of the kind. The consumption of nails is difficult to explain. We cannot explain it. We think a great amount is going out of the country in packing for export. There is also no doubt that the use of green lumber has stepped up the number of nails used in building. The level of construction in this country is far higher than in any other period in our history. The shortage of nails is due to the great use of nails in construction in Canada to-day. However, we are now entering a shortage which is a real one. Nails are not being manufactured to-day in any quantity, because practically all the nail plants are on strike and the plants which ship the primary steel to the nail plants are also on strike. So that for the next month or two, or longer if the strike lasts much longer, nails will be in very limited supply indeed. All stocks of nails have been frozen and are being diverted into low-cost priority housing. It is only a matter of time, I think, when shortage of nails will practically close down building construction in this country.

Mr. STEPHENSON: Would it be possible for us to know how much of our production of nails is being exported?

Mr. HOWE: For many months there has been an export prohibition on nails. No nails whatever are being exported from Canada through legitimate channels. I cannot speak as to bootlegging.

Mr. LENNARD: A short time ago the minister stated that now, when a veteran had his house completed to the extent of fifty per cent, he could secure priority to finish that dwelling. I am pleased to hear that, because several months ago some cases were drawn to my attention where veterans applied for priorities to complete their dwellings, they wanted to obtain lathing, and were told that their house had first to be 75 per cent completed. That practically meant that the laths had to be on the walls before they could secure priority to obtain them. I am pleased to hear the minister's statement. When did that new order come into effect?

Mr. HOWE: Last week.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Would the minister mind elaborating a little on the question of priorities? My mind is not clear as to whether there are priorities actually for persons building houses up to $6,000, how they go about getting them, and whether it means that those who build homes or other buildings worth over $6,000 do not require priorities but can go ahead and buy on the open market.

Mr. HOWE: Everyone can buy on the open market. Everyone does buy on the open market, I suppose. The priority means that if the open market has material the man holding the priority gets it first, but he does not get it all. I suppose that priorities account for only twenty-five to thirty per cent of materials available for house building; the other seventy or seventy-five per cent are sold on the basis of "first come, first served." Priorities are given to small house builders under certain government plans. One, Wartime Housing; second, integrated housing; third, Housing Enterprises; and fourth, emergency shelter. There is also a priority that applies to a veteran's house not built under any of these plans; provided that the veteran has it fifty per cent built he is given priority for material allowing him to finish the house. If he does not come under any of these clauses he goes on the market, and we wish him well.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I am following this up just another step. The minister states that a person building this low-cost home has a priority, but it has not been made clear over whom he has a priority because, according to the minister's own statement, another person building a more expensive home or another building may go to the same market and buy without having to have any priority. In other words, where there is no material to buy, your priority is no good; when there is material to buy, you do not need priority; you can go and buy anywhere.

Mr. HOWE: To carry the analogy one step more, some material comes on the market. Suppose there is no material to-day, but to-morrow a shipment comes in; the man with the priority gets his first, before the man without a priority gets anything.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Provided that he is there to get it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Along these lines there is a case I should like to mention, although it is only a small matter. The other day a master plumber wrote me, and I have tried to do something about priorities for him. He has taken people into his own house and he wants to put in some more fixtures; he has also some other jobs, but he cannot get wrought iron pipe. The work he has in hand is to accommodate veterans. Other people have done exactly the same thing; they have taken other people in, and they need more plumbing accommodation, the extra bathtub and things like that. Is he entitled to priority, or is he not? I take it that he is not. He is giving extra housing accommodation; why is he not entitled to priority?

As I said when I spoke before, many of these things are in short supply. My colleague mentioned nails the other day. Perhaps the minister knows that a number of theatres are going up, and he probably also knows that great numbers of nails are needed in such construction work. But these projects are not necessary, and people want houses. These large buildings which are to be erected will also require plumbing fixtures. Why should they have preference; why not put the fixtures into houses?

The minister, as I understood him, said that distribution of materials is made to certain districts. As I understand it, there is the distribution for the metropolitan district of Toronto, which takes in a wide area. The mayor of Toronto has no control over what they do in Mimico or other places in the district, and when supplies are sent out to build a theatre at Mimico the mayor of Toronto cannot forbid it simply because Toronto is short of material for housing. The situation is serious as far as building supplies are concerned. Soil pipe, wrought iron pipe fittings and other articles are in short supply. Bricks —how difficult it is to get bricks to-day; chimney linings, plumbing fixtures, and many other things are needed. It seems to me that something should be done about this situation. This is not the time to be putting up buildings which are really not necessary at present. Or take the bank building which I previously mentioned. I like to see the bank going up; but hundreds of pounds of nails and other needed materials will be absorbed in its construction, and it seems to me a pity that the veterans are to be deprived of their houses because of limited supplies of these articles. Some consideration should be given, too, to the people who are arranging to provide accommodation for additional families and who cannot get additional bathrooms, for it is just as important to enable a family to find accommodation in an existing house as to provide a new house.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Howe thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 306, to amend the National Housing Act, 1944.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

RESEARCH COUNCIL ACT

APPOINTMENT OF VICE-PRESIDENTS AND EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, ETC.— CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to bill No. 154, to amend the Research Council Act.

Mr. STIRLING: Will the parliamentary assistant comment on the amendments?

Mr. McILRAITH: The amendments are to be found in Votes and Proceedings No. 75 of Monday, July 8. They are quite short. They do not go into the substance of the bill but rather deal with the clarification of language. The first amendment deals with section 7 of the bill, additional powers of the council, and clarifies the language to make it clear that the additional power granted the council is to carry on manufacturing of an experimental and developmental nature. It will be noted that they strike out the words "experimental and development work and manufacturing" and substitute in their place "work and manufacturing of an experimental and developmental nature." In other words, they limit the type of manufacturing that can be carried on and clarify the language in that respect.

The next amendment has to do with section 9 of the bill and is simply a matter of change in numbering the paragraphs referred to, (c), (d), (i) and (h) so that they will read in their proper alphabetical order.

The next amendment has to do with paragraph (b) of section 4 (1) of the act. That paragraph had to do with the council assuming control of existing companies, and the amendment brings the wording of that section into line with the wording of the section granting power to incorporate companies. It adds, after the word "companies", the following language: "incorporated under the provisions of part I of the Companies Act, 1934". It simply makes it clear that they cannot assume control of existing companies of another type. These are the only amendments.

Mr. GREEN: The official opposition concur in the amendments. As a matter of fact, the first one we suggested ourselves while the bill was under debate in this house. At least we suggested a similar amendment. I think it strengthens the bill. The other amendment that really amounts to anything at all is the fourth, and we also concur in it.

Mr. IRVINE: I am opposed to them all.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

GOVERNMENT COMPANIES

OPERATIONS AND FINANCING—SUPERANNUATION AND PENSION PROVISIONS—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to bill No. 155, respecting the operation of government companies.

He said: These amendments to bill 155 are to be found in Votes and Proceedings, No. 75 of Monday, July 8. The amendment is limited to section 10 of the bill. Section 10 deals with the contents of the annual report and provision for it to be laid before parliament. Subsection 1 as it now reads in the bill as passed by the House of Commons is as follows:

> Every company shall, as soon as possible after the thirty-first day of March in each year, and in any event within three months thereof, submit to the minister an annual report in such form as the minister may prescribe of its affairs and operations during the twelve-month period ending on the thirty-first day of March, and the minister shall lay the said report before parliament, if parliament is then in session or within fifteen days of the next session of parliament.

The senate amendment provides for the deletion of the words "in such form as the minister may prescribe" and the addition after the word "march" of the following words:

> containing its financial statement and such other information as the minister may prescribe.

It is an amendment in form. It clarifies the language and makes it clear that the financial statement must be included in the annual report.

Mr. GREEN: What type of financial statement is to be submitted by these companies? Is it the financial statement as called for under the Dominion Companies Act?

Mr. McILRAITH: It would be the financial statement as provided for by the Companies Act of 1934.

Mr. GREEN: The official opposition also concur in this amendment.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

CRIMINAL CODE

JURORS IN CRIMINAL CASES IN SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of bill No. 303, to amend the criminal code.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain this? The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) is not here.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I explained the purpose of this bill on the first reading thereof and discussed it afterwards with the hon. member for Calgary West. He was satisfied with the provision that was being made. This is the situation. In Saskatchewan the code provided that indictments should be tried by a jury of six persons. The government of Saskatchewan, through the attorney general, asked us to have the code amended to provide that in that province, as in most of the other provinces, trial on indictment be by a jury of twelve. That is one provision made in the bill. The other provision is to carry out an undertaking I gave the hon. member for Calgary West when my estimates were under consideration, that I would ask the house to deal at this session with the situation with respect to challenges and requests to stand aside in the selection of jurors to existed immediately before the first day of September, 1905. The Northwest Territories Act, as it existed before the first of September, 1905, gave the accused only four peremptory challenges in the selection of a jury of six persons to try even a capital case. The hon. gentleman suggested that in the trial of important cases in Alberta the detry indictments in Alberta. There was the provision that the code would not apply in Alberta in so far as its provisions might be inconsistent with the Northwest Territories Act and amendments thereto, as the same fence should have the same number of challenges as would prevail elsewhere. He also complained that the crown had an unlimited number of stand-asides which could be exercised, and that might place an accused person in an unfair position. He was not suggesting that these requests to stand-aside were used unfairly, but they could be used unfairly to make up the kind of jury that those representing an accused person would not like to have sworn.

After the discussion of the estimates in the house, we communicated with the attorney general of Alberta, and he was quite willing to have this provision in the code eliminated, because it seemed to be more embarrassing than otherwise—that is, the provision referring to the Northwest Territories Act as it existed in 1905—provided that the number of jurors to be sworn were not increased beyond six, and provided that the number of peremptory challenges and the number of stand-asides be one-half those that could be exercised when a jury of twelve persons was being selected. I mentioned that to the hon. member for Calgary West and he was quite satisfied that that was a fair provision to make. It gives the defence in Alberta the same proportionate right in choosing a jury of six as that which exists in other provinces where the jury is composed of twelve persons.

Hon. members will remember that when the matter was discussed while my estimates were being considered, the hon. member for Calgary West said he was not complaining of a six-man jury, but of the fact that the defence did not have the same proportionate rights with respect to a jury in Alberta which they had in the procedure which prevails in the other provinces.

It required quite a lengthy bill to carry out the provision, but I can assure the house that that is all the bill does. It increases the number of jurymen in Saskatchewan from six to twelve as requested by the government of that province. It provides, as existed heretofore, that six jurymen instead of twelve will try indictments in Alberta, but that in their selection there shall be one-half the number of challenges and one-half the number of stand-asides which are allowed in the selection of a panel of twelve jurors in the other provinces.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. HACKETT: That is the only province in which—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The house is not in committee.

Mr. HACKETT: I was going to ask a question, if I might.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: It is not regular to ask questions until the bill is in committee. However, I am in the hands of the house.

Mr. HACKETT: I shall ask the question later on.

Bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Application of act to Alberta.

Mr. KNOWLES: I confess that I am terribly out of my depth here—

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): That will not discourage you from asking questions.

Mr. KNOWLES: When this bill passes it leaves us with only one province in the dominion where there is a six-man jury.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, that is my understanding. My understanding is that all the other provinces will now have twelve jurors sworn to try indictments.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is the matter brought on by provincial request? Obviously we have jurisdiction because we are doing it here. What puzzles me is the explanatory note which says:

> The object of this amendment is to make the provisions of the criminal code applicable uniformly so far as possible, to all the provinces . . .

If there is argument for having a twelve-man jury in eight provinces, why should we not have it right across Canada?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is a matter which is, of course, within the jurisdiction of parliament. But it has been the practice to endeavour to meet the requests of the provincial authorities, because they incur the expense of providing courts to try indictments. At one time Saskatchewan as well as Alberta expressed the desire, for the purpose of facilitating the organizing of juries, to reduce the number from twelve to six. After a few years' experience in Saskatchewan, they have come to the conclusion that they want to go back to the system of twelve jurymen, but in Alberta they are still satisfied to operate with six. Of course it does not require the summoning of as large a panel to make a choice of a six-man jury possible. There is less expense incurred in summoning a panel for the selection of a jury if you require only six than if you have to summon a panel large enough to be able to pick twelve jurors out of it. So long as the government of Alberta, and the people of Alberta, as represented by, amongst others, the hon. member for Calgary West, say that they prefer it to the more expensive system, the Department of Justice tries to fall in with their views. In everything that is done under the criminal code we try to get the cooperation of the provincial authorities, and we try to extend our cooperation to them for the purpose of facilitating the administration of justice.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member for Calgary West is satisfied?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Trial without jury in Alberta, by consent.

Mr. JAENICKE: Section 2 provides that in an indictable offence an accused may be tried with his own consent by a judge of the superior court. Is that under part 17 or part 18 of the code?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is under part 18 of the code, or rather it is to bring Alberta under the code and conserve this particular provision which resulted from the Northwest Territories Act. The six-man jury and this special provision were the only portions that remained inconsistent with the criminal code. The criminal code can be made to apply generally in Alberta, provided that we have this and the other disposition with respect to the six-man jury.

Mr. JAENICKE: The accused would have the right to be tried by a district court judge, as we call them in Alberta and Saskatchewan, under part 17, as well as by a judge of the supreme court or the court of king's bench without the intervention of a jury?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. JAENICKE: It would not be called a speedy trial.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Here he can be tried with his own consent by a judge of a superior court of criminal jurisdiction.

Mr. JAENICKE: Under part 18.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That would be a judge of the supreme court of Alberta, as it is called in that province, I believe, but he could be tried by a judge of the supreme court of Alberta without the intervention of a jury if he so elects.

Section 2 agreed to.

Sections 3 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT

ADDITIONAL PUISNE JUDGE FOR EXCHEQUER COURT

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of bill No. 249, to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Constitution of court.

Mr. FLEMING: Will the minister tell the committee when the governor in council proposes to appoint the additional judge provided for under this bill? It is a matter of some importance, I think, in view of the accumulation of cases in that court.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The provision is being made now; I should not like to set any specific date for the appointment, but it is intended to have the judge in office after what we usually call the long vacation.

Mr. FLEMING: Then we can expect that the court will be—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would expect to have the judge appointed so that he would be able to take up his duties at the opening of the fall term of the court.

Section agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

JUDGES ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING JUDGES OF DOMINION AND PROVINCIAL COURTS

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of bill No. 250, respecting judges of dominion and provincial courts.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Perhaps I might suggest now that we report progress and ask leave to sit again. Certainly we could not get through the bill in the two or three minutes remaining, and it is one of considerable importance. The bill being now before the committee, perhaps it would suit the convenience of hon. gentlemen to have progress reported.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, July 23, 1946

The house met at eleven o'clock.

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS

TERMINATION ON AUGUST 15, 1946, OF CONTROL FOR ALTERNATIVE SERVICE

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table herewith copy of P.C. 3030, passed on July 18, 1946, providing that effective August 15, 1946, control over conscientious objectors for alternative service will end.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

WAR EXPENDITURES—CONCURRENCE IN FOURTH REPORT

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax) presented the fourth report of the special committee on war expenditures, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Twenty-second and twenty-third reports of standing committee on veterans affairs.—Mr. Tucker.

PRIVILEGE

MR. GREEN—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN MONTREAL "GAZETTE"

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question of privilege having to do with a Canadian Press dispatch which appears in this morning's Montreal Gazette and probably has been published in other Canadian papers. The heading of the article is "Stiffer Attitude Seen in Outlays for Vets." The article goes on to say:

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

A stiffening attitude towards further financial outlays through allowances for Canada's veterans is reflected in rejection by the veterans committee of two new proposals.

It adds this paragraph, which is the one about which I am complaining:

The Department of Veterans Affairs recommended that student-veterans at universities be given a $5 a week commutation allowance if they had to travel a certain distance to school and a $5 a month textbook allowance. The committee rejected both but accepted a loan plan to aid such veterans.

As a matter of fact no such proposal was put before the committee on veterans affairs by the Department of Veterans Affairs, and that paragraph of the report is entirely erroneous.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I entirely agree with my hon. friend.

MR. FRASER—QUESTIONS DROPPED FROM ORDER PAPER

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. This morning, just as I entered the chamber, I was handed your letter, and I wish to read it:

Dear Mr. Fraser,

I enclose copy of a memorandum submitted to me by the Clerk of the House of Commons, with regard to certain questions filed by you for the order paper.

Yours very truly,
Gaspard Fauteux.

The enclosed memorandum reads:

Memorandum for Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to state his question of privilege very briefly.

Mr. FRASER: Mr. Speaker, I cannot possibly state my question of privilege unless I read the memorandum. The memorandum is from the Clerk of the House in regard to questions that I submitted to him for the order paper, and I feel that in justice to myself and other members of the house who have submitted questions and have had them taken off the order paper, I should be allowed to read this memorandum.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Would the hon. gentleman give the house a summary of what is in the letter, without reading it? I think it is improper to read the letter.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I do not think the attitude of the hon. member is right. I believe that if he looks at Bourinot, Beauchesne and May he will see that it has always been the practice in this house not to question or to discuss the conduct of the Speaker. I do not think the hon. member would assist in maintaining dignity inside of this house and outside it by discussing the conduct of the Speaker. I call his attention to May's Parliamentary Practice, 14th edition, chapter 16, page 334; it is entitled "Questions to the Speaker":

> Questions dealing with matters within the jurisdiction of the Speaker should be addressed to the Speaker by private notice. No written or public notice of questions addressed to the Speaker is permissible. . . .

And so on. I am sure the hon. member would not wish to do anything which would reflect disagreeably upon the Speaker, and may I point out that if he needs any explanation, if he requires any advice which the Speaker can give him, the Speaker will be glad to give him any advice or information within his power.

Mr. FRASER: Mr. Speaker, at all times I have tried to uphold the dignity of the house—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FRASER: —and I do not wish to reflect in any way on the Speaker. I have held him in high regard, and I still do. The whole point is that I submitted questions for the order paper; they refused to put them on the order paper, but instead they have sent them to the chairman of the war expenditures and economies committee to be answered, and I find from members of that committee that many of the questions which they asked weeks and weeks ago still remain unanswered.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FRASER: That is why I rose to-day on a question of privilege.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I notice that the question which was asked by the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) and was removed from the order paper is restored to-day. I was hoping that some explanation would be given to the house of the removal and the restoration of questions to the order paper. Is it the intention of the Speaker to make an explanation?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman will receive a letter and memorandum.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, on this question of inquiries as to questions, I regret as much as you do and as the house does that we should be having so much difficulty and trouble, and at times it may appear as though it is almost a reflection upon Your Honour—which I am sure no one in this house wants it to be. But here is a question which has just been raised by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell)—a question on all fours with the one which was refused admittance to the order paper, the one asked by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser); I refer to the question dealing with War Assets Corporation—which was on the order paper for some days, and then on Friday everyone noticed that it was off the order paper; now we come to Tuesday, and it is on the order paper again.

An hon. MEMBER: "Off again, on again."

Mr. GRAYDON: In raising the question as a matter of privilege, Your Honour, I do not think it is enough to send letters and memoranda to hon. members in matters of this kind. I think we should have a definite ruling so that the house could have the opportunity of saying whether these questions, without the approval or consent of the member who submits them, can be sent to a committee of the house. If these questions are to be refused a place on the order paper they ought to be returned to the hon. member, but on no occasion has anyone a right to send them to any other member of the house; yet I understand that in the case of the hon. member for Peterborough West they were sent to the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor). I know of no right on the part of any official of the house to send a question designed to be placed on the order paper to another hon. member without the consent of the hon. member whose question it is. Actually what this is doing—and I say this in all seriousness, though I do not want to have a lot of trouble, nor do I suppose any hon. member does—is drawing an asbestos curtain right over the whole question of the War Assets Corporation.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member for Peel will realize that if I thought it was right to send a memorandum, which was prepared by the Clerk of the House—who is acknowledged as an authority—to the hon. member for Peterborough West, I should do the same thing for the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, who is leader of the C.C.F. party. I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to "Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure," chapter 9, page 313:

> It is the duty of the Clerk to point out any irregularity to the Speaker, as in the case of notices of motion and if the latter is of the same opinion he will order the Clerk to communicate with the member—

"To communicate with the member" what has been done.

—so that he may have the opportunity of amending his notice.

Now, what is the duty of the Speaker? Is it to discuss the merits of the question? The duty of the Speaker in relation to the question, as indicated in "May's Parliamentary Practice," fourteenth edition, chapter 16, page 333, is this:

The Speaker's responsibility in regard to questions is limited to their compliance with the rules of the house.

"Is limited to their compliance with the rules of the house". If therefore, according to the rules of the house, the question should not be put on the order paper, the Speaker's duty is not to discuss the merits of that question, though the rule may be unfortunate for some member, but to act in accordance with the rules. I may say to the leader of the C.C.F. party that the hon. member will receive a memorandum written and prepared by the Clerk of the House, and it may help if the hon. member would consult the Speaker, who will do everything possible to be agreeable.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I say, Mr. Speaker, that the reason I raised the question was that we might get an opinion on the record of the house. I understood that would be done. The question was ordered "stand" in the house, and then it was removed, and I submit that an explanation is due the house. I understood an explanation was to be given, and when we have that explanation, if it is based upon the rules, I shall be the last one to suggest that we do anything that would cause the Speaker to take any action contrary to the rules. An explanation as to why the question was removed and then restored should be given to the house, since it was done against the order of the Speaker that the question stand on the order paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have noted with interest the remarks of the hon. member, and will take them into consideration.

CANADIAN FORCES

REINSTATEMENT IN CIVIL EMPLOYMENT ACT, 1942—REGULATIONS GIVEN STATUTORY EFFECT

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 307, to provide for the reinstatement in civil employment of discharged members of His Majesty's forces and other designated classes of persons.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the explanation of the bill?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. MITCHELL: This is a new bill, Mr. Speaker, replacing the bill which was given first reading on, I think, April 15 last. Following that, as hon. members will recall, the bill was withdrawn in order that it might be redrafted and referred to the committee on veterans affairs for consideration and report. The bill consolidates the provisions of the 1942 act and of subsequently passed orders in council and gives statutory effect to the orders in council.

The form in which it is now presented has received the approval of the committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING SCHOOL ATTENDANCE AND POWERS TO MAKE REGULATIONS

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 308, to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1944.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CLAXTON: This bill would make two minor changes in the Family Allowances Act. The first would carry into statutory form the provisions now in force regarding school attendance. The second would make textual alterations regarding the powers to make regulations.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

HOUSING—ELECTRICAL WIRING SUPPLIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. PROBE (Regina City): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Will he please inform the house what priorities for electrical wiring supplies for houses being build under the Veterans Land Act are now in effect and whether the amount of such materials being reserved for veterans' building is such as to curtail distribution of electrical wiring through the normal trade outlets in Canada.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): Where an individual contract is set up by the director, Veterans Land Act, the contractor is issued with a priority certificate by the priority officer of the department of reconstruction. This certificate entitles the contractor to electrical wiring from the local dealer, provided that the dealer has it to supply. The Veterans Land Act uses a very small proportion of the total amount of electrical wiring manufactured, and any priority supplied to the Veterans Land Act would have little, if any, effect on the normal distribution.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE IN QUESTIONS ON THE ORDERS OF THE DAY

Mr. SPEAKER: Orders of the day.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No. 1.

The CLERK ASSISTANT: Third reading of bill No. 303, an act to amend the criminal code.

Mr. HODGSON: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry, but the order of business has already been called.

Mr. GRAYDON: On a question of privilege, I have never seen this done before in my eleven years here. Time after time latitude has been given a member who was trying to get the floor when the Clerk Assistant got in ahead of him. Surely you are not going to do this to us.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rules of the house are clear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. When a member rises to ask a question he says, "Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to put a question to the hon. minister of so and so." On this occasion the order of the day had been read by the Clerk Assistant, and after it had been read the hon. member rose to put a question. I do not wish to be severe, but I have stated the rule of the house. With the unanimous consent of the house I will permit the hon. member to put his question, but according to the rules—

Mr. GRAYDON: We surely cannot be put in a straitjacket every moment of our time. I would—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: I would—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Withdraw that.

Mr. GRAYDON: I appeal to the leader of the government to ask that unanimous consent be given.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You cannot insult the Speaker.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I should be glad to ask the house to give unanimous consent, but the hon. member who is leading the opposition should withdraw the statement he has made about being in a straitjacket.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it has been my experience in this house over a good many years that even when the Clerk or the Clerk Assistant has called the first item on the orders of the day, where it appears that a member wishes to ask a question the Clerk sits down so that the member may put the question. May I point out that it is not necessary for a member before asking a question to say, "Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called". That is only a custom; it is not a rule of the house, and it not necessary that a member wishing to ask a question should use those words. Before the orders of the day are called any member may rise and ask an appropriate question.

Mr. SPEAKER: As I have pointed out to hon. members, it is the practice every day, even when the Clerk Assistant has risen and has begun to read the item called by the leader of the house, to permit the member to put his question. But once the item has been read I do not think it is permissible for anyone to put a question. However, if it is the pleasure of the house that he be allowed to do so, the hon. member may rise and state his question.

FLOUR

SHORTAGE IN VICTORIA CONSTITUENCY

Mr. C. W. HODGSON (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, or to his parliamentary assistant, who is in the house, under whose department the wartime prices and trade board is administered. My question has reference to priority in connection with the acute flour shortage in my constituency. I would like to know what has been done since Friday to relieve that flour shortage in the county.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): The hon. gentleman on Friday last asked me a similar question without sending me any notice, and he has done the same to-day. I will tell him what has happened. I gave him the address of the flour administrator in Montreal, even that gentleman's telephone number, and suggested that he or his principals get in touch with the administrator and inform him who their supplier is and what they have used of their quota. They did not see fit to do it in that way, but suggested that I do it for them. I therefore called up the flour administrator's office on Saturday morning about nine o'clock, and was informed that the bakers in whom the hon. member is interested are buying their flour not from the Robin Hood Milling company but from Canada Packers. The Robin Hood Milling company has supplied to the Canada Packers the full quota of flour to which these bakers are entitled, and if they have not received their full quota it is to this company that they should apply and not to the flour administrator. Further, I wish to advise the hon. member that these companies have not only used up their full quota but were sent an additional fifty bags. The administrator said that he would get in touch with the Canadian bakers on Saturday afternoon in an endeavour to see if there was anything wrong or if they had fallen down in their deliveries, and they would try to get supplies. However, there is a way of handling these matters, and it is not by bobbing up in the house on every pretext—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MAYHEW: Everyone knows who the administrator is—

Mr. GARDINER: The request for the regulations came from the other side.

Mr. MAYHEW: The hon member had all this information last Friday morning. He could have come to my office and it would have been settled, but he waited until after three o'clock and then rose on the orders of the day. I leave it to the house to judge why it was done.

Mr. HODGSON: On a question of privilege, I went to the parliamentary assistant at three o'clock—

Mr. MAYHEW: At three o'clock?

Mr. HODGSON: —in the afternoon.

Mr. MAYHEW: Three o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. HODGSON: A few minutes after. I will not hesitate to say four o'clock, or five o'clock, if you like. The reason I went to the hon. member and asked him to do it was that this was not a new thing. This has been going on since June 12. I have letters here—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Order.

Mr. HODGSON: —which have come from the bakers, and—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE: A Tory bear-garden.

Mr. LENNARD: I never saw you throw one over your shoulder.

[Mr. Mayhew.]

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member—

Mr. HODGSON: The statement made by the parliamentary assistant—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HODGSON: —is not right.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would remind the hon. member that when the Speaker rises and calls "order," the hon. member who is speaking must resume his seat.

Mr. HODGSON: I am sorry; there was so much noise over here I did not notice that Your Honour was on his feet. As to the statement about bakers having used up their quota of flour—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I ask a supplementary question of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance. The question is, what is he doing to relieve a similar situation in Muskoka?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Order no. 1.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MAYHEW: I had no notice of the hon. member's question, but I say the same to him. If he will give the department a list of those who are in short supply of flour, it will be attended to, provided that they have not already used up their quota.

Mr. HODGSON: I gave the list on Friday.

CRIMINAL CODE

JURORS IN CRIMINAL CASES IN SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved the third reading of bill No. 303, to amend the criminal code.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

JUDGES ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING JUDGES OF DOMINION AND PROVINCIAL COURTS

The house resumed from Monday, July 22, consideration in committee of bill No. 250, respecting judges of dominion and provincial courts—Mr. St. Laurent—Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Shall section 1 carry?

Mr. KNOWLES: No, Mr. Chairman. When second reading of this bill was called last evening, as the record will show, at about five minutes to eleven, there seemed to be a desire to get it into committee so that it might be discussed in detail.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. There is so much noise in the chamber that I can hardly hear the hon. gentleman.

Mr. KNOWLES: Because of the desire to get the bill into committee we did not raise any objection at that time. As a matter of fact no remarks were made when the order was called for second reading. But as we in this group look over this bill and find that its important provisions are for increases of salaries, many of which are already quite large, we do not take kindly to it. The lowest salaries referred to in the bill, aside from salaries for part-time service, are of the order of $5,000, which are to be increased to $6,666.66. Then they go all the way up to a present salary of $15,000, which is to become $20,000. I know that some of us hold a view which other hon. members of the house do not understand, but we still feel that when old age pensioners are asked to live on the amounts provided them, when the suggestion is made that a ten cents an hour increase is all that should be granted to workers at this time, it is not fair to propose such munificent increases in salaries in brackets that are already so high.

I have no objection to large salaries; I have no objection to judges, but we should look at this matter in the proper perspective. I am all for the dignity of our courts and our judiciary, but too much emphasis has been laid upon the necessity of large salaries to maintain that dignity. One must also bear in mind that there are generous pension provisions in the act for judges and their widows. Taken by themselves, I have no objection to salaries of this kind being provided, but in the light of our failure in this parliament to deal properly with old age pensioners, which I mention particularly, it is hardly called for. I know that at times when we on this side of the house have made reference to what has been done for old age pensioners as compared with some of these large salaries we get replies from the other side to the effect that it is "cheap stuff", and so on. I suggest that that is not so. If the word "dignity" has any merit or validity, it applies to all citizens, and one has to ask the question how much dignity can be maintained on an old age pension of $25 a month. It does seem to me that the Minister of Justice, as a member of a government which has failed to deal properly with our old age pensioners, has a tough proposition on his hands to make a case for the increases set out in this bill.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to say a few words on this section. I had intended to say them on second reading of the bill. This bill is one of the most important ones we have before parliament. For many years the Judges Act has remained a dead letter, as to the function of judges, the appointment to their offices, and so on. We should have an equitable system of appointing judges. There should be an amendment to the act in that respect. Some judges in the Montreal district are classed as superior court judges and they are doing the very same work as is done by His Honour Judge Parker, the able senior judge of the county of York. He has the largest number of civil and other cases in any industrial area in Canada.

I had two bills before the house which the minister said he would consider, but I do not see any reference to them in this legislation. One dealt with judges, providing that they should not serve on what are known as federal commissions. Unless we have too many judges their time should be fully occupied with judicial and not parliamentary matters. We are fast building up in this country a system of commission government over the head of parliament when it is in session. The other bill related to the construction to be placed upon certain statutes, providing that a decision of a court of record on authoritative cases shall be final and binding, and shall be followed by all judges appointed under this act. I find that is not the case now. In one particular matter which has been referred to many times in this house we find that the decision of the final court, the judicial committee of the privy council, which should be authoritative and binding upon all judges appointed under the Judges Act, was not followed, though there can be no doubt about the law in that connection.

I am sorry to see that some of the recommendations of the chief constables' association are not implemented in this legislation. I do not want to speak very long, since this is our first morning session, but since confederation the federal government has not enforced its own laws. Every year hundreds of orders in council and acts are passed by this parliament, but the federal government does nothing to enforce them. Their enforcement is left to the attorneys general of the nine provinces. It is the duty of the federal government to enforce its own laws. All these acts are passed under section 91 of the British North America Act, and their enforcement should be under the federal government instead of being handed over to the provinces, who in turn delegate it to the municipalities, who have to pay the costs. With the tens of thousands of orders in council passed during the war, this has placed an intolerable burden upon every municipal police system in the country. Last Saturday we had a meeting in the city of Toronto of chief constables from many cities on both sides of the border; we had the police games, and all that sort of thing. There is also a chief constables' association. Why was their brief not included here? I remember when I was head of the city council and police commissioner in Toronto the police chiefs of many cities met there and formed the Canadian chief constables' association. These men are out day and night, meeting all kinds of people, many of whom come across the border and commit all sorts of offences here, while the public are not protected.

There is another matter I am sorry is not dealt with in this legislation. I had a return brought down showing the large number of people killed and injured in fatal accidents on the highways. There were twenty-seven killed or injured last week end, and it is the same throughout the year. The province can spend sixty or seventy thousand dollars in prosecuting a person charged with culpable homicide, but it has not a dollar to spend to deal with this menace. More people are injured in the city of Toronto each year than would fill the seats in this House of Commons ten times over. In my city alone thousands of people were injured by the motor car, constituting one of Canada's greatest scandals. Men, women and children are slaughtered. Small children lawfully using the streets are struck down by hit and run drivers, and what are we doing to stop it? We are doing nothing under this bill. The penalties should be increased. That offence should be considered culpable homicide to a pre-eminent degree, because as I have said before nothing is so cowardly as that particular offence.

Now may I say a word about the appointment of judges. I do not wish to advocate the American system of electing judges—more care in selection is needed—but with all respect I think the minister should tell us who makes these appointments of county court judges. The other day I made some remarks about members of the bar which I am afraid the right hon. attorney general, who was very patient, misunderstood. All appointments made to the county court of York are lawyers of at least ten years standing at the bar, but I had in mind that some of them had not practised for many years. They may have been county clerks or township clerks or division court clerks, or held some other municipal office before being appointed to the county court bench. I am not saying the men appointed have not been good men, but I believe there should be some better system of appointment. It has been a rule since confederation that members of the House of Commons shall not ask the right hon. attorney general, who is Minister of Justice, to give legal opinions to the house or the committees thereof. That is a wise rule, because he is Attorney General of Canada, and there may be contests in the law courts between him and the attorneys general of the provinces. But I believe we should know how these appointments are made. I understand the provincial and federal cabinet ministers make recommendations to the minister. Sir John A. Macdonald appointed members of both parties to the bench, which had a good effect. He appointed some people who were on the opposite side of politics, because after all is said and done, our system is different from that of the mother country. Our Department of Justice includes the equivalent of four or five departments of the government in England. It performs the functions of the attorney general; it performs the functions of the solicitor general; it carries out the duties of the lord chancellor in England, who appoints the judges and is responsible for their salaries and the conduct of their offices. In addition our Minister of Justice has under his jurisdiction our penal institutions, which in England come under the home secretary. So in Canada this department has grown to be very important. The present minister is probably one of the best lawyers we have ever had in this office. A great many eminent lawyers have held this position, and I am filled with a spirit of deep humility when I recall some of them and their fine work for Canada.

The war has been over for a year, but we have not had a commission appointed to revise the criminal code. One provision of the code is violated every day, the provision concerning who may wear certain clothing and who may not. That is only a small matter, but there are other sections of the code which need to be looked into. In this connection I am sorry to say that one matter, which is now before the court of appeal in Ontario, was mentioned in this high court of parliament. That should not have been done, because the matter is still pending before the courts of the province of Ontario.

Then I understand the attorney general of Ontario wrote a letter to the Attorney General of Canada asking for certain changes in the law regarding culpable homicide. I have been trying to get something done about motor cars and many other matters, but I find no action has been taken on all these matters. Then I think we should have some explanation from the Attorney General about the recommendations of the various bar associations. I do not see why we should wait for them to make recommendations for the appointment of judges, practically taking that matter out of the hands of the Attorney General. I say further that at least some people in Canada believe in the election of judges. I am not prepared to go that far at the present time, though I can say that at times there is dissatisfaction on the part of bar associations and some of our local people about bringing judges into the county court of York from all over Ontario. We had three judges in that city who did all the work: the late Judge Coatsworth, then the late Judge Winchester; Judge Morson, and Judge Morgan. They were worked to death. Those judges were appointed from our own city.

What are the duties of county judges? Well, they have to do work in connection with the voters' list and in connection with many other municipal acts. These matters are referred to them for consideration. In my opinion they should have special knowledge of the localities in which they preside in civil and criminal cases. In this connection I do not agree with an argument used by a former minister. To a great extent they are judges handling municipal matters, under municipal laws and laws relating to the provinces under section 92 of the British North America Act. It is true that they take some cases which are under section 91. I believe the time has come however when some revision of policy should be made. There is criticism of the absence from this bill of penalties to check fatalities and accidents arising from motor cars, level crossings, drowning, fire hazards, fires in homes when parents are not present, and conditions of that kind. It is high time we in the House of Commons did something to remedy this condition by more modern legislation.

I believe that judges have for a long time earned larger salaries. We will remember that at one time a bill was introduced to exempt them from income tax. The first legislation of that kind was introduced by the late administration. Following the debate they were included under the income tax provisions. This is the highest court in Canada, the high court of parliament. Representations are made from time to time by certain members of the bar. Only last Saturday an article appeared in a local paper with respect to the able hon. member for Calgary West. We must remember that we sit in the high court of parliament, and must protect the judiciary. Many members of the bar have earned salaries far greater than they have been paid as judges, and it pleases me to see some progress made in this connection.

The quicker a royal commission is appointed to revise the criminal code, the better. As chairman, I would suggest a great trial judge like Mr. Justice Keiller Mackay. There are many other competent judges, and have been many in the past. I have in mind the late chief justice W. R. Meredith, and a brother, Chief Justice R. M. Meredith, one of our most able judges. Both served on a commission to revise the statutes.

The public should receive more consideration than it does to-day. We must consider the onerous work performed by the Minister of Justice. I can tell him that unless he does less work and has more leisure, and devotes less time to his duties of office I fear for his state of health, remembering what happened to three of his predecessors. While he has given some of his work to the new Solicitor General, a competent man in his own right, I believe the only solution is a standing national legal committee, such as may be found in all the provinces, to consider all legal bills we have in this house. If we had a legal committee we would not be forced to operate in compliance with the rules of house procedure. Two special committees have met. We must keep in mind that this high court of parliament is the highest court in the land. Let us first attend to our own rules, and make a complete revision. In the disposition of civil and criminal cases in the courts we need a British North America Act for the living, not one for the dead. The rules of procedure for this chamber are obsolete. Let us put our own house in order first; let us recover the rights, functions and privileges we had in this chamber years ago. We do not want generosity. We are sent here by the high court of public opinion, the people of Canada, to do our duty properly and to the best of our ability.

As I read the text of the bill presented the other day I war reminded of the time when Charles I walked in the door of the House of Commons, and sat in the Speaker's chair. He was looking for five men, and approached Mr. Speaker Lenthall in the matter. Mr. Speaker Lenthall said: "May it please Your Majesty, I have neither eyes to see nor tongue to speak in this place but as the house is pleased to direct me, whose servant I am here." The presiding officer in this chamber is the servant of the House of Commons, as is a judge or a chief justice in a court of law who under sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act represents parliament in civil and criminal cases.

Charity should begin at home. If we want to set an example for our law courts, and have a popular administration of justice, then let us set our own house in order. The first step would be to have a committee to revise the rules, so that we would have modern rules in this court of law, this highest court in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. BOUCHER: With much of what was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I am sure all hon. members will be in agreement. He has asked why we should think of increasing the salaries of judges when old age pensioners are not getting enough to live on. Upon reflection however I believe he will realize that his main point is not well taken. In Canada, as in all British countries, one of the things in which we take greatest pride is our judiciary. Fundamental to the well-being of every nation is a respect for law and constituted authority. So far as a respect for law and authority is concerned I believe Canadians, perhaps more than those of any other nation, have reason to be proud. I fear however that within the last five or ten years there has been in our country a diminishing of that attitude. This is most regrettable. I do not believe the Canadian citizen of to-day is as anxious to maintain the respect and obedience for the dignity of law as he was ten years ago.

When discussing salaries of judges I believe we should reflect upon the general attitude of the average Canadian toward Canadian laws and institutions. For the last ten or fifteen years, and perhaps for longer than that, I think parliament has not properly appreciated the particular advantages accruing to Canadian citizenship from a strong and highly respected and dignified judiciary. To a great extent I believe parliament and legislators generally have lost perspective through the appointment of so many commissions and commissioners with powers to interpret and to decide law.

A survey of the duties of judges in our Canadian courts would disclose that they have very little leeway in rendering their judgments because they must follow legal precedent. They must follow a code of interpretation and administration of law which has been established for generations and is binding upon them. They must obey the judgments of superior courts, and in their decisions follow those superior court judgments. A good judge must also take into consideration changing law to suit changing conditions. To guide him in this he has a mass of precedent from the court of record to which he belongs. This is not so of commissions or committees. During the war we watched the operations of a rental administrator, a man appointed to deal with problems affecting real property. Very often administrators of this type who are given power to interpret the law have never actually studied any law outside that which they are empowered to interpret. They have had no experience in administration of the law, and no precedents to follow. A judgment given to-day in a similar set of circumstances could be entirely opposite from one given to-morrow. There seems to be no way of checking this process, and the result does not add either to efficiency or to respect for law.

As to the matter of raising the salaries of judges, I have no doubt that each hon. member could think of a judge here and there who may not have a busy time of it and who, we may feel, is receiving adequate compensation for the work he is doing. But we can also think of many other judges who are doing much more work than they are being paid for. The hon. member for Broadview has referred to the judges of the county court of the county of York. The hon. member has indicated that they receive a salary of $6,000 a year. How does that compare with the salary of $15,000 received by the chairman of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? Compare the ridiculous salaries of some civil servants appointed by this government with the salaries of the supreme court judges in Ontario, who when they are on itinerary seldom are able to spend more than a weekend at home. Then look at the death toll among the supreme court judges of Ontario through overwork in the last fifteen or twenty years, and we shall begin to realize that the public, instead of having gained a few paltry dollars by keeping the salaries and the number of the judges down, have really lost through not having enough judges to do the work and by not giving the increased number more work to do.

If we do increase the salaries of the county court judges—and I am not objecting to that—some of them will be getting more salary than the work they have to do entitles them to, but for the most part they will fully earn their salaries. I feel that parliament must in the very near future adopt a different policy in relation to our judges. Our judges are as independent as they can be. I think every Canadian will agree that the independence of our judges is one of the strongest attributes of our national life. Compare with some other officers, a judge who by experience is fitted to administer the law. Parliament passed a law on income tax and appointed a commissioner of income tax. The commissioner of income tax and his officials give a ruling, we will say, that I do not like and which I think is against the law. If I appeal from his ruling I have to appeal to the very man who has given that ruling. I am not saying anything against the commissioner of income tax, but I say that he has been administering the policy laid down by the government and has grown up in the spirit of income taxation. When there is an appeal from his ruling he has no court to which he can go for legal precedents and direction, nor has he that breadth of view of public problems to deal with them in the light of various circumstances.

I think we should approach this question first from the point of view of a strong realization of the dignity and authority of our courts, and, secondly, with the realization that that authority is not any greater than it was in the past, if as great. Personally I do not believe its authority is as great as it was ten years ago. I believe that the people of Canada, who have been subject during the war years to a multitude of regulations and restrictions, have through their lack of knowledge of the law and perhaps from a desire to beat the law, acquired an unhealthy disrespect for the law. I believe that those who administer the law have the responsibility of returning the people to a greater respect for the law.

Look at the experience that a county court judge has had. He has first of all had experience as a lawyer, whether that counts or not. Then when he sits on the county court bench he administers not only federal statutes, orders in council and regulations, but provincial law, orders in council and regulations, and municipal law and regulations, and he performs many other functions, all of which together give him a wealth of experience in interpreting the law.

In the provinces we have a municipal board administering municipal law. They are not members of the judiciary, and have not had the legal experience that our judicial officers have. The workmen's compensation board is another example, and if we want to take a federal example there is the wartime prices and trade board in almost every branch of which there are people engaged in interpreting a law for the enactment of which they themselves were responsible. A fundamental principle of British justice is that there shall be a differentiation between the judge, the prosecuting attorney, the jury, the witnesses, the plaintiff and the defendant, and we should bear that in mind. We should make sure that those who are appointed to office are able to perform the functions thereof. Therefore in supporting to a degree the Minister of Justice in raising the salaries of the judges, I do so not because I believe that at the present time under our present policy they all require an increase, but because I feel that the time has come when we must and should see that our judges are compensated for the increased work we shall be obliged to call upon them to do. But I would urge the Minister of Justice to take note also of the many officers who are performing judicial functions for which they have not judicial qualifications. If we are to increase the salaries of the county court judges, let us increase their work so that the people of Canada will also get the benefit of this increase.

Mr. McLURE: Mr. Chairman, I seldom enter into a discussion of bills of this kind, for the reason that I am not a lawyer and the legal fraternity are well able to take care of them. But I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Justice which deals with the judiciary of my province, Prince Edward Island. The matter I shall mention I have often heard our lawyers discuss in Charlottetown and in different parts of the island.

In Prince Edward Island, the supreme court of which consists of three judges as at present constituted, we have no real court of appeal. I understand that when a judgment is given by one judge an appeal may be heard only by the remaining two judges of the supreme court bench, with the result that if they disagree, as often happens, the trial judgment stands, even when the appeal judges disagree on points not even raised before these trial judges. I might also mention that the outcome of many cases is often unsatisfactory because the amount involved does not permit of an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. Does the bill now before us take care of such a situation as this, and has any consideration been given to the rearrangement of the judiciary of Prince Edward Island so as to provide for an efficient appeal court without adding to the existing number of judges?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This bill does not take care of the situation referred to by the hon. member. Consideration has been given to it at various times ever since I assumed the office of Minister of Justice. One of the suggestions made was that the number of county court or district court judges be reduced and the number of high court judges increased so that there would always be three high court judges who had not participated in the judgment from which an appeal was taken. That has been discussed with the provincial authorities. The hon. member will realize that it is a matter within their jurisdiction. They are the ones who determine what courts they will have and how many judges constitute the bench of each court. Of course we have something to say in the matter. We do not admit that they can provide for any number of judges, a number that would be out of all proportion to the number required to handle the judicial business. But we try to meet the desires of the provincial authorities in providing sufficient judges for the courts which they organize as being the ones required for their local needs.

The suggestion of having one more high court judge and one less county court judge is one that has not been abandoned. It has not yet been accepted. It is a matter about which I understand the local authorities would like to get acceptance by the population of the counties. It may well be that it would require having the county court judges given jurisdiction over the whole island and not over just one district, because I do not think any one county would wish to abandon its rights to a judge in favour of the other counties. It is a matter which is still under consideration, I understand, by the local authorities of the province. The suggestion would involve some additional expense, but the local authorities have been told that I would undertake to recommend to parliament the additional expense that would be involved in the difference between the salary of a county court judge and a high court judge. It is something which the people of Prince Edward Island will have to make up their minds about. I do not think the hon. member would suggest that there be one judge added; I think he would agree that there are enough judges in Prince Edward Island to take care of all the judicial work which arises there. It is a matter for the people of the province to determine how they want that judicial talent used to the best advantage.

Mr. McLURE: When I asked the question I put it this way: to provide an efficient appeal court without adding to the existing number of judges.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. McLURE: I should like to ask one more question. Could a county court judge sit with the two supreme court judges on an appeal case?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That suggestion has been considered, and so far the information I have is that that would not be an acceptable solution. It has been given consideration, but the hon. member knows that there are personal feelings which enter into it, and so far it has not been found by the local authorities to be an acceptable solution.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. HACKETT: In Ontario do not judges of different jurisdictions sit as an appeal tribunal?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They do not form part of the court of appeal. I understand that district or county court judges hear appeals from magistrates, but the Ontario court of appeal is composed exclusively of judges who are appointed to that court and who call in occasionally as ad hoc judges some of their brethren of the high court or of the trial side.

Mr. IRVINE: I should like to add a few words of protest to those of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in respect to the size of the salaries that are being provided for our judges. I want also to add a word of question in respect to the principle which is embodied in section 3 of the bill, that only barristers shall be eligible to be judges. I have just been reminded by the hon. member for North Battleford that Solomon had quite a reputation as a judge, and there is no evidence that he ever knew anything about Canadian law. I have also to remind the house, because I know they have a great respect for biblical characters and biblical lore, that Daniel was an extraordinarily adept judge, and I do not believe he was a lawyer.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): That was a long time ago.

Mr. IRVINE: That was a long time ago, but humanity is still humanity, and—

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. IRVINE: Just a minute; I want to finish this. Laws are not made for lawyers; they are made for people, and therefore the human element, all the conditions under which people err, is of greater importance than any legal dignity. Now ask your question.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Has the hon. member any evidence to show that Solomon and Daniel had not made deep studies in law?

Mr. IRVINE: If my hon. friend had asked the question a hundred years ago whether the moon was made of green cheese and had required me to prove that it was not, it might have been difficult, but it is not very difficult to prove it to-day; and I do not think it is difficult to prove that Daniel was not a student of law in the sense that our barristers are. However, I am not hinging too much on that reference.

Mr. POWER: Good.

Mr. IRVINE: Personally I do not care whether they were lawyers or not. I am making the point that I question very much whether those who are trained in law are the best judges, and I am going to ask the Minister of Justice before this bill is passed to justify the principle involved in section 3. I want to know how it happens that they know more about how to judge the weaknesses of human nature and the errors of men just because they happen to have passed an examination in law. I want to know why it is that some of our most important crimes are judged by juries who know nothing about law at all. If it be that judges alone are eligible for this high office, perhaps we ought to abolish the old practice of trial by jury. But I will leave the minister to clear up that point.

The other point I want to protest against is that of the size of the salaries. I do not object to a man getting a big salary, but this is a public office, paid for out of the public treasury, and I do not think it is good business in a democracy to have such enormous disparities between public service and the average run of people who keep the country going. According to the government's own figures as presented in the Marsh report, which is the latest official publication that I know of dealing with matters of this kind, there are actually hundreds of thousands of people in Canada who get less than $500 a year, and they are the people who will be judged by these judges who receive salaries of $20,000, $16,000, $13,000, $12,000, and so on. Then, when they get too old to judge, they receive three-quarters of their salary as pension, and their wives may come in for half of that three-quarters.

An hon. MEMBER: Two-thirds in some cases.

Mr. IRVINE: Two-thirds in some cases. In my opinion that is building up a plutocratic aristocracy which will not lend dignity to the law but which will rob it of all its dignity, unless it is possible to raise the living standards of the people who are to be judged to something a little nearer that which it is proposed to pay judges.

I was amazed at the reasoning, or perhaps lack of reasoning, of the member for Carleton. He pointed out two things, or perhaps he thought he was pointing out two things, one of which was that these high salaries that we are paying are an evidence of our profound respect as a people for law. If that were good reasoning, we should probably increase or double the salaries of judges and then we would all have so much respect for law that no one would ever break the law and the judges could take a holiday and would not die of overwork, as the hon. gentleman suggested. The other point in his argument was that many of our judges work very hard and therefore ought to be highly paid. They work so hard that they die young. If that is true, my suggestion to the hon. gentleman is that judges' salaries should be cut in half and twice as many judges appointed. They would then live longer, if they are dying of hard work, because certainly increasing their salaries will not make them live any longer if they do the same work they do now for a little less. But that is the kind of reasoning by which we are bolstering up increases in judges' salaries.

I have made my protest and I am going to insist that the Minister of Justice be kind enough, before the bill is passed, to satisfy the house as to the wisdom of the principle embodied in section 3.

Mr. McKAY: I am sorry I cannot be as eloquent as the member for Cariboo, but I have a few observations to make on this bill and several suggestions to offer with regard to our Canadian judicial system. First, I would say that there has been some little question in this house in the past over travelling and subsistence allowance given judges serving on various commissions appointed by the government. A reference has been made to at least one case where a judge received an allowance sufficiently large to provide for his wife while he was serving away from his judicial district. The government should have a clear-cut policy with regard to these cases, certainly so far as expense allowances are concerned. The fact that one judge receives special consideration, and the public is made aware of the situation, results in the public sometimes questioning whether judges are free from political favouritism on the part of the government. The judges are not to blame for that. I am not suggesting that they are, but I do suggest that the government is to blame for allowing it to happen. The house should insist that a flat rate be allowed for expenses and allowances for a judge's wife when away from home, and no deviation from that rate should be permitted. The judiciary should never be placed in such a position that the public may question its integrity.

Secondly, an impression prevails throughout the country that judges serving on commissions receive extra remuneration for such services, despite the fact that it has been stated in this house by the minister that only travelling and subsistence allowances have been allowed in addition to the salary normally received by the judge in the position he holds. I believe it is timely now to make a statement to the public that that is not so, and that the rule has not been broken with regard to the payment of any judges serving on commissions, so that the public in general may be made aware of the true state of things.

Thirdly, I question the method of appointing judges which has been in vogue in Canada ever since the passing of the British North America Act. When a Liberal government is in power Liberal judges are appointed—that is, Liberal in political faith—and should a Conservative government take office at the next election I should not be surprised to see judges of another political stripe appointed, namely, Conservatives. It is obvious that these appointments are political. Too often the appointments are a reward for political activities. Not infrequently, appointments are made to take care of some old war horse who has outlived his usefulness to the party. On the whole, I believe that the men appointed, either by this government or by previous governments, have been good men. I am not suggesting anything to the contrary. I am not suggesting that any of the men in the past have been incompetent. I say, however, that political appointees generally must find it a little difficult to bury the hatchet once they are made judges. They are human, and if they have been in political life for some considerable time they must retain some little political prejudice. While, mind you, there has been very little evidence that that is so, we hear rumours unfortunately from time to time that it is. I believe a better system could be devised than the one we have, and I would suggest that when the appointment of a judge is found necessary, recommendations for the position be invited from the law society of the province in which the judge is to be appointed.

Mr. FLEMING: Is the hon. member satisfied that political considerations would not be taken into account by such bodies in such circumstances?

Mr. McKAY: They might be, but not to such an extent. If they simply picked men of calibre who they felt were capable and qualified for the position, men who had experience, I do not think appointments would be restricted to any one political party. That is the point I am trying to make. I am willing to face a judge who is a Conservative, a Liberal or anything else; they seem to be decent chaps. That is not the point I am making.

I would further suggest that in order to free judges from political prejudice, in whatever degree it may exist—I am not suggesting it exists to any large degree—no member of parliament or of a legislative assembly be appointed as a judge. I know that is not a popular stand to take, and I shall be classed almost as a heretic.

Mr. HACKETT: No one who has been a member of these bodies?

Mr. McKAY: Yes. I knew it would not be popular.

Mr. HACKETT: I am not saying that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Appointments are made from these classes in England.

Mr. McKAY: I know, but I am making the suggestion.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would that suggestion apply also to magistrates in the provinces?

Mr. McKAY: I am speaking chiefly of judges.

Mr. GRAYDON: But would it apply to magistrates?

Mr. McKAY: They are appointed by the provincial governments. I had not thought very much of that, but I should have no particular objection to putting them in, and I think they would do their work very much better if they did not have any political connection.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is that the policy followed in Saskatchewan?

Mr. McKAY: In general I think so. I do not think they are picking out C.C.F. men as judges. As a matter of fact they would have a little difficulty in picking out men who are strictly C.C.F. followers.

Mr. GRAYDON: For magistrates?

Mr. McKAY: Yes. I know that in a recent appointment made in Saskatchewan the individual was definitely not a member of the C.C.F. I cannot say that is general; I cannot say that is the rule all the way through. It seems obvious to anyone that when a young lawyer enters the profession—

Mr. BOUCHER: May I ask a question?

Mr. McKAY: May I be permitted to carry on without too much interruption?

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. McKAY: It is not that I do not want to answer the questions, but I should like to follow my argument.

The CHAIRMAN: No hon. member should be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. McKAY: It is a little difficult for me to follow the trend of my argument if I have too many interruptions. I have tried to answer the questions.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member is pretty decent about it.

Mr. McKAY: As I said, young lawyers enter the profession and frequently look for something. They look forward to the day when they may be judges, and therefore they get into political life.

Mr. HACKETT: Not all of them.

Mr. McKAY: I agree with the hon. member for Stanstead that they do not all do that, because some have no hope of ever becoming judges.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McKAY: We find this situation developing. The young enterprising lawyer gets into political life. I have had experience in this particular field; I know what happened in one instance, where in a partnership one lawyer was a Conservative and the other a Liberal. They were not going to overlook their opportunities. I suppose if a third member was required in the partnership he would be a C.C.F. member. It could happen. If that were done then they would be always on the right side for any appointment that was being made; one or the other of the group would be selected.

If my suggestion with regard to appointments to the bench should be followed—I know it would not be popular—it would tend to safeguard the public against politics playing a part in the administration of justice.

I would further suggest that some method of promotion be evolved for judges. This suggestion may be a little more popular than the previous one. Every hon. member has observed the appointment of lawyers to high judicial places, even to the supreme court, I am told, without any experience whatever on the bench. I believe that is wrong; I think the principle is wrong. It is my opinion, and only my opinion, that judges should be appointed first to a district court, or to the county court, as it is called in Ontario, or to courts of equivalent status. The experience gained in that court would prepare a judge for work in a higher court. The next step upward would be to the court of king's bench. He would receive that appointment provided he had done acceptable work in the court to which he had been previously appointed. Then judges of the appeal court could be selected from the court of king's bench. I do not think it is sound to select men who have had no judicial training whatever and appoint them to high court positions.

The bill before us deals mainly with increases in judges' salaries and allowances for federal judges. It will involve considerable controversy; it will involve a considerable increase in public expenditure. I find myself definitely opposed to such a large increase at this time. Judges can still be found who will gladly serve for $5,000 a year, together with the other allowances which they receive, consisting chiefly of travelling and sustenance allowances when they are away from home. That is a fairly substantial salary, and as I have pointed out before, there always seem to be many men who want the appointments. That is proof in itself that they are adequately paid.

Some of our judges are not too busy. I have in mind a certain district court judge in Saskatchewan who had no more than twelve cases a year. In addition to his work on the bench he has the administration of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, which involves some extra work. But he is not a busy man. You can always tell how busy people are by what they do with their spare time.

I suggested a moment ago that $5,000 seemed to be a fairly substantial salary, but most of our judges in Saskatchewan—and I think this holds good throughout the dominion—receive an additional salary as judges of the surrogate court. That additional salary usually amounts to $1,000, and is added to the $5,000 which they receive as district or county judges. I believe I am right in that.

Mr. HACKETT: They receive that from the province.

Mr. McKAY: Yes, but it adds to their income. That makes the substantial salary of $6,000, plus the allowances for travelling and the sustenance which they receive when they go to a district some little distance from their home. It seems to me that that is adequate. It is going to be most difficult for us to convince the general public that it is not. I cannot see that the work of a judge is any more onerous than that of a provincial cabinet minister. The cabinet ministers I have come in contact with work day and night and are always on the go, and yet we are paying our judges a comparable salary.

We should keep it in mind when we are increasing the salaries that the judge is appointed for life. Most other positions which carry like incomes have not that security. The pensions which are allowed a judge and his widow are exorbitant. Any man who is paid $6,000 a year should be able to make some provision for the future, both for himself and his wife. The public must pay for all this, and when one considers that the old age pensioners receive approximately $300 a year, I cannot agree that a judge's widow should receive much more. I say that because the judge has received considerable income all through his life and could make provision for his future and that of his wife. The pensions, as outlined in this bill, are extravagant and unnecessary and tend to place judges and their wives in a privileged position. I am not trying to be nasty in what I am about to say, but I believe that we have placed the legal profession and the judges on much too high a plane. I am not convinced that they render any greater service than the school teacher or the minister of the gospel, and yet on the whole these people receive much smaller incomes and have no pension protection, and they certainly have not the security of position which judges receive when they are appointed.

With these few words, which, as I said, may sound like heresy, I shall take my seat. I still maintain that we have to cut the tax bill of this country. We are spending huge sums of money. If I thought that by not increasing the salaries of judges we would tend to make it difficult to obtain judges because we would not be able to get the proper type of men for these positions, I would not oppose it; but as it stands now I feel there are plenty of men to fill these positions at the present salaries, so I am in opposition to this increase.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Chairman, I have rather full notes here on this subject, but I must confess that if I did not know the hon. member for Weyburn to be very honest and capable I would almost think that somehow or other he had stolen my notes, for what I am going to say is almost identical with what he had in mind; and of course as a result I need not take up a great deal of the time of the committee.

There is a point, however, I should like to make here in respect to the argument that the salaries of these judges are so high that there is a tremendous spread between their incomes and the incomes of thousands of people in our country who get so little; and the old age pensioners have been referred to in this respect. This is true, and we have no argument against it except that fundamentally we are arguing at cross purposes. The fundamental error is not that one is getting so much and the other is getting so little; the fundamental error is that under our present system of tax finance, when we raise the salaries of judges or government appointees we are spending somebody else's money, and that is where the rub comes.

When these matters are under discussion here I cannot help thinking that there are two attitudes that may be taken. One seems to be the attitude taken by all the parties except the Social Credit party; the other is the attitude taken by us. The one attitude is that there is only so much money to go round, and that money must come from the taxpayers. Just so long as you agree that is so, then so long shall we have the argument that there is unfair distribution of the scarcity of money; and on that basis the argument would be sound. But the Social Credit philosophy in that respect is a philosophy of spending. That may sound strange to some who have not heard of it before, but money is only good in so far as you are able to spend it. For that reason we believe our taxation system can be extensively revised, even to a point of almost doing away with it, apart from some injustices that might occur; and that if only we can look at this matter as being the spending of new money which is not other people's money, perhaps that problem would dissolve. Of course the argument that increasing the salaries of judges is an injustice imposed upon those getting lower salaries would have been a good argument to advance when our own indemnities were increased by reason of a $2,000 expense allowance. We did not hear those arguments then. My observation, of course, is that we knew we needed it and could not get along without it; nevertheless the same argument applies.

It has always struck me as rather strange that those who administer the law get more than those who make it.

Mr. KNOWLES: But not as much as those who break it.

Mr. HANSELL: That is so, too. I do not want any unfair inference to be taken from my remarks. I am quite satisfied now with the indemnity and allowance we are getting, and I am well aware of the fact that those who administer the law must have a background of training which costs a great deal of money. They have to go to university; they have to be articled to some law firm; they have to start out in business; they take a chance on whether or not their ability will get them somewhere, and I know all these things have to be taken into consideration. But regardless of the remuneration paid those who make the law, let us take as an illustration the one person in this country who after all is responsible for the administration of all the legal aspects involved in the country's business. I refer to the Minister of Justice. I believe his salary is $10,000, with perhaps an allowance. But I am certain he has a tremendous responsibility. These judges get higher salaries than he receives. I could mention others. Take the Prime Minister, who gets a certain salary. I would have to turn to my estimates to refresh my memory as to the exact figure, but it occurs to me that the Prime Minister does not get as much as the chief justice of Canada, and he gets no pension when he is defeated at the next election. Then there are other government appointees who receive more than the Prime Minister receives. We have the Minister of Finance being paid $10,000 a year, and the governor of the Bank of Canada receiving $30,000 a year. I could never quite understand how that came about.

I shall refer to one other matter, to which I believe I shall not do better justice than did the hon. member for Weyburn, when he referred to the manner of appointing judges. To many who become judges the appointments are just juicy political plums. I refer to the matter in that way because I am certain that the appointment of judges is not necessarily based upon the ability of the appointees as lawyers. Many who receive appointments to the bench have not had outstanding careers in law. There are men who have outstanding legal careers and who have divorced themselves from politics but who, in my opinion, do not stand a ghost of a chance of becoming judges in Canada. I believe therefore that some other method should be devised for the appointment of judges.

I shall take my seat after asking a question. Are the salaries of judges subject to income tax, and are their expense accounts as outlined in the bill subject to income tax?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Salaries of judges are subject to income tax. Travelling allowances provided are not taxed.

Mr. DROPE: I have listened with interest to the discussion which has taken place this morning, and would suggest a medium through which we could raise the salaries of judges without adding any greater expense to the country. I believe we have too many judges. Reference has been made to the large amount of work they are doing—and this may be so in some cases. However I can visualize many counties in the rural sections of Canada where the judges could easily take on the duties of one or two more counties, and still do justice to their work. I believe that probably we would attract a better class of judges if we paid higher salaries, and I would favour such an increase in salaries. At the same time I believe there should be a reduction in the number of judges.

I hear a good deal of criticism from the fact that judges withhold too long decisions in cases they have tried. It appears that there should be some provision whereby in a reasonable length of time a judge would be compelled to give a decision in a case. The expenses in connection with the trials of many of these cases have been heavy, and yet there does not appear to be any way of compelling the judge to give his decision. I believe it would be in the public interest if action were taken along this line.

Speaking generally I believe the work of the judiciary in Canada has been satisfactory, and that we should see to it that they receive a remuneration which would make them independent and fit them to do a better job in the administration of our laws.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Ontario): As a rule I am not in favour of increasing public expenditures, but in this instance I am heartily in favour of the move made by the Minister of Justice. For too long have the judges who administer our laws been underpaid. I welcome this opportunity to support the action of the Minister of Justice in bringing this bill forward.

Some novel suggestions have been heard in committee this morning. The hon. member for Cariboo referred to Solomon. Well, judging from the number he had around his house, Solomon was probably a better judge of women than of most other things. And as to Daniel, he would probably have qualified as a judge at a circus, because he landed in the lions' den.

The suggestion that non-lawyers should be appointed as judges in our courts is a novel one. I do not suppose that even a socialist would set a blacksmith to lay bricks on a house. After all, any man holding a responsible position must have some training for the position he occupies. Judges have to have a practice in law at the bar for a term of years before they become qualified to hold judicial posts.

The hon. member for Cariboo referred to the administration of law by juries. Sometimes juries are right and sometimes they are wrong. I am not going to say in which class most of their findings would fall. But as a solicitor who has been practising for a good many years I have often wondered what particular use there was for juries in a country where we have such well-trained judges on the bench. Some of the findings of juries upon facts given in evidence make one wonder how those findings were arrived at. Let me add, however, that where juries are employed they are given direction by a judge who, after all, presides in the court and has control of its proceedings. It seems to me hon. members are going a long way when they advocate a system, such as was suggested this morning, under which we would not have trained lawyers on the bench to administer matters coming before them.

As usual the hon. member for Macleod had to give us the social credit theory—and I understood it this morning just as well as I have understood all the social credit theories we have listened to. I sit opposite them, and hear them all the time. Never yet, however, have I had the satisfaction of coming to a final conclusion of what it is all about, beyond the fact that it adds to the volume of Hansard and to the satisfaction of hon. members who have spoken.

Mr. LOW: Keep your mind open; you will learn.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Ontario): I cannot. I have had two sessions of it, and have learned nothing.

Mr. LOW: Don't blame us for that.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Ontario): The hon. member for Macleod also referred to juicy political plums. Let me tell him that there are many practising barristers and solicitors who do not look upon these appointments as juicy plums. Many of our best lawyers refuse to take appointments to the bench—and the Minister of Justice knows it. The result is that we must take men who have not the outstanding qualifications possessed by many others in the profession. For these reasons I certainly do not look upon an appointment to the bench as a juicy political plum.

Reference was made this morning to the law societies of the different provinces. For fifteen years I have been a bencher of the Law Society of Upper Canada. I am now a life member of that body, and I know that very often this matter has been discussed by it. They are actively interested in having the very best appointments to the bench.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Thursday, July 18, consideration of the motion of Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose on Thursday last I was discussing the question of dominion-provincial relations. Before I proceed with my remarks to-day I propose to take a few minutes of the time of the house to summarize briefly what I had to say up to that time.

I had shown that the question of dominion-provincial relations had first been set out in the British North America Act of seventy-nine years ago; that that act set up a federal system in Canada, and not a unitary system—in other words a two-government system, not a one-government system—with a central government on the one hand and provincial governments on the other.

I had pointed out that this federal system placed responsibilities on each of these two types of government, and on one of them, namely the provincial governments, it had placed a limitation of taxing powers, the provinces being confined to direct taxation and denied indirect taxation. I had shown that the advantages arising from confederation had not been equally distributed as between the different sections of Canada, not because of any deliberate intention, but partly because of the accident of the degree of centralization that it brought about.

I had shown that certain national policies, particularly the tariff, had borne inequitably on different sections of the nation. I had shown that certain social services and the cost of those services, responsibilities largely of the provinces, had multiplied rapidly in the seventy-nine years, and that as a result, certain areas in Canada either had a very low standard of social services or had them only by imposing such a high rate of taxation as to be almost confiscatory.

I had shown as well that in the seventy-nine years since confederation there had been several adjustments between the dominion and and the provinces with respect to subsidies and so on, most of them, as we see them to-day, more or less minor in character. But in the nineteen thirties the situation had become desperate, and in 1937 this government appointed a royal commission to deal with the matter. That commission after three years' work had reported in 1940. The report failed to secure the agreement of the province in 1941; and then the government, realizing that something had to be done and practically everybody accepting that decision, entered into the wartime tax suspension agreements with the provinces, whereby the provinces vacated certain tax fields and the government reimbursed the provinces to the extent substantially of the revenues which they had been receiving from those taxes.

With the termination of the war and the wartime tax suspension agreements being due to terminate, some next fall and others next spring, the federal government came forward with its August 1945 dominion-provincial proposals. Those proposals dealt not only with finance and taxation but with an expanded programme of social security and with a programme of public investment. Those proposals were modified slightly again in January of this year; and then in May of this year, in a conference with the provinces, failure to secure agreement was again the result. On June 27 last, when the Minister of Finance brought in his budget, he brought forward a much watered-down proposal which has been advanced to the provinces one by one since that time.

I had shown that in these various approaches to the problem there had been a progressive increase in the tax burden proposed to be levied on the Canadian people in order to meet this problem, increasing from $40,000,000 in 1940 under the proposals of the Rowell-Sirois commission's report to over $80,000,000 under the wartime tax suspension agreements, and to approximately $180,000,000 under the first proposals of the dominion government advanced last August, and approximately $200,000,000 in its modified proposals of last January; to which had to be added large sums for social security and public investment, bringing the tax burden sooner or later to be imposed on the Canadian people to $600,000,000 in the case of the dominion government and an addition of $200,000,000 on the provinces or a total of some $800,000,000 in all.

At the hour of adjournment on Thursday last I was dealing with the government's excuse for its meagre programme of tax reductions for this year, and for its action in omitting from its present programme the social security and public investment aspects of the proposals which it advanced last August. The efforts of the government in trying to represent that tax reductions by the government were dependent upon the approval of its proposals by the provinces I suggest, Mr. Speaker, leaves a false impression which is unworthy of the government of Canada. The government had to reduce taxation under the wartime tax suspension agreements of 1942 with the provinces. In its agreements with the nine provinces it was required by the provinces to get out of those tax fields to some extent at the end of the war. I know something about it, because I was on the other end of the agreement with Manitoba at that time. The provinces would not have gone into the agreements if they had not felt that they would be terminated when the war was over and that they could get back into their vacated tax fields without an undue burden on their taxpayers. In that connection I might read one section from the tax suspension agreement of the dominion with the province of Manitoba. I do not know whether the clause reads exactly the same in the agreements with the other provinces, but I presume it does. This is how section 20 of the tax suspension agreement with Manitoba reads:

> The dominion shall have the sole right to levy taxes on personal and corporation incomes of the calendar year ending on the thirty-first day of December nearest to the date of the termination of this agreement, and with respect to personal and corporation incomes in the following calendar year undertakes to reduce its rates of taxes by such an amount as will enable the province again to use the income tax and corporation tax fields, and in particular the dominion undertakes to reduce its rates of tax on corporation incomes by at least 10 per cent of such incomes.

That was a definite undertaking in the agreement signed four years ago. In compliance with that undertaking the government had no choice but to make these minor reductions in taxation which the minister announced in his budget.

Now with respect to the abandonment by the government of its social security programme and the public investment programme, what explanation does the government give for abandoning these two features of its 1945 proposal to the provinces? It is going ahead now province by province with the possibility of less than nine agreements being made; possibly eight, possibly seven, possibly six, possibly less; no man knows—possibly all. One cannot but regret this plan of approaching the provinces one at a time. One is compelled to wonder if the dominion is really anxious to have the larger provinces come in. I suspect it would rather see the larger provinces stay out.

The dominion is now paying $88 million to the provinces under the wartime tax suspension agreements. This amount will be saved the dominion treasury as the agreements expire, and if a province does not enter into a new agreement the dominion saves the rental it would otherwise have to pay. The government therefore has no right to say it has to abandon its social security and public investment policies because it has not been able to get the agreement of the provinces. If the government reaches agreement with all the provinces, it will pay what it has agreed to pay—$198 million, it is estimated, for the year 1947; and if it makes agreements with less than nine provinces the cost to the government will be less. So why talk about abandoning the social security and public investment features of this policy which it proclaimed so loudly last August? In comparison with the August 1945 proposals as amended by them in January, the saving to the dominion under the government's present plan would be colossal. All this present plan can cost the government of Canada is $198 million a year; the last-year plan might cost and would in due course cost the Canadian people, dominion and provincial—and they are the same people—$800 million a year. As I said, in comparison with the August 1945 proposals subsequently amended, the lessened cost to the dominion under the government's present plan would be colossal. For that reason I say that the dominion government's attempt to saddle upon the non-agreeing provinces the responsibility for postponement of their social security programme is just pure bluff.

But the government will say that unless it has the exclusive use of these three fields of taxation, income, corporation and succession duties, it will not know what the provinces are going to do in them. The government hints that while it may be endeavouring to raise national production and national income, the provinces in the meantime may be trying to lower it. This is another type of superiority complex which is unworthy of the dominion. The dominion government says it wants to pursue anti-depression policies; is it to be assumed that the provinces will want to pursue pro-depression policies? This superior attitude which the dominion is developing towards the provinces is anything but conducive to good dominion-provincial relations. Is the dominion government assuming that if it reduces its corporation and personal income tax rates by small amounts to raise the level of production and employment, the province of Ontario or of Quebec or of British Columbia is going to be so stupid or so reckless of its own interests and the interests of Canada that it will penalize individuals and industries by imposing higher taxes? The logic of the government's argument is that the provinces can no longer be trusted to act responsibly in fiscal matters. It brings into the open in a way that has never been brought out before this superior attitude of the dominion government and its secret invisible government of advisers.

A few centuries ago kings and ministers fell into the hands of alchemists, those who claimed they could produce gold from the philosopher's stone. Gold has not the importance to-day that it had a few centuries ago; but we are building up in Ottawa with the concurrence of this government, a public service which is beguiling the people into believing that there is some magic or mysterious way which is open to dominion officials, but to no others, to provide services and goods without imposing great obligations by way of taxation. If the present government's social security and public investment policies were sound last August and sound until last April, then they were also sound in June, when the government brought in its present proposals. The dominion has no justification for dropping its social security programme because of any action taken by the provinces. All the facts indicate, Mr. Speaker, that the government fears to proceed with its own policies, that it fears the consequences of the heavy burden of taxation they would impose. It looks as if the government was pleased when the conference failed, particularly if it could lay the blame on somebody else.

Let me summarize briefly my views with respect to this matter. My observations of the last nine years, during which I happen to have been very close to this problem, indicate to me two things. First, the people of Canada will not be satisfied without an agreement; second, they will not be satisfied without an agreement arrived at by conference with all the provinces as opposed to one made by the government's piecemeal procedure.

My recommendations in this matter can be stated very briefly. They are just four in number.

First the dominion government should repeal certain minor taxes, such as the gasoline tax, amounting to three cents per gallon, and the tax on electricity of eight per cent of the consumers' bills, which taxation fields it invaded as a wartime measure. To comment on that in passing, let me remind the house that in the case of this gasoline tax, three cents per gallon, farmers have been held down with respect to farm prices even as their costs are rising; and now the dominion continues to impose three cents a gallon tax not only on gasoline used by farmers but also on gasoline used by fishermen and many others. With respect to the eight per cent tax on consumers' bills for electricity, I know of two provinces, Ontario and Manitoba—there may be others—the governments of which are taxing their whole people, in order to do what? To lessen the cost by fifty per cent of the distribution of electrical energy to outlying communities. In the face of that generous policy the dominion government comes along and puts on an eight per cent consumer's tax on electricity, offsetting to at least that degree the policies of getting electrical energy extended to outlying areas. That is number one.

My second recommendation is that the dominion should stay out of these minor tax fields and leave them to the provinces. I cannot take time to-day to enlarge upon these things, but let me just say that in 1867 the provinces were required to give up their revenues in the form of indirect taxes, the chief source of revenue they had; and now, seventy-nine years later, they are asked to give up their important sources of direct taxation—income, corporation and succession duties; and the dominion still wants to stay in the other and minor fields of direct taxation. I say that the dominion should stay out of the minor fields and leave them to the provinces.

Third, the dominion should call another conference in order to try to achieve a united front in the attack on post-war problems.

Fourth, there should be set up in this dominion a central dominion-provincial committee to study dominion-provincial relations so that the present situation may be improved. In any event we should have a studied and acceptable plan for the time when the government's present five-year tax agreement plans either fail or come to an end. This question of dominion-provincial relations in Canada is too important not to have the best brains study it for as long as may be necessary in order to arrive at a plan that will receive the practically unanimous support of the Canadian people.

Briefly those are my suggestions. As for leaving these minor tax fields to the provinces, I wish to bring not only my own humble judgment but the judgment of the Rowell-Sirois commission, set up in 1937, which made a better study of this question than any other body that has studied it since confederation. What was proposed by that commission was that the dominion should have the sole recourse to income, corporation and succession duties; but that commission left no doubt in the minds of the Canadian people where it stood in respect of the other minor taxation fields. This is what the commission had to say at page 85 of volume 2 of its report:

> Each province will be left with, relatively speaking, a remarkably stable revenue. A large part of the revenue of some will consist of a fixed cash payment from the dominion. The taxes with highly variable yields will have been transferred to the dominion. Those with fairly constant yields will remain. (The chief exceptions are the public domain revenues and the mining tax rebate in some provinces, and the profits from the sale of liquor.)

Listen to this—the report continues:

> It is implicit in the plan, but should be clearly stated, that the dominion will respect the tax fields left to the provinces. Adjustments in the joint dominion-provincial-municipal tax structure will undoubtedly be necessary and desirable from time to time, but the dominion can no longer consider itself a free and independent agent to take unilateral action to this end when it pleases. The essence of the plan is to leave provinces and municipalities with adequate, suitable revenues, and this would clearly be defeated if the dominion should extend its taxation into fields already occupied by the provinces or on objects jointly taxed without making satisfactory compensatory adjustments. Such action would violate the whole spirit of the arrangement.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the view of the dominion's own commission after three years of study. It is the commission's view with respect to the attitude of the dominion government towards the minor fields of direct taxation in which the dominion now persists in remaining, even though it is asking the governments to give up the three large fields of taxation.

In addition to the views expressed by the Rowell-Sirois commission, I might point to the views of one of the provincial premiers, the premier of Nova Scotia. What he had to say may be read at the bottom of page 38, and on to page 39 of the proceedings of April 29 of the dominion-provincial conference. The date, as I say, is April 29, 1946, and I should like to read what he had to say about this particular aspect of the problem:

> How do the provinces stand under the proposals? We have two exclusive fields of taxation, one of which fields is valueless. There is joint occupancy of other small fields such as gasoline, amusements, electricity and the like. Then there are the proposed grants, which the dominion calculated at $15 per head, increasing as the production of this country increases. In return we are asked to surrender our rights to collect income and corporation taxes, two fields which, as I said, yielded last year something in excess of one and a half billion dollars. We have then to surrender the rights to collect income and corporation tax, two fields which I stated last year yielded something over one and a half billion dollars. That is the position which the provinces are asked to take.
> Let me ask you, Mr. Chairman, and the delegates here, whether they represent the dominion or the provinces, let me ask anyone who is within sound of my voice, let me ask that great body to which we as public servants are all accountable, the citizens of our provinces or of Canada, let me ask any of those people whether they think that is a fair or honourable or dignified position in which to place the provinces in this dominion? Provincial autonomy will be gone. Provincial independence will vanish. Provincial dignity will disappear. Provincial governments will become mere annuitants of Ottawa. Provincial public life—and I do not think these words are too strong—will be debased and degraded. I cannot think that such a state of affairs is desired by the representatives of the government of Canada here to-day, my one-time colleagues. I am sure that they have no wish or desire to see such a state of affairs come to pass in this country nor can I believe that such a state of affairs is desired by the people of this country.

So much for the views of the Rowell-Sirois commission and of the premier of Nova Scotia.

As I said, at confederation the provinces gave up their indirect taxes, which then represented almost their total source of revenue. They gave them up for a subsidy payment which, even now, seventy-nine years later, amounts only to about $17,000,000; and now, after that seventy-nine years, the provinces are asked by the dominion to give up their chief sources of direct taxation—income and corporation and succession duties. When the provinces say, "At least leave us a few minor fields of taxation," the dominion says no. I suggest that such an attitude is not democratic. It is not cooperative. It represents not the conference mind but the dictatorial mind. It represents cœrcion. It smacks of centralized dictatorship. It represents the type of public discussion that this country ought, until the last extremity, to try to avoid.

I come now to the second of the two topics I indicated that I wished to deal with, namely, the question of the attitude of the government of Canada toward the cooperative movement. With respect to the cooperative movement let me at the outset make two brief comments. To me the cooperative movement is one of the counter balancing forces to the present trend in government toward centralization and bureaucratic controls. I regard the cooperative movement as a bulwark against both cartelization on the one hand and state socialism on the other. It is a movement that is here; it is a good movement, and nothing must be permitted which will hamper its development along sound lines.

My position with respect to the government's proposed taxation of cooperatives can be briefly stated in five sentences. Before I state these views let me say that any responsible government must try to find a system of taxation which is fair to all its constituents. Neither this government nor any other can let itself get into a position where unfair taxation laws drive people from one type of enterprise into another. Having said that, let me outline our position with respect to these cooperatives.

First, we are opposed to the government policy of imposing taxes on moneys which would have been paid out in patronage dividends by certain cooperatives in 1944 and 1945. We have a situation in Canada where, from 1930 until now, these organizations were not taxed on patronage dividends, or savings, or earnings, or whatever you choose to call them; and the government now comes forward with a policy saying that after 1946 they are not to be so taxed, but with respect to what has gone before they say: We are going to put a tax on these earnings, or dividends, or whatever you call them, for the two years 1944 and 1945.

Mr. ABBOTT: They are not putting taxes on; the tax was there. There is nothing in this budget that is putting a tax on.

Mr. BRACKEN: Let me ask the hon. member, who will be the Acting Minister of Finance, is it the government's policy from now on to exempt cooperatives from paying taxes on patronage dividends?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, of course.

Mr. BRACKEN: All right. If the government had been bringing in this measure two years ago, what would have been your procedure? Would you have said you would tax them for two years and after that you would not tax them?

Mr. ABBOTT: The fact remains that the law is there. Whatever we might have done had we brought the measure in two years ago, the law is there to-day.

Mr. BRACKEN: My hon. friend cannot get away from this fact—

Mr. ABBOTT: It has been there since 1930.

Mr. BRACKEN: These organizations were not asked to pay taxes until about 1941.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, 1940.

Mr. BRACKEN: It was not suggested that they pay taxes any time after 1930 until then, and none have been paid. Now the government comes along with a policy which says that from 1946 on, these particular cooperatives will not have to pay taxes on patronage dividends, but that whether they are taxable or not, it is going to make them pay taxes for 1944 and 1945, the two best years they have ever had.

Mr. ABBOTT: We are going to change the law.

Mr. BRACKEN: It does not add up to any consistency whatever.

Mr. BENTLEY: The same law was there in 1930 and is still there; it has not been repealed.

Mr. BRACKEN: The law has not been changed in this respect since I do not know when. These organizations were not taxed and have not been taxed as yet. After all these years the government has come forward with a policy which says that from now on they should not be taxed but they are going to be made to pay for 1944 and 1945, the two best years that they ever had. We are opposed to the government policy of imposing taxes on moneys which would have been paid out for patronage dividends by certain cooperative organizations in 1944 and 1945.

Second, we are opposed to the provision governing payment of patronage dividends, by which they must be paid in cash. We take the position that cooperatives should be allowed to pay these dividends either in cash or its equivalent of any kind.

Third, we are opposed to the government limitation that transfers of stock ownership cannot be made free of tax except on purchases made subsequent to the year 1941. I shall make some observations on these latter matters in a moment or two.

Fourth, we are opposed to the government's policy of compelling cooperatives to pay patronage dividends to non-members. We are opposed to this because it is a matter of internal cooperative management and something which should not be made the concern of the government.

Mr. ABBOTT: The commission recommended that.

Mr. BRACKEN: It does not matter what the commission did; you are the government.

Mr. ABBOTT: In spite of that fact, we are entitled to pay some attention to their recommendations.

An hon. MEMBER: You cannot take it.

Mr. BRACKEN: Fifth, with regard to the government's plan that taxes must be paid on three per cent of capital employed, I want a further explanation from the government when we go into committee. As the matter now stands this plan is capable of different interpretations, and in addition it is not made clear how in practice it will be administered.

Let me now deal more specifically with the government's belated policy of dealing with pool taxation over the years prior to 1946. Ordinarily a taxing authority is supposed to know its business. What would we think as individuals if the government had been in doubt for some sixteen years as to whether we were liable for taxes or not? Members of this government had let the pools remain untaxed from 1930 to 1941 without protest.

Mr. ABBOTT: And the preceding government.

Mr. BRACKEN: All right, if that helps the hon. member any.

An hon. MEMBER: It does.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Take your head out of the sand and look forward.

Mr. BRACKEN: Then, under pressure from the pool's competitors the government felt obliged to say, "Well, we don't know; you may be taxable or you may not." This was before the election. They said: "We will try it out in the courts. Let us have a test case." And before the test case had reached the courts, the government said, "No; we will appoint a royal commission." That was also before an election. Now for the first time in sixteen years the government has a policy with respect to taxing cooperatives. Now they say to the pools: "If you will give us two cents of the 3½ cents patronage dividends that would have been paid in 1944 and 1945 if doubts had not arisen in the mind of the government, we will call the matter off."

This government has asked the farmers of Canada—I will be a little more specific; this government has asked the wheat growers of Canada—to take $1.25 a bushel for a certain portion of their wheat and $1.55 a bushel for certain other portions, while the world price is at a vastly greater figure. The pool organizations supported that policy loyally, and as a recompense the government comes along and says that on the amount that you regard as patronage dividends in the last two years amounting to approximately 3½ cents a bushel we will take two cents. That is the government plan, even though from now on it is going to discontinue it as a matter of considered government policy.

The government has been forcing western farmers to take $1.25 basis Fort William, plus a participation certificate, for a part of their wheat. It has been forcing them to sell on export markets at $1.55 a bushel, considerably below the price paid to their competitors. Let me put it this way. Suppose the government had made up its mind earlier, as it should have done; what would have been the result? The result would have been that the years 1944 and 1945 would have been treated precisely as the years 1946 and 1947 are to be treated from now on. The government could not possibly bring forward that kind of policy and say it is right to tax these people for two years and then it is wrong forever afterwards to tax them. The government either had a taxation policy or it had not. If it had not a taxation policy, it has no business now using its power to extract money from Canadian citizens under the threat of prolonged and costly litigation.

I want to deal for a moment or two with the restrictions with which the payment of patronage dividends are surrounded. As I read resolution No. 12 the government is going to require that patronage dividends be paid in cash. If the government persists in that attitude it means that the government is making a special, deliberate attack on the methods used by cooperatives throughout this country to finance their enterprises and to keep the ownership of cooperatives in active hands instead of in the hands of the estates of members who have passed away, or in the hands of members who have retired or left the country. Cooperatives generally follow what is called the revolving fund or revolving door policy. I can best illustrate the point by reference to pool elevator companies. Up to the end of 1928 the pools acquired their operating plants by deducting two cents a bushel from the sales of the grain of pool members, and one per cent of the value of the grain sold was set up as a commercial reserve. Let us say that a pool member, from whom such deductions were made, passed away with perhaps $500 payable to his estate. As patronage dividends are paid, say in 1945, or in any year, an amount equivalent to three-quarters of a cent per bushel is deducted from them, so that the cooperative members proportionately acquire the interests of those who have retired or become inactive or passed away.

In so far as transferring ownership is concerned, if the pools wish to deduct an interest in such ownership from patronage dividends, I do not see why the government should interfere. I am not talking about deducting money for buying new elevators or for the extension of capital equipment; that is an entirely different matter. I have never heard anyone object to paying taxes on funds so retained. I am talking now about the transfer of ownership from inactive to active members. These organizations want to have a membership that is alive. They do not want all their stock held by the estates of people who have died. In this respect we shall urge that the resolution be amended to provide that patronage dividends may be paid in cash or its equivalent.

I also object to the provision that these transfers can take place only on purchases made subsequent to the year 1942. They should be permitted in the case of purchases made back to 1925, and they should be permitted in the case of all cooperatives, in order not to interfere with the cooperative practice of maintaining active membership in the way I have just indicated.

The third objection I raise is with respect to the requirement that patronage dividends be paid to members and non-members alike. I think this is an interference by the government with the internal management of the cooperatives, and I am opposed to such interference. I do not object, and I know of no cooperative that objects, to the payment of taxes on earnings made by cooperatives through business done with non-members; but why should we interfere with their internal plan of management? The members of the pools risked their small capital in developing organizations which they think serve them well. Why should someone else, who takes no such risk, have the same advantages as the members of the pools, particularly when they can become members by signing an application and paying a dollar?

This measure is before the parliament of Canada to-day chiefly because of the fact that these great cooperative organizations of western Canada, in the years when both they and similar business organizations were making money, became the subject of protest by their competitors. That is how the matter first arose. Studies have been made in connection with cooperatives generally, but that is how the matter first arose, and it was as a result that these studies were made.

So far I have confined my remarks to the wheat pools, but I am reliably informed that, aside from the collection of back taxes, the objections which are held in the case of the pools are held also by cooperatives generally throughout Canada.

Before closing I want to refer to a statement made in this house on Wednesday last by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. McGarry), as reported at page 3540 of Hansard for that day. The hon. member admitted that he did not understand the resolutions but said he would quote a man who did; and he quoted the words of Doctor Coady, who he said is now and for many years has been director of the cooperative movement in the maritimes. For the information of the house let me say that Doctor Coady is not director of the maritime cooperative movement. Doctor Coady is director of the extension department of St. Francis Xavier university at Antigonish, Nova Scotia, and his views in regard to cooperatives are entitled to very great respect. But if any friends of the cooperatives in the maritimes wish to have the considered views of those organizations, let them apply to the Minister of Finance, who on July 11 received a telegram from the maritime cooperative services, representing all the major cooperatives in the maritime provinces. Since a copy of the telegram has been handed to me I shall take the liberty of reading it into Hansard. This is their resolution:

Resolved, that members and delegates of the Maritime Cooperative Services Limited assembled in annual convention in Moncton this 10th and 11th day of July, 1946, urge that the Minister of Finance, the Right Hon. Mr. Ilsley, reconsider proposals contained in the resolution in the budget speech respecting taxation of co-operatives with specific reference to:

(a) Motive—we cannot agree to cooperatives being classed with profit business in motive of business operation;

(b) Taxation based on percentage of capital;

(c) Classing non-member business in same category with member business;

(d) Payment of patronage dividends—co-operative members to have the right to dispose of their own portion of surplus;

(e) That any change made should not apply to organizations whose year ended prior to the announcement of the 1946 budget.

These are the considered views of an organization which speaks for all the larger cooperatives of the maritimes.

In concluding these remarks, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a final appeal to the government. My appeal is that the dominion-provincial conference be reconvened. As I said at the outset, we in Canada have a federal system. We have that kind of system because we could not have had confederation under any other system. And that is just as true to-day as it was seventy-nine years ago, and it is important that we maintain this system, in spirit as well as in letter. That kind of organization requires the utmost of cooperation and good will and the minimum of prejudice and misunderstanding. We should not be content with saying we are through because we have worked at it for nine months. The government could have started earlier and continued later. But whether or not they continue, the problem will be here and the Canadian people will have to deal with it. If the reconvening of the conference is essential to a consideration of the social security and public investment policies, it should be reconvened.

The government says these social security and public investment policies were important. If they were, the government should not give them up so easily. If, as they say, a united agreement is necessary, then the government should be trying to get that agreement, no matter what the circumstances were or are. I neither criticize nor condemn any of the men who took part in the conference. As we stand to-day the dominion will give orders and the provinces will be expected blindly to fall into line. The civil servants at Ottawa will lay down the law and the provincial governments in the provinces and the members of the legislatures of the provinces will be expected to comply. The dominion, with its supposed better mentality, will be pulling the strings, with the provinces expected to dance to their tune. We cannot get results in this way.

I therefore urge that the dominion and the provinces should meet again to cooperate in working out public investment and social security measures, as well as taxation policies. The last mentioned is all we have in the present arrangement.

The dominion says, "Give us the right to these taxes and we will give you $15 a head". They wash out the great programme of social security and public investment. The dominion has an exaggerated idea of its ability to regiment and control employment and production entirely on its own. The provinces have still great powers for the development of natural resources, the construction of roads and public undertakings; and their cooperation is vitally necessary in the implementation of an over-all Canadian plan.

If we were a unitary system, with only one kind of government, then that would be an entirely different proposition. But it is not that way, and it is not going to be changed. Any realistic man in Canada must know that. I appeal once more to the government to take this matter in hand. I can sympathize with some of the ministers. I lived during many years in one of the provinces which stood to benefit under an arrangement of this kind. I recall very clearly the more than three years when we in Manitoba found all kinds of serious difficulties, in studying this matter.

Negotiations have been long, perhaps wearisome to some ministers. Some of the ministers are tired and perhaps piqued by the slow progress made. But this is a case that calls for united action, not divided action. It calls for strengthening of the federal system, not the weakening of it. It calls for avoidance of centralized dictation and the preservation of the maximum of provincial autonomy and provincial responsibility.

Above all, our federal system calls for unity and good will, not friction and misunderstanding, as we face the task of bringing Canada to a measure of stability and confidence which is not in evidence to-day, but which the times demand, and which are within the grasp of a united people.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with profound attention to the forceful and aggressive address delivered by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken). But my mind was rather disturbed, because while my ears were wide open to what he said, my eyes were on the speech he delivered at a dominion-provincial conference on January 14, 1941. That was a long speech, covering eighteen pages of the record of that conference. The hon. member says that he has been put under false apprehension. It may be so. He was very friendly with one of the commissioners who is now dead. We know, therefore, whose was Esau's hand and whose was Jacob's voice in 1941. But in 1946 it would be quite interesting to know whose was Jacob's voice, while Esau's hand was the same.

Times change. Time marches on. I am sure that if the Rowell-Sirois report has been implemented by the government, it is precisely due to the able speech delivered by the present leader of the opposition on that fateful day, January 14, 1941. The hon. member was then, as he is to-day, a man of great experience, the dean of the premiers of the nine provinces. Here is what he said about the Rowell-Sirois report:

This commission was required by its terms of reference to make a very wide inquiry. It has done this in a most thorough manner. In the judgment of many competent authorities, it is one of the most intensive and complete public inquiries ever undertaken in the British empire on the workings of a federal state. Canadians now, and in the days to come, may differ as to the wisdom or efficacy of the specific recommendations of the commissioners; but the careful and exhaustive research on which the recommendations were based will stand to-morrow, as it stands to-day, a bench-mark to which we shall always return.

Yes—"Canadians now, and in the days to come"; who would have said then that in the days to come it would be on this 23rd day of July that the hon. gentleman would deny what he was boasting with such emphasis five years ago?

But that is not all, Mr. Speaker. I quote again the same gentleman:

We in Manitoba—

Now it is "we in Ottawa"—there is a slight difference.

We in Manitoba—

It may be "we in Toronto"—

We in Manitoba respect this report because it comes from men whose ability and integrity are generally admitted—men who have had the advantage of the fullest possible facilities for reaching sound conclusions—facilities that have never before in Canadian history been provided to those charged with similar responsibilities. To the men responsible for this outstanding contribution to our national life, I wish on behalf of the people and the government of Manitoba to convey our most sincere congratulations and thanks.

An then as he sat at the clerk's table, the hon. member summarized, the four major recommendations of the commission. What were they?

1. The transfer to the dominion government of a wholly modern responsibility—unemployment relief.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

When the war came along unemployment to a large extent decreased, and that question is not argued by the hon. member at this time. Then:

2. A change in the method of arriving at dominion financial assistance to the provinces.

This is very important. It changed the basis of taxation according to the British North America Act. Now let us see what will please the premiers of the provinces:

3. The transfer to the dominion government of the sole right to levy income tax, inheritance tax and corporation taxes.

And No. 4:

4. The assumption by the dominion of the debts of the provinces.

The subtitles were these: Implementation of Substance of Report Essential to National Unity. Very important, Mr. Speaker. Another one was this: Implementation of Report Enhances Provincial Autonomy. Then under the subtitle, Unsoundness of Tax Structure Inherent in Constitution, I read this:

As long as the provinces have resort only to direct taxation, and their revenues are supplemented by the dominion only through subsidies calculated on the obsolete basis of population—just so long the dominion cannot impose the taxation which it should on incomes and inheritances without seriously reducing the important sources of revenue of many provinces, including certainly Manitoba. We suggest that as long as the provinces retain the field of direct taxation, our national tax structure will continue to present this irrational aspect.

Another subtitle, Mr. Speaker—most interesting—was this: Ill-Balanced Tax Structure Bears Heavily upon Low Income Consumers and Unprotected Producers, and under that heading I find this:

Let me touch on this for just a moment. As long as the dominion has to raise the bulk of its revenues by indirect taxes upon consumption which bear most heavily upon the low income groups, its taxes will continue to inflict the grave injustice which has been inflicted during the depression upon the poor, upon the consumer, and upon the farmer and other producers who are not protected by the tariff. The poorer a man, the larger his family, the less protected his market—the more heavily this tax structure bears upon him, regardless of the province in which he lives.

Some of the other subtitles are: Heavy Indirect Taxes Increase Cost of Living—Ill-Balanced Tax Structure Leaves Relatively Heavier Burden upon Low Income Groups—Present Tax Structure Transfers Income from Relatively Poor to Relatively Rich. Under the subtitle "Decision Provinces Must Make", I find this:

The decision which the provinces must make is whether they shall retain their right to impose these direct taxes and get less and less from them, or whether they shall voluntarily relinquish them now for adequate considerations, financial and otherwise.

That is what was said by the hon. leader of the opposition a little more than five years ago. I regret to have to remind him of what he said on that occasion. It may or may not be of some embarrassment to him, but as he is the one who by his eloquence was responsible for the adoption of the Rowell-Sirois report by the government, it is my duty to put this before the house so that even those who were not in public life at the time will not be unaware of the stand taken by the hon. gentleman on that occasion.

As I read the amendment which has been moved by the financial critic of the opposition I find that his first complaint is that the budget does not provide for tax reductions in the calendar year 1946. No tax reductions! I am for tax reductions provided that the expenditure is not too heavy, and I will have a word to say about that in a moment.

When the Prime Minister sponsored the motion to establish the Rowell commission I thought that his purpose was to clear the skies, to relieve Canada of all the difficulties which had been a cause of contradictory jurisprudence, and to give ample opportunity to the government at Ottawa and to the provinces to stand up and be self-supporting for years to come.

If we read the British North America Act attentively and read at the same time what was said by Lord Carnarvon, who sponsored our constitution in the House of Lords, we shall realize that the purpose of those statesmen who had foresight and who did not change their minds every year or every five years, was to create independent entities, to create provinces that were to be independent of the dominion government and of the dominion parliament just as much as they were to be independent of each other. The word 'exclusively" is repeated time and time again to show that the jurisdiction of one authority is not the jurisdiction of the other. The speech of that great Englishman can be summarized in these words: we will teach them, teach Ottawa and the provinces, we will teach them all to mind their own business. It is precisely because of the encroachment that has been made upon these separate fields of jurisdiction, by the dominion on provincial ground and by the provinces on federal ground, that we reached the time when the commission was created.

And what happened? What was it? The intelligensia appeared before the commission from everywhere. They even brought Bruening, the ex-Chancellor of Germany, to tell the commission what had happened over there and what should happen here. I asked Mr. Dunning if Bruening had come as an expert, and he said, no, as a witness. Nevertheless he came to illuminate the minds of the commissioners. One of them was coach to the present leader of the opposition when he was premier of the province of Manitoba. All sorts of men came before the commission. And what was the purpose of the commission in drafting its report? The purpose was precisely to annihilate the provinces, and I am surprised that a clear-sighted man like the leader of the opposition did not realize that when he bestowed such praise on the commission. I remember, and I mentioned it in the house in February, 1941, that in January of that year on the eve of the meeting of the dominion-provincial conference at Ottawa I heard a professor from Queen's in one of his broadcasts saying: We should not have ten countries in Canada, ten small independent nations—and he had a word of contempt for the ten small countries—we should have only one big country.

I can tell the hon. gentleman that I am very glad that the government was a little cautious about implementing that report, because if one were to take for granted what he said on January 14, 1941, nothing would be left to the provinces; they would be completely destroyed; for they would have no powers of taxation. It is dangerous to listen to bad counsellors, bad advisers; and when I say that to the hon. gentleman who leads the opposition I mean it, and I make a great distinction between himself and the board of strategy of his intelligentsia in Toronto. I am sorry for him that he listens to them, that he is guided by them, that he becomes a tool in their hands. And when I speak of his board of strategy I do not include Mr. Drew.

I come to federal politics. As, five years ago, the present leader of the opposition spoke as the premier of his province, to-day he spoke in this house as the leader of a great dominion party—using "great" in a manner of speaking, but there are still great men in it. And if the Conservative party—call it "Progressive Conservative", "Tory", or what you will—is not stronger to-day in this country, it is because the hon. gentleman has listened to the voices of those who, though they cannot be elected by the people of Canada, continue to run the group. I regret that that is so, because they are bigoted and narrow-minded, while the hon. gentleman himself is broad-minded and is not bigoted. Those men are responsible for the division which exists in this country. If the hon. gentleman spoke to them with the same aggressiveness and forcefulness as he spoke to-day in this house I am sure there would be no more articles in the Ontario papers against the province of Quebec. It is pretty tough to listen to the predicants of national unity. National unity does not exist in this country. It is unfortunate; no one regrets it more deeply than I do. Unity will exist when the two old parties get rid of those who, as I have proved to the house, pull the strings for their own benefit. These men have not the confidence of the people, and how can the leader of the opposition expect to regain the confidence of the people by listening to the Jonahs who have been rejected by the whale, rejected not only once, as was the Jonah of the old testament, but every time they faced the people? Even the big whale could not swallow them.

I heard the hon. gentleman speak of cooperatives. He has views on the subject, which no doubt I shall read about in the five o'clock papers. It was impossible to take a note of what he said. There may be some good suggestions in what he said on that subject, and if so they may be taken into account by the government. But with regard to the wheat pools he knows very well that the price which the grain growers get for their wheat now on the London market is $1.55.

Mr. COLDWELL: At Fort William.

Mr. HACKETT: London is a different story.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, but there are subsidies. When I look over the border I find that the price of wheat is $2.15 or $2.18. The United States price is a little higher. That is because our trade channel is up a dead-end street, or a one-way street. I leave that for meditation by the hon. gentleman, who can draw his own conclusions and communicate them to his friends of the elevators of the west.

But how can the hon. gentleman complain about taxation and extravagance? Here are the first two points emphasized in his amendment by the financial critic for the opposition:

(1) That the budget does not provide for tax reductions in the calendar year 1946;

(2) That the budget gives no indication of any serious attempt to eliminate extravagance or effect economies in the cost of government.

It was easy to practise economy, but once again the Conservative party has missed the boat. When the loan policy was brought to the house it was found that it was wrong. The Conservative party approved it. They approve anything that is going to be done for other countries. I am not so bigoted as to say that we should do nothing for others, but in one respect I agree with R. B. Bennett when he said "Canada first"; I believe that Canada should be served first and that others should be served by Canada only after Canada has been well served. So these gentlemen have not the right to complain about extravagance. I think of their own turpitude when they mention extravagance in their amendment. When I spoke of that in the house the newspapers had big headlines, "Quebec member opposed to British loan," thereby insinuating that the member for Temiscouata was anti-British. I am not anti-British, but I am pro-Canadian. I see in all papers "Quebec" members have done this, "Quebec" members have done that. Always Quebec. Well, I decided to visit English-speaking Canadians outside of the house—in the Ottawa valley, in the St. Lawrence valley, and along the Atlantic coast, to the great city of Halifax. There I repeated exactly what I have said in this house—and what I say in my own county—because I have no different language for the one or the other. When I believe something I say it, whether I am wrong or right, and I admit I am wrong when I am proved to be wrong; but that has not occurred yet. I have the happiest recollection of a meeting which I had the honour to address when I told my audience that what was lacking in the House of Commons was the Canadian spirit, which should be the inspiration of our legislation. I did not say anything unpleasant about my colleagues. I said of them, sir—and I included yourself—that they were a fine bunch of fellows, which is true. It is unfortunate however that men of good will belonging to all parties in the house very seldom succeed in having their serious and most valuable suggestions adopted. In some mysterious way success comes to those on the outside. When a member of parliament makes an academic speech it does not go any farther than the house; but if an outsider, who has the halo of an expert, becomes an adviser to the government, at once his word is gospel and he must be listened to. This is very dangerous.

I said a moment ago that the Rowell-Sirois commission was a fiesta of the intelligentsia. All the people that could be got together from all around came to give, not evidence, but presentations, and they suggested all sorts of things. Most of the time it was not in the public interest, but in their own personal interest, to present a fine bill, to be well paid, and to see the little job or the fat job on the horizon coming to them just as quickly as possible. That was the purpose.

How can the hon. gentleman who leads the opposition, and his supporters, complain about bureaucracy? The Rowell-Sirois report is the magna charta of bureaucracy in Ottawa. That is the trouble, and if we wish to redress wrongs of the past we must undo the workings of the Rowell-Sirois commission and we must return to what we were before the adoption of that report in an oblique way.

I am not going to speak much longer, although I have much more to say; but I mention again the Canadian spirit. The Canadian spirit should be our inspiration, and I say to some of my colleagues who were born outside, but who are Canadians at heart, as well as to all those who were born in this country: imperialism is the political religion of men without a country. Imperialism does not appeal to youth and at the present time there are two ways which are open to youth, one of which lies in the way of thinking that characterized our forefathers. It is the red-blooded Canadian way, the basis of which is patriotism rooted in the land of birth or adoption, above everything else. That is patriotism. But patriotism has long since been discarded, to be replaced by imperialism and then by internationalism; and internationalism is the synonym of communism. And, I say to my hon. friends, the other way that is open to youth is communism. I am in direct contact with the people and I know what our youth are thinking. I know what the returned boys are thinking. I know what the boys who stayed at home and were busy in essential occupations also know. Those boys are better Canadians than previous generations, and by that I mean that they think more of this country than is evident here in this house.

Take for instance the question of the flag. The public sentiment has not been understood by those who have designed a monstrosity which has no meaning, because the purpose of a flag is to be the sign—the "ensign", or the sign—of a country, and of one country in particular, without any subjection or suggestion of hegemony in relation to any other country. I say public sentiment was not understood. It was not understood so well in this house, under this roof, as it is understood by the youth of the country, and I hope that when the time comes to make a choice, that choice will not be made in camera but in the open, so that the sentiments that are necessarily in the hearts of men of good will will appear, and youth will choose a real Canadian flag instead of the red flag with hammer and sickle.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): It is because the rules of the house forbid the Social Credit group moving an amendment that I wish to speak for a few minutes to-day in order to clarify our position both with respect to the motion and on the amendment moved by my hon. friends the Conservatives. I am sure hon. members will not feel that I am holding up the business of the house unduly if I take a few minutes to clarify our position. That would have been done had we been able to move a subamendment.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), speaking in this debate a few days ago, expressed his desire to reach as soon as possible a position where he could bring in a balanced budget. That desire is quite understandable and from the personal point of view it would be for him something of an achievement. It certainly is a goal that has been sought by nearly every Minister of Finance. Moreover, by balancing the budget the minister would remove a great deal of the criticism that is usually levelled at him by the opposition in this house and throughout the country. Pressure toward a balanced budget has always been strong, and that is particularly so after a vast spending spree such as is exhibited during a destructive war.

I should like to point out that grave danger is involved in the determination to balance the federal budget. That does not hold so true with respect to provincial budgets, but it does with respect to a federal budget, especially because there is another way out. The minister should take warning that any undue pressure or haste on his part to balance his budget might result in a period of deflation. If such a trend is induced through the demands of unthinking opposition to the government, then I say it is inevitable that Canada's gross national production will be forced down to low levels, and that means only one thing, a low standard of living, depression, bread lines and human misery in a land of potential abundance. The federal government should resolve to do everything within its power to see that Canadian production of all kinds is kept at a high level. In my judgment, $11 billion a year is a reasonable minimum objective at the present time. The objectives should be revised from time to time as our productive capacity increases.

This government will come to realize sooner or later that balanced budgets will never meet the needs of a modern mass production economy so long as we continue under the system of financing which we now have. Balanced budgets in the federal field are bound to be restrictive in their effect, restrictive in every way. I refer to the traditional budget in which expenditures are brought within the revenues which the government expects.

I come now to the question of economy as it relates to the budget, and about which we have heard so much in the debate up to this day. Particularly I want to present it as it relates to a possible balancing of budgets.

The Social Credit group in this house has always advocated economy; but by "economy" we mean efficiency of expenditure and management within our country's ability to produce goods and services. We do not mean undue pressure to cut down expenditures, to bring into balance those expenditures with anticipated tax revenues. The weakness of the Conservative position, as I understand it from their amendment, is that they press strongly for reduced government expenditures; but, as has already been pointed out, at the same time they advocate increased services to the people. The only possible result of such a position is a period of depression, a period of deflation. As the Conservatives learn more about the weaknesses of our money system they will come to understand that this is so.

The weakness of the C.C.F. position is just what the Minister of Finance pointed out last Thursday. They advocate huge government spending, but their only suggested alternative to high taxation is government ownership of the means of production from which they say there will accrue to the government profits with which services will be extended to the people without higher taxation.

Mr. KNOWLES: Plus greater production.

Mr. LOW: An examination of the results of socialist rule in any country to this day will reveal the fact that while in many of these countries, notably New Zealand and Australia, increased social services have been extended to the people, they have been extended as a result of higher taxation. In no single country to this day can the C.C.F. demonstrate that the application of the socialist principle of government ownership has enabled the government there to extend social services without increased taxation. In her apology the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum)—and I took it as an apology on behalf of Australia and New Zealand—did enumerate the services that these countries are giving. I appreciate those services; I believe everyone appreciates to the full the increased services that those countries are giving. They have done very well in this respect, but it is only fair to point out that nowhere on the face of the earth are tax levels and per capita national debt so high as they are in those countries. What is more, even under socialist governments, economies have bogged down into periods of depression where great quantities of goods and services have wasted, while human beings have languished in want because they have not the means to buy.

Mr. McCUAIG: Where has that happened?

Mr. LOW: In Australia and New Zealand. I say that the C.C.F. position is very weak indeed and is certainly no comfort to debt-burdened, tax-ridden and freedom-loving people.

As a contrast to the other two opposition parties, the social crediters have been consistent in showing the government where the money is to come from. Whenever we have advocated increased services to the people we have repeatedly urged the government to exercise the sacred responsibility which was placed upon them by the British North America Act to have a financial commission, or in the alternative, the Bank of Canada, issue for them debt free all the purchasing power required by all Canadians to do their business. The Minister of Finance, the governor of the Bank of Canada, and many other authorities admit that this can be done scientifically; that it is simply a matter of which way the people choose. History records that many times this method has been used in the past to the entire satisfaction of the people. Even the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Sinclair) who spoke just before one o'clock, can see how wrong it would be for people to go hungry when large quantities of foodstuffs are being utterly wasted in Canada simply because starving people have not the purchasing power with which to buy the goods. Even he could understand the action of his own government if they should create and issue to these people who are starving, who are in want, the amount of money which represents the value of these goods so that they could be consumed and the people kept from starving. I say, "even the hon. member for Ontario" in all friendliness.

The Social Credit party has been the realistic one, and it is now realistic. We know perfectly well that this time would be a poor one to create and issue additional new money. We have not advocated such a thing under present conditions of consumer goods shortage; we are not now advocating such a thing, but we have advocated more goods. Open wide the floodgates of production by removing every possible restriction to production so that goods and services can quickly come into balance with the money that is available to buy them. This is the only sensible way to meet the threat of inflation. It is the way we have consistently advocated. It is only when goods and services, not to come, but already in existence, cannot be bought by the people who need them, that we advocate issuing any new money, debt-free. But when we do suggest and advocate that it be issued we ask that it be issued in sufficient quantities to bring consumption and production into balance and keep them there. If that is done we will take the hills and hollows out of the economy over the years.

Social crediters have always declared that the bond-debt method of government financing is the most wasteful, inefficient and unfair method that can be adopted. To my knowledge—and I have searched earnestly for the information—its advocates have never yet been able to show that this system is anything but what I have already said: wasteful, inefficient and unfair.

I understand the objects of the bond-debt method of government financing; and I am speaking of it now entirely separate and apart from the taxation method. It has two objects. In the first place, its object is to encourage thrift, and with that I can quite agree. The second object is ostensibly to manage the money supply so that there will always be purchasing power in amounts to suit the needs of the people. The idea is that in good times, when things are going along swimmingly, the government will sell bonds, thereby withdrawing purchasing power and in some respects controlling the possibilities of inflation. In bad times the idea is to buy back the bonds and thereby put into circulation new money, thus increasing the purchasing power of the people generally.

A number of obvious weaknesses are apparent to anyone who will study this whole matter and its effects. When the government sells bonds, those securities will inevitably within a very short time find themselves in the hands of those who do not need the money to buy goods and services out of current production. I have already pointed out in this debate that if a mass production economy is to serve the people in this day, then mass production must be matched by mass consumption. I have also pointed out the poorly distributed purchasing power one would find in Canada if a survey were carried out, as a survey was carried out in the United States. Another speaker in this debate has pointed out the poor distribution of pent-up war-time savings upon which business is depending so much for future orders. I say that mass consumption cannot be brought about if large groups of our population find themselves without adequate purchasing power to meet their needs. Under such circumstances goods will be wasted.

The second weakness of the bond-debt method of financing is that it diverts investment money from the development of resources in our country into the sure-thing investment field of government bonds. We often wonder why we are not getting the development of Canadian resources we ought to have. It is simply because we are opening the door wide to investment in government bonds by offering the people a sure thing at a good rate of interest. That becomes a drain away from investment in the resources of the country, to the extent that our resources cannot be developed as they ought to be under private enterprise. Of course private enterprise is blamed. To many people socialism seems to be inevitable because of our failure to recognize this weakness of the bond-debt financing system. Correct this weakness and socialism will cease to become a threat.

The third weakness is that the system actually accelerates and aids maldistribution among our citizens. Only a few people during their lifetime can afford to buy government bonds or securities. The natural resultant of that is the fourth weakness. It creates a special social evil by making it possible for some men to live off the mortgaged toil of their fellow men. No man is entitled to that right.

The fifth weakness of the system is that it piles up burdens of unpayable debt, because of the high interest involved. I have already pointed out that even in peace time, when one would expect we might be able to do something about the matter, this country did not even pay the interest on the debt we piled up. From 1919 to 1939, roughly the peace period between the two wars, this country increased its debt by almost the exact amount of the interest payable on the debt, which simply meant that we could not meet the interest, let alone whittle down the principal to anything like decent proportions.

The sixth weakness of the bond-debt method of financing is that it makes continued high taxation necessary. When the Canadian people face the future realizing that every year they will have to dig up through taxation $481,000,000 for interest on the debt, they can see little hope for anything like a period of freedom, a period of full enjoyment of the resources of our country. The only way we shall ever be able to deal adequately with a situation of that kind is to change our method, to get at the balancing of the purchasing power in the country with the production of the country in another way; and that way Social Credit has consistently and constantly advocated. If some hon. members, as they have said, have been sitting in this house for years without coming to understand Social Credit, that is because they have not applied their minds to it. People who have applied their minds have found that the solution is sound; and once they see, they become ardent advocates and devotees of the principles we advocate.

Bond-debt financing stands condemned as a means of managing the distribution of purchasing power within our country. The best evidence of its failure is the fact that over the years since it was first introduced the economies of all nations that have adopted it have been torn by periods of disastrous, recurring depressions, and by increasing loads of debt and taxation upon the people. Let me repeat that when social crediters advocate any additional government expenditures we shall always help the minister by showing him where he can get the money without resorting to additional taxation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, just one word about cooperatives before I conclude. The social crediters do not waste their time in trying to bring the tax burden of everyone, including the cooperatives, up to the same high level. What we should all be spending our time on is in finding a means of bringing the load of taxation on all individuals and businesses down to the level of the taxes paid by cooperatives. We should be doing something sensible if we did that. Social crediters will do everything within their power to protect the cooperatives from injury through taxation; and we shall have more to say on the specific resolutions when they come up, following the vote on the budget. With the reservations I have already mentioned, the Social Credit group propose to vote for the amendment because of what it says and not because of what some people might interpret the wording to mean.

Mr. E. G. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the budget under discussion is perhaps the most unpopular budget ever brought down by a Canadian government. It is particularly unpopular with the average Canadian, who looked for a great deal but finds very little in the budget proposals to be happy about. While the minister refers to the severity of the attacks on the budget by members of this house, and perhaps feels that such attacks are unjustified, the leaders of the cooperative movement and cooperative associations across this country have used very strong language in their criticism of the budget proposals in regard to cooperatives. I have here, in the Manitoba Cooperative, an editorial entitled "Discrimination", which says:

> The viciousness of the proposed legislation contained in the 1946 resolutions is aimed at the eventual destruction of the cooperative organizations.

Taking into consideration the number of letters and telegrams I have received, I am sure the leaders of cooperatives across the country are unanimous in their opposition to the budget proposals in this connection. I could continue quoting from various articles along the same line appearing in the press, but I shall deal with this phase of the budget later on in my remarks.

I should like to compliment the minister on the very hard work he put into the preparation of the budget. My honest conviction is that no one in Canada has given more of his time and effort in the service of Canada than has the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). The most unfortunate thing is, however, that so much was expected of this budget and so little relief has come in the way of taxation or in the laying down of a real peacetime economy. It is like the old saying that "the mountain has laboured and brought forth a mouse".

At page 3589 of Hansard the minister says:

> The C.C.F. opposition has shown no concern about our expenditures.

He continued by saying:

> I enjoy listening to them; but they never come down to this: How would they finance? That is the question they never answer.

Hon. members have complimented the minister upon his capitalist budget. I agree that it is well-nigh impossible for any capitalist government to give anything little better than rationed poverty to the masses of the people, and still permit the legalized robbery of the farmers and workers of this country. A capitalist government is put into power primarily to protect capital, and so far in this country the voters have been successfully misled by people like Trestrail and have voted for capitalist governments. In Great Britain the people have decided, in the traditionally British and progressive way, to chart a new course. There they have voted in a government with an economic policy similar to that of the C.C.F.

Mr. MacNICOL: Nothing like it at all.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I did not hear anyone advocating, and especially before the last election, that Canada should follow in the traditions of Great Britain. However, among other things I wish to cover two main points. First, I wish constructively to criticize the government for its failure in governmental policy, and in regard to the present budget, for its failure for laying a basis of a high and enduring standard of living for our people, and to show them what can be done under democratic socialism.

Second, I wish to deal with some of the specific resolutions in regard to the cooperatives. I see that the minister is not in his seat at the moment, but I believe, if he will forget the capitalist viewpoint, that I can illustrate the democratic socialist way whereby a high standard of living can be achieved for all our people.

At the very beginning of the minister's speech the other day he said, as recorded at page 3589 of Hansard:

> Most of the speeches have been directed to the urging of measures which would help here and there, but few of the speeches that have come from the opposition parties in this debate have taken into account the necessity of keeping within our means.

Again, to quote from his remarks at page 3596, he said:

> We can go ahead and incur huge deficits, and do everything that everybody wants for a while if we can get people to lend us the money.

These two statements coming from the minister seem like an echo of the pre-war Liberal government policy: Where is the money coming from? Much praise has been taken by the government for their war effort, instead of attributing such success to the efforts of the people, which have been magnificent. However, the people of the country, after giving their services for the winning of the war, and producing the goods of war, now find that they have tied to their necks a millstone of a national debt of $16 billion, and an annual tribute of around $481 million to the capitalist class of this country. I think, if a true answer could be given as to who has won this war, it would not be the returned serviceman who to-day is looking for a home and finds he has to pay twice what it was worth before he finds one, or the worker who is trying to fight for a decent wage. It would be the privileged few who have had cost-plus contracts, and who now greedily demand the same privileges of profit.

I wish to hasten to say here that I do not believe that all capitalists are terrible ogres without soul or conscience. But to-day, as down through the centuries, we are fighting a class struggle. Some of us are on the side of the common people, while some are on the side of special privileges. Since we have said this has been the war of the common man, then to interpret that into real victory it would mean that so far as Canada was concerned there would need to be, considering that we had relatively full employment during the war, at least the creation of 600,000 new jobs for the 800,000 people in the armed services. This would allow 200,000 to be absorbed through marriage, in the permanent army and in other ways. Then we could really say we had full employment.

These 600,000 new jobs would have to be in addition to jobs for those employed in war industry during the war, who would on reconversion have to have jobs. Nothing short of scientific planning can accomplish this, nothing short of the responsibility of the government realizing that everyone has a right to work, and accepting the principle that full employment means more jobs than applicants. This is not possible under capitalism. Capitalism can function only on a large float of unemployed.

I wish to bring two examples before the house, one of which is taken from the Bankers' Magazine of London for August, 1943. It states:

> Workers of the future will require fears of unemployment and poverty to ensure the necessary drive in this world of internal and international competition.

Another quotation taken from the London Times of January 23, 1943, states:

> Unemployment is not a mere accidental blemish in a private enterprise economy. On the contrary, it is part of the essential mechanism of the system, and has a definite function to fulfil.
> The first function of unemployment (which has always existed in open or disguised forms) is that it maintains the authority of master over man.

Under the capitalist system the minister has only two main sources of revenue, those of taxation and borrowing. The average person is burdened with taxes for this and taxes for that until he cannot stand any further taxation. Big business and monopoly are still running this country. They will be taxed pretty well just as much as they choose and no more. So that the minister is in a quandary as how to give old age pensioners superannuation at sixty years of age, how to give free national health services and still keep taxes down on big business and allow them their profit.

I have regard for the minister in his plight, but I am far more concerned about the people, tens of thousands of them, and more joining the ranks every day, who realize that if everyone was allowed to work and that if wages and prices were fair, every Canadian would be assured of a decent standard of living, that we could have adequate old age pensions at sixty years and free health care for all our people.

Let us look back over history. I said earlier that we have had a class struggle down through the ages. May I say that for scores of centuries the world's wealth producers were mostly the property of an owning class—chattels, slaves. Some one wrote that "next to the preservation of life itself, the craving for freedom is the dominating objective of all conscious life." Slaves wanted freedom and frequently rebelled. One such rebellion led to Sparticus, a slave gladiator, who defied the power of Rome for about three years. When this rebellion was quelled, the fear-maddened owners used frantic cruelty. Along the Appian way, six thousand crosses were planted and six thousand slaves were nailed to them.

Changing methods of production and fear of rebellions gradually brought owning classes to adopt changes, first to serfdom, and then to the free wage serf. They reasoned something like this. Slaves and serfs must have enough of their own products to keep them in fit condition to work and they must also raise children to keep up the supply of workers. Why not give them full freedom and hire them for a wage that will allow them to buy their own living? We will give them the form of freedom. As long as we own the means of life, namely the natural resources and the machinery of production, transportation and distribution for the primary producer, we will hold ownership of the markets where they must buy and sell. By owning these, we can keep for our own use all they produce above what it costs them to live. We will let them imagine that they are free and we need no longer fear heavy rebellions. There you have the greatest hoax in all history. George Bernard Shaw, with his usual caustic wit, called this hoax "giving the workers the key to the street."

We have the form of freedom, but economically we are the slaves who produce our own living and also the luxury living of the owning class. In addition, we have built up, with the labour of our hands and brains, the great industrial, transportation and distribution systems that exist in the world today. We have done all this for slaves' pay and a wage for our labour and a price for our product that would on the average buy us a living.

The present great wealth producing systems are, legally—because the owning class have always been able to make the laws—the property of a small owning class. About all we own is the right to produce wealth when the owning class can use our labour or buy our products at a profit. If anyone should question this I would refer him to the labour disputes that we read about in the newspapers, where wage increases are demanded by workers and only conceded by employers when it can be proven that the cost of living has gone up. The fact that the workers are producing a large surplus above their cost of living wage does not seem to be considered much by either side.

I would remind hon. members that in Canada, of which we are all so proud, we have achieved in the past year our greatest national production of $11 billion. In the light of that, the standard of living in this country is disturbing. I have here the Labour Force Bulletin, put out by the Department of Labour, which shows that in 1945, excluding those in the armed forces, we had 4,256,000 people gainfully employed in Canada. In the Canadian Unionist of May, I find another table. By doing a little bit of arithmetic I find that of the 4,256,000 who were gainfully employed in 1945, those earning over $2,000 numbered 687,700, and the number earning $2,000 or less who were gainfully employed was 3,568,300. Subtracting those earning less than $2,000 but paying income tax from the total labour force, exclusive of the armed services, gives us 1,891,000 people or approximately forty-four per cent of the total population gainfully employed who do not qualify to pay income tax under the exemptions of $660 or $1,000 for single and married men respectively, and eighty-four per cent earn under $2,000. This confirms that even in this country we have not the freedom we should have when we are capable of producing a gross national income of $11 billion.

I have contended that a capitalistic government gets the money for social services and government expenditure mainly from two sources, by borrowing and taxation. I wish to illustrate how a democratic socialist government, such as the C.C.F. advocate, would get the money and how the standard of living of our people would be governed only by the availability of labour applied to our resources. In other words, what is physically possible would be made financially possible. The minister has challenged us on that. Let me illustrate by taking first the capitalist set-up and then what could be done under the democratic socialist set-up.

Let us take as an example, a large factory in a capitalist set-up. Here the owner pays the wages and other overhead in the cost of producing the goods. As an example, in a shoe factory the wages are paid, and taxes and overhead are all the responsibility the factory owner has. Then the owner has the legal right to all the shoes produced, less his costs. Under modern technology this means he accumulates wealth when he sells the surplus shoes, wealth which, unless reinvested, remains out of circulation. The owner can wear only one suit of clothes and one pair of shoes at a time, and even if he lives in the most riotous luxury he can spend only a small portion of his profit. Consequently huge accumulations of wealth become built up, which ordinarily are not reinvested and do not come into circulation. This means that under private monopoly huge accumulations of wealth become centralized. The same is true of our large financial institutions where, through usury, money is accumulated and concentrated.

In this example of the shoe factory, which is typical of all modern factories, we have the workers receiving only a small portion of the total wealth produced. It is clear to see that, if we use this reasoning for all industry, huge surpluses of goods of various kinds are produced without aggregate wages paid to buy back what is produced. This in the past has been the chief reason for exporting. Countries have had to fight for world markets, sometimes going to extremes in the struggle for markets, even to the extreme, one might say, of attempting to sell woollen underwear to the Africans or longer shirttails to the Chinese. Eventually capitalism breaks down, and it is true that the last two great wars were fundamentally fought for markets. This sort of process under capitalism forces periods of economic stagnation and collapse, periods which are coming closer and closer together. Here, too, is the reason for unemployment and the failure of capitalist governments to give the opportunity of full employment.

Let me illustrate by another example. In the A. O. Smith body plant at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, 20,000 employees originally employed produced a unit of 10,000 car frames a day. Then, around 1930 they built a semi-automatic plant which required only 2,000 men to produce the same unit of 10,000 car frames daily. A few years later, a fully automatic plant was built requiring only 200 men, or a displacement, in the production of this daily unit of 10,000 car frames, of 19,800 men. This has taken place over some thirty years of industrial and technological development. Under the capitalist system the owner has no responsibility for those 19,800 unemployed men. They are thrown into the lap of the government and become its responsibility. So that to-day, even though it be argued that plant working conditions are the very best, where there is air conditioning, good hours of work and good pay, it is still essential to socialize such industries, because private ownership of these factories gives too much financial and economic control over the lives of our people.

The minister has said that no one has told him where the money is to come from. I think I can tell him where it would come from if the people owned these factories. The wealth, instead of belonging to a legally privileged class, would belong to the people.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the hon. member suggest that, if the country were under socialism, plants should not be modernized and equipped with the very best and most up-to-date machinery that could be got to cut down the cost of production?

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I absolutely agree that that should be done.

Mr. MacNICOL: Well then, what you have said just now does not bear out at all the answer you gave me.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Yes, it does. What we would use would be all the technological and scientific knowledge we have. We would be able to use these factories and these technological advances and improvements to have mass production, pay good wages in these factories, and have fair hours of work too. As I pointed out in giving this example of a shoe factory, when we had paid good wages to these people and sold enough shoes for that purpose, the shoes which remained would belong to the people, and, when they are sold, the money would go into the consolidated revenue of the country, and we would be able to provide social services, old age pensions and other things. There would be opportunities, for everyone willing to work at real jobs with decent wages. All would have a real incentive to work, and our national production would be governed only by the will to work. I do not think the minister can properly criticize this proposition of publicly owned enterprises or contend that they are less efficient than those privately owned, for I believe the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) has said that government-owned plants operated more efficiently than private companies during the war.

Mr. MacNICOL: He never said any such thing.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): In closing this part of my argument, let me say to the minister and to the government there has, in my opinion, never been a greater betrayal of the people than that of using the taxpayers' money in building up billions of dollars' worth of plant and equipment for war and then to scrap or sell them at fire-sale prices when these could have been converted to peace-time use and met the crisis of peace production as they met the crisis of war.

Instead of that, what have we to-day? Rather than enabling the small wage-earner to be free from income tax, so that at least we could have income exemption of $1,000 for a single person and $2,000 for a married couple, $50 a month for men over sixty years of age and women over fifty and free health services for all our people, we now find the minister and his government trying unsuccessfully to balance the budget. As I said before, the interest alone on our national debt is approximately the total pre-war government expenditure. The present financial policy is ridiculous and stupid.

To-day there is nothing but unrest, nothing but fear of the future. The question arises, what could and should be done to prevent this?

First, the government should have set up a federal planning board representative of organized labour and farmers, industry and government. Scientific surveys should have been made to find out the productive need of the country; the potential productive capacity; possible employment in each field; proper basis of producer prices and wage levels, arrived at by negotiation. But what has the government done in this respect? It would seem that the only authority for planning is the wartime prices and trade board, carried over from the war. I have no quarrel with the personnel of this board, except to say this. If this board is to have power deliberately to raise farm costs and living costs without responsibility to parliament, I protest most strongly. We should have a national planning board with representation of organized agriculture and labour and industry and government, and this board should be responsible to parliament. Such a board, working in conjunction with the Minister of Finance, would be able to dispel the growing fears of our people and it would carry democracy into our national planning as never before.

As I have already said, the increase in exemptions allowed the people in the low-income brackets leaves the people no better off than they were a few years ago because everything has gone up to such an extent.

I cannot join in the optimism of the minister over his budget. I consider that such a budget will eventually lead to the government finding it necessary to protect big business by the government's emergency powers; it will find increasing unemployment, and unrest will force the government to use strong-arm methods to keep so-called law and order. To speak quite candidly, it will force the government to use measures of fascist tendencies; for fascism is only ultra-capitalism, capitalism in its last stages when capitalist forms of government are protected at any cost, where religious hatred or race baiting is thrown in to confuse the issue, but where, as I say, preservation of specilal privilege is the supreme purpose.

[Mr. McCullough.]

I wish now to deal with cooperatives. I want to add my voice to the strenuous objections taken by the leaders of the cooperatives across Canada in their criticism of the budget proposals in regard to cooperatives. Unless we can persuade the government to change certain of these proposals, it portends sinister things to come. Because of certain proposals, I feel, that the budget strikes at the very basis of cooperation and would cripple the cooperative movement across this country.

Some cooperatives have vigorously objected, and I am in agreement with them on the following five points:

First, the objection taken that the proposals ignore the basic difference between cooperatives and private business. The cooperative organizations stem out of the need of the people who have cooperated to give themselves, through cooperation, services of various kinds at cost which they could not have got in any other way. The great wheat pools have grown up because farmers found that only by handling their wheat could they get a fair share of the products of their labour. The pools were organized, and the farmers through the pool elevators gave competition to the private elevators. There were spreads of ten and twelve cents between street and track prices; and handling charges were excessive. Through their pool organizations the farmers have been able to reduce the spread between street and track wheat to about two cents, and to reduce their handling charges materially. We farmers who are members of the pool consider the marketing of our wheat part of our farming operations. We have production costs of summer-fallowing, sowing, threshing and handling. We consider the marketing of our grain part of our business. We feel that the net price received by us should be the only money taxable, that it should be computed as part of farm income and that there should be no duplication of taxation. I maintain that in a bona fide cooperative there is no such thing as profit. The budget proposals fail to ensure that such organizations are tax exempt and leave cooperatives in doubt as to where they stand.

I could mention the Saskatchewan oil cooperative. Here again the farmers and cooperators joined together to cut down the cost of oil to themselves by setting up a cracking plant, and refining and distributing oil to themselves, thus making savings.

Resolution No. 12 would repeal section 4 (p) which recognized the differences between cooperatives and non-cooperatives. It would be serious if the government failed to define this difference. I criticize the government for not having introduced a national cooperative act long ago. Then there would be no doubt as to what constituted a bona fide cooperative.

My second criticism is the objection that the proposals force cooperatives to treat members and non-members alike. This strikes at the very heart of the cooperative movement. What justification can there be to force a cooperative to treat non-members who have not any financial or other responsibility for such a cooperative on the same basis as members?

I take strong objection to this, and the very least the government should do is to allow a cooperative the choice of treating members and non-members alike, or, as an alternative, withholding dividends from non-members and paying a tax on the amounts so withheld. If non-members received the same treatment, since there would be no incentive to join and old members would die off, it would not be long before a cooperative would completely disintegrate. This is a vicious proposal.

The third objection is this, that the proposals would prevent cooperatives from providing service at cost by forcing them to pay tax on not less than three per cent of the employed capital. This prevents members from putting their money without interest into cooperative enterprise. This, too, is a discriminatory measure. As an example, take the position of a farmer who wishes with his neighbours to start a cooperative oil business. These farmers have already paid income tax on such money and, unless private business is taxed on the same basis, this tax is certainly unfair and discriminatory.

My fourth objection is that such proposals would interfere with the right of the individual member to leave his savings with his cooperative, for provision of further service, by forcing payment in cash within six months. By this being done, according to my information there is not enough time allowed to provide a safeguard so that cooperatives could limit or conduct their business in case of emergency, or depression, or other hazards. We shall suggest changes in committee. However, I think most cooperatives would be satisfied if the royal commission report on this matter were effected, whereby directors would have the power in any one year to limit the amount paid to ten per cent of the total and, temporarily, to suspend payments of patronage dividends in periods of crisis.

My fifth objection is this: They propose that the minister may, in his discretion, discriminate as between cooperatives in the matter of retroactive taxation. In listening to the minister's speech and in reading it over, I am still at a loss, as I believe the minister and all members of this house are, to know what a bona fide cooperative is, and what cooperatives would be subject to retroactive taxation. Certainly no minister should have the right to decide mandatorily what is or is not a cooperative. The government has done a very great injustice in bringing in such proposals, which strike at the very basis of cooperation. It has failed to bring in a national cooperative act, defining a cooperative. Its failure to do this is as great as its failure to bring in a comprehensive national labour code. The people will not forget, unless the government repents and changes these proposals.

PRIVATE BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING

Bill No. 197, to incorporate Cooperative Life Insurance Company—Mr. Tucker.

FOOD AND DRUGS

PROVISION FOR LABELLING IN FRENCH AS WELL AS IN ENGLISH

Mr. L. PHILIPPE PICARD (Bellechasse) moved the second reading of bill No. 55, to amend certain acts in respect to the labelling and marking of foods and drugs.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should not like to deprive the hon. member of making a full explanation on the bill, and I am quite sure that he is prepared to do so.

Mr. PICARD: I must really thank my hon. friend for his kind attention to me. This bill has been standing in my name since the 16th of April and we have had a long time to consider it. Since that time I have received comments for and against the bill and have discovered there was a strong feeling in favor of it. With the permission of the house I will give an idea of the motives behind the bill and state its intention and purpose.

At the moment the public throughout Canada is protected against fraud, misrepresentation and so on, under the Food and Drugs Act and it is protected against injury to health under the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act. The object of the present bill is to provide for those who do not understand the English language the same protection as is provided under these two acts for those who speak English. It might be said by some that the labelling prescribed under the act is not for the purpose of warning the public as to the danger of the drugs so labelled; but if we look at section 3, paragraph (b), of the Food and Drugs Act it will be seen that it gives the governor in council power to enact legislation concerning different matters having to do with drugs and food. Paragraph (b) says that the governor in council has power to make regulations:

> respecting the packaging and labelling of any article of food or drug and the design of any such package or label with a view to preventing the public or the purchaser—

I draw particular attention to these words:

> —being deceived or misled as to the character, strength, quality or quantity of the article.

And so on. What I intend by this bill is to make sure that the probably 2,000,000 people in Canada who are not conversant with English and who therefore are not protected, as is the intention of the law be protected by including after "labelling" the words "in English and in French." I do not think the wording of the clause is correct and, if ever my bill reaches the committee stage, I would ask a colleague to move a motion to change the wording to make it more effective. I would ask to have moved at the end of paragraph (b) the following proviso:

> Provided that if the governor in council makes any regulation respecting the labelling of any article of food or drug as above-mentioned said regulation shall provide for the labelling in the French as well as in the English language.

I would then have him move to strike from my bill the words "in English and in French" in the tenth and eleventh lines. That would make it clearer and more definite in its prospective application.

The next section of my bill, section 3 concerns the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act. Had I not been remiss in my duty I would have been here on Monday, May 20. It is often said that many members are away on Monday and Friday. Many will not admit it, but unfortunately I am forced to do so in the present case. I could then have proposed an amendment to the legislation that was passed by this house on that day to the same effect as I urge to-night, by moving to amend section 4 of bill No. 29, which now reads as follows:

> (b) no retail druggist shall sell, or offer for sale except pursuant to direction of a physician, any preparation referred to in paragraph (a) of this subsection unless there is printed in a conspicuous place on an inseparable part of the main panel of the label and wrapper of the bottle, box, or other container, and in letters of the same size and visibility as the directions for the use of the preparation, the full formula or true list of medicinal ingredients, and the following words: "It is unlawful to administer this preparation to a child under two years of age as it contains codeine and is dangerous to its life."

I should have moved that after the words "unless there is printed" there be added "in English and in French". However, on May 20 I was in my constituency and not in the house, and I have only myself to blame if I did not move my amendment then.

If it is judged by this house that it is wise to pass a law which forces manufacturers of drugs to warn the public that the preparation should not be administered to a child under two years of age, are we not just carrying on a humanitarian gesture by adding this same proviso, printed in the language of a large part of the population of Canada, a proportion of whom do not know the English language? I will not to-night enter into a long discussion about the rights and merits of the French against the English, or the inalienable rights of this or that section; no, it will not be such a speech; I am only asking that protection be given to those who, according to the laws of this country, are entitled to speak their language, that in respect of the warnings given under the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act and the safeguards provided by the Food and Drugs Act, they receive the same protection as is given those who know English.

I shall not enter into a long discussion of that matter. The point is just this, shall we or shall we not recognize that, in accordance with their undoubted rights, some people in this country are not bilingual? There are some who are not bilingual because they know only English; there are other who are not bilingual because they know only French. If those who know only English are protected under the law, why should not those who know only French be protected? I do not think anybody would suffer if such protection were accorded, and it would be in the interests of the health of a large number of people in this country.

Hon. members may wonder why I, who am not a physician, would worry about this; that I, who never attempted to ring the bell of nationalism or to build my following on arguing the rights of this or that minority—though I have done my best to defend and uphold them—should come forward to-night with such a bill? Well, it may be a long story but it is a childhood story. My father was a country doctor; or I should not say a "country" doctor because he was a physician at Rivière-du-Loup, the nicest little city in the world, so well represented by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). My father practised there for twenty-five years. At one time a client came to his office with his daughter, who was sick. My father prescribed a certain medicament; he had it in his own office; and at the time he was about to hand it to the patient's father he was called away to another patient and had to leave his home, so he said to this man, "You can read English. I give you the bottle, on which the dose is plainly and clearly written. Give it to the child according to those directions". He explained it to him in French, and the man, who could read English, went away. The health of the daughter improved; at least I suppose so, because my father was a good doctor. But some time later in the same home a young child got sick, and the girl's mother, the wife of the man who had received the bottle, did not read English, so she said, "If it was good for my other daughter, this seems to be the same ailment and I will give it to the child." But the medicine contained codeine or some such drug; the child got worse and my father was called in. When he came home my father, who was not one of these rabid nationalists, who was bilingual and had studied in England and in France, said, "Will the day ever come when both our people will have the same chance assured to them by law? Shall we ever have a law that will require the formulas on our medicaments to be printed in both languages?"

Later on, I happened to travel a bit, and went to Mexico, where, if I remember well, Your Honour was years ago. Travelling in that country and in Cuba, I saw that all the drugs imported to Cuba and Mexico, even those labelled on one side in English, had on the other side a label in Spanish containing a perfect translation, for which there was room enough on the bottles. That story of my childhood came back to my mind, and I investigated the field of medical preparations. I have discovered that, throughout the whole of Canada, probably thirty per cent of the drugs sold are labelled in both languages. This is due to the trade ability or good will of the manufacturers. It has taken time to reach that. I remember my father writing for this purpose to some of these firms, and now things have reached the point where I am assured by doctors that this practice is growing. An hon. member who is a physician and an English-speaking Canadian told me of seeing in Winnipeg a well-known drug the label of which, and not only the outside container, was printed in both languages.

As the matter stands at the moment, there being no law requiring protection for those who speak only French, we have chaos in the drug business. As I have said, in the whole of Canada only about thirty per cent of the drugs have directions printed in both languages. In Quebec, I would say the proportion is probably fifty per cent, and another fifteen per cent have outside labels in both languages, while the bottle is labelled only in English. So that you have four if not five ways in which these medicaments are labelled. Some issued by firms in the last five years are fully bilingual, which shows that it can be done without cost or trouble, besides being just and equitable to those who speak only French.

I have here an article from a certain firm. I am not advertising it; I am not selling its products; I do not know the proprietors; they are all nice people, but I do not care about any of them except, of course, when I need their products. One from Charles E. Frosst is called ostrogen. What it does I do not know, but anyway it is perfectly printed. The bottle is small; yet space has been found to put on it the formula in both English and French, and the warning as to how it should and how it should not be taken. These instructions are found not only on the wrapper but on a tiny bottle like the one I have in my hand, which shows that, with good will, there is no reason why any receptacle, however small, could not have the particulars printed in both languages.

Here is another bottle, even smaller, from Montreal, "Poulenc", a French firm which has opened branches in the United States and Canada.

Here we have a smaller container of "Gardenal", which I remember was mentioned in one of the answers given by the then minister when the Food and Drugs Act was proposed in 1920. It was stated that it was a narcotic and that the formula should be well printed or fully described. Anyway, on the package, small as it is, space has been found to put it in French and English, with the warning that it was a narcotic and should not be given without a doctor's prescription.

Here is one by a company operating in Switzerland, in Canada and in the United States, the CIBA company. This medicine I have here contains fully bilingual directions on the bottles, although they are very small. I chose the smallest bottles I could find to indicate that my proposal is a perfectly feasible one.

Here is another one, "Vick's" inhaler, made in the good city of Windsor, represented by my hon. friend the Secretary of State (Mr.

Martin), who is three-fourths French, while I am seven-eighths French. There is just a matter of one-eighth between us, because I had a grandmother who was half English, which makes me one-eighth English, while he had an Irish grandmother. This drug made in Windsor is fully described both in English and French, and as will be seen, the package is very small.

Mr. MARTIN: I am sure the hon. gentleman will permit me the observation that there is no doubt about the very high quality of that particular product.

Mr. PICARD: I am sure of that; it comes from the home of my hon. friend. I know he was interested in drugs years ago, because I found his name in a debate on the question in 1936 or 1938. So that I am sure he will approve of me to-night.

I have another preparation here, or rather only the box. The bottle was big and I feared to drop it. This one is known as Collyrium and has a bilingual container outside. Although the bottle itself is big, apparently they could find space only for English. It is written in French and English on the outside box, but on the bottle you find only English. That is what is called a concession to Quebec, to please the Quebec trade. There is a second wrapper which is intended specially for the purchaser in Quebec. Presumably, when he is outside Quebec he is supposed not to get sick. He does not even have to take aspirin tablets, because the makers of aspirin have not seen fit to have directions printed bilingually on the box or on the container but only on the Quebec cardboard.

Another preparation I have here is Alophen, which is put up by Parke, Davis.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Is that Toronto?

Mr. PICARD: Walkerville.

Mr. MARTIN: And also Windsor.

Mr. PICARD: This also has an outside carton which is bilingual, and on the inside there appears this: "To comply with certain pharmacy acts, this bottle is labelled poison." There is a space which is left blank; evidently they were not prepared to print anything in French on it. On the bilingual outside container they forgot to put what they stated on the inside about poison.

Here is another one, to show the house the chaos we are in. I am referring to Phillip's milk of magnesia in tablets. Let me assure the house that I am not advertising anything; I am a lawyer, and although I may not be prosperous in the legal profession, I have no intention of going into the advertising business. However, here you find everything in English except the dose. They have printed the directions for use in five lines of French, and that is something anyway, even if you do not know what the preparation is taken for. You may not know what it is intended for, but you know how much you should take.

Here is another one: Grove's cold tablets. The same thing applies here. There are directions for use. They do not tell you what it is for, and no doubt you buy it for the sake of obtaining the nice white cardboard box. You know how many you should take, but not what they are for.

I have here other samples, the great majority of which are labelled only in English. That is the admitted general practice.

Here is something else that might be a menace to health, which is put up in the United States by that other company which I praised a moment ago for being bilingual in respect of what they sell in Canada, CIBA. So far as the American end of this company is concerned, it is established at Summit, New Jersey. Of course there is no question of speaking French either in their house of representatives or in their state legislature. If French is used in that country it is used as a mark of culture by certain classes, as it is in most countries of the world. This preparation is printed in English, and of course there is no question of imposing French upon the Americans in their country.

However, this product is imported into Canada, it is supposed to be for adults only, and the caution is given that it should not be used by individuals suffering from heart disease or thyroid disturbance except on the advice of a physician. This comes into Canada and no one is protected who does not speak English. Let us note that if there are two million people in this country who do not speak English, there are many more millions who do not speak French. Nevertheless, those who do not speak English have no protection so far as this preparation is concerned, while their English-Canadian compatriots are protected.

I suggest that if it is our desire to carry out the intent of the law it would be well for us to see what was stated in 1939 when the law was modified. At that time the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) was Minister of Pensions and National Health, and as reported at page 331 of Hansard of 1939, he made this statement:

Means are being sought—

That is, in the amendments which he was proposing at that time.

—to make more effective the restraints upon misrepresentation in the marketing of foods and drugs.

But how can there be misrepresentation if you do not represent anything? If the cover of a container is blank to the one who reads it, no matter how cultured he may be in some other language, obviously he does not know what is represented in those printed words. The printed matter should appear in such a form that he can read it. Again, at page 822 of the same volume of Hansard, the minister said that the object of the amendments was:

To improve the statutory means for protecting the purchasing consumer against injury to health—

That would apply to the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, which does not make it compulsory to state explicitly that the drug is not safe for any child.

—and against deception in food and drug products.

The aim of the act, according to the minister at that time, was to protect the consumer against injury to health. Injury would result if a young boy, whose parents did not read English, administered a drug to him in the absence of any caution printed in both languages. To attain the objects which the minister stated, authority was then sought:

to deal in greater detail with matters such as packaging and labelling, advertising, adulteration and the use of dangerous materials.

I remember that in 1939 the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) told the minister about someone who had bought rat poison which somebody had eaten because there was no proper label on the container, and the minister assured him that under the act as it was then being amended labels would be printed in such a way that no one could possibly mistake rat poison for food. The hon. gentleman who told about the incident was apparently satisfied because his objection was limited to pointing out that particular case. But if it is considered necessary that a label should be printed in such a way as to ensure the protection of people who read the caution in English, why should not the same safeguard be afforded the two million people who do not speak English and who have the same rights under the law?

I am not going to take up any more of the time of the house, but I would appeal to the good will of all hon. members in this matter. Should, by chance, this bill go to a committee, I will bring in amendments to improve the law so as to provide for bilingual labelling so far as drugs only are concerned. Through inadvertence. I worded my bill in such a way that it would apply to foodstuffs as well. I do not wish to go that far, for the moment at any rate, because it might force some small British Columbia salmon packers who market their product on the west coast of the United States and Canada to have their labels printed in French as well as English, and I do not suggest that that should be done, any more than I should like to have the people in my province who are packing small fruits for sale in neighbouring villages compelled to print their labels in both languages. My suggestion is that it should apply only to drugs. I assure the house that my intention is neither narrow nor nationalistic, but it is just for protecting our people that I wish to see these labels printed in French as well as in English. My object is to ensure the protection of those who speak only French, just as those who speak English are protected. I appeal to the minister and to the house to approve the principle involved, and if we get in committee I will propose the amendments necessary to bring the bill more in line with its aim.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard) has given us a delightful speech in favour of this bill, subject to such further amendment as he may be prepared to make if the bill reaches the committee. In his speech he made a number of points which were of considerable interest to hon. members. He produced a substantial array of exhibits. Last year we had hon. members producing fruit of various kinds and we were told this was not a fruit store. In another legislative place I remember seeing hon. members competing on the relative values of different types of club sandwiches, and since all the club sandwiches were juicy it created quite a scene.

The bill put forward by the hon. member must be considered on the text which is before us. Section 2 proposes an amendment which would enable the governor in council to make regulations respecting the packaging and labelling in English and in French of any article of food or drug. The existing regulations in force read in division 1, section 1, part A (1) as follows:

Every article of food or drug in packaged form sold or put up by the manufacturer or producer thereof shall be labelled.

That has been part of the law of Canada for a long time. It has been generally enforced to the satisfaction of the Canadian people. It is arguable that if the amendment means anything it means that, whenever any requirement is made regarding the labelling of any food or drug in Canada, the labelling should be in English and in French. It is also arguable that it may mean something else, but from what the hon. member said I would gather that it was his intention that all labelling be in French and English. The hon. member has been good enough to say that that is not his intention so far as food is concerned. I think it would meet with the wishes of the members of the house and of the buying public in Canada generally that it should not be necessary to label all articles of food in French and in English. To do so would lead greatly to the inconvenience of everyone and to the cost of doing business. Therefore, if we restrict the provisions of the bill as the hon. member suggests that he would have restricted it had it been drawn so as to give effect to his intention, then it should be restricted to require the labelling of drugs. I gather from what he says that he would propose that labelling of drugs should be carried out in French and in English.

We now come to the question of different classes of drugs. First, we have narcotics, which are dealt with under the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act. This was amended at this session of parliament to make the sale of all narcotic drugs possible only under prescription. Therefore a very large class of cases which the hon. member has in mind is covered by the existing legislation. In fact the case which he mentioned where his father gave a drug to somebody which was not properly used was, I understand, a case where codeine was the drug. Under the existing law that could only be done on the prescription of a doctor. If a doctor prescribes a drug there is no requirement in any law that his prescription should be in French and English. The prescription is aimed at the person who asks for it, and if a person speaks French the doctor makes the label on the bottle or the druggist makes the label on the bottle in French, or if the patient speaks English, then it is put on the bottle in English, or the physician and druggist are not likely to continue to enjoy the custom of that particular patient.

This year we brought into effect a law under which all narcotics of every type can be sold only on prescription, except very small doses of codeine which must be mixed with other drugs and which would be very unlikely to do any harm to anyone. These very small quantities of codeine can be sold without a doctor's prescription, but they must have a warning label in one language or the other. I would suggest that the only possible application of the hon. member's suggestion to narcotics would be to that small class of cases in which it is at least arguable that unless considerable quantities of the medicine are taken there would be little harm, even to a small child.

Then there are drugs other than narcotics in respect of which there are labelling provisions of the act and of the regulations. These labelling provisions are designed to give any purchaser an accurate description of the contents of the bottle or box which he is buying. It is submitted in that respect we can leave the choice of language very largely to the good sense of the customer and of the manufacturing chemist or other person producing that particular medicine for sale. If he wants to make a sale of the medicine to persons who speak the French language, then he has to put his label in French or he will not be so likely to make the sale. If he wants to make it to English-speaking people, then he should put it in English or he will not be so likely to make the sale. In that respect it is very much the same as in the case of food. It is a matter where we can let the ordinary rules of customer-vendor relationship take effect so as to see that the person gets what he wants.

With regard to another class of drugs or medicines, namely poisons. the hon. member here is dealing with a matter which has been dealt with by the provinces. Every province has a pharmacy act. In Quebec the pharmacy act is chapter 267 of the revised statutes of 1935, and section 20 reads:

> It shall be unlawful to keep or sell any of the poisons named in the said schedule, unless the box, bottle, vessel, wrapper or cover, in which such poison is contained, be distinctly labelled with the name of the article and the word "poison" and with the name and address of the seller of the poison.

The schedule to the act has a number of medicines listed many of which would not ordinarily be regarded as poisons, but which undoubtedly, if taken in sufficient quantity, would poison anyone. That is the requirement of the Quebec law; and, I believe that there is a corresponding requirement in the law of every province. In no province is there a requirement that this important warning be put in both languages.

I would suggest to the hon. member that a large part of his case has been met by the amendment proposed this year to the Narcotic Drug Act which has been enacted, and that such part of it as is left should properly be directed at the provinces which, under these pharmacy acts, make certain requirements with regard to medicines which may act as poisons. So I would respectfully submit to the hon. member that in view of the amendment made this year and in view of the situation in the provinces, where they have laws in force, the matter should be reconsidered, to see if there is any case which should be covered by legislation and which is not now covered.

Just one word in conclusion, and it is this. I think it can be said that in the cases which have been drawn to the attention of our department where someone has been done an injury through taking some drug or medicine improperly or in excess, it is difficult to say that this has been due to any failure to read the label properly because it was not printed in both languages. In the majority of such cases the person taking the medicine could not read in any language because he or she was too young to read. I would submit that for every case where some injury has been done due to any failure to print the label in both languages, there are many cases due to the inability of the person to read in any language or to know what he is doing because of the age of that person; and there is no way in which laws can be drawn to safeguard infants of tender years against injuries done through negligence on the part of parents or doctors or druggists or others concerned with the handling of medicines and drugs. For our ultimate protection in regard to these matters we must look first, as we do, to the provincial laws regarding poisons, which I think are well drafted and adequately enforced and carried out; second, to the federal law regarding narcotics, which has been extended in consequence of legislation passed this year and is now, I think, effectively enforced; third, to the provisions regarding labelling, which I think to a greater degree in Canada than elsewhere are fairly enforced, to ensure that as far as possible a person buying a medicine knows what he is buying; but ultimately we must look to the care of all the people who have to handle these things, and for that care no legislation can enforce or replace that care entirely.

So, Mr. Speaker, in the light of the changes brought about in the situation this year since the hon. member introduced his bill, and in the light of the representations I have made that this is so largely a matter falling within the jurisdiction of the provinces, I would ask the hon. member if he would withdraw his bill and consider if there still remains some field which could be adequately covered by legislation of this house.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Did I understand the minister to state it was left to the province to decide whether articles of food as well as drugs should be labelled? I thought there was some misunderstanding, because any product of our province of British Columbia by its very pack is shown to be pure.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. PICARD: I have noted the expression of views by the minister. I do not know that I could entirely agree with him when he says the existing laws have been applied to the satisfaction of everyone. I am sure his department has done its best, but those who could not understand the labels were certainly not as well satisfied as those who did understand them. Of course, when you come to the question of a warning I understand, as the minister says, that many provincial laws cover the matter; yet we are legislating here in a federal parliament, and I thought for once I might convince my colleagues to take this step toward improving the situation and amend the federal law as I suggest. The minister says the main thing is the provincial laws, and the care of people handling the drugs. It may be so partly, but we want to give them the assistance of having the labels printed in such a way that everyone can understand them. The minister later said the second point was the federal narcotics law, while the third point would be in regard to the labelling, but those are the two points I tried to cover in the bill. I should think it would be only fair that some such provisions might be made to cover them, and I am really surprised that the minister does not agree with me on this question of the protection of a large part of the population.

With all due regard to the minister's ability, I am not convinced by his argument on these points to-night. However, as I admitted myself, the bill covers more than I at first intended, including food which I did not desire to cover and would need many amendments in committee, and since it can be brought back at another session—and I do not think this parliament will be dissolved before another session—I shall dream on it and redraft it in the hope that next year the idea may have gained way, its fairness may be recognized and it may be given more favourable consideration by the cabinet and the house. In these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I wish to withdraw the bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member leave of the house to withdraw his bill?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Bill withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: The list of private and public bills having been exhausted, the house will revert to the business under consideration at six o'clock.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock it was considering the Income War Tax Act.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Income War Tax Act and to provide:

1. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years the present rules for computation of personal income tax be replaced by the following schedule of graduated rates:

On the first $250 of income or any portion thereof, 22 per cent per annum; or

$55 upon the income of $250; and 25 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $250 and does not exceed $1,000; or

$177,312.50 upon the income of $250,000 and 85 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $250,000.

Mr. McMASTER: I desire to offer a few observations in connection with the first three paragraphs of the resolution, dealing with the income tax on private individuals.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Acting Minister of Finance): I am in the hands of the committee, but I wonder whether it would suit the convenience of hon. members if I were to make a brief explanatory statement on these various resolutions as they are called, and then other hon. members could offer their comments. If that meets with the wishes of the committee I might proceed in that way.

The first and second resolutions taken together give effect to the revision and simplification of the personal income tax structure, which is proposed for 1947. The single schedule of graduated rates set forth in resolution 1; the exemption of $750 for a single person and $1,500 for a married person, and the further exemptions for dependents set forth in resolution 2, replace the entire present personal income tax rate structure, which includes the following:

1. The normal tax of 7 per cent, which in the case of certain taxpayers is increased to 8 per cent at $1,800 and to 9 per cent at $3,000;

2. The tax credit of $28 allowed against normal tax for each dependent;

3. The schedule of graduated rates in the present law;

4. The $660 deduction from income, the $150 tax credit allowed for a wife and the $80 tax credit allowed for a child under the graduated tax;

5. The formula by which the savings portion of the total tax is calculated. While the refundable tax has not been imposed since 1944, the tax liability under the present law is still determined by calculating the total tax and deducting therefrom the savings portion to arrive at the actual balance of tax payable.

6. The family allowance recovery tables which were introduced as a temporary supplement to the present tax structure, to give effect to the principle approved by the house that the taxpayer should not benefit in full from both family allowance payments and relief for the same child granted under the income tax. As the committee will appreciate, there is a very real simplification of the personal income tax structure. The substantial benefits to the taxpayer arising from this over-all revision were fully explained in the budget speech, and have since been set forth in the house.

I wish again briefly to summarize those advantages:

1. Between 550,000 and 600,000 taxpayers will be completely exempt from taxation in 1947.

2. Including adjustments of family allowances, the total benefit to the taxpayers in the proposal will be $155 million, and relief amounting to 25 per cent of our present income tax revenues, coming on top of the 16 per cent already allowed for 1946.

3. Of the total relief of $155 million, about 70 per cent will accrue to taxpayers with incomes under $3,000; 83 per cent will accrue to taxpayers with incomes under $5,000 and 90 per cent will accrue to taxpayers with incomes under $10,000.

4. Our exemptions under the proposal will be higher than those of any other English-speaking country in the world.

Mr. McMASTER: I think I can agree with the minister when he says that the method of computation has been considerably simplified. I would go farther and say that any change made would be almost bound to simplify the difficult procedure which has grown up under the act of making computation of the tax.

However, the tax still has to be paid after the computation has been made, and it is for us to examine just what change has been made, and who has benefited by it. I find that 30 per cent of the revenue obtained by the Dominion of Canada is obtained from personal income tax. Out of a total of $2,140 million the government expects to obtain from personal income tax the sum of $640 million. That is a substantial sum.

It is true that some 550,000 or 600,000 taxpayers will in the future not be bound to make out income tax returns. But a substantial number of low income taxpayers will still be bound to do so, and a substantial sum will be obtained from them. Taking the number of taxpayers in the report issued by the government for the year 1945, I estimate that 600,000 single men, each earning less than $1,500, will pay a total of $41 million; and 187,000 married men, without children, each earning less than $2,000, will pay a total of $10 million. Then, 110,000 married men without children, each earning between $2,000 and $2,500, will pay a total of $14 million, and 100,000 married men with one child, each earning less than $2,500, will pay a total of $5 million.

In other words, single men still paying taxes and earning less than $1,500, and married men earning less than $2,500 will contribute toward the taxes of Canada approximately $70 million. I would say that is a substantial sum contributed by the men in the lower income tax brackets.

The minister has just said that the exemptions are the highest in the world. That may be true, so far as exemptions for single men are concerned, and perhaps it is true, but only by a narrow margin, for married men. But it is not true so far as dependents are concerned, because in the United States the allowance for each dependent is $500, whereas in Canada, even taking the impact of family allowances into consideration, it has been figured out at approximately $300.

I must congratulate the officials of the income tax branch upon making out so well this list of percentages. It must have been done by a process of trial and error, because everything was arranged so that the allowance is practically equivalent to $300 for those in the lower income tax brackets. It gets slightly larger in those for higher incomes.

The people in the low income tax brackets who contribute this considerable sum of $70 million are also the people who contribute a great part of the other revenue.

It will be noticed that in introducing his budget the Minister of Finance pointed out, as indicated at page 2905 of Hansard, that we would receive $183 million from customs duties. I do not know why he estimated it so optimistically, because last year it was only $129 million. From the excise tax he expects to get $195 million, or slightly more than last year. Then, from the sales tax he expects $250 million, or an increase of about $38 million over the figure for the preceding year.

These people in the lower income tax brackets are the people with children, and they are the greatest buyers of the articles which are taxed in these other ways. The only taxes which to some extent they may escape are the corporate tax to an extent of $210 million, excess profits tax of $340 million, interest on dividends of $30 million, succession duties of $24 million and other miscellaneous taxes.

So that the people in the lower income tax brackets, those with large families, are still paying more than their fair share of the burden of taxation in Canada.

I believe I might now refer to paragraph (a) of resolution 3, where we find these words:

(a) Where the spouse has an income of more than $250 and less than $750 by the amount by which the spouse's income is more than $250.

That is, if a wife happens to go out and work her income will be deducted from her husband's exemption.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but if we might discuss that when we reach resolution 3 it would be helpful.

Mr. McMASTER: I shall leave that for the time being.

As I have said, the income tax will be responsible for 30 per cent of the revenue of Canada in the coming year. Yet this revenue will be dependent entirely upon the amount of wages the people in Canada will earn. I think the minister was optimistic when he estimated $620 million. I find that the total wage income for 1945 was about $5,200 million. That is a considerable sum, much more in fact than in the previous year, when it was only $4,790 million. I should think 1945 was a peak year. Let us go back to 1938, when the total income of wage-earners in Canada was $2,449 million. It was only $2,450 million in 1939 and in 1940. When we were having the effect of the war it was only as high as $2,860 million. Can anyone believe that wage-earners can pay $640 million out of income which may, and probably will, sink as low as that of 1940, which was a fair year? And yet, without this $640 million it will be extremely difficult to meet the ordinary expenses which are now over $1,200 million, and which are bound to increase in the future from the very fact that debt charges will increase, and the fact that, as it goes along, nearly every department of government is finding other ways of spending money.

It would be very pleasant if only the rich were to pay the taxes. I was interested to find from the government's own return that in 1945 which, to say the least, was a peak year, so far as earnings are concerned, only 17,000 people in the whole of Canada would acknowledge that they made over $10,000, and that only 7,800 of the 17,000 would admit that they made more than $15,000. One would almost think there must be something wrong. I would suppose there are hon. members in the house who might easily earn $10,000 a year. If they do, after they pay their taxes they must live in a humble and quiet way. Yet in Toronto—and I know only Toronto and these parliament buildings—there are many people who would seem to have more money than $10,000. Where do they get the money? If they are evading the income tax we should take measures to obtain it. If they are living on their capital, that is different. It may be that some of them are living on their capital because, as I recall it, attempts were made many years ago to estimate the wealth of different countries. At that time, in 1935, at the bottom of the depression the wealth of Canada was estimated at $25 billion. In 1928 it was estimated at $31 billion to $32 billion. What is it to-day? First of all, we have a debt of $16 billion, and perhaps we ought to add that to the $32 billion, which would make us worth $48 billion, if these debts that we owe to one another are part of the capital of Canada. I realize that this is a more or less hit-or-miss way of estimating the wealth of the country; but the wealth of every country was estimated in that way, the wealth of Britain, France, and the United States as so much, and the total wealth of Canada, as I say, was estimated at $32 billion at the highest point in our financial history. We might well stop and think that a country with a capital wealth of $32 billion and a debt of $16 billion requires drastic measures to reduce spending so that we may overtake this immense debt which we have. I know it is an internal debt that we owe to one another, and only a very small portion of it is external debt, but it all has to be met so far as the individual taxpayer is concerned.

I should like to say something about the trade of Canada. Everybody is always speaking of the necessity of Canada having foreign trade. I was surprised to see in the monthly review of statistics some figures as to the trade of Canada during the month of April last. Those are the most recent figures I have, although I believe that the minister had more recent figures. They have not come to me, nor are they in the library. I have not the very latest figures; I wish I had. I find that during the first four months of this year, according to the figures I have, the imports of Canada amounted to $555 million and our exports, $700 million. The exports are very fine, but how do our imports compare with those of the last eight months of 1945? The imports for the first four months of 1946 were $555 million and the imports for the last eight months of 1945 were $1,215 million. The exports during the first four months of 1946 were only $700 million, as compared with exports of $2,250,000 during the last eight months of 1945. In other words, a credit of one billion dollars in the last eight months of 1945 has dropped to a credit balance of less than $150,000,000 during the first four months of this year.

We must live on our exports. That is our profit, and our profit is fast receding according to the figures of our exports for the present year. We know a lot of our exports are goods that we are sending out of the country by way of gifts. I am not criticizing that, but since we are giving away a lot of our goods I say that we should have a large surplus of exports over imports. During the last eight months of 1945 we had a favourable balance of trade of $100,000,000 with the United States. During the first four months of this year we have an unfavourable balance of trade of approximately $150,000,000 with the United States so that we are very likely in the near future, if this trend goes on, to owe to the United States a large external debt which will have to be paid. We shall have to raise the money.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does that unfavourable trade balance make allowance for our gold shipments?

Mr. McMASTER: I do not think so. I think that is trade pure and simple. Any gold which we might export to the United States would hardly be for that amount, unless several years' accumulation were sent over at once. The largest amount of gold that we sent out of Canada in the most favourable year, as I recollect, would be about $200,000,000.

As I was saying, we shall have to raise the money. My suggestion to the government is that there must be other means of raising it than by taxing such a large percentage of the people's earnings. There is no doubt in the world that many people hesitate to work when in the case of a single man everything he earns over $750 is to be taxed at the rate of 22 per cent. The minister in his budget speech did not give the rates in other countries, but the Minister of National Health and Welfare covered that in his fifteen points—one more than President Wilson had—and he spoke of the larger exemptions that were allowed in Canada. But he did not mention how much higher our rates were, once the exemptions were taken care of. I find that the rates in the United States start at 17 per cent.

Mr. ABBOTT: At 19 per cent, I think.

Mr. McMASTER: The extra three per cent might bring it up to 19 per cent. I think the minister is correct. The rates in the United States then start at 19 per cent and ours start at 22 per cent. The rate is important to the man who pays the tax, much more important than the few dollars of exemption which he is allowed. I would say to the government that some other method of raising the large sum of money required must be found than simply taking the earnings of the people which they have acquired by hard work. There is not enough differentiation made between the man who earns his money by hard labour and the man whose income comes from investments which were acquired at a time when there was no large income tax. I cannot conceive of anybody ever becoming wealthy under our present income tax laws, especially on earnings from personal work. To-day we had before us a bill to raise judges' salaries, and I sat down with a pencil and figured that every dollar that we gave them in increased salaries amounted approximately to their income tax. So that their only hope of being able to get some personal benefit from the increase is in the reduction of the income tax. A man who makes $20,000 a year will pay $7,000 in income tax under this budget, and anybody who earns less than that has little or no prospect of ever being anything but a poor man. The difference between the wealthy and the poor will, as the years go by, be accentuated under the tax laws such as we now have before us.

Mr. KNOWLES: When I spoke in the main budget debate I devoted a good portion of my remarks to the schedule which is proposed in this first resolution, and I made it my contention that it was an unfair schedule on the ground that it gave more substantial relief to those in the upper brackets than to those in the lower income brackets. In support of my argument I gave the house four tables, which are found in Hansard at pages 3374 and 3375. I indicated in connection with each of these tables that my purpose in giving them was to substantiate my contention in different ways. My point was that whether one considered the net increase in "take-home pay" or the grading of the income tax rates into the upper brackets, or if one made comparisons with the past—and I took the particular year 1941 for reasons I gave—in all cases the point was substantiated that relief was greater for those in the upper brackets than for those in the lower income brackets.

My reason for rising to say a few words on this matter at this time is that when the Minister of Finance spoke in this debate on July 18 he did me the honour of paying some attention to the argument which I had made and to the tables which I had presented. I was not terribly surprised that he did not agree with the social philosophy behind my contentions, but there are some remarks I feel I must make with respect to his comments on my tables, particularly one of them which I shall come to in a moment.

First of all, the minister said as reported at page 3591 of Hansard:

> Whether his first table—
> Referring to mine.
> —has any validity or not is a matter of political philosophy, more than anything else.
> Mr. Knowles: Social philosophy.
> Mr. Ilsley: Social philosophy, perhaps. But I disagree so fundamentally with the whole basis of the argument he used that I do not think I need say anything further to indicate that fact.

Obviously it is difficult for us to get together there, but it is also clear that we are in that case arguing, not the rightness or wrongness of figures, but rather a difference in social philosophy. My contention was somewhat along the lines of the views advanced by the previous speaker, namely, that, when revising the income tax structure, more consideration should be given to those who need it most, namely those in the lower brackets. Then the minister said, with reference to my second and third tables which are found on page 3374 of Hansard for July 11:

The second and third tables are difficult to understand, and they do not indicate that there have not been substantial tax reductions.

Well, I never claimed for these tables that they do not indicate that there have been substantial tax reductions; the very opposite was the case. In fact, reference back to page 3373 will show that I said this:

It will be perfectly clear to hon. members when they look at these tables that the grading up of the rates was steeper under the old system than it will be under the new.

That was my point in presenting these tables, to indicate that there had been reductions all right, but that these reductions are more substantial in the upper brackets than is the case in the lower groups. That, therefore, was the purpose of these tables, even though the minister found it difficult to understand them. I really think that behind that statement was the position he intimated earlier, namely a difference in social philosophy.

However, I might not have bothered to take the time of the committee to reply to the minister if it were not for the criticism he made of my fourth table which appears at page 3375 of Hansard for July 11. This is what the minister had to say, at least in part:

Then, I wish to refer to the fourth table particularly, because of the rather striking statement by the hon. member as it is found at page 3373 of Hansard where it says—

And then the minister read a fairly lengthy quotation from my speech which I do not think it necessary for me to requote at this time. Having done that, the minister went on to say:

I said, when the tables were placed on Hansard, that I would not raise any objection to them, but that there was no admission as to the correctness of them. If they were incorrect, and if there were time to do so, an answer would be made, but the hon. member said he touched for their correctness. However, there is an error in table No. 4, not an arithmetical error, but a more basic error. The hon. member has applied the national defence tax only to the part of income over and above exemption, instead of applying the national defence tax to the whole income from the first dollar. Therefore his 18½ per cent is much too low, and the same applies to his other figures. That, I say, vitiates the table. My officials advise me that that is so.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I feel that I could carry on the argument as to the validity of the comparisons which I made, but that will get us nowhere because of our difference of viewpoint; and so, to meet the minister's argument, I have worked out two more tables. This time I have done what the minister said I should do, namely, include the national defence tax back in 1941 right down to the very first dollar. The tables which I have here I feel should be put on Hansard, and I hope that the committee will consent to their going on to save time. If not, I have not much else I want to say at this point and I can take the time to read them. But what shows from these tables is this, that even when the change is made that the minister suggested, it does not vitiate my argument. My argument, as I set it out on July 11 on the pages indicated, was that in the lower brackets the rates of taxation under the new schedule now before us will be higher than they were in 1941, but that in the higher brackets the rates will be lower. I did it before in my table 4 which appears on page 3430 in terms of percentages, and when I was doing it in terms of percentages of course I could do it in brackets: $2,000-$3,000, $3,000-$4,500, and so on. But to meet the minister's argument I have worked out new tables for specific amounts of taxable income, taking in in 1941 the total tax payable including the graduated tax above the exemption level and the national defence tax on the total income. When that is done it does make a slight difference in the figures and a difference in the point at which the change takes place. Under the tables worked out in percentages as I gave them before, the dividing line was at $3,000 of taxable income. The dividing line under this new way of working it out is at $4,500 of taxable income. But under this way of working it out as I now present it, giving the actual taxes in dollars, computing them from the table in this schedule one that is now before us for 1947 and taking the Statutes of Canada, 1940-41, chapter 18, for the 1941 column—taking them all together, it stands now that both as regards the single taxpayer and as regards the married taxpayer the actual amounts, getting away from rates, paid up to the level of $4,500 of taxable income are greater in 1947 than in 1941; whereas above that, up to the $30,000 level, which is as far as I have worked it out in these cases, the amounts of taxation to be paid in 1947 will be less than was the case in 1941.

Mr. ABBOTT: Is my hon. friend suggesting that the tax payable by a man with an income, let us say, of $3,500 in 1947 is greater than the tax paid by the same man in 1941?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes. Does the minister refer to a man with an income of $3,500?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am taking it under the $4,000.

Mr. KNOWLES: The single man, or married?

Mr. ABBOTT: I take it the hon. gentleman is granting that the tax which the man will pay in 1947, in dollars, is less than he would have paid in 1941 on the same income. Is that correct?

Mr. KNOWLES: No. I have before me the table for married persons, and the man making $3,500 would have $2,000 of taxable income in both years, because the exemption level is $1,500 in both cases. In 1941 the total tax payable on $2,000, including graduated tax above the exemption level and national defence tax on the whole $3,500, was $472.50.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a married person.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes.

Mr. ABBOTT: With no children?

Mr. KNOWLES: With no children. On $2,000 of taxable income, or a total income of $3,500, the amount was $472.50.

An hon. MEMBER: What was the rate?

Mr. KNOWLES: On $2,000 to $3,000 the rate was a total 28½ per cent, but you have to add to that the fact that that man paid 3½ per cent on the first $1,500 as well. However, to get back to the comparative figures, before we get too far down in the column, the same man in 1947 will pay $522.50.

Mr. ABBOTT: Has the hon. member the figures for $3,000 in his table?

Mr. KNOWLES: No, I have not the figures for every level. I have taken from $1,000 up to $30,000 at various intervals. I took the figures that came as close as possible to the levels at which they were broken off in the 1941 and 1947 schedules. I gave just now the comparison for the man making $3,500, which was $2,000 of taxable income. For the married man with $3,000 of taxable income, or a total of $4,500, the total paid was $757.50 in 1941 and it will be $817.50 in 1947. For the man with a taxable income of $4,500—that is, the married man—or a total income of $6,000, the amount paid in 1941 was $1,275 and in 1947 that man will pay $1,282.50. The amount is greater but the difference is narrowing down. The next figure is $6,500 of taxable income, which would represent $8,000 of total income; in 1941 that man paid $2,060, and in 1947 he will pay only $1,962.50. But the point is that he will pay less in 1947 than in 1941, whereas those in the lower brackets pay more.

Mr. McMASTER: Where does the hon. member get those figures? I am not trying to help the government on their income tax act, but the total individual income tax paid in 1941 was $103,000,000. Is the hon. member speaking of 1941?

Mr. KNOWLES: These were the rates in effect for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1942, and if my hon. friend will look it up he will see that the amount was larger.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. McMASTER: I have it in front of me.

Mr. KNOWLES: I got my figures for that from the budget speech of the Minister of Finance in 1942, and the same figures were repeated in 1943. It was about $290,000,000.

Mr. ABBOTT: In his new table my hon. friend has jumped from percentage rates to dollar amounts?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, at the minister's suggestion.

Mr. ABBOTT: The first one was shown to be wrong and we shall have to check this one. I do not, of course, suggest that it was intentionally wrong.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was a little surprised, when I worked it out afterwards, at the way in which the minister had done this. I did not think it was up to his usual style of debating. He said:

> Therefore his 18½ per cent is much too low and the same applies to his other figures. That, I say, vitiates the table.

In other words, the minister made the statement that something else had to be taken into consideration.

Mr. ABBOTT: It did, didn't it?

Mr. KNOWLES: When I made my point I put the facts and figures before the house to prove it. The minister did not give figures to substantiate his position, and when I worked them out I found that it does not vitiate the argument I was making. But the minister had not checked it himself. His statement was:

> My officials advise me that that is so.

I should like to place these tables on Hansard. The first is a comparison of total amounts of income tax payable by single taxpayers at various levels as between 1941 and 1947, given in three columns. The first column is the amount of taxable income; that is, above the exemption level of $750. The second column is "1941—Total tax payable including graduated tax above exemption level and national defence tax on total income". The third column is "1947—Total tax payable under new budget proposals". Then I give the figures from $1,000 at the various levels, running to as high as $30,000. That appears under the first column. Under the second column, 1941, I give the figures, which run from $211.25 up to $14,456.25. In the third column the first item is $242.50 and it runs up to $13,812.50. My second table is a comparison of total amounts of income tax payable by married taxpayers at various levels as between 1941 and 1947. The first column is the amount of taxable income, that is, above the exemption level of $1,500. The next column is "1941—Total tax payable including graduated tax above exemption level and national defence tax on total income", and the third heading is "1947—Total tax payable under new budget proposals". Under the first column I give figures from $1,000 up to $30,000. In the second column I give the figures which run from $237.50 to $14,482.50. In the third column I give the figures, namely from $242.50 to $13,812.50. It is hardly necessary for me to ask for unanimous consent to put these on Hansard since I have read practically the whole thing.

Mr. BRACKEN: If the hon. member will tell us the source of the basic figures he is using, I shall be glad on behalf of this party, to approve of the tables going on Hansard.

Mr. KNOWLES: Gladly. The source of the figures for the columns under 1947 will be found in the budget resolutions which are before us, or as they are contained in Hansard at page 2925. For example, I include the $10,500 level. It will be found that the tax payable on $10,500 of taxable income is $3,562.50.

Mr. BRACKEN: They are all official figures?

Mr. KNOWLES: These are the figures in the resolution now before us, which the Minister of Finance has presented. He has given the various points and what the amount is to be. That is the source of my figures for 1947. The source of my figures for 1941 is the statutes of Canada, 1940-41, parts I and II, chapter 18, which is an act to amend the Income War Tax Act. Included in that act will be found a schedule of amounts payable, similar to the one which is now before us. It is two or three pages long. I would rather not read it. It could be placed on Hansard, but that is hardly necessary; it is an official document and can be referred to by any hon. member. I would remind any hon. member who intends to work it out that he has to add to the amount of money which is called for here under the graduated tax, the national defence tax, which in most cases in 1941 was 3½ per cent. The yearly rate was boosted to 7 per cent, but for that year only half of it was payable. It means that in 1941 the single person who had an income of $1,750 paid this graduated tax on the $1,000 over the $750, but in addition to that he paid 3½ per cent on the whole $1,750.

Mr. ABBOTT: Was that not because it was in effect for only half of a year?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes.

Mr. ABBOTT: To make a comparison of like with like the hon. member should calculate the national defence tax at 7 per cent. He should do that if he is comparing 1941 with 1947 to get a true percentage rate.

Mr. KNOWLES: If you do that it will make it even worse, because it makes the rates higher.

Mr. ABBOTT: Whether it makes it worse or not, you want to get a correct comparison.

Mr. KNOWLES: Right, and I suggest that the minister's proposal would not give a proper comparison, because you have to compare the actual taxes paid in the two years. That is the criticism the Minister of Finance made to me the other day, that I had to get down to the actual amounts paid rather than percentages. Therefore I say you have to compare the amount paid in 1941 with the amount paid in 1947. If, as some hon. members suggest—

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not want to interrupt, but—

Mr. KNOWLES: May I remind the minister that before we got to paying the full 7 per cent— that was the case in 1942—other changes were made. The $750 and $1,500 exemption levels were abolished and, instead we had the $660 level and deduction from taxation for wives and dependents, which makes it completely impossible to make any comparison between 1947 and 1942. There was also compulsory savings. But a comparison between 1947 and 1941 is valid, because in these two years we have the same basic structure, namely, the $750 exemption level for single people and $1,500 for married people, without the other complications.

I am prepared to answer any further questions which may be asked about the matter, but I do not wish to continue it further. Obviously the reason I raised it was that I felt the Minister of Finance was unfair in making the statement that he did on July 18 that this would vitiate my tables. I have presented these tables in reply, working them out as he suggested that I should, and they still support my contention that in the lower brackets the new rates are higher than was the case in 1941, and in the upper brackets the new rates are lower. The minister said the comparison with 1941 did not matter. I forget the words he used, but it is begging the question; these things do matter. The fact is that there were higher rates charged in 1941 in the upper brackets than are now being imposed. These rates went still higher in 1942. They went considerably higher in the upper brackets in 1942 than was the case in 1941. It would have been better for my purposes to have made the comparison with 1942 because of that situation, but I refrained from doing so because I felt that such a comparison was not proper for these other reasons I have given. The purpose of my rising at this time is to support with these tables and the others that I put on Hansard previously my contention that the schedule now before us gives more relief than it should in the upper brackets and consequently not as much as it should in the lower brackets.

Mr. ABBOTT: If the committee has no objection we shall put the tables on Hansard and have a look at them.

The CHAIRMAN: With the unanimous consent of the committee the hon. member may put his tables on Hansard.

Mr. KNOWLES: The tables are as follows:

Table 1

Comparison of Total Amounts of Income Tax Payable by Married Taxpayers at Various Levels, as Between 1941 and 1947.

Amount of Taxable income (i.e. above exemption level of $1,500)	1941 Total Tax Payable including graduated tax above exemption level and National Defence Tax on Total Income	1947 Total Tax Payable Under new Budget Proposals

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. LESAGE: Even if I share some of the principles of social philosophy of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I cannot agree with him when he says that reductions in income tax this year are more important for upper income brackets than for lower income brackets. Before dealing with that, I think that we can agree on these principles of social philosophy. According to social justice, there are two main principles in taxation. The first one is that all government bodies must measure taxes to administrative needs. That is a duty and we must fulfil it even in spite of demagogic opposition. The general evolution in the world and in our country requires higher and higher budgets as far as ordinary expenses are concerned. My hon. friends who sit just in front of me will agree with that, and they are asking for more social security, and thus for higher budgets. The increase in population, the constant evolution in the world and social security add every year to the responsibility of the state. I do not see how we can go back; we must go forward. We cannot go back; we must follow progress. The greater the field of government action, the more numerous must be its administrative staff and the more effective must be the administration. All that requires more money. That means more taxes. Let us consider the question of taxes with a true civic spirit, having in mind—and I think it is important—that the income tax is the best way for the equitable distribution of wealth.

The second principle of social justice in taxation is that taxes must be proportionate to the citizen's resources. That is the principle I want to study and the application of which I want to look for in the resolutions of the budget we are now studying.

I said last year that taxes should be imposed on personal income only over and above the minimum necessary to each one, according to his own family responsibilities. What is strictly necessary for an individual or for an individual and his family must be exempted. What has been called the normal tax takes away from the citizen in the lower brackets of income what is strictly necessary. Such a tax is unfair and unjust, and I am sure that the people of Canada are satisfied that it will disappear.

What is the amount strictly necessary for a married couple to live in Canada at the present time, and what is the amount necessary to raise children? I say, the government's obligations being what they are, the total of such amounts, according to the needs of each individual, should be the non-compressible revenue for that individual.

At the present time what is the average cost in Canada of the necessities of life for a married couple? I could not find any statistics in this connection. I inquired of the proper authorities, and the only statistics indicated to me were those giving the estimated distribution of income recipients by income classes for 1942, which can be found in the appendix to a publication of the dominion bureau of statistics entitled, "National accounts, income and expenditures, 1938-1945." Table 2A of the appendix gives the estimated distribution of income recipients by income classes for 1942, excluding agriculture and the armed services. I submit that in order to obtain an average we can take this table, because on the one hand the revenue of the farmers is difficult to calculate or appreciate, for obvious reasons, and on the other hand the income of persons in the armed services in 1942 was only temporary. The table gives the number of married men in the various income classes without distinction between those who have children and those who have not. I took an average as accurately as I could and arrived at the figure of $1,441 a year as the average income of married men in Canada in 1942. I was unpleasantly surprised to find the figure so low, which goes to prove that the people with lower incomes must be protected and that their incomes should be increased by all means possible under present economic conditions. Since 1942 there has been an increase of about twenty per cent, which would give for married men in Canada in 1946 an estimated average income of $1,730 a year.

Let us assume that this figure is the average income of a married man in Canada in 1946. We may say that it contains, first, what is strictly necessary for his wife and himself; second, for an average of a little more than two children; third, that it includes also the income tax paid in 1942 and also the savings that were made, without counting any luxuries. If you take off all the other items, the total of what is strictly necessary for the married man and his wife will fall below $1,500. That is as accurate as I can get it with the figures at hand; and $1,500 is the exemption proposed in the budget resolution. I repeat that I am far from sure the amount is accurate, and I would urge the Minister of Finance, or the acting minister, to have a survey made every five years—and I think this is important—to learn the average cost of living in the cities of Canada in order to determine what is necessary to maintain single persons and married couples, and then children of various ages, so that after each period the exemptions may be revised accordingly. I said we should ascertain the average cost of living in the cities, because if we took a complete average it would mean an average of the whole country, which in turn would mean that the population of the cities, where the cost of living is highest, would be called upon to pay taxes on part of what is strictly necessary for their maintenance.

I now come to the children. I said last fall, and I repeat, that what is strictly necessary to rear a child should not be taxable. Here again we have no statistics for Canada. However, in 1938 a survey was made in the United States, and it was found that the annual cost of feeding and clothing children from one to eighteen years of age varied from $109.40 to $241.60. As I say, these figures include only the cost of food and clothing. If you add $125 as an average to cover the other expenses, and to cover also the difference between the cost of living in the United States in 1938 and the cost of living in Canada in 1946, you will arrive at an average of around $300, which is the exemption proposed for children in the present resolution.

As a matter of fact, taking into account the family allowance, the exemption is more than $300, especially in the lower income brackets. For instance, take a man with five children, earning $3,000 a year. If the exemption for his children was $300 each he would have an exemption of $1,500 for his wife and himself and $1,500 for his children. He would receive nothing and would have no tax to pay. Under the present system, however, his exemption for himself and his wife will be $1,500 and his exemptions for his five children will be $100 each or $500, which makes a total exemption of $2,000, leaving a taxable income of $1,000 on which his tax is $242.50. On the other hand, however, he will receive at least $312 in family allowances. Consequently his net income at the end of the year will be $3,069.50, all taxes paid; and that is a man with an income of $3,000. Not only will he have no tax to pay; he will have a surplus of $69.50 over his earned income. Take a man with five children, earning $2,000 a year. He will have no tax to pay. His exemption is $2,000, and he will receive $312 in family allowances. Who said the new system is not protecting families in the lower income brackets? Who will say that even with the tremendous expenses it has to meet the government is not giving to all, under the circumstances, a great measure of equality of opportunity? I congratulate the Minister of Finance on having set up a system of personal income tax which protects the families, especially in the lower income brackets, and which imposes a tax only on the available income of the taxpayer after the necessities of life have been provided, according to his needs.

Before I go on, I should like to say a few words about the exemptions for children going to college or university. I submit that there should be no age limit of twenty-one and, in addition, that the cost of sending a son or daughter to university is so much more than $300 a year that a man should be allowed to deduct the actual expenses incurred in the education of his son or daughter falling within that category. Let him produce receipts, if necessary, but give him a chance. Taxpayers of average means cannot afford such advanced education for their children. However, I submit that those children have the same right of education that the children of rich men have. The interest of the state itself is to have the greatest possible number of advanced and educated men, and its corollary duty is to encourage young people and their parents to do so, in giving all classes of society equality of opportunity in that field.

Now that there have been corrected the two great injustices of the normal tax and of the uniform imposition of the graduated rates over $1,200, and now that there has been applied the sound principle of net income pressible income, according to family responsibilities, let us see what should be the distribution of the personal income tax on what is left over and above that minimum.

A distribution of justice requires that the rates be graduated. Let me only recall what the Master said about the poor widow. I am sure I do not have to mention to hon. members that passage in scripture which refers to the poor widow who had put only one penny into the fund, but was declared to have been the one who had given the greatest alms. As to the scale of rates, it should depend upon the needs of the state. There is no doubt that the rates proposed in the resolution are high. But the needs of the state are also very high and will still be in 1947. Let us hope that reductions will be announced in the next year's budget, and that such reductions will be made, especially in the lower rates of the scale, so as to ensure better distribution of wealth, and to promote further equality of opportunity.

I should like now to emphasize the importance of the reductions of personal income tax proposed for 1947. I have here a table which, with the permission of the committee, I should like to place on Hansard. It shows the distribution by income groups of combined tax reduction and increase in family allowance payments totalling $155 million in 1947.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. LESAGE: The table is as follows:

Distribution by Income Groups of combined Tax Reduction and increase in Family Allowance Payments totalling $155 millions in 1947

	Dollar Reduction	Percentage Reduction
Benefit to 550,000 to 600,000 exempt taxpayers	$ 24 millions	100
Benefit to taxpayers still taxable having incomes under $2,000	45 millions	42
Benefit to taxpayers with incomes $2,000 to $3,000	40 millions	39
Benefit to taxpayers with incomes $3,000 to $5,000	20 millions	23
Benefit to taxpayers with incomes $5,000 to $10,000	11 millions	13
Benefit to taxpayers with incomes $10,000 to $25,000	9 millions	12
Benefit to taxpayers with incomes over $25,000	6 millions	10
Total	$155 millions

Of the total benefit of $155 millions—
70 per cent is given taxpayers with incomes up to $3,000
83 per cent is given taxpayers with incomes up to 5,000
90 per cent is given taxpayers with incomes up to 10,000
10 per cent is given taxpayers with incomes over 10,000

Of that $155 million it will be seen in the table that the 550,000 to 600,000 who are exempt in 1947 will benefit to the extent of $24 million. Those still taxable and having incomes under $2,000 benefit to the extent of $45 million; those with incomes between $2,000 and $3,000 to the extent of $40 million; those with incomes between $3,000 and $5,000 to the extent of $20 million, and for those with incomes between $5,000 and $10,000 the reduction is $11 million. For those with incomes between $10,000 and $25,000 the amount is $9 million and, on incomes of over $25,000 it is $6 million. For those having incomes under $2,000 it will be seen that the reduction is 42 per cent; for those with incomes between $2,000 and $3,000, 39 per cent; for those with incomes between $3,000 and $5,000, 23 per cent, and for those with incomes from $5,000 to $10,000 it is 13 per cent.

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member will admit that there are more of the people in the lower income tax brackets.

Mr. LESAGE: That is right, so far as I have given it.

Mr. KNOWLES: What counts is the amount the individual pays.

Mr. LESAGE: That is right when I talk about the dollar reduction; but when I come to the percentage it is not true, because 42 per cent is the average reduction for everyone. I do not say that $155 million is 100 per cent, and then take in the various brackets in proportion. I do not do that. I say that for people who are still paying income tax and who earn less than $2,000 a year the average reduction for the whole of that is 42 per cent, while the average reduction for incomes between $5,000 and $10,000 is only 12 per cent.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes. I know what the hon. member is talking about, and I agree that that is right. But what counts is—

Mr. LESAGE: I will give my hon. friend the total figures. Of the total benefit of $155 million it is indicated that 70 per cent is given to taxpayers with incomes up to $3,000, and 83 per cent to taxpayers with incomes up to $5,000.

However, some taxpayers, a very few of them, who earn around $8,000 a year and who have six children or more, will not benefit by any reduction in income tax. Some of them will even suffer an increase of a few dollars in 1947 over 1946. It will be an increase of from $1 to $25. That is their net position, after taking into account family allowance.

Here is the explanation of that situation. Under the 1946 act, which is really the wartime statute introduced in 1942, with subsequent modifications, a liberal allowance was made for children in families with incomes between $4,500 and $10,000. This allowance, which quite substantially exceeds $108 per child, which most people assumed it would be, arises from the following provisions in the act:

(a) The allowance of $28 off the normal tax for each child.

(b) The allowance of $80 off the graduated tax for each child.

(c) The fact that at some levels of income the refundable portion is equal to one-half the tax, while at other levels it is equal to a certain proportion of income, which causes the tax value of children, expressed in net tax apart from refunds, to change.

(d) The refundable portion of the tax, where this is a percentage of income, is increased by one per cent for each child. In recent years and in 1946 the refundable portion is no longer payable, so that this results in an increased tax value of the child, that is to say, an additional allowance for the child.

(e) At present there is, of course, an arrangement for recovering family allowances paid to persons also getting income tax allowances for children.

On the whole, the tax value of children for incomes of over $4,500 in families of six children and over, is lower under the new law than under the old one. In most cases this difference is more than offset by the reduction in the total tax to which the parent is liable; but in a few cases the decrease in the tax value of the child is greater than the reduction in income tax that would otherwise occur. Consequently there is no reduction of tax, on balance.

To explain it with figures, the tax value of children for 1946, owing to the reasons I have mentioned, in a family of six children is as follows: $432 on an income of $1,200; only a few dollars more on $2,000; only a few dollars more on from $3,000 to $3,500; $550 on $4,000, and a little over $600 on an income of $4,500. Then it goes up sharply, reaching $1,100 at an income of $8,000.

In 1947 that line is levelled, and the tax value of the same children varies from $560 at an income of $2,100 to about $650 at an income of $8,000. The line for 1947 crosses the 1946 line at an income of $4,500, the tax value being there, I repeat, a little over $600.

All that means that justice has been done to everyone, that a disproportionate tax value for children has disappeared for higher incomes in that category, and that a fair and levelled tax value has been given to children in large families with incomes below $4,500. For the very few cases in which the net position in 1947 is worse than in 1946, I wonder if it would not be possible to have a proviso that in no case would anyone be asked to pay more income tax in 1947, after due deduction of the amount of the family allowances received, than he will have paid in 1946, in the same conditions of income and family obligations. It is only a few dollars, and if I were one who, upon filling out my income tax, found that in the same conditions and with the same income I would have a few dollars more to pay, I would not be pleased; that is certain.

If I had to pay more I would get mad and I believe that a few taxpayers will certainly get mad.

Many hon. members have spoken of the failure of the government to raise the exemptions for the lower incomes sufficiently high. I have already dealt with that, but let me add that with a population of 4,500,000 gainfully employed in Canada, only 1,800,000, or a little more than one-third, will pay personal income tax. I do not say that those exemptions could not be raised, but if they are they should be raised when it is also possible to reduce the rates of the graduated tax, especially on those with lower incomes.

Let us take examples which will show that for lower incomes the reduction is important. I have already given some for incomes of $2,000 and $3,000, with five children. Let us now take a man with an income of $2,250 and two children under sixteen years of age. For 1946, his net tax after receiving family allowances will be $72. In 1947—I am not making a comparison with 1941 because that is too far away and I think it is more fair to compare 1946 with 1947—his family allowances will exceed his income tax by $14. That is more than a reduction; he will have no tax to pay and will be actually $14 better off in earned income.

A man whose income is $2,500 and has three children under sixteen, will in 1947 pay $167.50 in taxes, but he will receive $194 in family allowances. His net position, therefore, at the end of the year will be a net income of $2,527.50. He will be better off in earned income by $27.50.

All the examples that one can take go to prove that, even with the high rates of graduated tax, we have attained a great measure of equality of opportunity in applying sound principles. Let us hope that with further reductions in the rates when government expenses fall, we shall attain a full measure of equality of opportunity.

Mr. FRASER: It has come to my attention that during the last few years taxpayers have gone to income tax offices in different parts of Canada and have had their income tax returns checked by the tax office and were told that they were correct, everything all right. They have then paid their tax, and then perhaps a year and half or two years afterward they get an account from the head office saying that they owe this, that or the other amount of income tax, which includes interest at five per cent from the time that they made their tax payment. I personally feel and I think the taxpayer feels that the department should not charge interest until at least ten days after the taxpayer has been notified of his assessment. If a taxpayer overpays he certainly does not get any interest back, and I do not see why the government should charge interest on accounts that they have already checked and stated to be correct. The reason for this practice might be that the people in the district offices do not understand the set-up as well as the head office does. After the district offices have made a ruling on the assessment and decided that everything is all right, the return then goes to headquarters. After examining the return, head office says, "That is not right." Back it goes to the district office, and they send out a notice of assessment to the taxpayer. I think that practice should be changed.

Every year I believe for the last six years I have asked for an income tax office to be established in Peterborough. The Peterborough district pays over one-third of the income tax that goes into the Belleville office, and although we have had one man in Peterborough in the last year with a helper, we should have an income tax office established permanently right in Peterborough.

There are other matters which I shall bring to the attention of the minister later.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I might now reply briefly to the first point my hon. friend raised in connection with assistance given to the taxpayer in preparing his return. Human nature being what it is, most of these taxpayers go into the district offices just a little time before the 30th of April, in the rush period, and ask for assistance in the preparation of their returns. That assistance is given so far as possible; but as the deputy minister has pointed out to me, the office has to employ everybody it can get and some of those taken on are not too experienced. Of course, as my hon. friend knows, the responsibility is on the taxpayer himself to make out his return and calculate the amount of his tax. The department endeavours to give as much assistance as it can, but the committee will realize that there are limitations on the number of staff that can be made available in the rush period toward the end of the year who are fully qualified to give such assistance.

I do not think it would be desirable to eliminate interest on the unpaid balance owing by a taxpayer until he had received a notice of assessment, at least until we are able to secure a more adequate staff than we have been able to obtain up to the present. It would require a very much larger staff to ensure that all returns would be assessed within, let us say, two or three months after they are filed. I do not think it is asking too much that a taxpayer should pay interest on the tax which on assessment it is found that he owes. Members of the committee will see that there is a provision later on in the resolution to the effect that interest will not be charged over a certain period. That is the suggested amendment in this year's budget.

Mr. FRASER: I am glad to hear that. The minister spoke of a rush of returns being made at the last minute. But I know of cases where the returns were made to the district office a month and a half before the time of payment came due. This was in Hamilton, and the office had plenty of time to check the returns. It was not a case of a last-minute rush. It was a case of a mistake being made by the tax office.

Mr. MICHAUD: May I add a few words following the remarks and figures submitted to the committee by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre? As I understand his position, he takes the view that the reductions which will go into effect on the 1st of January next are greater in the upper brackets than in the lower brackets, and he submitted tables on the budget discussion and further figures to-day. While he was quoting figures, I took the trouble to do some figuring myself, taking as a basis the figures which were submitted by the Minister of Finance on June 27 and which have not been challenged. Dealing first with the single person group, I find that the reductions for single men earning an income of $850 will be 55 per cent and on an income of $1,000, 28 per cent. Of course the figures I am now giving to the committee may contain some errors, because they were calculated rapidly.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Will the hon. member tell us the reduction from what year?

Mr. MICHAUD: 1946 to 1947. On the $1,250 income the reduction is 15 per cent; on $1,500, 13 per cent; from $2,000 and $2,500 up to $10,000 it varies between 15, 14, 16, 17 per cent; it goes up and down, but it hangs on around that figure. That is for the single person. If we turn to the married person with no children, we find this. In the first place, taxpayers with incomes of $1,250 and $1,500 will not pay any income tax next year, whereas they are paying in 1946, so that it is difficult to figure out the percentage there.

An hon. MEMBER: One hundred per cent.

Mr. MICHAUD: One hundred per cent; that is right. When we come to $2,000 income we find the reduction will be 40 per cent; on $2,500 the reduction will be 28 per cent; on $3,000, 22 per cent; on $4,000, 18 per cent; on $5,000, 16 per cent. So that as we go into the higher income brackets, the reductions are smaller; in other words, the reductions are greater in the lower income brackets.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I remind the hon. member that if the Minister of Finance were here he would probably tell him that he should not deal in these percentages, he should deal in actual figures. If he does that he will find that the figures increase as you go up.

Mr. MICHAUD: I cannot surmise what the Minister of Finance would tell me.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is what he told me.

Mr. MICHAUD: May I follow along by giving to the committee the result of a calculation in respect of taxpayers with two children. For those under $2,000 the net position is improved in every case, so that it is pretty difficult to figure the percentage there. The net position, taking into consideration family allowance, is improved by $14 in the case of a $1,300 income, to $73 in the case of the $2,000 income. The taxpayer earning $2,250 had to pay $72 in 1946, whereas in 1947 his net position will be $14. That is again a 100 per cent reduction. For a taxpayer with an income of $2,500 the reduction will be 63 per cent; for a $2,750 income, reduction 42 per cent; $3,000 income, reduction 30 per cent; for $4,000, 13 per cent; and for $5,000, 13 per cent. So it appears to me, as a result of these casual calculations, that the reduction is considerably higher in the lower income brackets and it decreases as we reach the upper brackets. This is the opposite conclusion to that reached by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and I submit it is the proper way to look at it, that is, the percentage reduction.

Mr. KNOWLES: Oh, no.

Mr. MICHAUD: Well, that is a matter of opinion; and when the hon. member quoted figures I think he took the initial position that the reductions were greater in the higher income brackets.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is true.

Mr. MICHAUD: And he should have argued on the reductions from 1946, but to prove his point apparently he went to the 1941 figures.

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member wants to be fair. When I spoke on July 11, I put on the record four tables. I spent most of my time to-night in dealing with the fourth, because that was the one which the minister challenged. But the first one is, "Net increase in amount of income retained by taxpayers after payment of 1947 income taxes as compared with 1945 and 1946". It is to be found on page 3374 of Hansard. I have the same three columns which the hon. member has given, for the single person, the married person with no children, and the married person with two children. But instead of doing it in percentages I did it in the actual amount of money, which is what counts to the taxpayer.

Mr. MICHAUD: I was not in the house when the hon. member dealt with it then. At any rate, I want to put before the committee the results in terms of percentages, and the net result is a conclusion opposite to that reached by the hon. member.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to answer one question which the hon. member for High Park asked me while I was speaking and I was not able to give him the chapter and verse at the time. He asked me what was the total amount of revenue received from income taxes in the year to which certain rates applied, namely the 1941 rates which I quoted. He gave a figure of something around a hundred and some millions. I said I thought it was in the order of $290 million. I would now ask the hon. member to refer to Hansard of June 27, at the end of which is an appendix to the budget containing various papers. On page 4 of that appendix, in the first column, the first item is, "Tax revenue—individual income tax, including national defence tax", and the amount is $296,139,000. That was for the fiscal year 1941-42, which was the year covered by the rates that I was quoting.

Mr. McMASTER: I think that includes corporation tax.

Mr. KNOWLES: No; I am sorry. If the hon. member will turn up the page he will find that the corporation income tax is $185,836,000; it is just three items farther down in the column. He may have the figures for the previous fiscal year, but I am quoting the year which corresponds with the year the rates of which I was giving.

Mr. McMASTER: I will ask the hon. member to look at page 11 of the taxation statistics issued by the department, which was what I had in my hand when I was criticizing. I did not keep it in my head.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am looking at the official figures given by the Minister of Finance. I appreciate the support of the principles we have been advocating by the two hon. members on the other side who spoke, and I would say to my hon. friend who has just spoken that what counts to the worker is the "take-home pay" and not what you can do by dealing with percentages. I refer him again to my tables of July 11.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. KNIGHT: Before this section carries, I should like to draw the attention of the acting minister to something which I think works hardship and injustice on certain employees. Perhaps I can explain this best by giving a specific instance. The one which was drawn to my attention was the case of a girl teaching in a country school who, in the course of events, submitted the amount of her income on the proper form to the department. At the same time her income was returned to the income tax department as being so much; I refer to the return on the form—I believe it is T.D.-1—which the employer uses to inform the department of the amount earned by the employee. The secretary of the school district in which the girl was working supplied his estimate of the amount of her income. She disputed that amount; she wrote to the school board and asked that it be corrected, but for some reason this was not done. I believe the secretary simply adopted the attitude that he had already finished with that matter and that as far as he was concerned he could not be bothered about it. So the girl was informed by the income tax department's local office that the only thing they had before them was the amount furnished by the employer, and since she was an interested party they could not accept her figure. However, they advised her to write to the employer and get the correct figure. Again she wrote and this time no notice was taken of the letter. The result was that the income tax people threatened to sue that girl for the amount and they had her frightened to such an extent that she paid the full amount although she knew she had not earned the income on which the amount was based. Rather than get into trouble she paid the extra amount. It was then that I received a letter about the matter, and it was finally straightened out so that she was given the refund and the matter was adjusted. I thought it was my duty to bring such a case to the attention of the income tax people in the hope that some provision might be made—I do not know how; that is their headache—to prevent that type of injustice occurring again where the employer is not willing to cooperate with the employee and with the income tax department.

Mr. ABBOTT: That would be a very rare case. Of course, the income tax inspector, or whoever it was, had no right to insist upon taking the return of the employer rather than the statement made by the young lady in her income tax return that that was her income. In the result, as my hon. friend has pointed out, the situation was cleared up and the refund made. She is only liable to pay tax on her real income. If the employer makes a mistake and reports on T.D.-1, if that is the number of the form, that the income was in excess of the amount actually received, the mistake is his and not the taxpayer's, and the taxpayer is entitled to insist that the tax be paid only on the income actually received. This young lady no doubt did take appropriate steps later on to see that she was not charged more than she should be. It is one of the things incidental to administration. The law is perfectly clear. The taxpayer files his return and pays tax on that. If the return is incorrect the department is entitled to assess. It is not a case of the employer's word against the taxpayer's, but a question of what the amount actually received by the taxpayer was.

Mr. KNIGHT: There is no way, as far as I can find out or can presently see, for the department to ascertain what the actual figure was. If the employer has given a wrong statement and refuses to give another, who is to decide what the amount was?

Mr. ABBOTT: If the department under those circumstances insists on taking the employer's word as against the taxpayer's, the taxpayer has the simple recourse of filing an appeal within thirty days under the provisions of the act, and that takes the form of a simple letter appealing against the assessment. The appeal is to the minister and it would come in the ordinary course to the department at Ottawa. It would come to the attention of the deputy minister and the matter would be investigated. I think the case mentioned by my hon. friend, while it is an accurate statement of what took place in the circumstances, is exceedingly rare, because I suppose 999 employers out of 1,000 file correct statements showing the amount actually paid to the employee, and it is hard to imagine a case where it is called to the attention of the employer that he appears to have made a mistake that he would refuse to correct it or to reply to a letter. But that is one of the hazards incident to human nature.

Mr. SHAW: The hon. member for Peterborough West referred to interest charged on arrears where such arrears arise in consequence of an error in calculating the amount of the tax. What I have to say in that regard arises out of certain representations made to me by farmer organizations. As the minister is aware, the farmers of western Canada are at the present time just a bit disturbed, to put it mildly. Their feeling is not attributable entirely to matters relating to income tax. There is the price structure in relation to costs, over which the minister has no control. There is the cost of living, about which of course they are disturbed, because they have no faith whatsoever in the cost of living index, which ignores taxes, and quality or lack of quality of clothing, and so forth. There is some complaint about having to file tax returns. However, they knew that the law obliges them to file returns and that a day of reckoning would arrive. Therefore I am not saying anything about that argument of theirs. Many of them, however, make this statement: "We worked under extreme difficulties during the war when there were shortages, more particularly shortages of skilled help. We put in long hours, up to sixteen a day. We are not skilled in the art of completing income tax returns and often we have no time to go to points where satisfactory help could be secured. We did our best in computing the returns and we submitted them. We heard nothing about them for two or three years, and then we were advised that we had miscalculated and therefore owed the department one, two or three hundred dollars, and were charged five per cent on balances due."

The argument of the income tax branch has been this: "We have experienced a shortage of staff." Well, the farmer's argument is just as legitimate. The income tax people say, "We have inexperienced help," but the farmer was in exactly the same position. The farmer says, "These people have a specific task, namely, that of assessing returns, and we feel that we should not be penalized in consequence of their taking two or three years to notify us that we owe them two or three hundred dollars." Some got their 1943 assessments last year; some got their 1942 assessments last year, and personally I feel that they have a legitimate argument in asking for consideration as far as interest on unpaid returns is concerned.

The argument might be advanced that they are assessed interest only as from the date of assessment. That was what the minister was going to say, I have no doubt.

Mr. ABBOTT: May I point out that there is a resolution, No. 36, which proposes an amendment to the law with respect to the payment of interest on income tax. I think my hon. friend's remarks would be more appropriate there. However, he has got pretty well started and perhaps he had better carry on.

Mr. SHAW: It had escaped my attention that there was such a resolution, and if it meets the situation that exists, then I say, thank goodness for it.

Mr. ABBOTT: It will be more appropriate to discuss the question under that resolution. That was the point I was making.

Mr. SHAW: Someone has suggested that it applies only to returns filed in 1945 or thereafter.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. SHAW: Then, of course, that does not meet the argument because the great period of emergency was in 1940, and more particularly in 1941, 1942, 1943 and 1944. That is when we were deeply involved in war and when the farmer encountered his greatest difficulty in the matter of help. That is when he, in compliance with the request of the government, worked from long before sun-up until long after sun-down. However, I shall have more to say about that when we reach the appropriate resolutions.

I should like to say a few words in respect of the exemption for income tax purposes. We fully appreciate, as has been argued, that the government is in great need of revenue. Of course it is difficult for the single man who receives $14.50 a week to understand why he is still going to pay taxes on that amount. The government says to him, "Well, we need the revenue." Of course he advances this argument, and more particularly in some parts of Canada, "It certainly was not because of our advice that you used financial methods which piled up the colossal debt, colossal interest charges plus the other colossal fixed commitments, and all the other commitments that resulted." It is small consolation to the single man who receives $15 or $16 a week to be told whenever he encounters difficulties in getting along, "Just think of the government's great needs which are still greater than yours."

So far as the married man is concerned, if he receives $28.80 or $29 a week he is taxed. I do not know just what argument could be advanced, especially with the present increased living costs, and the higher taxes in every field including those on his own home, to convince this man that he should be taxed. It is hard for any of us to accept the argument that because of the great needs of the country we must retain our exemptions at such an extremely low level. Personally I gave a great deal of consideration to the demand for a $1,000 exemption for the single man and $2,000 for the married man. I stuck at it, simply because I have made certain budget calculations. I am not going to quote any figures, but it is an application of a bit of common sense to our living costs of to-day as compared with three, four or five years ago. The worst feature of it is that the cost of living is sky-rocketing to-day. That is taking place in spite of the controls. Any man who pays a bill will realize that his general cost of living has increased materially. He cannot be kidded by any 122 or 124 as the cost of living index. For example, the commodities of food and clothing make up the bulk of the purchases of the family man. So far as clothing is concerned, I say that the cost of living has gone up more than forty per cent, and the cost of foodstuffs generally has gone up an equivalent amount. To ask or to expect that we shall maintain in this country a decent standard of health and a proper mental outlook, while at the same time still imposing upon the $14 a week single man and the $28 married man these high rates of taxation, is to kid ourselves.

I do not wish to take up any more time at this moment, except to say that with respect to interest I shall watch the resolution referred to and if it does not grant the concessions which we believe the farmers are entitled to then I shall be obliged to occupy more of the time of the committee.

Mr. FAIR: Before this section is carried, I should like to refer once again to the question that is puzzling farmers to a great extent in my part of the country, namely taxation on money received from the sale of grain grown in the early years of the war. The farmers were compelled to store this grain because of the quota system which was in effect. Then, when the grain was sold in 1943, 1944 or 1945 they are compelled to pay taxes on the basis of the year the grain was sold rather than when the grain was grown. I should like to have a statement from the minister in that connection. I feel that if the grain was grown in 1940 and was stored because of the quota system in effect, which was not the choice of the farmer but of the government, then the grain should be assessed at the 1940 rate rather than that of 1944 or some other subsequent year when the grain was sold.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall look into the question raised by the hon. member.

Resolution agreed to.

2. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years the following deductions from income be allowed:

(a) $1,500 in the case of married persons and persons allowed a deduction equivalent to that of a married person and $750 in the case of all other persons;

(b) $300 in the case of dependents not eligible for family allowances, $100 in the case of children eligible for family allowances and amounts not exceeding $300 contributed to the support of partial dependents.

Mr. McMASTER: Will the Acting Minister of Finance take into consideration the moving appeal made by the hon. member to my left with regard to raising the amount of tax exemption for each child?

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall take it into consideration, yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: If it were possible, of course, this is the resolution which some of us would be seeking to amend, but we know what the rules of the house do to us when we make such an attempt. I should like to ask whether any changes are proposed with respect to the definition of a married person. As the committee may recall, one of my complaints was that some cases of single persons were getting more benefits than married persons, but what I am thinking of now is not a single person who has no other responsibilities, but single persons who do have additional responsibilities, but who in the past have not been included in the married status. I have in mind widowers who are maintaining homes to keep their families together. I need not go into all the different cases which have been brought to the attention of the Minister of Finance and the department down through the years. Are any changes proposed?

Mr. ABBOTT: I remember the discussions which took place in preceding years. There is no change contemplated this year in the definition as to what will qualify a man or a woman as having married or equivalent status.

Mr. JACKMAN: In fixing the exemption for single people at $750, has the department ever endeavoured to analyse just how difficult it is for a single person to live in a city on that amount. May I suggest here that it is to a large extent in the cities where the income tax is most easily collected. The income tax is often said to be the ideal tax, but may I say to the minister that the income taxes are satisfactory only where books are kept and where there is an accounting. There are a great many people in Canada as a whole who do not receive their salaries from a corporation or business, and it is not so easy to ascertain whether or not they do have incomes. I sometimes believe that we put an overemphasis on income tax as the ideal form of tax. Perhaps there are other forms which are worthy of more attention than they receive.

To get back to the original suggestion as to whether or not the Department of National Revenue or the Department of Finance ever investigated the difficulty of an individual single person living in a city like Toronto or Montreal on the minimum exemption of $750 which is allowed under section 2, I have had a budget prepared by a young woman, in fact, by my secretary in Toronto, which is entitled "Cost of Living Chart for a Single Girl on a Weekly Basis." I think it is worthy of presentation to this committee because it does show—and I think the committee can pass on it as well as any person—whether or not an individual can live on this small sum of money, $750, before being subject to the first bracket of taxation of 22 per cent.

The budget is as follows: board and room for the week, $8. I do not think anyone will cavil at that amount being set aside for a single girl living in a large city. Car tickets, $1, which would provide just enough to take her to and from work, I think with one extra trip a week. Lunches, $2; that is, 40 cents a working day for lunch. Some people may think that is high for an average lunch, but occasionally they want a bit of variety, so that I do not think anyone will object to that.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is very low.

Mr. JACKMAN: I think so myself, but I shall leave it to the committee. This budget was drawn up on October 24 last, and no doubt prices have risen since then. Clothing, $4 a week; and I see in parenthesis, "and incidentals necessary to good grooming." Then doctor and dentist bills, including medicines, tooth paste and so on, $1. I see there is a note on this item, which says:

> Most people in ordinary circumstances go far too long without consulting their doctor; in fact it could safely be said that the majority wait until they experience symptoms of illness rather than have the necessary check-up. So to build up a needed reserve for doctor bills, hospital expenses, to take care of periodic check-ups with the dentist and to provide the necessary aids to good health, $52 a year seems little enough.

Then there is entertainment, club fees, educational and cultural advancement, at fifty cents a week. I do not think anyone will object to a small amount like that. Next is a rather large item which is perhaps not often met with: church collection and donations, fifty cents a week. We can cut that out entirely if hon. members wish; it is only $25 a year and would not do very much to disprove the point I am endeavouring to make, but personally I think most of us feel that fifty cents is not a large amount for church collection and donations, and certainly it is very much less than the tithe some people like to contribute. Then there is an item for a holiday fund, to provide for the two weeks it is hoped to get as holidays, which requires the saving of $1 a week throughout the year; and it is difficult to get holidays nowadays even for $50. These items total $18 a week; on a yearly basis the total is $936, or $186 over the exemption of $750. I believe, after an examination of the individual items, hon. members will feel that they are on the low side rather than the high side. There is a deficiency, therefore, of $186 below the amount which I think can be considered a minimum; but if a person does earn $936 to cover this minimum budget the tax collector comes around and collects 22 per cent on the amount in excess of $750, or a total of $40.92, which I feel is too much to take from a person in that income bracket.

I shall not go into the budget for a married person endeavouring to live on $1,500 in one of our cities, but it is impossible to maintain anything like a Canadian standard on such a minimum amount of money. I wonder whether or not the tax collectors in setting such minimum amounts, have really examined the position of these people. It is quite true they come back and tell you that we are now carrying on a great many social services and that there are other expenses—

Mr. ABBOTT: They are the most generous exemptions in the world.

Mr. JACKMAN: Let us assume that our exemptions are the most generous in the world, as the minister has said. I shall not challenge his statement, but I wonder whether many of the things the government has undertaken are really wanted by the people who are just above these exemption brackets of $750 and $1,500; whether these people really want the things the government is endeavouring to provide for them, or the other things on which the government spends the taxpayers' money. It would not be so bad to provide all the things we do provide, to spend all this money on information services, film boards and everything else we think may be desirable, though expensive, if the taxes could be collected from those whose standard of living is not brought below a minimum which any member of this committee would consider decent. Therefore I feel that when the house is appropriating money we should realize that a large part of our revenue comes from single people who are just above the $750 bracket and from married people just above the $1,500 bracket. The government continually remind us of the amount of revenue that would be lost if the exemptions were raised to more reasonable standards. But I hope they realize that they are taxing people below what could be considered sufficient to maintain what we believe to be a minimum standard of living; and I suggest that we cut down expenses on many of the things on which we are spending the money of these poor taxpayers, these things and services which are not as necessary to them as is a little higher standard of living. That is one of the reasons why many on this side of the house feel that some better treatment should be given Canadian taxpayers in the very low brackets, by way of further exemptions.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Ever since the minister delivered his budget speech, I have been thinking that in 1941 Roosevelt and Churchill met somewhere in the Atlantic and agreed to an Atlantic charter. Two of the things against which the world was supposed to be guaranteed in that charter were want and fear. What we have succeeded in doing is guaranteeing to all of us want and fear. This is a most astonishing thing. From coast to coast in this country I believe the people are just haunted by want and fear.

The remarks of the hon. member for Rosedale would cause almost anyone to think seriously along this line. The hon. member could have gone on to point out several other things which are being overlooked. Let us suppose that a young girl finishes high school, goes to normal and then commences to teach. Let us suppose she has accumulated a debt of $300 in order to complete her education. This girl starts to work, we will say, at $750 or $800 a year. Suppose she cuts down the expenses mentioned by the hon. member for Rosedale by twenty-five per cent. In the first place, let the most brilliant man in the income tax department go to work and figure out how long it will take that girl to pay off her $300 debt. Then, let him figure out how long it will take her to save enough to provide for two or three years of additional education. In the case of a young man, how long will it take to prepare himself to be able to marry? How long will it take either the girl or the young man to provide anything like sufficient savings for their later years? In case this girl has an accident or must have an operation for appendicitis, costing perhaps $125, with a doctor bill of, say $100, how long will it take to pay off those bills?

I do not want to complain overmuch, but I think we are seriously neglecting a large percentage of the population to whom we ought to be giving careful attention. If we are going to impoverish the youth of the land and destroy their incentive, how shall we build that fine, high morale, which should prevail to make this a great nation? How shall we build in our young people a confidence that Canada is really the great land we all supposed she was?

Some serious thought must be given to this matter. It may be argued that the government must have money. I grant that, freely.

My own ideas as to where money can come from are well enough known to hon. members. I find that in a general way, when those ideas are even mentioned, the minds of hon. members close up, just like granite. It is high time members of the house began to open their minds a bit. Surely what can be achieved in the way of social services and many other things that are desirable, surely the extent of those services is not going to be limited by the amount of dollars we can wring out of our people by such oppressive taxation as is now inflicted upon them.

It ought to be clear to hon. members that to suppose that such a limit is the governing factor is only to be foolish. It is time there was different thinking in financial circles of this country. It is time we began to realize that the amount of money we can have depends upon the goods and services we can produce, and not upon the dollars we can wring out of the people's pockets.

If members of the Progressive Conservative party would begin to direct their attention along those lines instead of talking about economy all the time—

Mr. MacNICOL: I am listening.

Mr. BLACKMORE: —they would be on their way to real progress. If their thinking and their expressions should follow along the line that what is physically possible in this country must be made financially possible—

Mr. HANSELL: That is too much to expect.

Mr. BLACKMORE: —and if the Liberals would begin to think along the same lines they would begin to say, "That is good, sound, common sense. What is physically possible ought to be financially possible. How can we make that come about?" Then I think we would begin to look upon as a monstrosity such taxation measures as we are at present seriously contemplating in this House of Commons.

It may be argued that we have the most generous taxation system to be found. Well, that is no credit to us. The serious thing is the way we are afflicting the people who make this country their home. I believe I have said enough for the present. I shall probably have more to say later on.

Mr. MacINNIS: There are only four minutes to go, and I was wondering if I might use them by trying to say something sensible. I am inspired to speak, not by the hon. member for Lethbridge but by the hon. member for Rosedale. We both agree on one thing, namely that the exemptions in the lower income tax brackets are too low. If I understood the hon. member correctly, that is about the extent to which we agree, for the thesis he propounded was that people were kept poor because of the taxes they pay. If the hon. member takes the tax on an income of $900 or $800 at 22 per cent he will find that it is a small amount. No one is made poor because that amount is taken from him. He was made poor long before that happened. And he is kept poor, not because he is taxed, but because he does not get the full or the social value of his production. That is why he is poor.

We are not going to remedy the position, either, by making things financially possible that are physically possible, or by eliminating taxes, until we get down to the fact that a man is entitled to a living simply because he is a human being. And he is entitled to a living on an equality with all other human beings in the country, because the wealth of the country cannot be produced without him and his kind. We have on our hands some labour disputes, in which a great many people are involved. These are people with small incomes. But when they stop working, the wealth out of which comes all income is not produced.

I agree with the hon. member for Rosedale that the exemptions are too low. But when I included that in an amendment to the budget, he voted against it, just as he and his colleagues voted against the various other things which the leader of the opposition supported to-day, but which he voted against last week.

We must stop talking on both sides of our face. We must deal with issues as they really are, and not in the superficial way that my hon. friends are dealing with them.

Resolution stands.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

ARMY PERSONNEL AND DEPENDENTS RETURNED TO CANADA

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. How many Canadian army personnel have been returned to Canada in each month of the present year?
2. How many dependents have been returned for each month of the present year?
3. What is the number of (a) Canadian army personnel; (b) dependents, yet to be returned to Canada as at July 1, 1946?

1.

January	31,984
February	31,000
March	6,084
April	8,531
May	6,151
June	11,796

2.

	Wives	Children
January	406	175
February	517	323
March	3,492	1,302
April	2,891	789
May	3,258	1,546
June	2,739	1,358
Total	13,303	5,493

3. (a) 11,352 as of 28 June, 1946; (b) Wives, 15,389; children, 4,238.

DISPOSAL OF WEARING APPAREL, BEDDING AND CAMP EQUIPMENT

Mr. KNIGHT:

What action is the government taking as to the ultimate disposal of the eighty-seven carloads of wearing apparel, bedding, and camp equipment referred to in sessional paper No. 248, tabled on Tuesday, July 16?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Some items are required for use by the army and are being moved to the army distributing depot, Regina. Items not required by the army are being declared as surplus to War Assets Corporation for disposal.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

WAR ASSETS—SALES OVER $4,000 TO FIRMS, CORPORATIONS OR INDIVIDUALS

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. To what firms, corporations or individuals in, (a) Ottawa; (b) Montreal; (c) Toronto; (d) Winnipeg, have surplus, (1) scrap metal; (2) plumbing fittings and fixtures; (3) electrical equipment; (4) Trucks; (5) passenger cars; (6) tractors; (7) machine tools and equipment; (8) aircraft engines; (9) non-ferrous metals; (10) clothing, been sold by War Assets corporation or War Assets Limited in excess of $4,000?
2. What is the value of the sales made to each of such firms, corporations or individuals as of April 1, 1946?
3. Which of the above firms, corporations or individuals are classed as "recognized dealers" by War Assets corporation?

INSPECTION BOARD—SALARIES

Mr. LENNARD:

1. How many people were in the employ of the Inspection Board of Canada on July 1, 1946, and what are their salaries?
2. Who is the chairman of the board; who are the directors of the different departments of this board and what are their salaries?
3. What are the duties at the present time?
4. Have any new appointments been made to the board since the cessation of hostilities?
5. If so, had these appointees seen service overseas?
6. What was the total cost of operating this board from July 1, 1945, to July 1, 1946?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Return tabled.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

Mr. FRASER:

1. How many different agencies has the national film board?
2. Where are these agencies located?
3. What are the functions of each of these agencies?
4. How many workshops, or studios, are used by the national film board?
5. How many offices has the national film board?
6. What rent is paid for each of these offices, studios or workshops?
7. How many employees are employed by the national film board?
8. How many employees have been taken on by the national film board since January 1, 1946?
9. What amount is paid in salaries and wages per month, by the national film board?
10. How many employees receive (a) $2,000 and over per year; (b) $3,000 and over per year; (c) $5,000 and over per year?
11. What is the salary of each person who receives $5,000 or over per year?

Mr. CLAXTON: Return tabled.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX—REFUNDABLE PORTION

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia):

1. What is the total amount of refundable portion of the excess profit tax payable to Canadian companies for the years 1941-42-43-44-45?
2. What companies will receive over (a) $500,000 as a refund on the excess profit tax; (b) what is the amount in each case?

Mr. McCANN: An answer can be given to the first part of this question, but I do not think we can give an answer to the second part, because that is private business and should not be divulged what companies will receive over $500,000 as a refund on the excess profits tax.

Mr. KNOWLES: Why not?

Mr. McCANN: It is private business.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

RATIONING OF SUGAR AND BUTTER

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

For a copy of all letters directed by the wartime prices and trade board or any of its officials to the head office of La Banque Provinciale du Canada or to senior officials of the said bank since the 1st of January, 1945, drawing attention to breaches of wartime prices and trade board regulations or other irregularities in connection with the rationing of sugar and butter, and a copy of all replies thereto.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PROVISION FOR LOANS FOR ESTABLISHMENT IN BUSINESS OR PROFESSION

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to authorize payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of losses, within the limitations therein provided, to banks incurred in respect of loans made to veterans resident and domiciled in Canada who have received or are entitled to receive a gratuity under the War Service Grants Act, 1944, and who have not elected to take benefits under the Veterans Land Act, 1942. Such loans to be confined to the purpose of establishing the veteran in business or professionally. Provision is also made for the payment of the necessary expenses of administration out of moneys appropriated by parliament.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

UNITED NATIONS

WORLD HEALTH ORGANIZATION—DR. CHISHOLM EXECUTIVE SECRETARY OF INTERIM COMMISSION

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Monday the Final Act of the international health conference and the constitution of the world health organization were signed at New York by fifty-one of the united nations and by nine other nations. The signature for Canada was made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Deputy Minister of Health, Doctor G. B. Chisholm. There were also signed an intergovernmental arrangement establishing the interim commission of the world health organization and a protocol designed to transfer to the world health organization the functions and duties now performed by the office internationale d'hygiene publique.

I now table copies of these documents, and so that hon. members may have before them the text of the constitution, I ask the consent of the house to have it printed as an appendix to Votes and Proceedings.

A resolution will be introduced at this session if time permits to provide for the approval of the constitution.

At this conference Canada had as advisers, in addition to officers of the government, Doctor T. C. Routley, C.B.E., General Secretary of the Canadian Medical Association, and two former presidents of the Canadian Public Health Association, Doctor C. W. MacMillan, Professor of Public Health at McGill University and Doctor A. Groulx, chief medical officer of the City of Montreal. These distinguished representatives of the medical profession were in constant attendance throughout the whole period of the conference, and the government wishes to express its warm appreciation and thanks for services rendered in this way to their country and indeed, to humanity.

Doctor G. B. Chisholm, Deputy Minister of Health, acted as rapporteur of the technical preparatory committee which prepared the draft of the constitution. He was also chairman of the important committee of the conference dealing with administration and finance. The great value of his services in connection with the conference has been recognized by his selection as executive secretary of the interim commission of the new organization which will be charged with the task of setting up the new organization. This has necessitated his resignation as deputy minister of health, which has been accepted, and Doctor G. D. W. Cameron has been appointed in his place. Doctor Cameron saw service in the last war, graduated in medicine from Queen's University, holds the diploma of Public Health and has been director of health services of the department.

Canada has been named as one of the eighteen nations to constitute the interim commission, which will carry on the work of organization until the required twenty-six states have ratified the constitution.

By these instruments the foundation has been laid of a single world health organization, whose object is "the attainment by all peoples of the highest possible level of health." By the preamble the parties to the constitution declared that "the following principles are basic to the happiness, harmonious relations and security of all peoples." The first principle was that "health is a state of complete physical, mental and social well being and not merely the absence of disease or infirmity."

The functions of the organization will be varied. There is a wide field where co-operative action between nations is necessary and where the organization itself through its executive board and general assembly can give leadership in the attainment "by all peoples of the highest possible level of health."

The conference was an outstanding success. It showed that in a matter of wide human interest like health, the nations could work together to establish a world organization on a sound foundation. The constitution of the world health organization, which has just been unanimously agreed to, is not a colourless compromise, but represents a constructive document of world-wide scope and immense human significance.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I suggest to the Acting Prime Minister that high priority be given to the resolution ratifying this constitution? I suggest that it be dealt with at this session, whether there is time or not.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If want of time were a physical obstacle, it could not be dealt with anyway, but it is hoped that this will be regarded by hon. members as one of the subjects that should have high priority in the session.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask whether the interim commission to which the right hon. gentleman has just referred is carrying on its work now, and, if so, who is Canada's representative thereon?

Mr. CLAXTON: Perhaps I might be permitted to answer that question. The interim commission is actually sitting in New York and is carrying on its work there. Canada is represented on the commission to-day by Doctor T. C. Routley, who has stayed in New York for the purpose. Canada's permanent representation on the commission will be decided later, but it is hoped that Doctor Routley will be associated with it.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say to the acting leader of the government that I am in considerable agreement with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) as to the desirability of early consideration of a matter so very important from the international point of view. I should think that this house would not need to take a great deal of time in deciding that Canada desires to have a part in what is regarded by many as the best testing ground and perhaps the best opportunity for international cooperation with respect to any subject in the international field.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: When hon. members will have had an opportunity to read the constitution I shall be glad to have a word with the leaders of the various groups and try to provide an appropriate moment to dispose of the matter without taking up more time than is really necessary.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is satisfactory.

TRAVEL ABROAD

PASSPORTS TO EUROPE—CONDITIONS AFFECTING RETURN JOURNEY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have looked into the question directed by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) on Monday last to the Minister of Mines and Resources concerning a certificate required to be signed by persons applying for passports to enable them to go to countries outside the western hemisphere. As the issuance of passports comes within the jurisdiction of the Department of External Affairs, possibly I can answer the hon. member's question. The answer may help the public to understand why the formality is being required.

As the hon. member knows, the transportation situation was particularly difficult immediately after the war and travel beyond the western hemisphere was restricted to certain categories of applicants. As conditions abroad improved, these categories were broadened from time to time, and in June of this year the screening of applications for travel to countries beyond the western hemisphere was dispensed with. While there is now no screening process, transportation facilities will nevertheless continue to be limited for some time, and the government feels that it is only fair to warn all persons proceeding overseas that this condition exists. The passport office has, therefore, been authorized to endorse passports for any country on demand provided that the applicant signs a statement that he realizes the difficulty of obtaining transportation. The statement also acknowledges that the applicant realizes that the issuance of a passport does not obligate the government of Canada to undertake any responsibility with regard to his transportation. It is thus made perfectly clear to the applicant that he will have difficult travel conditions to face in connection with which the government may not be able to help him.

Mr. FRASER: I thank the right hon. gentleman.

NATIONAL FLAG

RECOMMENDATIONS OF COMMITTEE—QUESTION AS TO ACTION BY ORDER IN COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. ROSS THATCHER (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Is it the government's intention to have the house debate the recommendation of the flag committee this session? If not, will it give an undertaking that a Canadian flag will not be selected by order in council before the next session.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): I shall have to take the hon. gentleman's question as a notice. I have not had an opportunity of discussing the matter with my colleagues. It will be appreciated that the pressure on our time has been such that I need not apologize for not having had that opportunity. However, as soon as the opportunity presents itself I shall be glad to make a statement to the house.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

"DAILY PROVINCE" AND VANCOUVER TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): May I ask the Minister of Labour whether he has received the report of the conciliation board in the matter of the dispute between the Vancouver Daily Province and the Vancouver typographical union?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): No report has come to my attention, and I think I can say, with the acting leader of the government, that I too have been under some pressure. As soon as the matter comes before me I shall be glad to inform my hon. friend.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

2. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years the following deductions from income be allowed:

(a) $1,500 in the case of married persons and persons allowed a deduction equivalent to that of a married person and $750 in the case of all other persons;

(b) $300 in the case of dependents not eligible for family allowances, $100 in the case of children eligible for family allowances and amounts not exceeding $300 contributed to the support of partial dependents.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose last night it was considering resolution 2 of the Income War Tax Act. Before the committee begins its discussion may I remind hon. members that this is one of the committees of the whole, and paragraph 2 of standing order 58 reads as follows:

Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

It has been the custom in the past to allow general discussion on the first clause, but I would remind the committee that we are now on the second one, and all discussion should be relevant to that particular clause.

Mr. FLEMING: Paragraph (b) of resolution 2 has to do with the allowance for dependents. I should like to mention particularly the provision in regard to dependent children under sixteen years of age. In explaining the purpose of this resolution the Minister of Finance said on June 27, as reported at pages 2915 and 2916 of Hansard:

I should like to make it clear that this proposal assumes the universal payment of family allowances to all taxpayers with eligible children from January 1, 1947. A taxpayer with a child eligible for family allowances will be assumed for purposes of income tax to have received family allowances, and will be given the deduction from income of only $100 in respect of such child. Taxpayers who are not now claiming family allowances for children eligible for them should make application for them to commence in the new year when the proposed measure will take effect.

I should like to submit to the Acting Minister of Finance that this is a harsh proposal for a number of people who prefer not to take family allowances. Surely it is arbitrary on the part of the government to say to them, "you must take family allowances or forego both your right to family allowances and your right to the deduction." Why should it not be possible for the department to continue the present basis, under which the taxpayer who is eligible for family allowances will take his benefit either in the form of family allowances or in the form of the larger deduction in respect of the support of the dependent child? It may be that it is easier for the departments concerned, National Revenue, Finance and National Health and Welfare, to do it in the way that it is proposed in this resolution; but the government should look farther than that.

In actual effect, what does it mean? It means that some wage earners and salary earners from whose earnings deductions have not been hitherto made at the source will now become subject to deduction of taxes at the source, and those who do not pay their income tax on that basis—for instance, the man who is working on a commission or any basis other than salary or wages—will lose deductions he has hitherto enjoyed, in that the government will insist, in effect, on paying him his family allowances, and will take from him a larger sum in quarterly instalments of income tax. That seems an involved way of carrying on government business. In fairness to the taxpayers I suggest that the government owes them the duty to permit them the choice they now have of taking either the family allowances or the larger deductions.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Acting Minister of Finance): Perhaps I had better say a word in answer to the comments which have been made by the hon. member for Eglinton. In the first place, of course, there is no compulsion on anyone to take family allowances. If the taxpayer is eligible to claim and receive family allowances, it is optional with him whether he does it or not; but under the system proposed by the resolution, if he fails to do it the exemption which he can claim for his child will be only $100. My hon. friend has pointed out—

Mr. FLEMING: That is in effect compulsion.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is not compulsory. He forfeits a certain amount of money each year; the average is $72 per child—that is perfectly true. There are serious administrative difficulties in adopting a system such as my hon. friend suggests—difficulties particularly for the employer, because he would have to have one deduction for those employees who receive family allowances, and another deduction for those who do not. There would be administrative difficulties for the tax department in ascertaining whether or not family allowances had been claimed. There would have to be a complicated exchange of information. In my view what is more serious is that it implies that there is something wrong in a taxpayer taking family allowances who is eligible to receive them. It is true that on balance in the higher income bracket the taxpayer derives no net advantage from claiming family allowances under the system as it stands to-day. Under our proposed system, of course, he does, and taking into account all the factors, the greater ease of administration so far as the employer and the tax department is concerned, and the fact that parliament has approved the principle of family allowances, has declared that it is a desirable principle, I suggest it is not imposing any heavy burden on a man who is receiving five or six or seven thousand dollars a year to make a claim and receive the cheque once a month. There may be some practical disadvantage in the fact that his wife receives it instead of himself, but that is beside the point.

Mr. FLEMING: I take it that the government has made up its mind on this matter. The minister says that there is no compulsion. I say there is, in effect and in practice, compulsion. The government is saying to any individual who has children eligible for family allowances: Apply for and take your family allowances, or you forfeit both your right to family allowances and your right to $200 of deduction in respect to the maintenance of that child. That is in effect compulsion.

The minister also says parliament has approved the principle of family allowances, and he goes on to conclude that therefore everybody ought to take them. I say, Mr. Chairman, there ought to be a measure of freedom allowed in a case of that kind; but that measure of freedom is to be taken away from those who do not choose to accept the family allowances by the proposal now before us, and I submit that is a definite interference with reasonable liberty on the part of these taxpayers involved. The fact that parliament has approved the principle of paying family allowances to those entitled is no reason why parliament should say to every taxpayer in this country, "You must take the family allowances or you lose the benefit of a deduction of $200 in respect of each child of yours under sixteen years of age."

I make this observation on the administrative problem involved. In his remarks I think the minister has placed a high premium on the ease of administration.

Mr. ABBOTT: Ease for the employer, too. I emphasized that, as well as ease for the taxpayer.

Mr. FLEMING: All right. I am speaking now of the minister's remarks in reference to ease of administration in the department, and I may refer to the employer in a moment. The minister has placed a high premium on ease of administration in the department, when that ease is to be carried to the lengths proposed in this resolution. What does it mean in effect? It means the government is making people take a larger income by accepting benefits from the government, and making them pay higher taxes.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is not taxable.

Mr. FLEMING: In effect that is what it comes down to. The taxpayer is called upon to swell his income by accepting certain benefits from the government, and then to pay the government a tax on the amount he has received from it.

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. FLEMING: Certainly that is what it amounts to. It means the taxpayer is being called upon to accept from the government on the one hand, and to give back to the government on the other, because his tax is going to be higher.

Mr. ABBOTT: As my hon. friend knows, or should know, the family allowances are not included in the taxable income.

Mr. FLEMING: It comes down to this, that the taxpayer will be paying higher taxes because he will get a lower deduction in respect of his children. Surely the sensible thing to do is to allow the taxpayer the choice. Let him have the right to take the family allowance or the right to take the higher deduction in respect to the maintenance of the children. Surely if the government is going to say to the individual, "Take the family allowance and pay a higher tax, because your deduction in respect to your children is being lowered by $200," it is simply creating two transactions which I submit are unnecessary. It is carrying the ease of the department in simplified administration to the point where I think it is done with less than adequate consideration for common sense and for the rights of the taxpayers. I sometimes think, Mr. Chairman, if that proverbial man from Mars dropped down on this earth and heard the Canadian government saying to a taxpayer, "You accept this cheque we are handing you and then turn around and pay us higher amounts in quarterly instalments or by way of deduction from your salary or wage, and keep that circle going," he would prefer to return to Mars, thinking we were a pretty crazy people.

I have one final observation about the other point made by the minister. He touched on the simplification of the task of the employer in respect to making deductions. Well, Mr. Chairman, the government gets out forms; there seems to be no lack of them. Why should it be an insuperable obstacle in this instance? Why not say to the employer: If the employee chooses to accept the family allowance, this is the form to use. On the other hand if the employee choses not to take the family allowance but to take the deduction of $300 in respect of each child under sixteen years of age, form No. 2 should be used. Surely there is no great load cast on the employer in that respect. I can only conclude that the ease of the department in respect to family allowances in administering the Income War Tax Act is being exalted above the fair rights of the individual taxpayer.

Mr. ABBOTT: May I just comment on that?

Mr. HACKETT: I was going to add a few words, and perhaps the minister could comment on the little I have to say when he offers his comment on what the hon. member for Eglinton has said.

My objection to the provision is not one of convenience but one of principle. I object to being put into a class of government annuitants whether I wish to be or not. I object to a government making me a beneficiary of the state whether I wish to be or not. It is the violation of that elementary principle of liberty that I object to here. If I am not content to become an annuitant of the state the penalty is that I lose a direct benefit to which I am entitled as the father of a family. That is significant of an era which unfortunately is not new to hon. gentlemen opposite. There was a time when we looked upon the Liberal party as a Liberal party, a party which adhered to the doctrine of Liberalism, freedom, and respect for individual liberty. To-day we find that doctrine violated in almost every measure coming before this house. When we are told that, whether we will it or not, whether we need it or not, we must accept money which the government offers us or be fined, I say that is a denial of the elementary principles of which we as Canadians have been proud and of which hon. gentlemen opposite have held themselves out as the great protectors and advocates. This instance in itself is not of grave importance, but it is indicative to me of an attitude which is contemptuous of individual freedom. I resent it and I object to it.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I might deal with one subject at a time. I have no desire to comment on my hon. friend's exposition of the principles of Liberalism, because I have never looked upon him as an outstanding expert in that field. On the question raised by the hon. member for Eglinton, there is one fact that perhaps he has overlooked: that is, that it may well be in the interests of the taxpayer to receive the family allowance rather than rely on the exemption. There are bound to be a good many marginal cases where it is impossible for a man to know in advance what his income is going to be for a particular year. If he were to follow the system we followed last year and exercise an option as to whether or not he receives the family allowance relying on his being in an income bracket which would mean that it would be of no benefit to him, in the result during the year it might well prove that his income would fall below that figure and it would turn out that he had made a choice that was to his disadvantage.

There is no greater compulsion exercised here than in asking a man to declare in his income tax return whether he has children of an age which entitles him to the exemption. In other countries in which family allowances are in force there is no option; family allowances are paid on a universal basis to taxpayers who are eligible to receive them. Taking all the factors into account the government has come to the conclusion that the system which is proposed under the terms of this resolution is one which is in the interest of the taxpayers and of the government, which after all is the government of the people.

Mr. HACKETT: Would the minister be good enough to mention the countries in which these allocations are forced upon people whether they wish them or not?

Mr. ABBOTT: The United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand.

Mr. HACKETT: They all have socialistic governments.

Mr. PROBE: Far be it from me to come to the defence of the present government, but I listened with some amazement and amusement to the professions of principle propounded by my eloquent friends to the right, when they said they were forced into the position of becoming annuitants of the state whether they wished to be or not. I should like to remind the house of what took place quite commonly throughout parts of this country in the early years of the war when the government was pressed for funds to prosecute the war. Many citizens in this and in other countries objected to taking interest on moneys lent for the prosecution of the war. I have many friends in that category. They lent their money to the government without any return of interest, because their principles were such that they would not permit themselves to receive profit from the war. My good friends to the right are not prepared to stand by their professed principles, when to do so would cost them a few dirty pennies. It seems to me that they are off on the wrong foot this morning.

However, I did not rise particularly to take issue with them on this matter, although I feel it keenly. I rose to ask the minister what constitutes married status. I receive letters from time to time from married men who are earning their incomes in this country, but whose dependents are abroad. Owing to circumstances beyond their control, during the war years they were unable to remit moneys to their families. I believe that under income tax regulations this prevented their considering themselves as married persons for income tax purposes. Would the minister explain what relief a married taxpayer might have in the event of his permitting someone else to assume temporarily the obligations for the support of his family abroad?

Mr. ABBOTT: The regulations with respect to dependents of a class to which the hon. member refers are found in rule 3 of section 2 of the first schedule to the Income War Tax Act. The section reads as follows:

A taxpayer may deduct $150 from the graduated tax otherwise payable by him in any year under this section if, during the taxation year, such taxpayer was—

(a) a married person who supported his spouse and whose spouse was resident in any part of His Majesty's dominions or in a country contiguous to Canada, or, residing elsewhere, was a subject or citizen of a country associated or allied with Canada in the conduct of the war which commenced in September, nineteen hundred and thirty-nine, and was prevented by reason of such war, or prohibited by law, from entering or landing in Canada.

That covers the wife or husband who is in another country, the taxpayer residing here. Then, under the heading of "children," paragraph (b) refers to—

(b) a person with a son or daughter wholly dependent upon him for support, if the son or daughter was, during the taxation year,

(i) under eighteen years of age;

(ii) eighteen years of age or over and dependent by reason of mental or physical infirmity; or

(iii) under twenty-one years of age and a student at a secondary school, university or other educational institution.

This paragraph gives the same residence qualifications as apply to the wife or husband. I do not know whether that answers my hon. friend's question. If it does not, perhaps I might add that it would be a bit easier to discuss this question when the bill is before us. On the other hand, if he cares to pursue it further at this time, I shall be glad to try to clear the matter up.

Mr. PROBE: I should like to know whether the fact that it was impossible, because of exchange regulations, to send the money abroad, prevented such a married person from being classified as such.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that in cases where it was impossible to remit moneys to foreign countries—as, for example, in the case of China—the departmental practice has permitted a trust fund being set up here into which moneys can be paid, irrevocably. That would avail as justifying a claim for dependency, which of course would mean that some other arrangements would have to be made in the meantime for the support of the person abroad. I am informed that that is permitted under departmental practice.

Mr. PROBE: That regulation is in effect?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. LOW: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion which has taken place respecting the effect of family allowances in our income tax schedule. I am hoping that some hon. members are not taking this too lightly.

I have had experience in the administration of income tax regulations, and I believe I know something of what the minister and his staff would be facing. I do not blame the officials of the income tax branch for seeking some relief for themselves, as well as for the taxpayers. I know what the job is. But I know, too, that there are fairly large groups of people who, because of deep convictions, are not accepting family allowances. Their convictions will not allow them to do so, because they have always had a spirit of independence. Those same substantial groups of people have taken the same view with respect to relief. Over the years they have cooperated among themselves to remove their numbers from the relief rolls of the countries in which they live. As I have said, that was done to maintain so far as possible under existing circumstances that spirit of independence which, it seems to me, is of great importance in any people. Under the new income tax proposals we are going to kill that spirit, because we are going to force those who by conviction have refused to become wards of the government in any respect, to accept family allowances, or in the alternative to be penalized to the extent of $72 per child by way of extra taxation.

I point that out because to my mind it is important. I should not like to see anything done which would destroy the independent spirit of any group of people, I do not care who they are. I would rather by all means do everything in my power to assist the government or the administrators of the Income War Tax Act to find a way by which they could give those people a choice in the matter. If this is humanly possible, let us find that way.

I am not now speaking against family allowances, because I have always felt that they were a good thing. But I certainly do not like to see anything done that would destroy such a splendid spirit as we find among several groups of people, with one substantial group of which in Canada I am familiar.

Mr. COLDWELL: I find it difficult to understand that argument, coming from my hon. friend, because, as I understand it, the theory of my hon. friend is that everyone in the country should receive a dividend from the state.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Of $25 a month.

Mr. COLDWELL: Both millionaire and pauper. I must confess I find it very difficult to follow his argument.

Mr. LOW: You would, because you believe in compulsion.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not believe in compulsion. I say to the hon. member that his former leader stated categorically that dividends would be paid to millionaire and pauper; I remember the phraseology very well. Apparently the intention was that every millionaire would receive it as well as every pauper. However, I am not dealing with that at the moment.

It seems to me that the net result of this provision is that it does not make any difference whatsoever to the individual whether he accepts the family allowance or not. The point is that it places everyone in the country on a basis of equality, and on the basis of equality, not on the basis of compulsion, I believe it should be supported by hon. members

It is all very well to talk about interference with the liberty of the subject, but I get a little nettled when I hear people talk about the liberty of the subject who when they were in power compelled hundreds of thousands of people to stand in line and ask for pittances. There never was a time in the history of this country when people were so regimented and compelled to accept poverty as when my hon. friends were in power from 1930 to 1935. To hear this kind of thing about this budget seems to me to be fantastic.

Mr. LOW: There are two things I think I must answer to-day. I can quite understand what the leader of the C.C.F. has said, because his whole programme is based on compulsion.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is based on the liberty of the individual. These are the compulsory people on my right.

Mr. LOW: In the first place, the Social Credit group has never offered a programme based upon compelling anyone to accept anything. Whether or not a person accepts the dividend is his own business. He must register for it, and he has to make known his readiness to accept it. If he does not want to accept and if he does not want to register, he will not have to take it

Mr. ABBOTT: The same applies to family allowances.

Mr. LOW: The second point is this. As to compelling people to accept poverty, that is quite a different matter from compelling them to accept any person's or party's formula for getting out of poverty. Our whole programme is based upon choice. The individual has complete freedom to choose whether or not he will take a certain action. We have always supported the principle of family allowances, but we certainly do not want to lend our hand to making them compulsory. I am not saying that that principle is exactly the principle the minister has in mind, but I do say that the arrangement now being worked out does not give the people any choice except on a penalty. That is the thing that counts.

We believe in the distribution of the tax load according to ability to pay—I think we can all accept that principle. But you are not arranging the tax load according to ability to pay if you force people to accept family allowances as a condition of receiving a tax reduction. That is the principle I take exception to. Does the minister not think it is a serious matter to force an apparently substantial group of citizens who have deep convictions against the acceptance of family allowances into the position either of registering for them against their convictions or, in the alternative, of losing $72 per child?

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I might just say a word on this question of compulsion. In the first place, under our income tax law as it now stands and as it has stood for some years, those of us with incomes above a certain level have in fact been receiving family allowances. I have received a tax credit each year on my income tax of $108 for each of my three children. That was a form of family allowance to me as a taxpayer of $9 per month. It was not called a family allowance, but I was given a tax credit which meant that I paid $108 less tax every year for each one of my three children because they were under a certain age.

In reply to the impassioned plea of the hon. member for Stanstead that he did not want to be forced to accept anything he did not want to accept, let me point out that hon. gentlemen opposite have advocated old age pensions at sixty-five years of age without a means test. The other day I read through the statement made by the leader of the opposition on May 15 of last year when he advocated just such a policy. I cannot see any difference between an old age pension at sixty-five without a means test, payable to millionaire and pauper alike, and the payment of family allowances for all Canadian children under sixteen years of age.

I am advised that at the present time there are approximately 3,350,000 children for which family allowances are being paid, and that the change will add only about 150,000 to 175,000 children to the rolls. I cannot agree with the hon. member for Peace River that this is an objectionable form of compulsion. I do not think there is any more compulsion in it than to ask a man to declare in his income tax return whether he has children under sixteen years of age in order to get a $108 tax credit for each child. I understand that my hon. friend's group have advocated that we should pay old age pensions to all people over sixty-five years of age without a means test. If one is in favour of the principle of family allowances, and it has been endorsed by the house—I have yet to see a single hon. member stand up in his place and oppose it—then I say that no one should have any objection to filing a formal claim.

Mr. LOW: May I have an answer to my question? I did not attack the principle at all, but I ask the minister, does he not think it a serious matter to force family allowances upon a substantial group of people who by conviction are against them, or put them in the position of being penalized to the extent of $72 per child?

Mr. ABBOTT: I can answer that quite easily. Family allowances are part of the law of the land. If any citizen, by conviction or otherwise, feels that he does not want to accept this payment of $72 per year, that is his inalienable privilege as a British subject. However, he must be prepared to forfeit some monetary advantage because of his conviction. I do not think it is an improper use of government power to say that in common with millions of other citizens he should accept it, or if he does not, because of one reason or another, see fit to do it, that he should.

Mr. FLEMING: Some things have become clearer in the course of this discussion. Let us examine some of them for a moment. In the first place, the Acting Minister of Finance has said that family allowances are part of the law of the land, but I do not think it is the law of the land that those who are eligible for family allowances must accept them or lose. Surely the basis of our present family allowances is that people with children under sixteen years of age are entitled to a monthly payment in respect of each child if they choose to receive it. But now the government has tacked something on to that, and it says: Whether you like it or not, you must take that benefit, you must apply for it and accept it from the government each month or you are going to lose certain benefits. The minister has said that after all there is no difference. He says, speaking for himself, "I in effect was receiving the family allowance". I controvert that principle entirely. The minister was not receiving a family allowance; the minister was enjoying a right given to him by the law of this land, either to accept the family allowance, and forgo certain deductions, or to take those deductions.

Mr. ABBOTT: I had that right before there was any family allowance.

Mr. FLEMING: That right should be enjoyed by anyone. The minister is asking that parliament give to his personal judgment —his own preference, apparently, as it is now —the force of law for all citizens. He says: I think it is better that everyone should take the family allowance; therefore we are going to make everyone take the family allowance, and we are going to make everybody pay more income tax because we are going to reduce his deduction accordingly. I say that that is an evasion of the rights of the individual. It means that the government has made up its mind that everybody is to become the ward of the state—an annuitant, to use his own expression, whether he wishes it or not.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not use the word "annuitant"; that was your friend from Stanstead.

Mr. FLEMING: And it does not influence me in the least to take a view in favour of a resolution of this kind to see the leader of the C.C.F. rise and give it such vociferous support. If we want any better proof of the fact that inherent in this resolution is compulsion, you need no better evidence of it than the support given it to-day by the leader of the C.C.F.

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh, how ridiculous!

Mr. FLEMING: I do not know when gentlemen sitting to your right, Mr. Chairman, are going to wake up to the fact that they are being led down the path by the C.C.F., when they go on welcoming so enthusiastically, as they always do, the way in which the leader of the C.C.F. comes to the government's rescue, as he so often does.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The Tories favour reaction; that is the whole story.

Mr. FLEMING: If the Minister of Veterans Affairs has now decided that he is going to talk in the same tone as his colleagues, and not talk in different tones as he was doing on housing not so long ago, perhaps we can pay some attention to what he is saying.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I was here long before you were heard of.

Mr. FLEMING: If the Minister of Veterans Affairs goes on speaking as he is doing on the subject of the "aftermath", somebody one of these days is going to write finis to his career.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Are you against family allowances?

Mr. FLEMING: I am in favour of a system under which people will be allowed to accept family allowances, or not to take them without having a club held over their heads.

Mr. MARTIN: Tory reaction.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Go back to the eighteenth century where you belong.

Mr. FLEMING: It is too much to expect consistency from the Liberal party; and as for the leader of the C.C.F., he is living in the events of fifteen years ago. The Progressive Conservative party is living in modern times; it does not continue to live in the dark days of the ninteen-thirties.

An hon. MEMBER: When your party was in power.

Mr. FLEMING: The Liberal party was also in office in those days, and hon. members opposite can take what happiness they can get out of raking up the misfortunes of the people who suffered in this country then, as they suffered in every country in the world during the depression. So far as we are concerned we have learned some lessons from the experience of this country along with other countries in those days. I wish my hon. friend the leader of the C.C.F. would learn some lessons too.

Mr. MARTIN: Are you still opposed to family allowances?

Mr. GRAYDON: Get a new record.

Mr. FLEMING: Again we hear this question being parrotted by the Secretary of State.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. MARTIN: Are you opposed to family allowances?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Are you for or against?

Mr. FLEMING: If that question is the only contribution which the minister is able to make to this debate—

Mr. MARTIN: Are you opposed to family allowances?

Mr. FLEMING: I should be glad to give the answer. I have repeatedly said that I am in favour of a system of family allowances; I always have been, but not on the basis of holding a gun to people's heads and saying to everybody: "You have got to take it—or else." For the benefit of the leader of the C.C.F., who is still living back in the early thirties, I should like to give him a quotation from a speech delivered by a man whom, perhaps, my hon. friend the leader of the C.C.F. may yet succeed as leader of the Liberal party.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is a supporter over there.

Mr. FLEMING: Frankly I think his chances are about as good as anybody's.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. ABBOTT: Which resolution are we on?

Mr. FLEMING: The speech to which I am referring was made by the present Prime Minister of Canada when he was still leader of the opposition, in a hectic election campaign, on October 1, 1935.

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: Away back there in the thirties!

Mr. FLEMING: I am giving this for the benefit of the C.C.F., who have thrown up references to that period. This speech was made in Winnipeg. Making all due allowances for the fact that the Prime Minister delivered this speech in the heat of an election campaign—and we know that his speeches in the heat of election campaigns do not always jibe with the things he has said in this house, or with some of the things his cabinet ministers have been saying and parrotting since—this is what the Prime Minister said, as reported by the Canadian Press:

"I say that in making these promises Mr. Bennett set an example—"

He was speaking of Mr. Bennett's reform legislation in 1935; and if any members of the C.C.F want to say that they are opposed to that legislation I shall be glad to give them the opportunity.

". . . in making these promises Mr. Bennett set an example that is thoroughly immoral and thoroughly wrong and which, if it is followed in the future, will lead to the ruination of this country."

"Where is the difference," asked Mr. King, "between offering a great body of people $25 a month and going into a man's home and putting $25 into his hand in exchange for his vote?"

And then there was an interjection:

"Bribery," came a voice from the gallery.

"Someone said bribery," said Mr. King. "I say any party which seeks to obtain office by offering money out of the public treasury, whether in the form of cash or in the form of projects to benefit certain persons, is departing from the only basis on which you can keep a nation straight in regard to the administration of public affairs."

When you add to that, Mr. Chairman, the element of compulsion, I say that this government is trying to thrust down the throats of the people benefits which ought to be available to them if they want to take them, but as to which they should have an opportunity of making a choice, as they have to-day, instead of being compelled to take these family allowances. It does not seem to matter one iota to hon. gentlemen opposite that they are going to continue with this apparently endless process of building up a bureaucracy, creating more transactions for the government, making people more dependent on the government. Here is what it comes down to. The Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar have made up their minds that they prefer to see people compelled to take the family allowance—not given a choice. So far as I am concerned I insist that the principle is sound, and should be observed, that people shall still have the opportunity of saying whether they choose to take the deduction or whether they choose to take the family allowance.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I just say one word? The hon. gentleman who has just spoken threw in an innuendo when he quoted from a former speech of the Prime Minister. Whatever I may think of the Liberal party, I hope that among its own membership it could find a successor to the Prime Minister and not have to follow the example of the Tory party, who hunted from one end of this dominion to the other and then had to accept a gentleman who had always been opposed to them.

Mr. GRAYDON: A pretty successful hunt.

Mr. MACKENZIE: "Strike one!"

Mr. GRAYDON: The marriage is complete.

Mr. POULIOT: I appreciate what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said about Tory leadership, which must have reached rock bottom, because for the second time they have looked to the Liberal party to lead them. The two last leaders of the Tory party were former Liberals. However, that having been said, I rise as a peace maker for the second time in my parliamentary career, and I wish to absolve all my colleagues in the house, those belonging to all parties and groups. I will say that if they were not so careless at times we would not be in such a jam.

I have here a paper which was widely distributed during the election of 1935. It is entitled "Taxes." It was distributed by the Liberal party, and the one who was responsible for it was the member for Temiscouata, because he was asked by the member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) to prepare a list of taxes imposed by R. B. Bennett and his government, to serve as political propaganda during the election. It was my deep conviction that the Liberal party would come back to the taxation that existed before 1930 that caused me to prepare that list. The list gave all the taxes imposed by Bennett during the five years of his regime, and I expected them all to be erased, to be struck out by the Liberals, so that we would return to the happy days prior to 1930. That was my purpose, and the paper was widely distributed throughout the country. Those figures can be found in Hansard. If hon. members are doubtful about it they may go to Hansard of 1935, where they will find a list of the taxes imposed by the Bennett government from year to year, from 1930 to 1935 inclusive.

There was the sugar tax, and there were many other taxes. They were all to go, but none of them has gone. I will show what comes under this heading of taxes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Why don't you read it?

Mr. POULIOT: I have a French copy, but it was published in English as well. I will read part of it to show that before 1930 the government thought more of man-power, especially young man-power, than it did afterwards. I remember a speech which the hon. member for Peel delivered on March 3, 1943, when the social legislation was brought down. He spoke after the Prime Minister and said that when the war was over we would have to pay more attention to man-power. More attention should have been paid to man-power at that time, and always, because man-power is the greatest wealth of the country—not only gun flesh, bodies to be slaughtered, but brains with which to think, brains to help to get the country out of the hole in which it is. I have the greatest respect for my fellow citizens and I believe that all the gold mines in the country, all the inanimate wealth, all the deposits in the banks, are as nothing compared to a brain that is working normally, the brain of a child or the brain of a grown-up. Therefore I appeal to the brains and the intelligence of my colleagues when I speak to them now, and I hope that they will be conscious of their responsibility.

Let us see what happened. The exemption from income tax for married couples in 1930 was $3,000 and for single persons it was $1,500. In 1932 Bennett reduced the exemption for married persons from $3,000 to $2,400 and for single persons from $1,500 to $1,200. Then it became much worse from 1933 to 1935. The exemption was reduced for married persons from $2,400 to $2,000 and for single persons from $1,200 to $1,000, while for children it was reduced from $500 to $400. Hon. members must remember that until then the exemption for young children who were dependents was $500. To-day it is a miserable pittance compared to what it was then, because at that time man-power was better regarded than it is to-day.

Think of it—a reduction from $500 to $400. Everyone complained at the time. I said it was wrong, and I said so with sincerity because I hoped that my party, the Liberal party, would return to the old traditions which I knew before Bennett came to power. And now we have the same rule as when Bennett was in power—and I do not apply that reproach to Mr. Elliott, the deputy minister of taxation, or to the taxation branch of the government, but to the crazy fools who made the financial policies of this country, and who think only of destroying the purchasing power of individuals. I do not understand why the leader of the C.C.F. and the member for Eglinton, both well gifted colleagues, talk about compulsion. Each tax is a compulsion. Each tax destroys the purchasing power and destroys the personality of one man. Everyone will agree with that. Why single out any tax when all taxes are alike?

We must consider the cause of taxation, the foolish expenditures that are made. But we heard of extravagance in the amendment that was defeated yesterday, the amendment proposed by the Progressive Conservative party. They are thrifty of cents but they are ready to waste billions by enriching other countries at the expense of their own. They do not see that. They do not see the foolish extravagance of giving away billions of dollars at the expense of our own people, but when it comes to cents and a few small dollars, they are economical, and they complain about extravagance.

What hypocrisy! Why are we here month after month? It is more than two months since I decided not to speak, but I came here just to say a few words about the seven and a half billions that have not been accounted for. They may have been lost at Bikini and perhaps we shall hear about them to-day when the submarine bomb explodes. Perhaps it will come up to the surface. We hear much about active assets, and I was told that the $450 million that was given for the air force of Great Britain was an active asset. What is more foolish than that? And yet we hear intelligent people indulging in that idle talk day after day, discussing the effect without ever trying to remove the cause. The only way to remove the cause is for the members of the House of Commons to come to their senses and to see through the thick fog of prejudice and propaganda, to see clearly what is the interest of this country, and to make up their minds about it and decide to do something at last for the Canadian people.

The officials of the income tax branch are not responsible for these foolish expenditures; those who are responsible are the ones who have made the policies of the government, those silly policies which I condemn with all the power of my voice and the sincerity of my heart. Those who are responsible are those who have given us bureaucracy. Why should the members of any party complain about bureaucracy when we have so many Charlie McCarthy to the Bergens of the west block? There they are; they are marvellous people. We must listen to them. They are doctors honoris causa; they come from Queen's; they come from Toronto. They have been to Oxford, they have been to Cambridge, and it gives them a lustre, a kind of satin finish which makes them acceptable to all. And any one of those fools has more influence on the Minister of Finance than any member of parliament. Their word is the word of the gospel. They have landed here; they were landed in Ottawa by Bennett, by flattering his vanity, his immense vanity, by telling him that the North American continent was not fair to him, that he should be doctor of laws honoris causa of all universities on this continent; that he should swell up, that he should be just as big as the greatest giant who ever lived, a giant physically, mentally, et cetera, et cetera, et cetera.

What has been done for the farmer? I am sick of hearing my colleagues complaining of bureaucracy and doing nothing to curb it. The way to curb it is not to take away young people or young girls or boys who are stenographers or minor clerks. The thing to do is to cut the head off the snake. I am like St. Patrick; I follow his example. The first thing he did in evangelizing Ireland was to expel the snakes. I want the snakes to be expelled from office in Ottawa, the dangerous ones, those who are responsible for bringing this country to the position in which it is, of destroying economy, of destroying private initiative. They shall go. It is because of social parties that they do not go. Mrs. So-and-So meets Mrs. So-and-So, the wife of this eminent cabinet minister, and Mrs. So-and-So, the wife of this indispensable deputy, is very friendly with Mrs. So-and-So, who is in the social and personal column every day of the year. That is that. And who has to pay for it? The farmer has to pay for it; the man in overalls has to pay for it. Everyone has to pay for it. Here we are listening to it and indulging in shadow-boxing. Is it the C.C.F. who are responsible for compulsion? Yes, they are responsible for compulsion. Is it the Tory party? Yes, it is the Tory party. Is it the Liberal party? It is the Liberal party, and it is the Social Crediters. They are responsible—

Mr. LOW: No.

Mr. POULIOT: No, it is not? I do not think anyone is responsible for compulsion, because I have absolved all my colleagues. I referred to the discussion which took place in the house. It is the constant drawing of the red herring across the trail. The red herring becomes the political football; so it goes; time marches on; hon. members are satisfied when they say something cruel to the other party, and it usually comes back like a boomerang. Time passes. There are no reductions in taxes because the expenditure remains the same. How long have I to repeat the same thing to my colleagues?—because I do not consider that they are bereft of intelligence. I boost them every time I have the opportunity to do so; I want to wake them up. How is it that the English speaking audiences whom I have the honour to address all over the country are ready to think their own thoughts? I do not want to convey any of my thoughts to my colleagues; what I want them to do is to stop and think of the tremendous responsibilities of R. B. Bennett when he installed in the Bank of Canada and in the west block these men who have the power of life and death over all Canadian citizens.

I am not bigoted; I am not against the Jews. I believe that the Jews who are Canadians should have the same rights as all others, but on the other hand I do not see why the Jew should have more rights than the Canadian. I cannot understand how it is that one Rasminsky, one of those who built up the bureaucratic structure, not long ago in a committee of the house refused to give information to members of parliament. He knew something that no one else knew with the exception of the Minister of Finance. Is it fair? I am not bigoted because I speak in this way; I am not to minimize the rights of any Canadian citizen. I want them to be free and happy in this great country. But I do not see how it is that one man, whether he belongs to one race or another—if he were French Canadian I would denounce him just as bitterly as I denounce Rasminsky—how is it that one man is so secret, has a mystery which he will not give to others? These are the people who built up this chain of mountains of taxation, and we go on like that. What will be the way out? Did hon. members ever think of it? Our war expenditures amounted to $30 billion. We have to pay it, unquestionably so. Oh, we have to abandon our responsibility to all the debt.

I believe in private initiative; I believe in the savings of the people. Everyone remembers the progress that communism made in France because of the devaluation of the franc. All those who were receiving superannuation, either government or otherwise, were ruined, as they were ruined. The only door open to them was communism. They wanted to share the whole as theirs had gone with the wind. The example of France will be remembered by all. There is something else that should be remembered by all. It is that in France the reason why scoundrels took power was the indifference of the good people. They were indifferent to what was going on in France. It is the same thing in Canada, because the Canadian people have their eyes on us, and those who are indifferent to foolish, silly, dangerous and indifferent Canadian expenditures are precisely the members of parliament who seem to be blindfolded, who do not see any clearer than the French citizens, the French men and women, did before the war When one asks them, "What do you think of politics?" they say, "I don't care; it is the job of politicians." Here we are not politicians; we are Canadians. I have the greatest admiration for my colleagues; I respect them, and I want them to keep the respect of my fellow citizens. I could easily raise prejudices when I go here and there—religious prejudice, racial prejudice—but I never do. I never do because in spite of all the trouble, in spite of all the humiliation, in spite of all the difficulties that we have in this country, I still hope for a better future, but a future that is in the hands of the House of Commons more than in the hands of the Senate, because the elected members of parliament who sit in the House of Commons are closely in touch with their constituents, while the Senate is independent, is appointed by the government and has not to run for office. But now the Senate puts the House of Commons to shame in spite of the fact that the senators are about the average age of—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. The speech which the hon. member is making is entirely out of order on the section now before the committee. The section we are dealing with reads as follows:

That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years the following deductions from income be allowed:

Then it goes on to enumerate the deductions. I believe hon. members are anxious to get on with the business, and I should hope we would try to confine our remarks now entirely to these sections.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir.

Mr. KNOWLES: Before the hon. member goes on, in view of his last statement that he is most anxious not to raise any religious or racial prejudice will he make it clear that his references to Mr. Rasminsky were made of him as a Canadian and an official, and not because of his race?

Mr. POULIOT: I shall do so gladly; and my hon. friend will remember that I said even if he were a French Canadian I would say the same thing.

Mr. KNOWLES: My thought was that it would have been better for the hon. gentleman to refer to the official in question by name instead of bringing in the question of race at all, because it can be so easily misunderstood.

Mr. POULIOT: Perhaps so, but my hon. friend knows I have never raised any racial or religious issues. What I cannot understand is that one man in the whole country should have a secret which he shares with the Minister of Finance but which we, as colleagues of the minister, cannot know. That is my point.

Mr. ABBOTT: I can answer that very quickly, if my hon. friend desires. It is considered advisable by the minister that figures with respect to foreign exchange holdings should not be disclosed until a period of six months has elapsed; and I think that is for obvious reasons. The bill which is now under consideration provides that the annual statement of the board will not be produced until six months after the end of the year. There is no secret or mystery about that; it is known to the minister, but there are other aspects of government administration, including the income of individual taxpayers, which are known only to certain officials and to the minister. But I want to say, in the case of the civil servant, the official of the Bank of Canada referred to, that the refusal to disclose the information asked for was on instructions of the minister, not on his own initiative. I want to make that perfectly clear.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, sir, I blame the minister for giving such instructions.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is proper, but do not blame the civil servant.

Mr. POULIOT: And I blame him very strongly. When there is information which is not to be publicized the government should have enough confidence in hon. members to give it to them privately if it is not to be given publicly.

Mr. ABBOTT: The government only asks for delay in publication of this information, that is all.

Mr. POULIOT: I notice the acting minister is much more open-minded than the minister himself, and though of course he is bound by his duty to take a certain stand I give the devil what is due to him. My hon. friend is not the devil; he is a very good friend. Now, sir, I want to make myself very clear on that question. At the present time we hear a great deal about a higher standard of living. How is it possible for a family to have a higher standard of living with the present taxes? It is most absurd, because the cost of living has increased tremendously and we are in a worse position than in the thirties, when taxes were much lower. That is not taken into consideration.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I hope the hon. member will keep to this resolution, which is No. 2.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir; that is exactly what I am doing now. I am speaking of the impossibility of a Canadian family achieving a higher standard of living under the pressure of our present taxation. I say it is the more absurd because the taxation is heavier than it was when the cost of living was much less. Fifteen or sixteen years ago the cost of living was much lower than it is now, and at the same time taxation was much less. Taxation is heavier now because expenditures are heavier, and I consider myself strictly in order in mentioning the cause of the heavy taxation which is such a burden upon the people. It is my fervent hope that members of the house, all those who are liberal-minded whether they sit with the Progressive Conservative party, the Liberal party—because there are still some liberal-minded people in the Liberal party—the C.C.F. or the Social Crediters, will consider every measure upon its merits, without being influenced by propaganda of any kind from any source; and I hope they will not forget their own constituents when they take a stand on a matter of importance in the House of Commons. At times sentiment is a very fine thing. When young people are in love their sentiment is praised by all. Love may inspire fine sentiments, but here we are with a tremendous responsibility which is the collective responsibility of all members of parliament, to ensure and assure order and good government in this country. At the present time we have disorder; the strikes prove it. Why are there strikes? Precisely because the taxation on the working man is so high that he has not enough left to meet current expenses.

Mr. KNOWLES: Because they do not have enough on which to pay taxes.

Mr. POULIOT: Exactly, on account of the taxes. If the income of the working man was not cut as it is by taxation his standard of living would be much higher and he would not have to go on strike to remedy his difficulties and deficiencies. It is taxation that has reduced the salaries of the working men, professional men and everyone else. Here we are given a little relief, but it is not the relief that was expected by the Canadian people. If taxation were lower I know many strikes would be settled at once. The men engaged in our industries which are the pride of Canada managed very well and had a good understanding with their employers previously. They made sacrifices during the war in the expectation that once the war was over the tax burden would be alleviated. Now they are disappointed; their cheques are reduced at the source, and they cannot get along on what they receive. So they ask their employers for higher wages. We have an example of that here, under this very roof. I am not in a position to say who is right, but I know the burden of taxation is so heavy because of the expenditures that have been approved by this house, and as a result we now have the difficulties that overpower us. My only hope, and it is the hope I express to my constituents when I visit my constituency, is that each member of parliament, whether he belongs to any party or any group, will do his own thinking about all the problems we have to solve. It is said that the consensus is the criterion of truth. I believe that is so, because when a man considers a matter objectively upon its merits, without being influenced by any propaganda, he may reach the same opinion that has been reached in similar circumstances by one who may be thousands of miles away, but who has used his intelligence to discover the truth—truth which may have been forgotten for a long time, and which must reign in this country if we want to have order and good government.

Mr. HAZEN: I wish to bring to the attention of the minister a condition which I believe does not make for justice and which in my opinion should be corrected. I have reference to the taxes imposed upon domestic servants in different parts of the country. Domestic servants in the maritime provinces are charged $26 per month for board and lodging when they come to make up their income tax returns. In Quebec they are charged only $15 a month. I have not the figures for the other provinces and I am not trying to draw any distinction between Quebec and the maritime provinces. I refer to Quebec only because I have not the figures for the other provinces. This works a hardship on the domestic servants in the maritime provinces. Their incomes are figured out at $312 a year for board and lodging, while those in Quebec are figured out at $180. So when they come to completing their tax, domestic servants in the maritime provinces have $312 assessed against them as income, while those in Quebec have only the smaller amount. Domestic servants in the maritimes do not get better board or lodging than those in Quebec. Their board and lodging probably costs no more than it does in Quebec. I would ask the minister to look into the matter to see if it can be rectified. It seems to me it is a discrepancy which should be corrected.

Mr. ISNOR: I support the hon. member for St. John-Albert in what he has said. I have received the same complaint from persons living in Halifax and other parts of Nova Scotia. I would ask the minister to look into the matter. Parallel to that is the case of the railway porters, stewards and waiters who operate on the Atlantic region between Halifax and Montreal. They complain that whereas the operators in the central and other regions of the Canadian National system are not taxed on tips, those in the Atlantic region are taxed to the extent of $300. If this is so, it is a clear case of discrimination, and I would ask the minister to look into it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be glad to do so. I agree with both hon. members that there should be no discrimination between servants employed in the maritimes and those employed in other provinces. I shall look into the matter and see what is causing this condition.

Mr. KNOWLES: Under this section which deals with deductions from income I should like to ask a question about a matter I brought up two years ago. Looking through Hansard of that year I find the same minister was before the committee, acting as parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance. Therefore to some of us it seems only natural to have him acting as minister to-day. It is of particular interest too, in view of the rumours one reads in the newspapers from time to time.

Mr. ABBOTT: Pay no attention to rumours.

Mr. KNOWLES: The matter which I again draw to the minister's attention is that of the discrimination between train conductors and sleeping car conductors—and in the same class as the sleeping car conductors are the sleeping car porters. The relevant definition in the act states that—

> 5. (1) "Income" as hereinbefore defined shall for the purpose of this act be subject to the following exemptions and deductions . . .
> (f) Travelling expenses, including the entire amount expended for meals and lodging, while away from home in the pursuit of a trade or business.

As a result of that wording, and the interpretation of it, sleeping car conductors and train conductors travelling on the same train find themselves in different positions in the matter of deductions for expenses incurred away from home. The sleeping car conductors and porters point out that as a matter of fact they are away from home more than other members of the crew, but because of the difference in the way they are paid, one on a mileage and the other on a monthly basis, the discrimination still holds.

When the matter was discussed two years ago the minister expressed sympathy with the representations made. Indeed on one occasion the Minister of Finance cited this as an example of unfairness cutting right across an industry, because of the hodge-podge way in which our income tax legislation has grown up. I had hoped that in this partial revision and simplification of the Income War Tax Act consideration would be given to the matter. I see nothing in the resolution to indicate that that is so. Has consideration been given to rewording the section so that these two classes of employees shall be on the same basis as to deductions allowable from income because of away-from-home expenses.

Mr. ABBOTT: I recall the occasion upon which the matter was discussed. I am informed that following that time the condition has been considered at four or five conferences which have been held between departmental officials and officers of the two employees' organizations involved. We are conscious of the problem. It has not been possible however to work out a solution, and there is nothing in these resolutions on which an amendment to the act could be based. The matter has been under consideration. It is a difficult and complex problem. There are others affected in addition to the two groups mentioned by the hon. member. As I say, both sides are fully aware of the position and of the complexity of the problem, and discussions are still proceeding. It will not be possible to do anything at this time.

Mr. KNOWLES: I want to express once again the hope that the government will carry out what was expressed in the statement made two years ago by the Minister of Finance that this complex matter called for some solution. It is cold comfort to these people to be told that they are caught in a difficult situation. I think by next year we should get, not just a series of amendments to the Income War Tax Act, but a brand new income tax act which will take care of many of these anomalies.
